Obs. XI. The state of the gospel, or of the church under the new testament, being accompanied with the highest spiritual privileges and advantages that it is capable of in this world, two things do thence follow: —

1. The great obligation that is on all believers unto holiness and fruitfulness in obedience, unto the glory of God. We have herein the utmost condescension of divine grace, and the greatest effects of it that God will communicate on this side glory. That which all these things tend unto, that which God requireth and expecteth upon them, is the thankful and fruitful obedience of them that are made partakers of them. And they who are not sensible of this obligation are strangers unto the things themselves, and are not able to discern spiritual things, because they are to be spiritually discerned.

2. The heinousness of their sin by whom this covenant is neglected or despised is hence abundantly manifest. This the apostle particularly asserts and insists upon, Hebrews 2:2, 3, 10:28, 29.

Notes on the difference between the Old and New Covenants by Thomas Watson:

Thomas Watson (A Body of Divinity, pg 155) states:

Why should God make a covenant with us?

It is out of indulgence, favour, and regard to us. A tyrant will not enter into a covenant with slaves, he will not show them such respect. God's entering into a covenant with us, to be our God, is a dignity he puts upon us. A covenant is insigne honouris, a note of distinction between God's people and heathens. 'I will establish my covenant with thee.' Ezek. 16: 60. When the Lord told Abraham that he would enter into a covenant with him, Abraham fell upon his face, as being amazed that the God of glory should bestow such a favour upon him. Gen 17: 2.

God makes a covenant with us, to tie us fast to him; as it is called in Ezekiel, the 'bond of the covenant.' God knows we have slippery hearts, therefore he will have a covenant to bind us. It is horrid impiety to go away from God after covenant. If one of the vestal nuns, who had vowed herself to religion, was deflowered, the Romans caused her to be burnt alive. It is perjury to depart from God after solemn covenant.

How does the covenant of grace differ from the first covenant made with Adam?

(I.) The terms of the first covenant were more strict and severe. For,

(1) The least failing would have made the covenant with Adam null and void, but many failings do not annul the covenant of grace. I grant, the least sin is a trespass upon the covenant, but it does not make it null and void. There may be many failings in the conjugal relation, but every failing does not break the marriage bond. It would be sad, if, as oft as we break covenant with God he should break covenant with us; but God will not take advantage of every failing, but in 'anger remember mercy.'

(2) The first covenant being broken, allowed the sinner no remedy, all doors of hope were shut; but the new covenant allows the sinner a remedy: it leaves room for repentance, and provides a mediator. 'Jesus the mediator of the new covenant.' Heb 12: 24.

Properties of a Covenant and Testament

Definitions and implications thereof clearly point to particularity in redemption.

The benefits of the new testament depends upon the death and resurrections of the testator, Jesus Christ, after which he bequeaths his goods, the good things procured by his death, faith, grace and glory hereafter, to his elect, the church. It has to be this way if it be a testament, where an inheritance is involved. An inheritance is not open ended but designed for those for who named in the covenant. Remember a covenant is no covenant without distinct persons involved on both sides that are to be reconciled, hence, those who receive the inheritance are those who were chosen in Him, actual individuals, the elect (the election hath obtained it - -om11:7). So that this covenant or testament made by God and those things in it to be bestowed or bequeathed to the beneficiaries are not just things made available but will actually be bestowed infallibly to those who God chose - --yet he hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things, and sure:" "Sam23:5 . In this way, salvation is sure to the elect not just a possibility, depending upon the free will of man whether or not he will chose Christ as the Arminians suppose. It is an inconsistency to say that the effect (salvation or receiving Christ) comes before the cause (God's disposing of virtue, the communication of his glory) or that man's act of believing creates its own object.

Therefore, God had a purpose in mind to infallibly bring to pass his will in glorifying himself in the salvation of his church by his free sovereign grace without any antecedent merit or acts in the creature to include believing or faith or any other work (Romans 9:11..that election might stand) - Arminian doctrine says that one must believe to warrant the gift of the promises. But this is a mistake, for the very ability of believing is the very thing that is bestowed on one who God intends to convert - --o the Arminians have it all backwards; they believe that we have it in our power to believe before we receive the gift of believing, i.e., faith! So, I added this real long discourse on the covenant to give you an appreciation of this sovereign act of God infinite wisdom of the way of salvation, so that in the end you will know the things that are revealed to us, these mysteries, because they are invaluable to our growing in faith and grace, being conformed to his image and that we might walk worthy of the Lord, Col. 1:9, all of which will lead you to react as Paul did in Romans 11:33, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!"

Hebrews 8:6 pg52-78 (p63-95 online) by John Owen

Ver. 6. —But now he hath obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also he is the mediator of a better covenant, which was established on better promises.

3. The general way whereby our Lord Christ came unto this ministry is expressed: Τετευχε, —"He obtained it." Τυχαῖως either "sorte contingo," "to have a lot or portion;" or to have anything befall a man, as it were by accident; or "assequor," "obtineo," to "attain" or "obtain" anything which before we had not. But the apostle designeth not to express in this word the especial call of Christ, or the particular way whereby he came unto his ministry, but only in general that he had it, and was possessed of it, in the appointed season, which before he had not. The way whereby he entered on the whole office and work of his mediation he expresseth by χεκληρονομηχε, Hebrews 1:4, — he had it by “inheritance;” that is, by free grant and perpetual donation, made unto him as the Son. See the exposition on that place.

There were two things that concurred unto his obtaining this ministry: (1.) The eternal purpose and counsel of God designing him thereunto; an act of the divine will accompanied with infinite wisdom, love, and power. [This the Arminian do not like; they do not like the idea of God's decree that would overrule man's liberty or freedom, his so called self-directed will.] (2.) The actual call of God, whereunto many things did concur, especially his unction with the Spirit above measure for the holy discharge of his whole office. Thus did he obtain this ministry, and not by any legal constitution, succession, or carnal rite, as did the priests of old. And we may see that, —

Obs. V. The exaltation of the human nature of Christ into the office of this glorious ministry depended solely on the sovereign wisdom, grace, and love of God. —When the human nature of Christ was united unto the divine, it became, in the person of the Son of God, meet and capable to make satisfaction for the sins of the church, and to procure righteousness and life eternal for all that do believe. But it did not merit that union, nor could do so. For as it was utterly impossible that any created nature, by any act of its own, should merit the hypostatical union, so it was granted unto the human nature of Christ antecedently unto any act of its own in way of obedience unto God; for it was united unto the person of the Son by virtue of that union. Wherefore, antecedently unto it, it could merit nothing. Hence its whole exaltation, and the ministry that was discharged therein, depended solely on the sovereign wisdom and pleasure of God. And in this election and designation of the human nature of Christ unto grace and glory, we may see the pattern and example of our own. For if it was not upon the consideration or foresight of the obedience of the human nature of Christ that it was predestinated and chosen unto the grace of the hypostatical union, with the ministry and glory which depended thereon, but of the mere sovereign grace of God; how much less could a foresight of anything in us be the cause why God should choose us in him before the foundation of the world unto grace and glory!

4. The quality of this ministry, thus obtained, as unto a comparative excellency, is also expressed: “More excellent.” The word is used only in this epistle in this sense, Hebrews 1:4, and in this place. The original word denotes only a difference from other things; but in the comparative degree, as here used, it signifies a difference with a preference, or a comparative excellency. The ministry of the Levitical priests, was good and useful in its time and season; this of our Lord Jesus Christ so differed from it as to be better than it, and more excellent. And, —

5. There is added hereunto the degree of this pre-eminence, so far as it is intended in this place and the present argument, in the word οσω — “by how much.” ‘So much more excellent, by how much.’ The excellency of his ministry above that of the Levitical priests, bears proportion with the excellency of the covenant whereof he was the mediator above the old covenant wherein they administered; whereof afterwards.

So have we explained the apostle's assertion, concerning the excellency of the ministry of Christ. And herewith he closes the discourse which he had so long engaged in, about the pre-eminence of Christ in his office above the high priests of old. And indeed, this being the very hinge whereon his whole controversy with the Jews did depend, he could not give it too much evidence, nor too full a confirmation. And as unto what concerns ourselves at present, we are taught thereby, that, —

Obs. VI. It is our duty and our safety to acquiesce universally and absolutely in the ministry of Jesus Christ. — That which he was so designed unto, in the infinite wisdom and grace of God; that which he was so furnished for the discharge of by the communication of the Spirit unto him in all fullness; that which all other priesthoods were removed to make way for, must needs be sufficient and effectual for all the ends unto which it is designed. It may be said, 'This is that which all men do; all that are called Christians do fully acquiesce in the ministry of Jesus Christ.' But if it be so, why do we hear the bleating of another sort of cattle? What mean those other priests, and reiterated sacrifices, which make up the worship of the church of Rome? If they rest in the ministry of Christ, why do they appoint one of their own to do the same things that he hath done, — namely, to offer sacrifice unto God ?

Secondly, The proof of this assertion lies in the latter part of these words; “By how much he is the mediator of a better covenant, established on better promises” The words are so disposed, that some think the apostle intends now to prove the excellency of the covenant from the excellency of his ministry therein. But the other sense is more suited unto the scope of the place, and the nature of the argument which the apostle presseth the Hebrews withal. For on supposition that there was indeed another, and that a “better covenant,” to be introduced and established, than that which the Levitical priests served in, — which they could not deny, — it plainly follows, that he on whose ministry the dispensation of that covenant did depend must of necessity be “more excellent” in that ministry than they who appertained unto that covenant which was to be abolished. However, it may be granted that these things do mutually testify unto and illustrate one another. Such as the priest is, such is the covenant; such as the covenant is in dignity, such is the priest also.

In the words there are three things observable: — 1. What is in general ascribed unto Christ, declaring the nature of his ministry; he was a “mediator:” 2. The determination of his mediatory office unto the new covenant; “of a better covenant:” 3. The proof or demonstration of the nature of this covenant as unto its excellency, it was “established on better promises:” —

1. His office is that of a mediator, — one that interposed between God and man, for the doing of all those things whereby a covenant might be established between them, and made effectual Schlichtingius on the place gives this description of a mediator: “Mediatorem foederis esse nihil aliud est, quam Dei esse interpretem, et internuntium in foedere cum hominibus pangendo; per quem scilicet et Deus voluntatem suam hominibus declarer, et illi vicissim divinae voluntatis notitia instructi ad Deum accedant, cumque eo reconciliati, pacem in posterum. And Grotius speaks much unto the same purpose.

[Google Translate from Latin: "The Mediator of the covenant, to be nothing else than to be an interpreter of God, and a go-between in league with the men pangendo; the will of God to men, and whereby he is declarer, and equipped for the knowledge of God, and they look at the approach of the divine will, and live with him, being reconciled, to cultivate peace in the future,"]” My input - Socinians do not believe in the imputation of righteousness to the elect hence they only believe that Jesus just points the way and disregards the atoning sacrifice of Christ which is the primary act of his priestly duty as High Priest. Also, Arminians do not believe in the imputation of Adam's sin to all his posterity which has a direct bearing on the doctrine of Original Sin, i.e., they don't believe it; they believe that we have some virtue in us after the fall, that we can come to God by our self-directed wills or can resist God's grace; either way.

But this description of a mediator is wholly applicable unto Moses, and suited unto his office in giving of the law. See Exodus 20:19; Deuteronomy 5:27, 28. What is said by them doth indeed immediately belong unto the mediatory office of Christ, but it is not confined thereunto; yea, it is exclusive of the principal parts of his mediation. And whereas there is nothing in it but what belongs unto the prophetic office of Christ, —which the apostle here doth not principally intend, —it is most improperly applied as a description of such a mediator as he doth intend. And therefore, when he comes afterwards to declare in particular what belonged unto such a mediator of the covenant as he designed, he expressly placeth it in his “death for the redemption of transgressions,” Hebrews 9:15; affirming that” for that cause he was a mediator.” But hereof there is nothing at all in the description they give us of this office. But this the apostle doth in his, elsewhere, 1 Timothy 2:5, 6, “There is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all.” The principal part of his mediation consisted in the “giving himself a ransom,” or a price of redemption for the whole church. Wherefore this description of a mediator of the new testament is feigned only, to exclude his satisfaction, or his offering himself unto God in his death and blood shedding, with the atonement made thereby.

The Lord Christ, then, in his ministry, is called μεσσιτης, the “mediator” of the covenant, in the same sense as he is called ergguov, the “surety;” whereof see the exposition on Hebrews 7:22. He is, in the new covenant, the mediator, the surety, the priest, the sacrifice, all in his own person. The ignorance and want of a due consideration hereof, are the great evidence of the degeneracy of Christian religion.

Whereas this is the first general notion of the office of Christ, that which compriseth the whole ministry committed unto him, and containeth in itself the especial offices of king, priest, and prophet, whereby he dischargeth his mediation, some things must be mentioned that are declarative of its nature and use. And we may unto this purpose observe, —

(1.) That unto the office of a mediator it is required that there be different persons concerned in the covenant, and that by their own wills; as it must be in every compact, of what sort soever. So saith our apostle, “A mediator is not of one, but God is one,” Galatians 3:20; that is, if there were none but God concerned in this matter, as it is in an absolute promise or sovereign precept, there would be no need of, no place for a mediator, such a mediator as Christ is. Wherefore our consent in and unto the covenant is required in the very notion of a mediator. Jonathan Edwards noted similarly, meaning that God is one side of the transaction.

(2.) That the persons entering into covenant be in such a state and condition as that it is no way convenient or morally possible that they should treat immediately with each other as to the ends of the covenant; for if they are so, a mediator to go between is altogether needless. So was it in the original covenant with Adam, which had no mediator. But in the giving of the law, which was to be a covenant between God and the people, they found themselves utterly insufficient for an immediate treaty with God, and therefore desired that they might have an internuncius to go between God and them, to bring his proposals, and carry back their consent, Deuteronomy 5:23-27. And this is the voice of all men really convinced of the holiness of God, and of their own condition. Such is the state between God and sinners. The law and the curse of it did so interpose between them, that they could not enter into any immediate treaty with God, Psalm 5:3-5. This made a mediator necessary, that the new covenant might be established; whereof we shall speak afterwards.

(3.) That he who is this mediator be accepted, trusted, and rested in on both sides, or the parties mutually entering into covenant. An absolute trust must be reposed in him, so that each party may be everlastingly obliged in what he undertaketh on their behalf; and such as admit not of his terms, can have no benefit by, no interest in the covenant. So was it with the Lord Christ in this matter. On the part of God, he reposed the whole trust of all the concernments of the covenant in him, and absolutely rested therein. "Behold," saith he of him, "my servant, whom I uphold; mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth," or is "well pleased," — εν ω ευσοχησα, Isaiah 42:1; Matthew 3:17. When he undertook this office, and said, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God," the soul of God rested in him, Exodus 23:21; John 5:20-22. And to him he gives an account at last of his discharge of this thing, John 17:4. And on our part, unless we resign ourselves absolutely unto a universal trust in him and reliance on him, and unless we accept of all the terms of the covenant as by him proposed, and engage to stand unto all that he hath undertaken on our behalf, we can have neither share nor interest in this matter. [hence, Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, Ps110:3]

(4.) A mediator must be a middle person between both parties entering into covenant; and if they be of different natures, a perfect, complete mediator ought to partake of each of their natures in the same person. The necessity hereof, and the glorious wisdom of God herein, I have elsewhere at large demonstrated, and shall not therefore here again insist upon it.

(5.) A mediator must be one who voluntarily and of his own accord undertaketh the work of mediation. This is required of everyone who will effectually mediate between any persons at variance, to bring them unto an agreement on equal terms. So it was required that the will and consent of Christ should concur in his susception of this office; and that they did so, himself expressly testifieth, Hebrews 10:5-10. It is true, he was designed and appointed by the Father unto this office; whence he is called his "servant," and constantly witnesseth of himself, that he came to do the will and commandment of him that sent him: but he had that to do in the discharge of this office, which could not, according unto any rule of divine righteousness, be imposed on him without his own voluntary consent. And this was the ground of the eternal compact that was between the Father and the Son, with respect unto his mediation; which I have elsewhere explained. And the testification of his own will, grace, and love, in the susception of this office, is a principal motive unto that faith and trust which the church placeth in him, as the mediator between God and them. Upon this his voluntary undertaking doth the soul of God rest in him, and he repositeth the whole trust in him of accomplishing his will and pleasure, or the design of his love and grace in this covenant, Isaiah 53:10-12. And the faith of the church, whereon salvation doth depend, must have love unto his person inseparably accompanying it. Love unto Christ is no less necessary unto salvation, than faith in him. And as faith is resolved into the sovereign wisdom and grace of God in sending him, and his own ability to save to the uttermost those that come to God by him; so love ariseth from the consideration of his own love and grace in his voluntary undertaking of this office, and the discharge of it.

[1.] That he should remove and take out of the way whatever kept the covenanters at a distance, or was a cause of enmity between them. For it is supposed that such an enmity there was, or there had been no need of a mediator. Therefore in the covenant made with Adam, there having been no variance between God and man, nor any distance but what necessarily ensued from the distinct natures of the Creator and a creature, there was no mediator. But the design of this covenant was to make reconciliation and peace. Hereon, therefore, depended the necessity of satisfaction, redemption, and the making of atonement, by sacrifice. For man having sinned and apostatized from the rule of God, making himself thereby obnoxious unto his wrath, according unto the eternal rule of righteousness, and in particular unto the curse of the law, there could be no new peace and agreement made with God unless due satisfaction were made for these things. For although God was willing, in infinite love, grace, and mercy, to enter into a new covenant with fallen man, yet would he not do it unto the prejudice of his righteousness, the dishonor of his rule, and the contempt of his law. Wherefore none could undertake to be a mediator of this covenant, but he that was able to satisfy the justice of God, glorify his government, and fulfill the law. And this could be done by none but him, concerning whom it might be said that “God purchased his church with his own blood.

[2.] That he should procure and purchase, in a way suited unto the glory of God, the actual communication of all the good things prepared and proposed in this covenant; that is, grace and glory, with all that belong unto them, for them and on their behalf whose surety he was. And this is the foundation of the merit of Christ, and of the grant of all good things unto us for his sake.

(7.) It is required of this mediator, as such, that he give assurance to and undertake for the parties mutually concerned, as to the accomplishment of the terms of the covenant, undertaking on each hand for them: —

[1.] On the part of God towards men, that they shall have peace and acceptance with him, in the sure accomplishment of all the promises of the covenant. This he doth only declaratively, in the doctrine of the gospel, and in the institution of the ordinances of evangelical worship. For he was not a surety for God, nor did God need any, having confirmed his promise with an oath, swearing by himself, because he had no greater to swear by.

[2.] On our part, he undertakes unto God for our acceptance of the terms of the covenant, and our accomplishment of them, by his enabling us thereunto.

These things, among others, were necessary unto a full and complete mediator of the new covenant, such as Christ was. And, —

Obs. VII. The provision of this mediator between God and man was an effect of infinite wisdom and grace; yea, it was the greatest and most glorious external effect of them that ever they did produce, or ever will do in this world. The creation of all things at first out of nothing was a glorious effect of infinite wisdom and power; but when the glory of that design was eclipsed by the entrance of sin, this provision of a mediator, — one whereby all things were restored and retrieved into a condition of bringing more glory unto God, and securing forever the blessed estate of them whose mediator he is, — is accompanied with more evidences of the divine excellencies than that was. See Ephesians 1:10.

2. Two things are added in the description of this mediator: (1.) That he was a mediator of a covenant; (2.) That this covenant was better than another which respect is had unto, whereof he was not the mediator: —

(1.) He was the mediator of a “covenant.” And two things are supposed herein: —

[1.] That there was a covenant made or prepared between God and man; that is, it was so far made, as that God who made it had prepared the terms of it in a sovereign act of wisdom and grace. The preparation of the covenant, consisting in the will and purpose of God graciously to bestow on all men the good things which are contained in it, all things belonging unto grace and glory, as also to make way for the obedience which he required herein, is supposed unto the constitution of this covenant.

[2.] That there was need of a mediator, that this covenant might be effectual unto its proper ends, of the glory of God and the obedience of mankind, with their reward. This was not necessary from the nature of a covenant in general; for a covenant may be made and entered into between different parties without any mediator, merely on the equity of the terms of it. Nor was it so from the nature of a covenant between God and man, as man was at first created of God; for the first covenant between them was immediate, without the interposition of a mediator. But it became necessary from the state and condition of them with whom this covenant was made, and the especial nature of this covenant. This the apostle declares, Romans 8:3, “For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh.” The law was the moral instrument or rule of the covenant that was made immediately between God and man: but it could not continue to be so after the entrance of sin; that is, so as that God might be glorified thereby, in the obedience and reward of men. Wherefore he “sent his Son in the likeness of sinful flesh;” that is, provided a mediator for a new covenant. The persons with whom this covenant was to be made being all of them sinners, and apostatized from God, it became not the holiness or righteousness of God to treat immediately with them anymore. Nor would it have answered his holy ends so to have done. For if when they were in a condition of uprightness and integrity, they kept not the terms of that covenant which was made immediately with them, without a mediator, although they were holy, just, good, and equal; how much less could any such thing be expected from them in their depraved condition of apostasy from God and enmity against him! It therefore became not the wisdom of God to enter anew into covenant with mankind, without security that the terms of the covenant should be accepted, and the grace of it made effectual. This we could not give; yea, we gave all evidences possible unto the contrary, in that “God saw that every imagination of the thoughts of man’s heart was only evil continually,” Genesis 6:5. Wherefore it was necessary there should be a mediator, to be the surety of this covenant. Again, the covenant itself was so prepared, in the counsel, wisdom, and grace of God, as that the principal, yea, indeed, all the benefits of it, were to depend on what was to be done by a mediator, and could not otherwise be effected. [i.e., not dependent upon man's fickle will] Such were satisfaction for sin, and the bringing in of everlasting righteousness; which are the foundation of this covenant.

(2.) To proceed with the text; this covenant, whereof the Lord Christ is the mediator, is said to be a "better covenant." Wherefore it is supposed that there was another covenant, whereof the Lord Christ was not the mediator. And in the following verses there are two covenants, a first and a latter, an old and a new, compared together. We must therefore consider what was that other covenant, than which this is said to be better; for upon the determination thereof depends the right understanding of the whole ensuing discourse of the apostle. And because this is a subject wrapped up in much obscurity, and attended with many difficulties, it will be necessary that we use the best of our diligence, both in the investigation of the truth and in the declaration of it, so as that it may be distinctly apprehended. And I shall first explain the text, and then speak to the difficulties which arise from it: —

[1.] There was an original covenant made with Adam, and all mankind in him. The rule of obedience and reward that was between God and him was not expressly called a covenant, but it contained the express nature of a covenant; for it was the agreement of God and man concerning obedience and disobedience, rewards and punishments. Where there is a law concerning these things, and an agreement upon it by all parties concerned, there is a formal covenant. Wherefore it may be considered two ways: —

1st: As it was a law only; so it proceeded from, and was a consequent of the nature of God and man, with their mutual relation unto one another. God being considered as the creator, governor, and benefactor of man; and man as an intellectual creature, capable of moral obedience; this law was necessary, and is eternally indispensable.

2dly. As it was a covenant; and this depended on the will and pleasure of God. I will not dispute whether God might have given a law unto men that should have had nothing in it of a covenant, properly so called; as is the law of creation unto all other creatures, which hath no rewards nor punishments annexed unto it. Yet this God calls a covenant also, inasmuch as it is an effect of his purpose, his unalterable will and pleasure, Jeremiah 33:20, 21. But that this law of our obedience should be a formal, complete covenant, there were moreover some things required on the part of God, and some also on the part of man. Two things were required on the part of God to complete this covenant, or he did so complete it by two things: —

(1st^{ly}) By annexing unto it promises and threatenings of reward and punishment; the first of grace, the other of justice. (2dly.) The expression of these promises and threatenings in external signs; the first in the tree of life, the latter in that of the knowledge of good and evil. By these did God establish the original law of creation as a covenant, gave it the nature of a covenant. On the part of man, it was required that he accept of this law as the rule of the covenant which God made with him. And this he did two ways: —

[1st¹] By the innate principles of light and obedience concreated with his nature. By these he absolutely and universally assented unto the law, as proposed with promises and threatenings, as holy, just, good, —what was meet for God to require, what was equal and good unto himself.

[2dly.] By his acceptance of the commands concerning the tree of life, and that of the knowledge of good and evil, as the signs and pledges of this covenant. So was it established as a covenant between God and man, without the interposition of any mediator.

This is the covenant of works, absolutely the old, or first covenant that God made with men. But this is not the covenant here intended; for, —

1st: The covenant called afterwards “the first,” was σλαθηκη [a will - -y insert], a “testament.” So it is here called. It was such a covenant as was a testament also. Now there can be no testament, but there must be death for the confirmation of it, Hebrews 9:16. But in the making of the covenant with Adam, there was not the death of anything, whence it might be called a testament. But there was the death of beasts in sacrifice in the confirmation of the covenant at Sinai, as we shall see afterwards. And it must be observed, that although I use the name of a “covenant,” as we have rendered the word σλαθηκη, because the true signification of that word will more properly occur unto us in another place, yet I do not understand thereby a covenant properly and strictly so called, but such a one as hath the nature of a testament also, wherein the good things of him that makes it are bequeathed unto them for whom they are designed. Neither the word used constantly by the apostle in this argument, nor the design of his discourse, will admit of any other covenant to be understood in this place. Whereas, therefore, the first covenant made with Adam was in no sense a testament also, it cannot be here intended.

2dly. That first covenant made with Adam, had, as unto any benefit to be expected from it, with respect unto acceptation with God, life, and salvation, ceased long before, even at the entrance of sin. It was not abolished or abrogated by any act of God, as a law, but only was made weak and insufficient unto its first end, as a covenant. God had provided a way for the salvation of sinners, declared in the first promise. When this is actually embraced, that first covenant ceaseth towards them, as unto its curse, in all its concerns as a covenant, and obligation unto sinless obedience as the condition of life: because both of them are answered by the mediator of the new covenant. But as unto all those who receive not the grace tendered in the promise, it doth remain in full force and efficacy, not as a covenant, but as a law; and that because neither the obedience it requires nor the curse which it threatens is answered. Hence, if any man believeth not, “the wrath of God abideth on him.” For its commands and curse depending on the necessary relation between God and man, with the righteousness of God as the supreme governor of mankind, they must be answered and fulfilled. Wherefore it was never abrogated formally. But as all unbelievers are still obliged by it, and unto it must stand or fall, so it is perfectly fulfilled in all believers, —not in their own persons, but in the person of their surety. “God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us,” Romans 8:3, 4. But as a covenant, obliging unto personal, perfect, sinless obedience, as the condition of life, to be performed by themselves, so it ceased to be, long before the introduction of the new covenant which the apostle speaks of, that was promised “in the latter days.” But the other covenant here spoken of was not removed or taken away, until this new covenant was actually established.

3dly. The church of Israel was never absolutely under the power of that covenant as a covenant of life; for from the days of Abraham, the promise was given unto them and their seed. And the apostle proves that no law could afterwards be given, or covenant made, that should disannul that promise, Galatians 3:17. But had they been brought under the old covenant of works, it would have disannulled the promise; for that covenant and the promise are diametrically opposite. And moreover, if they were under that covenant, they were all under the curse, and so perished eternally: which is openly false; for it is testified of them that they pleased God by faith, and so were saved. But it is evident that the covenant intended was a covenant wherein the church of Israel walked with God, until such time as this better covenant was solemnly introduced. This is plainly declared in the ensuing context, especially in the close of the chapter, where, speaking of this former covenant, he says, it was “become old,” and so “ready to disappear.” Wherefore it is not the covenant of works made with Adam that is intended, when this other is said to be a “better covenant.”

[2.] There were other federal transactions between God and the church before the giving of the law on mount Sinai. Two of them there were into which all the rest were resolved: —

1st: The first promise, given unto our first parents immediately after the fall. This had in it the nature of a covenant, grounded on a promise of grace, and requiring obedience in all that received the promise.

2dly. The promise given and sworn unto Abraham, which is expressly called the covenant of God, and had the whole nature of a covenant in it, with a solemn outward seal appointed for its confirmation and establishment. Hereof we have treated at large on the sixth chapter.

Neither of these, nor any transaction between God and man that may be reduced unto them, as explanations, renovations, or confirmations of them, is the “first covenant” here intended. For they are not only consistent with the “new covenant,” so as that there was no necessity to remove them out of the way for its introduction, but did indeed contain in them the essence and nature of it, and so were confirmed therein. Hence the Lord Christ himself is said to be “a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made to the fathers,” Romans 15:8. As he was the mediator of the new covenant, he was so far from taking off from, or abolishing those promises, that it belonged unto his office to confirm them. Wherefore, —

[3.]. The other covenant or testament here supposed, whereunto that whereof the Lord Christ was the mediator is preferred, is none other but that which God made with the people of Israel on mount Sinai. So it is expressly affirmed, verse 9: “The covenant which I made with your fathers in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt.” This was that covenant which had all the institutions of worship annexed unto it, Hebrews 9:1-3; whereof we must treat afterwards more at large. With respect hereunto it is that the Lord Christ is said to be the “mediator of a better covenant;” that is, of another distinct from it, and more excellent.

It remains unto the exposition of the words, that we inquire what was this covenant, whereof our Lord Christ was the mediator, and what is here affirmed of it.

This can be no other in general but that which we call “the covenant of grace.” And it is so called in opposition unto that of “works,” which was made with us in Adam; for these two, grace and works, do divide the ways of our relation unto God, being diametrically opposite, and every way inconsistent, Romans 11:6. Of this covenant the Lord Christ was the mediator from the foundation of the world, namely, from the giving of the first promise, Revelation 13:8; for it was given on his interposition, and all the benefits of it depended on his future actual mediation. But here ariseth the first difficulty of the context, and that in two things; for,

[1.] If this covenant of grace was made from the beginning, and if the LORD Christ was the mediator of it from the first, then where is the privilege of the gospel-state in opposition unto the law, by virtue of this covenant, seeing that under the law also the Lord Christ was the mediator of that covenant, which was from the beginning ?

[2.] If it be the covenant of grace which is intended, and that be opposed unto the covenant of works made with Adam, then the other covenant must be that covenant of works so made with Adam, which we have before disproved.

The answer hereunto is in the word here used by the apostle concerning this new covenant: νενομοθετηται, whose meaning we must inquire into. I say, therefore, that the apostle doth not here consider the new covenant absolutely, and as it was virtually administered from the foundation of the world, in the way of a promise; for as such it was consistent with that covenant made with the people in Sinai. And the apostle proves expressly, that the renovation of it made unto Abraham was no way abrogated by the giving of the law, Galatians 3:17. There was no interruption of its administration made by the introduction of the law. But he treats of such an establishment of the new covenant as wherewith the old covenant made at Sinai was absolutely inconsistent, and which was therefore to be removed out of the way. Wherefore he considers it here as it was actually completed, so as to bring along with it all the ordinances of worship which are proper unto it, the dispensation of the Spirit in them, and all the spiritual privileges wherewith they are accompanied. It is now so brought in as to become the entire rule of the church’s faith, obedience, and worship, in all things.

This is the meaning of the word νενομοθετηται: “established,” say we; but it is, “reduced into a fixed state of a law or ordinance.” All the obedience required in it, all the worship appointed by it, all the privileges exhibited in it, and the grace administered with them, are all given for a statute, law, and ordinance unto the church. That which before lay hid in promises, in many things obscure, the principal mysteries of it being a secret hid in God himself, was now brought to light; and that covenant which had invisibly, in the way of a promise, put forth its efficacy under types and shadows, was now solemnly sealed, ratified, and confirmed, in the death and resurrection of Christ. It had before the confirmation of a promise, which is an oath; it had now the confirmation of a covenant, which is blood. That which before had no visible, outward worship, proper and peculiar unto it, is now made the only rule and instrument of worship unto the whole church, nothing being to be admitted therein but what belongs unto it, and is appointed by it. This the apostle intends by νενομοθετηται, the “legal establishment” of the new covenant, with all the ordinances of its worship. Hereon the other covenant was disannulled and removed; and not only the covenant itself, but all that system of sacred worship whereby it was administered. This was not done by the making of the covenant at first; yea, all this was superinduced into the covenant as given out in a promise, and was consistent therewith. When the new covenant was given out only in the way of a promise, it did not introduce a worship and privileges expressive of it. Wherefore it was consistent with a form of worship, rites and ceremonies, and those composed into a yoke of bondage which belonged not unto it. And as these, being added after its giving, did not overthrow its nature as a promise, so they were inconsistent with it when it was completed as a covenant; for then all the worship of the church was to proceed from it, and to be conformed unto it. Then it was established. Hence it follows, in answer unto the second difficulty, that as a promise, it was opposed unto the covenant of works; as a covenant, it was opposed unto that of Sinai. This legalizing or authoritative establishment of the new covenant, and the worship thereunto belonging, did effect this alteration.

3. In the last place, the apostle tells us whereon this establishment was made; and that is $\epsilon\pi\iota$ $\chi\rho\epsilon\upsilon\pi\tau\omicron\sigma\iota\nu$ $\epsilon\pi\alpha\gamma\gamma\epsilon\lambda\iota\alpha\iota\varsigma$, —“on better promises.” For the better understanding hereof we must consider somewhat of the original and use of divine promises in our relation unto God. And we may observe, —

(1.) That every covenant between God and man must be founded on and resolved into “promises.” Hence essentially a promise and a covenant are all one; and God calls an absolute promise, founded on an absolute decree, his covenant, Genesis 9:11. And his purpose for the continuation of the course of nature unto the end of the world, he calls his covenant with day and night, Jeremiah 33:20. The being and essence of a divine covenant lies in the promise. Hence are they called “the covenants of promise,” Ephesians 2:12; —such as are founded on and consist in promises. And it is necessary that so it should be. For, —

[1.] The nature of God who maketh these covenants requireth that so it should be. It becometh his greatness and goodness, in all his voluntary transactions with his creatures, to propose that unto them wherein their advantage, their happiness and blessedness, doth consist. We inquire not how God may deal with his creatures as such; what he may absolutely require of them, on the account of his own being, his absolute essential excellencies, with their universal dependence on him. Who can express or limit the sovereignty of God over his creatures? All the disputes about it are fond. We have no measures of what is infinite. May he not do with his own what he pleaseth? Are we not in his hands, as clay in the hands of the potter? And whether he make or mar a vessel, who shall say unto him, What doest thou? He giveth no account of his matters. But upon supposition that he will condescend to enter into covenant with his creatures, and to come to agreement with them according unto the terms of it, it becometh his greatness and goodness to give them promises as the foundation of it, wherein he proposeth unto them the things wherein their blessedness and reward do consist.

For, 1st: Herein he proposeth himself unto them as the eternal spring and fountain of all power and goodness. Had he treated with us merely by a law, he had therein only revealed his sovereign authority and holiness; the one in giving of the law, the other in the nature of it. But in promises he revealeth himself as the eternal spring of goodness and power; for the matter of all promises is somewhat that is good; and the communication of it depends on sovereign power. That God should so declare himself in his covenant, was absolutely necessary to direct and encourage the obedience of the covenanters; and he did so accordingly, Genesis 15:1, 17:1, 2. 2dly. Hereby he reserves the glory of the whole unto himself. For although the terms of agreement which he proposeth between himself and us be in their own nature “holy, just, and good,” —which sets forth his praise and glory, —yet if there were not something on his part which hath no antecedent respect unto any goodness, obedience, or desert in us, we should have wherein to glory in ourselves; which is inconsistent with the glory of God. But the matter of those promises wherein the covenant is founded is free, undeserved, and without respect unto any thing in us whereby it may in any sense be procured. And so in the first covenant, which was given in a form of law, attended with a penal sanction, yet the foundation of it was in a promise of a free and undeserved reward, even of the eternal enjoyment of God: which no goodness or obedience in the creature could possibly merit the attainment of. So that if a man should by virtue of any covenant be justified by works, though he might have whereof to glory before men, yet could he not glory before God, as the apostle declares, Romans 4:2; and that because the reward proposed in the promise doth infinitely exceed the obedience performed.

[2.] It was also necessary on our part that every divine covenant should be founded and established on promises; for there is no state wherein we may be taken into covenant with God, but it is supposed we are not yet arrived at that perfection and blessedness whereof our nature is capable, and which we cannot but desire. And therefore when we come to heaven, and the full enjoyment of God, there shall be no use of any covenant any more, seeing we shall be in eternal rest, in the enjoyment of all the blessedness whereof our nature is capable, and shall immutably adhere unto God without any further expectation. But whilst we are in the way, we have still somewhat, yea principal parts of our blessedness, to desire, expect, and believe. So in the state of innocency, though it had all the perfection which a state of obedience according unto a law was capable of, yet did not the blessedness of eternal rest, for which we were made, consist therein. Now, whilst it is thus with us, we cannot but be desiring and looking out after that full and complete happiness, which our nature cannot come to rest without. This, therefore, renders it necessary that there should be a promise of it given as the foundation of the covenant; without which we should want our principal encouragement unto obedience. And much more must it be so in the state of sin and apostasy from God; for we are now not only most remote from our utmost happiness, but involved in a condition of misery, without a deliverance from which we cannot be any ways induced to give ourselves up unto covenant obedience. Wherefore, unless we are prevented in the covenant with promises of deliverance from our present state, and the enjoyment of future blessedness, no covenant could be of use or advantage unto us.

[3.] It is necessary from the nature of a covenant. For every covenant that is proposed unto men, and accepted by them, requires somewhat to be performed on their part, otherwise it is no covenant; but where anything is required of them that accept of the covenant, or to whom it is proposed, it doth suppose that somewhat be promised on the behalf of them by whom the covenant is proposed, as the foundation of its acceptance, and the reason of the duties required in it.

All this appears most evidently in the covenant of grace, which is here said to be “established on promises;” and that on two accounts. For, —

[1.] At the same time that much is required of us in the way of duty and obedience, we are told in the Scripture, and find it by experience, that of ourselves we can do nothing. Wherefore, unless the precept of the covenant be founded in a promise of giving grace and spiritual strength unto us, whereby we may be enabled to perform those duties, the covenant can be of no benefit or advantage unto us. And the want of this one consideration, that every covenant is founded in promises, and that the promises give life unto the precepts of it, hath perverted the minds of many to suppose an ability in ourselves of yielding obedience unto those precepts, without grace antecedently received to enable us thereunto; which overthrows the nature of the new covenant.

[2.] As was observed, we are all actually guilty of sin before this covenant was made with us. Wherefore unless there be a promise given of the pardon of sin, it is to no purpose to propose any new covenant terms unto us. For “the wages of sin is death;” and we having sinned must die, 82 whatever we do afterwards, unless our sins be pardoned. This, therefore, must be proposed unto us as the foundation of the covenant, or it will be of none effect. And herein lies the great difference between the promises of the covenant of works and those of the covenant of grace. The first were only concerning things future; eternal life and blessedness upon the accomplishment of perfect obedience. Promises of present mercy and pardon it stood in need of none, it was not capable of. Nor had it any promises of giving more grace, or supplies of it; but man was wholly left unto what he had at first received. Hence the covenant was broken. But in the covenant of grace all things are founded in promises of present mercy, and continual supplies of grace, as well as of future blessedness. Hence it comes to be “ordered in all things, and sure.”

And this is the first thing that was to be declared, namely, that every divine covenant is established on promises.

(2.) These promises are said to be “better promises.” The other covenant had its promises peculiar unto it, with respect whereunto this is said to be “established on better promises.” It was, indeed, principally represented under a system of precepts, and those almost innumerable; but it had its promises also, into the nature whereof we shall immediately inquire. With respect, therefore, unto them is the new covenant, whereof the Lord Christ is the mediator, said to be “established on better promises.” That it should be founded in promises, was necessary from its general nature as a covenant, and more necessary from its especial nature as a covenant of grace. That these promises are said to be “better promises,” respects those of the old covenant. But this is so said as to include all other degrees of comparison. They are not only better than they, but they are positively good in themselves, and absolutely the best that God ever gave, or will give unto the church. And what they are we must consider in our progress. And sundry things may be observed from these words: —

Obs. VIII. There is infinite grace in every divine covenant, inasmuch as it is established on promises. — Infinite condescension it is in God, that he will enter into covenant with dust and ashes, with poor worms of the earth. And herein lies the spring of all grace, from whence all the streams of it do flow. And the first expression of it is in laying the foundation of it in some undeserved promises. And this was that which became the goodness and greatness of his nature, the means whereby we are brought to adhere unto him in faith, hope, trust, and obedience, until we come unto the enjoyment of him; for that is the use of promises, to keep us in adherence unto God, as the first original and spring of all goodness, and the ultimate satisfactory reward of our souls, 2 Corinthians 7:1.

Obs. IX. The promises of the covenant of grace are better than those of any other covenant, as for many other reasons, so especially because the grace of them prevents any condition or qualification on our part. —I do not say the covenant of grace is absolutely without conditions, if by conditions we intend the duties of obedience which God requireth of us in and by virtue of that covenant; but this I say, the principal promises thereof are not in the first place remunerative of our obedience in the covenant, but efficaciously assumptive of us into covenant, and establishing or confirming in the covenant. The covenant of works had its promises, but they were all remunerative, respecting an antecedent obedience in us; (so were all those which were peculiar unto the covenant of Sinai). They were, indeed, also of grace, in that the reward did infinitely exceed the merit of our obedience; but yet they all supposed it, and the subject of them was formally reward only. In the covenant of grace it is not so; for sundry of the promises thereof are the means of our being taken into covenant, of our entering into covenant with God. The first covenant absolutely was established on promises, in that when men were actually taken into it, they were encouraged unto obedience by the promises of a future reward. But those promises, namely, of the pardon of sin and writing of the law in our hearts, which the apostle expressly insisteth upon as the peculiar promises of this covenant, do take place and are effectual antecedently unto our covenant obedience. For although faith be required in order of nature antecedently unto our actual receiving of the pardon of sin, yet is that faith itself wrought in us by the grace of the promise, and so its precedency unto pardon respects only the order that God had appointed in the communication of the benefits of the covenant, and intends not that the pardon of sin is the reward of our faith.

This entrance hath the apostle made into his discourse of the two covenants, which he continues unto the end of the chapter. But the whole is not without its difficulties. Many things in particular will occur unto us in our progress, which may be considered in their proper places. In the meantime there are some things in general which may be here discoursed, by whose determination much light will be communicated unto what doth ensue.

First, therefore, the apostle doth evidently in this place dispute concerning two covenants, or two testaments, comparing the one with the other, and declaring the disannulling of the one by the introduction and establishment of the other. What are these two covenants in general we have declared, — namely, that made with the church of Israel at mount Sinai, and that made with us in the gospel; not as absolutely the covenant of grace, but as actually established in the death of Christ, with all the worship that belongs unto it.

Here then ariseth a difference of no small importance, namely, whether these are indeed two distinct covenants, as to the essence and substance of them, or only different ways of the dispensation and administration of the same covenant. And the reason of the difficulty lieth herein: We must grant one of these three things: 1. That either the covenant of grace was in force under the old testament; or, 2. That the church was saved without it, or any benefit by Jesus Christ, who is the mediator of it alone; or, 3. That they all perished everlastingly. And neither of the two latter can be admitted.

Some, indeed, in these latter days, have revived the old Pelagian imagination, that before the law men were saved by the conduct of natural light and reason; and under the law by the directive doctrines, precepts, and sacrifices thereof, —without any respect unto the Lord Christ or his mediation in another covenant. But I shall not here contend with them, as having elsewhere sufficiently refuted these imaginations. Wherefore I shall take it here for granted, that no man was ever saved but by virtue of the new covenant, and the mediation of Christ therein.

Suppose, then, that this new covenant of grace was extant and effectual under the old testament, so as the church was saved by virtue thereof, and the mediation of Christ therein, how could it be that there should at the 85 same time be another covenant between God and them, of a different nature from this, accompanied with other promises, and other effects?

On this consideration it is said, that the two covenants mentioned, the new and the old, were not indeed two distinct covenants, as unto their essence and substance, but only different administrations of the same covenant, called two covenants from some different outward solemnities and duties of worship attending of them. To clear this it must be observed, —

1. That by the old covenant, the original covenant of works, made with Adam and all mankind in him, is not intended; for this is undoubtedly a covenant different in the essence and substance of it from the new.

2. By the new covenant, not the new covenant absolutely and originally, as given in the first promise, is intended; but in its complete gospel administration, when it was actually established by the death of Christ, as administered in and by the ordinances of the new testament. This, with the covenant of Sinai, were, as most say, but different administrations of the same covenant.

But on the other hand, there is such express mention made, not only in this, but in sundry other places of the Scripture also, of two distinct covenants, or testaments, and such different natures, properties, and effects, ascribed unto them, as seem to constitute two distinct covenants. This, therefore, we must inquire into; and shall first declare what is agreed unto by those who are sober in this matter, though they differ in their judgments about this question, whether two distinct covenants, or only a twofold administration of the same covenant, be intended. And indeed there is so much agreed on, as that what remains seems rather to be a difference about the expression of the same truth, than any real contradiction about the things themselves. For, —

1. It is agreed that the way of reconciliation with God, of justification and salvation, was always one and the same; and that from the giving of the first promise none was ever justified or saved but by the new covenant, and Jesus Christ, the mediator thereof. The foolish imagination before mentioned, that men were saved before the giving of the law by following the guidance of the light of nature, and after the giving of the law by 86 obedience unto the directions thereof, is rejected by all that are sober, as destructive of the Old Testament and the New.

2. That the writings of the Old Testament, namely, the Law, Psalms, and Prophets, do contain and declare the doctrine of justification and salvation by Christ. This the church of old believed, and walked with God in the faith thereof. This is undeniably proved, in that the doctrine mentioned is frequently confirmed in the New Testament by testimonies taken out of the Old.

3. That by the covenant of Sinai, as properly so called, separated from its figurative relation unto the covenant of grace, none was ever eternally saved.

4. That the use of all the institutions whereby the old covenant was administered, was to represent and direct unto Jesus Christ, and his mediation.

These things being granted, the only way of life and salvation by Jesus Christ, under the old testament and the new, is secured; which is the substance of the truth wherein we are now concerned. On these grounds we may proceed with our inquiry.

The judgment of most reformed divines is, that the church under the old testament had the same promise of Christ, the same interest in him by faith, remission of sins, reconciliation with God, justification and salvation by the same way and means, that believers have under the new. And whereas the essence and the substance of the covenant consists in these things, they are not to be said to be under another covenant, but only a different administration of it. But this was so different from that which is established in the gospel after the coming of Christ, that it hath the appearance and name of another covenant. And the difference between these two administrations may be reduced unto the ensuing heads: —

1. It consisted in the way and manner of the declaration of the mystery of the love and will of God in Christ; of the work of reconciliation and redemption, with our justification by faith. For herein the gospel, wherein “life and immortality are brought to light,” doth in plainness, clearness, and evidence, much excel the administration and declaration of the same truths under the law. And the greatness of the privilege of the church 87 herein is not easily expressed. For hereby” with open face we behold as in a glass the glory of the Lord,” and Lord changed into the same image,” 2 Corinthians 3:18. The man whose eyes the Lord Christ opened, Mark 8:23-25, represents these two states. When he first touched him, his eyes were opened, and he saw, but he saw nothing clearly; whence, when he looked, he said, “I see men as trees, walking,” verse 24: but upon his second touch, he saw every man clearly,” verse 25. They had their sight under the old testament, and the object was proposed unto them, but at a great distance, with such an interposition of mists, clouds, and shadows, as that they saw men like trees, walking,” —nothing clearly and perfectly: but now under the gospel, the object, which is Christ, being brought near unto us, and all clouds and shadows being departed, we do or may see all things clearly. When a traveler in his way on downs or hills is encompassed with a thick mist and fog, though he be in his way yet he is uncertain, and nothing is presented unto him in its proper shape and distance; things near seem to be afar off, and things afar off to be near, and everything hath, though not a false, yet an uncertain appearance. Let the sun break forth and scatter the mists and fogs that are about him, and immediately everything appears quite in another shape unto him, so as indeed he is ready to think he is not where he was. His way is plain, he is certain of it, and all the region about lies evident under his eye; yet is there no alteration made but in the removal of the mists and clouds that interrupted his sight. So was it with them under the law. The types and shadows that they were enclosed in, and which were the only medium they had to view spiritual things in, represented them not unto them clearly and in their proper shape. But they being now removed, by the rising of the Sun of righteousness with healing in his wings, in the dispensation of the gospel, the whole mystery of God in Christ is clearly manifested unto them that do believe. And the greatness of this privilege of the gospel above the law is inexpressible; whereof, as I suppose, we must speak somewhat afterwards.

2. In the plentiful communication of grace unto the community of the church; for now it is that we receive “grace for grace,” or a plentiful effusion of it, by Jesus Christ. There was grace given in an eminent manner unto many holy persons under the old testament, and all true believers had true, real, saving grace communicated unto them; but the measures of grace in the true church under the new testament do exceed those of the community of the church under the old. And therefore, as God winked at some things under the old testament, as polygamy, and the like, which are expressly and severely interdicted under the new, nor are consistent with the present administrations of it; so are sundry duties, as those of self denial, readiness to bear the cross, to forsake houses, lands, and habitations, more expressly enjoined unto us than unto them. And the obedience which God requireth in any covenant, or administration of it, is proportionable unto the strength which the administration of that covenant doth exhibit. And if those who profess the gospel do content themselves without any interest in this privilege of it, if they endeavor not for a share in that plentiful effusion of grace which doth accompany its present administration, the gospel itself will be of no other use unto them, but to increase and aggravate their condemnation.

3. In the manner of our access unto God. Herein much of all that is called religion doth consist; for hereon doth all our outward worship of God depend. And in this the advantages of the gospel-administration of the covenant above that of the law is in all things very eminent. Our access now to God is immediate, by Jesus Christ, with liberty and boldness, as we shall afterwards declare. Those under the law were immediately conversant, in their whole worship, about outward, typical things, — the tabernacle, the altar, the ark, the mercy-seat, and the like obscure representations of the presence of God. Besides, the manner of the making of the covenant with them at mount Sinai filled them with fear, and brought them into bondage, so as they had comparatively a servile frame of spirit in all their holy worship.

4. In the way of worship required under each administration. For under that which was legal, it seemed good unto God to appoint a great number of outward rites, ceremonies, and observances; and these, as they were dark in their signification, as also in their use and ends, so were they, by reason of their nature, number, and the severe penalties under which they were enjoined, grievous and burdensome to be observed. But the way of worship under the gospel is spiritual, rational, and plainly subservient unto the ends of the covenant itself; so as that the use, ends, benefits, and advantages of it are evident unto all.

5. In the extent of the dispensation of the grace of God; for this is greatly enlarged under the gospel. For under the old testament it was upon the matter confined unto the posterity of Abraham according to the flesh; but under the new testament it extends itself unto all nations under heaven.

Sundry other things are usually added by our divines unto the same purpose. See Calvin. Institut. lib. 2:cap. xi.; Martyr. Loc. Com. loc. 16, sect. 2; Bucan. loc. 22, etc.

The Lutherans, on the other side, insist on two arguments to prove, that not a twofold administration of the same covenant, but that two covenants substantially distinct, are intended in this discourse of the apostle.

1. Because in the Scripture they are often so called, and compared with one another, and sometimes opposed unto one another; the first and the last, the new and the old.

2. Because the covenant of grace in Christ is eternal, immutable, always the same, obnoxious unto no alteration, no change or abrogation; neither can these things be spoken of it with respect unto any administration of it. as they are spoken of the old covenant.

To state our thoughts aright in this matter, and to give what light we can unto the truth, the things ensuing may be observed: —

1. When we speak of the “old covenant,” we intend not the covenant of works made with Adam, and his whole posterity in him; concerning which there is no difference or difficulty, whether it be a distinct covenant from the new or no.

2. When we speak of the “new covenant,” we do not intend the covenant of grace absolutely, as though that were not before in being and efficacy, before the introduction of that which is promised in this place. For it was always the same, as to the substance of it, from the beginning. It passed through the whole dispensation of times before the law, and under the law, of the same nature and efficacy, unalterable, “everlasting, ordered in all things, and sure.” All who contend about these things, the Socinians only excepted, do grant that the covenant of grace, considered absolutely, — that is, the promise of grace in and by Jesus Christ, — was the only way and means of salvation unto the church, from the first entrance of sin. But 90 for two reasons it is not expressly called a covenant, without respect unto any other things, nor was it so under the old testament. When God renewed the promise of it unto Abraham, he is said to make a covenant with him; and he did so, but it was with respect unto other things, especially the proceeding of the promised Seed from his loins. But absolutely under the old testament it consisted only in a promise; and as such only is proposed in the Scripture, Acts 2:39; Hebrews 6:14-16. The apostle indeed says, that the covenant was confirmed of God in Christ, before the giving of the law, Galatians 3:17. And so it was, not absolutely in itself, but in the promise and benefits of it. The nomoesia, or full legal establishment of it, whence it became formally a covenant unto the whole church, was future only, and a promise under the old testament; for it wanted two things thereunto: —

(1.) It wanted its solemn confirmation and establishment, by the blood of the only sacrifice which belonged unto it. Before this was done in the death of Christ, it had not the formal nature of a covenant or a testament, as our apostle proves, Hebrews 9:15-23. For neither, as he shows in that place, would the law given at Sinai have been a covenant, had it not been confirmed with the blood of sacrifices. Wherefore the promise was not before a formal and solemn covenant.

(2.) This was wanting, that it was not the spring, rule, and measure of all the worship of the church. This doth belong unto every covenant, properly so called, that God makes with the church, that it be the entire rule of all the worship that God requires of it; which is that which they are to restipulate in their entrance into covenant with God. But so the covenant of grace was not under the old testament; for God did require of the church many duties of worship that did not belong thereunto. But now, under the new testament, this covenant, with its own seals and appointments, is the only rule and measure of all acceptable worship. Wherefore the new covenant promised in the Scripture, and here opposed unto the old, is not the promise of grace, mercy, life, and salvation by Christ, absolutely considered, but as it had the formal nature of a covenant given unto it, in its establishment by the death of Christ, the procuring cause of all its benefits, and the declaring of it to be the only rule of worship and obedience unto the church. So that although by “the covenant of grace,” we oftentimes understand no more but the way of life, grace, mercy, and salvation by Christ; yet by “the new covenant,” we intend its actual establishment in the death of Christ, with that blessed way of worship which by it is settled in the church.

3. Whilst the church enjoyed all the spiritual benefits of the promise, wherein the substance of the covenant of grace was contained, before it was confirmed and made the sole rule of worship unto the church, it was not inconsistent with the holiness and wisdom of God to bring it under any other covenant, or prescribe unto it what forms of worship he pleased. It was not so, I say, upon these three suppositions: —

(1.) That this covenant did not disannul or make ineffectual the promise that was given before, but that that doth still continue the only means of life and salvation. And that this was so, our apostle proves at large, Galatians 3:17-19.

(2.) That this other covenant, with all the worship contained in it or required by it, did not divert from, but direct and lead unto, the future establishment of the promise in the solemnity of a covenant, by the ways mentioned. And that the covenant made in Sinai, with all its ordinances, did so, the apostle proves likewise in the place before mentioned, as also in this whole epistle.

(3.) That it be of present use and advantage unto the church in its present condition. This the apostle acknowledgeth to be a great objection against the use and efficacy of the promise under the old testament, as unto life and salvation; namely, ‘To what end then serveth the giving of the law?’ whereunto he answers, by showing the necessity and use of the law unto the church in its then present condition, Galatians 3:17-19.

4. These things being observed, we may consider that the Scripture doth plainly and expressly make mention of two testaments, or covenants, and distinguish between them in such a way, as what is spoken can hardly be accommodated unto a twofold administration of the same covenant. The one is mentioned and described, Exodus 24:3-8, Deuteronomy 5:2-5, — namely, the covenant that God made with the people of Israel in Sinai; and which is commonly called “the covenant,” where the people under the old testament are said to keep or break God’s covenant; which for the most part is spoken with respect unto that worship which was peculiar thereunto. The other is promised, Jeremiah 31:31-34, 32:40; which is the new or gospel covenant, as before explained, mentioned Matthew 26:28; Mark 14:24. And these two covenants, or testaments, are compared one with the other, and opposed one unto another, 2 Corinthians 3:6-9; Galatians 4:24-26; Hebrews 7:22, 9:15-20.

These two we call “the old and the new testament.” Only it must be observed, that in this argument, by the “old testament,” we do not understand the books of the Old Testament, or the writings of Moses, the Psalms, and the Prophets, or the oracles of God committed then unto the church, (I confess they are once so called, 2 Corinthians 3:14, “The veil remaineth untaken away in the reading of the Old Testament,” —that is, the books of it; unless we shall say, that the apostle intendeth only the reading of the things which concern the old testament in the Scripture;) for this old covenant, or testament, whatever it be, is abrogated and taken away, as the apostle expressly proves, but the word of God in the books of the Old Testament abideth for ever. And those writings are called the Old Testament, or the books of the Old Testament, not as though they contained in them nothing but what belongeth unto the old covenant, for they contain the doctrine of the New Testament also; but they are so termed because they were committed unto the church whilst the old covenant was in force, as the rule and law of its worship and obedience.

5. Wherefore we must grant two distinct covenants, rather than a twofold administration of the same covenant merely, to be intended. We must, I say, do so, provided always that the way of reconciliation and salvation was the same under both. But it will be said, —and with great pretense of reason, for it is that which is the sole foundation they all build upon who allow only a twofold administration of the same covenant, —‘That this being the principal end of a divine covenant, if the way of reconciliation and salvation be the same under both, then indeed are they for the substance of them but one.’ And I grant that this would inevitably follow, if it were so equally by virtue of them both. If reconciliation and salvation by Christ were to be obtained not only under the old covenant, but by virtue thereof, then it must be the same for substance with the new. But this is not so; for no reconciliation with God nor salvation could be obtained by virtue of the old covenant, or the administration of it, as our 93 apostle disputes at large, though all believers were reconciled, justified, and saved, by virtue of the promise, whilst they were under the covenant. As therefore I have showed in what sense the covenant of grace is called “the new covenant,” in this distinction and opposition, so I shall propose sundry things which relate unto the nature of the first covenant, which manifest it to have been a distinct covenant, and not a mere administration of the covenant of grace: —

1. This covenant, called “the old covenant,” was never intended to be of itself the absolute rule and law of life and salvation unto the church, but was made with a particular design, and with respect unto particular ends. This the apostle proves undeniably in this epistle, especially in the chapter foregoing, and those two that follow. Hence it follows that it could abrogate or disannul nothing which God at any time before had given as a general rule unto the church. For that which is particular cannot abrogate any thing that was general, and before it; as that which is general doth abrogate all antecedent particulars, as the new covenant doth abrogate the old. And this we must consider in both the instances belonging hereunto. For, —

(1.) God had before given the covenant of works, or perfect obedience, unto all mankind, in the law of creation. But this covenant at Sinai did not abrogate or disannul that covenant, nor any way fulfill it. And the reason is, because it was never intended to come in the place or room thereof, as a covenant, containing an entire rule of all the faith and obedience of the whole church. God did not intend in it to abrogate the covenant of works, and to substitute this in the place thereof; yea, in sundry things it reenforced, established, and confirmed that covenant. For, —

[1.] It revived, declared, and expressed all the commands of that covenant in the decalogue; for that is nothing but a divine summary of the law written in the heart of man at his creation. And herein the dreadful manner of its delivery or promulgation, with its writing in tables of stone, is also to be considered; for in them the nature of that first covenant, with its inexorableness as unto perfect obedience, was represented. And because none could answer its demands, or comply with it therein, it was called “the ministration of death,” causing fear and bondage, 2 Corinthians 3:7.

[2.] It revived the sanction of the first covenant, in the curse or sentence of death which it denounced against all transgressors. Death was the penalty of the transgression of the first covenant: “In the day that thou eatest, thou shalt die the death.” And this sentence was revived and represented anew in the curse wherewith this covenant was ratified, “Cursed be he that confirmeth not all the words of this law to do them,” Deuteronomy 27:26; Galatians 3:10. For the design of God in it was to bind a sense of that curse on the consciences of men, until He came by whom it was taken away, as the apostle declares, Galatians 3:19.

[3.] It revived the promise of that covenant, —that of eternal life upon perfect obedience. So the apostle tells us that Moses thus describeth the righteousness of the law, “That the man which doeth those things shall live by them,” Romans 10:5; as he doth, Leviticus 18:5.

Now this is no other but the covenant of works revived. Nor had this covenant of Sinai any promise of eternal life annexed unto it, as such, but only the promise inseparable from the covenant of works which it revived, saying, “Do this, and live.”

Hence it is, that when our apostle disputeth against justification by the law, or by the works of the law, he doth not intend the works peculiar unto the covenant of Sinai, such as were the rites and ceremonies of the worship then instituted; but he intends also the works of the first covenant, which alone had the promise of life annexed unto them.

And hence it follows also, that it was not a new covenant of works established in the place of the old, for the absolute rule of faith and obedience unto the whole church; for then would it have abrogated and taken away that covenant, and all the force of it, which it did not.

(2.) The other instance is in the promise. This also went before it; neither was it abrogated or disannulled by the introduction of this covenant. This promise was given unto our first parents immediately after the entrance of sin, and was established as containing the only way and means of the salvation of sinners. Now, this promise could not be abrogated by the introduction of this covenant, and a new way of justification and salvation be thereby established. For the promise being given out in general for the whole church, as containing the way appointed by God for righteousness, life, and salvation, it could not be disannulled or changed, without a change and alteration in the counsels of Him “with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning.” Much less could this be effected by a particular covenant, such as that was, when it was given as a general and eternal rule.

2. But whereas there was an especial promise given unto Abraham, in the faith whereof he became “the father of the faithful,” he being their progenitor, it should seem that this covenant did wholly disannul or supersede that promise, and take off the church of his posterity from building on that foundation, and so fix them wholly on this new covenant now made with them. So saith Moses, “The LORD made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, who are all of us here alive this day,” Deuteronomy 5:3. God made not this covenant on mount Sinai with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but with the people then present, and their posterity, as he declares, Deuteronomy 29:14, 15. This, therefore, should seem to take them off wholly from that promise made to Abraham, and so to disannul it. But that this it did not, nor could do, the apostle strictly proves, Galatians 3:17-22; yea, it did divers ways establish that promise, both as first given and as afterwards confirmed with the oath of God unto Abraham, two ways especially: —

(1.) It declared the impossibility of obtaining reconciliation and peace with God any other way but by the promise. For representing the commands of the covenant of works, requiring perfect, sinless obedience, under the penalty of the curse, it convinced men that this was no way for sinners to seek for life and salvation by. And herewith it so urged the consciences of men, that they could have no rest nor peace in themselves but what the promise would afford them, whereunto they saw a necessity of betaking themselves.

(2.) By representing the ways and means of the accomplishment of the promise, and of that whereon all the efficacy of it unto the justification and salvation of sinners doth depend. This was the death, blood-shedding, oblation, or sacrifice of Christ, the promised seed. This all its offerings and ordinances of worship directed unto; as his incarnation, with the inhabitation of God in his human nature, was typed by the tabernacle and temple. Wherefore it was so far from disannulling the promise, or diverting the minds of the people of God from it, that by all means it established it and led unto it. But,

The terror and bondage of the law - pointed to promise in Christ

“Behold, we die, we perish, we all perish. Whosoever cometh anything near unto the tabernacle of the LORD shall die: shall we be consumed with dying?” Numbers 17:12, 13. And the curse solemnly denounced against every one that confirmed not all things written in the law was continually before them.

[3.] In a spirit of bondage unto fear. This was administered in the giving and dispensation of the law, even as a spirit of liberty and power is administered in and by the gospel. And as this respected their present obedience, and manner of its performance, so in particular it regarded death not yet conquered by Christ. Hence our apostle affirms, that “through fear of death they were all their lifetime subject unto bondage.”

This state God brought them into, partly to subdue the pride of their hearts, trusting in their own righteousness, and partly to cause them to look out earnestly after the promised deliverer.

(4.) Into this estate and condition God brought them by a solemn covenant, confirmed by mutual consent between him and them. The tenor, force, and solemn ratification of this covenant, are expressed, Exodus 24:3-8. Unto the terms and conditions of this covenant was the whole church obliged indispensably, on pain of extermination, until all was accomplished, Malachi 4:4-6. Unto this covenant belonged the decalogue, with all precepts of moral obedience thence educed. So also did the laws of political rule established among them, and the whole system of religious worship given unto them. All these laws were brought within the verge of this covenant, and were the matter of it. And it had especial promises and threatenings annexed unto it as such; whereof none did exceed the bounds of the land of Canaan. For even many of the laws of it were such as obliged nowhere else. Such was the law of the sabbatical year, and all their sacrifices. There was sin and obedience in them or about them in the land of Canaan, none elsewhere. Hence, — (5.) This covenant thus made, with these ends and promises, did never save nor condemn any man eternally. All that lived under the administration of it did attain eternal life, or perished forever, but not by virtue of this covenant as formally such. It did, indeed, revive the commanding power and sanction of the first covenant of works; and therein, as the apostle speaks, was “the ministry of condemnation,” 2 Corinthians: 3:9; for “by the deeds of the law can no flesh be justified.” And on the other hand, it directed also unto the promise, which was the instrument of life and salvation unto all that did believe. But as unto what it had of its own, it was confined unto things temporal. Believers were saved under it, but not by virtue of it. Sinners perished eternally under it, but by the curse of the original law of works.

Nature of the Promises

The following excerpt from John Owen has a multitude of important doctrines and considerations almost like a grand summary of everything - the nature of the promises, Adam's grace vs. NT believers, Arminianism, Pelagianism, the will, heart, soul, communication of grace in the New Covenant, etc.

Subjects covered: Adam's original grace given (see bold red next few pages); temptation of Satan, the serpent an instrument of Satan, God redemptive plan. Adam was given a certain grace but was promised no more, i.e., there was no promise of perseverance that believers have under the new covenant, that constant stream of grace for grace that we receive having been engrafted into the true vine. Adam was not "in Christ" while in the Garden, but believers in the new covenant are...in Him all things consist; that is, if one is not in Christ, he is liable to defect which Adam was and subsequently fell. In the covenant of works, there was no surety or mediator; Adam was under the covenant of works...do this and live. It is man's proud opinion of himself that he is autonomous, self-directed without any effectual influence from God which is an extension of this covenant of works and opposed to the covenant of grace in which those who are partakers benefit from the constant influence of the sap of the vine or God's grace for grace being supplied them by virtue of the promises of this covenant. So if one is still under the covenant of works, he will expose himself by insisting on this autonomous condition, being ignorant of his utter dependence on God and thus opposed to it, hence Christ is a "stone of stumbling, a rock of offense", the stone that the builders rejected. But one that is saved prizes this dependence and gives glory to God for it thus evidencing his saved condition. The nature of the new and old covenants is covered here too; very good in understanding the heresy of Pelagianism and Arminianism, Prevenient grace, etc., the will of man, etc. See Flavel's comments on this in his Sermon #28 on page 1596. It is outstanding...Grace without the Spirit.

(1.) A recapitulation, collection, and confirmation of all the promises of grace that had been given unto the church from the beginning, even all that was spoken by the mouth of the holy prophets that had been since the world began, Luke 1:70.

Here is Luke 70-75:

⁷⁰As He spoke by the mouth of His holy prophets,
Who have been since the world began,

⁷¹That we should be saved from our enemies
And from the hand of all who hate us,

⁷²To perform the mercy promised to our fathers
And to remember His holy covenant,

⁷³The oath which He swore to our father Abraham:

⁷⁴To grant us that we,

Being delivered from the hand of our enemies,
Might serve Him without fear,

⁷⁵In holiness and righteousness before Him all the days of our life.

[The promises of grace were first given to Adam in Gen 3:15 - that God would break that league between man and the devil by changing the nature of the covenantees so as to hate sin and Satan, and to turn people to God, re-stated in Jer. 31:33, Ezek.36:25-27]

¹⁵And I will put enmity
Between you and the woman,
And between your seed and her Seed;
He shall bruise your head,
And you shall bruise His heel." Gen. 3:15

This, the promise in Gen. 3:15, is the gospel proposed in obscure language - so, before I end this long discourse and because Owen explains it so well, let me digress for a moment; I have included Owen's explanation of it here:

Exercitations to Hebrews pg170-174 Vol. XVII John Owen

First, If there be not a promise of deliverance expressed in these words, whence is it that the execution of the sentence of death against sin is suspended? Unless we will allow an intervention satisfactory to the righteousness and truth of God to be expressed in these words, there would have been a truth in the suggestion of the serpent, namely, that whatever God had said, yet indeed they were not to die. The Jews, in the Midrash Tehillim, — as Kimchi informs us on Psalm 92, whose title is, "A Psalm for the Sabbath-day," which they generally assign unto Adam, — say that Adam was cast out of the garden of Eden on the evening of the sixth day, after which God came to execute the sentence of death upon him; but the Sabbath being come on, the punishment was deferred, whereon Adam made that psalm for the Sabbath-day. Without an interposition of some external cause and reason, they acknowledge that death ought immediately to have been inflicted; and other besides what is mentioned in these words there was none.

Secondly, The whole evil of sin, and curse, that mankind then did, or was to, suffer under, proceeded from the friendship contracted between the woman and the serpent, and her fixing faith in him. God here declares that he will break that league, and put enmity between them. Being now both of them under the same condition of sin and curse, this could not be without a change of condition in one of them. Satan is not divided from himself, nor is at enmity with them that are left wholly in his estate. A change of condition, therefore, on the part of the woman and her seed is plainly promised; that is, by a deliverance from the state of sin and misery wherein they were. Without this the enmity mentioned could not have ensued.

Thirdly, In pursuit of this enmity, the Seed of the woman was to bruise the head of the serpent. The head is the seat of his power and craft. Without the destruction of the evil and pernicious effects which by his counsel he had brought about, his head cannot be bruised. By his head he had contrived the ruin of mankind; and without the destruction of his works and a recovery from that ruin, he is not conquered nor his head bruised. And as these things, though they may now seem somewhat obscurely expressed in these words, are yet made plain unto us in the gospel, so the importance of them was evident unto our first parents of old, being expounded by all the circumstances wherewith the matter of fact was attended.

Again, there is an intimation of the manner how this work shall be performed. This, first, God takes upon himself: ‘I will do it; “I will put enmity.”’ It is an issue of his sovereign wisdom and grace. But, secondly, he will do it in and by the nature of man, “the Seed of the woman.” And two things must concur to the effecting of it; — first, That this Seed of the woman must conquer Satan, bruise his head, destroy his works, and procure deliverance for mankind thereby; secondly, That he must suffer from, and by the means of, Satan in his so doing, — the serpent must “bruise his heel.” This is the remedy and relief that God hath provided for mankind. And this is the MESSIAH, or God joining with the nature of man to deliver mankind from sin and eternal misery.

24. This promise of relief by the Seed of the woman is, as the first, so the only intimation that God gave unto our first parents of a way of deliverance from that condition whereinto they, and the whole creation, were brought by the entrance of evil or sin. It was likewise the first discovery that there was in him [Hebrew words], —benignity, grace, kindness, or mercy, compassion, pardon. Hereby he declared himself to be [Hebrew words] Nehemiah 9:17, —“a God of pardons, gracious, and tenderly merciful;” as also, Psalm 86:5, “good and pardoning, and much in mercy.” And if this be not acknowledged, it must be confessed that all the world, at least unto the flood, if not unto the days of Abraham, — in which space of time we have testimony concerning some that they walked with God, and pleased him, — were left without any certain ground of faith, or hope of acceptance with him; for without some knowledge of this mercy, and the provision of a way for its exercise, they could have no such persuasion. This, then, we have obtained, that God, presently upon the entrance of sin into the world, and the breach of its public peace thereby, promised a reparation of that evil, in the whole extent of it, to be wrought in and by the Seed of the woman, — that is, the Messiah

(1.) A recapitulation, collection, and confirmation of all the promises of grace that had been given unto the church from the beginning, even all that was spoken by the mouth of the holy prophets that had been since the world began, Luke 1:70.

The first promise [in Gen3:15] contained in it the whole essence and substance of the covenant, of grace. All those afterwards given unto the church, on various occasions, were but explications and confirmations of it. In the whole of them there was a full declaration of the wisdom and love of God in sending his Son, and of his grace unto mankind thereby. And God solemnly confirmed them with his oath, namely, that they should be all accomplished in their appointed season. Whereas, therefore, the covenant here promised included the sending of Christ for the accomplishment of those promises, they are all gathered into one head therein. It is a constellation of all the promises of grace.

[1.] In that, as unto the accomplishment of the grace principally intended in them, they received it in the sending of Christ; and as to the confirmation and establishment of them for the communication of grace unto the church, they received it in the death of Christ, as a sacrifice of agreement or atonement.

[2.] They are established as the rule and law of reconciliation and peace between God and man. This gives them the nature of a covenant; for a covenant is the solemn expression of the terms of peace between various parties, with the confirmation of them.

(3.) They are reduced unto such form of law, as to become the only rule of the ordinances of worship and divine service required of the church. Nothing unto these ends is now presented unto us, or required of us, but what belongeth immediately unto the administration of this covenant, and the grace thereof. But the reader must consult what hath been discoursed at large unto this purpose on the 6th^verse.

And we may see from hence what it is that God here promiseth and foretelleth, as that which he would do in the “days that were coming.” For whereas they had the promise before, and so virtually the grace and mercy of the new covenant, it may be inquired: ‘What is yet wanting, that should be promised solemnly under the name of a covenant?’ For the full resolution of this question, I must, as before, refer the reader unto what hath been discoursed at large about the two covenants, and the difference between them, on verse 6. Here we may briefly name some few things, sufficient unto the exposition of this place; as, —

This is the whole point in going through this explanation of what a covenant is. It is foundational to a fuller understanding of the scope of the atonement being limited.

"For by the making of this covenant with any, the effectual communication of the grace of it to them is principally intended. Nor can that covenant be said to be made absolutely with any but those whose sins are pardoned by virtue of it, and in whose hearts the law of God is written; which are the express promises of it. And it was with respect to those of this sort among that people that the covenant was promised to be made with them. See Rom 9:27-33; 11:7. But in respect of the outward dispensation of the covenant, it is extended beyond the effectual communication of the grace of it. And in respect to that did the privilege of the carnal seed of Abraham lie." " Owen

That is, for a covenant to be a legitimate covenant, there must be specific persons as the object of those promises (i.e., the Father chooses distinct persons (Jesus calls them by name! ..I sheep hear my voice..) who are the objects of his love, in eternity, to whom he bestows his glorious possessions, his graces [and surely, he gives his dowry to none other than to his bride - Thomas Shepard) which comprise the foundation of the covenant, otherwise it is no covenant. Heb. 8:8 "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, and I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and the house of Judah." The greatest and utmost mercies that God ever intended to communicate unto the church, and to bless it withal, were enclosed in the new covenant. Nor doth the efficacy of the mediation of Christ extend itself beyond the verge and compass thereof; for he is only the mediator and surety of this covenant. p120 (p 147 online) Heb. 8:9 -

Ver. 19 on pg 355 (437 online)

Ver. 19. — "For when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book and all the people."

(3.) There is the rule whereby Moses proceeded herein, or the warranty he had for what he did: "According unto the law." He read every precept according to the law. It cannot be the law in general that the apostle intends, for the greatest part of that doctrine which is so called was not yet given or written; nor doth it in any place contain any precept unto this purpose. Wherefore it is a particular law, rule, or command, that is intended; — according unto the ordinance or appointment of God. Such was the command that God gave unto Moses for the framing of the tabernacle: "See thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount." Particularly, it seems to be the agreement between God and the people, that Moses should be the internunci, the interpreter between them. According unto this rule, order, or divine constitution, Moses read all the words from God out of the book unto the people. Or it may be, "the law" may here be taken for the whole design of God in giving of the law; so as that "according unto the law," is no more but, according unto the sovereign wisdom and pleasure of God in giving of the law, with all things that belong unto its order and use. And it is good for us to look for God's especial warranty for what we undertake to do in his service.

The second thing in the words is, what Moses did immediately and directly towards the dedication or consecration of this covenant. And there are three things to this purpose mentioned: (1.) What he made use of. (2.) How he used it. (3.) With respect unto what and whom: —

(1.) The first is expressed in these words: "He took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop." He took the blood of the beasts that were offered for burnt-offerings and peace offerings, Exodus 24:5, 6, 8. Unto this end, in their slaying he took all their blood in basins, and made an equal division of it. The one half he sprinkled on the altar, and the other half he sprinkled on the people. That which was sprinkled on the altar was God's part; and the other was put on the people. Both the mutual stipulation of God and the congregation in this covenant, and the equality of it, or the equity of its terms, were denoted hereby. And herein lies the principal force of the apostle's argument in these words: Blood was used in the dedication of the first covenant. This was the blood of the beasts offered in sacrifice unto God. Wherefore both death, and death by blood-shedding, was required unto the confirmation of a covenant. So also, therefore, must the new covenant be confirmed; but with blood and a sacrifice far more precious than they were.

This distribution of blood, that half of it was on the altar, and half of it on the people, — the one to make atonement, the other to purify or sanctify, — was to teach the twofold efficacy of the blood of Christ, in making atonement for sin unto our justification, and the purifying of our natures in sanctification.

(2.) With this blood he took the things mentioned with respect unto its use, which was sprinkling. The manner of it was in part declared before. The blood being put into basons, and having water mixed with it to keep it fluid and aspersible, he took a bunch or bundle of hyssop bound up with scarlet wool, and dipping it into the basons, sprinkled the blood, until it was all spent in that service.

This rite or way of sprinkling was chosen of God as an expressive token or sign of the effectual communication of the benefits of the covenant unto them that were sprinkled. Hence the communication of the benefits of the death of Christ unto sanctification is called the sprinkling of his blood, 1 Peter 1:2. And our apostle compriseth all the effects of it unto that end under the name of “the blood of sprinkling,” Hebrews 12:24 And I fear that those who have used the expression with some contempt, when applied by themselves unto the sign of the communication of the benefits 443 of the death of Christ in baptism, have not observed that reverence of holy things that is required of us. For this symbol of sprinkling was that which God himself chose and appointed, as a meet and apt token of the communication of covenant mercy; that is, of his grace in Christ Jesus unto our souls.

And, — Obs. X. The blood of the covenant will not benefit or advantage us without an especial and particular application of it unto our own souls and consciences. — If it be not as well sprinkled upon us as it was offered unto God, it will not avail us. The blood of Christ was not divided, as was that of these sacrifices, the one half being on the altar, the other on the people; but the efficacy of the whole produced both these effects, yet so, as that the one will not profit us without the other. We shall have no benefit of the atonement made at the altar, unless we have its efficacy on our own souls unto their purification. And this we cannot have unless it be sprinkled on us, unless particular application be made of it unto us by the Holy Ghost, in and by an especial act of faith in ourselves. [which faith is also promised and bestowed (bequeathed) to the elect in the covenant! - hence the faith of God's elect.]

(3.) The object of this act of sprinkling was “the book” itself “and all the people.” The same blood was on the book wherein the covenant was recorded, and the people that entered into it. But whereas this sprinkling was for purifying and purging, it may be inquired unto what end the book itself was sprinkled, which was holy and undefiled. I answer, There were two things necessary unto the dedication of the covenant, with all that belonged unto it: [1.] Atonement; [2.] Purification. And in both these respects it was necessary that the book itself should be sprinkled. [1.] As we observed before, it was sprinkled as it lay upon the altar, where atonement was made. And this was plainly to signify that atonement was to be made by blood for sins committed against that book, or the law contained in it. Without this, that book would have been unto the people like that given to Ezekiel, that was “written within and without; and there was written therein lamentations, and mourning, and woe,” Ezekiel 2:10. Nothing but curse and death could they expect from it. But the sprinkling of it with blood as it lay upon the altar was a testimony and assurance that atonement should be made by blood for the sins against it; which was the life of the things. [2.] The book in itself was pure and holy, and so are all God’s institutions; but unto us every thing is unclean that is not sprinkled with the blood of Christ. So afterwards the tabernacle and all the vessels of it were purified every year with blood, “because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions,” Leviticus 16:16. Wherefore on both these accounts it was necessary that the book itself should be sprinkled.

The blood thus sprinkled was mingled with water. The natural reason of it was, as we observed, to keep it fluid and aspersible. But there was a mystery in it also. That the blood of Christ was typified by this blood of the sacrifices used in the dedication of the old covenant, it is the apostle’s design to declare. And it is probable that this mixture of it with water might represent that blood and water which came out of his side when it was pierced. For the mystery thereof was very great. Hence that apostle which saw it, and bare record of it in particular, John 19:34, 35, affirms likewise that “he came by water and blood,” and not by blood only, 1 Epist. 5:6. He came not only to make atonement for us with his blood, that we might be justified, but to sprinkle us with the efficacy of his blood, in the communication of the Spirit of sanctification, compared unto water.

For the sprinkler itself, composed of scarlet wool and hyssop, I doubt not but that the human nature of Christ, whereby and through which all grace is communicated unto us, (“for of his fullness we receive, and grace for grace,”) was signified by it; but the analogy and similitude between them are not so evident as they are with respect unto some other types. The hyssop was a humble plant, the meanest of them, yet of a sweet savor, 1 Kings 4:33; so was the Lord Christ amongst men in the days of his flesh, in comparison of the tall cedars of the earth. Hence was his complaint, that he was as “a worm, and no man; a reproach of men, and despised of the people,” Psalm 22:6. And the scarlet wool might represent him as red in the blood of his sacrifice. But I will not press these things, of whose interpretation we have not a certain rule. 445 Secondly, The principal truth asserted is confirmed by what Moses said, as well as what he did: —

Ver. 20. — “Saying, This [is] the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you.”

The difference between the words of Moses and the repetition of them by the apostle is not material, as unto the sense of them. [Greek word], “behold,” in Moses, is rendered by τούτο, “this;” both demonstrative notes of the same thing. For in pronouncing of the words Moses showed the blood unto the people; and so, “Behold the blood,” is all one as if he had said, “This is the blood.” The making of the covenant in the words of Moses is expressed by [Greek word], “hath cut,” “divided,” solemnly made. This the apostle renders by ενετειλατο “hath enjoined” or “commanded you.” And this he doth partly to signify the foundation of the people’s acceptance of that covenant, which was the authority of God enjoining them or requiring them so to do; partly to intimate the nature of the covenant itself, which consisted in precepts and injunctions principally, and not absolutely in promises, as the new covenant doth. The last words of Moses, “Concerning all these words,” the apostle omits; for he includes the sense of them in that word, “Which God hath commanded you.” For he hath respect therein both unto the words themselves written in the book, which were precepts and injunctions, as also the command of God for the acceptance of the covenant.

That which Moses said is, "This is the blood of the testament." Hence the apostle proves that death, and the shedding of blood therein, was necessary unto the consecration and establishment of the first testament. For so Moses expressly affirms in the dedication of it, "This is the blood of the covenant;" without which it could not have been a firm covenant between God and the people. Not, I confess, from the nature of a covenant in general, for a covenant may be solemnly established without death or blood; but from the especial end of that covenant, which in the confirmation of it was to prefigure the confirmation of that new covenant which could not be established but with the blood of a sacrifice. And this adds both force and evidence unto the apostle's argument. For he proves the necessity of the death and blood-shedding or sacrifice of Christ in the confirmation of the new covenant from hence, that the old covenant, which in the dedication of it was prefigurative hereof, was not confirmed without blood. Wherefore, whereas God had solemnly promised to make a new covenant with the church, and that different from, or not according unto the old (which he had proved in the foregoing chapter), it follows unavoidably that it was to be confirmed with the blood of the mediator (for by the blood of beasts it could not be); which is that truth wherein he did instruct them. And nothing was more cogent to take off the scandal of the cross and of the sufferings of Christ.

For the enunciation itself, "This is the blood of the covenant," it is figurative and sacramental. The covenant had no blood of its own; but the blood of the sacrifices is called "the blood of the covenant," because the covenant was dedicated and established by it. Neither was the covenant really established by it; for it was the truth of God on the one hand, and the stability of the people in their professed obedience on the other, that the establishment of the covenant depended on. But this blood was a confirmatory sign of it, a token between God and the people of their mutual engagement in that covenant. So the paschal lamb was called "the LORD'S Passover," because it was a sign and token of God's passing over the houses of the Israelites when he destroyed the Egyptians, Exodus 12:11, 12. With reference it was unto those sacramental expressions which the church under the old testament was accustomed unto, that our Lord Jesus Christ, in the institution of the sacrament of the supper, called the bread and the wine, whose use he appointed therein, by the names of his body and blood; and any other interpretation of the words wholly overthrows the nature of that holy ordinance.

Wherefore this blood was a confirmatory sign of the covenant. And it was so, 1. From God's institution; he appointed it so to be, as is express in the words of Moses. 2. From an implication of the interest of both parties in the blood of the sacrifice; God, unto whom it was offered; and the people, on whom it was sprinkled. For it being the blood of beasts that were slain, in this use of it each party as it were engaged their lives unto the observation and performance of what was respectively undertaken by them. 3. Typically, in that it represented the blood of Christ, and fore-signified the necessity of it unto the confirmation of the new covenant. See Zechariah 9:11; Matthew 26:28; Luke 22:20; 1 Corinthians 11:25. So was it "the blood of the covenant," in that it was a sign between God and the people of their mutual consent unto it, and their taking on themselves the performance of the terms of it, on the one side and the other.

Obs. XI. The condescension of God in making a covenant with men, especially in the ways of the confirmation of it, is a blessed object of all holy admiration. — For,

1. The infinite distance and disproportion that is between him and us, both in nature and state or condition;
2. The ends of this covenant, which are all unto our eternal advantage, he standing in no need of us or our obedience;
3. The obligation that he takes upon himself unto the performance of the terms of it, whereas he might righteously deal with us in a way of mere sovereignty;
4. The nature of the assurance he gives us thereof, by the blood of the sacrifice, confirmed with his oath; do all set forth the ineffable glory of this condescension. And this will at length be made manifest in the eternal blessedness of them by whom this covenant is embraced, and the eternal misery of them by whom it is refused. The apostle having given this full confirmation unto his principal assertion, he adds, for the illustration of it, the use and efficacy of blood, that is, the blood of sacrifices, unto purification and atonement.

THE NEW COVENANT [\[my comments in blue\]](#)

The necessity of this upbringing and preparation does not arise, objectively, in God as though he were variable; nor in Christ as though he were not the same yesterday and today and forever; nor in the spiritual benefits as though they did not exist and could not be communicated by God. But it arises, subjectively, in the state of the human race, which, precisely as a race, had to be saved and hence had to be gradually prepared and educated for salvation in Christ. [Calvin] Christ, accordingly, is the turning point of the times, the cross the focal point of world history. First, everything was led in the direction of the cross; subsequently, everything was inferred from the cross.

So when the fullness of time had come and Christ had completed his work on earth, the covenant of grace moved into a higher dispensation. Believers in Israel indeed knew that the Sinaitic dispensation was merely temporary and therefore anticipated the day of the new covenant with longing. And Jesus with the apostles who read the Old Testament in that way saw in it the same covenant of grace with the same benefits that now became fully manifest. The Old and the New Testaments are in essence one covenant (Luke 1: 68– 79; Acts 2: 39; 3: 25). They have one gospel (Rom. 1: 2; Gal. 3: 8; Heb. 4: 2, 6; 2 Tim. 3: 15); one mediator, namely, Christ, who existed also in the days of the Old Testament (John 1: 1, 14; 8: 58; Rom. 8: 3; 2 Cor. 8: 9; Gal. 4: 4; Phil. 2: 6; etc.), exercised his office of mediator (John 8: 56; 1 Cor. 10: 4; 1 Pet. 1: 11; 3: 19; Heb. 13: 8), and is the only mediator for all humans and in all times (John 14: 6; Acts 4: 12; 1 Tim. 2: 5). It included one faith as the way of salvation (Matt. 13: 17; Acts 10: 43; 15: 11; Rom. 4: 11; Gal. 3: 6– 7; Heb. 11); the same promises and benefits of God's communion (2 Cor. 6: 16; Rev. 21: 3), forgiveness, justification (Acts 10: 43; Rom. 4: 22), and eternal life (Matt. 22: 32; Gal. 3: 18; Heb. 9: 15; 11: 10; etc.). The road was the same on which believers in the Old and the New Testaments walked, but the light in which they walked was different. [Calvin]

For all the unity between them, therefore, there is also difference. The Old and the New Testaments as different dispensations of the same covenant of grace are related as promise and fulfillment (Acts 13: 32; Rom. 1: 2), as shadow and substance (Col. 2: 17), as the letter that kills and the Spirit that makes alive (2 Cor. 3: 6ff.), as servitude and freedom (Rom. 8: 15; Gal. 4: 1ff., 22ff.; Col. 2: 20; Heb. 12: 18f.), as particular and universal (John 4: 21; Acts 10: 35; 14: 16; Gal. 4: 4– 5; 6: 15; Eph. 2: 14; 3: 6).

The new thing in the New Testament, therefore, is the shedding of the non-arbitrary but still temporary sensory national forms under which one and the same grace was revealed in the old day. The new dispensation already starts in a sense when, with the births of John the Baptist and Jesus, the promises of the Old Testament begin to be fulfilled. Yet the old dispensation still remained in effect up until the death of Christ. [62] Jesus himself was an Israelite, fulfilled all righteousness, and still concerned himself only with the lost sheep of the house of Israel. But at his death, the curtain in the temple tore in two (Matt. 27: 51), the testator himself died (Heb. 9: 15– 17), the New Testament was founded in his blood (Matt. 26: 28), the bond that stood against us was canceled (Col. 2: 14), the dividing wall was broken down (Eph. 2: 14), and so on. Factually the old dispensation may long linger, but legally it has been abolished. Better still, nothing was abolished, but the fruit was ripe and broke through the husk. The church, carried like a fetus in Israel's womb, was born to an independent life of its own and in the Holy Spirit received an immanent life principle of its own. The sun of righteousness rose to its zenith in the heavens and shone out over all peoples. The law and the prophets have been fulfilled and in Christ as their end and goal reached their destiny. The law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ (John 1: 14). He is the truth (John 14: 6), the substance (Col. 2: 17) in whom all the promises and shadows have been realized. In him all things have been fulfilled. He is the true prophet, priest, and king; the true servant of the Lord, the true expiation (Rom. 3: 25), the true sacrifice (Eph. 5: 2), the true circumcision (Col. 2: 11), the true Passover (1 Cor. 5: 7), and therefore his church is the true seed of Abraham, the true Israel, the true people of God (Matt. 1: 21; Luke 1: 17; Rom. 9: 25– 26; 2 Cor. 6: 16– 18; Gal. 3: 29; Titus 2: 14; Heb. 8: 8– 10; 1 Pet. 2: 9; Rev. 21: 3), the true temple of God (1 Cor. 3: 16; 2 Cor. 6: 16; Eph. 2: 21; 2 Thess. 2: 4; Heb. 8: 2, 5), the true Zion and Jerusalem (Gal. 4: 26; Heb. 12: 22), its spiritual offering, the true religion (John 4: 24; Rom. 12: 1; Phil. 3: 3; 4: 18; etc.). Nothing of the Old Testament is lost in the New, but everything is fulfilled, matured, has reached its full growth, and now, out of the temporary husk, produces the eternal core. It is not the case that in Israel there was a true temple and sacrifice and priesthood and so on and that all these have now vanished. The converse, rather, is true: of all this Israel only possessed a shadow, but now the substance itself has emerged. The things we see are temporal, but the invisible things are eternal. [63]

RELATION TO THE COVENANT OF NATURE

[Doctrine of Concurrence explained]

This covenant of grace, which through various dispensations has now been fully realized in the New Testament, was from the first moment of its revelation and is still today surrounded and sustained on all sides by the covenant of nature God established with all creatures. Although special grace is essentially distinct from common grace, it is intimately bound up with it. After all, though the covenant with Noah is called— for the purpose of differentiation— the “covenant of nature,” it did not flow from God’s nature and was not given with the nature of things; it, too, rests on grace, proceeds from God’s patience, and grants all natural benefits and blessings out of God’s general goodness. It is a covenant of grace in the broad sense. Further, it is the Father who— not apart from the Son but specifically through the Logos and the Spirit— produces all the forces and gifts present in nature and unregenerate humankind (John 1: 4– 5, 9– 10; Col. 1: 17; Pss. 104: 30; 139: 7). And this Logos and Spirit who dwell and work in all creatures and humans are the same agents who as Christ and the Spirit of Christ acquire and apply all the benefits pertaining to the covenant of grace. Father, Son, and Spirit, then, prepare for the covenant of grace in the covenant of nature and reach back from it, as it were, into the covenant of nature.

The essential character of the covenant of grace, accordingly, consists in the fact that it proceeds from God’s special grace and has for its content nothing other than grace— undeserved and forfeited blessings. To that extent it is essentially distinct from the covenant of works, which was established before, and broken by, the fall. Granted, it is also true of the covenant of works that God was not obligated to introduce it. It was his condescending goodness, and thus also grace in a general sense, that prompted him to grant this covenant to human beings. He, accordingly, established it and determined every part of it: it is his ordinance and institution. Yet in that covenant of works God came to humanity with the demand of obedience and—only in that way and upon the accomplishment of it— promised to grant them the blessedness of heaven, eternal life, and the enjoyment of the beatific vision. The covenant of works, accordingly, factored in the free will of the first human pair; in part it depended on them and was therefore insecure and unstable. In fact, therefore, it was broken, not by God, but by [the first] human pair. God stands by the rule that those who keep the law will receive eternal life. He posits this in his law, attests it in everyone’s conscience, and validates the statement in Christ. But human beings broke the covenant of works; now they are no longer able to acquire life by keeping it. By the works of the law no human can be justified. In distinction from and contrast to the covenant of works, God therefore established another, a better, covenant, not a legalistic but an evangelical covenant. [legalistic is doing things primarily from a principle of self-love, self-preservation, self-interest or for mercenary ends, etc.; evangelical is doing things by faith in the God, and more particularly, because you love God; your acts flow from a principle of love for God] But he made it, not with one who was solely a human, but with the man Christ Jesus, who was his own only begotten, much-beloved Son. And in him, who shares the divine nature and attributes, this covenant has an unwaveringly firm foundation. It can no longer be broken: it is an everlasting covenant. It rests not in any work of humans but solely in the good pleasure of God, in the work of the Mediator, in the Holy Spirit, who remains forever. It is not dependent on any human condition; it does not confer any benefit based on merit; it does not wait for any law keeping on the part of humans. It is of, through, and for grace. God himself is the sole and eternal being, the faithful and true being, in whom it rests and who establishes, maintains, executes, and completes it. The covenant of grace is the divine work par excellence— his work alone and his work totally. All boasting is excluded here for humans; all glory is due to the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

Covenant of Election

Thus in a marvelous way the doctrine of the covenant maintains God's sovereignty in the entire work of salvation. It far surpasses the covenant of works to the degree that Christ exceeds Adam. God's threefold being is manifest much more clearly in the re-creation than in the creation. It is the Father who conceives, plans, and wills the work of salvation; it is the Son who guarantees it and effectively acquires it; it is the Spirit who implements and applies it. And into that entire work of salvation, from beginning to end, nothing is introduced that derives from humans. It is God's work totally and exclusively; it is pure grace and undeserved salvation. Despite, or rather because of, the fact that this doctrine of the covenant so purely and fully maintains God's sovereignty in the work of salvation, however, it is all the more important to note that it at the same time beautifully allows the rational and moral nature of humans to come into their own. [Doctrine of Concurrence; God's sovereignty is consistent with man's liberty; God does not operate by compulsion doing violence to man's liberty of his will; he's doesn't force man against his will.] In the covenant of works, this point has already been explained in detail. [Bavinck] But in the covenant of grace, it comes to even more striking expression. In this respect it is very different from election. [Kuyper] Admittedly, the two are not so different that election is particular while the covenant of grace is universal, that the former denies free will and the latter teaches or assumes it, that the latter takes back what the former teaches. But the two do differ in that in election humans are strictly passive but in the covenant of grace they also play an active role. Election only and without qualification states who are elect and will infallibly obtain salvation; the covenant of grace describes the road by which these elect people will attain their destiny. The covenant of grace the channel by which the stream of election flows toward eternity. In this covenant Christ indeed acts as the head and representative of his own, but he does not efface and destroy them. He vouches for them but does so in such a way that they themselves, instructed and enabled by the Spirit, also consciously and voluntarily consent to this covenant. [Doctrine of Concurrence again] Although the covenant of grace has been made with Christ, through him it nevertheless reaches out also to his own, completely embraces and incorporates them body and soul. The pact of salvation expands to become a covenant of grace. The head of the covenant of grace is at the same time its mediator. For that reason, from the moment of its public announcement, it comes with the demand of faith and repentance (Mark 1: 15). In the beginning Reformed theologians spoke freely of "the conditions" of the covenant. [Calvin] But after the nature of the covenant of grace had been more carefully considered and had to be defended against Catholics, Lutherans, and Remonstrants, many of them took exception to the term and avoided it. [K. Olevianus]

In the covenant of grace, that is, in the gospel, which is the proclamation of the covenant of grace, there are actually no demands and no conditions. For God supplies what he demands. [the main difference between the Covenant of Works vs. Grace] Christ has accomplished everything, and though he did not accomplish rebirth, faith, and repentance in our place, he did acquire them for us, and the Holy Spirit therefore applies them. Still, in its administration by Christ, the covenant of grace does assume this demanding conditional form. The purpose is to acknowledge humans in their capacity as rational and moral beings; still, though they are fallen, to treat them as having been created in God's image; and also on this supremely important level, where it concerns their eternal weal and eternal woe, to hold them responsible and inexcusable; and, finally, to cause them to enter consciously and freely [Concurrence] into this covenant and to break their covenant with sin. The covenant of grace, accordingly, is indeed unilateral: it proceeds from God; he has designed and defined it. He maintains and implements it. It is a work of the triune God and is totally completed among the three Persons themselves. But it is destined to become bilateral, to be consciously and voluntarily accepted and kept by humans in the power of God. [Concurrence again!] This is the will of God, which so clearly and beautifully manifests itself in the covenant in order that the work of grace may be clearly reflected in the human consciousness and arouse the human will to exert itself energetically and forcefully. The covenant of grace does not deaden human beings or treat them as inanimate objects. On the contrary, it totally includes them with all their faculties and powers, in soul and body, for time and eternity. It embraces them totally, does not destroy their power, but deprives them of their impotence. It does not kill their will but frees them from sin; it does not numb their consciousness but delivers it from darkness. [God does not destroy their liberty – their wills are not forced, but sweetly changed by the Spirit – that's the key!] It re-creates the whole person and, having renewed it by grace, prompts it, freely and independently, with soul, mind, and body, to love God and to dedicate itself to him. The covenant of grace declares that God's honor and acclaim is not won at the expense but for the benefit of human persons and celebrates its triumphs in the re-creation of the whole person, in his or her enlightened consciousness and restored freedom.

4. The subject-matter of the promise given is a “covenant,” — tyriki. The LXX. render it by διαθηκη, — “a testament.” And that is more proper in this place than “a covenant.” For if we take “covenant” in a strict and proper sense, it hath indeed no place between God and man. For a covenant, strictly taken, ought to proceed on equal terms, and a proportionate consideration of things on both sides; but the covenant of God is founded on grace, and consists essentially in a free, undeserved promise. And therefore tyriki, “a covenant,” is never spoken of between God and man, but on the part of God it consists in a free promise, or a testament. And “a testament,” which is the proper signification of the word here used by the apostle, is suited unto this place, and nothing else.

For, — (1.) Such a covenant is intended as is ratified and confirmed by the death of him that makes it. And this is properly a testament: for this covenant was confirmed by the death of Christ, and that both as it was the death of the testator, and as it was accompanied with the blood of a sacrifice; whereof we must treat afterwards at large, if God will.

(2.) It is such a covenant, as wherein the covenanter, he that makes it, bequeatheth his goods unto others in the way of a legacy; for this is done by Christ herein, as we must also declare afterwards. Wherefore our Savior calls this covenant “the new testament in his blood.” This the word used by the apostle doth properly signify; and it is evident that he intends not a covenant absolutely and strictly so taken. With respect hereunto the first covenant is usually called the “old testament.” For we intend not thereby the books of Scripture, or oracles of God committed unto the church of the Jews, (which yet, as we have observed, are once called “the Old Testament,” 2 Corinthians 3:14,) but the covenant that God made with the church of Israel at Sinai, whereof we have spoken at large. And this was called a “testament” for three reasons: —

[1.] Because it was confirmed by death; that is, the death of the sacrifices that were slain and offered at its solemn establishment. So saith our apostle, “The first testament was not dedicated without blood,” Hebrews 9:18. But there is more required hereunto; for even a covenant properly and strictly so called may be confirmed with sacrifices. Wherefore, —

[2.] God did therein make over and grant unto the church of Israel the good things of the land of Canaan, with the privileges of his worship.

[3.] The principal reason of this denomination, “the old testament,” is taken from its being typically significative of the death and legacy of the great testator, as we have showed.

We have treated somewhat before concerning the nature of the new testament, as considered in distinction from and opposition unto the old. I shall here only briefly consider what concurrerth unto the constitution of it, as it was then future, when this promise was given, and as it is here promised. And three things do concur hereunto: —

(1.) A recapitulation, collection, and confirmation of all the promises of grace that had been given unto the church from the beginning, even all that was spoken by the mouth of the holy prophets that had been since the world began, Luke 1:70. The first promise contained in it the whole essence and substance of the covenant, of grace [Gen3:15]. All those afterwards given unto the church, on various occasions, were but explications and confirmations of it. In the whole of them there was a full declaration of the wisdom and love of God in sending his Son, and of his grace unto mankind thereby. And God solemnly confirmed them with his oath, namely, that they should be all accomplished in their appointed season. Whereas, therefore, the covenant here promised included the sending of Christ for the accomplishment of those promises, they are all gathered into one head therein. It is a constellation of all the promises of grace.

[1.] In that, as unto the accomplishment of the grace principally intended in them, they received it in the sending of Christ; and as to the confirmation and establishment of them for the communication of grace unto the church, they received it in the death of Christ, as a sacrifice of agreement or atonement.

[2.] They are established as the rule and law of reconciliation and peace between God and man. This gives them the nature of a covenant; for a covenant is the solemn expression of the terms of peace between various parties, with the confirmation of them.

(3.) They are reduced unto such form of law, as to become the only rule of the ordinances of worship and divine service required of the church. Nothing unto these ends is now presented unto us, or required of us, but what belongeth immediately unto the administration of this covenant, and the grace thereof. But the reader must consult what hath been discoursed at large unto this purpose on the 6th^verse.

And we may see from hence what it is that God here promiseth and foretelleth, as that which he would do in the “days that were coming.” For whereas they had the promise before, and so virtually the grace and mercy of the new covenant, it may be inquired: ‘What is yet wanting, that should be promised solemnly under the name of a covenant?’ For the flail resolution of this question, I must, as before, refer the reader unto what hath been discoursed at large about the two covenants, and the difference between them, on verse 6. Here we may briefly name some few things, sufficient unto the exposition of this place; as, —

(1.) All those promises which had before been given out unto the church from the beginning of the world, were now reduced into the form of a covenant, or rather of a testament. The name of “a covenant” is indeed sometimes applied unto the promises of grace before or under the old testament; but tyrubi, the word used in all those places, denoteth only “a free, gratuitous promise,” Genesis 9:9, 17:4. But they were none of them, nor all of them together, reduced into the form of a testament; which they could not be but by the death of the testator. And what blessed privileges and benefits were included herein hath been showed before, and must yet further be insisted on in the exposition of the ninth chapter, if God permit.

(2.) There was another covenant superadded unto the promises, which was to be the immediate rule of the obedience and worship of the church. And according unto their observance of this superadded covenant, they were esteemed to have kept or broken covenant with God. This was the old covenant on Sinai, as hath been declared. Wherefore the promises could not be in the form of a covenant unto the people, inasmuch as they could not be under the power of two covenants at once, and those, as it afterwards appeared, absolutely inconsistent. For this is that which our apostle proves in this place, namely, that when the promises were brought into the form and had the use of a covenant unto the church, the former covenant must needs disappear, or be disannulled. Only, they had their place and efficacy to convey the benefits of the grace of God in Christ unto them that did believe; but God here foretelleth that he will give them such an order and efficacy in the administration of his grace, as that all the fruits of it by Jesus Christ shall be bequeathed and made over unto the church in the way of a solemn covenant.

(3.) Notwithstanding the promises which they had received, yet the whole system of their worship sprang from, and related unto the covenant made at Sinai. But now God promiseth a new state of spiritual worship, relating only unto the promises of grace as brought into the form of a covenant.

Obs. VIII. The new covenant, as re-collecting into one all the promises of grace given from the foundation of the world, accomplished in the actual exhibition of Christ, and confirmed in his death, and by the sacrifice of his blood, thereby becoming the sole rule of new spiritual ordinances of worship suited thereunto, was the great object of the faith of the saints of the old testament, and is the great foundation of all our present mercies.

All these things were contained in that new covenant, as such, which God here promiseth to make. For, —

(1.) There was in it a recapitulation of all the promises of grace. God had not made any promise, any intimation of his love or grace unto the church in general, nor unto any particular believer, but he brought it all into this covenant, so as that they should be esteemed, all and every one of them, to be given and spoken unto every individual person that hath an interest in this covenant. Hence all the promises made unto Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the other patriarchs, and the oath of God whereby they were confirmed, are all of them made unto us, and do belong unto us no less than they did unto them to whom they were first given, if we are made partakers of this covenant. Hereof the apostle gives an instance in the singular promise made unto Joshua, which he applies unto believers, Hebrews 13:5. There was nothing of love or grace in any of them but was gathered up into this covenant.

(2.) The actual exhibition of Christ in the flesh belonged unto this promise of making a new covenant; for without it, it could not have been made. This was the desire of all the faithful from the foundation of the world; this they longed after, and fervently prayed for continually. And the prospect of it was the sole ground of their joy and consolation. “Abraham saw his day, and rejoiced.” This was the great privilege which God granted unto them that walked uprightly before him; such an one, saith he, “shall dwell on high: his place of defense shall be the munition of rocks: bread shall be given him; his waters shall be sure. Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty: they shall behold the land that is very far off,” Isaiah 33:16, 17. That prospect they had by faith of the King of saints in his beauty and glory, though yet at a great distance, was their relief and their reward in their sincere obedience. And those who understand not the glory of this privilege of the new covenant, in the incarnation of the Son of God, or his exhibition in the flesh, wherein the depths of the counsels and wisdom of God, in the way of grace, mercy, and love, opened themselves unto the church, are strangers unto the things of God.

(3.) It was confirmed and ratified by the death and blood shedding of Christ, and therefore included in it the whole work of his mediation. This is the spring of the life of the church; and until it was opened, great darkness was upon the minds of believers themselves. What peace, what assurance, what light, what joy, depend hereon, and proceed from it, no tongue can express.

(4.) All ordinances of worship do belong hereunto. What is the benefit of them, what are the advantages which believers receive by them, we must declare when we come to consider that comparison that the apostle makes between them and the carnal ordinances of the law, Hebrews 9.

Whereas, therefore, all these things were contained in the new covenant, as here promised of God, it is evident how great was the concernment of the saints under the old testament to have it introduced; and how great also ours is in it, now it is established.

5. The author or maker of this covenant is expressed in the words, as also those with whom it was made: —

(1.) The first is included in the person of the verb, “I will make;” “I will make, saith the Lord.” It is God himself that makes this covenant, and he takes it upon himself so to do. He is the principal party covenanting: “I will make a covenant.” God hath made a covenant: “He hath made with me an everlasting covenant.” And sundry things are we taught therein: —

[1.] The freedom of this covenant, without respect unto any merit, worth, or condignity in them with whom it is made. What God doth, he doth freely, — “ex mera gratia et voluntate.” There was no cause without himself for which he should make this covenant, or which should move him so to do. And this we are eminently taught in this place, where he expresseth no other occasion of his making this covenant but the sins of the people in breaking that which he formerly made with them. And it is expressed on purpose to declare the free and sovereign grace, the goodness, love, and mercy, which alone were the absolute springs of this covenant.

[2.] The wisdom of its contrivance. The making of any covenant to be good and useful, depends solely on the wisdom and foresight of them by whom it is made. Hence men do often make covenants, which they design for their good and advantage, but they are so ordered, for want of wisdom and foresight, that they turn unto their hurt and ruin. But there was infinite wisdom in the constitution of this covenant; whence it is, and shall be, infinitely effective of all the blessed ends of it. And they are utterly unacquainted with it, who are not affected with a holy admiration of divine wisdom in its contrivance. A man might comfortably spend his life in the contemplation of it, and yet be far enough from finding out the Almighty in it unto perfection. Hence is it that it is so divine a mystery in all the parts of it, which the wisdom of the flesh cannot comprehend. Nor, without a due consideration of the infinite wisdom of God in the contrivance of it, can we have any true or real conceptions about it: JEKazhloi. Profane, unsanctified minds can have no insight into this effect of divine wisdom.

[3.] It was God alone who could prepare and provide a surety for this covenant. Considering the necessity there was of a surety in this covenant, seeing no covenant between God and man could be firm and stable without one, by reason of our weakness and mutability; and considering of what a nature this surety must be, even God and man in one person; it is evident that God himself must make this covenant. And the provision of this surety doth contain in it the glorious manifestation of all the divine excellencies, beyond any act or work of God whatever.

[4.] There is in this covenant a sovereign law of divine worship, wherein the church is consummated, or brought into the most perfect estate whereof in this world it is capable, and established for ever. This law could be given by God alone.

[5.] There is ascribed unto this covenant such an efficacy of grace, as nothing but almighty power can make good and accomplish. The grace here mentioned in the promises of it, directs us immediately unto its author. For who else but God can write the divine law in our hearts, and pardon all our sins? The sanctification or renovation of our natures, and the justification of our persons, being pro-raised herein, seeing infinite power and grace are required unto them, he alone must make this covenant with whom all power and grace do dwell. "God hath spoken once; twice have I heard this; that power belongeth unto God. Also unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy," Psalm 62:1 |, 12. [Arminians say that the power belongs to us in our innate ability to believe which is untrue, and not only that, their doctrine undermines the doctrine of original sin, saying that man is unwilling and unable to come to God, 1Cor2:14, Rm8:7-8, Jn14:17 and robs God of the glory of his free grace.]

[6.] The reward promised in this covenant is God himself: "I am thy reward." And who but God can ordain himself to be our reward?

Obs. IX. All the efficacy and glory of the new covenant do originally arise from, and are resolved into, the author and supreme cause of it, which is God himself. —And we might consider, unto the encouragement of our faith, and the strengthening of our consolation, —

[1.] His infinite condescension, to make and enter into covenant with poor, lost, fallen, sinful man. This no heart can fully conceive, no tongue can express; only we live in hope to have yet a more clear prospect of it, and to have a holy admiration of it unto eternity.

[2.] His wisdom, goodness, and grace, in the nature of that covenant which he hath condescended to make and enter into. The first covenant he made with us in Adam, which we brake, was in itself good, holy, righteous, and just; — it must be so, because it was also made by him. But there was no provision made in it absolutely to preserve us from that woeful disobedience and transgression which would make it void, and frustrate all the holy and blessed ends of it. Nor was God obliged so to preserve us, having furnished us with a sufficiency of ability for our own preservation, so as we could no way fall but by a willful apostasy from him. But this covenant is of that nature, as that the grace administered in it shall effectually preserve all the covenanters unto the end, and secure unto them all the benefits of it. For, —

[3.] His power and faithfulness are engaged unto the accomplishment of all the promises of it. And these promises do contain everything that is spiritually and eternally good or desirable unto us. "O LORD, our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth'." How glorious art thou in the ways of thy grace towards poor sinful creatures, who had destroyed themselves! And, —

(2.) The persons with whom this covenant is made are also expressed: “The house of Israel, and the house of Judah.” Long before the giving of this promise, that people were divided into two parts. The one of them, in way of distinction from the other, retained the name of Israel. These were the ten tribes, which fell off from the house of David, under the conduct of Ephraim; whence they are often also in the Prophets called by that name. The other, consisting of the tribe properly so called, with that of Benjamin and the greatest part of Levi, took the name of Judah; and with them both the promise and the church remained in a peculiar manner. But whereas they all originally sprang from Abraham, who received the promise and sign of circumcision for them all, and because they were all equally in their forefather brought into the bond of the old covenant, they are here mentioned distinctly, that none of the seed of Abraham might be excluded from the tender of this covenant. Unto the whole seed of Abraham according to the flesh it was that the terms and grace of this covenant were first to be offered. So Peter tells them, in his first sermon, that “the promise was unto them and their children” who were then present, —that is, the house of Judah; and “to all that were afar off,” —that is, the house of Israel in their dispersions, Acts 2:39. So again he expresseth the order of the dispensation of this covenant with respect to the promise made to Abraham, Acts 3:25, 26, “Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed. Unto you first, God having raised his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you;” namely, in the preaching of the gospel. So our apostle, in his sermon unto them, affirmed that “it was necessary that the word should be first spoken unto them,” Acts 13:46. And this was all the privilege that was now left unto them; for the partition-wall was now broken down, and all obstacles against the Gentiles taken out of the way. Wherefore this house of Israel and house of Judah may be considered two ways: [1.] As that people were the whole entire posterity of Abraham. [2.] As they were typical, and mystically significant of the whole church of God. Hence alone it is that the promises of grace under the old testament are given unto the church under these names, because they were types of them who should really and effectually be made partakers of them.

[1.] In the first sense, God made this covenant with them, and this on sundry accounts:

1st: Because He in and through whom alone it was to be established and made effectual was to be brought forth amongst them of the seed of Abraham, as the apostle Peter plainly declares, Acts 3:25.

2dly. Because all things that belonged unto the ratification of it were to be transacted amongst them.

3dly. Because, in the outward dispensation of it, the terms and grace of it were first in the counsel of God to be tendered unto them.

4thly. Because by them, by the ministry of men of their posterity, the dispensation of it was to be carried unto all nations, as they were to be blessed in the seed of Abraham; which was done by the apostles and other disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ. So the law of the Redeemer went forth from Zion. By this means “the covenant was confirmed with many” of them “for one week,” before the calling of the Gentiles, Daniel 9:27. And because these things belonged equally unto them all, mention is made distinctly of “the house of Israel, and the house of Judah.” For the house of Judah was, at the time of the giving of this promise, in the sole possession of all the privileges of the old covenant; Israel having cut off themselves, by their revolt from the house of David; being cast out also, for their sins, amongst the heathen. But God, to declare that the covenant he designed had no respect unto those carnal privileges which were then in the possession of Judah alone, but only unto the promise made unto Abraham, he equals all his seed with respect unto the mercy of this covenant.

[2.] In the second sense the whole church of elect believers is intended under these denominations, being typified by them. These are they alone, being one made of twain, namely, Jews and Gentiles, with whom the covenant is really made and established, and unto whom the grace of it is actually communicated. For all those with whom this covenant is made shall as really have the law of God written in their hearts, and their sins pardoned, according unto the promise of it, as the people of old were brought into the land of Canaan by virtue of the covenant made with Abraham. These are the true Israel and Judah, prevailing with God, and confessing unto his name.

Obs. X. The covenant of grace in Christ is made only with the Israel of God, the church of the elect. — For by the making of this covenant with any, the effectual communication of the grace of it unto them is principally intended. Nor can that covenant be said to be made absolutely with any but those whose sins are pardoned by virtue thereof, and in whose hearts the law of God is written; which are the express promises of it. And it was with respect unto those of this sort among that people that the covenant was promised to be made with them. See Romans 9:27-33, 11:7. But in respect of the outward dispensation of the covenant, it is extended beyond the effectual communication of the grace of it. And in respect thereunto did the privilege of the carnal seed of Abraham lie.

Obs. XI. Those who are first and most advanced as unto outward privileges, are oftentimes last and least advantaged by the grace and mercy of them. — Thus was it with these two houses of Israel and Judah. They had the privilege and pre-eminence, above all nations of the world, as unto the first tender, and all the benefits of the outward dispensation of the covenant; yet, “though the number of them was as the sand of the sea, a remnant only was saved.” They came behind the nations of the world as unto the grace of it; and this by reason of their unbelief, and the abuse of the privileges granted unto them. Let not those, therefore, who now enjoy the greatest privileges be high-minded, but fear.

(3.) The manner of making this covenant is expressed by “perficiam,” “consummabo,” “I will perfect” or “consummate.” In the Hebrew it is only trokwa,, “pangam,” “feriam,” “I will make; but the apostle renders it by this word, to denote that this covenant was at once perfected and consummated, to the exclusion of all additions and alterations. Perfection and unalterable establishment are the properties of this covenant: “An everlasting covenant, ordered in all things, and sure.”

(4.) As unto its distinguishing character, it is called “a new covenant.” So it is with respect unto the old covenant made at Sinai. Wherefore by this covenant, as here considered, is not understood the promise of grace given unto Adam absolutely; nor that unto Abraham, which contained the substance and matter of it, the grace exhibited in it, but not the complete form of it as a covenant. For if it were only the promise, it could not be called “a new covenant,” with respect unto that made at Sinai; for so it was before it absolutely two thousand five hundred years, and in the person of Abraham four hundred years at the least. But it must be considered as before described, in the establishment of it, and its law of spiritual worship. And so it was called “new” in time after that on Sinai eight hundred years. Howbeit it may be called “a new covenant” in other respects also. As, first, because of its eminency; —so it is said of an eminent work of God, “Behold, I work a new thing in the earth:” and its duration and continuance, as that which shall never wax old, is denoted thereby.

Man's Corruption - Total Depravity

Sin, Satan, the Curse, the Promise of relief, Man's corruption or Original Sin, Adam's original grace in the garden at his creation by John Owen, Commentary on Hebrews

“If Arminians (and Pelagians) believe that people are born innocent of Adam's transgression, that God did not impute Adam's sin to his posterity making them sinners, inherently bad, then why did God cast out Adam's most innocent posterity from paradise?” Owen's reasoning is excellent. - A Display of Arminianism Chp 7

26. We may now, therefore, take the sum of this discourse, and of the whole matter that we have insisted on, about the entrance of sin into the world, and the remedy provided in the grace and wisdom of God against it. It appears, upon our inquiry, First, That the sin of our first parents was the occasion and cause of all that evil which is in the world, — of all that is felt or justly feared by mankind; for as those who knew not, or received not, the revelation of the truth in these things made unto us in the Scripture, could never assign any other cause of it that might be satisfactory unto an ordinary rational inquirer, so the testimonies of the Scripture make it most evident, and especially that insisted on. Secondly, It hath been evinced that mankind could not recover or deliver themselves from under the power of their own innate corruption and disorder, nor from the effects of the curse and wrath of God that came upon them; neither is there any ground of expectation of relief from any other part of God's creation: but yet, that God, for the praise of the glory of his grace, mercy, and goodness, would effect it and bring it about. Thirdly, that this relief and deliverance is first intimated and declared in these words of God unto the serpent, “I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel;” which appears, —

First, Because, in and with the serpent, Satan, who was the head of all apostasy from God, and by whom our first parents were beguiled, is intended in these words. This we have made evident from the confession of the Jews, with whom principally, in this matter, we have to do. And to what hath been already observed unto that purpose, we may add the testimonies of some other of them to the same purpose. Rabbi Bechai, he whom they call qzyyjb, “Bechai the elder,” in his comment on the law, upon these words, Genesis 3:15, speaks to this purpose: “We have no more enmity with the serpent than with other creeping things. Wherefore the Scripture mystically signifies him who was hid in the serpent; for the body of the crafty serpent was a fit instrument for that force or virtue that joined itself therewithal. That was it which made Eve to sin; whence death came on all her posterity. And this is the enmity between the serpent and the seed of the woman; and this is the mystery of the holy tongue, that the serpent is sometimes called Saraph, according to the name of an angel who is also called Saraph. And now thou knowest that the serpent is Satan, and the evil figment, and the angel of death.” And Rabbi Judah, in rqylk: “Many interpreters say that the evil figment hath all its force from the old serpent, or Satan.” To the same purpose, the author of jrpw rwtpk, “Caphtor Vapaerach:” “The devil and the serpent are called by one name.” And many other testimonies of the like importance might be collected out of them. We have also a surer word for our own satisfaction, in the application of this place unto Satan in the divine writings of the New Testament: as 2 Corinthians 11:3; 1 Timothy 2:14; Romans 5:11-13, 15; Hebrews 2:14, 15; 1 John 3:8; Revelation 12:9, 20:2, 3; but we forbear to press them on the Jews.

Besides, it is most evident from the thing itself; for, — first, Who can be so sottish as to imagine that this great alteration which ensued on the works of God, that which caused him to pronounce them accursed, and to inflict so sore a punishment on Adam and all his posterity, should arise from the actings of a brute creature? Where is the glory of this dispensation? How can we attribute it unto the wisdom and greatness of God? What is there in it suitable unto his righteousness and holiness? Whereas supposing this to be the work of him who was in himself the beginning of all apostasy, and who first brake the law of his creation, all things answer the excellency of the divine perfections. Moreover, is it imaginable that the nature of man, then flourishing in the vigor of all its intellectual abilities, reason, wisdom, knowledge, in that order and rectitude of them which was his grace, should be surprised, seduced, and brought into subjection unto the craft and machinations of an inferior creature, a beast of the field, and that unto its own ruin, temporal and eternal? The whole nature of the inferior creatures, James tells us, “is tamed by the nature of man,” chap. 3:7, and that now, in his lessened and depraved condition; and shall we think that this excellent nature, in the blossom of its strength and right unto rule over all, should be tamed, corrupted, subdued, by the nature of a beast or a serpent? And yet again, whereas in the whole action of the serpent, there is an open design against the glory and honor of God, with the welfare and happiness of mankind, and that managed with craft, subtlety, and forecast, how can we imagine that such a contrivance should befall a brute worm, incapable of moral evil, and newly framed out of the dust by the power of its Creator?

Original Sin, and the Necessity of Being Born Again

John 3

By John Calvin

My notes in [blue]

6. That which is born of the flesh. By reasoning from contraries, he [Christ talking to Nicodemus] argues that the kingdom of God is shut against us, unless an entrance be opened to us by a new birth (palingenesia). For he takes for granted, that we cannot enter into the kingdom of God unless we are spiritual [that is, born again or born from above, i.e., converted]. But we bring nothing from the womb but a carnal nature. [or fallen/sinful/depraved nature: the effect of Adam's sin: the doctrine of Original Sin] Therefore it follows, that we are naturally banished from the kingdom of God, and, having been deprived of the heavenly life [where the heart has been changed to love Christ/God and hate sin and Satan], remain under the yoke of death. [under the curse of the law as all are by nature until they are converted by the Spirit – the new birth.] Besides, when Christ argues here, that men must be born again, because they are only flesh [natural as opposed to spiritual, i.e., born again to the newness of life, having now being made a partaker of the divine nature but also still having the old nature that wars with this new nature. Hence a believer as two natures; the Spirit, via grace, wars with the flesh, etc.], he undoubtedly comprehends all mankind under the term flesh. By the flesh, therefore, is meant in this place not the body, but the soul also, and consequently every part of it. When the Popish divines restrict the word to that part which they call sensual, they do so in utter ignorance of its meaning; for Christ must in that case have used an inconclusive argument, that we need a second birth, because part of us is corrupt. But if the flesh is contrasted with the Spirit, as a corrupt thing is contrasted with what is uncorrupted, a crooked thing with what is straight, a polluted thing with what is holy, a contaminated thing with what is pure, we may readily conclude that the whole nature of man is condemned by a single word. Christ therefore declares that our understanding and reason is corrupted, because it is carnal, and that all the affections of the heart are wicked and reprobate, because they too are carnal. [All people come into this world in this state of nature, a fallen nature due to Adam's sin (the doctrine of Original Sin); man is totally depraved in all his being: all the faculties of his soul, the mind/understanding darkened, the will stubborn, self-centered, and the affections perverted, so that man is a hater and despiser of God and lover of self. Man declares his independence from God as Adam and Eve did in the garden in this way: that I will decide what is good or evil from my own understanding or contrivance, and not from God's law. And so, God, punishing sin with sin, all of us come into this world declaring our independence from God, putting our own self in the room of God. Read Romans 1 and Romans 3 for a summary of this situation.]

But here it may be objected, that since the soul is not begotten by human generation, we are not born of the flesh, as to the chief part of our nature. This led many persons to imagine that not only our bodies, but our souls also, descend to us from our parents; for they thought it absurd that original sin, which has its peculiar habitation in the soul, should be conveyed from one man to all his posterity, unless all our souls proceeded from his soul as their source. And certainly, at first sight, the words of Christ appear to convey the idea, that we are flesh, because we are born of flesh. I answer, so far as relates to the words of Christ, they mean nothing else than that we are all carnal [as opposed to Christ/heavenly minded] when we are born; and that as we come into this world mortal men, our nature relishes nothing but what is flesh. He simply distinguishes here between nature and the supernatural gift; for the corruption of all mankind in the person of Adam alone did not proceed from generation, but from the appointment of God, who in one man had adorned us all, and who has in him also deprived us of his gifts. Instead of saying, therefore, that each of us draws vice and corruption from his parents, it would be more correct to say that we are all alike corrupted in Adam alone, because immediately after his revolt God took away from human nature what He had bestowed upon it. [This is the judgement of God, that God punishes sin with sin.]

Here another question arises; for it is certain that in this degenerate and corrupted nature some remnant of the gifts of God still lingers; and hence it follows that we are not in every respect corrupted. The reply is easy. The gifts which God hath left to us since the fall, if they are judged by themselves, are indeed worthy of praise; but as the contagion of wickedness is spread through every part, there will be found in us nothing that is pure and free from every defilement. That we naturally possess some knowledge of God, that some distinction between good and evil is engraven on our conscience, that our faculties are sufficient for the maintenance of the present life, that -- in short -- we are in so many ways superior to the brute beasts, that is excellent in itself, so far as it proceeds from God [Romans 1]; but in us all these things are completely polluted, in the same manner as the wine which has been wholly infected and corrupted by the offensive taste of the vessel loses the pleasantness of its good flavor, and acquires a bitter and pernicious taste [Romans 3:9-18]. For such knowledge of God as now remains in men is nothing else than a frightful source of idolatry and of all superstitions; the judgment exercised in choosing and distinguishing things is partly blind and foolish, partly imperfect and confused; all the industry that we possess flows into vanity and trifles; and the will itself, with furious impetuosity, rushes headlong to what is evil. Thus in the whole of our nature there remains not a drop of uprightness. Hence it is evident that we must be formed by the second birth, that we may be fitted for the kingdom of God; and the meaning of Christ's words is, that as a man is born only carnal from the womb of his mother; he must be formed anew by the Spirit, that he may begin to be spiritual.

The word Spirit is used here in two senses, namely, for grace, and the effect of grace. For in the first place, Christ informs us that the Spirit of God is the only Author of a pure and upright nature, and afterwards he states, that we are spiritual, because we have been renewed by his power.

The Gov't of Christ; when nations or people cast off the Gov't of Christ, i.e., rebel against his law, bondage and affliction comes. Other subjects: when salvation comes to a person - signs of conversion - self-examination, etc. This is very good! Plus a comment on Arminianism.

My comments in blue; red etc., for emphasis

2 Chron. xii. 8, "Nevertheless they shall be his servants, that they may know my service, and the service of the kingdoms of the country."

The greatest part of this chapter is spent in setting down that famous war which Shishak, king of Egypt, made against Rehoboam, king of Judah.

The cause of this war in regard of Shishak is not set down; probable conjectures there be: Jeroboam probably might be treacherous, who having a party in Egypt, lest Rehoboam should grow too great, together with some other pretended wrongs, might awaken this bear from his den; but in regard of God, you may see the reason set down, (ver. 2,) "because they had transgressed against the Lord."

The time of this war is set down in the first verse — when he had established the kingdom by wholesome laws, erecting God's worship, and countenancing godly men, (2 Chron. xi. 16, 17,) which continued three years, and strengthened himself by fortified places, and munition fit for war, as in the foregoing chapter appears. Now, when he had most peace and quiet, he and all Israel suddenly forsake the Lord, which was the fourth year; and in the fifth year comes Shishak, and with a mighty host wastes all before him until he comes to the chief city.

Now, in verse the fifth and sixth is set down the repentance of the people, with their princes especially Shemaiah, who, no doubt, had spoke against their idolatrous courses before, takes his season when they were low and tamed, and tells them the true cause of their misery. (Ver. 5.) Many sins there were in the land, as idolatry, and whoredoms, etc.; yet the venom was, "They had forsaken the Lord." Let the sin be what it will be, yet let it be such a one as men forsake the Lord by it, that is the provocation; hereupon they humble themselves, some effectually, some hypocritically, yet all outwardly, and say the Lord is righteous; they extenuate not their sin, they lay not the blame on man, no, not on Shishak, but see the Lord, justify his proceedings: The Lord is righteous, we unrighteous, although it were more heavy than it is.

Now, in the seventh verse, and in the words read, is set down the mitigation of God's plague, and the moderation of his chastisement, "I will not pour out all my wrath," yet I think it not fit to show perfect deliverance, "I will make them servants, to let them know," etc.

There are two parts in the words read: —

1. The punishment or chastisement on Judah for forsaking the Lord, and backsliding from him, which is bondage and privation of the liberty they had — they must be Shishak's servants.
2. The Lord's end; it was very gracious — "that they may know my service," etc .

For explication.

1. What is meant by service?

Ans. There are two things in service: 1. Government. 2. Subjection; cheerful obedience to that government. Both the Hebrew word, as also the nature of the thing itself, hath these two.

God sets up his government over a people; his people do or should subject cheerfully to this government. By my service is therefore meant my government, and your subjection wrought by me to this government.

2. "They shall know." 1. Not by the knowledge of the brain, for that they know now, but knowledge of experience, as it is said in Ezek. 6. ult.: "When I shall have made the land desolate in all their habitations, they shall know that I am the Lord." Now, what shall they know of it?

Ans. The difference between them, the sorrow of the one, the sweet of the other; the misery of the one, and blessedness of the other; the bondage of the one, and the liberty of the other.

There might be many things observed from the words, but I note only the general.

Obser. That when any people of God forsake the Lord, and cast off his government over them, they provoke the Lord to put them under the bondage of another government. They that abuse God's liberty must be under bondage; the Lord hath a kingdom, in this world most glorious; hence, when men will not be under it, if they will not be ruled by him, they must be ruled by the whip; and if Christ's laws cannot bind, Christ's chains must. Jer. v. 19, "And it shall come to pass when ye shall say, Wherefore does the Lord do all these things unto us? then shalt thou answer them, Like as ye have forsaken me, and served strange gods in your land, so shall ye serve strangers in a land that is not yours." Ps. 107:10, 11, "Such as sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, being bound in affliction and iron, because they rebelled against the words of God, and contemned the counsel of the Most High." Ezek. 20:24, 25, "Because they had not executed my judgments, but had despised my statutes, and polluted my Sabbaths, etc. Wherefore I gave them also statutes that were not good, and judgments, whereby they should not live," etc. Zech. 11:15, 16, "And the Lord said unto me, Take unto thee yet the instruments of a foolish shepherd. For lo, I will raise up a shepherd in the land, which shall not visit those that be cut off, nor seek the young one, nor heal that that is broken, nor feed that that stands still," etc. Here is the ESV version:

¹⁵ And the LORD said to me, "Next, take for yourself the implements of a foolish shepherd. ¹⁶ For indeed I will raise up a shepherd in the land who will not care for those who are cut off, nor seek the young, nor heal those that are broken, nor feed those that still stand.

When people break covenant with God, and loathe him, then saith the Lord, I will not feed, and then he sets over them idol shepherds.

This is certain: when the soul will not subject itself to God, he goes about to subject God to him, nay, to his lusts. Is. xliii. 24, "Thou hast made me to serve with thy sins." For one of them must stoop, and a man would have the Lord be merciful, patient, and pitiful to him, when he is in league with his lusts: now, this the Lord will not do. And hence, if he does not destroy him, he withdraws himself from serving of the creature, and hence other evils take hold of it, and bring it under. When Adam stood and was for God, all creatures served him, and the riches of God's goodness preserved him, the Lord communicated the sweet of his government or service to him; but when turned away from the right ways of God, now, if the Lord should serve him by governing of him in goodness, he should serve a lust, and bow to the creature, nay, to a lust; which is a viler thing than for one creature to fall down and worship another. Therefore, now, hence it comes to pass, because the Lord will not be a servant to any man's lust, there must be some other government that must seize upon them. Hence set all the saints in the churches with their faces subjected to the Lord, his good will and righteous ways, and then his goodness shall flow down upon them in and through Christ; for otherwise we have nothing to do with good, but when we are set right for God. Hos. ii. 19, "I will betroth thee unto me forever, yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness, in judgment, in loving kindness, and mercy," etc. The Lord will then command all creatures to be serviceable to his church and people. (Ver 21, 22.) But on the contrary, misery must needs seize upon the soul that doth cast off the government of the Lord Jesus. Thus much for the general explication of the point. Now, in particular, —

1. What is this government or service of God?
2. What is that bondage he captivates his unto?
3. Why doth the Lord do thus?

Ques. 1. What is this government or service of God which being shaken off the Lord gives them over to bondage?

Ans. There is a double government of the Lord over his people.

1. Internal or inward, of which our Saviour speaks. (Luke 17:21.) The kingdom of God (saith Christ) comes not by observation and outward pomp; "For behold the kingdom of God is within you." And this is nothing else in general, but when the Lord doth by his Spirit in the word of his grace cause the whole soul willingly to submit and subject itself to the whole will of God so far as it is made known to it; this is the inward kingdom of God and government of Christ in the soul. Rom. viii. 14, "So many as are led by the Spirit are the sons of God." Ps. 90:2, "The Lord shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion," etc. 2 Cor. x. 4, "For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds." Ver. 5, "Bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ." There are mighty boisterous distempers, but the Lord, when he comes in his kingdom, to sit upon the royal throne of the hearts of his people, now they fly; and this is the inward kingdom of Christ, like a poor subject pardoned and received to favor, he is before the face of the prince continually attending on him. Rev. vii. 14,15, "These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Ver. 15, "Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple," etc. Now, this is meant in part by God's service in these days: do you think the Lord cared for thousands of rams? No, but to walk humbly. (Micah vi.) Did he care for temple and ordinances? No, but, (Is. i 19,) "If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land." Neh. ix. 20, "In these days he gave them his good Spirit to instruct them."

2. External or outward, the end and instigation of which was to set up and help forward the inward; for external ordinances are nothing in themselves, mean things, but as they are appointed and sanctified for this end, they are most glorious; and therefore, Christ threatens the Jews (Matt. 21:43) that the kingdom should be taken from them. What was that? Surely not inward, for that they had not, but the outward and external means called God's kingdom; all these helps and means shall be taken from you, and all laid ruinous. Now, his external kingdom of Christ is double.

1. The external kingdom or government of God by his church, in the administration, and execution, and subjection to the blessed ordinances of God, wherein the power and kingdom of Christ I is seen and thus, (Dan. ii. 44, 45; vii. 27,) "It shall be given to the saints of the Most High," etc. Not to profane her of beasts or cages of unclean birds, but to the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all the princes of the world shall subject themselves to this kingdom of Christ.

This outward kingdom Christ administers amongst his people in this world: and this was part of the Lord's government over his people herein, though various from our form now.

2. Of the commonwealth which may have many forms and had in the time of Israel; but it receiving its law from God and governing for God, hence it was the government of God, and subjection hereunto was subjection and service to God himself. And hence, when the people cast off Samuel, (1 Sam. 8:7,) "They have not rejected thee, but me." Rev. 11:15, "The kingdoms of the world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever." For although the commonwealth of Israel was made up of the church, and hence Josephus calls it a theocracy, where the Lord governed, and yet the same thing had many forms and respects, and hence there was a diverse government then, and hence made diverse, 2 Chron. 19:5, 8, "Jehoshaphat sets judges in the land throughout all the fenced cities." Such is the wildness, boldness, and carelessness of men's hearts, that they do not only need laws, but watchmen over them, to see they be kept; and hence the Lord appointed some chief, some judges in every city, and also some in every village, as by proportion may be gathered, (Ex. 18) every ten men had one over them.

Now, this was the blessed wisdom of God to put all into sweet subordination one unto another for himself.

2. Hence, the Lord (it being not good to leave man to himself) erects a kingdom of the church, with his own power and authority, and government in it for that end.

3. This being poor and shiftless against inward and outward revenge, hence the Lord sets up kingdoms of the world, which either rule for this end, or these ends, or not. If they do not, they are to answer it, and shall one day to Christ, "whom God hath made head over all things to the church." (Eph. 1:22.) If they do, then their government, judgment, and kingdom is the Lord's in a special manner; and hence break the yoke of subjection to any one of these, you cast off Christ, the Lord's government and service; and being so linked together, in truth if you break one you break all, and this will provoke the Lord to make you kiss the clink, and to put your necks under iron bondage that refuse subjection to him.

Ques. 2. What is that bondage or other government to which the Lord gives over his people when they have cast off his government: this will provoke the Lord if the Lord be cast off, and the casting off the government of Christ will bring the most famous kingdoms, churches, and families into bondage: you will say, What is this bondage? When is it that the Lord takes his season for the execution of it?

Ans. 1. The Lord takes his own times to do it; these were a twelvemonth before the Lord sent Shishak. Here he was more quick. Nebuchadnezzar comes at last, and many years it is before the Lord does it.

2. The Lord is various in working; as he is wonderful and has many ways or means of bondage, he has more prisons and chains than one.

1. Sometimes the Lord opens the door of a kingdom or state for the inroad of some foreign, or it may be barbarous enemy, breaking in sometimes by power, coming in sometimes by craft, and then ruling like lions, which the Lord makes to vex and prick the people of God; thus here their lives were spared, but liberties lost. Thus, Judg. ii. 13, 14, "They forsook the Lord, and served Baal and Ashtaroth;" and in verse 14, "The anger of the Lord waxed hot against Israel, and he delivered them into the hands of spoilers that spoiled them." Ver. 15, "Whithersoever they went out, the hand of the Lord was against them for evil." And this the Lord doth many times suddenly, that one would never think that ever the Lord should be so sudden; the Lord can be as quick to punish as man to sin, and that unexpectedly. Eccl. ix. 12, "Man knows not his time, but is taken like fish in an evil net suddenly." Lam. iv. 12, "The kingdoms of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world, would not have believed." Judg. v. 8, "They set up new gods, and war was in the gate."

2. Sometimes the Lord turns the edge of that lawful authority God hath set over them against themselves, to be a heavy scourge from God upon them. Thus it was with Israel in Egypt, (Ex. i. 8, 9;) there arose a king which knew not Joseph, and it is said then they were oppressed. Thus Jeroboam, whom the ten tribes chose, (Hos. 5:11,) he oppressed the people, he will be innovating, and this becomes their oppression. Thus the people under the reign of degenerate Solomon, (though their complaint might be in part unjust.) Such is the venom of sin and unsubduedness to the kingdom of God, that the Lord turns light into darkness, and makes an aching head matter of sorrow to all the state and body of people. Eccl. x. 16, "Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child." And one man shall do a world of hurt, one Shebna or Amaziah, and this the Lord doth in justice many times for casting off his government.

3. Sometimes the Lord gives a people up into the hands of one another to be mutual oppressors of each other, that a man's neighbor shall be his oppressor. Zech. xi. 9, "I will pity no more the inhabitants of the land, I will deliver them everyone into his neighbor's hands. I will feed you no more; that which dies let it die, and that which is cut off let it be cut off, and let the rest eat everyone the flesh of another." Sometimes the Lord is pleased to send marvelous straits into a place, that men are forced to imbondage themselves sometimes by words as bitter as death, as sharp as arrows; the Lord is pleased, for the forsaking of his righteous ways, to make a man's self rip his own bowels, the father against the child, the master shall be a scourge to the servant, and the servant shall be a scourge to his master, weary him of his life, the government of the Lord in a man's heart or family being cast off; (Micah vii. 4, 5,) "Trust not in a friend." No greater bondage in the world than for men professing the Lord to be desperately set one against another.

4. By taking from a people all that righteous power of government the Lord hath set over them, when a people despising the Lord and inward government first, (for there all begins,) and so not prizing what they have, nor praying for them, nor subjecting to them, the Lord hereupon sends some sickness, or some other evil, that they are either suddenly taken away, or gradually; and when they are gone, all sink, or else such cross carriages, that as Moses said, so say they, "I cannot bear this people." Thus, (Judg. xxi. 25,) "Men did what was right in their own eyes when there was no king in Israel." No state so miserable as an anarchy, when everyone is a slave, because everyone will be a master. Thus, (Is. in. 1, 2, ff,) "Be a ruler to us." No, I will not undertake to rule. So (2 Chron. xv. 3, 5) when without a teaching priest, then no peace at all, men will not be under government of them, you shall not have them, they shall rest in peace, and you shall then know the want of them.

5. By giving them over to Satan's and their own hearts' lusts, that seeing they will not serve the Lord, they shall serve their lusts and their sins, that now the Lord he hath left off chastising of men, and conscience shall check no more, prosper, saith the Lord, and go on in thy sin. Ps. lxxxi. 12, "So I gave them up to their own hearts' lusts, and they walked after their own counsels." Rev. xxii. 11, "Let him that is filthy be filthy still."

When the Lord shall give a man over to Satan, not only to winnow him, to let out the chaff, and so to make the grain the purer, or to buffet them as he did Paul, but to insnare them, and hold them, that he shall not only tempt, but his temptations shall take, and not only take, but holds (2 Tim. ii. ult.) "who are taken captive by him at his will;" taken alive as a snare doth, that now a man is beyond the reach of all means, only peradventure God may give repentance; (Is. 1:5), "Why should ye be stricken anymore? ye will revolt yet more and more." The Lord leaves smiting and says, Go on and prosper in thy sin; and, which is the worst of all, Satan shall so Wind him and harden him, fill him with pride, passion, lying, hatred of God's people, caviling against the Lord's ways of grace, slighting of his betters, despising of wholesome counsel from his dearest friends, that he knows not that gray hairs are upon him. And after this, when God hath cast out, it may be the church doth also, a most fearful bondage that the Lord gives such a soul over unto.

There are two reasons of this point which I collect only from the story in this chapter.

Reason 1. In regard of the righteous judgment of God. It is just and equal that he that will not be ruled by this blessed Lord Jesus, he should be ruled by his lusts; he that will not be in subjection to a merciful Christ, he should be in bondage to unmerciful men: this a humbled heart will acknowledge, as these do here. (Ver. 6.) They acknowledged the Lord to be righteous. Man being fallen, it had been righteous with God to have left all men as the angels that fell in chains of darkness forever. But among his church and people the Lord sends the gospel to proclaim liberty, and with it sends Christ with his Spirit, to come to the prison doors of poor sinners, to give repentance as well as remission of sins; and now, if they will not come out of their bondage, accept of the Lord's liberty, it is exceeding righteous to deal with them as we do with prisoners condemned to die; if the prince comes to the prison doors, and says, I am come to give thee thy life, nay, and here is pardon, nay, favor, and to pull off thy chains also; now, if he says, No, I had rather be in prison, everyone will say it is just, and as it was in the year of jubilee, he that would not go free was to be a bondman forever. It is very righteous to give men their own choice; it is no wrong to let them have their own will: if, indeed, the laws of Christ were Draco's laws, hard and heavy, there were something to object; but they are most sweet, and for which of all other blessings men have cause to bless him. (Ps. 147: ult.)

Reason 2. In regard of the mercy or merciful wisdom of the Lord toward his church and people, especially his peculiar ones, that hereby they keep the closer to the Lord, set a higher price upon the rules and government of the Lord, love his kingdom the more, and the liberties thereof, and use them better when they have them again, so here, "that they may know my service," etc.

1. How sweet it is. Experience, we say, is the mistress of fools; such is the foolishness of men's hearts that men are many times never truly taught a truth till they are taught it by sense, (Prov. 5:11,) "and thou mourn at last when thy flesh is consumed : " tell a man of all the glory of the saints, they never understand it till they feel it; tell men of the woe of their ways, they will not believe it till they see it. Ps. 32:9, "Be not as the horse or mule, that hath no understanding, whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle." Hos. x. 11, "Ephraim is like a heifer that is taught." Like untamed horses that will cast their rider, unless they be held under and backed, and then they are gentle, so it is here; and truly it is long before a man can learn the sweet of Christ's government: hence Israel must be long in Egyptian bondage, and many long miseries, so that, if there be either justice or mercy in the Lord, he will do this, and this point shall be true.

Use 1. Hence, then, see that the greatest liberty and sweetest liberty is to be under the government of Christ Jesus, although men do not think so: hence the Lord tells them here " they shall know my service." they might have replied, We do know it. No, till they be in bonds they know it not, nor cannot learn it. So it is now; and hence, let men observe while they live loosely, and are guided by their own wisdom, for their own ends, according to their own will, at peradventures, at rovers, as they please, they do think this liberty very sweet; and it is better than to be curbed in. But let the Lord strike an arrow in the heart of these wild bucks that have broke park and pale, send affliction and an iron yoke of sorrow upon them, or distress of conscience, if there be any sense and feeling left, they will bemoan themselves, and say, I did think my liberty sweet, but now I see it is bitter in a sinful way: and the Lord's way was most sweet, by their own confession. Hence, (Ps. ii. 3,) " Let us break their bands," etc. But O, now hence learn this truth, and digest it thoroughly, that the greatest liberty lies here. Do not, in thy judgment, think Christian liberty lies in being freed from the law as a rule of obedience in respect of the matter of it to be done, nor in thy practice; but know though thou didst meet with a thousand sorrows with it and griefs, yet it is sweet. Christ's "yoke (Matt. xi. 30.) is easy, and his burden light." What, when not a hole to hide his head in, when a reproach of men, a worm and no man, when he bore the Father's wrath? Yes, when he was meek under it, ("Not mine, but thy will be done,") it was then most sweet. 1 Kings ix. 21, 22, To be a servant to Solomon is no bondage. Ps. cxix. 32, "I will run, when thou shalt enlarge my heart."

Use 2. Hence see the reason why the Lord hath deprived his churches of their liberty, and his government over them at sundry times, and hath put them under iron yokes and bonds, and sore pressures: the reason is shown; they have either openly or more secretly cast off the government of the Lord; here hath been the very wound, the ail of all churches famous and glorious. Ps. 81:14, "O that they had hearkened! I should then soon have subdued their enemies." The cause is not so hard to find to a discerning spirit who is privy in any measure to the counsels of God. 1 Kings ix. 8, 9, Solomon hath a promise that "the Lord's eyes and heart shall be to his people" which are under him; but if once they slip the collar, then woe; and why?" Because they forsook the Lord, that brought them out of Egypt;" they had liberty, but they cast it off.

What do you think was the moving cause of all those bloody persecutions, when the blood of dogs was more precious than of Christian churches? Were not they godly? "Yes, I do not doubt of it. But as it was here, though humbled they must be in bondage, because they had cast off the government of the Lord Jesus. And, hence in the apostle's time evil times were come, sad apostasies from the truth, and because it was long before they were low enough. And hence, (Rev. vi.) till the fifth seal was opened; no crying, as it was with Israel in bondage, no prayer to purpose, and because the Lord saw they would abuse all liberties if they had them. And hence in Constantine's time, when peace came in, contention came with it, and so abused all, that their peace was their poison. And hence, in the primitive churches, they began to cast off the government of the Lord Jesus; murmurings there were; hence came persecution; but they were a precious people, and made blessed use of it. And the Lord couples their chief persecution with their rest. And it is said, (Acts ix. 31,) "Then had the churches rest," etc.

And what do you think of the reason of the long reign of Antichrist, exalting himself above God and all that is called God, bringing the church under the heaviest bondage for body and soul that ever the earth saw? Men did not love the truth, either speculative to guide their minds, or practical to rule their wills; and hence left to this day. _

What is the cause of bleeding Germany's woe? O poor Germany! whence the gospel first broke out in its full strength, that now it is a field of blood, that men in woods like satyrs are afraid of men, and men in cities glad to eat the entrails of beasts, and sometimes the flesh of their own babes, to preserve their lives. What, was there no evil, but the common condition of the church to be under the cross? Ask them, they cannot tell what ails them, but curse the emperor and Swedes, etc. O, think of it with sorrow, in secret, for them that know it not themselves, they have secretly, I say, secretly cast off the government of a merciful i Christ, and hence are under the hand of unmerciful men.'

What is the cause in our native country, notwithstanding all prayers and tears no deliverance? Truly men do not know it, but the Lord sees it, they know not how to use their liberty.

And for ourselves, what shall I say? I cannot but bless God, and wonder to see how it is with many, and rejoice to see many precious, holy ones, to whom one day in God's court is sweeter than a thousand elsewhere; but I must profess, and cannot but mourn for others, men that were eminent under bondage, but never worse than here; as if the Lord should say, Look, here be your eminent ones; look, and fear, and mourn, you ministers of my house; here .be the people you had thought had been converted, and that of all others such a one would never have fallen so; one an opinion takes him, another a lot, another loose company, another his lust, another goes proud, another fierce, another murmuring. What, should I name all? O, that my words might be healing! etc.

Use 3. Hence see what will become of us that are now under the government of the Lord, if ever we cast it off, either inward or outward, or both. We are not dearer to him than his people Israel here, nay,- Judah. When old Israel, the great and numerous tribes of Israel, had set up calves, little Judah and Benjamin received the priests; and yet they fell, and were in bondage. I know we are not yet in bondage; yet it is not more unseasonable to speak now than for the Lord to Solomon. (1 Kings ix. 1.)

Quest. But there being much unsubduedness in the hearts of the best, how shall one know when there be such sins for which the Lord will cast from under his government?

Ans. 1. When men do not loathe their own hearts for the unprofitableness, but loathe God's ordinances secretly, and grow weary of them as of their burdens, because of the unprofitableness of them; when a people find not that special good by them which recompenses all losses, and so prize them, but lay blame on them, because unfruitful to them. (Mai. iii. 13.) He speaks to a people got out of captivity, "Your words have been stout against me;" no, say they, "It is in vain to serve the Lord; what profit is there in this?" You must conceive they had many losses, were very poor, (as ver. 11,) a temptation which a proud heart cannot endure above any; here is now no profit in mourning, fasting, etc., and God's own people began to think so; and hence, (ver. 16), "Then they spoke often one to another;" there was good effect of his sermon. Now what follows? Chapter iv. 1, Hence the wicked shall come and cut off branch and root in Antiochus's time; there is a burning day a coming, that shall burn down house, root and branch and hence, (Matt. xxi. 43,) "The kingdom shall be given to them that bring forth fruit." You will say, We do; no, your own mouth shall condemn you; you do not; you find no good by all the ordinances of God, and, hence come those questions; what warrant for such an ordinance? The bottom is, they never felt good of it, and hence grow weary of it. Well, if it be your burden, the Lord will ease you of it.

2. When you see men (professing the fear of God) mutually naturally contentious, and continuing so; I say contentious with saints which they say they love, and which they are by covenant bound to love, either from some conceived wrong, and hence cannot forgive as Christ doth them; or from a prejudicate groundless opinion, They care not for me, nor I for them; or from a spirit of scornful censoriousness, what are such and such? or because distasted, because of some reproof in their sin; or by some opinion, or by some worldly conveniency, or laying out lots, or restraint of some liberty, etc., or because of some sin; now can sit and censure; and I say, when this is mutual; for a godly man may be contended with, but he prays and mourns and pities, unless it be at some time, but when it shall continually abide so fierce and implacable, (Eccles. vii. 9,) "Anger rests in the bosom of fools." When a man shall be glad of an occasion of difference, that so he may depart and have something to quiet conscience for breach of covenant, that there can be no healing, but bellies of pigs are more dear than bowels of saints, and when quiet, upon the least occasion apt to pick holes and quarrel; now, it is time for the Lord to give over to another government. Zech. xi. 14, 15, When brotherhood is broken, then an idol shepherd is set up. Ex. ii., Moses was sent to deliver Israel, but he finds two Hebrews, oppressed, striving, and must not be checked neither; well then farewell deliverance if you be of that spirit; you shall love one another better if ever the Lord doth that for you. It hath been the wisdom of some princes, when their subjects have been at civil wars, to call them forth to a common enemy, and there they can agree. O brethren, there is no sin like this, and yet none so slighted. You shall know what it is either by being yoked under enemies or sins; the first of these breaking bonds of union to Christ, the other with his members.

Use 4. Hence see the reason why many men are delivered up to the bondage of their own lusts, the most sad bondage and power of Satan, who have seemed to be delivered from it truly they have cast off the government of the Lord. / Men wonder why in this country men are more vile than ever they were, men that gave great hopes: the reason is this; they have seemed to be under Christ's government, but secretly cast it off; and hence filthy and vile lusts are their apparitors and pursuivants, etc. [pursuivants are followers or attendants; apparitors an officer who summons witnesses and executes orders for an ecclesiastical and formerly a civil court.]

Object. The saints feel a bondage; how shall one know the difference?

Ans. The first and greatest enthrallment is, when Satan and sin so rule as that they know them not; this is lamentable, that like those, (John viii. 33,) when Christ told them, if they continued in the truth it should make them free, they would not believe that ever they were in bondage. So here a man thinks himself free when he is a slave, thus: (Ps. lxxxi. 13,) "God gave them up to their own hearts' lusts, and they were led by their own counsels." The saints may be much carried away by the power of Satan's temptations, but never so far as to think their bondage is their freedom, and to have reasons and arguments prevailing against the good ways of God's grace, and to have reasons to maintain their sinful courses, and that is in such as have wit, and parts, and knowledge, which through the righteous judgment of God are left so far to abuse it as to make use of it to maintain their sinful lusts.

2. When men, if they see their bondage, yet have no heart to come out of it, in using all means for that end. When the will is in captivity, no captivity like it, no galley slave like it: a child of God hath a bondage and is led into captivity; but, O miserable man! he cries; but these (Prov. xvii. 10) "have a price in their hand, but no heart to make use of it.", Ezra 1:5, "So many whose hearts the Lord stirred, they get up to go to Jerusalem." But the Lord never stirs the hearts of these poor creatures; they know and fear, yet have no heart to get out of that condition, nay, rather willingly are so. They sell themselves to their lusts, and sins, and Satan. Here is (says Satan) this gain; neglect prayer for it, tell a lie for it, break covenant for it, lose thy peace for it: here is this honor and credit; look big on it: here is this estate; carry thy countenance high, and thus apparel thyself with these trappings, walk thus with thy boots French-like: here is this pleasure and mirth; keep thou this company, loose thy heart, neglect thy God, give thyself over to it: here is this ease; defer thy repentance, be cold in prayer, neglect thy family; and a man sells himself to his lust, pleasures, and honors; thou art thus provoked, and therefore now you must fret, and murmur, and rage, and hold your own, and so ease your heart: thus men set themselves to sale willingly.

3. When men have some heart to come out of it, but the Lord leaves men to an indifferency, and consequently to apostasy, as it was with Agrippa almost persuaded, and like the Israelites that refused to go into that good land, (Num. 14), and hereupon the Lord was wroth, and said they should not, but they repented and would fain have had some pity showed in regard of their misery, but their enemies fell upon them and destroyed them; all the plea of the Arminians is for this, which is nothing else but men's misery. Luke xiv., Those that were invited made their excuses, and said, " I must needs go and see it;" but found no necessity to come to Christ. Now, the saints, the Lord never leaves them to a spirit of indifferency, but keeps them in a spirit of necessity. I must come out of this miserable condition, saith the poor soul; they say not, Flesh is weak, but, I must have help. (Ps ex.) Because it is "the day of the Lord's power," they must not rest contented without help; and if the Lord delays them, and hears not, they will follow the Lord so much the harder.

4. If they have any resolution to come out, and think it must not be thus, and purpose never to live thus again, yet notwithstanding all their purposes and resolutions, they fall again, and never get any real conquest, their untamed hearts and wills are never a whit more subdued. Isa. 63:7, 8, "For he said, Surely they are my people, children that will not lie. So he was their Saviour; but they soon rebelled, and vexed his Holy Spirit:" their wills were never subdued. But now the saints, either the Lord preserves them from such falls and apostasies; or if they do depart from the Lord by reason of the prevailing power of any temptation, they ever get real conquest by their fall; their sinful corruption thereby gets its deadly wound. (Rom. xi. 10.) Their backs are not always bowed down, but the Lord raises their bowed down spirits, (Ps. 145:14,) and upholds their spirits for them when they think they shall one day fall by the hand of such Saul-like sins and distempers. A carnal heart may carry a fair profession, and be in subjection to Christ for a time; but his back stands always bowed down under his profession; it is his burden, and hence at last he casts it off as a man does his wearisome burden; but on the contrary, a child of God being indeed weary of his sin, and carrying that up and down with him as his burden, with his soul bowed down in the sense of his own vileness, by this means, through the help of Christ, at last he comes to get real conquest over his sin, and cast it off.

5. When the Lord in this case lets them alone without inward or outward troubles, this is a fearful sign. Hosea iv. 17, "Ephraim is joined to his idols; let him alone;" the Lord will take no more pains with them; he is wearied out with striving. Isa. 1:5, "Why should ye be stricken? ye will revolt yet more and more." when the Lord sees men the worse for his merciful corrections, he deals like parents that have striven long with their children, and can do no good on them; they then resolve to let them take their own course, and will own them no longer to be of their family: the Lord never deals thus long with his; but if their sin will not waste by words, the Lord will then try what chains will do; and now they shall find good, now they shall remember their backslidings and apostasies from God, and their impenitency in sin, in secret sins, especially in the days of their peace and prosperity; now the Lord will make sin as bitter ad ever it was sweet. O, consider this, you that are prosperous; and because the Lord is good to you, therefore you think the Lord likes well of your ways. No greater plague than for the Lord to give a man peace in his sin; or if the Lord begins to afflict you in your name, or estate begin to be blasted, and you cannot see God's hand on you, and know it, and yet you remain unhumbled, this is a sign you are under the bondage of your sin.

Use 5. For examination, whether we do, or when a people do cast off the government of the Lord and destroy his kingdom, it is needful to know the sin, that we may prevent the misery; and it is certain, let New England be watchful, and make sure here to advance the Prince of Peace, and to keep the right and government in his hand, and you shall have the blessing of God and his ordinances, peace and mercy in your times, and continued to your children ; for "his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and of the increase of his kingdom there is no end;" and on the contrary, if New England cast off the government from over them, and refuse his service, the Lord will then take the kingdom from you, and you shall then know the want of what now ye enjoy. Now, because Christ's government or kingdom is, 1, inward; 2, outward in church and in state, —

I shall let you know, 1, when the inward kingdom of Christ is set up, and when it is razed down, which I shall do by giving you a brief view of the nature of it, and wherein it consists, and so you may the better judge of your own hearts in this particular. As Satan hath an inward kingdom in the hearts of those that are without, so the Lord Jesus hath an inward kingdom in the hearts of all his saints. Col. i. 13, "Blessed be God" (saith the apostle) "which hath translated us from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan into the kingdom of his dear Son," which is very spiritual, little seen; a man may be under all outward government, and yet nought here; and therefore attend: this inward kingdom therefore consists in four things, or when the whole soul submits itself to God in these four particulars : —

1. When the whole soul gives entertainment unto the Lord himself to come into it; for if a people shall say they are under such a government, and yet will not admit the prince himself to come amongst them, but keep him out of the kingdom, they cast off his government and his kingdom.

2. When the whole soul closes with the whole will of the Lord; for if a people shall receive a prince amongst them, but he shall make no wholesome laws to govern them but will be led by their own wills and lusts, they pull down his kingdom.

3. When the whole soul thus closes with the will of Christ by virtue of the power and spirit of Christ; for if a people submit to the will of their prince, but it is not by virtue of his authority over them, command of them, and helps he hath given them for that end, but it is by reason of some foreign power, that underhand encourages them to yield, this is poor subjection.

4. When the soul thus submits to Christ's will for the Lord's ends, denying its own wisdom or will, and is led by the Lord to his end; for if a people shall submit to their prince, but it is to set up other princes, he is cast off from his throne. When a man shall serve God and be under his government because it is profitable or honorable, it suits his own end, this is poor service in the Lord's account.

1. I say, then, the soul is under the inward kingdom or government of Christ, when the whole soul gives entertainment to the Lord of lords, the Lord himself, with all his train, in and by the gospel of grace, the royal sword and scepter of Christ's kingdom; for when Christ himself is thus received, the kingdom of God is come to that soul, and entered into that heart; and hence (Mark i. 14, 15) the gospel is called the gospel of the kingdom, and when John and Christ preached, " Believe and repent, for the kingdom of God is at hand." Under which word is comprehended much, but principally Christ Jesus ready to enter the souls of his people; and hence John preached Christ. Now, it is said those that were effectually wrought upon, (Matt. 11:12,) that " the kingdom of heaven did suffer violence, and the violent take it by force;" so that the kingdom of God is come into the hearts of all the elect of God, when the soul uses a holy violence, and the Lord does draw the heart to an entertainment of the Lord himself. Many difficulties there be between them and Christ, and yet they break through all.

This is the condition of all men by nature; they are strangers to Christ, and live without God and Christ in the world, and Christ from them, and so Satan takes possession and rules them, and so men are under the kingdom of darkness, so that the devil himself possesses. every natural man, as the apostle speaks, "He worketh in the children of disobedience," to run on so, and remain so. Now, the gospel of the kingdom and the means to advance Christ in his kingdom makes a free offer of Christ himself; indeed, it offers pardon, grace, mercy, life, glory, but all these are in Christ himself, and we possess them by possessing and receiving of Christ himself; as a poor woman hath all the wealth of the man by entertaining of the man. So that the gospel firstly and primarily offers Christ himself, and faith doth pitch on Christ himself, and doth "open those everlasting doors that the King of glory may come in." John i. 12, It is said, "So many as received him, he gave power to be the sons of God." 1 John v. 12, " He that hath the Son hath life;" so that now let a man refuse or reject the Lord himself as he is thus offered in the gospel, he does refuse the kingdom of the Lord, and does refuse to be under the power of the Lord. True, it may be said the kingdom of God hath been nigh to him, when Christ is offered in the gospel, and God says, as it were, Nothing shall please me so much as this, if you do receive me, Luke 10, "Go and preach to these and these cities, and if they will not receive you, shake off the dust of your feet, and let them know the kingdom of God hath been nigh to them;" then Christ comes into the soul when the whole soul takes the Lord for himself, Christ, and all that Christ hath, Christ in a pardon, and Christ in a promise: at that very day the Lord gave the heart to receive him, then is the kingdom of God come in that heart, and with him all, life, peace, joy, and glory, God, Spirit, and all.

Now, the whole soul receives him, when, 1. the mind sees him in the glory of his grace, that though it had low, mean thoughts of Christ before, for which it mourns, yet the rising of this glorious sun upon him, he esteems all things loss for him that he may win Christ, and be found in Christ, I in him, and he in me, in vocation; and not having my own righteousness, in justification; and to feel the life of Christ and death also, in sanctification; and to attain to the resurrection of the dead, in glorification: and now nothing is dear to the soul but Christ. 2. When the will, after the soul hath had some hopes, the Lord may look toward it in his grace, and having had many heart breaking tears before the Lord, the Lord is now pleased by the glad tidings of the gospel to give the will power not only to receive and entertain the Lord, but gladly to receive him. The soul wonders that ever the Lord should bow down to him, and offer mercy to him; and whenas together with this, by the sweet favor of his grace that he doth let into the heart, the soul doth receive the Lord with most dear embracings into his soul, that now there is none like to the Lord, Cant. 1:3, "Thy name is like an ointment poured out, where the very feet of the messengers of glad tidings are beautiful." But the Lord himself is the only crown and joy of the soul, when the least look of love to a castaway is more sweet than kingdoms, ay, and much more, that is, love itself. Isa. 52:9, "Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem: for the Lord hath comforted his people." When kings shall stop their mouths as vile in themselves, and not able to set forth that glory they never heard of before, and the soul for joy Bells away all to buy this pearl, that it says with David, "How do I love thy law!"

Now, beloved, when the soul does thus receive the Lord, the kingdom of God is come to that soul, and therefore try and examine, is it thus with you? or hath the Lord begun to deal thus with thee, to give himself, the glory of angels, the wonderment of heaven, the mighty God of heaven, to come to thy heart? Thou art then under the government of the kingdom of God. But now, on the contrary, if thou canst be content to receive the ordinances of Christ, or the consolations of Christ, or some of the commands of Christ, and that is all, and the Lord never gave thee a heart to close with Christ himself, it is a strange thing to thee, that which is the main thing, the diamond in the ring of the gospel; thou art yet far enough off from the kingdom of God; I dare not say nor think, for all the world, that ever the kingdom of God came to thy heart. Again, if you have received Christ, but not with thy whole soul; that now the offer, promises, blood, life, grace, glory in the gospel, are grown common things to thee; that the Lord never sent thee home wondering at the glory of God's grace to a poor wretch, never yet said, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord;" the Lord never yet lay next thy heart, or if thou hast had some liking, and some love and affections in pangs, yet the Lord is not only precious and exceeding dear in thy heart, thy heart breaks not for grief that thou hast so much slighted him, so little borne him of thy heart. It is a sign that the Lord hath begun to reveal himself to thy soul when he gives thee a heart to mourn for thy standing out against him, but this never came to thy soul.

Certainly, here is the wound of many men. The gospel of God never hath its proper effect till the Lord help thee to give thy whole heart thus to a Saviour, to a God, to the Prince of Peace; and till this is done, the gospel is ineffectual, it doth nothing. It was a sweet prayer of him, "Make thy Son dear, very dear, exceeding dear, only dear and precious, or not at all!" If thou hadst a thousand hearts, it was too little for Christ to love him; and dost grudge him one? When thou hast imparted thy heart and esteem to thy lusts and creature, dost thou love the Lord with part of thy heart? but a vile lust, a poor creature must have a share, and the remnant will serve Christ; is he not the only pearl of thy heart? to give him daily communion, know this thou art a stranger to. "Hear, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish; God will work a work in your days." What is that? The infinite God cannot express, as it were, the wrath that shall come against such a soul, nor I cannot express the wrath that shall come upon such a despiser of the Lord Jesus. Give him all thy heart or none; if thou hast the Lord, thou hast his whole heart: if he had a thousand lives, he would have laid them all down for thee. He poured out his blood for every one of his; but for the present thou art out of the kingdom of God to this day.

2. When the whole soul closeth with the whole will of Christ, having thus received him; for if a prince be come, and people will not be ruled by him nor any laws that he makes, though never so good, but what they list, the kingdom is cast off; for, beloved, there is a marvelous common deceit in men's hearts, they would not for all the world but have Christ; ay, but the will of Christ is neglected, that is a clog, and the burden of the Lord of hosts. Christ is sweet and his will is bitter, Christ is precious and his will is vile. Why do you make him a king, and ye will make laws for Christ, and you will rule Christ, and his will shall not stand? Here is no king. Such kind of idle libertines were in the apostles' time. 1 John 1:6, "If we say we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and there is no truth in us." But now, when the whole soul does submit to the whole will of the Lord, now his kingdom is come indeed, when his will is thus sweet. Dan. vii. 27, "His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all nations shall serve him, and his servants ye are whom ye obey," whether Christ, the devil, or your own hearts.

Now, the whole will of Christ is, 1. directing; 2. correcting.

Now, when the soul submits to both, then Christ rules in his kingdom; sometimes you meet with Christ's directing will; now this is men's frame, naturally they will not see it, "they will not come to the light," (John iii. 20,) they are led by their own counsel, and will not regard the light and counsel of God in his word; they will quarrel with the light when it is cross to their ends, gain, honor, and the like; men have high thoughts against the Lord Jesus, (2 Cor. 10:5), "Casting down imaginations, and every high thought that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God." And again, if men do see it, yet, like the devil, that has much light, they do not love it, nor out of love, (not unless it be out of fear,) subject to it like Balaam, that had no love to God's command, but only was acted by fear and constraint; now, when the soul continues thus, it casts off Christ's kingdom, but if the whole soul first comes to the light, though it sees little, sets the whole will of Christ before it, (Ps. 18:22,) says David, "I have kept the ways of the Lord, and have not wickedly departed from my God;" and though it hath had many quarrelings against the truth of God, yet now it hath not, nor dares not, but says, Lord, teach me; the Lord gives them hearts to lie down at the feet of any man that shall show them anything that is amiss in them, and they say with David, "Lord, search me, and try me;" I have many crooked ways, and therefore, good Lord, find them out, and therefore come to the Lord for that end; and though there be something in them that is desperately contrary to the good will of God, yet there is an inward man that does delight in the law of God, and when the Lord is pleased to give them a heart to submit to the will of God, O, the soul doth wonder at the Lord, that the Lord should show him anything, and help him against temptations; and though there be a great deal of weariness in the ways of God, yet there is a spirit within him, that it is indeed heaven itself to him to be in the ordinances of God; now, ye stoop to the directing will of Christ, when this is thy way, though you go often out of it, yet comes in it again, as sin is a wicked man's way, although he goes a thousand times out of it.

Now for the other, the correcting will of Christ. The Lord hath strong trials. Now, here subjection to Christ is required as well as to the directing will of Christ; then the soul submits to this will when the mind objects not, charges not God with folly, as Eli. 1 Sam. iii. 18, "It is the Lord; let him do what seemeth him good." And likewise, the will, though it hath had many sad bouts, yet this is his frame in the conclusion, that the will of Christ is better than everything else; the will of Christ is alone sweet to him. Isa. 37, Says Hezekiah, "Good is the will of the Lord;" and so Lam. 3, "It is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth, and to turn his cheeks to him that smites him." Nay, when there is spiritual evils on the soul, as was on Christ himself, spiritual desertions, nothing but bitterness and sorrow, yet the soul saith, as Christ did, "Not my will, but thine, be done; Father, save me from this hour; yet, Father, glorify thyself," and so the soul does humbly submit itself to the Lord; though the Lord should never pity it, yet it will lie down at the feet of the Lord; now is God's kingdom come.

But if the soul will have Christ, and yet cast off the will of Christ, 1. either in his judgment, that the law of God, as given by Christ, should be no rule to a Christian; suppose you were in England, and were there pressed to bow before an altar, or image; what shall lead you, if that God's will and law must not be your rule? The Lord will one day make you know his blessed will in that blessed law of his, that ye shall never find peace to the end of the world, except the Lord do help ye thus to walk. Again, when men cannot endure the will of Christ, cannot endure exhortations: What doth the man mean to exhort us thus? I tell thee there goes forth power with the exhortations of Christ. I say, take heed of casting off the will of Christ here; and so, when men in their practice shall quarrel against any of God's truths, and are loathe to see it, or, if they do, yet not love dearly every truth of God, but it is a burden to them, especially if it cross their own ends and gain, they will not see it to be a truth, lest they should be convinced and turn to the rule of it; if the will and ordinances of Christ be a burden to a man, and a man is not weary of his weariness, but weary of them all the while. Art thou under the government of Christ? If a man forsaken of God, led by his own counsels, be under the kingdom of Christ, then thou art; so long as there is credit for the truth, so long it is entertained; but now suppose it be costly, that it should bring beggary and affliction with it; is it now sweet to you? doth this support thy heart? I am in God's way; canst lie down and subscribe to the equity of Christ's proceedings with thee, though he should never show favor to thee? If it be not thus, I dare not say thou art under the kingdom of Christ. And so for the correcting will of Christ; many sad afflictions the Lord tries thee withal, the Lord tries men marvelously; when thou art under the hand of the Lord, those very things that should make men cry to heaven and wean thee from the world, those very things do harden thee, and make thee grudge and repine. The Lord be merciful to thee, if this be thy frame; the kingdom of Christ never came into that heart; you are begging for mercy, and the Lord says, You mercy? you have abused it; no, saith the Lord, go to your lust, that have despised the day of grace, and so now you cast off the Lord because the Lord will not give you mercy when you would have it. Will you now quarrel with the Lord? No! down, proud heart; pray still, and mourn still, and turn to the Lord, and say, Lord, do with me what thou wilt; I am clay in thine hand; thou mayest make me a vessel of dishonor; I deserve not the least bit of bread: such a one as is above the Lord and his will is not under the Lord; therefore submit thyself to the good will of Christ.

3. When the soul doth thus submit to the will of Christ, by virtue of the power and spirit of Christ, i. e., when the soul doth not submit by virtue of its own power, strength, or ability, for this is foreign power. But as it doth seek to submit to the will of Christ, so it would have Christ himself act it and rule it, and so enable it to submit thereunto. Now is the kingdom of God come near to that heart. And herein Christ's kingdom is different from princes'; they give laws that men may keep them by their own might; hence they command no impossible things; but the will of Christ is so cross to a carnal heart, that it is impossible man of himself should submit to it; but the Lord doth, it for this end, that the soul should then come to Christ in its need, that he would do all the good pleasure of his will, and now , the Lord himself reigns, and that gloriously./ Rom. viii. 1, 2, "For the law of the spirit of life, which is in Christ Jesus, hath made me free from the law of sin and death." Acts v. 31, "A Prince and Saviour, for to give repentance and remission of sins." It is part of his princely power for to give remission of sins, both in turning from sin, and to God and all the ways of God; and now you exalt him when he is thus set up. 1 Cor. iv. 20, "The kingdom of God is not in word, but in power." The power of Christ Jesus is come into thy soul, and the soul is under the kingdom of the Lord Jesus, when it doth lie under the mighty power of the Lord Jesus Christ. 2 Thess. 1:11, 12, "We pray always for you, that the Lord would work and fulfill the good pleasure of his will, and the work of faith in power, that Christ may be glorified." Yea, then is Christ glorified, when God omnipotent reigns over sin and unbelief; and when the Lord doth this, not only the kingdom of God is now come, but the kingdom of Christ in glory is come. There is many a poor soul thinks Christ rules him not, because he cannot do this nor that, because he finds his heart unable and unwilling for to submit to the will of Christ. I find no strength at all, saith the soul, and I go to Christ, and find not strength conveyed; and now he thinks he is not under the kingdom of Christ. I answer, that is not the question; but hath the Lord made thee willing in the day of his power? When the soul doth lie under the power of the Lord Jesus Christ, when the soul doth lie like wax before the Lord Jesus, when the soul saith, Lord, there was never any change of my nature; the good Lord change it, and if there be any change, the good Lord increase and stir up the graces of thy Spirit in my soul, and do thou lead me and guide me, — brethren, the kingdom of Christ is come to this soul. John v. 40, "You will not come to me for life." He does not say, You do not quicken yourselves, or, Ye cannot come to me, but will not. Here is their wound; they will not come to Christ for life, Rom. vi. 19, "As ye have yielded your members servants to sin and Satan, so now yield up yourselves servants to righteousness and to holiness." Ps. cxix. 5, 6, "Thou hast commanded that we should keep thy precepts continually. O that my heart were directed to keep thy precepts continually! O that my heart were directed to keep thy statutes!" When a Christian is grappling with his own heart, ye will never be able to overcome the unsubduedness thereof; but when ye bring them to the Lord Jesus Christ, that he would take a course with them, 1. Now ye please Christ. 2. Ye take a sure course to have the will of God done, he being in office for that end; for him hath God exalted to be a Prince and Saviour to Israel; when the soul doth look up to the Lord Jesus, and lie under the power and Spirit of the Lord Jesus. 3. You now make the yoke of Christ sweet, and his name glorious; nothing glorifies Christ so much as this, when Jesus doth work in a Christian; now the kingdom of Christ is come to the soul, and that in power. The Deceitfulness of Sin Seen In Its Exercise

It is clear that man is radically depraved. This is clearly stated in Romans 3. But how does this manifest? How are we to guard against it. How do we examine ourselves to see that we be in the faith or not? Thomas Shepard is probably the best at this work of discovery of the hidden things of the heart that above all are profoundly deceitful. I have highlighted many places where sin is manifested, that before here mentioned was hidden from your sight! And so many acknowledge man's depraved nature but are unskilled in discerning its tendency and appearances so as to root it out. As the introduction to Shepard's work, The Parable of the Ten Virgins, advised the reader – "Don't read it! Study it, a few pages at a time; decipher it. Live with it. Die with it. It may not save you, but it will leave you in no doubt if you are saved, and even less if you are not." We are commanded to make us a clean heart; but it is the Spirit that must work it.

The following are excerpts from Thomas Shepard's book The Parable of the Ten Virgins (1659). My comments in [blue]. The introductions, the Forward, etc., are priceless!

Parable of the Ten Virgins Thomas Shepard 1659

Forward

(The last part of the forward to Shepard's Book,)
My inserts in [blue]

Jonathan Edwards quoted from the Parable in his classic Religious Affections more often than all the other secondary writings combined. This may have been because Shepard was the profoundest of all, the most biblical of all, or the most cryptic of all. It could even have been because he was the most difficult of all to understand. Certainly, that was because his Parable was the most unfinished of all, being published from rough sermon notes he left behind.

Reader, beware! The Puritans are never “light” reading. However, Edwards is relatively easy alongside Shepard in the Parable. It is inconceivable that Shepard would have allowed his notes to go to press in that form. But how glad we are that Jonathan Mitchell and Shepard’s son, the Rev. Thomas Shepard, did not hesitate.

This work is valuable in inverse proportion to its readability. Don’t read it! Study it, a few pages at a time; decipher it. Live with it. Die with it. It may not save you, but it will leave you in no doubt if you are saved, and even less if you are not.

The first part of the Parable deals with the visible church’s preparation to meet Christ at His return; and the second with His coming to meet her. If you are a typical church member today, you will learn that you are not prepared for Christ’s coming. Shepard will do everything in human power to get you prepared. When you realize that you have never “closed with Christ,” you will spend the rest of your life seeking and praying that God will close with you! - John H. Gerstner

If thou art one who knowest what it is to be serious in the great business of providing for eternity, it is very probable thou mayst be no stranger to the name of this reverend author, now with God, whose name in both the Englands is as an ointment poured forth; and then thou wilt be eagerly desirous to peruse these following Sermons, in tendency to the further increasing thy stock of spiritual oil; and when thou hast read them, and sucked forth the sweetness and nourishment contained in them, and, by the assistance of the Holy Spirit, turned them into good and healthful nutriment to thy soul, we question not but it will enhance the author’s worth in thy thoughts and estimation. But perhaps thou hast never lighted on any of those flowers which this holy man has planted in God’s garden, and then we are confident thou wilt meet with such savory sweetness in this Discourse as will make thee wish Christ’s church had longer enjoyed to choice and skillful a workman. If thou be one who hast hitherto little considered of God, and thy soul, and the concernments of eternity, or only now and then had some morning-dew thoughts of that which deserves and requires the choicest and most vigorous workings of thy soul, we wish thou wouldst so far comply with God’s goodness in bringing this book to thy hand, and gratify thyself, - we mean thy soul, thy better self, - as to read over this treatise in which thou wilt meet with those serious and soul-piercing truths which, by God’s blessing, may be as poison to thy lusts, and awaken thee to a serious and hearty engaging in that work which none ever yet repented of. For the occasion of publishing this piece, we refer thee to the larger epistle of our reverend brother, and only add, that though a vein of serious, solid, and hearty piety run through all this author's works, yet he has reserved the best wine till the last. The Lord help they and us so to read and improve these and such like labors of God's harvestmen, that we may, with the wise virgins, have the lamps of our souls trimmed and furnished with oil, that, when the Bridegroom shall come, we may be ready to enter with him into his kingdom. Which is and shall be the prayer of us who are hearty well-wishers to thy Soul.

Preface
(Excerpts)

To the Reader, and especially to the Inhabitants of Cambridge, in New England

That to make sure of life eternal is the one necessary business that we some of death have to do in this world, and without which all our time here is worse than lost, every enlightened mind will easily acknowledge; this present life being, by the rule of it, appointed but to this end, to be preparation time, spent in a continual care to make ready, that we might have a good meeting with Him who shall be seen in this air one day. And whether we look up to heaven, or down to hell; whether we reflect upon our own immortal souls, or turn our eyes toward the greatness and goodness of that God in Christ with whom we have to do; whether we pace over the time between this and judgment day or send our thoughts to view the eternity that is to follow after, - all things put a necessity, a solemnity, a glory upon this work.

But difficilia quae pulchra. It is one of the oracles uttered by our Lord with his own mouth, "Strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." It is not so easy a thing to get to heaven, nor so broad a way thither, as the slight and loose opinions of some, and practices of more, would make it, nor as the carnal hearts of all would have it; though that, if it be examined, is the common scope of all erroneous conceits; and how restlessly have the corrupt minds of men labored therein in all ages, and od in these our days, to widen the way to life, to break down the boundaries of this narrow path, and make it broader than ever God made it!

...But when all stones are turned, the way to heaven is and will be found to be a strait way; truth has said it is so, God has laid it out so, and it is not all the notions of men that will make it otherwise. And hence those solemn counsels of the Scripture, "Work out your salvation with fear and trembling;" "Give all diligence to make all sure;" "Strive to enter in at the strait gate;" "So run that you may obtain;" etc., though they be little attended by the looseness of these times, yet they are of endless moment and use, and had need be awfully regarded by all that love their everlasting peace.

...For to speak any good and useful truths is good and commendable; but yet it is another and an further matter to hold the candle to the poor people of God, even to the meanest, to light them to heaven, or to take the soul by the hand, and lead it from step to step through all the difficulties, deceits, and turnings, at which the closes hypocrites do miss their way and lose themselves; and to do this so convincingly, thoroughly, and distinctly, as that the secrets of the hearts may be made manifest, the secure self-deceiver discovered and awakened, and yet the humble, upright Christian confirmed and encouraged.

In this skill and work, as the author of the following Sermons was known to be among the first three, so these lectures of his, upon the Parable of the Virgins, have been esteemed to excel in this kind; having left such a relish un the hearers as that they have not forgotten the taste of them to this day.

And you that sometimes were the flock of his shepherd, and have heard these things from the lively voice of this soul-melting preacher, whom you neve can forget, let it be a welcome providence to have these truths thus revived to you and put into your hands, that he who is dead may yet speak to you and yours. Get them into your house to read, nay, into your hears to feed upon, as choice and precious treasure. And let them still be living and continual warning to you to watch and keep alive the power of godliness, the daily practice of working "out your own salvation with fear and trembling," the love of the truth, the hatred of every false way, the esteem and improvement of God's ordinances, and the true, humble, heavenly life of faith in Christ Jesus.

...The epistle of James and John are antidotes against this kind of poison, and I look on them as lamps hung up to discover these men, not but that these men are indeed under a covenant of works; for there be but two sorts of men, and two ends of all men, hence but two covenants; hence those that are not indeed under grace are under law, and under the curse; but because the most subtle hypocrites appear or seem to be under grace, and their external operations are chiefly evangelical, hence I call them evangelical hypocrites.

SECT. II

Reason 1. In regard of the power of the Word and Gospel of life and spirit in such churches; for the Gospel where it comes, as it advanceth the glorious and everlasting righteousness of Christ, so it knocks under foot all mans, as a means subservient to that end, and it coming with power and light, it would be too gross for hypocrites to maintain life by works; hence Christ is that which they look unto; for Christ when he preached, not only many believed because of his Miracles, but when they heard his Word, John 8:30, Mat. 13. In the Parable of the Sower, the word came with much power, that they received it with joy, and did believe, but fell by their lusts. And look as 'tis with the sun, there comes light and heat with it, so there comes -

1. Truth to the mind, and conquers the judgements of hypocrites, that there is no life, good, righteousness, but in Christ, nor salvation but by Christ.
2. There comes some goodness of the gospel to the heart, that men hearing and seeing Salvation wrapt up there, Oh that is sweet and good! and hence their affections and hearts are in some measure conquered by the power of the over-dazzling truth, and hence hypocrites being thus conquered, partly being of this opinion, partly tasting some good of it, desire it out of self-love, expect it out of self-delusion, and profess themselves virgins out of these principles. [i.e., “natural principles” such as self-love, nothing different from what demon possess.]

Reason 2. In regard of power of evangelical examples in the five wise virgins; for look as 'tis with living men when the sun shines upon their heads, they cast their shadows that follow them; so when the Lord Jesus shines upon the souls of his own people, almost every honest sincere-hearted man will cast his shadow that will be like him; hence hypocrites in those churches which are commonly rather led by example than by rule, will be very like them, and imitate them; if they should not, what communion could they have with them, or what love could they receive from them? [seeking honor from men...] for there is a mighty power in eminent examples to overbear hypocrites, that if they will turn themselves into any form, they must into theirs, as in Joash: for there are two things in the carriage of the Saints.

1. There is a condemning power in it; hence men fear to live unlike them.
2. There is a winning virtue in it, an attractive virtue; hence men endeavour to be and live like them, to be of the same mind, the same heart with them: and hence others take them, and they take themselves to be sincere, and hence they are evangelical gospel hypocrites that lie hid in these churches; hence Zach. 8:23, Many shall take hold of a Jew's skirt (I doubt not but some false ones,) we have heard God is with you. And as Christ when lifted up and risen, so saints draw hypocrites to them.

Reason 3. Because the Gospel brings the greatest and sweetest consolations with it: Hence a man under the terror of the law, and sense of curse for his sin, will make his last refuge hither, and hide himself under the wing of the Gospel, not so much out of love to Christ, or Gospel, but because they serve his turn, and give him ease. Like men scorched with heat, and almost ready to die, the shadow of a tree is now very comfortable, and therefore there they sit; so these. Or as men with scalded arms, they put them into water, which gives them ease, no cure; but because it gives them ease, there they keep them, so here. Men have been scalded with wrath, Oh now Gospel is very sweet, and so are eased by it, never cured by it. Therefore, here you shall find them disclaim all works, and cry up grace only; where the purest churches are, there are usually great awakenings, there God is very near men, and made most manifest to men's consciences, and there are most soul-plagues, contempt of the Spirit of Grace, and hence most dreadful torments of conscience, and fearful lookings for of Judgement. Now hence it comes to passe when Christ is offered, and general notice given to men's minds, that yet there is hope and mercy for great sinners, this fills them with joy and peace, as John's hearers, John 5:35, and hence they believe as the stony ground that had some plowing, and hence received the word with joy and believed, Psalm 66:3. It's a Prophecy of the Kingdom of Christ, Antichrist he tormented the consciences of men, Rev. 9. Men have no peace within or without. Luther is raised up, and preacheth the doctrine of free grace, which a world of men looking to their ease, others in truth receive it; for some time before his death he cries to God that he may not live to see the ruins that were coming on Germany for their contempt. The law is the ministry of death, the gospel propounds great privileges, with much more sweetness to sinners, and hence hither men fly.

Reason 4. Because the Gospel yields the fairest colors for a man's sloth, and strongest props for that. Hence you shall see them walking in this garden. For the last sin God conquers in a man is his sloth. When the swine have no swill to eat, yet you shall find them in the mire of sloth; this slays the foolish. Hence the best hypocrite will plead the gospel, its troublesome to the flesh, to bear a daily sense of the sins and wants of the soul. Hence you shall have Capernaum receive Christ, and wonder at his doctrine; and yet Christ upbraids them, they repented not, Matt. 11:20. It's troublesome, nay, impossible for a man to break his chains and get his soul loosed from his lusts, and free for the Lord. The gospel shows all fulness in Christ, & that he must do all, a slothful false heart there closeth with Christ as the end, but neglects him in the means. Why? Christ must do all, say they, and hence if Christ do drop upon their hearts, well and good, if not, 'tis Christ's fault; he is a hard master that gathers where he did not sow, and hence wrap it up. A man's false heart is weary of the yoke of Christ, and hence would fain be eased of it. Now the Gospel promiseth liberty from the bondage and curse of the Law, and a slothful heart can find out reasons to free himself from the rule of it, as part of Christian liberty, this is our Liberty in Christ Iesus, 2 Pet. 2:19. And they rejoice exceedingly that the Law is dead, as they did, Rev. 11:10, for the death of the witnesses, because they tormented them. I say again, they rejoice not because the Lord makes them like himself, and because of his Image restored by the gospel, and because they feel the power of it, but because they are free from the power of it. It's an old deceit, yet subtle, to rejoice, and love, and bless Christ, because he will pardon sin, though I lie and live in them. Or if they do not free themselves from it, the gospel shows the law within closing with the law without, to be an evidence the Lord will not impute it, and that 'tis not therefore they, but sin in them. Hence a slothful heart will continue in his sloth, and to ease himself of trouble for sin and obedience too, say 'tis not he, but sin. And hence Arminius makes a strange interpretation of Rom. 7. Because he saw German professors plead that for themselves, the Israelites entered not into Canaan, unbelief caused it. And why did that shut them out? Oh, there were walled towns and difficulties, and this was the last shock, and hence they fell off; so 'tis in hypocrites now. The safest place to lie asleep is in Christ Lap.

Reason 5. From the mighty cunning of Satan, the strength of whose Kingdom is made and continued by peace, Luke 11:21, Hence he will turn himself into an Angel of light, and suffer men to go to Christ and gospel, to avoid the search, that they may be Christ's in appearance, and his indeed, 2 Cor. 4:4. He hath a mighty power over men to blind them.

When a strong man, fully armed, guards his own palace, his goods are in peace.

2Cor. 4:4

In their case the god of this world has blinded the minds of the unbelievers, to keep them from seeing the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God.

For there be three things which trouble men usually, and make them question their estates, and the gospel quiets and absolves them from all.

1. Conscience, that cries dolefully sometimes, these sins shall have these woes. Yes, unless I believe; but I believe, and trust to Christ, and flee to Gods mercy.
2. Ministry, that cries and seacheth into the deepest windings of men's hearts, that men cannot but see that Christ hath eyes of flaming fire to see through them. Now hence men avoid the stroke and power of all ministry, thus it is with me, thus it is will be with me, but I believe and trust to Christ. And hence men bear back like brazen walls all blows.
3. Gods judgment-seat. What though men see you not, yet God seeth. Why, they have sinned they confess, but Christ hath suffered, they have sinned, but they trust, &c. Micah 3:11, Is not the Lord among us? Look as it was with Joab, he runs to the Horns of the Altar, yet there he perisheth, there he would die, there was the last refuge from search and death, so here.

Pgs. 308-317

Quest. How may a Christian know when the Lord hath changed his nature, and taken down the power of his sin?

Ans. It might suffice to evidence this against all gainsayers, that thus 'tis, and so to know it by the Spirit's witness, which shows us the things freely given of God, who to save the Lord a trying another day, tries us now, and makes known these hidden works. Especially seeing some divines think, that as the first Adam conveyed this sin of nature, I not knowing; so the second Adam doth also remove this by an immediate stroke, I conceive 'tis so also, but not only by it. And therefore take two Evidences now.

1. Wherever this is done, that soul doth not only see this sin, for so an unregenerate Paul did, Rom. 7:9, Where sin revived, &c. And the word is a divider of joints and Marrow. Nor do they only feel this as an evil, and so be much troubled with it, but when the Lord makes the dejected soul feel it as its greatest evil, so long as it remains in its being; (as it will) worse than death, than hell, than all afflictions, and miseries. 'Tis not a particular sin, but this that he feels thus. You will say, this is a high pitch. I say, consider if any man was ever humbled under sin, but he that felt sin as it is. For if I feel it not as 'tis, I am deceived. Now 'tis the greatest evil. To depart from a living God is worse than for soul and body and all creatures to depart from me. To make God miserable is worse than for all creatures ever to be made so, and sin in its tendency doth so, being a cross to his will, Isa. 1:24. Hence he that feels it indeed, feels it so; the beginning of which is a sorrow and mourning after God, that it might be so, Isa. 63:17, Why hast hardened our hearts from thy fear? But thus 'tis indeed, Rom. 7:24. And when 'tis thus, it will hold thus till death, while the cause remains; nay, the more life and love, the more tender it grows; setting aside some careless fits. And hence its greatest joy is to think of the time it shall be for ever holy. And hence accounts no such mercy as to be set at liberty to live to God indeed. A graceless heart sees and fears it, and cries out of himself for it; but stay a while, and he loseth his tenderness, either because he cannot part with it, or because of Christ, he looks now to him, or because he hath now some sprinkling of the Spirit, nature is eased thereby, and he is quieted; and hence never any carnal heart, but some root of bitterness did grow up at last in this soil. Hence ordinances profit not, because feeling is lost. But the soul thus feeling it, beholding the holiness of God and Love of Christ, and its constant withdrawings, resistings, oh it cuts deep!

2. Then the nature is changed, when the conscience being still and quiet, and the soul assured of the Lords love, yet nothing gives the heart quiet till 'tis contiguous to God in Christ to enjoy him, in his Holiness, and in the love and delight of his whole will. For this is a certain rule: If the nature be not changed, if conscience be but once quieted with the sense of Gods love, and affected with it, and hath not God indeed, nor his work to quiet it, it will fall to lusting after creatures and live upon them, and feed the heart there. For as 'tis impossible for a man to live, or to be without provision, so the world being provision for the flesh, meat, drink, sleep, and these lawful things, there it doth and will lie quiet without God. But now where the nature is changed, and there is another nature, there is something else provided for it to live on, and that is the Lord and his Will. As Christ said, 'tis my meat and drink to do his Will. And Rom. 7:22, I delight in the Law of God in the inner man. There was somewhat that loathed it, but here was somewhat else delighted in it, and there lies its life, and though the heart would rest and give over sometimes, yet 'tis a Law of the mind that the soul hath, he can have no rest, Rom. 8:5. And therefore take a child of God, let him have meat, drink, sleep, blessing in his calling, preach, pray, and have honour, yet he will constantly come home to the Lord mourning. What doth all this do me good? When I rise up, lie down, eat, drink and pray, and do all without him? An untuned heart all this while. The world stands between him and the Lord all this while, but this doth not. Many a sincere heart hath heavy complaints, and many doubts, because 'tis not thus; this rather is an evidence of peace, than Gods war against it. Its an old rule, he that can live in heaven, shall; and there is nothing but a God to suck in, and breath out, and live unto. Is this thy Element now?

Oh consider and examine your selves here you poor Saints, that you may be comforted.

Others of you, if now you do not, the Lord Jesus will another day, and bring these secret things of darkness to light. If thou findest this was never yet done, know it, all thy tears, and fears, and prayers have been in vain; and under the power of sin and Satan thou still art, through the fierce wrath of God against thee. And there I leave thee till the Lord find thee out.

SECT. II.

II. A Fulness of Illumination in the room of darkness.

But let it be first noted that I speak not here of Revelations of future events. When virgin churches shall fall a dreaming, 'tis a sign they fall a sleeping. Nor of revelation of new doctrines, nor yet of the Love of Christ and assurance thereof; but of the person of Christ, a work common to all the elect, and not peculiar to some, for Christ may not appear in his promise of love for a time to a sincere heart, yet this is then wrought. I shall therefore express my thoughts herein in four conclusions.

1. That all unregenerate men are under the power of darkness, of ignorance, Eph. 5:8. You were darkness in the abstract, Eph. 4. 18. So that they cannot understand the things of the Spirit of God, 1 Cor. 2. 14. Especially the Lord Jesus, for the knowledge of him is above nature, not only corrupted but pure nature. Nay though the Lord gives the best and clearest means of revealing himself, yet they cannot see, John 1. 5. Light shined in darkness, and it comprehended him not, no more than he whose visive faculty is lost, when the Sun shines round about him. Nay, that light which is in them is darkness, Mat. 6. 23. And then how great is that darkness? For many men might have known Christ, but that they thought they did know him before, and so are delivered up in these chains of darkness to the prince of darkness, but are like wilderness-shrubs, shall never see when good comes. Ministers (as Christ did) may mourn over them, but can never help them until the Lord pull off their scales. For they please themselves in darkness, and love it more than light, and are not as Paul, praying and mourning under the scales that are upon their eyes.

Concl. 2. That there is a state of light to which God calls his people only; or rather, that there is a spirit of light, illumination or revelation let into the mind, which is peculiar to the beloved of Christ, 1 Pet. 2:9. As of other things, so especially of the Lord Jesus, 2 Cor. 4:4, 5, 6. And 'tis so glorious a work that Christ himself admires the Father, and stands in a ravishment at it, Mat. 11:25. To babes, incapable of all others of knowledge; yet to them doth the Lord reveal some things that the wisest in the world never knew. I do believe that the greatest scholar that ever lived, never had one such thought or apprehension of the Lord and the things of the Lord, as the saints have. And hence Christ puffedeth, oh blessed are your eyes that they see; and themselves bless him, and fall a wondring many times, Lord why dost manifest thy self to us, and not to the world? And therefore 'tis an injury to the grace of God, to make precious things common, and all the work of the Spirit on the understanding to be common to reprobates, and to say, the difference lies only in the work of the Spirit upon the will, John 6:45. He that hath heard and learned of the Father, comes to me. If the Learning of the Father be common to a Reprobate, then either they may come to Christ, which is there denied, or Christs promise is false, for then a carnal heart may hear and learn of the Father, and never come to Christ.

Concl. 3 That notwithstanding 'tis thus with them, yet foolish virgins may have some light in their Lamp; some sight and knowledge of Jesus Christ. It is said we live in days of light, and so indeed we do, but as the Lord said to them that had seen his miracles, yet the Lord had not given them eyes to see to this day; they were enlightened yet fell, Heb. 6:4. I shall therefore speak not of the revelation of all the word, but of Christ the end of it, and the knowledge of whom comprehends all the rest.

1. There is a knowledge of Christ in many a man which is begot by common fame, and human private instruction, which men hearing from credible men, conceive of and believe; as that Christ is the Saviour of the world, is come, is dead, is risen, is at God's right hand, that in him Gods justice and mercy is reconciled, that there is mercy with him for the greatest of all sinners, &c. And according as men are more or less instructed; so do men conceive and believe. But now this knowledge is but traditional, and begot by common fame and human report, like Herod's, that heard many things of Christ, and yet indeed despised him. The Lord I know doth make use of this to cause the soul to come to further sight of him, as in the queen of Sheba, but it's far enough off from giving any saving knowledge of the Lord Jesus; and hence John 1:46, when they had been with Christ, they do not wish them to rest in the report, but Come and see; so you hear of these things, but come and see these things. You have learned them from man come unto the Lord that he may teach them; and hence we shall see many of the people of God that have been put to a question of all things that ever they learned, and learnt them over again; as, whether there be a Christ or no, &c. And they never saw these things indeed, until the Lord taught them a second time; hence therefore those that have been thus trained up, and have been troubled and comforted by some conceived promises of Christ, but never saw any more of his person, then what you have learned before; Your eyes are closed up to this day.

2. If any man should see and behold Christ really, immediately, this is not the saving knowledge of him. I know the Saints do know Christ as if immediately present, they are not strangers by their distance, if others have seen him more immediately I will not dispute it, but if they have seen the Lord Jesus as immediately as if here on earth, yet Capernaum saw him so; nay, some of them were disciples for a time, and followed him, John 6, and yet the Lord was hid from their eyes; nay all the world shall see him in his glory which shall amaze them, and yet this is far short of the saving knowledge of him, which the Lord doth communicate to the elect. So that though you see the Lord so really as that you become familiar with him, yet Luke 13:26, Lord have we not eat and drunk, &c. And so perish.

3. A man may see the Lord in his wonderful works, and glorious kingdom and government, and yet not know him savingly, wondrous deliverances, preservations of himself, and of Gods people, dreadful destruction of enemies, such as they cannot but say, This is the finger of the Lord, and yet know not, Deut. 29:1, 2, 3, 4. And hence John 15. 24. and hence men think such things are done, and shall I ever be vile again, yet they become as bad as ever.

4. He may see the Lord Jesus yet more clearly by the letter of the Scripture, which though it brings to the saving knowledge of Christ, yet to see the Lord Jesus no otherwise then by the strength of fancy and understanding, from thence is no saving knowledge of Jesus Christ; and hence (Rom. 16:26), the mystery of the gospel was hid from the Jews, but now 'tis revealed to all nations; literally, to all where it comes, savingly to some few. For between the saving knowledge of Christ in the gospel, and palpable ignorance of him in the Gospel, there is this middle knowledge which is literal, whereby a man doth see, yet in seeing, sees not, Isai. 6:9, which is the state of a church which hath been long trained up under good means; and hence we shall see many men of great learning have been able to wrote volumes of the mystery of Christ, and yet in seeing never saw.

5. There may be in a false heart a strange knowledge of Christ without scriptures, which may ravish a man's deluded heart strangely, which is usually the first temptation of the virgin churches, that are of much knowledge, and little love, 2 Cor. 11:2, 3, 4. Wherein Satan doth not seek to pull away men to forsake the gospel, but from the simplicity of the Gospel, Repent, and believe, and be saved, for saith he, Satan is transformed into an Angel of light. And hence we have heard that some have heard voices, some have seen the very blood of Christ dropping on them, and his wounds in his side, some have seen a great light shining in the chamber, some wonderfully affected with their dreams, some in great distress have had inward witness, Thy sins are forgiven; and hence such liberty and joy that they are ready to leap up and down the chamber: O adulterous generation! This is natural and usual with men, they would earnestly see Jesus, and have him present to give them peace; and hence papists have his image; and hence Christ gives the sacrament to show himself as familiarly as can be. Hence Thomas would not believe, unless he might put his finger in his side, and the Lord tendered him, yet pronounced them blessed, them have not seen, and yet believed, Joh. 20:29. So I say e contra, Woe to them that have no other manifested Christ, but such a one. Little do you think what wrong you do to Christ, for you do as much as in you lies eclipse all his glory at the last day, as the wicked by their sins eclipse his glory at this day. 2 Thes. 1:10. He shall be admired in all that believe. Why? Because our Testimony was believed; that faith which closeth with, and sees Christ in a Testimony, is that whereby Jesus shall be admired at the worlds end.

Concl. 4. That the saving knowledge of Jesus Christ is this, whereby the soul being sensible of his ignorance of Jesus, beholds such a glory in Christ's person, as that he esteems him in all his glory, as his present, greatest, and only good. I will take this in pieces.

1. I say that soul which hath truly and savingly seen the Lord Jesus, hath been made sensible of his ignorance of him; I see him not, I have heard of him, and read of him, and taken his name into my mouth, and professed him; and I believe others see him, and blessed are their eyes, but I see him not, John 9:26, 27, 39. For judgment came into this world, and look as all the increase of the knowledge of Christ comes in by this door, so the beginning of it, and therefore those that have been cast down and heard of Christ a Saviour, but never felt their ignorance of him before they have apprehended him, their light is darkness, and their knowledge full of delusion and idolatrous.

2. It beholds a glory in Christs person, for before the Lord reveals his Son to any, look what he was to the Jews he is to every man, Isa. 53:2, 3. He is rejected and despised of men, nothing so mean as Christ, every vanity preferred above him, and men can do no other, because they see not his glory and beauty, 1 Cor. 2:8. If they had known, &c. Therefore the Lord reveals his hidden glory to them, such as never entered into their hearts before, or into the minds of other men, which though others may talk of, yet they cannot see it in that manner as they do; it is called therefore, marvelous light which he doth reveal, when the soul hath been viewing its own shame and filth, when all the grass and glory is withered, Isa. 40:6, then the glory of Christ is revealed; one every way so fit and suitable to them, according to all their wants and woes, by some sermon or other, which when the soul doth see, it usually fills the head, and heart, and eyes with tears. Oh that I have despised him so glorious! Acts 2:36, 37, 2 Cor. 4:5, 6. If the soul should not feel its ignorance of him, it would never esteem the fight of him, but now it doth thus, and now that Glory is revealed, John 1:14, We beheld his Glory as the Glory of the only begotten Son. In every truth there is a Glory which men see not, and this is called in Scripture, the finding of the Pearl, Matt. 13: 45.

III. He so beholds him in his Glory, as that he now esteems of him in all his Glory. For a Balaam may see the glory of the tents of Israel; and the Star of Iacob, but they esteem not of him in all his Glory. The damned in Hell see a Glory in Christ, else they would never grieve for the loss of him, but 'tis only in regard of something in Christ, delivering saints from sorrows they feel. Nay many reprobates under a lively ministry, shall see some glory in Christ and in saints, to think them the happy men, yet not esteem of him in all his Glory; but 'tis otherwise here. The Lord ariseth as the sun upon the earth, which makes all things that have any Glory to appear therein, and it puts a Glory on every thing, that was hid before. So Christ puts a Glory on every thing of himself: So that,

1. The soul sees a glory in the grace of Christ, John 1:14. For the glory of Christs person is not seen without these excellencies, Luke 1:46. My soul magnifies the Lord.

2. A Glory in the holiness of Christ, Isa. 6:3. Especially to consider, it's in him to make me holy, 2 Cor. 3:18.

3. A Glory in his Covenant and Promises, Psa. 45:1, 2. Oh that all those Promises might be made good to me! This is all my desire, 2 Sam. 23:5.

4. A Glory in the Government and Commands and Will of Christ. Oh, if once I could in everything give content to his heart. Psa. 19:10. That the soul had rather lose all than cross his will in a small thing, seeing a glory in the least truth, in casting off a ceremony, &c. Zach. 6:13.

5. A Glory in all the ordinances of Christ. Oh how amiable are thy tabernacles oh God! Oh, the fellowship of saints! Oh the peace on sabbath!

6. A glory in all his carriage. Let him bless me with outward estate, though but a little. This is the allowance that Christ in Glory provides for me. Let him threaten me, good is the Word of the Lord. Let him desert me, his anger is love. Oh that is Glorious! Let him take all from me, reproach me, Moses esteems Christs reproach greater riches than Egypt, which is our estate here. It sees a glory in all Christ's ways, and quiets itself here, it is the Lord, as Eli said. Thus saints see and esteem of Christ in all his Glory, and we shall find a false heart ever falls short here, a sincere heart never, but commonly is so taken up with it, that if you ask, suppose you should have all grace, holiness, promises of Christ, &c. Would not this be mercy? Yes, enough. I should then boast in him, and bless him for ever. And hence Christ is called, Luke 2:33, the Glory of Israel, because they so esteem him. And Isa. 28:5, In that day the Lord shall be a Diadem of Glory. Others may in horror prize Christ above the world, but 'tis only to ease them.

IV. I add, he esteems him thus,

1. As his present good; so that if the Lord doth withdraw or deny himself, now unto him nothing in this world can for the present quiet him, Jer. 50:4, 5. Hence those in their judgments acknowledge Christ the greatest good, and when they are dying, and see he will be so at last day, yet now for the present a little more liberty in sin, sloth, lust, honour, gain, Lots, large accommodations are better. You never saw him. Oh, vile world! the Lord will one day condemn thee out of thine own mouth; thy own will was more dear to thee than his; this worlds ease better than his peace, &c. When you lie on your Death-beds, you esteem him then. Why? Because he serves your turn then. Hence before you did not.

2. As the greatest good, Deut. 33:26. Jer. 10:7. Hence those that see some good in Christ and desire him, and offer fair for him, but prize him not as the greatest good: And hence with the young man, though content to part with somewhat, not with all, they will cast their rags down at Christs feet, and entreat him to take away their sins; but will not cast their crowns down, the dearest things they have. And hence the thorny-ground-professors ever fall away. The good things of this world which they forsook in time of persecution, were dearer than Christ, and hence they fall away. 'Tis a dishonour to a King to be valued as other men are, Zach. 11:12, 13.

3. As the only good, Isa. 24:23. The Sun shall be confounded, &c. And though other things may steal into their hearts for a time, yet they recover themselves; this is the one thing, Psa. 27:4, that they beg in this life. And hence do fall short,

1. Those that esteem Christ as men do merchandise; they would fain have it, but are loath to fetch it. Men may esteem Christ, as they think, the only good; but herein their falseness appears, that they neglect means to it, because they have some good else to quiet them. And here is condemned all lazy profession.

2. Those that would have Christ, and esteem him highly, and use means for him diligently, but they must have Christ, and world, and lust, and ease too; Christ to quiet their Consciences, and the world their hearts; Christ to rest on, when their duties fail them, and world to rest in, when the Consolations of Christ are denied unto them. The Lord is good, go up and possess it.

Object. 1. But do the Saints come to this pitch?

Ans.: 2 Cor. 4:3. If our Gospel be hid, 'tis hid to them that be lost. Who are those from whom Christ is hid? When is he hid? When his Glory is hid. I know saints may feel a want of, and mourn for it, but it will appear if they are the Lord's, at some time. Nay this they will find, some and much contempt remaining which they oppose, yet this is here, and at parting times it is seen.

Object 2. But Saints cannot know this.

Ans.: Yes (as well as they can know their contempt) by means of God's Spirit, he that carried from one contrary to another shall know it.

Object. 3. But hypocrites may attain to this.

Ans.: Then the gospel may be revealed to an hypocrite and to them that are lost.

2. Then they may believe; for to them only the Lord is precious, 1 Pet. 2:7. Then a thing is precious, when we value it according to the worth of it. Now the Lord is the greatest and only good and then when we esteem him so; this is the work of believers only.

3. Then Christ may be a carnal treasure. For that is our treasure which we esteem most.

4. Then a carnal heart may honour Christ with one of the highest degrees of honour, which consists in this high esteem, Luke 1:46. My soul magnifies the Lord.

5. Observe we, that never any lost Christ but because they undervalued him. Forsake all, and take the pearl. That it shall lie upon you one day; Oh if Christ had had that esteem which lust and world hath had, I had had him now! Examine, if it be thus, if you thus see and prize the Lord Jesus. Oh be thankful that ever the Lord sent that Messenger to reveal Christ! If not, Oh go and mourn! Paul did ss three days, Acts 9. when he saw nothing. Oh Christ hath been long hid from thee. Oh, few have this; but lay about for it, for else that in Mat. 23:39, shall be your portion.

SECT. III.

III. Fulness of Faith, in the room of unbelief.

For 'tis not unknown how strongly this sin keeps every mans palace, and that not Moses, but the Lord Jesus is the stumbling stone even of the Jews, the peculiar people of God. When men are at their last cast, that the Lord intends to wait to pity no more, at last the Son comes, and an unbelieving heart casts the balance and refuseth him. After that the Lord hath tried men by miraculous preservations, deliverances from Pharaohs, provision at Massah, then Canaan comes to be entered, and men cannot enter because of unbelief. This sin stands in open view, and keeps the breach, when all other sins in appearance are beaten out of the field. Now there is a Spirit of Faith, which comes in the room of this unbelief, dispossesseth the soul of the power of it; for there may be some lighter strokes of the Spirit, which are lighter skirmishes with it, but yet it wins the field again; as in the stony ground, that believed, but unbelief got head again in time of persecution and temptation, and then they fell away.

Quest. 1. What is this Faith, or that fullness or full measure of it?

Ans.: I shall not speak here of historical or miraculous faith. The first of which is in the devils, the second in some men only, that may perish afterward. Nor yet of that faith which we call, of assurance, we shall not come yet to that. But of that which we call justifying Faith, and that which doth first unite to Christ, and justify. Now this faith is the coming of the soul to Christ. This is the general. For Adam had his life in himself, but now 'tis lost in us, but laid up in Christ, Col. 3:3. Now hence they that would have this life, must go out of themselves to the Lord for it. Now the motion of the soul between these two extremes of emptiness and death here, to life and fulness there, what is it but faith? Which Adam had not, nor could have in that estate; and therefore none of the Sons of Adam naturally can share in it.

And that this is faith it appears,

1. From John 6:35. I am the Bread of life, he that comes to me shall never hunger, and he that believes in me shall never thirst.

2. Because unbelief is the departing of the soul from the God of life, Heb. 3:1. Not from a holy Law, but from a living God.

3. Faith is the proper effect of vocation or rather the chief part thereof. Now look as ineffectual vocation is when the Lord calls, but the soul never comes; so effectual vocation is whereby the Lord calls, and the soul answers, and so comes. So that to sit still and see nothing, and do nothing, is not faith, but sloth. No, Christ cannot be in that soul that is yet in himself. Therefore faith is not a passive possibility of the soul to receive Christ, though that may prepare for him, but the going out of a man's self unto Christ.

Quest. 2. But may not a man come to Christ, that never shall have mercy from Christ?

Ans.: Yes, there may be many lighter strokes, as in temporary Believers. The world is at this day full of faith. Every man thinks and saith he believes, though his faith be weak. 'Tis men's buckler against all means, they know these sins, but as long as they believe all is well. And 'tis their comfort in all their troubles, though the Lord kills, yet they will believe. And I say, some men have departed indeed from the Lord. The Gospel hath been preached, and they have made out of themselves to Christ, but missed of him. There is a Bramble-Faith that catcheth and scratcheth Christ, kisseth and betrays him. That coming to Christ therefore which none else have the full measure of, it appears in these particulars.

'Tis that work of the Spirit whereby a sinner, sensible of his extreme nakedness, emptiness and wants, being called of God, his whole soul comes out of himself to Christ, for himself. I speak not of assurance, for if that were faith, all reprobates then were bound to believe an untruth, viz. that God the Father loves, and Christ hath died for them.

1. 'Tis a work of Gods Spirit, and hence 'tis called the Spirit of Faith, not only because wrought by it; but because the Spirit is in an admirable manner fastened to it, and clasped to the soul, and the soul to Christ by it.

2. The subject in which 'tis wrought: A sinner sensible of his extreme wants; for faith springs out of the destruction of our own excellency, and ruins of it; like Christ, that did arise a root out of a dry ground; for the Lords great plot, is to advance Christ and his rich grace. Now look as 'tis obscured by bringing any thing of our own to it, so 'tis advanced by fetching all from it; this can never be till the soul is sensible of his nakedness, emptiness and wants; let Christ be never so sweet, a full soul will loath him; and I say extreme want. The Prodigal never comes home, till he dies for hunger; for such is the senselessness of men, and dislike of Christ, that extremities only drive them hither, as Judges 5:6. When the Midianites came, they ran like beasts to their den, and until bread was taken from them, they cry not unto the Lord, but then they do. So men have neither hearts, or if so, no heads to come to Christ till now; and usually the Lord makes this the ground of the souls first motion towards Christ. I die here, and because of my wants I therefore come. Pardon sin, because great, Psa. 25:11, Be merciful, because 'tis a stiff-necked people, Exod. 34:9. That so when the Lord pardons, the soul may have nothing to boast of but misery, and now 'tis hard to believe. But this is not all.

3. It must be called of God, for else the soul though never so sensible of misery, could not, would not, durst not come; but it would either sink under its burden, or plead against all means. It shall presume, as Judas that had no look of Christ (as Peter had) hangs himself: And hence Jer. 3:23. Come unto me, their heart answered, we come. For this is usually the objection of the soul when it sees the riches of mercy, What have I to do with it, that am so vile, and have fallen so oft, and rejected the Lord, and am like to do so? I shall sin the more by this means. No, the command of the Gospel comes, Oh come, notwithstanding all this, nay because of this, for I will heal you of them. Now this call hath two things in it. 1. 'Tis particular, for general invitations to believe and come in, are made particular to the elect, who else would not come in; and hence Isa. 43:1. I have called thee by name. For we shall find that the hearts of men when they see a promise, cannot think it concerns them; all that hunger shall be satisfied, but shall I? And hence show them 'tis as particular as the law, they cannot think it is to them; and hence they say sometime the word All, is not put in. Now that is the mighty power of unbelief, a word spoken to all is regarded by none, till the Lord make it particular; and hence Isa. 2. Christ is said to judge the Nations, now when judges ride their circuits, they do not make laws, but only apply laws. One man is brought before them to be condemned, he hopes better, but he is so; now he trembles: Another to be acquitted, he fears, being falsely accused, he is freed; and now he rejoices. 2. 'Tis a living call, or powerful call, John 5:25. And hence a man may live under the calls of the minister long, and never come, because 'tis not made living from the Lord of life; and hence not irresistible.

4. Upon this call the whole soul comes out of it self to Christ; for if a man could climb the clouds, and unlock the doors of heaven, and come Elias like in his body to Christ, he might miss of Christ, as well as those that came and followed Christ for a time with their bodies while he lived on the earth; a man may come to Christ with half his soul or heart, there may be some hope, and some desires, some love, and some cleaving to him, and choice of him really, inwardly, and yet not savingly, because the whole soul is not here come, but half of it, James 1:7, 8. Now the whole soul then comes, when all the affections and will take their flight to the Lord, and fasten there. When all the affections are gathered from all other things and changed, and so they come to, and embrace the Lord; so that hope waits only here, When will the Lord pity me? Desires that were set on a thousand things before, all long after him, love only tasted him; the Lord letting in some sight of the freeness of mercy, hope looks out hither; the Lord showing the want, but the way to it, desire breaks down stone-walls, and all means, and the difficulty of them, to have him: The Lord letting the soul taste the sweetness of Jesus and his grace, the soul joys, and love embraceth, and the will fosters; a carnal heart desires, loves, joys in other things, and the Lord also, and so hath a false heart. But the whole heart comes hither, and when 'tis here, thinks one heart too little, nay, one life, one soul, and when any part of the affections are left any where else, then the soul mourns, hates that bondage, is ashamed of it, &c. So that the stream of the whole soul runs now hither, Psal. 119:2, Jer. 3:10, Psal. 45:10. So 'tis with the soul, as with them when they were to come out of Egypt, they would not leave child, nor hoof behind, lest there should be any occasion of return; it is with the soul departed from the body, it only minds the Lord, it hath taken leave of all; so by faith the whole soul leaves all, and comes to the Lord; otherwise the soul is not come to Christ, but reacheth after Christ; like men that waded after the ark, but perished in the waters: Their arms are not long enough, their desires and love are not long enough to reach Christ, the bent and stream of the soul is set and runs here. 'Tis with the soul, as 'tis with two rivers, both run with all their strength to the sea, but the great river is bigger, and runs faster, yet the others stream is wholly carried thither. So some men may be more full of faith then others, yet both run to the sea, and as rivers, they run in their circles, this way and that way, and are sometimes dammed up, yet end there. So the souls of all saints run to this and the other creature, yet they end in the Lord at last. As Peter and John that ran to the Sepulcher, though one out-ran the other, yet they came both to the Lord at last; when both of them had for a time forsook him, though all the world draw the soul back, it cannot live without the Lord; nay, though the Lord beat away the soul from him, yet it follows after him.

5. 'Tis to the Lord for himself, for John 6, some came to Christ for loaves, and could have been glad if Christ had been king for it, but did not care for himself. And hence vers. 27, he points and turns them to himself; some came to him for higher ends, therefore were his Disciples, that is, for life from him. But when he told them, There is no life, unless you have the Son, and eat and drink his flesh and blood, or else you die, it was a hard saying, they could not understand nor see what that meant, and hence forsook him, but when they come and receive him himself; now life is indeed theirs.

So that it's Christ's person that this faith first pitcheth on, as 'tis in marriage, and those that come for this, were never sent away. Now the soul is truly come to him for himself: 1. When himself gives rest to the soul in the want of all things, Heb. 4. 3. If friends, protection, strength, life, glory be wanting, yet having him, in him I have all these; when all is sold away, not the treasure only, but the field contents him; for it looks on this, as better than heaven, than glory, it comforts the soul that the Lord himself should be mine. 2. The soul that talketh him, 'tis not only to make boast of him, as Capernaum had him, nor to cover sloth, and sin, and delusion by him. I have Christ, and I have no more to care for, &c. but to live on him, John 6:57, He that eateth me, shall live by me. Phil. 3:9, 10. A man takes not Christ as medicine to ease him; nor as stately hanging to adorn him, but as bread to receive life from him. For many receive Christ, rest they do upon him, and rest they say in him, but they do not suck any good from him, nay before they had any Christ or assurance of him they were better than now. You have nothing to do with the Lord Jesus, you are out of your place. As in Jotham's parable, the olive and vine would not be pulled out of their places, to be set on the tops of other trees, as Kings; lest they lose their fatness and sweetness. So since you have closed with Christ, you have lost your fatness and sweetness that once you had, you are now out of your place, go to your horrors and sorrows again, till the Lord so give himself to you as that you may receive life from him.

Quest. 3. But must all come thus to Christ with their whole soul, will not part of the price serve?

Ans.: No, the whole soul must come, and cannot but come.

1. In regard of the jealousy of God; who is like a jealous husband, can bear with many weaknesses, but will have the whole heart; and they that do not, shall be destroyed for spiritual whoredom, Psa. 73:27. He should dishonour Christ else, to sell him so cheap.

2. In regard of the excellency of Christ: The Lord draws the soul by the revelation of him, Rom. 1:16, 17, Isa. 55:3, 4. Now look, as men in this world, when they see a seeming good, their whole soul is over-powered to be drawn after it. So here, when such an object is seen, especially the soul having been at his sepulcher weeping, as iron never stirs till the loadstone comes, and then it makes to that only, not to things touched with it. For as we love him because he loved us first, so Christ loving the soul with all his heart, and his whole heart set upon him, the whole soul is, e contra, set on Christ.

3. In regard else a man can receive nothing from the Lord, Jer. 29:12, 13. As 'tis with conduit-pipes, let them be laid, but not reach the conduit head, no water can come to that family; so here. And this is the reason why men live, and pray, and receive nothing, their hearts reach not hither. Men's hearts reach but half way to Christ. Tell me else, did you ever not receive?

4. Because else 'tis indeed no coming to him, but a leaning on him or toward him. So as 'tis with trees, if not cut off quite, or not pulled up quite by the roots, they cannot be set in another orchard, if the tree be left with never so little twigs in the ground, so here. Nay, the Lord accounts this worse than if a man had not come at all, Jer. 3:10. The Lord abhors a double heart, that Judas -like forsakes all for the Lord, but then loves the Lord and the bag too. You are not the Lords. As it was with that man that quarreled about the tree, it leaned over the pales, but the root being found to be there, his it was. So though he lean on Christ, he is none of his.

Quest. 4. But do all Saints come to this measure?:

Ans.: Ponder these grounds else.

Object. But are not our hearts partly carnal, and so close with the creature?

Ans. True, but yet,

1. So far as is carnal it is lamented heavily; so that they grow not there, but are dying, withering daily, Jer. 31:18, 19. When a man's affections grow out of the world, and there is no fear nor sorrow, in this respect now, no Christ is there.

2. The bent and bias of the soul carries the whole soul hither. For I would not judge of this so much by sudden pangs, as by an inward bent; for the whole soul in affectionate expressions and actions may be carried unto Christ, but being without this bent and change of affections, it's unsound. As in Gideon, they would on a hurry make him king. He would not. He knew it was a sudden pang which would die. And the reason is, the true turn of the whole soul is not by turning old affections upon another object, but changing them first by this bent, and so turning them. For a carnal heart may have the first, as the same eye may see the sun and a dunghill, and the eye not changed; so here. Now when the whole soul is set here, it is never at rest till here.

Quest. 5. But may not Hypocrites come to this?:

1. Then they may be blessed, Psa. 119:2.

2. Then they shall never be cast off from Christ, John 6:37.

3. Then they may partake of that which the Lord only looks for. For why is the Lord angry? The heart is gone from him. Why is the ministry ordained, but to win the whole heart to him? John 3:19, 20, 21. Oh, therefore consider whether it hath been thus with you or no! If not, woe to you! Oh, be very careful here! 'Tis a thousand to one if some part of your heart be not fixt elsewhere. If Christ were at judgment, and should say, Come ye Blessed: How glad would ye be? Oh, he saith now, Come and take myself.

SECT. III.

Quest. But doth not the Lord respect the groanings of his people? doth not Christ say, John 4. 10, if thou hadst asked, &c., doth not the Lord look upon the inner man, the very frame, nay, desires that have been past?

Ans. Yes, there be some desires which are evidences; some which are not; I shall discover them that be unsound in the particular example of these foolish Virgins, &c.

First, Those are unsound desires, which arise in the soul easily, without feeling a need of the Lords almighty power and Spirit of life to work them at first; we shall find that the desires of regenerate Christians do not come easily, but they find a need of the Lord to draw them, Jer. 31:10, Lam. 5:21; but the desires of others spring up easily and quickly; as these foolish Virgins, they wanted [lacked, I think meant here] oil, they could quickly desire it; and they go to their fellow-brethren for help, Oh give us of your oil. Look as it is with wild rye and pease, they will come up at the season of the year in abundance, without sowing or plowing, the ground bears them naturally; but other corn and grain will not come so easily; your ground will not bear it till plowed and digged, and then the hand of man must set it, and die it must, before it can live again; so here, if desires come and spring up easily, it is a sign they are wild; the Lord must break the heart, and then sow these, and plant these from heaven, and you must fetch it out of heaven, else it is naught; for when the Lord works saving desires indeed, he ever sows them in a broken heart, which is thoroughly broken indeed; when God sets the smoking flax on fire (which are desires) he first bruise the reed itself.

Secondly, The subject in which these desires are; a man hath a Son and a Servant; the Son hath all his desires granted him, because he hath a sonly spirit; all the Father hath is for him, that may be good for him; a servant desires importunately, but he prays from the spirit of a servant, and all that his master hath is not for him; and therefore if he pray for the inheritance or a part of it, of the portion of the son, shall he have it? No, he shall have what is fit for a servant; so it is here, the Lord hath some sons in his churches; these praying and desiring from a son-like spirit, all that God hath being theirs, they shall have it; and hence Psal. 145:18, 19, 20, He will fulfil the desires of them that fear him, and love him, and delight themselves in him; for that is the son-like disposition; when he is cut short of all comfort in the world, nay, when he may have his fill of them, yet he delights in his Fathers face, love, and grace, and fellowship, and house, Psal. 27: 4, For they are heirs and coheirs with Christ, being sons; but now there are servants in the house of God; shall they have their wills and lusts? No; thus it was with these foolish Virgins; they were only servants in the house, no true spouse or sons, and were foolish at best, and had not the spirits of sons, but had their lusts; never were espoused savingly to the Lord Jesus himself, nor laid up all their hope in him, but were foolish and that is the ground why others desires are heard, not theirs.

Thirdly, unsound desires make after a certain measure only, whereas the desires of saints seek after this grace without measure; and thus the foolish virgins fell short of the wise; all that they could get was little enough for themselves; but the foolish look after some of their oil, as many a man looks upon the gifts and parts of another; Oh, saith he, if I was as honest, as humble a man as such a one! and many a man sets up such a measure, and if he hath that, is well, while he wants [lacks] that miserably: Look wistly [intently] upon the foolish virgins, they did content themselves with a measure, and now they are in want of it, seek for it; at first a little did content them, and now when it is spent, a little will serve them again: And what is their measure?

1. So much as will beautify and adorn them before men, our Lamp is out.
2. So much as will comfort them against the coming of Christ; for now they were troubled that their oil was spent, whereby they might meet the bridegroom; he that desires it for a little measure of it, his desires are certainly unsound; so much as will serve his turn (he cuts his coat according to his cloth) but he that desires it without measure, è contra, as Paul, Phil. 3:2, That I may apprehend by any means, that for which I am apprehended: As Chrysostom calls Paul that insatiabilis Dei cultor; for he makes it his last end; as he that desires wealth without measure, though he gets not all the wealth of the world, yet the more he hath, the more he craves; this his fleshly lust is his last end.

Obj. But he may desire it without measure for his own ends.

Ans. I confess 'tis true; for men may desire honor and no honor but by gifts, and no gifts but by grace; and hence may desire infinitely, but yet it is but a measure, viz. to serve his own ends, but not the Lords ends; to set up himself; true desire of grace, is for that which may pull down self, and make God all, Psal. 119. 4, 5.

Fourthly, It is not their only desire, or the only thing they desire, viz. the good Spirit of the Lord, and that they might not live or any thing else in them, but that the Lord may live, and his Grace and Kingdom may prevail in their hearts; the desires of saints are only after this; or if their desires are after other things, the Spirit lusts against them, 2 Sam. 23:5. As carnal desires are after life, and the comforts of it, so spiritual desires are after the life of Christ in them, and the comforts of the Lord thereby, Psal. 27:3, 4, One thing I have desired, and that I will seek for; what was it? a crown, a kingdom? No, but that I may dwell in the Lords house for ever, and visit his Temple: Notable is that example of Abraham, Heb. 11. Two things he met with that might draw down his desires.

1. He came to a land which God promised to give him, where he lives among enemies and in fears.

2. He might have returned to another Country, and now have been better.

3. God blessed him, &c. but it was nothing he desired, only another above; hence God is not ashamed to be called his God; but the foolish virgins fell short of this, and hence they now seek only in times of extremity. And this is the frame of many graceless hearts in time of extremity.

1. When all grace is gone. 2. When death is come, then they seek earnestly after the Lord, and Grace; Oh their sin lies heavy! Oh then a humble heart is sweet! but before their hearts were overcome with lusts after other things; and this double heart every carnal heart hath, Ephes. 2:3, fulfilling the lusts of the mind, i.e., diabolical lusts, and lusts of the flesh, i.e., sensual and beastly lusts, it's the state of all men; and hence promises are not made simply to men's seeking the Lord, for they may miss, but to them that do it with their whole heart, Psal. 119:2, Jer. 29:13, this they never do; and hence men pray daily, and live in their lusting all the day after; men long in misery, but are cool in peace.

SECT. IV.

Quest. But seeing there is in Saints two natures, flesh lusting against the spirit, and spirit against flesh; and a double heart in a reprobate, whereby he desires grace and other things, how shall we distinguish them?

Ans. 1. The lusts after grace and worldly things in a hypocrite agree together in the same heart; but those lusts which are after the flesh and spirit in a regenerate heart are contrary one to another, and like fire and water one seeking to destroy the whole being of the other. E.g., A man wants the things of this world, he seeks and desires after them, riches, honor, rest, and peace; but thinks he, if I have no more but this, I may to hell; if no grace; hence he desires that, and so doing now he hath peace, and all is quiet with him, and goes on sweetly in a way of profession and prayer; and a gracious heart is ready thus to do, and to make his head lie soft with two pillows, but yet the Spirit riseth up against this, that the soul thinks, I shall fall by this heart; Lord, how apt to rest in these lees! lusts in hypocrites are like brethren, that help one another, to this end to get peace; but here as enemies, to destroy such a cursed peace as that is in the godly.

2. In a false heart, lusts and desires after these things are dear to them, like their limbs and best members, they cannot be nor cannot do without them; but in saints they are sores and blains, and so hated of them; ex. gr. Let a man have a full table, and fair estate, and outward blessings, promising much, and the ordinances of God, and a heart to follow God there; now see him lively in the service of God; but let him be brought to extremities, and want of all this, and fears of poverty, estate wasteth, poverty appears, many rates come in, and the wife cries out; now he falls down to the earth in discontent or worldliness, and his life and affection to ordinances, or the servants of God, is now gone; as it is with a bird, when she hath two wings she can fly, but when she hath only one, then she falls, and the fowler takes her, because it was a limb precious to her; so here. Thus it was with David's servants at Ziklag, 1 Sam. 30:4, all wept till they could weep no more; but here it was otherwise with David, he could fly to God without those wings; so when God gives a man a condition not so great as he would, and the heart lusts after so much, and God crosseth; he cannot be content with a little, or with a mean estate, because his lust is his limb, he cannot suffer it to be cut off, or be pared; if a man hath a wooden leg, he can cut it answerable to his shoe, but if but a limb, he must have his shoe cut answerable to his leg; because it is his limb, no cutting of that less; Oh it is dear. So it is with a man that hath a lust after any thing, it is dear, and hence he is said to live in them, and to be in the flesh; but the desires after these things in a gracious heart, they are blains, they can be without them; Oh never such a happiness if the Lord would dead them to me, Gal. 5:24, they that are in Christ have crucified the flesh, with the affections and lusts thereof.

3. The lusts and desires in a false heart are reigning lusts, and make the lusts after grace and holiness serve them; but è contra in a holy heart. Ex. gr. A man prays for the love of God, and the Spirit of grace, and 'tis affectionate, but yet 'tis ever for some lust: Jam. 4:3, a man desires grace to perfect his gifts, and gifts to deck him, and purchase him honor before men; a man desires grace to quiet his conscience in assurance of Gods love, and pardon of sin, that he may live the more peaceably with his sin, Isa. 58:3, 4. Now in a gracious heart, the desires of these things serve the desires after grace; for he desires the things of this world to be the more holy, Prov. 30:7, 8. Feed me with food convenient, that I may not tempt thee; he desires, and hath them for Israel's sake, 2 Sam. 5:12. Like a tradesman, he buys and sells, but it is for gain, Phil. 1:20. Oh consider of these things, and if your hearts have had only such false desires as these, know it, that as verily as these virgins were shut out, so shall you another day.

Chapter XIII

The Desires and Endeavors of Hypocrites after Grace Are Not Lasting

Observ. 4. That foolish Virgins in their first endeavors after the spirit of grace, usually cease from seeking farther, before they have got that measure and fulness of it which will continue to the last. Or,

That there is ever a cessation in the first endeavors of carnal professors from seeking after that measure of grace which will indeed last and continue until their meeting with and appearing before the Lord Jesus Christ.

For these virgins here did seek after the Lord Jesus Christ, and the Spirit of Christ, and hence did get that measure which lighted their lamps for a good season; and they contented themselves with this, and gave over seeking until it is too late; and therefore now they say, Give us of your oil, our Lamps are out: These foolish virgins when they had got somewhat, they are carried with abundance of affection and profession, they think themselves as good as the best, and what need they seek for more! and then grow secure and fall asleep until all is spent. The Scripture is pregnant every where for this. But let us look and see the causes of this.

First. Sometime it is because they know not what that measure is which doth accompany salvation; but they set up an imagination of their own heads, which is a false image of saving-grace, and when they have that, now they think all is well, and they go no further. Judg. 2:11, 12. People that know not the Lord, nor the power of his grace, will set up other gods, and serve them, and there rest; until it is with them, as it was with those, when the anger of the Lord waxeth hot, and spoilers come, now they cry unto the Lord; What is the reason why many a man falls short of the righteousness which is of God, viz. of faith? Because he sets up in his head a righteousness of his own; and if I get that, then I hope the Lord will accept me, and forgive me; and hence Rom. 9:31, 32, why did they miss of it? Because they sought it by a righteousness which is of their own; so why do many miss of faith? because they think it is an assurance; or when a man rests upon Christ, not considering the need of an Almighty power; and hence the Apostle prays for this, Ephes. 1:19. So for repentance, why do men fall short of it? they think it is when God's anger is expressed, the soul then comes to seek the Lord, and finds some comfort Psal. 78, Matt. 3, and so runs away with it. So for Holiness, they think it is to be like others; and then well, they think these are the men that shall live, and are happy; and look as it is like it was at Babel, when head and tongues were confounded, one calls for a brick, the other brings him a trowel, hammer or tile, because he did but imagine what he spake, and so understood not his language; so 'tis here; men read and hear God speak, and ministers call for faith, and knowledge of God; but earthly minds cannot understand heavenly language; and hence they imagine that is faith and repentance which indeed is not, and so miss of that which indeed else would continue; and this is the misery of many thousands that in seeing see not. The experience of the work of grace, makes men savingly to know what grace is, John 5:37, 38. Now men graceless never felt it in the life and power of it, and therefore cannot tell it.

Secondly. From the nature of Common-grace; the nature of which is as the Apostle speaks of lifeless knowledge, 1 Cor. 8:1 to puff up; it never leaves the soul more sensible of his vileness, as saving-grace doth, Ezek. 16 ult., and so makes a man never rest in seeking after the Lord; but makes the soul feel himself full, and hence the stomach is gone from seeking after more, as Rev. 3:17, She thought she was rich, &c. The spirit of grace which is but common, that heals a vile, proud heart, it easeth him, it quiets him, in healing some sin, which lies sore on the conscience; it heals and quiets the man, so he is well, needs no repentance; but the Spirit of life indeed destroyeth the man, and slays corruption, and hence he resists; and now saith the soul, I never felt my heart so vile as now; and hence, saith Paul, Sin revived, and led me captive, Oh wretched man! as it is with a prince, if any great ones come and serve him, he likes them, this gives him rest, settles him in his throne; but if any one come to reign over him, now he gathers all his strength to oppose. So common grace it ever comes as a servant to corrupt; and hence take a man of best wit and parts, he turns them against the Lord, and makes them serve himself.

Thirdly. From an apprehension of this difficulty, and an unwillingness in the heart to break through the difficulty of seeking after the Lord; many a man sees (as Dives in hell, Abraham afar off) grace, and God, and Christ afar off; but there is a great gulf between them and grace; now to be watching, fasting, seeking the Lord diligently, to follow the Lord hard, Psal. 63, to keep the heart lamenting till the Lord comes, this is hard, as Heb. 3, 'tis said, They could not enter in because of unbelief. 1. They thought they could never overcome. 2. They thought the Lord did therefore hate them, Deut. 1:27. They did not regard the strength of God; they shall be but bread for us saith Caleb; they could not believe that to be bread that is so hazzardful. So 'tis with many a man; and hence he sits down with desires and hopes, and so perisheth; the sluggard's desires slay him; hence many complain of difficulty, but never break difficulties, and so perish; and so not like to the merchant that goes far for pearl. It is his business, and no storms nor ill weather drive him to desire the smoke of his chimney, till he hath got them, he hath now resolved to venture all for, Prov. 2:5, if thou dig for silver, &c., many prize Christ and grace, Oh that I had it, but are loath to dig for it, they love their ease so well, and hence rest in their desire after it; but indeed miss it; and hence many can come to, and follow God in outward ordinances, but never find fruit and comfort in any of them, because of difficulty, yet sit down content because they seek for ordinances, as Prov. 12:27, The sluggard roasts not what he had took in hunting; there is a very great delight in coming to ordinances, as travelers under the shadow, but then to climb the tree that is hard, and hence lose the fruit; and hence God seeing a man love his sloth, and hath that base esteem of his grace, as that he will not follow so hard after it as he hath done after his lusts, let's loose Satan, and he comes and stakes down a sinner in this, God must do all, and there he rests, and so he falls short; like one that comes to husbandmen, and tells them they have taken much pains and care to get their ground good to bring forth much, but for time to come their ground shall bring forth fruit without planting or sowing, only reap you the fruit, it would be good news to them, and they believe it, and then when the year comes about, they are to seek for corn; so this affects, and here they rest, and by this means want [lack].

Fourthly. From feeling the unprofitableness of seeking the Lord through difficulties, and hence they give over but a little before they find that that will continue.

1. Some follow the Lord for carnal ends, as Judas did, but he finding the purse grow lank, and the bag empty, he forsakes the Lord.

2. Some for comfort, and hence pray and mourn; and hence Mal. 3:14, what profit is there that we have walked so? as it was with Naomi, when she returned home, both her daughters accompany her some part of her way, Return again, saith she, to your friends, here is no husband for you where I go; the one would not be beaten off, it is not a husband I came for, but a God; thy God shall be my God; the other hearing her speeches, and loving her fathers house, and country, goes back, not without some affection; so it is here; whereas faith will cry the more.

Fifthly. From the offences which usually Satan casts in when they are in the heat of their first endeavors; as the stony ground being offended fell away. As,

1. Persecution, and hence they fall; a childe begins to look towards God; the Father, Mother, Friends scoff and reproach.

2. Corrupt Teachers, Matt. 24, that like false Christs deceive, and put a world of scruples into men's heads, and then lead them away; as the Galatians that would pull out their eyes for Paul, yet by love and smooth carriage of false teachers so plausible, they fell off strangely.

3. Corrupt company, women or men; many strong men have fallen by the one, and men also who having a form of godliness, yet denying the power of it, their hearts be taken in these snares.

4. Some hard point of doctrine, John. 6:60, 66. something is preacht that is cross to our apprehensions; I will never believe it, say they; and away they fall.

▣ Sixthly, Because of false comforts which usually men meet with before they get that which will abide in them, in their worst hours; and this quiets all.

1. From themselves; A man sees Christ only can redeem him by price, but he feels no need of Christ to redeem him by power; and now seeing what a miserable creature he is, stays himself upon the Lord, and that it may be by some word which he hears, John 8:30, 31, when they heard that, they believed; yet the Lord tells them, they are not free, but were yet captive to their sin, which they need the Son himself to die to save them from; and so many a one comforts himself, and stays here, though he have no other assurance.

2. The approbation and comfort of others, Ezek. 13:3, 4.

3. Strange ecstasies of joy which many a man meets with suddenly; they have eaten and drunk in Christs presence, and have been comforted at such and such a time in such a manner; this, we shall find it, persuades men that God is theirs, without revealing the subject, viz. we be his people, and that change which God hath made.

SECT. II.

Quest. What is that measure which will last, and throughout continue?

Ans. I have spoken of this at large; but he that loves the truth as his daily bread, will feed upon it, when ever it is set before him. Now there is one thing (this is different) and I shall express my self in one thing only, viz. They give over before they have tasted and drunk the satisfying sweetness of the grace of Christ, and the presence of his grace in their souls. That look as it was with Israel, they came out of Egypt, and saw the wonders of God in the wilderness, and had his fiery law, and glorious tabernacle among them, yet they never came to the land of rest; so it is at this day with many, they have some glimpses of the excellency of Christ, and his grace, and some desires after it, and some tastes of it; they are pulled out of their woeful bondage, and seeing words of God, are oft affected, yet their carcasses must fall in the wilderness, because they never come to rest; they fall off from God because they never knew what this rest meaneth, Heb. 4:11.

Hypocrites have awakening grace, and are much troubled; they have enlightening grace, and know more than many Christians; they have affecting grace, and are wonderfully taken with the glad tidings of the Gospel; but satisfying grace, or that grace which brings them to full rest, and satisfying sweetness in God, not only to their consciences but to their hearts; not carnal, but spiritual, this they never came to, John 4:14, he that drinks the water I give, shall never thirst again; John 6:54, If ye eat my flesh and drink my blood, there is life, if not, no life; eating and drinking, is not sipping and tasting; many may eat and drink in his presence, as those Exod. 24:11, but yet not feed at all on his person; this makes the soul hold out, Prov. 2:10, 11, Psal. 90:14, this makes the soul glad in God, and in all the days of his life; where any creature is at rest, there it is in the proper place; it is a token the Lord is the proper place of the soul, (not sin, nor hell, which was Judas' proper place) when it is at rest there; and this is the last end, and fruit of the redemption of Christ, Jer. 31:11, 14. i.e., not having so much of God as to be a God-glutted Christian (as he said) but so satiate as not to desire other things, but there to stay, though the heart doth oft feel not the same sweetness.

SECT. III.

Now there be four things which do concur to this fulness of satisfying sweetness:

First. Manifestation of the Lord Jesus in his full proportion, and in all the dimensions of his goodness to the soul; the soul of man is made for, and so desires an infinite eternal good; whiles this good is not known to be such a one, it never satisfies; and hence let a man look upon any one creature, there is much sweetness in it, but not all; hence it satisfies not; there's sweetness in honor and wealth, but if sick, a miserable man; there is sweetness in health, but if poor and naked, a desolate man; and if one creature had all in it, yet when one thinks this must be taken from me, it is like Jonah's gourd, it never satisfies:

Now the grace which satisfies must first, manifest the fulness of infinite goodness suitable to me in the Lord; if that now do I want any outward blessing it is in Christ, for he is heir not only of heaven, but of all the world.

2. Do I want spiritual blessings? Eph. 3, there is all in him; life, and peace and glory.

3. Have I nothing to move the Lord to do any of these to me? yet there is fulness of tender mercy, and pity in him, Eph. 1:17 and 3:18.

Secondly. Possession of this good as mine; let a poor man see heaps of gold before him, it satisfies not him, because it is none of his; let a Christian hear of kingdoms, peace, glory, in and with Christ, yet it satisfies not him; it troubles him the more, if Christ forsake him, and grow strange to him; but to be sure that Christ is mine, this makes the soul do, nay suffer the utmost for Christ, and to know that nothing can separate, &c., as a man that knows he shall kill, and not lose his life, will venture like Sampson upon an host of men; they may wound me, they cannot bind nor slay me, Rom. 8. ult., there is joy and some satisfaction in finding the pearl of great price, what joy when it is possessed!

Thirdly. Communication of this good to the soul; let a man have meat and drink, but he cannot come at it when he hath need of it, will this satisfy if it be lockt up? Let a man have real possession of never so many lands, yet if he hath not the benefit sure to him, as well as the thing, he will never hold out; what am I the better? so that grace satisfies that brings the soul to fruition of the good, that it is now in respect of the benefit of it conveyed to the soul, Psal, 16:4, 5, the Lord is the portion of my lot and cup, and he maintains both; and hence Jer. 14:9. Why art thou like a man astonished, yet in the midst of us! if a man have meat and clothes, and the one never feeds, the other never warms, would this satisfy? no, unless that he may feel them; nay, he would think this a curse; so let saints have God in his ordinances, the best in the world there is, if not fed thereby, Lord! what a misery is this? especially if the Lord helps not in time of need.

Fourthly. Reflection of good again to the good which doth refresh us, else it never satisfies; if a man have meat dealt out, and it is very sweet, yet if it gives him no strength to perform acts of life; if a man have a friend, and he cannot love again, nor show testimony of love, it will not satisfy him; so that grace satisfies which makes the soul reflect the love of God to God again; shall I serve the Lord, said David, of that which cost me nothing? you know the vine and olive,

Judg. 9, were quieted by this, that they did rejoice the heart of God and man; what do you tell me of bonds? I account not my life dear to finish my course, saith Paul.

□ Now a carnal heart gives over before he sees or possesseth or enjoyeth the Lord, or found the sweetness of a holy life in walking with God. Hence,

1. He loathes and is weary of all his profession and truth he knows, and the God he talks of.
2. Hence they break out to some lusts or others; which because if not satisfied here, they must satisfy themselves some other way, either in vain conceits or opinions, or lusts of the world.
3. Hence, desperate doubts, Is the Lord mine? whereas if it were otherwise, then as it is with a man, ask him, how do you know you eat and drink? it satisfies me, saith he, it puts strength, I should die daily else.

SECT. IV.

Use 1. Of Examination, instruction, and exhortation to all those who have rest content with that measure of the Spirit which will never last, to begin again, and lay a better foundation, lest it befall you as it did these virgins, or as the sinner in Prov. 5:11, 12, 13. you mourn when you, not your flesh, but soul is consumed; Oh how have I despised instruction! lest wrath break out which cannot be quenched, for dealing slightly with God and your own souls; how many Christians take that for grace, which when it comes to trial will be found too light, and know it not, and regard it not, till the hand-writing of God is upon their consciences!

If therefore you have not found the satisfying sweetness of the Spirit of God's grace, that water which quenqueth all your inordinate thirst, that bread which feeds you to life, be sure your oil will be spent, and your light will go out before you die.

SECT. V.

Quest. How should I know that satisfying sweetness?

Ans. Ah methinks you should say, Oh that I did know it! yet wary I would be of giving any just occasion to break off what the Lord in his grace hath wrought; yet you may know something of it by this.

1. When the Spirit of Gods grace dispensed in his ordinances doth glut you and slay you, and make you worse; here is not the grace of Christ which doth satisfy you; if the more knowledge you have of the truth, the less glory you see in the truth, and the less you love the truth; if the more comfort you have sound by it, the less you now desire after it; if the more abilities you have received by it, the more proud you grow, and high-minded; if having come for to seek the ordinances of God, the less good you find by them, the more weary you grow of them, and the more you despise them; it is certain, the satisfying grace of Christ is not here, when the bread to feed, is poison to slay; is not this the condition of many? what is the cause they are growing worse, that they are worse in their latter end and middle of their Christian profession, than the beginning, because they are grown full by Gods Ordinances, and so worse; what is the cause in places of persecution the Lords ordinances were precious, not when they come to them? God's ordinances plenty makes them to undervalue them through their sin; that look as it is with men in consumptions, whose life is going out, they think they can eat, yet when it is before them, loath the smell of it, or a little serves them, whereas another finds it otherwise; not but that saints may think thus, but they with Hezekiah mourn under it, 2 Chron. 32, Hos. 6:5, I have hewn and slain, what is the cause? because your goodness is like a morning dew, which soon vanisheth, therefore have I slain them. Oh God loves us, and we are the best people in the world, because we have ordinances; no, but because you be shallow, hence you shall have prophets to slay you.

Secondly, If any man maintains any living lust in himself in the midst of his profession, and hungers after it, and the life of it; for when a man hath better food to feed upon, he will neglect his own at home, as Christ said to them when they asked him, why he did not eat; how many be there which have strange gifts, and have had marvelous ebbings and flowings of the spirit of life and peace, and yet one sin have they lived in, and would not, could not live without it. Look as it was in the wilderness, they were for a time pretty well content with their allowance and wilderness-walks and provisions, but they could not stay long, They asked meat for their lusts, but he sent leanness into their souls, Psal. 106:14, 15. So that there it is, if lust be stirring, the Lord either denies it his own people, because he will starve the lust, that the soul may grow, or if he gives it, slays the lust by it, gluts it, makes the soul grow weary of it, and prize his first husband more; as Solomon by his experimental discovery of the creature: many men confess and pray against their sins, but by their sorrows and desires, they do maintain the life of their sin, fall to it as the dog to the vomit; you will be cast away at last, 1 Cor. 9. ult., I beat not the air, lest I become a cast-away; whereas a gracious heart doth not maintain, but waste and consume his lust. His life is to live to God.

Thirdly, If a mans heart and affections reach not the people of God with the dearest embracings, nor yet mourn for the want of such a heart; for sometimes there are some drops of the Lords goodness falling into the heart, whereby the soul cleaves unto the Lord, and is moved and ravished, and bears much love, as it thinks, towards him; but look to their love to the people of God, there they fall short; because the love of Christ is not shed abroad abundantly into their hearts, filling and satisfying of them; and hence have none to pour out upon the souls of their neighbors, 1 John 4:20, 21. In our own Country, what was the accusation of saints? viz. They are hypocrites before God; what did you think of those men that said so?

Ans. Surely they were enemies to the Lord, and that never loved him; for then they would love his people. But what is the occasion here? Now they say they come far for ordinances; but they are unjust oppressors, cruel; poor men may starve before regarded by them; and so they cast reproach not only upon some few, but all the people of God, and church of God; If that it be so, their accusation is God's accusation; if not (as generally it is) for many, though unable to do much, yet if called to it, would lay down their estates and lives for others; then know thou never hadst Christ's love shed in thy heart (which will continue) but drops of it only; because thy love cannot reach to these. Beloved, what is the end of your coming over hither? is it not to enjoy first Christ, and nextly his people, so his ordinances? because next to fellowship of Christ, the saints company is most precious; and do you here bite, and censure, and devour, and neglect, and reproach one another, and upon any conceived injury stumble? are poor men neglected? It is a sad sign the love of Christ in not in power, Heb. 6:9, 10.

Fourthly. If there have been abundance of sweet affections and sweet refreshings, thereby rising up within the soul, without the death, and killing, and removal of the contrary lusts and sins; it is certain this soul was never truly filled nor satisfied with the Spirit of Gods grace; for as it is with vessels, while they be filled with lime or chaff, they cannot be filled with wheat or with water; so while the heart is filled with some noisome distempers, it cannot be filled or satisfied with the Lord; look but abroad in the Churches; how many be there that say and think they hate their sin as the only evil, they close with the Lord Jesus, they love the people of God all of them, they seek the glory of God, and yet they do but think so! for though they hate sin, yet it is unsoundly, because they see not how closely their hands are knit to their sin; they never did believe, because they never felt their unwilling heart to close with Christ; they never loved the saints, because they never felt their contempt of saints; never sought Gods glory, because they never mourned under that which did stain it; they never make work with their own hearts; the stony and thorny ground withered because their soil was naught; a heart filled with sweet affections, which never felt the strength of contrary corruptions lying underneath, it is an ill soil, and where those affections will never prosper, nor prove right; and hence, 2 Tim. 2:20, 21, he that purgeth himself from these things shall be a vessel of honor, ever preserved, never broken. Do not put it to a venture, it may be I may have grace, and so put your salvation on the hazard of such hopes; but the Lord that hath come to thee knocking, open the door that he may come in and feast; cry for infinite creating power and mercy to make haste and come and help thee; what have you to do else but to get your old lusts purged away? what do you labor for else? if you have children to bring up, if you have any love to them, nay if swine or cattle, meat you will have to feed them, and satisfy them if possible; and yet behold thy soul perishing for want of true spiritual refreshings!

Chapter X

Sect. VI

SECT. VI.

See the happiness of saints (all you standers by) and of all believers. You think what are they? What have they, that I have not? What get they by seeking, by mourning? They have the Lord himself, not Kingdoms, nor Heaven, not guard of Angels, not pardon, nor comfort or Grace only, but which is greater, and than which there can be no greater, the Lord of Glory himself. Is there any thing that is good there? I theirs. I doubt not but Angels stand amazed at this. What hast thou? Thou hast peace, and ease, and duties, and friends, but no Christ, then poor and cursed thou art.

Hence learn to judge of your faith, whether it be of the right make or no? whether it be such a faith as will never fail you, but shall in deepest miseries, in sorest agonies, and most furious temptations; nay in greatest sins and desertions, be indeed a friend unto you? Is it such a faith as pitcheth on, and closeth with the person of Christ himself, and him alone? So that all the delights in creatures quiet thee not, unless thou canst find him through them; nay, no ordinances cheer thee, unless thou canst see him in them; nay, heaven itself will not content thee, but him in heaven, Psa. 73:25. And hence 'tis him thou seekest, 'tis him thou seest, it is him thou approvest thy self unto, and servest. So that it is this Rock of ages thou trustest to, Isa. 26:3, 4. 'Tis his strength thou art strong by, 'tis his life thou livest by, 'tis the Lord himself that thy faith fathoms. This is right, 1 Pet. 2:7. For now what good can the Father deny thee, when he hath given a Son to thee? What hurt can Satan do thee by all his shakings, when thou hast the Son himself, this corner-stone, this horn of salvation to support thee? What hurt can the law do thee, when thou hast righteousness in a son? What hurt can delusion do thee, when thou hast wisdom ever plotting for thy good, in such a glorious Head as the Son? What hurt can death do thee, or sin do thee, when thy life is in the Son? Oh lead me to the Rock, saith David, that is higher than I. Oh here is a rock higher than death, than grave, than sin, than Satan. Who can hurt thee now? But oh Beloved, how many fall short of entering into this rest? and closing with this person? And there are four sorts of them, that spin the finest thread of deceit to themselves that think they believe when yet they have not the Son.

1. Those that do not close with himself, but only come to him for some righteousness out of himself (for I shall not speak of them that forsake all, and follow Christ for the bag and for the loaves [see Jn6:26]) for 'tis with all men living naturally, as 'tis with men that have been rich shop-keepers, but now they are broke, and cast into great want; steal they will not, dig they cannot, beg they know not how; turn prentice to another they must not, they have not been used to that life; hence they resolve to set up their trade again, though they sell but pins, and points, and small wares; and because they cannot set up for themselves, they go unto merchants to help them, and run into their books on trust, and desire day and patience, and they will pay them all again; now 'tis not the man that they respect, but to make up their markets out of him; but alas, they cannot pay their debts, and hence to prison they go: so 'tis here, God set up Adam with a stock in his own hand [stock is the original stock of grace given or concreated in him at his creation], now he is broken and cast into great want, and fears the arrest of Gods displeasure. Now, sin men dare not, dig and help themselves they cannot, and to beg and live upon the Lord and his alms they know not how; indeed they will not, they are not used to this life; hence seek to set up their trade again, though in never so small duties; and because they cannot help themselves, hence they go to Christ, not as to an husband for himself, but as to a merchant to set them up again. And truly Christ for many ends, and to show his freeness to his own, gives many talents to such, which they receiving hope to please the Lord by; when I can get the Lord to give me some more knowledge, brokenness, affections, enlargements, abilities to do, then I hope I shall please him: but either they spend all and fall away to nothing before they die, or else death come; and carries them captive to the judgement-seat of God, and there they see they are run but the deeper in debt, and not able to pay. Thus it is with Papists who profess that none of their own works save, but his works in us, and his blood meriting, that these shall save. Hence they trust not to what they do, but to what the Lord does, against which very faith the Apostle disputes, Rom. 4:5. Thus it was with the Jews, divers despised Christ, and sought a righteousness of their own; others cried Lord, Lord, Lord, there be these sins that wring my conscience, ease me of them; here be these duties I must do, else never saved, and my heart is dead, Oh affect me, and help me to do them; there be such works I am to perform, and have no strength to pray, to prophesy, Lord assist me! Matt. 7:21, 22, Depart, I know you not, never accepted of you, you thought these things would please me, you closed not with me. Oh now depart from me, from my fellowship, my bosom, my presence! For this is ever their frame; they think to pacify God by what they do, and though they think his justice cannot, yet they hope there is such indulgence in his mercy that he will accept. Thus it was, Isa. 58:2, for this is their temper; they are not wounded with the want of Christ himself, but with some jarrings against the Law, for which they fear they must die. Hence not seeing into the spiritual nature of the Law, they are wounded, not slain by the Law; they hope they shall live if they can leave such sins, perform such duties, feel such abilities. Now having made trial at home, they go to Christ, and seek him with delight for to work this or that, and then they are well. Now if they do not receive at present, then they hope by seeking to find in time, if he doth not help them, then they shall be well. Hence they ever live in some sin, and know it not, as these did, and as the young man, Mat. 19. And thus it is as it is with two princes; one is in trouble by inroaders, he sends for aid to another, but doth not cast down his crown, and put himself in subjection to the other. So men will be kings, and hence send for aid against the inroads of some sin that stings conscience, but put not themselves under the Lord Jesus. Bring those mine enemies hither, Luke 19:27. In one word; as the wound is, so is my closing with Christ. If one be in outward trouble, now to Christ he goes to deliver; if pressed with inward trouble for some sins, now to Christ to remove them, and so to pacify conscience; if with want of Christ himself, now he goes for himself.

2. Those that close with Promises without Christ himself, and divide between them two, that strip Christ of these his Swadling-clouts, make their gain of these, and let himself go. I confess all a Christians wealth is laid up in promises, not in words and syllables, for they are dead things, but Christ in them, and God's faithfulness in them, 2 Sam. 23:4, 5. This is all my salvation, for all fulness is in Christ; he is rich, but what am I the better? Nay, the more miserable, for all emptiness is in me; therefore in the promise lies my peace. And this is a Christian's support in all troubles, and hence he casts anchor here; but here is his frame; he lays not hold on them without Christ, but by them goes to Christ, and there rests, John 6:45. He that hath heard of the Father cometh unto me. Give children milk in the dish, they cry still, they must have it from the mother, and there suck; so 2 Pet. 1. 2, 3. Now there are others that finding some work in themselves without Christ, and thinking that it's saving, and so a good sign; hence are mistaken, and close with it without Christ, and now they think it's well. I doubt not but the Jews that be devout comforted themselves with that promise, He that confesseth, &c. Prov. 28:13, not understanding of it, Matt. 3, Say not within your selves we have Abraham to our Father, that promise kept them off from Christ, Matt. 22. Some came not to the feast, some came but without a wedding garment. 'Tis with these men as 'tis with men that come to buy wines, they taste them, and content themselves with a taste, another buys the thing; a Saint doth so; another tastes the sweet, and after falls to the unpardonable sin, Heb. 6. Or as 'tis with a man that sees corn on the ground, he buys the field, another he gleans somewhat, and contents himself with that. There is in one word a double error,

First. When a man shall close with Christ without promises; and hence seek to be seated without a promise. Hence say some, you must not gather any evidence from any qualification you feel in your self. [\[Roman Catholicism says that you cannot be assured of your salvation! But if you see evidence of the Spirit's work on your heart, that is evidence.\]](#)

Secondly. When men shall snatch and nibble at promises, and misapply them, not closing with Christ in them and by them. I have confessed my sin, and repented, and run away with this without Christ. Oh time will come, the Lord will say, how camest thou in hither? what hast thou to do to take my promises into thy mouth? [\[Ps. 50:16\]](#) to arm thy self against Christ by promises to make a spoil of Christ's grants, and let him be crucified. When Saul rent off Samuel's garment, he said, The Lord shall rend, &c. 1 Sam. 15:27, 28. The letter kills, all promises without Christ slay, because they keep the famishing soul from bread itself.

3. Those that close not with promises only, but with Christ himself, but it's only with the image and fancy of him, which they think is himself. In true faith the Father reveals the Son as he is, or the Son reveals himself as he is, and faith hence closeth with him as he is, John 6:40. But some there be that hear of him, hence think what he is. Hence a carnal mind imagines of him as it imagines of a King in a far Country, and falls down to his Image, and trusts to it, and depends on it, and joys in it, until a man comes to be converted, or to die; and then he sees the deceit. Or if he did see him, yet he can see no beauty in him to desire him. There is many a man in this case that trusts to, and joys in Christ, whom if he did know he would loath. John came preaching the Gospel to show them Christ; they all came to him and rejoiced in his light, but it was but for a season; for when he came to show them there he is, John 1:29, not one man stirs when he shows them Christ, and ver. 35, only two: and chap. 3:32, No man received his testimony. This is (beloved) the great sin and cause of all the rest, if they had known they would not have crucified the Lord of Glory. Christ is not seen, hence not thought of, hence not esteemed; hence men boast not in him. Nay, 'tis the great plague under means, that in seeing they see not. Lord how long. You say Christ never so clearly seen, true, but thou in seeing mayest not see; and if it be thus, then look for ruin, Isa. 6:9, 10, 11, 12. We say Christians want [lack?]not light, but life and affections. Oh, beg for light that will bring affections, else all affections will dry up if not fed with this Spring, John 5:37 [I think he meant John 4:13-14 below]. What people had such means as they, yet they not eyes to see?

¹³ Jesus said to her, "Everyone who drinks of this water will be thirsty again, ¹⁴ but whoever drinks of the water that I will give him will never be thirsty again.^[b] The water that I will give him will become in him a spring of water welling up to eternal life."

4. Those that do not close with the bare fancy of Christ, but with himself; but 'tis not for himself, and for his holiness, but only for his peace, and consolations, and joys. Like a sick woman that comes to the physician, not to marry him, but to heal her, cure her, and so comfort her. Or if she doth come to marry him, 'tis only to satisfy her lust, or to save her from trouble, etc. In a word, they receive Christ, that he may give contentment to them, and not that hereby they may also give contentment unto him. They close with Christ to make them happy, not to make them holy. But they thus closing with him, think they have him, and hence rejoice exceedingly, and hence have a love to him, and hence some kind of communion with him, and hence think they are espoused to him, and more familiar with him than others, and hence verily look with these five foolish virgins to embrace the bride-groom. That look as a saint from a false apprehension of Christ, to be none of his, may be very sad, lose his joy, nay his very love, in the act of it, nay his communion and boldness to go to him, nay, his expectation of him; so from a false conceit that Christ is mine, è contra. Thus, a man is grievously troubled with the sight of God's anger, and with horror, and useth all means; at last he sees only Christ can do it, and hence seeks for and prizeth his love (for his one ease) for as horror may be his greatest evil, so love to ease him, may be his greatest good. At last he is fully persuaded. How? By any work or word? No, but God hath persuaded, and its now sealed, hence joy. But now there is matter of more trouble, holiness, and close walking with Christ; this is troublesome. He cares not for Christ, to help him here, but diviseth how to keep Christ and joy without holiness. Hence let a world of sin lie upon them, they be not troubled with that; they look up to Christ. Or if they see and be troubled at it, they take it as a burden, not as the greatest burden. Hence (say men) you must not judge of your estate by any thing or qualification you feel in your self, for these may fail your eye-sight in misty times (But we must follow it then, and not rest till we see and find it, for without holiness no man shall see God) Hence also let there be never so many falls, yet, say they, never call your state into question, hence they profess, we cannot move till we be moved; and if I do not, it is not my fault. Hence, if ministers do preach any things which are not about the person of Christ, or the excellency of a Christian in Christ, or the emptiness of the creature to prepare for Christ, (which are indeed of great use) and press to any work or service of Christ, they are Legal Preachers, and bring people under a Covenant of works. Whereas if we preach duties, and leave them as signs, before being in Christ, they are so, but here to preach any duty of the Law, is part of the sweet will of Christ. Tell us (say they) what we should do. What can a man do? He can do all things through Christ. True, but Christ must come to act it. Yea, but he hath a faith to fetch it, 1 John 1:6. Many said they had communion with him, 1 John 2:3, 4. It seems, they said they had no sin, as now some say; God sees no sin in justified people, God looks to the new creature only, 'tis not I but sin: if the Spirit help not, 'tis not my fault. Not many days since it did lie upon the spirit of one, who seeing Christ, hath undertaken all, closed with him, rejoiced in him, not for this end, not from the beauty they saw in holiness, nor bitterness of sinfulness, but because they should be eased of the work. I have known them that have lived in some sin, and promised the Lord shall be blessed if he save them in their sin, and conceiting he would, have loved him; thus these. In a word, the soul of man desires rest and peace, seeks for it in creatures, seeks to satisfy itself there; there it cannot; hence seeks for it (as many dying men do) in Christ, not in the grace, but in the joy of Christ; not in Christs holy presence, but in his comforting presence; seeking the utmost perfection of a Christian in the seal of the Spirit, not in the mighty actings of the Spirit for God. Hence, he is deluded, and fancies he hath Christ, and hence joy. Sin is the great evil, hence the end of Christs coming is to take it away. Hence if a man close with Christ to remove horror, not sin, and so hath not closed with him for his holiness, you never closed with Christ for the end of his coming, nor for his, but only for your own ends, and so 'tis not him, but his, 2Cor. 2:15. The Gospel is a savior to them that perish, if of Death to death. Oh consider of these things if it be not thus. 1 John 5:11, 12. Hast the Son for thy portion? Dost see his Glory full of Grace to accept and sanctify thee, thou hast life; if not the Son, but only something from him, Oh death and not life! the bonds of Death (not life) are upon thee, which no creature can unloose unless the Lord come to they grave-side and unloose thee.

¹⁵ For we are the aroma of Christ to God among those who are being saved and among those who are perishing, ¹⁶ to one a fragrance from death to death, to the other a fragrance from life to life.

Spiritual Sloth

Beware of a False Rest

This is one of the best commentaries on the deceitfulness of the sin of spiritual sloth!

SECT. IV.

Use 1. Hence see the reason why many Christians at their first beginnings grow, and thrive, and abound in the fruits of Righteousness; but afterward so poor and ragged; Oh the two or three first years, how frequently in prayer, meditation! Oh what sorrow and peace! but after this, now they can find little good they can get; little growth they make, unless it be downward; little life they have, and what ado to keep it, or to get a good spiritual meals meat! this is the reason of it; when they first began, then the enemy was out, and they were up, and now they conquered and had the spoils; but since, they have grown secure, and loved to sleep, I say love to sleep; and hence, little to be seen about them but rags; hence (Prov. 6:11), lest thy poverty come as an armed man, Prov. 20:13. 11, truly this is it, and hence no wonder you are ever so full of complaints in midst of means; where God gives you matter of fulness, joy, peace, everlasting glory, yet you find nothing; so that sometimes you think there is no grace, or are almost of the mind that there is no grace to be looked for in us; if not, yet finding so little, there's no evidence for it: Oh your sloth it is the cause; hence 'tis you marvel at the Lord he helps not; Oh you do not awake, to awaken the arm of the Lord; you shall know, if you follow on to know the Lord, but that you do not; and hence the pricks and vexations you made your peace with, and are again vexed by them, this is the reason of it. Oh therefore go in secret and say, I complain of my sins; the ordinances and God that I seek, and have not, when my heart should be otherwise; but oh it is not because I cannot, but because I care not; it is not because of the strength of my enemy without, but because of my neglect of watch and diligence within. I know it was a sin for Pharaoh to charge Israel with idleness, because he commanded work without means; but is the Lords work so? look up to him for strength, he gives it them that have none; put forth that strength thou hast, he will accept thy will, but will never allow thee in thy sloth, but you shall to beggary at the last. Hence men roast not what they take in hunting, (Prov. 12:27.) after ordinances; Oh there's world there; never shall you see a soul careful, but he finds every sabbath something.

Use 2. Hence we may learn the reason why many Christians, when the Lord begins to work upon them, have many combats and sore conflicts with various temptations, and one corruption after another, and scarce any breathing time wherein they are freed from such; and then many strong cries, &c. but afterward they are freed from all, and even these also; and they find nothing either within or without that greatly troubles them; but they go on smoothly in a course of profession also, without very much ado with their own hearts; their consciences are at peace, their distempers are at peace, and lie not heavy upon them; and they think God is at peace with them, and hence they are quiet; the reason is because they are quiet, and fall asleep, and let their sin and Satan alone, and hence they let them alone. A sluggard saith, there is a Lion in the way, and it's hedge of thorns; many difficulties God sets before him; now if a man meets with no lions, no thorns, pressed with no great difficulties in his course, it is certain sloth hath seized upon that soul, and he is carried away captive by it, Prov. 22:13. For -

Look upon men, why should they be quiet? Is it because sin and Satan are quite vanquished, that they have no agonies and wrestlings with them? The apostle denies that, Eph. 6:12 [For we do not wrestle against flesh and blood...]. Indeed while he keeps the palace then he is all peace, and it is a sign he is entered again if you have this peace. But else Paul himself, and all that are in the field, are opposed, and will have fiery darts; and hence the apostles exhorts to put off the works of darkness, and put on the whole armor of light; why not works of light? because then a Christian will find many assaults, Rom. 13:12. Or it is because they are men of such a refined faith, and such pure metal that there needs no knocking, nor melting, nor temptations? I confess the Lord doth not see at all times the like need, but gives his servants many sweet seasons; but yet 1 Pet. 1:6, 7, 8, they were begotten to a lively hope, and they did rejoice greatly in that hope; yet they had their seasons of trials, manifold temptations, &c. It may be they thought, did the Lord ever love us, when such desertions, such fierce oppositions? &c. I know the Lord may leave David thus, Ps. 30:6, but then God was angry, and he saw it before many days. No, no, there is both reason for it, and need of it; and why are you at peace now? it is because of your sloth, Jer, 48:11, Moab is at rest; and hence settled on her lees, that they neither feel nor know their sin, and their scent is in them, though none is smelt or runs out; hence never stirred by any word they hear, nor by any blow unless it be very heavy; they are now at peace with sin, death and hell, and are at league with them, Isa. 28:15. And hence as it is, where there be two kingdoms met, what's the reason that there is no hurt that the one do to the other? the reason is, because there is a peace; why so? because war was so troublesome, and rest was good: So it is here: Why are men never troubled? but only because they are at peace with their sin; and why so? because rest is good. Oh they love to sleep; I shall never overcome it, or I have other work to follow, say men, and hence they spiritually war no more; and hence Satan and sin are at peace. This is the guise of men, they think the man is sure; they maintain a name to live before men, keep duties upon the wheels before God, and have comfort often; and though a world of vanity is in their hearts, yet it never oppresses them, because they oppose not it, and so are quiet.

SECT. V.

Objection. But is not Christ's yoke easy and his burden light, full of sweetness, etc.?

Ans. There is a life of faith, and a life of sloth; a rest which Faith gives, and Christ gives; and a rest which mans own sloth and security gives: but there is a wide difference between them.

First, a believing heart cleaves to the Lord, and so finds rest in the Lord, and that with purpose and decree of heart, to cleave to him in one thing as well as in another; the heart is not at peace with Satan, and at war with God, but joins to the Lord, and stands armed with a strong resolution against every temptation; and hence peace with Christ is maintained, not with sloth: as Barnabas, Acts 11:23, exhorted with full purpose of heart to cleave unto the Lord, when he saw the grace of God; seeing you find such mercy from him, Oh cleave unto him. But now a secure heart cleaves to the Lord in some desires; and if he be resolved of any thing, it is only of that which he can do with ease, and will not be what he would be; he would be better, and know the Lord more, and this quiets him; but he will not be what he would be, because his compact and covenant of peace is made with another; he will be sluggish and secure, and not use the means; Oh sleep is sweet, Prov. 12:27. The sluggard roasts not what he took in hunting; he will not roast it, there is trouble there.

Secondly. A believing heart, or faith, finds and feels its rest by trouble. Unto the righteous there ariseth light out of darkness, Ps. 37. After you have suffered, God settle you, 1 Pet. 5:10. Not as the world gives peace, give I it unto you, John 14:27. For the life of a Christian is a life of faith, which is a life contrary to sense and reason. When the Lord kills, what - doth he intend then to save me? and when he blinds me, doth he intend to teach me? yes that he doth, and by their warfare they find peace. Hence Paul at the end of his life makes his triumph, I have finished my course, 2 Tim. 4:6, 7, 8, this makes promises precious; when, though a man feels the strength of sin, yet sees the Lord will subdue it; when a man finds guilt of sin, yet sees the Lord will pardon it for his own names sake. It's a strange place 2 Cor. 1:8, 9, We were oppressed without reason, Why? that we might not trust in our selves, (why, was there no way but this?) why, this is the life of faith, to find life in death, peace in sorrow. But a slothful heart finds not rest by denying itself, and walking through trouble; but by pleasing it self, and easing it self of trouble, because it is at league with it: One that hath broken league, finds peace by war, and then takes spoils; but another è contra, etc. [This is awesome!!! Read on!]

1. A man denies the power of godliness, that's a burden; his slothful heart will not bear that, that's too hot; for the world carries a condemned carriage of them; and hence he keeps a name to live, and thereby hath peace with the world.
2. He wrestles not against Satan, and his lusts, pursuing them daily, carries not the sense and feeling of them; and hence being luke-warm, he thinks he is rich, and wants [lacks] nothing, when poor, and blind, and naked.
3. Hence, not wrestling against sin, he feels not sin, and so conscience is at peace with him; sin is alive without the law.
4. Keeping a constant course of private duties, he thinks God is at peace also, and so his peace gives him rest, and sloth makes him make a league, because he loves rest; and hence we find, a Christian most oppressed in times of trouble, many times has most peace; and è contra. Because as it was with Gideon, he had his peace by trouble, they had their peace by rest whose flesh he tore with thorns, Judges 8:7. Oh therefore fear and tremble at their condition.

SECT. VI.

Use 3. Hence see the reason why many a Christian, after he hath seen and felt the work of Gods grace in his heart and soul, and hence hath been filled with peace and joy unspeakable, that yet after long profession loses the sight of it, and knows not whether there be any dram of grace in his heart or no; and consequently hath no assurance. But ask him, have you not known it? Yes; but 'tis a question whether ever it was immortal seed or no, for then it would not die, as I see it hath; the reason of this is, a man falls to a secure condition, fast asleep, forgets God and himself; and hence though there be grace, yet it is not exercised, Matt. 25:6 [And as the bridegroom was delayed, they all became drowsy and slept], and hence not seen at all, 2 Pet. 1:8, 9, and one grace to another, and then an open entrance is made; this makes calling sure; if this they do not, they will not see afar off; why? because they forget the Lord, which is one part of security. Hence we shall find in times of persecution, never such assurance as then, Zach. 13. ult., because grace is never so exercised as then; and hence men much in prayer abound with much assurance (when Christ was in his agony he prays more fervently because then a man is watchful, and grace most exercised; when a man dies in prayer, and grows secure, and hath little exercise of grace, now it is a question whether there is grace at all or no; and hence when men come to sacraments, how oft are they put to it whether the Lord be theirs or no! and hence when men come to the word, they lose all comfort, because they know now whether these promises are theirs or no, because they are asleep, and not waking with the Lord. Oh, therefore lay no blame upon the Lord, but thyself - I have had grace, but I have not exercised it; I have lived a life of sloth and security. Had I lived a life of thankfulness, prayer, watchfulness, and been ever awake, I should have seen my own heart, and what the Lord hath done for my soul. Here, here lies the security of a Christian, not in losing all grace he had, but in losing the exercise of it.

SECT. VII.

Quest. How shall I do this?

Ans. 1. Look that your eye be single, that the Lord be your last end, and that with an infinite love you cleave to that, and then the whole body will be full of light; but if your eye be double, etc., Matt. 6:24 [No one can serve two masters...], A ship that hath but one place to go to, will get thitherward in open sea with every wind. Who is so great as the Lord? who minds thee but the Lord? does he provide, protect and pity thee, when thou seekest thy self? will he not do it much more when thou art set for him?

2. Consider the sweetness of this life. 1. In this life, 1 Cor. 15. ult., be ever abounding; why? Oh you know your labor shall not be in vain. And what will it be when you come to die? Isa. 38:1, 2, 3. Remember I have walked with thee: And 2. After death, Rev. 14:13, it may be you account them nothing, but they shall follow thee; do you not find bitterness in the end of another life? You will find your pillow hard enough before you die; Oh therefore get something to make it easy.

3. Take heed of forgetfulness of the Lord, for this is the reason why many a man is not ever up in walking with the Lord, because he forgets the Lord; It is not because he will not, or because he cannot, but he remembers not the Lord's love, the glory of his ways, what an evil thing and bitter it is to depart from the Lord, Psal. 22:11, They shall remember and turn, Jer. 2:1, 6. The Lord complains of apostacy, they said where is the Lord? I remember thee, etc. So I say to you, the Lord of glory remembers you, thou art written on the palms of his hand, and like show-bread before the ark, so thou dost ever stand before the Lord; hence every moment he is pardoning, purging, preserving and devising how to do thee good; nay, he remembers thy love, prayers, seekings after him, nay, thy house and walls of it where thou dwellest. Oh, therefore forget not the Lord, that so you may be ever seeking after, and cleaving to the Lord.

SECT. VIII.

Use 4. Hence see the reason why men after long profession fall into many slothful opinions, because their hearts are surprised with this enemy of sloth first; and it is God's just judgement upon men, that seeing they love their sleep and laziness, they shall be lazy by rule, and so be forever hardened in it.

Quest. What are those slothful opinions?

Ans. First, What is this but one, to make the law no rule to a Christian's life? as though a Christian should be like a man at sea, and carried by the wind, but he must have no compass to sail by also. In these last times Christ's kingly office is chiefly opposed; men are glad of Christ's righteousness and death to save them, but when he comes to plant his laws (as all conquerors do amongst men) they do then shake them off, and under a color of love to their Prince, make his laws no bonds to bind them; so these think this is the liberty of a Christian, the liberty of a Prince to be lawless, 2 Pet. 2:19.

Secondly. That there is no activity of grace received, no power to stir till stirred; and therefore leave all upon Christ, they can do nothing; if he gives nothing, they cannot help it; if he does, then all is well, etc. It is true, till the Lord does help what can we do? But there is an immutable assistance of spirit, whereby the Lord does enable his to act more or less like himself, when stirred up. And if you find none, because you fall short of Christ, do not think that the Lord will be a cover to such a cap; nor a pillow for a slothful heart; there is a sickness in the best, and must be followed, else we die.

Thirdly. That Ministers must not exhort. Why? What can men do? If servants cannot abide to be spoken unto when there is need, from what can it come but idleness? What can words make better? Yes, the Lord's words have a power to help or ruin, when you shall say, Oh the exhortations, Oh the intreaties I have had, etc., one main means of reconciliation is now abolished, 2 Cor. 5:20.

Fourthly. That Christians must gather no evidence from sanctification; we shall find the root of it to be difficulty, which is never sloth's bed-fellow.

1. It is difficult to be holy always, but there will be many weaknesses and sins, etc.
2. When we do so, it will be hard to discern what holiness it is, whether counterfeit or not.
3. When we do so, 'tis hard to keep it, but you will lose it again, and be put to farther search, and so off and on. I believe Christians make them more difficult than indeed they are; but yet it is the Lord's way. Scripture is plain for it; and if avoided because difficult (which to many is sweet) what is this but an invention of sloth?

Fifthly. That what a man cannot do, is always a weakness which the Lord will pardon. Sometimes it is; but not here; for a man's chief sin may be kept unsubdued from this ground, which sloth makes warrantable.

Sixthly. That if once the main be wrought, though he never grow better, yet he is to keep his peace and confidence; Oh intreat the Lord to keep your heads sound (though hearts be sluggish) so as you may not love, and defend your security, and then go and leave Christ.

SECT. IX.

Let this be a warning to all, that there is such an enemy to be slain; truly I had thought if I could have got my heart broken, if I could seek the Lord till I had gotten a promise, then I should be well enough.

Oh no, there is a slothful heart yet continues; and let it be encouragement to war against it; Oh 'tis the last enemy, and then comes your crown, and then your warfare is ended; and therefore do as Sampson; Lord, help this one time, that I may be avenged for my two eyes; so, thou hast been made a slave to it in private duties, and God hath neglected thee. In public, at meetings you have been forced to sleep, that an Indian it may be, if he had stood by would have jogged thee; therefore pray, Oh help Lord this one time (though I die) against this one enemy. Thus Paul 1 Cor.9, ult. Is an immortal crown nothing? Will it be no sorrow to you when you awake, to lose eternal rest in God, for a little rest in thy sloth? Oh therefore beat down thy body; it is the last, hence the worst enemy; say as Judges 9:54, What; shall I fall by a woman? Shall I fall by the worst? Why did I oppose lust and pride? Oh, because vile; why, this is worse; it is the last, and hence Christ hates it most; and hath he given strength against any sin, and will he not against this? Oh, therefore pray God that you fall not here.

Judges 9:54 - Then he called quickly to the young man his armor-bearer and said to him, "Draw your sword and kill me, lest they say of me, 'A woman killed him.'" And his young man thrust him through, and he died.

Men Naturally God's Enemies

by Jonathan Edwards

SECT. VII.

Why natural men are not willing to come to Christ, and their dreadful condition.

Hence we may learn the reason why natural men will not come to Christ: they do not come because they will not come. "Ye will not come to me, that ye might have life." John v. 40. When we say that natural men are not willing to come to Christ, it is not meant that they are not willing to be delivered from hell; for without doubt, no natural man is willing to go to hell. Nor is it meant, that they are not willing that Christ should keep them from going to hell. Without doubt, natural men under awakenings often greatly desire this. But this does not argue that they are willing to come to Christ: for, notwithstanding their desire to be delivered from hell, their hearts do not close with Christ, but are averse to him. They see nothing in Christ wherefore they should desire him; no beauty nor comeliness to draw their hearts to him. And they are not willing to take Christ as he is; they would fain divide him. There are some things in him that they like, and others that they greatly dislike; but consider him as he is, and as he is offered to them in the gospel, and they are not willing to accept of Christ; for in doing so, they must of necessity part with all their sins; they must sell the world, and part with their own righteousness. But they had rather, for the present, run the venture of going to hell, than do that.

When men are truly willing to come to Christ, they are freely willing. It is not what they are forced and driven to by threatenings; but they are willing to come, and choose to come without being driven. But natural men have no such free willingness; but on the contrary have an aversion. And the ground of it is that which we have heard, viz., that they are enemies to God. Their having such a reigning enmity against God, makes them obstinately refuse to come to Christ. If a man is an enemy to God, he will necessarily be an enemy to Christ too; for Christ is the Son of God; he is infinitely near to God, yea, has the nature of God, as well as the nature of man. He is a Saviour appointed of God; he anointed him, and sent him into the world. And in performing the work of redemption, he wrought the works of God; always did those things that pleased him; and all that he does as a Saviour, is to his glory. And one great thing he aimed at in redemption, was to deliver them from their idols, and bring them to God. The case being so, and sinners being enemies to God, they will necessarily be opposite to coming to Christ; for Christ is of God, and as a Saviour seeks them to bring them to God only; but natural men are not of God, but are averse to him.

Hence we see, how dreadful is the condition of natural men. Their state is a state of enmity with God. If we consider what God is, and what men are, it will be easy for us to conclude that such men as are God's enemies, must be miserable. Consider, ye that are enemies to God, how great he is. He is the eternal God who fills heaven and earth, and whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain. He is the God that made you; in whose hand your breath is, and whose are all your ways; the God in whom you live, and move, and have your being; who has your soul and body in his hands every moment.

Consider, What will it be to have this enmity to be mutual, and maintained for ever on both sides? For as God will for ever continue an enemy to you, so you will for ever continue an enemy to God. If you continue God's enemy until death, you will always be his enemy. And after death your enmity will have no restraint, but it will break out and rage without control. When you come to be a fire-brand of hell, you will be so in two respects, viz. As you will be full of the fire of God's wrath; and as you will be all on a blaze with spite and malice towards God. You will be as full of the fire of malice, as you will with the fire of divine vengeance, and both will make you full of torment. Then you will appear as you are, a viper indeed. You are now under great disguise; a wolf in sheep's clothing: but then your mask will be pulled off; you shall loose your garments, and walk naked. Rev. xvi. 15. Then will you vent your rage and malice in fearful blasphemies. That same tongue, to cool which you will wish for a drop of water, will be eternally employed in cursing and blaspheming God and Christ. And that not from any new corruption being put into your heart; but only from God's withdrawing his hand from restraining your old corruption. And what a miserable way will this be of spending your eternity!

Notes on God's immutability, sovereignty and Arminian's view of man's will by Hermon Bavinck

This immutability of God, however, was frequently combated from the side of both deism and pantheism. In the opinion of Epicurus the gods totally resemble excellent human beings, who make changes with respect to location, activity, and thought (etc.); and according to Heraclitus and later the Stoics, the deity as the immanent cause of the world was also caught up in its perpetual flux.[25] Opposition to God's immutability in Christian theology was of the same nature. On the one hand, there is the Pelagianism, Socinianism, Remonstrantism, and rationalism, which especially opposes the immutability of God's knowing and willing and makes the will of God dependent on—and hence change in accordance with—the conduct of humans. Especially Vorstius, in his work On God and His Attributes, criticized the immutability of God. He made a distinction between God's essence, which is simple and unchangeable, and God's will, which being free does not will everything eternally and does not always will the same thing.[26] Bavinck, God & Creation, Vol. 2 pg 155

Van Til states:

In saying that God is a Spirit we do not think of some vague generic concept of spirituality of which God is one particular instance and man another. God is the absolute Spirit. He is the self-contained Spirit. He does not need materiality over against himself in order to individuate himself. He is the self-individuated Spirit. [In other words, I think was Van Til is saying here, that God is not in an act of becoming via a correlative relationship with his creation – i.e., a pantheistic view. He is entirely distinct from his creation and he already is! and that by or of himself, a se. He is not becoming more conscious of himself nor coming into his own so to speak (becoming individuated), through a correlative relationship by being one with creation in the ongoing changes characteristic of all creatures. For one thing, God is immutable.] Van Til, Systematic Theology, pg 369

Free Will, Contingency

Arminian liberty vs. God's Sovereignty

The next several discourses add further light to God's sovereignty in the communication of his grace, his goods, the fullness of which is in the Son which he gives it to whom he will.

The Arminian concept of contingency or chance. Owen explains this below and then I took it to apply it to that same spirit that masquerades in all this talk regarding the foundation of evolutionary thought, i.e., where did this idea of chance come from and why. Well, this is it: my comments in [blue], red for emphasis and to note important terms. See also code481, Van Til on chance.

From John Owen's book, A Display of Arminianism

Chapter XII.

Of free-will, the nature and power thereof.

Our next task is to take a view of the idol himself, of this great deity of free-will, whose original being not well known, he is pretended, like the Ephesian image of Diana, to have fallen down from heaven, and to have his endowments from above [i.e., many say that God gave us free-will]. But yet, considering what a nothing he was at his first discovery in comparison of that vast giant-like hugeness to which now he is grown, we may say of him as the painter said of his monstrous picture, which he had mended or rather marred according to everyone's fancy, "Hunc populus fecit," — it is the issue of the people's brain. Origen¹⁹⁹ is supposed to have brought him first into the church; but among those many sincere worshippers of divine grace, this setter forth of new demons found but little entertainment. It was looked upon but like the stump of Dagon, with his head and hands laid down before the ark of God, without whose help he could neither know nor do that which is good in any kind, still accounted but “truncus ficulnus, inutile lignum,” — “a fig-tree log, an unprofitable piece of wood.” “Incerti patres scamnum facerentne?” The fathers of the succeeding ages had much debate to what use they should put it, and though some exalted it a degree or two above its merits, yet the most concluded to keep it a block still; until at length there arose a stout champion,²⁰⁰ challenging on his behalf the whole church of God, and, like a knight-errant, wandered from the west to the east to grapple with any that should oppose his idol; who, though he met with divers adversaries,²⁰¹ one especially,²⁰² who in the behalf of the grace of God continually foiled him and cast him to the ground, and that in the judgment of all the lawful judges assembled in councils, and in the opinion of most of the Christian bystanders, yet, by his cunning insinuation, he planted such an opinion of his idol’s deity and self-sufficiency in the hearts of divers [many], that to this day it could never be rooted out.

Now, after the decease of his Pelagian worshippers, some of the corrupter schoolmen, seeing him thus from his birth exposed without shelter to wind and weather, to all assaults, out of mere charity and self-love built him a temple, and adorned it with natural lights, merits, uncontrolled independent operations, with many other gay attendances. But in the beginning of the Reformation, — that fatal time for idolatry and superstition, together with abbeyes and monasteries, — the zeal and learning of our forefathers, with the help of God’s word, demolished this temple, and brake this building down to the ground; in the rubbish whereof we well hoped the idol himself had been so deeply buried as that his head should never more have been exalted, to the trouble of the church of God, until not long since some curious wits, whose weak stomachs were clogged with manna and loathed the sincere milk of the word, raking all dunghills for novelties, lighted unhappily upon this idol, and presently, with no less joy than did the mathematician at the discovery of a new geometrical proportion, exclaim, “We have found it! we have found it!” And without more ado, up they erected a shrine, and until this day continue offering of praise and thanks for all the good they do to this work of their own hands.

And that the idol may be free from ruin, to which in himself they have found by experience that he is subject, they have matched him to contingency, a new goddess of their own creation, who, having proved very fruitful in monstrous births upon their conjunctions, they nothing doubt they shall never want [lack] one to set on the throne and make president of all human actions: so that after he hath, with various success, at least twelve hundred years, contended with the providence and grace of God, he boasteth now as if he had obtained a total victory. But yet all his prevailing is to be attributed to the diligence and varnish of his new abettors, with (to our shame be it spoken!) the negligence of his adversaries [referring to the negligence of Christians that should have opposed this false teaching]. In him and his cause there is no more real worth than was when by the ancient fathers [Augustine vs Pelagius in 300AD] he was exploded and cursed out of the church: so that they who can attain, through the many winding labyrinths of curious distinctions, to look upon the thing itself, shall find that they have been, like Egyptian novices, brought through many stately frontispieces and goodly fabrics, with much show of zeal and devotion, to the image of an ugly ape.

[comment on the first sentence to explain this notion of chance, aka, contingency. What he is saying here is that those people who advocate the power of our free-will have, by experience, found it to be a dead end street, wrought with failure and confusion; so they erected an excuse or a plausible explanation in the room thereof! -that being that things just happen by chance, to help explain away their failures or confoundedness that their idol of free, which vaunts itself against God's sovereign disposal of things which God has decreed in eternity that should take place, naturally tends to. If they don't go there for this lame excuse of contingency, then they necessarily must submit and acquiesce to God's complete sovereign control of things which they despise. This is the same avenue most people on the "left" do go down when trying to explain the origin of man, the universe, etc. So instead of attributing creation to the Almighty hand of God, they attribute it to chance (or contingency), the foundation of evolutionary theory. This is the vain imagination of their brains that is put on the altar of their minds to which they bow down. Otherwise they must concede and confess the Lord which they abhor by nature. 1Cor2:14 - "But the natural man does not receive the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him; nor can they know them, because they are spiritually discerned." And that's why this idea of contingency has taken front stage in unregenerate minds as a "god" or an unprofitable piece of wood...that cannot hear, etc.... (Isaiah 44:15-20, below), which sheds light on man's vain attempts to manufacture a idol out of the imagination of his darkened mind:

Then it shall be for a man to burn,
 For he will take some of it and warm himself;
 Yes, he kindles it and bakes bread;
 Indeed he makes a god and worships it;
 He makes it a carved image, and falls down to it.
¹⁶He burns half of it in the fire;
 With this half he eats meat;
 He roasts a roast, and is satisfied.
 He even warms himself and says,
 "Ah! I am warm,
 I have seen the fire."
¹⁷And the rest of it he makes into a god,
 His carved image.
 He falls down before it and worships it,
 Prays to it and says,
 "Deliver me, for you are my god!"
¹⁸They do not know nor understand;
 For He has shut their eyes, so that they cannot see,
 And their hearts, so that they cannot understand.
¹⁹And no one considers in his heart,
 Nor is there knowledge nor understanding to say,
 "I have burned half of it in the fire,
 Yes, I have also baked bread on its coals;
 I have roasted meat and eaten it;
 And shall I make the rest of it an abomination?
 Shall I fall down before a block of wood?"
²⁰He feeds on ashes;
 A deceived heart has turned him aside;
 And he cannot deliver his soul,
 Nor say, "Is there not a lie in my right hand?"

So man who knows not the true God makes one up to try to explain why things happen the way they do. First, he thinks that all is due to his own industry or control. When he finds out that that is woefully inadequate to what he actually experiences in life, he attributes it to contingency or chance, or in other words, nothing. What else has he who is still blind to the things of God, the sovereign pleasure of his will, his divine providence, those wheels that turn round and round, noted in Ezekiel? That's why the Arminians hate the idea of God having decreed all things; it takes away man's vain idea that he is the center of things and not God, until God reveals himself to that person. He will not surrender his own idol of free will or contingency until God tears it away from him at conversion, when God takes away the heart of stone (Ezek. 36:23-31!) This is what had to have happened to the tax collector prior to his exclamation in Luke, where he exclaims, "God, be mercy to me, a sinner!" And Jesus said "I tell you, this man went down to his house justified rather than the other; for everyone who exalts himself will be humbled, and he who humbles himself will be exalted." All man's foolish and vain thoughts about his self-sufficiency leave him when he sees the King, when the glory of God is revealed to him. This man was exhibiting a fruit of saving faith, that being humility and a contrite spirit; it wasn't his saying what he said that saved him; it was what he said that evidenced his justified state. See James 2:17, "Thus also faith by itself, if it does not have works, is dead." So when you examine yourself, look for those works of the spirit that should bring forth fruit.

Owen continues on free will:

Yet here observe, that we do not absolutely oppose free-will, as if it were "nomen inane," a mere figment, when there is no such thing in the world, but only in that sense the Pelagians and Arminians do assert it. About words we will not contend. We grant man, in the substance of all his actions, as much power, liberty, and freedom as a mere created nature is capable of [called "creaturely freedom" in theological circles]. We grant him to be free in his choice from all outward coercion, or inward natural necessity, to work according to election and deliberation, spontaneously embracing what seemeth good unto him. Now, call this power free-will, or what you please, so you make it not supreme, independent, and boundless [that's the key! Arminians will not yield this point.], we are not at all troubled. The imposition of names depends upon the discretion of their inventers. Again; even in spiritual things, we deny that our wills are at all debarred, or deprived of their proper liberty: but here we say, indeed, that we are not properly free until the Son makes us free [Amen!]; — no great use of freedom in that wherein we can do nothing at all. We do not claim such a liberty as should make us despise the grace of God [i.e., to resist the effectual call of God is to despise it; same thing. Arminians believe that your self-directed free will is autonomous and that it is unfair nor like unto God to violate man's liberty by imposing Himself upon them by forcing the issue of believing; but this notion of conversion is a misunderstanding of God's sovereign disposal of his grace regarding the regenerating the soul, his divine and sovereign prerogative to do as he pleases...I will have mercy on whomever I will have mercy, Rm9:15 In other words, when God calls someone to save him, he will effect it; you cannot resist it or despise it. Jesus says himself, My sheep hear my voice and I know them (to love them, to show them favor...) and they follow Me. And I give them eternal life, and they shall never perish; neither shall anyone snatch them out of My hand." "God will fulfill his promises, not maybe fulfill them. This calling is synonymous with conversion; they are one in the same.], whereby we may attain true liberty indeed; which addeth to, but taketh nothing from, our original freedom. But of this after I have showed what an idol the Arminians make of free-will. Only take notice in the entrance that we speak of it now, not as it was at first by God created, but as it is now by sin corrupted; yet, being considered in that estate also, they ascribe more unto it than it was ever capable of. As it now standeth, according to my formerly-proposed method, I shall show, — first, what inbred native virtue they ascribe unto it [i.e., they oppose the doctrine of Original Sin, in that we are wholly corrupt, unwilling and unable to come to God for salvation.], and with how absolute a dominion and sovereignty over all our actions they endow it; secondly, what power they say it hath in preparing us for the grace of God; thirdly, how effectually operative it is in receiving the said grace, and with how little help thereof it accomplisheth the great work of our conversion; — all briefly, with so many observations as shall suffice to discover their proud errors in each particular.

“Herein,” saith Arminius, “consisteth the liberty of the will, that all things required to enable it to will anything being accomplished, it still remains indifferent to will or not.” And all of them at the synod: “There is,” say they, “accompanying the will of man an inseparable property, which we call liberty, from whence the will is termed a power, which, when all things pre-required as necessary to operation are fulfilled, may will anything, or not will it;” that is, our free-wills have such an absolute and uncontrollable power in the territory of all human actions, that no influence of God’s providence, no certainty of his decree, no unchangeableness of his purpose, can sway it at all in its free determinations, or have any power with his highness to cause him to will or resolve on any such act as God by him intendeth to produce. [that is the idol in action, right here! what follows here is excellent:] Take an instance in the great work of our conversion. “All unregenerate men,” saith Arminius, “have, by virtue of their free-will, a power of resisting the Holy Spirit, of rejecting the offered grace of God, of contemning the counsel of God concerning themselves, of refusing the gospel of grace, of not opening the heart to him that knocketh.” What a stout idol is this, whom neither the Holy Spirit, the grace and counsel of God, the calling of the gospel, the knocking at the door of the heart, can move at all, or in the least measure prevail against him! Woe be unto us, then, if when God calls us our free-will be not in good temper, and well disposed to hearken unto him! for it seems there is no dealing with it by any other ways, though powerful and almighty. “For grant,” saith Corvinus [a chief Arminian, follower of Arminius], “all the operations of grace which God can use in our conversion, yet conversion remaineth so in our own free power that we can be not converted; that is, we can either turn or not turn ourselves;” where the idol plainly challengeth the Lord to work his utmost, and tells him that after he hath so done he will do what he please. His infallible prescience, his powerful predetermination, the moral efficacy of the gospel, the infusion of grace, the effectual operation of the Holy Spirit, all are nothing, not at all available in helping or furthering our independent wills in their proceedings. Well, then, in what estate will you have the idol placed? “In such a one wherein he may be suffered to sin, or to do well, at his pleasure,” as the same author intimates. It seems, then, as to sin, so nothing is required for him to be able to do good but God’s permission? No! For the Remonstrants [side bar here: It was the Arminians, aka, the Remonstrants – followers of Arminius, that opposed the Reformers in 1618 at the The Synod of Dort, aka, the Synod of Dordrecht. It was an international synod held in Dordrecht in 1618–1619, by the Dutch Reformed Church, to settle a divisive controversy initiated by the rise of Arminianism.] as they speak of themselves “do always suppose a free power of obeying or not obeying, as well in those who do obey as in those who do not obey;” — that he that is obedient may therefore be counted obedient, because he obeyeth when he could not obey, and so on the contrary:” where all the praise of our obedience, whereby we are made to differ from others, is ascribed to ourselves alone, and that free power that is in us [that is key! man claiming his independence from God or claiming to be God who alone is sovereign! Man will not accept any notion that his decisions are influence by any outside force because it violates his so called liberty; that all his actions must be from himself and not from without himself; but this is the definition of a god! Only God wills things from the counsel of his own will see Eph 1:11] "I" Him also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestined according to the purpose of Him who works all things according to the counsel of His will." "That is, he does not consider things or influences without himself; he is the potter; the clay cannot contend with him. But man in his fallen state is blind to this and thinks he is self-willed, that the will determines itself, that it is autonomous when the contrary is true.]

Now, this they mean not of any one act of obedience, but of faith itself, and the whole consummation thereof. "For if a man should say, that every man in the world hath a power of believing if he will, and of attaining salvation, and that this power is settled in his nature, what argument have you to confute him?" saith Arminius triumphantly to Perkins; where the sophistical innovator as plainly confounds grace and nature as ever did Pelagius [that is, Pelagius thought that man in his unregenerate state, has in him by nature, a power to savingly come to God without the saving grace given by the Holy Spirit]. That, then, which the Arminians claim here in behalf of their free-will is, an absolute independence on God's providence in doing anything, and of his grace in doing that which is good, — a self-sufficiency in all its operations, a plenary indifferency of doing what we will, this or that, as being neither determined to the one nor inclined to the other by any overruling influence from heaven. So that the good acts of our wills have no dependence on God's providence as they are acts, nor on his grace as they are good; but in both regards proceed from such a principle within us as is no way moved by any superior agent. Now, the first of these we deny unto our wills, because they are created [think about that - anything created by God must by definition be wholly dependent upon God otherwise God is not God, man is, that is, he is not dependent upon any outside power or influence to sustain him!]; and the second, because they are corrupted [due to Adam's fall]. Their creation hinders them from doing anything of themselves without the assistance of God's providence [that's the key]; and their corruption, from doing anything that is good without his grace. A self-sufficiency for operation, without the effectual motion of Almighty God, the first cause of all things, we can allow neither to men nor angels, unless we intend to make them gods; and a power of doing good, equal unto that they have of doing evil, we must not grant to man by nature, unless we will deny the fall of Adam, and fancy ourselves still in paradise. [masterful words!! Isn't that what Satan proposed to Eve? You can become like God! i.e., independent and sovereign in our own right. But, on the other hand and in a very profound way, we do and will become like God; for when we partake of the divine nature we become like God! So little did Satan realize that what he tempted Eve with actually happened in a different way, to his utter amazement and confoundedness.]

But let us consider these things apart.

First, I shall not stand to decipher the nature of human liberty, which perhaps would require a larger discourse than my proposed method will bear. It may suffice that, according to my former intimation, we grant as large a freedom and dominion to our wills over their own acts as a creature, subject to the supreme rule of God's providence, is capable of. Endued we are with such a liberty of will as is free from all outward compulsion and inward necessity, having an elective faculty of applying itself unto that which seems good unto it, in which it is a free choice; notwithstanding, it is subservient to the decree of God [which all unregenerate hate], as I showed before, chap. iv. Most free it is in all its acts, both in regard of the object it chooseth and in regard of that vital power and faculty whereby it worketh, infallibly complying with God's providence, and working by virtue of the motion thereof; but surely to assert such a supreme independency and every way unbounded indifferency as the Arminians claim, whereby, all other things requisite being pre-supposed, it should remain absolutely in our own power to will or not to will, to do anything or not to do it, is plainly to deny that our wills are subject to the rule of the Most High.

[e.g., see Proverbs 21:1 "The king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, Like the rivers of water; He turns it wherever He wishes."]

It is granted that in such a chimerical, fancied consideration of free-will, wherein it is looked upon as having no relation to any act of God's but only its creation, abstracting from his decree, it may be said to have such a liberty in regard of the object; but the truth is, this divided sense is plain nonsense, a mere fiction of such an estate as wherein it never was, nor ever can be, so long as men will confess any deity but themselves, to whose determinations they must be subject. Until, then, more significant terms may be invented for this free power in our nature, which the Scripture never once vouchsafed to name, I shall be content to call it with Prosper, a "spontaneous appetite of what seemeth good unto it," free from all compulsion, but subservient to the providence of God. And against its exaltation to this height of independency, I oppose, —

This will exercise your reason: code305a

First, Everything that is independent of any else in operation is purely active, and so consequently a god; for nothing but a divine will can be a pure act, possessing such a liberty by virtue of its own essence [this is the same with what Arminians contend man's will is endowed with, that their will determines itself]. Every created will must have a liberty by participation, which includeth such an imperfect potentiality as cannot be brought into act without some promotion (as I may so say) of a superior agent. Neither doth this motion, being extrinsical, at all prejudice the true liberty of the will, [i.e., God does not work by coercion] which requireth, indeed, that the internal principle of operation be active and free, but not that that principle be not moved to that operation by an outward superior agent. Nothing in this sense can have an independent principle of operation which hath not an independent being. It is no more necessary to the nature of a free cause, from whence a free action must proceed, that it be the first beginning of it, than it is necessary to the nature of a cause that it be the first cause.

Secondly, If the free acts of our wills are so subservient to the providence of God as that he useth them to what end he will, and by them effecteth many of his purposes, then they cannot of themselves be so absolutely independent as to have in their own power in every necessary circumstance and condition, that they may use or not use at their pleasure. Now, the former is proved by all those reasons and texts of Scripture I before produced to show that the providence of God overruleth the actions and determineth the wills of men freely to do that which he hath appointed [in his eternal decree, e.g., see Acts 13:48!!!

"Now when the Gentiles heard this, they were glad and glorified the word of the Lord. And as many as had been appointed to eternal life believed."

And, truly, were it otherwise, God's dominion over the most things that are in the world were quite excluded; he had not power to determine that any one thing should ever come to pass which hath any reference to the wills of men. [And so as Jonathan Edwards points out, that God being the promiser, certainly it is in his providential power to also be the disposer of those things and not just the predictor of them!]

Thirdly, All the acts of the will being positive entities, were it not previously moved by God himself, "in whom we live, move, and have our being," must needs have their essence and existence solely from the will itself; which is thereby made αὐτὸ ὄν, a first and supreme cause, endued with an underived being. And so much to that particular.

Let us now, in the second place, look upon the power of our freewill in doing that which is morally good; where we shall find not only an essential imperfection, inasmuch as it is created, but also a contracted effect, inasmuch as it is corrupted [by sin]. The ability which the Arminians ascribe unto it in this kind, of doing that which is morally and spiritually good, is as large as themselves will confess to be competent unto it in the state of innocency, even a power of believing and a power of resisting the gospel, of obeying and not obeying, of turning or of not being converted.

The Scripture, as I observed before, hath no such term at all, nor anything equivalent unto it. But the expressions it useth concerning our nature and all the faculties thereof, in this state of sin and unregeneration, seem to imply the quite contrary; as, that we are in "bondage," Heb. ii. 15; "dead in sins," Eph. ii. 1, and so "free from righteousness," Rom. vi. 20; "servants of sin," verse 17; under the "reign" and "dominion" thereof, verses 12, 14; all "our members being instruments of unrighteousness," verse 13; not "free indeed," until "the Son make us free." So that this idol of free-will, in respect of spiritual things, is not one whit better than the other idols of the heathen. Though it look like "silver and gold," it is the "work of men's hands." "It hath a mouth, but it speaketh not; it hath eyes, but it seeth not; it hath ears, but it heareth not; a nose, but it smelleth not; it hath hands, but it handleth not; feet, but it walketh not; neither speaketh it through its throat. They that made it are like unto it; and so is every one that trusteth in it. O Israel, trust thou in the Lord," etc., Ps. cxv. 4–9. That it is the work of men's hands, or a human invention, I showed before. For the rest, it hath a mouth unacquainted with the "mystery of godliness," "full only of cursing and bitterness," Rom. iii. 14; "speaking great swelling words," Jude 16; "great things, and blasphemies," Rev. xiii. 5; a "mouth causing the flesh to sin," Eccles. v. 6; — his eyes are blind, not able to perceive those things that are of God, nor to know those things that are "spiritually discerned," 1 Cor. ii. 14; "eyes before which there is no fear of God," Rom. iii. 18; — his "understanding is darkened, because of the blindness of his heart," Eph. iv. 18; "wise to do evil, but to do good he hath no knowledge," Jer. iv. 22; so that without farther light, all the world is but a mere "darkness," John i. 5; — he hath ears, but they are like the ears of the "deaf adder" to the word of God, "refusing to hear the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely," Ps. lviii. 5; being "dead" when his voice first calls it, John v. 25; "ears stopped that they should not hear," Zech. vii. 11; "heavy ears" that cannot hear, Isa. vi. 10; — a nose, to which the gospel is "the savour of death unto death," 2 Cor. ii. 16; — "hands full of blood," Isa. i. 15; and "fingers defiled with iniquity," chap. lix. 3; — feet, indeed, but, like Mephibosheth, lame in both by a fall, so that he cannot at all walk in the path of goodness; but "swift to shed blood, destruction and misery are in his ways, and the way of peace hath he not known," Rom. iii. 15–17. These, and divers other such endowments and excellent qualifications, doth the Scripture attribute to this idol, which it calls "The old man," [aka, the likeness of Adam! Gen. 5:3. See 1Cor15:49, Just as we have borne the image of the man of dust, we shall also bear the image of the man of heaven.] as I shall more fully discover in the next chapter. And is not this a goodly reed whereon to rely in the paths of godliness? a Powerful deity whereunto we may repair for a power to become the sons of God, and attain eternal happiness? The abilities of free-will in particular I shall consider hereafter; now only I will, by one or two reasons, show that it cannot be the sole and proper cause of any truly good and spiritual act, well-pleasing unto God.

First, All spiritual acts well-pleasing unto God, as faith, repentance, obedience, are supernatural; flesh and blood revealeth not these things: "Not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man; but of God," John i. 13; "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit," chap. iii. 6. Now, to the performance of any supernatural act it is required that the productive power thereof be also supernatural; for nothing hath an activity in causing above its own sphere. "Nec imbelles generant feroces aquilas columbæ." But our free-will is a merely natural faculty, betwixt which and those spiritual, supernatural acts there is no proportion, unless it be advanced above its own orb, by inherent, habitual grace. Divine, theological virtues, differing even in the substance of the act from those moral performances about the same things to which the strength of nature may reach (for the difference of acts ariseth from their formal objects, which to both these are diverse), must have another principle and cause above all the power of nature in civil things and actions morally good, inasmuch as they are subject to a natural perception, and do not exceed the strength of our own wills. This faculty of free-will may take place, but yet not without these following limitations:—First, that it always requireth the general concurrence of God, whereby the whole suppositum in which free-will hath its subsistence may be sustained, Matt. x. 29, 30. Secondly, That we do all these things imperfectly and with much infirmity; every degree, also, of excellency in these things must be counted a special gift of God, Isa. xxvi. 12. Thirdly, That our wills are determined by the will of God to all their acts and motions in particular; but to do that which is spiritually good we have no knowledge, no power.

Secondly, That concerning which I gave one special instance, in whose production the Arminians attribute much to free-will, is faith. This they affirm (as I showed before) to be inbred in nature, everyone having in him from his birth a natural power to believe in Christ and his gospel; for Episcopius denies that "any action of the Holy Spirit upon the understanding or will is necessary, or promised in the Scripture, to make a man able to believe the word preached unto him." [can you believe what that guy said!!] So that it seems every man hath at all times a power to believe, to produce the act of faith upon the revelation of its object: which gross Pelagianism is contrary, —

First, To the doctrine of the church of England, alarming that a man cannot so much as prepare himself by his own strength to faith and calling upon God, until the grace of God by Christ prevent [to come before or precede or antecedently] him, that he may have a good will. — Artic. x.

Secondly, To the Scripture, teaching that it is "the work of God that we do believe," John vi. 29. It is "not of ourselves; it is the gift of God.", Eph. ii. 8.

To some “it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven,” Matt. xiii. 11. And what is peculiarly given to some cannot be in the power of everyone: “To you it is given in the behalf of Christ to believe on him,” Phil. i. 29. Faith is our access or coming unto Christ; which none can do “except the Father draw him,” John vi. 44; and he so draweth [remember, to draw is essentially to convert], or “hath mercy, on whom he will have mercy,” Rom. ix. 18. And although Episcopius rejects any immediate action of the Holy Spirit for the ingenerating of faith, yet St Paul affirmeth that there is no less effectual power required to it than that which raised Christ from the dead; which, sure, was an action of the almighty Godhead. “That ye may know,” saith he, “what is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead,” Eph. i. 18–20. So that, let the Arminians say what they please, recalling that I write to Christians, I will spare my labour of farther proving that faith is the free gift of God; and their opposition to the truth of the Scripture in this particular is so evident to the meanest capacity that there needs no recapitulation to present the sum of it to their understandings.

This is an excellent explanation of Pelagianism, Semi-Pelagianism, common grace, saving grace or efficacious grace, and Rome’s view of grace. Bavinck clears up the objection that many have that if God elects people for salvation, then he must have to force his will upon them, forcing their will against their will (which is a contradiction, actually), to comply with the gospel command to believe, thus doing violence to the liberty of their will. Clearly this is not the case. Bavinck clears up the difficulty just as the Flavel, Edwards and others have done. Many of the footnotes have been abbreviated in brackets.

Pelagius and Augustine

PELAGIUS AND AUGUSTINE

Pelagius strayed much farther from the doctrine of grace than any of his predecessors; he abandoned the Christian foundation on which all of them still based themselves and renewed the self-sufficient principle of pagan philosophy, specifically that of the Stoics. Not only did he sever all connections between Adam’s sin and ours, so that neither guilt nor pollution nor even death was a consequence of the first transgression, but Christianity itself lost its absolute significance. Salvation was not bound to Christ but could also be obtained by following the natural law (lex naturae) and positive law (lex positiva). Hence, in Pelagius’s theology there could be no internal grace, no regenerating grace of the Holy Spirit which not only illumined the mind but also bent the will. He admittedly did speak of grace but meant by it only: (a) natural ability, the gift of being able to will, which God grants to every person—creating grace; (b) the objective grace of the proclamation of the law or the gospel and of the example of Christ, which was directed to the human intellect and instructed people in the way of salvation—illuminating grace; and (c) the forgiveness of sins and future salvation, which would be granted to the person who believed and did good works. Grace of the first kind, therefore, was proper to all humans. Grace of the second kind was not strictly necessary but served only to make it easier for people to acquire salvation. It was not efficacious grace (gratia operans) but only a form of assistance to people. Nor was it granted to all, but only to those who had made themselves worthy of it by the proper use of their natural powers. It was not a preparatory (or arousing) grace, nor was it irresistible grace, which is more truly “fate under the name of grace.” Finally, it was not necessary and was not granted by God or by the performance of every good deed (individual acts) but only of some. Many good works were performed by humans without any grace. [G. Wiggers, etc.]

Semi-Pelagianism moderated this system. It taught that though humanity was not spiritually dead as a result of Adam’s sin, it was ill; that its freedom of the will had not been lost but was weakened; and that humans therefore—to do the good and to obtain salvation—needed the assistance of divine grace. However, the grace that illumines the mind and supports the will may never be detached from but must always be viewed in connection with the freedom of will still remaining in humans. Grace and will work together and do so in such a way that in God’s intent grace is universal and meant for all but in fact only profits those who make the proper use of their freedom of will. It is ours to will [the good], God’s to carry it to its conclusion (Nostrum est velle, Dei perficere). Sometimes, as in Paul, grace may be antecedent; yet, as a rule, the will is first. The beginning of faith and persevering in it is a matter of the will; grace is needed only for the increase of faith. God helps those who help themselves. An efficacious or irresistible grace does not exist, and even prevenient grace is usually denied. [G. Wiggers]

Proceeding, as he did, from humanity’s total moral corruption as a result of Adam’s sin and of its total inability to do any spiritual good, Augustine arrived at a completely different doctrine of grace. Frequently he also described the objective benefits—the gospel, baptism, the forgiveness of sins, and so on—with the word “grace. But this grace is not enough. Still another grace is needed, an internal and spiritual kind that illumines the intellect and bends the will. First, Augustine had taught another doctrine, namely, that though God called us, believing was something we had to do. But later, around AD 396, especially as a result of reflection on 1 Corinthians 4: 7, he arrived at a different insight.[In To Simplicianus, written from the year 386 and in On Free Will from 388 to 395] Now he writes that grace not only consists in the external preaching of the law and the gospel, which instructs and admonishes us and in that sense offers help, but is above all “a hidden inspiration of God, an inspiration of faith and the fear of God, an aid in doing well, joined to nature and to doctrine by the inspiration of a burning and most dazzling love, a supply of virtue, an inspiration of love through the Holy Spirit.”[Augustine] A fruit of election, “the effect of predestination itself,” grace is distributed according to the divine mercy, not according to merit. [G. Wiggers...]

For that reason it is of course gratuitous. It would not be grace were it not wholly free. [Augustine] The Holy Spirit blows where he wills, “not following merits but producing them.”[Augustine] Grace is anterior to all merits; it is prevenient, preparatory, antecedent, and efficacious. It “is prevenient to the unwilling to make him will.” [Augustine] It inwardly illumines the intellect and frees it from blindness.

[Augustine] It produces faith, which is a gift of God, and creates a good will, love for the good, and the capacity to do good and removes the weakness from it. “Let us acknowledge that it is by a secret, wonderful, and ineffable power operating within that God works in human hearts, not only revelations of the truth, but even good dispositions of the will.” [Augustine] This grace, furthermore, is irresistible; it inexorably and insuperably has its way with the human will. [Augustine] It is not rejected by any heart, however hard, for God by grace takes away the heart of stone and puts a heart of flesh in its place. [Augustine] The elect, who receive this grace, are not only enabled to come to Christ by it but actually also come to him.

This does not mean, however, that God by his grace suppresses or destroys the free will of humans, for, to the contrary, grace rather liberates the will from the slavery of sin. “Do we then by grace make void free will? God forbid! No, rather we establish free will. For even as the law is established by faith, so free will is not made void by grace but established, for grace restores the health of the will.”

[Augustine] For that reason Augustine could also say: “To yield our consent to God’s summons or to withhold it is the proper function of our own will,” [Augustine] for both those who believe and those who do not believe do this voluntarily: “No one believes except by the consent of the will.” So far was he removed from again putting the decision back into human hands by this statement, however, that he immediately continues by saying: “This word does not invalidate but rather confirms the word of the apostle: ‘What have you that you did not receive?’ For the soul cannot receive and possess these gifts, which are here referred to, except by yielding its consent. And thus whatever it possesses, and whatever it receives, is from God; and yet the act of receiving and having belongs, of course, to the receiver and possessor. Now, should any man be for constraining us to examine into this profound mystery, why this person is so persuaded as to yield, and that person is not, there are only two things occurring to me, which I should like to advance as my answer: ‘O the depth of the riches!’ and ‘Is there unrighteousness with God?’” [Augustine] Like the beginning, so also the progress of faith and love is due solely to God’s grace. Operative grace turns into cooperating, consequent, and subsequent grace. It effects not only the willing but also the working and the fulfilling. Without Christ we can do nothing. Therefore, “as we begin, it is said: ‘his mercy shall go before me’; as we finish, it is said: ‘his mercy shall follow me.’” [Augustine] It is God “who prepares the will and perfects in us by his cooperation what he initiates by his operation. . . . He therefore operates without us in order that we may will, but when we will, and so will that we may act, he cooperates with us. We can, however, do nothing ourselves to effect good works of piety without him either working that we may will or co-working when we will.” [Augustine] God’s mercy “follows the willing that he may not will in vain.” [Augustine] And that grace is necessary not just for the performance of some good deeds but for all. “The human will must be assisted by the grace of God to every good movement of action, speech, or thought.” [Augustine] Objectively and subjectively, from beginning to end, the work of salvation is a work of God’s grace and of his grace alone. [Wiggers, Augustine and Pelag.]

Pelagianism was condemned at the Synod of Carthage (418), whose canons were endorsed by Pope Zosimus and later by Celestine I, and again at the Council of Ephesus (431) and the Synod of Orange (529). This last synod also rejected semi-Pelagianism, and its canons were confirmed by Boniface II. Consequently, it became official church doctrine that as a result of Adam’s sin, the whole person is corrupted, and that both the beginning and the increase of faith is owing, not to ourselves or our natural powers, but to the grace of God. That grace of God not only teaches us what we must do and not do but also enables us “to know what ought to be done, even to love and to be able to do it.” It is due to the infusion, operation, inspiration, and illumination of the Holy Spirit in us, which precedes and prepares our will, reforms (*corrigen*s) our will from infidelity to faith, and causes us to will and to work. Since then, the necessity of internal and prevenient grace has been taught by all. Also the Synod of Quiercy (853), which condemned Gottschalk, confessed: “We have free will for good, preceded and aided by grace . . . freed by grace and by grace healed from corruption,” just as Rabanus said that God “by his Holy Spirit rules within and comforts without by spiritual zeal.” The scholastics followed the same track. Lombard says that by sin humans lost the freedom of the will and that now “they do not have the strength to rise up either to actually willing the good or doing it unless they are liberated and assisted by grace: liberated indeed so that they may will, and assisted so that they may actually do it.” Hence the difference between operative grace and cooperative grace is, as in Augustine, that the former “precedes the good will: by it the human will is liberated and prepared, so that it may will good things and effectively do the good.” But “cooperative grace follows the-now-good will with assistance.” According to Aquinas, a person can indeed do a number of naturally good things without grace, but that person needs grace “to be healed and to perform the good of supernatural virtue,” to love God, to keep the law, to acquire eternal life, to prepare for the grace of justification, to rise up again from sin, to refrain from sinning, and each time he or she needs new grace to know and do the good and to persevere in it. Similarly, Trent established that adults, to prepare themselves for the grace of justification, needed prevenient grace, so that those who “by sin were turned away from God, through his stimulating and assisting grace are disposed to convert themselves to their own justification.” Rome, therefore, definitely teaches the necessity of prevenient (actual, stimulating, or arousing) grace and hence rejects the Pelagianism and semi-Pelagianism that attributed the beginning and increase of faith to the powers of [unregenerate] human nature.

SEMI-PELAGIANISM?

There is reason to ask, however, whether Rome, in speaking of prevenient grace, has in mind anything more than the external call of the gospel, which exerts moral impact on the intellect and will, and which was also recognized by Pelagius and his followers. Sometimes, in any case, its description of that grace is very weak: Trent identifies it with the calling “whereby they are called without any existing merits on their part.” Yet Rome understands by prevenient grace an inward influence of the Holy Spirit on intellect and will. The Synod of Orange spoke of an infusion and operation in us of the Holy Spirit. Trent called it “arousing” or “stimulating” (excitans) and described it in the words: “God touches the heart of man through the illumination of the Holy Spirit.” Aquinas says that the grace by which an adult prepares himself or herself for justification consists not in “some habitual grace” but in “an operation of God by which the soul is turned toward himself,” some “assistance of God moving the soul within or inspiring a good purpose.” Bonaventure sometimes also calls it a “grace freely given” and says that humans need it to prepare for justification and that it “arouses” (excitat) their free will. Bellarmine describes it as a “grace of special assistance,” as a “motion” or “action by which God moves a human toward activity” and as “special assistance,” grace that arouses and assists extrinsically,” contrasting it with “indwelling grace,” “infused grace,” “the Holy Spirit dwelling in us.” Among theologians there was much disagreement also about the characteristic nature of that preparatory grace. Thomists considered it a “physical quality supernaturally infused,” “a certain physical entity.”

Molina, Lessius, Ripalda viewed it as “an illumination of the mind and an inspiration of the will.” Suárez, Tanner, and others thought that it was not anything created but that the Holy Spirit himself moved the will immediately. Yet it is generally viewed as “gratuitous assistance,” “an internal and supernatural gift of God,” “an illumination of the mind,” and “an immediate movement of the will,” which conveys to humans not only “moral strengths” but also “physical powers” and enables them to prepare for justification.⁷⁰ [for more on Aquinas’ views and the donum superadditum, go to codeaquinas1]

⁷⁰On this difference in understanding “actual grace” (gratia actualis), cf. numerous authors listed... Stated somewhat more precisely, the issue was this: on the one hand, these theologians unanimously rejected the opinion of Lombard (Sentences, I, dist. 17–18), who equated grace with love and love with the Holy Spirit; on the other hand, there was also little openness to Dechamps’s opinion (in Heinrich and Gutberlet, Dogmatische Theologie, VIII, 23) that grace consists in the illumination of the mind and not in the inspiration of the will, since the will always follows the intellect. Hence, according to everyone, grace consisted in the illumination of the mind and the inspiration of the will. But is grace totally exhausted in these two operations, and does it totally coincide with them? Were they directly and immediately effected by the Spirit in people? Or was there still something else between them? Did the Holy Spirit perhaps first infuse in them a “physical and supernatural quality,” not “habitual but fluid,” of which “the illumination of the mind” and “the inspiration of the will” was then the result? The latter is the view of the neo-Thomists and is, for example, accepted by Heinrich and Gutberlet, and Manzoni.

But with that Rome’s rejection of semi-Pelagianism was over: in any case, in a roundabout way it was again smuggled back in. For, in the first place, Rome taught that the freedom of the will, though weakened by sin, is not lost; [Synod of Orange, 529] [go to codefreewill1 for more on this] even without grace humans can perform many naturally and civilly good works, which are absolutely not sinful. They can know and love God as creator and lead a decent life. And even though in the long run it is difficult to observe the whole law and to resist all temptations, as such this is not impossible. The “natural man” as such is a complete human. Second, Rome departs from Augustine in that it views “prevenient grace” as a grace that confers the capacity to believe but not the act of believing itself. On the contrary, prevenient (actual) grace is granted to all adults within hearing of the gospel, but it lies in their power to accept or reject it. “According to the Catholic faith,” said the Council of Orange II, “we believe this also, that after grace has been received through baptism, all the baptized with the help and cooperation of Christ can and ought to fulfill what pertains to the salvation of the soul, if they will labor faithfully.” [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion, #169] And Trent declared that humans can consent to prevenient grace and cooperate with it but also reject it. [Council of Trent, session VI, canon 5 and canon 6] Among theologians, however, there was much disagreement on this point. The Augustinians, among whom Berti is the most notable, teach that prevenient (actual, sufficient) grace confers the capacity (posse) but not the will (velle) to believe. Needed—in order that people may be not only capable but also desirous of believing and may actually believe, and that sufficient grace may in fact become efficacious—is a “victorious delight” (delectatio victrix) that overcomes “carnal delight” (delectatio carnalis), which is its opposite, and which transforms “being able” into “being willing.” Hence the will must be transformed by “victorious delight,” which is stronger than desire (concupiscentia). Thomists, [such as] Báñez, Gonet, Lemos, Billuart, and others, similarly say that sufficient grace confers the capacity but not the will to believe; to produce the latter must be augmented by a “physical action of God,” that is, a “physical advancement” or “predetermination.”

Augustinians and Thomists accordingly agree in teaching that efficacious grace depends not on the human will but on grace itself and that the act of believing infallibly follows “victorious delight.” They differ, however, in that the latter accept an essential, objective distinction between “sufficient” and “efficacious” grace, whereas the former believe that the two do not basically differ but that there are degrees in grace, so that a grace that is only “sufficient” for one person may—because of a lesser hardening—be efficacious in another. But one cannot say that this idea does justice to the Tridentine “capacity to assent or to reject.” The Molinists therefore made the efficacy of grace depend on the human will, and Congruists like Bellarmine let it be determined by a “foreseen congruence or incongruence of grace” with the condition or circumstances of those to whom at any given time grace was offered.

Catholic doctrine comes down to the following: in baptism the children born in the church receive regeneration (justification; infused grace) but those who hear the gospel at a later age receive “sufficient grace,” which consists in an illumination of the intellect and a reinforcement of the will by the Holy Spirit. A person can reject this grace but also assent to it. If he or she assents to it, this “arousing” grace (gratia excitans) passes into aiding or cooperative grace. A person works with it to prepare himself or herself for justification (gratia infusa; habitualis). This preparation has the following seven components: that humans, aided by God’s grace, begin to believe God’s Word, discover that they are sinners, learn to hope for God’s mercy, begin to love him, begin to hate sin, resolve to have themselves baptized and to lead a new life. [Council of Trent VI, 6] Faith here does not occupy a central place but is coordinate with the other six preparations for the grace of justification. It is, accordingly, no more than an ascent to the truth of Christianity, that is, to the doctrine of the church (unformed faith), and only acquires its justifying power by love (faith formed by love), which is imparted by the grace infused. Taken by itself it cannot justify; it is only called justifying faith because it is the beginning of human salvation, the foundation and root of all justification, that is, the first of the above preparations. Now if a person has thus prepared himself or herself and has done what was in him or her [materially in the proposition: “If a person does what is in him, God gives him grace.”]—whether this consists in the proper use of his or her grace-sustained [T. Aquinas] or natural [ibid] powers—God cannot refuse the infused grace. Admittedly, the person has not merited this grace, for the grace given far surpasses it in value; yet it is fair that God should, by the standard of a merit of congruity, reward those who thus do their very best with infused grace.⁸²

⁸²According to Ripalda, Vázquez, and others, pre-Tridentine theologians generally taught that people could with their natural powers prepare themselves positively for the reception of grace. There is disagreement only over Aquinas’s opinion and his view of the expression “doing what is in oneself.” After Trent, however, theologians usually construed the expression a bit differently. It is true that over against Pelagianism and semi-Pelagianism, Rome tried to retain the absolute unmeritability of the first grace (gratia prima). The grace of God is not granted according to our merit, neither according to a merit of condignity nor according to a merit of congruity, as (since Eck) merit was usually differentiated (J. Pohle, Dogmatik, II, 401). This is why today the expression “facere quod in se est” is generally interpreted by saying that the person who makes the proper use of his or her natural powers prepares himself or herself negatively for grace, in the sense that he or she does not pose an obstacle to grace. And some, like Vázquez, Glossner, and others, even reject this negative preparation.

This is granted in baptism and consists in the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, the infusion of supernatural virtues, participation in the divine nature, and is followed by the forgiveness of sins, which jointly with infused grace constitutes the two parts of justification.[Aquinas] Hence, in the theology of Rome, the forgiveness of sins is the negative counterpart of a person's positive renewal. Sin is forgiven because and insofar as it has been eradicated.

Now if in baptism a person has become the recipient of this infused grace, he or she can in fact lose it again as a result of mortal sins and also must do penance for venial sins, not only with contrition of the heart but also with oral confession and penance. Nonetheless, in infused grace a person has received the supernatural power to do good works and hence all subsequent grace, indeed even to merit eternal life according to a merit of condignity. For the good works one performs flow from a supernatural principle and are therefore deserving of a supernatural reward. From this perspective, finally, the underlying aim of this Catholic doctrine of grace becomes clear. Grace serves only to make it possible for human beings to again merit heavenly beatitude [go too codeB]. That was basically the case even in Augustine. In his work, grace, however granted without merit, consisted primarily not in the forgiveness of sins but in regeneration, in the infusion of love, which renders a person capable of doing good works and thus of obtaining eternal life. “[Humans] therefore receive righteousness that, on account of it, they may deserve to receive blessedness.” While merits do not precede grace and faith, they do follow them. [Augustine] “Merit is prepared by believing.” “Grace precedes merit: grace does not arise from merit but merit arises from grace; grace precedes all merits in order that the gifts of God may follow my merits.” Similarly, Ambrose wrote: “Grace itself deserves to be increased in order that, having been increased, it may also deserve to be perfected, one's will accompanying, not leading [it], following, not preceding [it].”

Later, when the doctrine of the image of God as “superadded gift” [see code294a] arose, this [trend] became even worse. The concept of grace underwent an important modification. Grace then became something that was needed not only for fallen humanity; by it, even Adam had to be elevated from being an ordinary “natural” human to being the image of God. After the fall, therefore, grace played a double role: first, to redeem humans from sin (the grace of healing, medicinal grace) and, second, to raise them up to the supernatural order (elevating grace). [Aquinas] For the former, grace is only accidentally necessary—only in a moral sense; for the latter, it is absolutely and “physically” necessary. The latter, accordingly, increasingly forces the former into the background. The ethical antithesis between sin and grace yields to the “physical” difference between natural and supernatural. By grace the Catholic Church does not, at least not primarily, mean the free favor of God by which he forgives sins. Instead, it takes grace to mean a quality infused in human beings by which they become partakers in the divine nature, [Aquinas] a supernatural, created, hyperphysical power—magically infused into natural humans through the mediation of priest and sacrament—which lifts them up to the supernatural order and enables them, by the performance of good works, to merit all the following graces as well and in the end heavenly blessedness by the merit of condignity [merit or worthiness].

Pelagianism and the Order of Salvation

And so, on the day of Pentecost, he sends that Spirit in order by the Spirit to apply all his benefits to his church. The Holy Spirit does not acquire those benefits nor add a single benefit, for Christ has accomplished everything. In no respect is the Spirit the meriting cause of our salvation. That is Christ alone, in whom the fullness of the Godhead dwells bodily and whose work therefore does not need to be augmented or improved. On the contrary, the Holy Spirit takes everything from Christ: as the Son came to glorify the Father, so the Holy Spirit in turn came down to glorify the Son. To that Son he bears witness; out of his fullness, he communicates grace upon grace; he leads people to that Son and through the Son to the Father. He applies all Christ's benefits, to each in his measure, at his time, according to his order. He does not stop his activity before he has made the fullness of Christ to dwell in his church and the church has reached maturity, "the measure of the full stature of Christ" (Eph. 4: 13). The activity of the Holy Spirit is therefore nothing but an applicatory one. The order of redemption is the application of salvation (applicatio salutis). The relevant question, therefore, is decidedly not, What must a person do to be saved? but only, What is God doing in his grace to make the church participate in the complete salvation acquired by Christ? Also the "application of salvation" is a work of God that must be viewed theologically, not anthropologically, which from beginning to end ("economically" speaking) has the Holy Spirit as its author and may be called his special work. The whole "way of salvation" is the "applicatory grace of the Holy Spirit."

Against this view of the order of salvation and from the side of Pelagianism, however, the objection is always raised that in that way the right of humanity is denied, human self-activity is suppressed, and an ungodly life is fostered. Insofar as this objection is fundamentally calculated to overturn the scriptural testimony that by the works of the law no human being will be justified (Rom. 3: 20), it is not, from the Christian position, admissible. Those who would to some extent agree with it would at the same time and to the same extent leave the scriptural basis behind. Insofar as it is really an objection and deserves consideration, it is untrue and based on misunderstanding. For the view of the "application of salvation" as God's work does not exclude but includes the full recognition of all those moral factors that, under the guidance of God's providence, affect the intellect and heart of the unconverted person. They may not suffice for salvation, as Scripture and experience clearly indicate, but on a truly reformational position there can be no failure to appreciate their value, even for the work of grace. It is God himself, after all, who thus leads his human children, witnesses to them, and showers benefits down on them from heaven [cf. Acts 14: 17] that they should seek God in hope of finding him [cf. Acts 17: 27]. We do not see, moreover, why the Holy Spirit, who calls people to faith and repentance by his Word, should nullify that moral effect of the Word on the human heart and conscience that Pelagianism attributes to it.

Reformed doctrine contains not less but more than what is recognized by Pelagius and his followers. They think they can be content with that moral effect. Augustine and his allies, however, while considering it inadequate, still fully included it in the Holy Spirit's working of grace. In addition, the application of salvation is and remains a work of the Spirit, a work of the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of Christ, and is therefore never coercive and violent but always spiritual, lovely, and gentle, treating humans not as blocks of wood but as rational beings, illuminating, persuading, drawing, and bending them. The Spirit causes their darkness to yield to the light and replaces their spiritual powerlessness with spiritual power. Grace and sin are opposites; the latter is overcome only by the power of the former, but as soon as and to the same degree that the power of sin is broken, the opposition between God and humans ceases: It is God's Spirit who "bears witness with our spirit that we are children of God" (cf. Rom. 8: 16). "I no longer live, but Christ lives in me; the life I now live in the body, I live by faith in the Son of God" (cf. Gal. 2: 20). "It is God who is at work in you, enabling you both to will and to work for his good pleasure" and who himself wants us to work out our salvation "with fear and trembling" (cf. Phil. 2: 12–13). This theological view is so far removed from fostering an ungodly life that, instead, it alone guarantees the reality of a new Christian life, assures believers of the certainty of their salvation, infallibly vouches for the victory of the kingdom of God, and causes the work of the Father and of the Son to attain completion in that of the Spirit. Pelagianism, by contrast, makes everything wobbly and uncertain— even the victory of the good and the triumph of the kingdom of God— because it hangs everything on the incalculable arbitrariness of humans. Standing up for the rights of humankind, it tramples on the rights of God and for humans ends up with no more than the right to be fickle. But the Reformation, standing up as it did for the rights of God, has by that very fact again gained recognition for the rights of humankind. For here, too, the word of Scripture applies: "those who honor me I will honor, and those who despise me shall be treated with contempt" [1 Sam. 2: 30]. The theological view of the order of salvation gathers up all the good that is concealed in the anthropological view, but the reverse does not happen. Those who start with God can also do justice to humans as his rational and moral creatures; but those who start with humans and first of all seek to secure their rights and liberties always end up limiting the power and grace of God.

Notes on God's immutability, sovereignty and Arminian's view of man's will

This immutability of God, however, was frequently combated from the side of both deism and pantheism. In the opinion of Epicurus the gods totally resemble excellent human beings, who make changes with respect to location, activity, and thought (etc.); and according to Heraclitus and later the Stoics, the deity as the immanent cause of the world was also caught up in its perpetual flux.[25] Opposition to God's immutability in Christian theology was of the same nature. On the one hand, there is the Pelagianism, Socinianism, Remonstrantism, and rationalism, which especially opposes the immutability of God's knowing and willing and makes the will of God dependent on—and hence change in accordance with—the conduct of humans. Especially Vorstius, in his work On God and His Attributes, criticized the immutability of God. He made a distinction between God's essence, which is simple and unchangeable, and God's will, which being free does not will everything eternally and does not always will the same thing.[26] Bavinck, God & Creation, Vol. 2 pg 155

Van Til states:

In saying that God is a Spirit we do not think of some vague generic concept of spirituality of which God is one particular instance and man another. God is the absolute Spirit. He is the self-contained Spirit. He does not need materiality over against himself in order to individuate himself. He is the self-individuated Spirit. [In other words, I think was Van Til is saying here, that God is not in an act of becoming via a correlative relationship with his creation – i.e., a pantheistic view. He is entirely distinct from his creation and he already is! and that by or of himself, a se. He is not becoming more conscious of himself nor coming into his own so to speak (becoming individuated), through a correlative relationship by being one with creation in the ongoing changes characteristic of all creatures. For one thing, God is immutable.] Van Til, Systematic Theology, pg 369

Arminian liberty vs. God's Sovereignty and Almighty Power
A Display of Arminianism by John Owen

Arminian error on human free will and liberty vs. God's Sovereignty – my comments in blue] excerpts from A Display of Arminianism, Chp 12

by John Owen

“Herein,” saith Arminius [founder of Arminianism], “consisteth the liberty of the will, that all things required to enable it to will anything being accomplished, it still remains indifferent to will or not.” And all of them at the synod: “There is,” say they, “accompanying the will of man an inseparable property, which we call liberty, from whence the will is termed a power, which, when all things pre-required as necessary to operation are fulfilled, may will anything, or not will it;” that is, our free-wills have such an absolute and uncontrollable power in the territory of all human actions, that no influence of God’s providence, no certainty of his decree, no unchangeableness of his purpose, can sway it at all in its free determinations, or have any power with his highness to cause him to will or resolve on any such act as God by him intended to produce. Take an instance in the great work of our conversion. “All unregenerate men,” saith Arminius, “have, by virtue of their free-will, a power of resisting the Holy Spirit, of rejecting the offered grace of God, of contemning the counsel of God concerning themselves, of refusing the gospel of grace, of not opening the heart to him that knocketh.” What a stout idol is this, whom neither the Holy Spirit, the grace and counsel of God, the calling of the gospel, the knocking at the door of the heart, can move at all, or in the least measure prevail against him! Woe be unto us, then, if when God calls us our free-will be not in good temper, and well disposed to hearken unto him!

for it seems there is no dealing with it by any other ways, though powerful and almighty. “For grant,” saith Corvinus [an Arminian], “all the operations of grace which God can use in our conversion, yet conversion remaineth so in our own free power that we can be not converted; that is, we can either turn or not turn ourselves;” where the idol plainly challengeth the Lord to work his utmost, and tells him that after he hath so done he will do what he please. His infallible prescience, his powerful predetermination, the moral efficacy of the gospel, the infusion of grace, the effectual operation of the Holy Spirit, all are nothing, not at all available in helping or furthering our independent wills in their proceedings. Well, then, in what estate will you have the idol placed? 210“In such a one wherein he may be suffered to sin, or to do well, at his pleasure,” as the same author intimates. It seems, then, as to sin, so nothing is required for him to be able to do good but God’s permission? No! For the Remonstrants (as they speak of themselves) “do always suppose a free power of obeying or not obeying, as well in those who do obey as in those who do not obey;” — that he that is obedient may therefore be counted obedient, because he obeyeth when he could not obey, and so on the contrary:” where all the praise of our obedience, whereby we are made to differ from others, is ascribed to ourselves alone, and that free power that is in us. Now, this they mean not of any one act of obedience, but of faith itself, and the whole consummation thereof. “For if a man should say, that every man in the world hath a power of believing if he will, and of attaining salvation, and that this power is settled in his nature, what argument have you to confute him?” saith Arminius triumphantly to Perkins; where the sophistical innovator as plainly confounds grace and nature as ever did Pelagius. That, then, which the Arminians claim here in behalf of their free-will is, an absolute independence on God’s providence in doing anything, and of his grace in doing that which is good, — a self-sufficiency in all its operations, a plenary indifferency of doing what we will, this or that, as being neither determined to the one nor inclined to the other by any overruling influence from heaven. So that the good acts of our wills have no dependence on God’s providence as they are acts, nor on his grace as they are good; but in both regards proceed from such a principle within us as is no way moved by any superior agent. Now, the first of these we deny unto our wills, because they are created; and the second, because they are corrupted. Their creation hinders them from doing anything of themselves without the assistance of God’s providence; and their corruption, from doing anything that is good without his grace. A self-sufficiency for operation, without the effectual motion of Almighty God, the first cause of all things, we can allow neither to men nor angels, unless we intend to make them gods; and a power of doing good, equal unto that they have of doing evil, we must not grant to man by nature, unless we will deny the fall of Adam, and fancy ourselves still in paradise. But let us consider these things apart.

code306a First, Everything that is independent of any else in operation is purely active, and so consequently a god; for nothing but a divine will can be a pure act, possessing such a liberty by virtue of its own essence. Every created will must have a liberty by participation, which includeth such an imperfect potentiality as cannot be brought into act without some premotion (I may so say) of a superior agent. Neither doth this motion, being extrinsical, at all prejudice the true liberty of the will, which requireth, indeed, that the internal principle of operation be active and free, but not that that principle be not moved to that operation by an outward superior agent. Nothing in this sense can have an independent principle of operation which hath not an independent being. It is no more necessary to the nature of a free cause, from whence a free action must proceed, that it be the first beginning of it, than it is necessary to the nature of a cause that it be the first cause.

Secondly, If the free acts of our wills are so subservient to the providence of God as that he useth them to what end he will, and by them effecteth many of his purposes, then they cannot of themselves be so absolutely independent as to have in their own power every necessary circumstance and condition, that they may use or not use at their pleasure. Now, the former is proved by all those reasons and texts of Scripture I before produced to show that the providence of God overruleth the actions and determineth the wills of men freely to do that which he hath appointed. And, truly, were it otherwise, God's dominion over the most things that are in the world were quite excluded; he had not power to determine that any one thing should ever come to pass which hath any reference to the wills of men.

Thirdly, All the acts of the will being positive entities, were it not previously moved by God himself, "in whom we live, move, and have our being," must needs have their essence and existence solely from the will itself; which is thereby made αὐτὸ ὄν, a first and supreme cause, endued with an underived being. And so much to that particular.

-- First, for the nature of grace: "God hath appointed to save believers by grace, — that is, a soft and sweet persuasion, convenient and agreeing to their free-will, — and not by any almighty action," saith Arminius. It seems something strange, that "the carnal mind being enmity against God," and the will enthralled to sin, and full of wretched opposition to all his ways, yet God should have no other means to work them over unto him but some persuasion that is sweet, agreeable, and congruous unto them in that estate wherein they are. Great stuff, I wish to merely add my own thoughts on the concepts of free will. The doctrine of prayer upends any belief of the doctrine of free will. Let us look to the Lord's prayer. Jesus opens up his prayer with thy kingdom come THY Will be done (as opposed to ours)..He ends with Lead us Not into Temptation and deliver us from evil. Prayer is a plea to the Sovereign God to align our hearts (wills) and to control our lives (actions) in such a way that brings Him glory. It is the recognition of His sovereignty over every aspect of our life (especially our wills). If one is willing to reject the sovereignty of God in salvation, on the basis of free will, they must then logically conclude that prayer is rendered wholly ineffective; for God can not impede upon the free choice and actions of man. And so the best hope for change would not be prayer to God, but pleas to men. The doctrine of God's sovereignty is not something that can be dabbled in an applied to only the areas we find comfortable; he either is all Sovereign or he is not, you cannot have it both ways - Blake Hart

The Son upholding and disposing all things - John Owen p 104-108 v19 (127-132 online)

This will help you understand the correct view on what man's creaturely freedom consists of in relation to God's sovereignty. This is amazing and will clear up many wrong presuppositions and conceits about this subject which will then make clear the truth of unconditional election, man's depravity and other like doctrines.

Our next inquiry is after the manner whereby the Son thus holdeth and disposeth of all things. He doth it “by the word of his power,” — τῷ ῥήματι τῆς δυνάμεως. Ρημα in the New Testament is used in the same latitude and extent with rbek in the Old. Sometimes it denotes any matter or thing, be it good or evil, as Matthew 5:11, 12:36, 18:16; Mark 9:32; Luke 1:37, 2:15, 18:34; — a word of blessing by Providence, Matthew 4:4; — any word spoken, Matthew 26:75, 27:14; Luke 9:45; — of promise, Luke 1:38; — and Ρηματα βλασφημα, “blasphemous words,” Acts 6:11; — the word of God, the word of prophecy, Luke 3:2; Romans 10:17; Ephesians 5:26, 6:17; 1 Peter 1:25; — an authoritative command, Luke 5:5. In this epistle it is used variously. In this only it differs from λόγος [reason in Greek according to Google], that it never denotes the eternal or essential Word of God. That which in this place is denoted by it, with its adjunct of της δυναμewς, the λόγος ενδιάθετος, or the divine power, executing the counsels of the will and wisdom of God, or the efficacy of God's providence, whereby he worketh and effecteth all things according to the counsel of his will. See Genesis 1:3; Psalm 147:15, 18, 148:8; Isaiah 30:31. And this is indifferently expressed by ρημα and λογος. Hence the same thing which Paul expresseth by the one of them, Hebrews 11:3, Πιστει νοουμεν χατμρτισθαι τους αιωνας ρηματι Θεου, "By faith we know that the worlds were made by the word of God," Peter doth by the other, 2 Peter 3:5, Συνεστωσα τω του Θεου λογω.

Now, this efficacy of divine Providence is called the word of God, to intimate that as rulers accomplish their will by a word of command, in and about things subject to their pleasure, Matthew 8:9, so doth God accomplish his whole mind and will in all things by his power. And therefore τής δυνάμεως, "of his power," is here added by way of difference and distinction, to show what word it is that the apostle intends. It is not Λογος ουσιωδης, "the essential Word" of God, who is the person spoken of; nor λογος προφοριχος, the word spoken by him in the revelation of himself, his mind and will; but a word that is effectual and operative, — namely, the putting forth of his divine power, with easiness and authority accomplishing his will and purpose in and by all things [aka, his secret will vs. his prescriptive will.].

This in the vision of Ezekiel is the communication of a spirit of life to the cherubs and wheels, to act and move them as seems good to Him by whom they are guided; for as it is very probable that the apostle in these words, setting forth the divine power of the Son in ruling and governing the whole creation, did intend to mind the Hebrews that the Lord Christ, the Son, is he who was represented in the form of a man unto Ezekiel, ruling and disposing of all things, and the γDævæ, "the Almighty," whose voice was heard amongst the wheels, so it is most certain that the same thing is intended in both places. And this expression of "upholding" (or "disposing of") "all things by the word of his power," doth fully declare the glorious providence emblematically expressed in that vision. The Son being over all things made by himself, as on a throne over the cherubim and wheels, influenceth the whole creation with his power, communicating unto it respectively subsistence, life, and motion, acting, ruling, and disposing of all according to the counsel of his own will.

This, then, is that which the apostle assigns unto the Son, thereby to set out the dignity of his person, that the Hebrews might well consider all things before they deserted his doctrine. He is one that is partaker essentially of the nature of God, "being the brightness of glory and the express image of his Father's person," who exerciseth and manifesteth his divine power both in the creation of all things, as also in the supportment, rule, and disposal of all, after they are made by him. And hence will follow, as his power and authority to change the Mosaical institutions, so his truth and faithfulness in the revelation of the will of God by him made; which it was their duty to embrace and adhere unto. The several passages of this verse are all of them conjoined by the apostle, and used unto the same general end and purpose; but themselves are of such distinct senses and importance, considered absolutely and apart, that we shall in our passage take out the observations which they singly afford unto us. And from these last words we may learn: —

I. Our Lord Jesus Christ, as the Son of God, hath the weight of the whole creation upon his hand, and disposeth of it by his power and wisdom.

II. Such is the nature and condition of the universe, that it could not subsist a moment, nor could anything in it act regularly unto its appointed end, without the continual supportment, guidance, influence, and disposal of the Son of God.

We may briefly consider the sum of both these jointly, to manifest the power and care of Christ over us, as also the weak, dependent condition of the whole creation in and by itself. The things of this creation can no more support, act, and dispose themselves, than they could at first make themselves out of nothing. The greatest cannot conserve itself by its power, or greatness, or order; nor the least by its distance from opposition. Were there not a mighty hand under them all and every one, they would all sink into confusion and nothing; did not an effectual power influence them, they would become a slothful heap. It is true, God hath in the creation of all things implanted in every particle of the creation a special natural inclination and disposition, according unto which it is ready to act, move, or work regularly; but he hath not placed this nature and power absolutely in them, and independently of his own power and operation. [This is a very important distinction! i.e., man is not autonomous as most people and Arminians suppose which leads them to think that their will is totally self-directed.] The sun is endued with a nature to produce all the glorious effects of light and heat that we behold or conceive, the fire to burn, the wind to blow, and all creatures also in the like manner; but yet neither could sun, or fire, or wind preserve themselves in their being, nor retain the principles of their operations, did not the Son of God, by a constant, continual emanation of his eternal power, uphold and preserve them; nor could they produce any one effect by all their actings, did not he work in them and by them. And so is it with the sons of men, with all agents whatever, whether natural and necessary, or free and proceeding in their operations by election and choice. Hence Paul tells us that “in God we live, and move, and have our being,” Acts 17:28. He had before asserted that he had “made of one blood all nations,” verse 26; that is, all men of one, whom he first created. To which he adds, that we may know that he hath not so left us to stand by ourselves on that first foundation as that we have any power or ability, being made, to do or act anything without him, that in him, — that is, in his power, care, providence, and by virtue of his effectual influence, — our lives are supported and continued, that we are acted, moved, and enabled thereby to do all we do, be it never so small, wherein there is any effect of life or motion. So Daniel tells Belshazzar that his “breath” and “all his ways” were in the hand of God, Daniel 5:23 ; — his breath, in the supportment and continuance of his being; and his ways, in his effectual guidance and disposal of them. Peter speaks to the same purpose in general concerning the fabric of the heavens, earth, and sea, 2 Peter 3:5.

Now, what is thus spoken of God in general is by Paul particularly applied unto the Son: Colossians 1:16, 17, “All things were created by him, and for him: and he is before all things, and by him all things consist.” He did not only make all things, as we have declared, and that for himself and his own glory, but also he continues at the head of them; so that by him and by his power they consist, — are preserved in their present state and condition, kept from dissolution, in their singular existence, and in a consistency among themselves.

And the reason hereof is taken, first, from the limited, finite, dependent condition of the creation, and the absolute necessity that it should be so. It is utterly impossible, and repugnant to the very nature and being of God, that he should make, create, or produce any thing without himself, that should have either a self-subsistence or a self-sufficiency, or be independent on himself. All these are natural and essential properties of the divine nature. Where they are, there is God; so that no creature can be made partaker of them. [This discovers the error of people's thinking that they think themselves independent beings, that they are in effect saying that they are God when in fact they are blind, naked, worms of the dust wholly dependent creatures. This is the key issue here when trying to see the vanity of Arminian thinking and the thinking of the unregenerate.] When we name a creature, we name that which hath a derived and dependent being. And that which cannot subsist in and by itself cannot act so neither.

Secondly, The energetical efficacy of God's providence, joined with his infinite wisdom in caring for the works of his own hands, the products of his power, requires that it should be so. He worketh yet. He did not create the world to leave it to an uncertain event, — to stand by and to see what would become of it, to see whether it would return to its primitive nothing (of which cask it always smells strongly), or how it would be tossed up and down by the adverse and contrary qualities which were implanted in the several of it; but the same power and wisdom that produced it doth still accompany it, powerfully piercing through every parcel and particle of it. To fancy a providence in God, without a continual energetical operation; or a wisdom without a constant care, inspection, and oversight of the works of his hands; is not to have apprehensions of the living God, but to erect an idol in our own imaginations.

Thirdly, This work is peculiarly assigned unto the Son, not only as he is the eternal power and wisdom of God, but also because by his interposition, as undertaking the work of mediation, he reprieved the world from an immediate dissolution upon the first entrance of sin and disorder, that it might continue, as it were, the great stage for the mighty works of God's grace, wisdom, and love, to be wrought on. Hence the care of the continuance of the creation and the disposal of it is delegated unto him, as he that hath undertaken to bring forth and consummate the glory of God in it, notwithstanding the great breach made upon it by the sin of angels and men. This is the substance of the apostle's discourse, Colossians 1:15- 20. Having asserted him to be the image of God, in the sense before opened and declared, and to have made all things, he affirms that all things have also their present consistency in him and by his power, and must have so, until the work of reconciliation of all things unto God being accomplished, the glory of God may be fully retrieved and established for ever.

1. We may see from hence the vanity of expecting any thing from the creatures, but only what the Lord Christ is pleased to communicate unto us by them. They that cannot sustain, move, or act themselves, by any power, virtue, or strength of their own, are very unlikely by and of themselves to afford any real assistance, relief, or help unto others. They all abide and exist severally, and consist together, in their order and operation, by the word of the power of Christ; and what he will communicate by them, that they will yield and afford, and nothing else. In themselves they are broken cisterns that will hold no water; what he drops into them may be derived unto us, and no more. They who rest upon them or rest in them, without the consideration of their constant dependence on Christ, will find at length all their hopes disappointed, and all their enjoyments vanish into nothing.

2. Learn hence also the full, absolute, plenary self-sufficiency and sovereignty of the Son, our Savior. We showed before the universality of his kingdom and moral rule over the whole creation; but this is not all. A king hath a moral rule over his subjects in his kingdom: but he doth not really and physically give them their being and existence; he doth not uphold and act them at his pleasure; but every one of them stands therein upon the same or an equal bottom with himself. He can, indeed, by the permission of God, take away the lives of any of them, and so put an end to all their actings and operations in this world; but he cannot give them life or continue their lives at his pleasure one moment, or make them so much as to move a finger. But with the Lord Christ it is otherwise. He not only rules over all the whole creation, disposing of it according to the rule and law of his own counsel and pleasure, but also they all have their beings, natures, inclinations, and lives from him; by his power are they continued unto them, and all their actions are influenced thereby. And this, as it argues an all-sufficiency in himself, so an absolute sovereignty over all other things. And this should teach us our constant dependence on him and our universal subjection unto him.

3. And this abundantly discovers the vanity and folly of them who make use of the creation in an opposition unto the Lord Christ and his peculiar interest in this world. His own power is the very ground that they stand upon in their opposition unto him, and all things which they use against him consist in him. They hold their lives absolutely at the pleasure of him whom they oppose; and they act against him without whose continual supportment and influence they could neither live nor act one moment: which is the greatest madness and most contemptible folly imaginable.

This discourse goes into great detail on the subject of man's total depravity; what it really means. This is very helpful for self-examination and to help you see the worth of what Christ really did, the gravity of it, which when seen more clearly, will lead you to a more devout worship and a more circumspect walk with God.

As extensive as original sin is in humanity as a whole, so it is also in the individual person. It holds sway over the whole person, over mind and will, heart and conscience, soul and body, over all one's capacities and powers. A person's heart is evil from his or her youth and a source of all sorts of evils (Gen. 6: 5; 8: 21; Ps. 51: 5; Jer. 17: 9; Ezek. 36: 26; Mark 7: 21). One cannot renew one's self (Jer. 13: 23; Ezek. 16: 6), understand the things of God (1 Cor. 2: 14), or submit to the law of God (John 8: 34, 36; Rom. 6: 17, 20; 8: 7), and one is dead through trespasses and sins (Eph. 2: 1). Rebirth, accordingly, is a prerequisite to entrance into the kingdom of God (John 3: 3). The whole of salvation is objectively and subjectively a work of divine grace (John 6: 44; 15: 5; 1 Cor. 4: 7; 15: 10; Phil. 2: 13; etc.). Upon these firm pronouncements of Holy Scripture, Augustine and his followers, and later the Reformers, built the doctrine of humanity's incapacity for good. Inasmuch as in Adam all of human nature has been corrupted, nothing truly good can any longer proceed from it, any more than a bad tree can produce good fruit. Human persons are now under the hard necessity of not being able not to sin. Their virtues are vices rather than virtues; they are by nature inclined to all evil, inclined even to hate God and their neighbor. This reasoning is undoubtedly hard, and it is not surprising that it has at all times encountered strong contradiction. Besides the natural aversion that spontaneously arises in the human heart against the doctrine of the total moral depravity of humans, there is undoubtedly also much incomprehension on the part of its opponents. Certainly, if this doctrine is clearly elucidated, it is daily confirmed by everyone's experience and vindicated by the witness of its opponents themselves.

1. The teaching of Scripture, after all, is not that every human lives at all times in all possible actual sins and is in fact guilty of violating all God's commandments. It only refers to the deepest inclination, the innermost disposition, the fundamental directedness of human nature and confesses that it is not turned toward God but away from him. If a human being is an organic unity, then one of these two things has to be true. Many people brush this aside by saying that humans are by nature neither or both at the same time, [Hegel] but this betrays a lack of reflection, is contrary to the nature of the good, and was therefore very seriously opposed even by Kant. [Kant] A person who commits one sin is in principle guilty of violating all the commandments; and a person who truly possesses one virtue in principle possesses them all. The human being is at the center of his or her being either good or evil—there is no third option.

2. Sin, however, is not a substance. [If it was, then God would have created it and been the originator of it which he can't be.] It does indeed inhabit and infect all of us, but it is not and cannot be the essence of our humanity. Also, after the fall, we human beings remained humans. We have retained our reason, conscience, and will, can therefore control our lower sensual drives and inclinations, and thus force them in the direction of virtue. Augustine, who called the virtues of Gentiles "splendid vices," candidly acknowledged this truth. Many of their actions not only do not deserve to be reprimanded but are worthy of our praise and emulation. [G.F. Wiggers] While Lutherans spoke of the "natural man" as stocks and blocks in matters spiritual, in the so-called lower hemisphere of civic life they still credited "him" with all sorts of powers for good. [F.H.R. Frank] And more than them all, Calvin and the Reformed have honored the virtues of unbelievers and frequently held them up as examples to Christians themselves. The doctrine of the total corruption of human nature by no means implies, therefore, that the sinful disposition that lies at the bottom of the human heart always erupts in the kind of deeds that betray clear hostility and hatred toward God and one's neighbor. There are various circumstances that intervene and keep the disposition from fully expressing itself. Not only are many sinful deeds restrained by the sword of the government, common civil decency, public opinion, the fear of disgrace and punishment, and so on, but a variety of factors—such as the natural love still inherent in every person; the moral character fostered by upbringing and struggle; favorable circumstances of constitution, environment, or job; and so on—all these frequently lead people to practice beautiful and praiseworthy virtues. Note, however, that while these factors may subdue the sinful disposition of the heart, they do not eradicate it. In all kinds of nasty considerations, thoughts, and desires, it keeps rising to the surface. When conditions are favorable and the need arises, it often breaks through the dams and dikes that restrained it. And those who show by their appalling words and deeds that they hate God and their neighbor have no other nature than the one all people share.

3. When we are taught that as a result of sin humans are incapable of any good and this inability is called “natural,” this does not refer to physical necessity or fatalistic coercion. Humans have not, as a result of sin, lost their will and their increased freedom: the will, in virtue of its nature, rules out all coercion and can only will freely. What humans have lost is the free inclination of the will toward the good. They now no longer want to do good; they now voluntarily, by a natural inclination, do evil. The inclination, the direction, of the will has changed. “The will in us is always free but it is not always good.” [Augustine] In this sense the incapacity for good is not physical but ethical in nature: it is a kind of impotence of the will. Some theologians therefore preferred to speak of a moral rather than a natural impotence—Amyraut, Testard, Venema, and especially Jonathan Edwards among them. Edwards in his day, one must remember, had to defend the moral impotence of humans against Whitby and Taylor, who denied original sin and deemed humans able to keep God’s law. They argued, against Edwards, that if humans could not keep God’s law, they did not have to, and if they did not keep it, they were not guilty. To defend himself, Edwards made a distinction between natural and moral impotence, saying that fallen humans did have the natural but not the moral power to do good. And he added that only natural impotence was real impotence, but moral impotence could only be figuratively so called. For sin is not a physical defect in nature or in the powers of the will; but it is an ethical defect, a lack of inclination toward or love for the good. [Edwards, Freedom of the Will] Now Edwards did say that human beings could not give themselves this inclination toward the good nor change their will. In this respect he was completely on the side of Augustine and Calvin. But by his refusal to call this disinclination toward the good “natural impotence,” he fostered a lot of misunderstanding and actually aided the cause of Pelagianism.

The Reformed, therefore, consistently spoke of natural impotence. This word “natural,” however, can have different meanings. One may use it to refer to the original human nature, created by God in Adam according to his image, in the sense used by Protestants when they said that the image of God is natural. In that case, the incapacity for good is not natural, but rather contrary to nature, unnatural, and subnatural. [Augustine] One can mean by it the physical substance or power of any creature, and in that case, too, this incapacity—since all substance and power is created by God—cannot be called natural. Incapacity for good is not a physical impossibility, like the inability of human beings to put their hands on the stars. But, speaking of natural impotence, one can also have in mind the characteristics of fallen human nature and mean by it that the incapacity for good in this fallen state is “by nature” characteristic for all human beings, congenital and not first introduced in them from without by custom, upbringing, or imitation. In this sense the term “natural impotence” is absolutely correct, and the term “moral impotence” open to misunderstanding. “Morally impossible,” after all, is the phrase often used to describe what is considered impossible for a given person on the basis of that person’s character, custom, or upbringing. It is morally impossible for a virtuous person all at once to become a thief, for a mother to hate her child, or a murderer to strangle an innocent child. Such a moral “impossibility” nonetheless definitely does occur under certain circumstances. This kind of moral impotence is not what describes the incapacity for good. Though ethical in nature, and an incapacity of the will, natural impotence belongs to humans by nature; it is innate, and a property of the volition itself. And precisely because the will, in its present fallen state, in virtue of its nature cannot do other than to will freely, it cannot do other than what it wills, than that to which it is by nature inclined. [T. Aquinas]

4. Finally, one must bear in mind that Scripture and the church, in teaching the total depravity of humanity, apply the highest standard, namely, the law of God. The doctrine of the incapacity for good is a religious confession. In light of the standard people usually follow in their daily life or in philosophical ethics, one can wholeheartedly admit that much of what people do is good and beautiful. The follower of Augustine, using this standard in the assessment of human virtues, can be even more generous and broad-minded than the most confirmed Pelagian. But there is still another, higher, ideal for us humans. There is a divine law with which we must comply. Virtues and good works are distinct. Good, true good—good in the eyes of a holy God—is only what is done out of faith, according to God’s law, and to God’s glory. [saving faith, with a spiritual sight of Christ, his glory, etc.] And measured by this standard, who would dare to say that any work performed by humans is completely pure and does not need forgiveness and renewal? To divide persons in two—like Rome and in part like the Lutherans—and to say that in the realm of the supernatural and spiritual they are incapable of any good but in the natural realm they can do things that are totally good is contrary to the unity of human nature, to the unity of the moral law, and to the teaching of Scriptures that humans must always be images of God, do everything they do to the glory of God, and always and everywhere love God with all their heart, mind, and strength. Now if that is true, if the human essence consists in being the image and likeness of God, then nothing in them, as they now live and work, can stand before the face of God. Weighed in the scales of God’s sanctuary, all their works are found to be wanting.

One can disagree about this standard and, to reach a more favorable conclusion, bring down the law of God and tailor it to human behaviors. But given this standard, the only possible judgment is that of Scripture: “There is no one who does good, no, not one” (Pss. 14: 3; 53: 3). And this judgment of Scripture is confirmed by a variety of testimonies. Let those who do not believe Scripture listen to the voices of the greatest people of our race! As soon as one, both in one’s own life or that of others, goes beyond words and deeds and inquires into the hidden motives and secret intentions, the sinful nature of all human striving comes to light. “Our virtues are often no more than vices in disguise” (Rochefoucauld). “Man is only a disguise, a lie and hypocrisy, both within himself and with respect to others” (Pascal). “Man to man is a wolf.” Without the state, human society would degenerate into “a war of all against all”(Hobbes). According to Kant, humans are by nature evil. There is in them a natural tendency toward evil, a radical inborn evil. The appalling facts evidenced to us by the history of humankind are sufficient proof of this. “Every man has his price, for which he will sell himself.” What the apostle says is a universal truth; there is no one who does good, not one.[Kant] “Those who maintain the bondage of the will and characterize humans as stocks and blocks are completely correct.”[Fichte] “The natural heart in which a human is caught up is the enemy one must fight.”[Hegel] “Humans have from eternity entangled themselves in themselves and in self-seeking, and all who have been born were born with the attached dark principle of evil. This original evil in humans, which only those can dispute who have only a superficial acquaintance with people as they are in themselves and in their relation to others, in its origin is their own deed.”[Schelling] “The main and fundamental motive in people as in animals is egoism, that is, the drive to exist and to prosper. This egoism, in animals as it is in humans, is most intimately connected, yes, identical with their inner core and essence.” This egoism is restrained by the bonds of decency, fear, punishment, government, and so on, but when these restraints are removed, [common graces, divine providence] “insatiable greed, despicable money-hunger, deeply concealed falseness, and spiteful evil again spring to the surface. One must read the histories of criminals and accounts of anarchic states to recognize what humans really are from a moral perspective. Thousands of people who before our eyes are peacefully commingling in public must be viewed as just so many tigers and wolves whose mouth has been secured by a strong muzzle.” Even the composition of the human conscience is one-fifth fear of other humans, one-fifth superstition, one-fifth prejudice, one-fifth vanity, and one-fifth custom. [Kant] The adherents of the theory of evolution have returned to the teaching of Mandeville, Helvetius, Diderst, d’Alembert, and others that egoism is the basis of morality and the norm of all human conduct. Humans are descended from animals and fundamentally remain animals guided by egoistic instincts. Civilization can tame humans but can never make of them something other than what they originally and temperamentally are. What we call moral life is an accidental product of circumstances of the life of people in a specific society. Under different circumstances and in another society, good and evil would have a very different content. [Darwin] In his Ethisch Idealisme, De Bussy makes a sharp distinction between the moral person whose self-centered nature has been curbed in its capriciousness by the community but not annihilated, whose virtues are often splendid vices, and the moral person in whom a new principle has been implanted.

It is truly not Scripture alone that judges humans harshly. It is human beings who have pronounced the harshest and most severe judgment on themselves. And it is always better to fall into the hands of the Lord than into those of people, for his mercy is great. For when God condemns us, he at the same time offers his forgiving love in Christ, but when people condemn people, they frequently cast them out and make them the object of scorn. When God condemns us, he has this judgment brought to us by people—prophets and apostles and ministers—who do not elevate themselves to a level high above us but include themselves with us in a common confession of guilt. By contrast, philosophers and moralists, in despising people, usually forget that they themselves are human. When God condemns, he speaks of sin and guilt that, though great and heavy, can be removed because they do not belong to the essence of humanity. But moralists frequently speak of egoistic animal tendencies that belong to humans by virtue of their origin and are part of their essence. They put people down but do not lift them up. If by origin we are animals, why then should we live as children of God.

A great dissertation on the doctrine of sin and its heretical views by Pelagius, philosophers like Plato, Plotinus, Cicero, etc. This gives you great depth in understanding sin, the corruptness of the human will, that man ruthlessly defends his autonomy, his self-reliance, his independence from God.

The Origin of Sin

Vol. 3, pg 25, 30-33, 39-44

The fallen world in which we live rests on the foundations of a creation that was good. Yet, it had scarcely been created before sin crept into it. The origin of sin is a mystery; it is not from God, and at the same time it is not excluded from his counsel. God decided to take humanity on the perilous path of covenantal freedom rather than elevating it by a single act of power over the possibility of sin and death.

Genesis 2:9 speaks of two trees, the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Both are integral to the Genesis narrative, and attempts to discount one or the other destroy narrative meaning. Similarly, efforts to explain the meaning of either of the trees in terms of progress and development (tree of life as awakening of sexuality) ignore the plain reading of prohibition and punishment associated with eating the trees' fruit. No, the story is a unity, and it is about the fall of humanity and the origin of sin. Genesis 3 is not a step of human progress but a fall.

This fall, however, is not simply human effort to achieve cultural power as a means of becoming independent from God. The Bible does not portray human cultural formation as an evil in itself so that rural simplicity is preferable to a world-dominating culture. The point of the "fall" narrative in Genesis is to point to the human desire for autonomy from God. To "know good and evil" is to become the determiner of good and evil; it is to decide for oneself what is right and wrong and not submit to any external law. In short, to seek the knowledge of good and evil is to desire emancipation from God; it is to want to be "like God."

The entry into sin comes by way of the serpent's lie. The serpent's speaking has often been mistakenly considered an allegory for lust, sexual desire, or errant reason. The various mythical interpretations and even attempts to explain the narrative in terms of animal capacity for speech before the fall all fail to meet the intent of the passage and the teaching of Scripture as a whole. The only appropriate explanation is to recognize, with ancient exegesis, the entrance of a spiritual superterrestrial power. The rest of the Bible, however, is relatively silent about this, though its entire narrative rests on this spiritual conflict between the two kingdoms. Sin did not start on earth but in heaven with a revolt of spiritual beings. In the case of humanity, the temptation by Satan resulted in the fall. Scripture looks for the origin of sin solely in the will of rational creatures.

The Christian church has always insisted on the historical character of the fall. In our day this is challenged by historical criticism as well as evolutionary dogma. Those who would challenge this notion attempt instead to accommodate it by demonstrating the reality of the fall from experience, thus validating Genesis 3 as a description of reality rather than as history. This rests on a misunderstanding; it ignores the fact that we need the testimony of Scripture in order to “read” our experience aright. Neither the Genesis account nor its historical character can be dispensed with. In fact, objections to the reality of the fall are themselves increasingly under review by more recent trends in the biblical and archeological/anthropological sciences. The Genesis account, especially of the unity of the human race, speaks positively to our conscience and our experience.

Though no true parallel to the biblical account has been found, it is clear from the myths of other ancients that underlying the religious and moral convictions of the human race are common beliefs in the divine origin and destiny of humanity, in a golden age and decline, in the conflict of good and evil, and in the wrath and appeasement of the deity. The origin and essence of sin, however, remain unknown to them. The origin of sin is sometimes found in the essence of things, its existence even denied by moralists and rationalists, treated as illusion or desire as in Buddhism, or dualistically traced to an ultimately evil power. Philosophers have treated sin as hubris that can be overcome by human will, as ignorance to be overcome by education in virtue, or even as a fall of preexistent souls. However, outside of special revelation sin is either treated deistically in terms of human will alone or derived pantheistically from the very necessary nature of things.

Both views also found their way into Christianity. The British monk Pelagius rejected all notions of original sin and considered every person as having Adam’s full moral choice of will. The fall did not happen at the beginning but is repeated in every human sin. Though the church rejected Pelagianism in its extreme form, Roman Catholicism maintained the notion of a less than completely fallen will, limiting the fall to the loss of the donum superadditum, [see Van Til @ code490] which can only be restored by sacramental grace.

When the Reformation rejected Roman Catholic dualism, streams within Protestantism, notable rationalist groups such as the Socinians as well as the Remonstrants robbed Christianity of its absolute character by dispensing with the need for grace in some measure. The image of God is regarded as the fully free will, which, like that of the pre-fall Adam, remains intact. While we are born with an inclination to sin, this inclination is not itself culpable; atonement is needed only for actual sin. Suffering is not necessarily linked to sin; it is simply part of our human condition.

Interesting attempts have been made to reconcile Pelagius with Augustine. Ritschl agrees with Pelagius that the human will and actual sin precede the sinful state or condition. But he also then insists that these singular sinful acts mutually reinforce each other and create a collective realm of sin that exerts influence on us, a reinforcing reciprocity that enslaves all people. Others combine Ritschl’s approach with evolutionary theory. When this is envisioned in strictly materialistic and mechanistic terms, all notions of good and evil, the possibility of a moral life, vanish behind physical and chemical processes. A more acceptable route is to see the evolution of moral life as one in which human beings rise above their primitive animal nature as they become more humanized, more civilized. From this evolutionary viewpoint, sin is the survival of or misuse of habits and tendencies left over from our animal ancestry, from earlier stages of development, and their sinfulness lies in their anachronism. The remaining animal nature is shared by all people; sin is universal, but so is moral responsibility and guilt.

This attempt to reconcile Augustine and Pelagius fails at several levels. Apart from the lack of proof for materialistic evolution, the major obstacle is explaining the origin of a free human will in the evolutionary process. To think of the will as somehow outside of human nature and unrelated to it is psychologically inconceivable. In fact, moral freedom not only becomes precarious, moral improvement becomes virtually impossible. Sin's power increases, and explanations for its origin flounder. Thinkers move from attributing it to human nature to cosmic explanations—all matter is evil. From there it was an easy step to locate evil in a tension of potencies within God himself as in the theosophical tradition of Böhme and Schelling. Hegel even considered the fall as the Ur-fact of history when the Absolute realized itself in the world as its own alternative existence. From here it is a small step to Buddhism, which considers existence itself as the greatest sin.

The question of sin's origin, like the question of existence itself, is an enigma. The philosophical tradition provides evidence for the scriptural teaching that this world is inexplicable without a fall but provides no satisfactory explanation. Sin cannot be inferred from the sensual nature of humanity since the "spiritual" sins of those who are older are often more appalling than the "fleshly" sins of youth. Asceticism does not solve the problem of sin; monks take sin with them into the cloister in their hearts. Appealing to the Pauline understanding of "flesh" to defend this view fails. "Flesh" is a sinful direction of the heart in opposition to the Holy Spirit and is not a contrast between material and immaterial or spiritual. From attributing sin to human nature it is a natural move to attribute it to the Creator. Consistent with our experience of life's contradictions, sin is the necessary obstacle to our moral development and perfection. Sin is God's own will; it is his design for creation. While there is a semblance of truth here, sin is made eternal, inferred from physical matter, necessary not accidental, seen not as the antithesis of good but as a lower grade of the good; this view makes God the author of sin. Scripture and human moral consciousness rebel against these conclusions. Pessimism and libertinism are the natural consequence of this view.

The question of God's will in relation to sin is vexing. Those who speak of God's permission with respect to sin rightly seek to avoid making him the author of sin. However, because this formulation risks denying God's full sovereignty, Reformed theology, following Augustine, was never satisfied with the idea of permission. At the risk of using "hard sayings," Reformed theologians insist that while God does not sin or cause sin, sin is yet not outside his will. In addition, God created human beings holy and without sin; sin's origin is in the will of the rational creature. God most certainly created human beings to be capable of sin; he willed the possibility of sin. How that possibility became reality is, however, a mystery. Sin defies explanation; it is a folly that does not have an origin in the true sense of the word, only a beginning. Attempting to locate the time of the fall, too, is impossible. Attempts to identify that time in the preformed chaos of Genesis 1:1 or in notions of preexistent souls are theologically and philosophically, as well as scripturally, without ground. We must be satisfied with the straightforward account of Scripture: humanity was created good and by its own volition, at a given time in the beginning, fell from that state and plunged into sinful alienation from God, who incorporates sin into his purposes, even as something that had to be there though it ought not to be there.

The Knowledge of Good and Evil

The tree of the knowledge of good and evil is undoubtedly so named because humans, by eating of it, would acquire a knowledge of good and evil such as they had not had until then, one that was forbidden to them and denied to them. The question, however, is what that knowledge of good and evil amounts to. The usual explanation is that, by eating of the tree, humans would gain empirical knowledge of good and evil. But this has rightly prompted the objection that this knowledge of good and evil would make humans like God— as not just the snake (in Gen. 3: 5) but also God himself (in 3: 22) says— and God certainly has no empirical knowledge of evil, nor can he have it. In addition, by eating of the tree, humans especially lost the empirical knowledge of the good. Finally, [in this view] Genesis 3: 22a must then be interpreted as irony, which by itself is already implausible but specifically in conflict with verse 22 as a whole. Others therefore came up with the idea that Genesis 3 relates the development of the human race from an animal state to self-consciousness and reason, and they therefore viewed the fall as the first hazardous undertaking of reason, the genesis of moral life, the origin of culture, the happiest event in the history of humanity.

pg 32: The paradisaical story, therefore, absolutely does not describe the human person as an intellectual or moral tabula rasa on which everything still has to be inscribed from without. Therefore, it cannot mean by the knowledge of good and evil an awakening to self-consciousness and reason nor the origination of conscience. But by the knowledge of good and evil that is prohibited, they say, we must understand the achievement of a mature intellect (3: 6), the ability to distinguish between the useful and the harmful (Deut. 1: 39; 2 Sam. 19: 35– 36; Isa. 7: 16; Jonah 4: 11); independent insight enabling persons to help themselves and not be dependent on others; intellectual knowledge of the world, the metaphysical knowledge of things in their connectedness, their value or worthlessness, their utility or inutility for people. In other words, this refers to wisdom, to the skills of controlling the world, the culture that is said to make humans independent of God and like God.

Hence the knowledge of good and evil that is prohibited to human beings has to mean something different. Marti points in the right direction when he describes it as the ability to stand on one's own feet and to find one's own way and speaks of the desire of humans to emancipate themselves from God by cultivating that ability. In Genesis 3, the issue is not primarily the content of the knowledge that humans would appropriate by disobedience but the manner in which they would obtain it. The nature of the knowledge of good and evil in view here is characterized by the fact that humans would be like God as a result of it (Gen. 3: 5, 22). By violating the command of God and eating of the tree, they would make themselves like God in the sense that they would position themselves outside and above the law and, like God, determine and judge for themselves what good and evil was. The knowledge of good and evil is not the knowledge of the useful and the harmful, of the world and how to control it, but (as in 2 Sam. 19: 36; Isa. 7: 16) the right and capacity to distinguish good and evil on one's own. The issue in Genesis is indeed whether humanity will want to develop in dependence on God, whether it will want to have dominion over the earth and seek its salvation in submission to God's commandment; or whether, violating that commandment and withdrawing from God's authority and law, it will want to stand on its own feet, go its own way, and try its own "luck." [J. Koberle] When humanity fell, it got what it wanted; it made itself like God, "knowing good and evil" by its own insight and judgment. Genesis 3: 22 is in dead earnest. This emancipation from God, however, did not lead and cannot lead to true happiness. For that reason, God by the probationary command forbade this drive to freedom, this thirst for independence. But humanity voluntarily and deliberately opted for its own way, thereby failing the test. [There you have it! The cesspool of sin flows from this fountain, man's declaring his independence from God. Now you can see why false religions prosper, why, for example, Deism is what it is....God is off in the distance and man is left to rely upon his own so called strength, stock and furniture.]

For if humankind is one, then it has descended from one ancestral couple; then it has spread out over the whole world from one specific location; then from the beginning it held in common a complex of intellectual, religious, and moral ideas and traditions; then a moral deviation must have occurred at the beginning in the life of the first human couple, for sin is universal. All in all, the science of nature and history to this day lacks the right to make a pronouncement on the truth of the state of integrity and the fall of the first humans. The witness pertaining to these things contained in Genesis, confirmed by the later appeal made to it by prophets and apostles and Christ himself, and intertwined as a necessary constituent in the whole revelation of salvation, continues to maintain itself in people's conscience and meshes perfectly with the reality our daily experience informs us about.

ALTERNATIVE EXPLANATIONS OF SIN

Indirectly this witness of Scripture is also borne out by the traditions, sagas. Or myths that among various peoples speak of a fall into sin....

...All these stories and others like them have no higher meaning other than to show that the human race from ancient times and everywhere wanted to give an account of the horrendous destruction the world exhibited, by seeing in it the result of a fall that took place in the life of humanity. But in that light they are valuable. Underlying the religious and moral convictions of human beings, more or less clearly articulated or unconscious, there is belief in the divine origin and destiny of humanity, in a golden age and subsequent decline, in the battle between good and evil, and in the wrath and appeasement of the deity.

At the same time, they bring out how pagans, though they gropingly searched for God, did not find him [cf. Acts 17:27]. Both the origin and the essence of sin remained unknown to them. Even the Jews, who recognized the fall and the temptation by Satan (Wis. 2:24) and therefore frequently called him the "ancient serpent," sometimes taught that Satan was created simultaneously with Eve on the sixth day, that, being sensually titillated, he tried to tempt man, and that even before the fall humans received, along with an impulse toward the good (הטוב יצר), an impulse toward evil (יצר הרע), in order to overcome it and so to make their works truly meritorious. Similarly, in the pagan world, the origin of sin was found, not in the will of rational creatures, but in the essence of things.

The fall is simply unknown. Confucianism is a shallow form of rationalism and moralism that considered humans naturally good and sought the way of salvation in a virtuous life in keeping with the world order. According to Buddhism, the Atman, or Brahman, the divine substance, is the only reality; the world of phenomena is but a dream, is fundamentally maya, illusion, and in a state of perpetual becoming and change. Suffering and sorrow, accordingly, are universal, for all things are subject to transitoriness, to birth, aging, and death. The cause of that suffering is to be found in desires, in the desire for existence, in the will to exist. Salvation therefore consists in extinguishing the consciousness or in the annihilation of existence: nirvana. Parsism traced evil to an original evil spirit, Ahriman, who is opposed to the supreme god, Ahuramazda, has his own kingdom of darkness and corrupts the creation of God, but is subordinate to Ahuramazda and will someday yield to him. The Greeks and the Romans, though in their sagas of a golden age, of Prometheus and Pandora, they possessed something reminiscent of the biblical stories, originally knew nothing of evil spirits that were opposed to the good and attributed to the gods all sorts of evil desires and misdeeds. The human race did not fall all at once but gradually degenerated. And the human will still possesses the power to live a virtuous life, to stay within moral bounds, and thus to conquer sin, which is essentially hubris.

[Note man tends to defend his own will, his autonomy, his independence from God, in matters of religion, life and philosophy. It's all will worship. You see this come out in Arminianism, Pelagianism, etc. which has permeated almost all churches. Amazing!]

Philosophy, as a rule, took the same position. According to Socrates, the cause and essence of sin consists solely in ignorance. No one is voluntarily evil, that is, unfortunate. Hence the person who knows the good is good and acts according to the good. All that is needed is education to guide humans, who are by nature good, to the practice of virtue. Plato and Aristotle indeed understood the inadequacy of this view. Reason, they said, is certainly far from always being able to control the passions. Sin is too deeply rooted in human nature to be overcome by knowledge alone. Plato even arrived at a totally different theory about the origin of sin, locating it in a fall of preexistent souls. Still, both maintained free will and continued to believe that virtue remains within our power. Our external lot may be determined, but virtue is without a master (ἀδεσποτος) and depends on the human will alone. “Both virtue and evil depend upon us.” The Stoics could not, on the basis of its pantheistic and deterministic position, locate the cause of sin in the human will and therefore attempted to fit both physical and moral evil into the order and beauty of the whole. It was not even possible for the deity to keep human nature free from every defect. Sin is as necessary as diseases and disasters and is something good to the degree that it serves and brings out the good. Still also the Stoics knew no way to overcome sin and to practice virtue other than the human will. Finally, in the works of Cicero, Seneca, Plotinus, and others, there was the ever-recurring thought that sin was an act of the will and could also be undone by the will. Outside the area of special revelation, therefore, sin was always either interpreted deistically in terms of the human will and construed purely as an act of the will or derived pantheistically from the essence of things and incorporated as a necessary component in the order of the universe as a whole.

Both views also found their way into Christianity and repeatedly met, in smaller or larger circles, with agreement and had their defenders. The practical Christianity that prevailed in the churches following the death of the apostles and is known to us from the so-called Apostolic Fathers and other writings already contained all kinds of religious and ethical notions that deviated from the New Testament and especially from Paul and were formed under the influence of Jewish piety and popular pagan philosophy, especially that of Cicero. Believers were indeed convinced that in Christ they had received great benefits, especially the forgiveness for all past sins in baptism; but if after that event they saw themselves called to a holy life, they already opened up a large space for free will, for their own power, and for the meritoriousness of good works. When, at the beginning of the fifth century, Pelagius proposed his theories, he could appeal to countless statements made by others before him. Still he isolated them from the context in which they occurred and combined them into a single whole in such a way that they ran fundamentally counter to the Christian doctrine of sin and grace.

To this monk from Britain everything depended on the free will. He saw it as the characteristic feature of human nature, the image of God, the first principle and foundation of the dominion granted him. Human nature has been so created by God that, depending on its free choice, it is able to and able not to sin; and this equal possibility in either direction, as a natural good, as a constituent of human nature, cannot be lost. As a result Pelagius had to reject all notions of original sin. Adam only brought sin into the world as an example or form. There is indeed a power of evil custom, but this does not so completely control humans that, if they seriously wanted to avoid sin and lead a holy life, they would be prevented from doing so. In any case, sin is not innate; it is always—and cannot be anything but—a free act of the will. The fall, accordingly, did not just occur once, in Adam, and take the whole human race with it, but every human being is still born in the same state in which Adam was, granted that, as a result of the power of custom, conditions are less favorable now. And all humans therefore stand or fall by themselves. Sin originates anew in every person; in every human life there occurs a fall when the power of free will is neglected or applied in a wrong direction.

These ideas of Pelagius were so obviously at odds with the teaching of Scripture and the faith of the church that they could not possibly be accepted by the church. They were, accordingly, modified and toned down in various ways. Specifically, to Adam's transgression was ascribed a stronger influence on the state of human nature, and, correspondingly, grace was credited with more vigorous cooperation at the beginning and in the development of the new Christian life. But, fundamentally, the final decision at all these points was again reserved for the free will. In Roman Catholicism, Adam's transgression did result for him and his descendants in the loss of the superadded gift [see code294a]; and insofar as God had granted this gift to Adam and he therefore should have enjoyed it, the loss of it can be called culpable. But original sin is no more than this privation; it does not consist in the concupiscence that by itself is not sin, nor in an innate evil of the will, for though the will may have been weakened, it is neither lost nor corrupted. Thus fallen nature is actually totally identical with uncorrupted nature; true, the supernatural gifts have been lost, but the natural gifts continue intact. In the abstract, therefore, a person could possibly abstain from all actual sins and, like unbaptized children dying in infancy, acquire a natural state of bliss. In this connection Rome could still maintain the absolute necessity of Christianity, however, inasmuch as humans, although in the most favorable scenario they could also acquire a natural state of bliss, could never by their free will receive supernatural righteousness and salvation. To that end the church with its sacraments is the only proper road. But when this Roman Catholic dualism was cast aside by the Reformation, the modalities that, within the circle of Protestantism, took over the Roman Catholic assumptions about original sin and free will virtually automatically had to relapse into the ancient errors of Pelagius and Coelestis or in any case into those of Hilary of Arles and John Cassian. For if Adam's fall did not, or did only in part, deprive the will of the freedom and power to do good, and original sin did not consist either in a culpable loss of an original supernatural gift, then in that same measure grace became dispensable and Christianity was robbed of its absolute character.

Sin as an Act of Will

This is actually what happened in Socinianism, Remonstrantism, and rationalism, in which, despite small modifications, the basic idea was always that sin is not rooted in a nature and is not a disposition or a state, but always an act of the will. In the case of humans, the image of God then primarily or exclusively consisted in dominion. To the extent that a state of integrity was assumed, it consisted mainly in childlike innocence, in the freedom of indifference, in the possibility of opting for either good or evil. The fall itself, when it is still recognized as a historical fact, loses its appalling significance and is an event rather like what occurs at every moment in human life when evil is chosen over the good. And the consequences of the fall are therefore also of little weight. Children are born in the same state as that in which Adam lived before his disobedience. Freedom of the will, that is, the image of God, remains intact. At most a certain tendency toward sin is transplanted from person to person, but such a tendency is not really the result of the first sin of Adam but of all the sins of all our ancestors. Nor is it a sin by itself; it only becomes a sin when the free will gives free rein to that tendency.

Reconciling Augustine and Pelagius

Adam's trespass, therefore, cannot have been the origin of sin in the human race; perhaps it was the first of a series of subsequent trespasses, but it is neither their source nor their first principle. Is sin, then, rooted in human nature? Ritschl denies this in the strongest possible terms. Sin is sin: its cause is not in God; it is not a functional element in his world order. It is, after all, the opposite of the good and experienced by us as guilt. But in the interpretation of the origin of sin, Ritschl can concur neither with Augustine nor with Pelagius. The former made humanity or human nature the subject of sin. But in that case every human already participates in the highest degree of sin in participating in original sin, and actual sins virtually no longer count. As a result of original sin, after all, humanity is already a "lost mass" (massa perdit), deserving of eternal punishment. But this cannot be true, for such a doctrine not only leads to untruth and makes all nurture impossible, but actual sins, according to everyone's mind, are something other and more than the mere phenomena and accidents [accidents: properties of, like white is to snow] of original sin. Also, Pelagius's view, according to which not human nature but the will of the individual is the subject of sin, is untenable, for sin is in fact something communal. Ritschl, therefore, tries to bridge the difference between the two, thinking he can achieve this by saying that the subject of sin is indeed humanity as a whole but the latter viewed as the sum of all individuals. He therefore agrees with Pelagius insofar as he, like Pelagius, has the sinful deed precede the sinful state, not the sinful state the sinful deed. All sin is grounded in the self-determination of each person's own will. And granted, under the existing circumstances and especially as a result of human ignorance, sin is indeed a “seemingly unavoidable testimony” to his will; still, the possibility of a sinless life cannot a priori be denied. So far Ritschl agrees with Pelagius. But he then tries to approximate Augustine’s position by viewing sins as a unity that arises, not in virtue of their origin from a single principle, but as a result of mutual interpenetration and connectedness. Sin begins with an act of the will, but every act retroactively shapes the will, gives it a nature and a character, produces an egoistic tendency in it, and so cooperates in establishing the dominion of the law of sin. [It’s amazing how these guys twist things around, like the blind leading the blind, trying to avoid the truth of their nakedness before an infinitely holy God!] But this is not all; sinful human acts and tendencies in turn exert influence on each other. Just as a sinful environment accustoms us to sin and dulls our moral judgment, so our own sinful deeds call those of others into being. In short: there is no original sin, but out of the sinful acts of all people collectively arises a collective unity, a realm of sin.

But also after Ritschl, Pelagius’s theory of the origin of sin has been defended and in a unique way connected with the theory of evolution. When this evolution is construed along purely and consistently materialistic-mechanical lines, there is no longer any room for a typically moral life, for sin and virtue. In that case, so-called good and evil acts are chemical products in the same sense as vitriol and sugar, only somewhat further and more finely distilled. But since nature is usually stronger than theory, the proponents of a mechanical evolution also continue to speak of good and evil, of moral law and moral obligation, of a culture of the true, the good, and the beautiful. Materialistic atheism, moreover, has lost credibility in recent years, and since the rebirth of philosophy and the revival of metaphysics, many thinkers do their best to restrict mechanical evolution to the material world and to make it subservient to a teleological ethical idealism

What is Sin

[Sin: not a substance, but an active principle of a privation of good]

Reformed Dogmatics, Hermon Bavinck, Vol. 3 pg 127, 136-138

The Nature of Sin, pg 127

Original sin, by contrast, has passed to all humans and characterizes all of them to the same extent. It is, after all, nothing other than the sin of Adam himself, imputed to all his descendants; it regards every one of them as born with the same guilt, the same impurity, and the same perverseness as, in the case of Adam, made their appearance immediately after his violation of God’s commandment. [i.e., as Bavinck notes, not mediately after they were conceived in iniquity, referring to mediate imputation, but immediately upon Adam’s transgression.]

If sin were a substance, there would exist an entity that either was not created by God or was not caused by God. Sin, accordingly, has to be understood and described neither as an existing thing nor as being in things that exist but rather as a defect, a deprivation, an absence of the good, or as weakness, imbalance, just as blindness is a deprivation of sight. [Athanasius, Against the Heathens] In the West especially Augustine brought out and upheld this privative character of sin in his opposition to the Manicheans. All being is per se good. All that is natural, to the degree that it is natural, is good. Evil can therefore only be something about the good. There cannot be any evil at all except in something good, because it cannot be except in something natural. It is itself not nature, but a lack, privation, or corruption of the good, a vice or defect of nature; for good to be diminished is evil. [Augustine, City of God] It therefore has no efficient but only a deficient cause. [Augustine, City of God] Scholastics and Catholic, Lutheran, and Reformed theologians similarly reduced the concept of sin in a metaphysical sense to that of privation. [in addition to the literature already mentioned, see e.g., also M. Becanus, Summa theologiae scholasticae...]

On the other hand, it is also clear that sin cannot be adequately described with the concept of privation. Certainly it is not a mere lack, pure nonbeing, but an active and corrupting principle, a dissolving, destructive power. Scripture usually speaks of it in a very positive sense as an act of transgression, wrongness, disobedience, lawlessness, and so on and ascribes to it the activity of witnessing, ruling, moving, thinking, fighting, and so on. Various theologians have therefore rejected the distinction between matter and form in their definition of sin. They based their views on the premise that blasphemy, idolatry, hatred against God, and so on are sinful actions and can never assume a good form, and so they described sin rather as a “certain real and positive something,” as a “real something.” [Cajetan in M. Becanus, Summa theologiae scholasticae...]

To understand this correctly, however, we must note the following: (1) When the majority of Christian theologians conceive sin as privation, they first of all have opposition to Manicheism in view. To that extent their opinion is completely correct and to be accepted without reservation. Sin is not a substance, neither spiritual nor material, for then it would either have God as its cause or else God would not be the creator of all things. (2) Also the nature of sin itself keeps us from viewing it as a substance, for sin is not a physical but an ethical phenomenon. It is a state and act of the will and is rooted in the will; it is not given with creation but originated after the creation as a result of disobedience. Accordingly, it cannot be a material thing that existed eternally or was created in time by God but only exists as a deformation of existence; in that sense it can even be called something that does not exist, a “nothing.” [Dr. R. P. Mees 1907] (3) This is not to be understood as meaning that sin is a nonnegative. The case is rather that Christian theology has at all times very firmly opposed the pantheistic view of sin as pure negation, as a state of not yet being, as a necessary component in the development of a finite being, as an illusion of thought. Sin was no “mere negation” but a “privation,” the difference between them being that “negation” is only a matter of “being without” (carere), while “privation” is lacking something essential to life (egere). The fact that a stone does not see is a negation, but that a human should not see is a privation, since sight belongs to the essential functions of a human being. Sin is a privation of the moral perfection a human ought to possess. (4) The characterization of sin as privation, accordingly, by no means excludes its being also—viewed from a different angle— an action. It is not a “substance” or thing, but in its being deprived of the good, it is an activity (ἐνεργεῖα), just as the limp of a cripple is not the absence of walking but a defective kind of walking. Augustine, who over and over describes sin as “privation,” therefore calls it a transgression of the law (transgressio legis), [Augustine, The Consensus of the Evangelists] the will to hang on to or pursue something that justice forbids, [Augustine, On the Two Souls, Against the Manicheans] a defect that includes a tendency, a defect that is not altogether nothing but tends toward nothingness, [Augustine, Against Secundus the Manichee] a leaning away from what is more to what is less. [ibid] He then gives this definition: “Sin is something done, or said, or desired contrary to eternal law; the law that is truly eternal is the divine reason or will of God, which demands the preservation of the natural order and forbids its disturbance.” [idem, Against Faustus the Manichee] Later this definition was universally accepted: sin is not mere or pure privation but an action deprived of due order, [P. Lombard] a privation having a positive quality and action, that is, an active privation. [J. Zanchi, Op. Theol., IV]

Man’s Misery by the Fall

A Body of Divinity

My comments in [blue]; red for emphasis

5. Man's Misery By The Fall

Q-19: WHAT IS THE MISERY OF THAT ESTATE WHEREINTO MAN FELL?

A: All mankind by their fall lost communion with God, are under his wrath and curse, and so made liable to all the miseries in this life, to death itself, and to the pains of hell for ever.

'And were by nature children of wrath.' Eph 2:3. Adam left an unhappy portion to his posterity, Sin and Misery. Having considered the first of these, original sin, we shall now advert to the misery of that state. In the first, we have seen mankind offending; in the second, we shall see him suffering. The misery ensuing from original sin is two-fold.

I. Privative. By this first hereditary sin we have lost communion with God. Adam was God's familiar, his favourite; but sin has put us all out of favour. When we lost God's image, we lost his acquaintance. God's banishing Adam out of paradise hieroglyphically showed how sin has banished us out of God's love and favour. [balance Watson’s statement about the image of God being lost with other comments on this. I think what Watson means is that we lost the principle part of the image, that being holiness consisting in a love for God and also the image of the knowledge of God. We still retain remnants of God’s image, namely a rational soul, reasoning mind, etc.]

II. Positive. In four things. 1. Under the power of Satan. 2. Heirs of God's wrath. 3. Subject to all the miseries of this life. 4. Exposed to hell and damnation.

[1] The first misery is, that by nature we are ‘under the power of Satan,’ who is called ‘The prince of the power of the air.’ Eph 2:2. Before the fall man was a free denizen, now a slave; before, a king on the throne, now in fetters. And whom is man enslaved to? To one that is a hater of him. This was an aggravation of Israel's servitude. 'They that hated them ruled over them.' Psa 106:41. By sin we are enslaved to Satan, who is a hater of mankind, and writes all his laws in blood. Sinners before conversion are under Satan's command; as the ass at the command of the driver, so he does all the devil's drudgery. No sooner Satan tempts but he obeys. As the ship is at the command of the pilot, who steers it which way he will, so is the sinner at the command of Satan; and he ever steers the ship into hell's mouth. The devil rules all the powers and faculties of a sinner.

(1.) He rules the understanding. He blinds men with ignorance, and then rules them; as the Philistines first put out Samson's eyes, and then bound him. Satan can do what he will with an ignorant man; because he does not see the error of his way, the devil can lead him into any sin. You may lead a blind man any whither. Omne peccatum fundatur in ignorantia [Every sin is founded upon ignorance].

(2.) Satan rules the will. Though he cannot force the will, yet he can, by temptation, draw it. The lusts of your father ye will do. John 8:44. He has got your hearts, and him ye will obey. 'We will burn incense to the queen of heaven.' Jer 44:17. When the devil spurs a sinner by a temptation, he will over hedge and ditch break all God's laws, that he may obey Satan. Where then is free will, when Satan has such power over the will? 'His lusts ye will do.' There's not any member of the body but is at the devil's service: the head to plot sin, the hands to work it, see [code-beast. Watson shows the symbolic language of the mark of the beast as Dean Davis does. Very good.] the feet to run the devil's errand. Grave jugum servitutis. Cicero. 'Slavery is hateful to a noble spirit.' Satan is the worst tyrant; the cruelty of a cannibal, or Nero, is nothing to his. Other tyrants do but rule over the bodies, he over the conscience. Other tyrants have some pity on their slaves; though they work in the galley, they give them meat, let them have hours for rest; but Satan is a merciless tyrant, he lets them have no rest. What pains did Judas take! The devil would let him have no rest till he had betrayed Christ, and afterwards imbrued his hands in his own blood.

Use one: See here our misery by original sin; enslaved to Satan. Eph 2:2. Satan is said to work effectually in the children of disobedience. What a sad plague is it for a sinner to be at the will of the devil! Just like a slave, if the Turks bid him dig in the mines, hew in the quarries, tug at the oar, the slave must do it, he dares not refuse. If the devil bids a man lie or steal, he does not refuse; and, what is worse, he willingly obeys this tyrant. Other slaves are forced against their will: 'Israel sighed by reason of their bondage,' Exod 2:23; but sinners are willing to be slaves, they will not take their freedom; they kiss their fetters.

Use two: Let us labour to get out of this deplorable condition into which sin has plunged us, and get from under the power of Satan. If any of your children were slaves, you would give great sums of money to purchase their freedom; and when your souls are enslaved, will ye not labour for their freedom? Improve the gospel. The gospel proclaims a jubilee to captives. Sin binds men, but the gospel looses them. But the Spirit must work it. [John 3] Paul's preaching was 'to turn men from the power of Satan to God.' Acts 26:18. The gospel star leads you to Christ; and if you get Christ, then you are made free, though not from the being of sin, yet from Satan's tyranny. [Pharoah was a type of Satan keeping the Israelites in bondage, but were set free \(to worship\) by Moses, a type of Christ.] 'If the Son make you free, ye shall be free indeed.' John 8:36. [Again, free to worship the true God; before Satan blinded you from this] You hope to be kings to reign in heaven, and will you let Satan reign in you now? Never think to be kings when you die, and slaves while you live. The crown of glory is for conquerors, not for captives. Oh get out of Satan's jurisdiction; get your fetters of sin filed off by repentance.

Chapter Two

Sin

By Geerhardus Vos

Reformed Dogmatics

Pgs. 239-249, 269-288

Code457

What are the principal philosophical theories concerning sin, and what must be introduced against them?

We have:

a) The dualistic theory, that sin is an inseparable characteristic of matter. Spirit = good, matter = evil.

Against it counts:

1. This theory, if it does not wish to see God as author of sin, must posit something that exists as a substance independently of God.
2. It removes the moral element from the concept of sin to replace it with a physical element and thereby weakens the concept of sin.
3. It also removes the responsibility of man by making sin necessary.

b) The theory that sin is merely a limitation of existence. All existence is good, only the lack of existence, that is, finitude and limitedness, is evil. Finite man must always remain sinful. This view: 1) is pantheistic. 2) Removes all responsibility. Only weakness, viewed in this way, is evil. Might is right.

c) The theory that sin is a necessary reaction against what is good. For its existence, everything in the world rests on opposition. There is no rest without weariness, no joy without sorrow, no desire without pain, no good without evil. This also makes sin necessary.

d) Schleiermacher's theory. Sin is the imperfection that arises because the higher principle of God-consciousness does not rule the lower principle of self-consciousness and world-consciousness.

According to this conception,

1. Sin is general and absolutely necessary. Even in the original state of man it was unavoidable.
2. Here the concepts of sin and guilt become merely subjective.

e) The theory that the sensual nature of man is the seat and origin of sin. However:

1. The worst and most sinful beings, namely the devil and the demons, are not sensual because they have no body.
2. The most hateful of all sins have nothing to do with the body; for example, pride.
3. This view would justify the monastic system and asceticism, which, however, are not approved by Scripture.
4. According to this theory, the older a man gets and the more the sensual nature in him dies down, the more he should also grow in holiness. This is not the case.
5. When Scripture speaks of sin as “flesh,” this has another basis, for thereby is expressed not one’s sensual character but ungodliness, Godforsakenness, the spiritual death of the state of sin.

f) The theory that all sin is selfishness.

Of all theories, this one comes closest to the truth. Against it, however, we have to note the following:

1. There is unselfish sin. When, for example, a mother, out of an excessive love for her deceased child, in despair takes her own life, this suicide is sin. This, however, is plainly not to be called selfishness.
2. In some sense there is selfish virtue. Man has duties toward himself. He has to esteem the image of God that is in him and he cannot hate his own flesh. God’s word requires love to our neighbor as ourselves.

3. All attempts to give a material definition of sin proceed from the presupposition that what they describe as sin also contains the property of sin per se, apart from any relationship to God. That is, one searches for a definition that will not only be material but also excludes God. And every definition that satisfies this demand is rationalistic and deistic in character, therefore useless for the Christian concept of sin. Sin, in the strict sense, is only conceivable as sin against God, and one can speak of sin against one’s neighbor only in a derivative and figurative sense. The feature of a relationship to God is essential for the concept of sin, and so has to be made part of the definition. If there were no God, one could not speak of sin. There would be selfishness and sensuality and love of the world, but all this, though one could call it evil, does not have a specifically sinful character because it is entirely lacking any relationship to God. It is absolutely necessary to grasp this clearly. It is not selfishness as such that constitutes the essence of sin, but selfishness as shutting oneself off toward God, as seeking after our own honor while not wanting God’s honor. [My note: Everything done outside of faith is sin, see Romans 14:23. The reason is because it flows from natural principles of self-love, self-preservation, seeking one’s own honor, to be seen of men, and other by-ends. As Jesus said in John 5:44, ⁴⁴ How can you believe, who receive honor from one another, and do not seek the honor that comes from the only God? So even if you do good things but they flow from these principles, it is sin. All that we do must proceed from a principle of love to God, that new living principle, that seeks his honor and glory; this can only come from a regenerate person who has the love of God in them.] If one remains committed to the negative concept of selfishness, sin is still presented as separate from relationship to God. However, to the negative side turned inward corresponds a positive side turned outward: enmity against God. Conversely, if one seeks the essence of the good in love, then this love, too, if it is thought of apart from relationship to God, is not the genuine, holy, spiritual love to which the predicate “good” can be attributed in the fullest sense of the word. So, if the mother commits suicide out of love for her deceased child, then love toward God, which should be more to her, recedes into the background and her first love becomes sin to her. And if one spares oneself and out of self-love does not follow a blind impulse to self-sacrifice because one knows that because of God’s will one may not sacrifice or endanger oneself, then in such selfishness a kernel of genuine, spiritual good can be veiled. One sees, therefore, how relationship to God determines everything, making sin to be sin and good to be good.

2. What characteristics, in consequence, belong to the scriptural concept of sin?

a) Sin is a specific evil. It is not to be confused with physical evil, with what is unpleasant. Above the terrain of the physical lies that of the ethical, where the antithesis between good and evil reigns. All beings that belong to this reasoning sphere must be one or the other, good or evil. An in-between state, a neutral state between these two, is not possible. There are stages in good and stages in evil, but there are no stages between good and evil. The transition between evil and good is qualitative, not quantitative. A being that is good becomes evil not by a decrease in his goodness but by a radical change in it, by passing over to sin. And one is not to think of stages in evil and good, as if in being less advanced in evil an element of goodness still lurks and, vice versa, in a less developed holiness an element of sin still lurks. In the former, everything is sin, and in the latter, everything is good. But as with the former all the sin potentially present need not yet have come to development, so with the latter goodness can be present as a seed while it has not yet increased. Thus on both sides, progression is possible without thereby sin and virtue having to be set in opposition to each other as quantitative entities. It is certainly true that everything less good is an evil, but that only says that for man the quantitative lessening of the good is impossible without it being accompanied by the qualitative changing of good to evil. Only in the case of a reduction of the entire development of man would a reduction of good be conceivable in which evil does not immediately enter in. All that man is should, as moral power, work goodness in him. But also in the good man there is expansion, the capacity for growth. It is likewise with sinful man. He is entirely evil, but his evil nature can develop, and to the same degree the level of sin also increase.

b) Sin always has reference to a law—and not just to a law in general, but specifically to a law of God. Precisely because they saw clearly that one cannot arrive at a correct understanding of sin if one does not establish it beginning with God, the old dogmatists placed much emphasis on this element when they said that sin is nonconformity to God’s law. That is the formal aspect of sin. If one can now describe the content of the law materially, then the problem would be solved as to what the material aspect of sin is. Now Scripture teaches that the law is fulfilled in love, and all its demands may be reduced to the one demand of love. That law, however, is the expression of God’s being insofar as it is a norm. Therefore, we cannot go further than to affirm that love for God is the material aspect of moral goodness and that the opposite of this is the material aspect of moral evil.

c) God’s law has to do not merely with already actually present persons, but also with representative and ideally present persons. Without yet being nonconformed to it habitu and actu [in disposition and act], one can be so by imputation, by reckoning. That is why sin extends to status, to being reckoned in the judgment of God. And here the rule holds that originally in Adam the actus [act] determined the status, but that subsequently for all his posterity status has determined actus. To give a complete definition of sin, we will have to say that it is nonconformity to God's law in status [status], habitus [disposition], and actus [act].

d) Sin includes guilt and pollution. Pollution is understood as spiritual, inherent depravity to which a sinful soul falls prey. Pollution is therefore not present before the soul itself is present. It is inconceivable without antecedent and subsequent guilt. Guilt, however, is conceivable without pollution. In Adam's first sinful motion, guilt and pollution coincided. Guilt does not necessarily presuppose the actual presence of the soul. One can be guilty covenantally. It is not something that was a reality in man but a reality with respect to man. Guilt exists in the judgment of God. It is called reatus [liability] by the theologians. One distinguishes, then, between a) reatus culpae [liability to guilt] and b) reatus poenae [liability to punishment]. By reatus culpae, one means the turpitude and criminality that is inseparable from any sin in the judgment of God and men. As something individual, it cannot be transmitted to another. It is otherwise for reatus poenae, obligation to punishment. This is transferable.

e) As concerns its center, sin resides in the will of man. Its effects extend also to the intellect and the capacity for emotions, to the entire man, the body included. The entire man is, in his sinful state, the object of God's displeasure. In its origination, however, sin comes from the will, namely from the will understood as voluntas, as the deeper spiritual orientation of man. To conceive of a human being that at the same time would possess a perfect will and a deficient intellectual and emotional life is impermissible. But if we imagine such a being, it could not be called sinful. In Christ there was something like this during His state of humiliation, but in His will there was nothing sinful and therefore He was pure in Himself and had no need of ethical sanctification, just as He did not need justification for Himself. One should keep in view, however, that the will of man is a reasoning will and not blind instinct, and furthermore that it is the will of a responsive being that necessarily has to react to the objects of its will. Man can only desire by means of his intellect and emotions, and so these three are closely connected such that they act together in every sinful deed. And the same is true for the habitus [disposition]. Our voluntas [will], too, is a moral tendency and inclination, going together with emotion. One may never forget that the three faculties of the soul in their distinctions are abstractions of what is given to us in our experience only as a living unity.

f) We can be in a sinful status without possessing pollution, but guilt and pollution are both connected to a sinful habitus [disposition]. According to the Pelagians, in contrast, one cannot speak of a sinful habitus in a proper sense. Every sin, according to their conception, exists in actus [as act]. Only with the free act, with the choice of the will, do guilt and pollution emerge for man. [i.e., they object to the imputation of Adam's sin to all of mankind.]

3. Describe in its general features the Pelagian doctrine of sin.

The principal position of the Pelagians is that our ability is the measure of our obligation and our responsibility to do good. In contrast, Augustine's consciousness of his dependence is expressed in the prayer: “Da quod jebes et quod vis” [“Give what you command, and command what you will”]. The following positions were contained in the Pelagian postulate:

- a) The freedom of the will is liberum arbitrium [free will] as abstract possibility at every moment to turn in either direction. The will is thus formed, concerning its quality, without a cause. The will arises from a willing subject, but in this subject no basis is to be found or indicated in advance exactly why the will becomes good or evil. [this is where Pelagianism/Arminianism gets crazy; anything to avoid accountability for sin. It is this so-called nebulous idea of equilibrium in the will that they insist that God cannot or should not do violence to, by his divine influence which is directly contrary to scripture, e.g., Phil. 2:13 – God works in you to will and to do; For Arminians, et al, everything originates from man’s so-called self-determined will. See Owen’s book, A Display of Arminianism].
- b) Accordingly, all sin exists in a clear, conscious, direct choice of evil.
- c) There is no original sin. Men today are born without virtue and without sin, morally neutral. Heredity and sin are two concepts that clearly exclude each other.
- d) This postulate also has a retroactive effect. That is to say, as little as innate virtue or innate sin is conceivable, just as little may innate holiness be thought of in Adam before the fall of our first parents. He was created by God in a state of innocence that stood below developed reasoning. Adam was neither good nor evil. He could only become either by his own free choice.
- e) When Adam fell, only his own nature was thereby changed. Cain, Abel, and Seth only became worse as the bad example of their parents was constantly before their eyes. The power of this example, however, does not at all necessarily lead to sin in all situations. Thus, every man is put to the test individually. Death is not a punitive evil, because children, who cannot have sinned, also die. There have also been adults, however, who have actually lived without sin.
- f) Redemption from sin apart from the gospel is possible. The light of the gospel makes easy, however, the complete obedience that is required. When the Pelagians nevertheless speak of grace, then by that they do not understand, as we do, the supernatural grace of the Holy Spirit but everything we receive from God’s goodness in the broadest sense of this word.
- g) Children do not have a moral character. Their baptism is only to be viewed as a sign of dedication to God. Augustine uses infant baptism as one of his most powerful arguments against the teaching of Pelagius. This is one of the strongest historical proofs for the antiquity of infant baptism, for if Pelagius had seen any chance to challenge the apostolic character of the baptism of infants, he surely would not have neglected to do it. He, to the contrary, had to make do with a symbolic interpretation of baptism and left the fact, as fact, stand untouched.

4. On what basis does this Pelagian doctrine of sin have to be condemned?

- a) The main proposition that our ability is the measure of our responsibility to do good conflicts with all testimonies of our conscience. It is an indisputable truth that with the increase of sin our inability to do good increases. Now if the Pelagian teaching were true, sin would free its own victims by relieving them of their responsibility. The more sinful a man would become, the smaller would be his responsibility. One may flatter oneself here and there with such a conception, and the sinful heart may try to hide behind its own inability; the conscience continues to testify against it. It teaches that our obligation and our responsibility are independent of what we are able to do in our sinful condition. Not what we can but what we ought to be determines our responsibility.

b) To say that man by nature does not possess a moral character is to call him an animal. Everything that is not expressly a conscious choice of the will is thereby robbed of its moral quality. Now every man feels that his inclinations, his moods, his expressions of emotion are subject to the contrast between good and evil, that they possess a moral character. God's children delight in His law according to the inner man [Rom 7:22]. Sin and virtue that are not connected with the root of his life are made superficial appendages to man.

c) An uncaused choice of free will is not only metaphysically and psychologically inexplicable but also ethically worthless. If no other ground than coincidence can be given why a good deed did not turn out differently, then there is also no essential distinction in the deed itself by means of which both these products, respectively, would be produced. If the man as a character does not stand behind his act, the latter loses all value. Only as an exponent of character does an act possess the ethical quality that we are accustomed to ascribe to it.

d) The Pelagian theory leaves the universality of sin entirely unexplained. The bad example of parents and ancestors is no basis of explanation. The possibility that all have sinned, as an abstract possibility, does not explain why they all have actually sinned. It is much more plausible to assume a universal predisposition to sin as basis for the universality of sin.

e) The theory leaves no room for the activity of God's grace. It is irreligious insofar as the essence of religion is situated in our dependence (both in willing and working) on God. The prayer for the influence of God's Spirit to fit us for doing good is for the Pelagian an impossibility. Or if he can pray, he becomes in the same moment in which he prays rightly an Augustinian Christian.

5. What are the causes of the ambiguity of Roman Catholic teaching concerning sin?

- a) Before the Council of Trent little consensus ruled among theologians.
- b) The pronouncements of the council itself are not unambiguous.
- c) They are interpreted in different senses.

6. In what difficulty did the Tridentine Council find itself?

On the one hand, it had to reject the teaching of the Reformers, and on the other hand, it could not openly abandon the teaching of Augustine. And yet both agreed with each other. Augustine had taught what the Reformers taught.

7. What appears to be the actual Roman Catholic teaching concerning sin as natural or inherent evil?

- a) That sin in its essence must always exist in a conscious act of the will.
- b) That, consequently, indwelling concupiscence, which through the loss of original righteousness has the upper hand, can as such not yet be considered punishable sin.
- c) That the sinfulness of Adam's posterity is a status rather than a condition, or at least is only a negative condition. It exists in the lack of something that should be present; it is the absence of original righteousness.
- d) Just for that reason it is removed in baptism quoad materiam [materially]. Concupiscence does remain, but does not have the character of sin.

8. What is meant by original sin, peccatum originale?

By that we understand:

- a) The sinful, guilty state into which we have come by Adam's first sin.
- b) The inherent corruption with which, as the result of this state, we are born, is called (a) hereditary guilt, (b) hereditary pollution.

9. Do all assume a connection between Adam's sin and ours?

No.

- a) As was shown above, Pelagian teaching on sin denies any real connection.
- b) The older Arminian theory teaches a natural impotence inherited from Adam, which, however, does not include any guilt for which we are not responsible and for which, rather, God owes us a remedy.
- c) The later Wesleyan Arminianism no longer denied that guilt adheres to this inborn corruption but still gave no explanation regarding on what legal ground this guilt rested.
- d) The New school theory teaches that the ground for their later becoming sinful is inborn in all men, but that this ground in itself cannot be called sin because sin exists exclusively in the clearly conscious, intentional violation of law.

10. What different theories have been formed to explain the data of Scripture concerning Adam's fall and our sinful condition?

- a) The federal theory, which, by positing a covenant of works, has Adam representing us in his probation, as a consequence of which his sin becomes legally our sin. This is called immediate imputation.
- b) The theory of mediate imputation. This means that we are responsible for Adam's sin only insofar as we possess the same sinful nature with him.

c) The realistic theory, also called the Augustinian theory, according to which Adam's sin has become our sin not only representatively but also really because we existed in Adam and sinned with him (compare also the preexistence theory).

Pgs. 266-288 on Sin cont.

Love for God, the principal from which all our acts should flow.
& the mystery of sin's first appearance in Adam

25. What is the rationale for the probation command?

That God made a morally neutral thing the point of decision appears, as was just noted, to have had the purpose of ridding sin of all incidental features and to lay it bare at its core. If man sinned against this command, then it could be for no other reason than that he chose evil as evil and rejected good as good. Because God's will is for us the binding power, and love toward God should permeate all our moral relationships, a command that depended solely on God's will was extremely well suited to place man before the pointed choice: only because of God's will, or not.

Now, however, it has been proposed that only by such a probation command did the possibility exist for Adam to do something because of God's will. This is not the case. By the probation command, the possibility was given that it would come to light how Adam could also do good only because of God's will. Even considered apart from the probation command, Adam was obligated not do anything because of his own will, and he did nothing only because his inclination urged him to do it. In everything, the deepest motivation had to be love to God, and it was in fact so as long as Adam remained unfallen. Thus if one maintains that Adam could do something on account of God's will only through the probation command and the choice before which it placed him, then one has accepted in principle the Pelagian theory of a state of innocence in which man has inclinations that lead to doing good but in which the good as a moral power is still not yet awakened in him. Thus one must reject this view. One ought to also hold, despite all difficulties, that the abstract and in itself neutral command, "You shall not eat of it," resonated in Adam and that he, being perfectly holy, felt an inclination and natural tendency of the soul to obey the command. So for Adam, the choice was not between his inclination to eat the fruit and an abstract command that aroused no resonance in him but between two inclinations: the one toward the fruit, the other toward keeping God's command. The question, then, was which of those two he would follow. And when he followed the former, then this could only reside in the fact that the other inclination out of love for God to fulfill His command had receded or was weakened. Additional comment on this subject of lack of love for God in the unregenerate on page 276 regarding man's total depravity:

Total depravity, on the other hand, does mean that by nature no love for God is present as the motivating principle of our life: that it does not dwell in us as a disposition and therefore never determines our deeds, thoughts, and words; and, conversely, that in our entire life there is an undertow of hostility toward God that only needs an external stimulus to develop into conscious opposition toward the Lord. There is no spiritual good in us.

With this, we stand before the mystery of sin and of its first appearance. In Adam's disposition toward God Himself lies the mysterious ground of the origin of sin. In an inexplicable way, that inclination ceased, reversed. In it itself lay the beginning point of sin. The rationale for the probation command is thus to be sought in the fact that it only isolated Adam's holy disposition to fulfill God's will entirely from other considerations and influences in order then in a mysterious way to place before it the occasion for decision. It does not appear that the sensual inclination to eat the fruit came into conflict with the initial spiritual inclination. The way in which Satan approached Eve is not along the line of sensual inclination. He first arouses unbelief, distrust, desire for illicit knowledge, then achieves the latter with her consideration of the fruit in this respect with a view to the act of eating. From all this it is apparent what little logical warrant one has in saying that Adam and Eve could not fall other than in this way. We know absolutely nothing about how they are now fallen and could fall. How then should we presume to make a judgment about whether or not they could have fallen in another way?

29. In what is the material principle of Eve's or Adam's first sin to be sought?

a) This matter has been judged very differently. In general, we can anticipate from the outset that what generally constitutes the essence of sin will also have constituted the seed in this first sin. Our consideration of the probation command given above leads directly to this conclusion.

b) We find the essence of sin in general to be this: that man (1) divorces himself and his relationships from God; (2) places them as a separate center in opposition to God; (3) makes them act against God. We will have to discover all three of these traits in the first sin. We find, in fact, that Satan incites Eve to regard God's prohibition as a limitation of human rights and freedoms. In his question he presents it as worse than it is and asks whether God has also forbidden eating of every tree. Eve does deny that this prohibition was general, but she takes up the representation of the evil One insofar as she, in turn, presents the prohibition more strictly than it was given ("nor touch it"), speaks about it with a note of an aggrieved sense of justice, and ascribes to God the obligation above all to have to care for man's well-being ("in order that you do not die"). One sees here how all three elements mentioned above are already potentially present. The two spheres of divine justice and human justice are already separated. They are no longer concentric. This happened as soon as Eve began to reflect on the relationship there was between her own rights and freedoms and the prohibition of God. This is temptation: to shift the center of our lives from God to a point outside God; and this, therefore, is already the actual fall.

c) This fall equally underlies all the different forms in which sin immediately appears outwardly. It is, therefore, a hopeless task to say that this or that sin has been the first. At the most, one can say that this or that form of sin has manifested itself first. And so we find:

1. The manifestation of this fall is in the consciousness; there man recognizes himself as no longer living from God and for God. This is the sin of unbelief. Man no longer feels solidarity with God. He has the sense that God wishes to deceive him and therefore considers His words to be untruth.
2. The manifestation of the fall is in the alignment of the will of man. He no longer makes himself subject to God but seeks to be like God, above all not less than God.
3. The manifestation is in the emotional life of man. That he looks with lust and desire at the fruit that was forbidden by God shows how his emotion, too, functions in a wrong way, that it is no longer an enjoying of things in God but a godless losing of himself in things outside God.

d) Although all these were only manifestations of sin and not the real root itself, they still belong to the fullness of the first sin. Because it is of the essence of sin that it does not remain hidden but acts itself out, in this respect the first sin, too, had to be typical. The relation that exists between sinful disposition, sinful thoughts, the summoning up of the will, and sinful action is not external but organic. That it turns into action reveals just how deeply sin has taken hold. It is, therefore, useless speculation to ask what would have happened if Adam and Eve had not proceeded to the sinful act. Humanly speaking, the act could not have remained in abeyance.

e) The difficulty that remains in all this is here: We can certainly understand how inciting motives from the outside can be at work on man, provided that first from within, in an immediate way, the disposition is produced to which those motives are directed. God acts in this manner in the re-creation of man. He also works from the outside through His word. That can be because He has first awakened life from within in a direct manner. But Satan could not do that. He cannot reorder the inner being of man, and if he had been able to, then man could hardly be considered responsible for it. From this follows the mysteriousness of this conjoining process. Just as it is, it seems to be nothing but an enticing to outward expression of a sinful principle that was present already from within. Yet it is more. What we can understand is the working of sin from the inside out. To that precedes the penetration of sin from the outside to the inside. This precedence, this wonder, we do not understand. With us, the disposition determines the deed, both in the natural state and in regeneration; with Adam, the deed determined the disposition.

f) One may not say that Adam fell because the grace of God left him, but through his fall, one must say, Adam fell in an incomprehensible way from the grace of God.

30. What were the consequences of Adam's first sin for himself?

- a) Coinciding immediately with the first sin, and therefore not to be called a consequence in the strict sense, was the total corruption of human nature— thus, that there was now nothing more in it that was in accord with the demand of God’s law.
- b) Related most closely to this was the loss of the gift of fellowship with God through the Holy Spirit. This is just the other side of what is noted in a). Both can be summarized in the proposition that man by his first sin lost the image of God—that is, insofar as it was losable.
- c) This radical change in man took place not only in the reality of his condition, but it also was reflected immediately in his consciousness. Hence the accusing conscience, the fear of God, the sense of shame.
- d) From His side, God also showed by actions how the condition of man and the relationship to Him was changed. Because paradise and the tree of life had been images and seals of the blessings promised in the covenant of works, man must be deprived of the sight of them. Hence banishment from paradise, the cherubim with the burning blade of a sword, and the declaration that “he may not reach out his hand and take of the tree of life.”
- e) The relationship of guilt is discussed above.

Pgs 272-288 – on Original Sin: many good comments on bondage of the will, natural and moral inability, etc., and dangers of the sinner’s prayer \(go to code457a\)

31. With what designation do theologians indicate what we in Dutch call erfzonde [“hereditary sin”]?

For that they use the term peccatum originale (English, “original sin”).

32. Why is this terminology more accurate than the one used in Dutch?

Because it comports better with everything considered to be hereditary sin. If one distinguishes two things, (a) the guilt imputed to us for Adam’s first sin, and (b) the corruption inherent in us as punishment for this imputed guilt, then one sees immediately that, strictly speaking, only the latter is inherited. The former is not inherited but is imputed to us. It is transmitted from Adam to us in the tribunal of God, but in an immediate way, not by heredity. Peccatum originale [original sin] expresses that better than hereditary sin [Dutch erfzonde].

33. *How then is the expression peccatum originale [original sin] to be understood?*

- a) Sin is called peccatum originale insofar as in its origin it stems from the root of the human race.
- b) Insofar as it has originated in us, not, according to the Pelagian conception, by imitation, but is original in us. We bring it with us inherently.

c) Insofar as it is the origin of all other sin, namely actual sinning. Although the terminology was not consciously calculated by someone to express all these ideas, still it is, once in use, an excellent instrument to summarize all this in just a couple of words.

34. In what does this original sin consist insofar as it is inherited (= peccatum inhaerens = hereditary pollution; in distinction from peccatum imputatum = hereditary guilt)? It consists of two parts:

a) The absence of the original righteousness. This is an inherited deficiency, a privation, the lack of something that should be there. Man is not only obliged to the bearing of punishment when he sins, because this sin is positively against God, but also because through this sin God is denied the obedience that is due Him. As was seen above, Roman Catholics make this the only element in inherited original sin.

b) The presence of positive evil that has entered in place of positive good.

35. What must be observed concerning this second, positive element of inherent original sin?

a) That it is sin essentially and in the proper sense of the word. In opposition to all who go along with us only halfway and here want to speak of sin in the figurative sense (the Greek fathers, the Remonstrants), one has only to pose the question whether personal guilt adheres to it. The answer to that decides everything. Whoever denies it does not hold to the biblical doctrine of inherent corruption.

b) That, nevertheless, it is not a substance that is infused into the human soul, nor a change of substance in the metaphysical sense of this word. [if it were a substance then God would have created it, which clearly cannot be, for God would be the author of sin.] This was the error of the Manicheans and of Flacius Illyricus at the time of the Reformation. By making sin a substance, one outstrips one's self in zeal to maintain it as a reality. Sin as substance ceases to be sin. It is inseparable from the concept of sin in that it is within the sphere of quality and not of substance.

c) In his polemic against the Manicheans, Augustine introduced a philosophical element into the concept of sin that subsequently has never disappeared from it. He taught not only that sin is not a substance, but further that it is deprivation of being, that is, a negation. He used here the terminology of the Neoplatonists and of Origen. This view in its turn, however, is related to the pantheistic theory that sin is limitation. Therefore, it is better to exclude this philosophical element from the concept of sin. Augustine wanted to point out that sin was not necessary and was not caused by God, and therefore he thought he had to make it negative. With him, we believe both, but deem it unnecessary to make this philosophical consideration the foundation of this belief.

1. It shows only that God need not be the cause of sin, but it does not prove that He is not the cause. There we also stand. We reject with indignation the proposition that God has in any way caused sin, but we cannot make it clear logically that He has nothing to do with the origin of sin. We recognize a mystery here.

2. It seems to us dangerous for the right view of sin to describe it as negative. It is a positive power in life.

3. Orthodox theology of later times has dropped this philosophical element in the teaching of Augustine, where it has insisted that sin should not be viewed as mera privatio (“mere deprivation”), but as actuosa privatio (“active privation”).

d) Thus sin is not a substance, [for God would have had created it making him the author of sin] but it is also not mere privation. Rather, it should be called a habitus, a disposition, that is inherent in the substance and can be changed without essential change of the latter. Furthermore, it is a habitus [disposition] that forms an antithesis with what is opposed to it, from which the substance of the soul cannot escape. As it belongs to the nature of matter to possess extension, so it belongs to the nature of the substance of the human soul to possess a moral disposition, good or evil.

e) Because the sinful habitus is inherent in the soul as a whole, it extends to every capacity of the soul, to the entire life of the soul, and leaves nothing untouched. The corruption of sin resides not only in the lower capacities, as if the higher remain sound, but in both lower and higher. Everything is alienated from God and therefore the object of his displeasure. One calls this “total depravity.” The meaning of this term is to be derived from the description we gave of the essence and the form of sin. If the distinguishing characteristic of sin is in relation to God, so total depravity will also have to be thought of in relation to God. By it is not meant:

1. That everyone is as bad as he can be or become. Although alienated from God and hostile toward God, in this hostility man can still have different grades of intensity.

2. Nor does it mean that the sinner carries about no knowledge of the will of God in his conscience. The conscience is an action of the moral consciousness of man. Even this moral consciousness is affected by sin, but since man has remained a rational being, the recognition of this fact can never disappear entirely from his consciousness. The conscience is the recognition of it. That it has remained, however, does not in the least prove that there is any good toward God in him. It is something cognitive. The conscience does operate on the will and on the emotions, but it does so through selfish motives.

3. Nor thereby is it meant that the one man cannot be more selfish than the other. All are sinful and selfish toward God, but within this circle of selfishness, in which the natural man moves, there are many concentric circles. A sinner, despite his selfishness toward God, can have a generous heart for his surroundings. Thus, while the one person includes much within himself in order to set it with himself against God, the other remains in almost complete isolation toward both God and world. There is thus a justitia civilis [civil righteousness], although at the same time for God everything that belongs to it is sin.

4. Sin has different forms in which it can manifest itself. No one ever has displayed all these forms in himself. The adjective “total” in the expression “total depravity” does not have in view that all possible depravity would be present in man. Total depravity, on the other hand, does mean that by nature no love for God is present as the motivating principle of our life: that it does not dwell in us as a disposition and therefore never determines our deeds, thoughts, and words; and, conversely, that in our entire life there is an undertow of hostility toward God that only needs an external stimulus to develop into conscious opposition toward the Lord. There is no spiritual good in us.

f) Considered from another side, this inherent depravity is “inability for spiritual good.” If man is sinful in everything and nothing but sinful, then from that it already follows that the sinner does no good. In this sense, inability is the impossibility of doing spiritual good. Inability, however, is also understood in another sense, namely as the impossibility of reversing the direction of one’s own will, so that from being evil it would become good. In this second sense, too, man is incapable.

36. What is meant by the distinction between natural and moral inability, and why should it be rejected?

Many wish to deny the natural inability of man and maintain our moral inability. By that they mean that man, even in his fallen state, possesses the natural capacities that could be used in doing spiritual good. He has a rational understanding, a capacity of the will, etc. The basis for what is good is completely present in him. He is, however, morally incapable—that is, not able to put these natural capacities into operation in a right way. Against this distinction the following should be noted:

a) The opposition between moral and natural is wrong and misleading. Moral and natural do not exclude each other. Something can be both at the same time. When it is said of man that he is incapable of spiritual good, this inability is natural because it is innate to his corrupt nature and with this corrupt nature is passed down from parent to child. Whoever then denies that the inability is natural appears to deny that it is natural in any sense of the word, while he only means what is explained above.

b) One usually uses the opposition between natural and moral inability to emphasize man’s responsibility. Because both adjectives, “natural” and “moral,” belong with the word “inability,” the appearance arises as if there are two degrees of inability, one less strong that is “moral” and one stronger called “natural.” In common usage, in a more or less Pelagian manner, one associates with the term “moral” an idea of variability that is not associated with the term “natural.” So the misconception arises that the inability of man for spiritual good is only a relative inability.

c) The distinction conceives of the will far too much as an abstraction. It is true that the sinful and good habitus [disposition] of the will have in common this abstract character of the will that they are both dispositions of the will. By that is not meant, however, that this abstraction exists in itself, apart from its inherent determination. Only if that were the case would it have any meaning to say that man is incapable because he has an evil will but still not incapable by nature because he has a will. One senses that the possession of a will takes away nothing from its inability unless one conceives of this will in a Roman Catholic-supernaturalistic sense, undetermined by nature. Then its natural presence can be viewed as a lessening of inability. The entire distinction, therefore, belongs in the Roman Catholic system and not on Reformed terrain.

d) The element of truth in it amounts to this: When it is said of man that he is spiritually incapable, then the idea appears to be present that he would want to change himself if only he could. This idea is completely wrong. In fallen man there is no spark present of this desire to change himself. Now the advocates of the distinction being discussed here say that man could do spiritual good, if only he wanted to. They stress that he is willingly evil. To place emphasis on that is far from unnecessary. Still, the idea is too much in vogue, as if spiritual inability is our fate and not our will, as if we groan under it but with the best will cannot escape it. This idea is prevalent especially in circles where one hides behind his inability and by appealing to it tries to avoid responsibility toward the gospel. Therefore, it must always be pointed out that inability and unwillingness are two sides of one and the same matter. We do not will what is good, and we cannot change our will. Still, it is not necessary, in order to put emphasis on this point, to adopt the distinction between natural and moral inability. One could just as well appeal to the continuing presence of the image of God in the broader sense. In it is already included that man has not lost his capacities of the will, intellect, and emotion.

e) The proposition that man is naturally not incapable also seems to deny that his capacities of intellect, will, etc., are weakened by sin to the greatest extent. The reason man is and remains evil is not only that those capacities operate in a perverse direction. Even if this moral direction were changed for a time, if with that change a change of these capacities themselves did not also take place by which they received their old power and perfection again, man could still not do a single deed that counts as perfect for God. The clarity of the intellect, the power of the will, the tone of the emotions—all are damaged in sinful man. In that, too, his inability exists, and this is one of the reasons why, for example, the good deeds of God’s children here on earth are never perfect. So, even if one would accept the distinction between natural and moral, natural inability must still be maintained.

37. Does the spiritual inability of man consist of the loss of his free will, his liberum arbitrium?

This question should be answered in different ways. If by “free will” one means the spontaneity that the soul works from itself without compulsion, this characteristic is inseparably connected with the concept of will. An unfree, enslaved will, then, is a contradictio in adjecto, something that never has existed and never can exist.

If, however, by “free will” one means the abstract possibility that the will of man turns from good to evil or from evil to good, then this liberum arbitrium existed before the fall but no longer after the fall. This is also what theologians meant when they listed the loss of the liberum arbitrium as one of the consequences of sin. Man did possess the capacity to make evil from good, but not the capacity to make good again from evil. The latter, the bringing about of something good as well as the abolishing of something evil, is the exclusive prerogative of the omnipotence of God. And inasmuch as now, after his fall, man must always do evil contrary to the testimony of his conscience, and sin hinders the development and free movement of all his powers, one may speak in this sense, too, of a lack of freedom and bondage in which he exists as sinner.

38. How can you prove this teaching of the inability of man for doing spiritual good?

It is proven:

- a) From the fact that Scripture nowhere ascribes to fallen man any capacity to do good of himself.
- b) From the express declaration of Scripture that the opposite is the case. Compare John 15:4, 5; 6:44; Romans 8:7; 1 Corinthians 2:14.
- c) From the form in which Scripture presents to us the doctrine of original sin. In this connection two features especially must be noted. The natural condition of sinful man is portrayed as a condition of death and as a fleshly condition. The point of comparison in both of these images includes the utter inability for spiritual good. As little as a dead person can stir or lifeless flesh can achieve an expression of life, just so little can the natural man do what is good toward God.
- d) From the explanation of Scripture that man is not only negatively dead toward God and fleshly passive but also, moreover, that in this death lurks a principle of development and of hostility against God. Man, therefore, is not shackled in total inability by a single bond, but by two bonds.
- e) From the necessity that the favor and fellowship of God are indispensable for man if he will produce spiritual good. As long as the wrath of God rests on him, nothing in his life can prosper. The consciousness of the judgment under which he lies, without having yet reckoned with other things, cuts off every good deed at the root. f) From the necessity of the immediate working of grace by the Holy Spirit in regeneration. This is the other side of what was said under c). Everywhere the Holy Spirit is presented as the one who awakes life and the source of life. Nowhere in Scripture does the human soul appear as a self-changing subject, but always as an object that becomes changed from the outside by affecting grace. Hence there is spoken of a new birth, a new creation, a resurrection from the dead. g) From the experience of the children of God. None will assert that he is capable of doing what the law demands of him. The awareness of guilt of an awakened sinner also includes, among other things, the conviction that he is bound by sin and cannot save himself. This sense of helplessness is precisely the characteristic of true repentance. Inasmuch, then, as the latter is nothing other than a coming to be aware of the real condition of man, we can infer from it that this in fact is a condition of inability.

The following point addresses the wicked presumption of the sinner's prayer, especially pt. (c).

39. Which objections have been advanced against this doctrine of total inability?

a) That it is incompatible with the moral responsibility of man. To this we respond with the following:

1. Inability to do good is only incompatible with responsibility if this inability has a non-moral origin. For man this is not the case. He cannot, but that is because the direction of his will is wrong, going against God. It is not a natural capacity to will that is lacking in him, but the good moral quality of his capacity. This is what we found to be the kernel of truth in the distinction between natural and moral inability. Only we would also want to call this moral inability natural, inasmuch as it belongs to the nature of man to be moral and to be good.

2. In human judicial proceedings, which are carried out in the name of God, responsibility is not limited by inability. No judge will maintain that the guilty person was always capable of desisting from the act for which he was condemned. Nevertheless, he pronounces the verdict on it. Still more than this, the judge will rightly seek the ground for his verdict in the relationship between character and deed. That is why it always counts as valid evidence when one seeks to show that there is no correspondence between the character of the accused and the deed with which he is charged.

b) That it removes every impulse to act. However, it does so only with respect to doing acts of holiness. Hence it is presented more clearly in the New Testament than under the old covenant, when the economy was still a legal one. With respect to the activities of the soul directed toward receiving the benefits of the covenant of grace, there can be no thought of removing an impulse, simply because these activities do not come into consideration as spiritually good acts but as instrumental acts. When the demand of the covenant of grace for faith and repentance comes to someone, the meaning of it is not, "perform a spiritually good deed, then you will be saved," but "acknowledge that your salvation is in Christ." Of course, it therefore remains the case for faith and repentance that in them a principle of spiritual good is present, for we teach that they are impossible without regeneration. But in the appropriation of the benefits of the covenant of grace, they do not figure under this aspect. Moreover, even the faith by which one is justified, viewed materially, is still an expression of a soul stained with sin and unrighteousness, which for its cleansing, which faith itself imparts, is in need of the righteousness of Christ. The faith, by which we are justified, is itself not righteous before God.

c) That it leads to postponing conversion. One says that it leads man to the thought, “I must wait on God’s time.” This, however, is by no means the case. If man lives with the consciousness of being able of his own power and on his own initiative to effect his conversion or even his regeneration, this could be for him a source of indifference and carelessness. It is capable of psychological proof that those actions that are in our own power result in no deeper movement in the life of our soul, while, on the contrary, the consciousness of inability and helpless passivity in important concerns can shake man in his deepest depths. So too here. Whoever preaches to man that he can change himself must expect that he will delay this easy change from one hour to the next. On the other hand, it can never have harmful consequences to tell man the full truth concerning his condition, provided that one but takes care that this inability itself is impressed on the conscience as guilt and responsibility.

40. From what can one determine extensively the scope of original sin?

a) Scripture everywhere teaches that all flesh is sinful and has corrupted its way before God (Job 14:4; John 3:6; Rom 3:9ff.; 1 Kgs 8:46; Psa 143:2; Prov 20:9; Eccl 7:20; Gal 3:22; 1 John 1:8). If now every man, for whom this holds true, committed no actual sin (for example, newborn children), then that involves that they are guilty because of original sin.

b) Sin reveals itself in man so early that there can be no thought of becoming sinful by imitating the example of others. Scripture teaches that this sin clings to us from the first moment of our existence (Psa 51:5). (One should note that in this psalm David does not cite indwelling corruption as an excuse but as an aggravating circumstance for his sin of adultery.) “By nature children of wrath” (Eph 2:3; cf. Psa 58:3). That sin is nature means that it is given with our being human and follows the natural line of reproduction. Moreover, this text includes that this innate sin is under the wrath of God—thus not in the Zwinglian or Arminian sense of sickness or defect but fully doom-worthy sin.

c) The consequences of sin are common. Temporal death extends to all, even to children who did not sin in the likeness of Adam’s sin. Where the consequence is present, the cause has to be present. Therefore, it was rightly seen by the Socinians and Remonstrants that, according to their system, corporal death could have no ethical meaning but must be a process of nature. Compare Romans 5:12–14. New School theology has seen itself compelled to return to this un-Christian and unscriptural position and to consider children before their use of reason to be on the same level with animals, although there are many who dare not take this position.

d) Scripture everywhere teaches that every single person has need of redemption through Christ. Now this redemption is in the first place redemption from the guilt of sin and the power of sin. If one wishes to limit the scope of original sin, then at the same time one thereby limits the necessity of redemption through Christ. Children are baptized as a sign and seal that they are washed in Christ's blood. Infant baptism, then, is a proof of the reality of original sin. To say that for children redemption is not deliverance from evil (but merely a means of preventing evil) is of no avail because it conflicts directly with the continuous significance of the means of grace. Compare John 3:3, 5, where the absolute necessity of regeneration for every person is taught (cf. Acts 17:30; Mark 16:16). If one does not believe in Christ, then one does not only then come under the wrath of God, but the wrath of God remains on such a person (John 3:36).

e) If some places in Scripture seem to teach that sin is not universal to man, then one must consider three things in that regard.

1. There is a justitia civilis [civil righteousness]. In civil matters, one can be free from intentional violation of the law without therefore being sinless before God.

2. There is a covenantal righteousness within Israel. The one who, as much as is within him, fulfills all the ceremonial commandments of the Mosaic law, possesses this covenantal righteousness, which at the most has only a typical significance but is not the righteousness of faith itself, much less the righteousness of works. Many places in the Psalms should be understood in this way.

3. There is an imputed righteousness that one possesses in Christ, which, instead of presupposing inherent righteousness, pointedly excludes it. One will be able to take all texts that speak of the righteousness and sinlessness of man back to one of these three groups.

f) Experience shows that no sinless creature has lived. Even those who deny original sin in principle cannot deny this fact and try to give it as good an explanation as possible. Every other explanation than that of an inborn depravity that extends to all is, however, unsatisfactory. That not everyone recognizes himself as such is no proof of the contrary. Sin has a blinding power by which it tries to conceal its own presence, and, on the contrary, it is a fact that progress in grace goes along with a deeper insight into sin and the inability of the natural heart.

41. What answer should be given to the question how this inherent depravity of Adam is transmitted to us?

- a) Negatively, the answer to that question given by most Reformed theologians was that sin as something immaterial cannot lurk in the seed of the father—that therefore the propagation of sin must have another ground than the origin of the body from this seed.

- b) That neither can the propagation of sin be ascribed to the sinful quality of the actus [act] of generation. This was the opinion of Augustine. It is tied to a one-sided view of sin as concupiscentia carnis [the lust of the flesh]. That the act by which a man is born is entirely sinful still need not be the cause that the product of this seed also becomes sinful, for sin is a quality and not a substance; it is resident only in the soul of those who perform the act, and in their body only insofar as it is the organic instrument of this soul. In the deed as such, taken metaphysically or physically, there is nothing sinful.

c) A third conception, likewise rejected by the leading dogmatists, has the sinfulness of the soul taking its origin from its contact with the body. The soul would then be created without sin and first become sinful at the moment of union with the body. One then adds, however, to avoid materialistic (or, as well, traducianist) consequences, that it is not the corruption of the body or of the embryo in itself that causes sin—that it is much more the union of a soul, deprived of its original righteousness, with such a disharmonious body that does this. So, while sin in the strict sense cannot reside in the body in itself, it is possible, one thinks, that a certain condition of the body appropriated by the soul can become sin for it, because it lacks the positive holiness to suppress the passions of the flesh. And so sin would reside neither in the body in itself nor in the soul in itself but in nature, because it is just the nature of man that consists in the organic bond of body and soul. Peter Martyr Vermigli, Polanus, Benedictus Aretius, Hyperius, and Keckermann hold this view.

d) The opinion of most is that:

1. God imputes to the soul the guilt of Adam's first sin by virtue of the covenant.

2. After this has already occurred (in the judgment of God), before the actual existence of the soul, God appears, where it concerns the origination of souls, in the double capacity of creator and judge. As creator, He calls forth the substance of the soul out of nothing. As Judge, He withholds from this substance, already at the point of this creation, the habitus of original righteousness. (Only a few, Zanchi for example, teach that for a short while the soul possesses justitia originalis [original righteousness], then loses it immediately thereafter.)

3. A human soul thus coming into being without original righteousness must immediately pass over into positive inherent depravity. This, therefore, is a necessary and immediate consequence of what God withholds from the soul. It is a reality, a real process, but it is not something God does to the soul, only something that the soul undergoes through the particular way in which God creates it.

This last explanation appears to us to be the most probable. We have to admit, however, that it does not remove all objections. The great difficulty present here is that one: (a) wills to keep God free from creating sin; (b) will not have the soul existing a single moment without sin. Now both conditions appear unable to be united in a consistent theory. If God does not cause sin, then it must originate in the already-existing soul. It is then a transition from not being sinful to being sinful, and if one posits this starting point and this end point, one is obliged to let the soul exist sinless for at least in a small moment of time; hence what Zanchi taught regarding the initial possession and immediately following loss of original righteousness. The difficulty here is the same as we found in the section on providence with respect to God's involvement in the evil deeds of man. There, too, we could not specify a point where the activity of God can be excluded. Everything that was in the deed had to be sustained and brought about by God, and yet at the same time this deed had to take a direction and a quality that could not be called God's work. One may transfer that to the origin of the soul, and one will feel the difficulty. One could produce images here in great number, but they would all give only a more or less accurate general view of the matter; they cannot resolve the true problem.

Further, it should be observed that the soul is not created by God outside the body but in close communion with it. Insofar as the embryo is no longer formed from the outside by the maternal organism but itself bears within itself a forming principle, this principle must be found in the soul. And insofar as the embryo developing in this way thus still constitutes a part of the maternal organism, the soul enters also into the closest connection with the latter. Herein is the truth of traducianism. Soul and body stand in the most intimate connection with each other and are organically one. So if the body still constitutes a part of the mother, then this cannot remain without influence on the soul. However, it does not seem permissible to draw this out to the point where it would also extend to the propagation of sin. Thinking, the will, and the emotions are entirely or in part tied to bodily mechanisms, from which it follows that, conversely, their development is determined by the formation of these organs. The same cannot be said of sin. It may manifest itself by means of the body, and that it manifests itself by means of the body might be a measure of its intensity. In the strict sense, sin is purely psychological in nature.

Sin belongs to the natural condition of man once it became so by the fall. Everything that belongs to nature has to reproduce. God's ordinance is such that natural traits and characteristics will be common to parents and children. Conversely, what is purely personal and individual need not reproduce. Nature is the term under which we summarize everything that is common to man. Personality is not something specific to all in the same sense, but differs for everyone. We must hold that sin is natural sin and therefore follows the line of natural reproduction. How this happens we cannot explain further. The ground on which it happens is not located only in a natural law. And the natural character of this sin does not exclude that it also takes on a personal shape for each person. All have a sinful will and a darkened intellect and a depraved emotional life, but because the personality that possesses these capacities is different in each particular instance, sin will nowhere occur equally and develop equally in two individuals.

42. What is meant by the distinction between original sin and actual sin?

In this contrast, "act" should be taken in a broader sense than the word usually has. Here it does not mean external action that is manifested by means of our body, but every conscious welling up of the depravity that is unconsciously present in us. Evil thoughts in this way fall under this concept of actual sins as well as evil words and deeds. One can make the following division:

I.

Peccatum Originale [original sin]a) Adam's first deed imputed to us = peccatum imputatum.b) Inherent depravity as punishment for that = peccatum inhaerens.1. absentia justitiae originalis = absence of original righteousness.2. praesentia mali = presence of positive evil as habitus [disposition].

II.

Peccatum Actualis [actual sin]a) Sinful thoughts by which inherent depravity enters into our consciousness = peccata interna sive cordis.b) Sinful words and deeds by which sinful thoughts take shape externally = peccata externa sive oris et operis.

43. Can one defend the distinction between "mortal sins" (peccata mortalia) and "venial sins" (peccata venialia)?

Some of the older theologians, proceeding on the true proposition that there are degrees of intensity in the development of sin and that therefore all sins cannot be placed on the same line, wished to adopt this Roman Catholic distinction. Very quickly, however, one saw that it had a completely erroneous meaning for Rome. According to Rome, there are still sins that, considered in themselves, are not worthy of eternal death but only of temporal punishments or punishments in purgatory. Such sins are called peccata venialia. Contrary to this, Scripture teaches that every sin, without distinction, renders [one] guilty of death. All sins, viewed in this way, are mortal sins. There are no sins pardonable in themselves. If, on the other hand, one wishes to call pardonable those sins for which, by God's mercy, forgiveness can be received, all sins are pardonable, the sin against the Holy Spirit excepted. Then the latter is the only mortal sin. In Lutheran dogmatics, the distinction between peccata mortalia and venialia has yet another sense. Namely, it was taught that man can fall from the state of grace by certain transgressions because they are irreconcilable with faith. These are called peccata mortalia. Other sins of a less serious sort are compatible with the continuance of faith and for that reason are called peccata venialia. Since we reject the teaching of the falling away of the saints, we also naturally cannot accept this distinction.

44. What should be observed concerning the distinction between sins of commission and omission (peccata commissionis et omissionis)?

That in the strict sense true sins of omission do not exist. At the basis of all omission is a principle of commission in a wrong direction. If I love God less and forget God, then it is because something else has taken the place of God in my heart. Still, the sin of commission is greater if to this forgetting of God it adds conscious opposition to God.

Entering Into the New Covenant by Human Prayer?

Covenants in general, the covenant with Adam, etc.

John Owen Hebrews 8 10-12 vol. 23

http://www.prayermeetings.org/files/John_Owen/Hebrews_8.1-10.39.pdf

Now, God thus uttered his severity towards them, that they might consider how he will deal with all those who despise, break, or neglect his covenant. ‘So,’ saith he, ‘I dealt with them; and so shall I deal with others who offend in an alike manner.’

This was the issue of things with them with whom the first covenant was made. They received it, entered solemnly into the bonds of it, took upon themselves expressly the performance of its terms and conditions, were sprinkled with the blood of it; but they “continued not in it,” and were dealt with accordingly. God used the right and authority of a husband with whom a wife breaketh covenant; he “neglected them,” shut them out of his house, deprived them of their dowry or inheritance, and slew them in the wilderness.

On this declaration, God promiseth to make another covenant with them, wherein all these evils should be prevented. This is the covenant which the apostle designs to prove better and more excellent than the former. And this he doth principally from the mediator and surety of it, compared with the Aaronical priests, whose office and service belonged wholly unto the administration of that first covenant. And he confirms it also from the nature of this covenant itself, especially with respect unto its efficacy and duration. And hereunto this testimony is express, evidencing how this covenant is everlastingly, by the grace administered in it, preventive of that evil success which the former had by the sin of the people. [So this new covenant is a more clear declaration of what was promised to Adam in Gen 3:15, essentially God promised he would change the natures of the seed of the woman so as to break that league between them and the Serpent - his was obscurely expressed by this verse and later made more clear in Jer. 31:33 and other places regarding the taking out of the heart of stone, etc.]

Hence he says of it, Οὐ κατὰ τήν, —"Not according unto it;" a covenant agreeing with the former neither in promises, efficacy, nor duration. For what is principally promised here, namely, the giving of a new heart, Moses expressly affirms that it was not done in the administration of the first covenant. [therefore, since one who is praying to get saved is still under the covenant of works and thus does not have this new heart and all that goes with it! That's why he is praying; he thinks it is attained by works!! You can tell what covenant people are under by how they act regarding God's free grace; whether they think it is something to be earned or not.] It is neither a renovation of that covenant nor a reformation of it, but utterly of another nature, by whose introduction and establishment that other was to be abolished, abrogated, and taken away, with all the divine worship and service which was peculiar thereunto. And this was that which the apostle principally designed to prove and convince the Hebrews of. And from the whole we may observe sundry things.

Obs. VII. No covenant between God and man ever was, or ever could be stable and effectual, as unto the ends of it, that was not made and confirmed in Christ. —God first made a covenant with us in Adam. There was nothing therein but the mere defectibility of our natures as we were creatures that could render it ineffectual. [i.e., he did not have the Spirit of Adoption, was not "in Christ" "herein all things hold together. Col. 1:17] And from thence did it proceed. In him we all sinned, by breach of covenant. The Son of God had not then interposed himself, nor undertaken on our behalf. The apostle tells us that "in him all things consist;" —without him they have no consistency, no stability, no duration. So was this first covenant immediately broken. It was not confirmed by the blood of Christ. And those who suppose that the efficacy and stability of the present covenant do depend solely on our own will and diligence, had need not only to assert our nature free from that depravation which it was under when this covenant was broken, but also from that defectibility that was in it before we fell in Adam. And such as, neglecting the interposition of Christ, do betake themselves unto imaginations of this kind, surely know little of themselves, and less of God. [Hence, the sinner's prayer is presumption.]

Obs. VIII. No external administration of a covenant of God's own making, no obligation of mercy on the minds of men, can enable them unto steadfastness in covenant obedience, without an effectual influence of grace from and by Jesus Christ. —For we shall see in the next verses that this is the only provision which is made in the wisdom of God to render us steadfast in obedience, and his covenant effectual unto us. [another proof of the atonement being limited to those who actually produce fruit]

Obs. IX. God, in making a covenant with any, in proposing the terms of it, retains his right and authority to deal with persons according to their deportment in and towards that covenant: "They brake my covenant, and I regarded them not."

Obs. X. God's casting men out of his especial care, upon the breach of his covenant, is the highest judgment that in this world can fall on any persons. And we are concerned in all these things. For although the covenant of grace be stable and effectual unto all who are really partakers of it, yet as unto its external administration, and our entering into it by a visible profession, it may be broken, unto the temporal and eternal ruin of persons and whole churches. Take heed of the golden calf. [Another reason why the sinner's prayer, our entering into this covenant by a visible profession, is a dangerous presumption.]

Insights on Free Will

One Reason Why People Arrive at Free Will as a Reason For One's Conversion is Due To a Wrong Idea of the Nature of God's Power

Code432

Excerpt from Hermon Bavinck's book,
Reformed Dogmatics Vol. 4, pgs. 459-560
Bavinck is a Dutch reformed theologian (1854 to 1921)

The power of the human word also depends on the extent to which a person puts one's heart and soul into it, on the distance existing between the person and one's speech. But in the case of God that is different. It is always his word; he is always present in it; he consistently sustains it by his almighty and omnipresent power. It is always God himself who, in whatever form and by whatever means, brings it to people and calls them by it. Therefore, even though the word of God that is freely proclaimed by ministers or conveyed to people by way of personal admonition, public address, a book or other writing, is indeed taken from Scripture but not identical with Scripture, it is still a word from God, a word that comes to human beings but is originally from God, is spoken in the power of the Holy Spirit and therefore always effective. The word of God is never separate from God, from Christ, from the Holy Spirit; it has no permanence or existence in itself. It cannot be deistically separated from its creator and author. Just as Scripture was not just inspired at one time by the Holy Spirit, but is continually sustained, preserved, and made powerful by that Spirit, so it is with the word of God that, taken from Scripture, is preached in some fashion to people. Jesus spoke through the Spirit (John 6: 63); the apostles who received the Spirit (Matt. 10: 20; Luke 12: 12; 21: 15; John 14: 26; 15: 26) proclaimed the gospel not only in words but also "in power and in the Holy Spirit" (1 Thess. 1: 5-6), with a "demonstration of the Spirit and of power" (1 Cor. 2: 4), and handled it as "the sword of the Spirit" (Eph. 6: 17). In that respect, the Lutherans are completely correct: always and everywhere the word of God is a power of God, a sword of the Spirit. "The Holy Spirit is always present with that word." [Formula at Concord, II. 3]

At the same time both Scripture and experience teach that the word does not always have the same effect. In a sense it is always efficacious; it is never powerless. If it does not raise people up, it strikes them down. If it is not "for the rising of many," it is for "the falling of many" [Luke 2: 34]; if it is not "a fragrance from life to life," it is "a fragrance from death to death" [2 Cor. 2: 16]. The question, then, is when that word of God is efficacious in the sense that it leads to faith and repentance. Now to render human beings inexcusable, Lutherans lock this divine and supernatural efficacy up in the word, but do not secure any advantage by it and, to explain the variable outcome of the word in people, have to resort to free will. The Reformed, however, taking into account that double outcome, did not view the efficacy as an impersonal magical power that had been put into that word, but always associated that word with its author, with Christ, who administers it by the Holy Spirit. And that Holy Spirit is not an unconscious power but a person who is always present with that word, always sustains it and makes it active, though not always in the same manner. In accordance with the unsearchable good pleasure of God, he uses that word for bringing people to repentance but also for hardening; for the rising but also for the falling of many. He always works through the word but not always in the same way. And when he wants to work through it so that it leads to faith and repentance, he does not objectively have to add anything to the word. That word is good and wise and holy, a word of God, a word of Christ, and the Holy Spirit takes everything from Christ.

Nonetheless, for the seed of the word to bear good fruit, it has to fall in soil that has been well prepared. Also the field has to be made ready for the reception of the seed. Hence the subjective activity of the Holy Spirit has to be added to the objective word. In the nature of the case, it cannot be enclosed in the word; it is another activity, an additional activity, a subjective activity, not through but along with the word, an opening of the heart (Acts 16: 14), an internal revelation (Matt. 11: 25; 16: 17; Gal. 1: 16), an act of drawing a person to Christ (John 6: 44), an enlightenment of the mind (Eph. 1: 18; Col. 1: 9–11), a working both to will and to do (Phil. 2: 13), and so forth.[36] In saying these things we are not detaching or separating the Spirit from the word, not even when, as in the case of infants, he effects regeneration without any means of grace. For the Spirit who regenerates is not the Spirit of God in general, but the Spirit of Christ, the Holy Spirit, the Spirit acquired by Christ, through whom Christ governs, who takes all things only from Christ, and whom Christ has poured out in the church and is therefore the Spirit of the believing community. Aside from whether the Holy Spirit sometimes also works and can work in pagans, something that is in any case exceptional, as a rule he effects regeneration only in those who live under the administration of the covenant. Also the infants he regenerates are children of the covenant, of the covenant that has the word of God as its content and received the sacrament as its sign and seal. The Holy Spirit, accordingly, follows Christ in his journey through history. He binds himself to the word of Christ and works only in the name, and in accordance with the command, of Christ. Individually and subjectively, for example when a child is considered in isolation from one's environment, the church in which the child was born, it may seem as if the Spirit worked without the word; objectively and materially the Holy Spirit only works in places where the covenant of grace, with the administration of Word and sacraments, has expanded itself. Therefore, in the case of infants, their regeneration is always known and proved to be genuine when they mature and it becomes manifest in acts of faith and repentance and links up with the word of God, which lies objectively before us in Scripture. The Holy Spirit, who in regeneration applies nothing other than the word, power, and merit of Christ, also automatically leads the conscious life of the person toward the word that he took from Christ and caused to be recorded by the prophets and apostles.

Owen: Hebrews Commentary, Heb. 8:1-10

“The law had only a shadow of good things to come, and not the express image of the things themselves.” Heb 10:1

But properly it is taken naturally, and opposed unto a body, or substance: Colossians 2:17, “Which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is Christ.” It is indifferent in whether sense we here take the word, for what is affirmed is true in both. If we take it in the first way, it intends that obscure delineation of heavenly mysteries which was in the legal institutions. They did represent and teach them, and so were taught and represented in the divine service of those priests; but it was so obscurely, that none could see their beauty and excellency therein. If it be used in the latter way, then it declares that the substance of what God intended in all his worship was not contained nor comprised in the services of those priests. There were some lines and shadows, to represent the body, but the body itself was not there. There was something above them and beyond them, which they reached not unto.

(2.) The things themselves whence they are restrained by this limitation are expressed; “of heavenly things.” The things intended in these words are no other than what God showed unto Moses in the mount; and therefore we shall defer our inquiry into them until we come unto those words. This, therefore, is the meaning of the words: ‘The whole ministry of the priests of old was in and about earthly things, which had in them only a resemblance and shadow of things above.’ And we may observe by the way, —

Obs. I. God alone limits the signification and use of all his own institutions. —We ought not to derogate from them, nor to take anything out of them which God hath put into them; nor can we put anything into them that God hath not furnished them withal. And we are apt to err in both extremes. The Jews to this day believe that the ministration of their priests contained the heavenly things themselves. They do so, contrary to the nature and end of them, which the Scripture so often speaks unto. This is one occasion of their obstinacy in unbelief. They will imagine that there was nothing above or beyond their legal institutions, no other heavenly mysteries of grace and truth but what is comprised in them. They put more in them than ever God furnished them withal, and perish in their vain confidence.

It hath so fallen out also under the new testament. God hath instituted his holy sacraments, and hath put this virtue into them, that they should represent and exhibit unto the faith of believers the grace which he intendeth and designeth by them. But men have not been contented herewith; and therefore they will put more into them than God hath furnished them withal. They will have them to contain the grace in them which they exhibit in the way of a promise, and to communicate it unto all sorts of persons that are partakers of them. Thus, some would have baptism to be regeneration itself, and that there is no other evangelical regeneration but that alone, with the profession which is made thereon. Everyone who is baptized is thereby regenerated. The sign and figure of grace, they would have to be the grace itself. Nothing can be invented more pernicious unto the souls of men; for all sorts of persons may be brought to a ruinous security about their spiritual condition by it, and diverted from endeavors after that real internal work, in the change of their hearts and natures, without which none shall see God. This is to put that into it which God never placed there. Some suppose it to be such a distinguishing, or rather separating ordinance, that the administration of it in such a way or at such a season, is the fundamental rule of all church fellowship and communion; whereas God never designed it unto any such end.

[And in like fashion, people put common grace for saving grace thus making what is common thing a special thing (in effect, this is making the blood of Christ a common thing; that the blood of Christ was shed for all and everyone, as opposed to just the elect). And so, what is really only a common or temporary faith is presumed to be a saving faith; so that anyone by his own industry or supposed inherent virtue, as he thinks he has, can pray this sinner's prayer to recommend himself to God for salvation when in fact the foundation of his asking is self-love and not true virtue, being not grounded on a spiritual sight of Christ, all of which leads one to a carnal security. This is the "c"rnal imagination" wen describes below]

In the supper of the Lord, the church of Rome in particular is not contented that we have a representation and instituted memorial of the death of our Lord Jesus Christ, in the signs of his body as broken and his blood as shed for us, with an exhibition of grace in the word of promise, or the gospel; but they will have the natural body and blood of Christ, his flesh and bones, to be contained therein, and to be eaten or devoured by all that partake of the outward signs! This is to put that into the ordinance which God never put into it, and so to overthrow it.

And there are two grounds or ends of what they do. The first is, to turn the wisdom of faith into a carnal imagination. It requires the light and wisdom of faith to apprehend the spiritual exhibition of Christ in the sacrament unto us. It is a great spiritual mystery, not at all to be apprehended but by the supernatural light of faith. This, the vain, darkened minds of men like not, they cannot away with it; it is foolishness unto them. Wherefore, under the name of a "mystery," they have invented the most horrible and monstrous figments that ever befell the minds of men. This is easily received and admitted by a mere act of carnal imagination; and the more blind and dark men are, the more are they pleased with it.

Secondly, They do it to exclude the exercise of faith in the participation of it. As they deal with the wisdom of faith as unto its nature, so they do with the exercise of faith as unto its use. God hath given this measure unto this ordinance, that it shall exhibit and communicate nothing unto us, that we shall receive no benefit by it, but in the actual exercise of faith. This the carnal minds and hearts of men like not. It requires a peculiar exercise of this grace, and that in a peculiar manner, unto a participation of any benefit by it. But this, under the notion of bringing more into the ordinance than ever. God put into it, they exclude, and ease all men of. Let them but bring their mouths and their teeth, and they fail not of eating the body and drinking the very blood of Christ. So, under a pretense of putting that in the ordinance which God never put into it, they have cast out of the hearts of men the necessity of those duties which alone render it useful and beneficial.

Some, on the other side, do derogate from them, and will not allow them that station or use which God hath appointed unto them in the church. (1.) Some do so from their dignity. They do so, by joining their own appointments unto them, as of equal worth and dignity with them. (2.) Some do so from their necessity, practically setting light by or disregarding the participation of them. (3.) Some do so from their use, openly denying their continuance in the church of God.

The reasons why men are so prone to deviate from the will of God in his institutions, and to despise the measures he hath given them, are, (1.) Want of faith in its principal power and act, which is submission and resignation of soul unto the sovereignty of God. Faith alone renders that an all-sufficient reason of obedience. (2.) Want of spiritual wisdom and understanding to discern the mystery of the wisdom and grace of God in them.

Obs. II. It is an honor to be employed in any sacred service that belongs unto the worship of God, though it be of an inferior nature unto other parts of it. —It is so, I say, if we are called of God thereunto. This was the greatest honor that any were made partakers of under the old testament, that they “served unto the example and shadow of heavenly things” only. And if now God call any of us into his service, wherein yet, by the meanness of our gifts, or want of opportunities, we cannot serve him in so eminent a manner as some others do, yet if we abide in our station and duty, there is great honor in the meanest divine service.

Obs. III. So great was the glory of heavenly ministration in the mediation of Jesus Christ, as that God would not at once bring it forth in the church, until he had prepared the minds of men, by types, shadows, examples, and representations of it. —This was the end of all legal institutions of divine worship and service. And herein the wisdom of God provided in these to cases that were necessary.

(1.) He filled them with glory and beauty, that they might affect the minds of men with an admiration and expectation of that greater glory which they represented and pointed unto. And this they did among all them who truly believed; so that they continually looked and longed after the coming of Him, the glory of whose ministry was represented in them. In these two things did their faith principally act itself: [1.] In a diligent inquiry into the mediation and ministry of Christ, with the glory which it was to be accompanied withal, 1 Peter 1:10, 11. 50 [2.] In earnest desire after the enjoyment of what they saw afar off, and which was obscurely represented unto them, Song of Solomon 2:17, 4:6. From both these arose that fervent love unto, zeal for, and delight in those ordinances of worship, which did so lead them unto these things that were so glorious; which in the Scripture are everywhere expressed, and which were so well-pleasing unto God.

(2.) On the other hand, because these institutions were to be so glorious, that they might be shadows of heavenly things, and the people unto whom they were given were carnal, and given to rest themselves in present outward appearances, God was pleased to intermix with them many services that we hard to be borne, and many laws with penalties severe and dreadful. This provision was laid in by divine wisdom, that they might not rest in what he designed only to prepare their minds for the introduction of that which was far more glorious. And well is it for us if we have a due apprehension of the glory of the heavenly ministration of Christ, now it is introduced. It is too evident that with many, yea, with most that are called Christians, it is far otherwise; for they are still seeking after the outward glory of a carnal worship, as though they had no view of the spiritual glory of the heavenly ministration of the gospel in the hand of Jesus Christ, our high priest. Nor will it be otherwise with any of us, unless we are enabled by faith to look within the veil, and see the beauty of the appearance of Christ at the right hand of God. The apostle tells us, that “the ministration of the law was glorious; yet had it no glory in comparison of that which doth excel.” But if we are not able to discern this more excellent glory, and satisfy ourselves therein, it is a great sign that we ourselves are carnal, and therefore are delighted with those things that are so. But we must proceed with our exposition.

Obs. 28 Free and sovereign, undeserved grace in the pardon of sin, is the original spring and foundation of all covenant mercies and blessings. — Hereby, and hereby alone, is the glory of God and the safety of the church provided for. And those who like not God’s covenant on these terms (as none do by nature) will eternally fall short of the grace of it. Hereby all glorying and all boasting in ourselves is excluded; which was that which God aimed at in the contrivance and establishment of this covenant, Romans 3:27; 1 Corinthians 1:29-31. For this could not be, if the fundamental grace of it did depend on any condition or qualification in ourselves. If we let go the free pardon of sin, without respect unto anything in those that receive it, we renounce the gospel. Pardon of sin is not merited by antecedent duties, but is the strongest obligation unto future duties. He that will not receive pardon unless he can one way or other deserve it, or make himself meet for it; or pretends to have received it, and finds not himself obliged unto universal obedience by it, neither is nor shall be partaker of it.

This will give you more insight into the true nature fallen man, their effort to maintain their independence from God, their so-called autonomy and the supremacy of the liberty of their will, and hence this will make clear the motive behind Arminianism, Pelagianism, Semi-Pelagianism, Roman Catholicism, Pantheism, Deism, and so on. This is the fountain from which flows all of our sin, our declaration that we are, in practice, God, putting ourselves in the room of God; we decide what is good and what is evil.

The Problem of Pantheism & Deism

NON-CHRISTIAN COMPETITORS

The Christian doctrine of providence as an omnipotent act of God by which he preserves and governs all things must be distinguished not only from pagan “fate” and “chance” but consequently also from pantheism and Deism, which keep cropping up in revived forms over the centuries of Christianity. After all, “there are but three alternatives for the sum of existence: chance, fate, or Deity. With chance there would be variety without uniformity, with fate there would be uniformity without variety; but variety in uniformity is the demonstration of primal design and the seal of the creative mind. In the world as it exists, there is infinite variety and amazing uniformity.”

The Problem of Pantheism

Pantheism knows of no distinction between the being of God and the being of the world and—idealistically—lets the world be swallowed up in God or—materialistically—lets God be swallowed up in the world. On that position there is no room for the [act of] creation and therefore no room, in the real sense, for preservation and government. Providence, then, coincides with the course of nature. The laws of nature are identical with the decrees of God, and the rule of God is nothing other than “the fixed and immutable order of nature” or “the concatenation of natural things.” On that view there is no room for miracle, the self-activity of secondary causes, personality, freedom, prayer, sin, and religion as a whole. While pantheism may present itself in ever so beautiful and seductive a form, it actually takes its adherents back into the embrace of a pagan fate. On its premises there is no existence other than the existence of nature; no higher power than that which operates in the world in accordance with ironclad law; no other and better life than that for which the materials are present in this visible creation. For a time people may flatter themselves with the idealistic hope that the world will perfect itself by an immanent series of developments, but soon this optimism turns into pessimism, this idealism into materialism.

Side note on pantheism:

Van Til's mentor, Abraham Kuyper was particularly concerned about the intrusion of pantheism into the church and the West. His principle concern was that by identifying God with ideals like progress, the boundaries between God and the world are blurred, and God becomes severely limited. See his "Pantheism's Destruction of Boundaries," in Methodist Review 75 (1893): 520-37; 762-78. – An Introduction to Systematic Theology, Van Til, pg 320 note 4

Van Til states again on page 369:

In saying that God is a Spirit we do not think of some vague generic concept of spirituality of which God is one particular instance and man another. God is the absolute Spirit. He is the self-contained Spirit. He does not need materiality over against himself in order to individuate himself. He is the self-individuated Spirit. [In other words, I think Van Til is saying here, that God is not in an act of becoming via a correlative relationship with his creation – i.e., a pantheistic view. He is entirely distinct from his creation and he already is! and that by or of himself, a se. He is not becoming more conscious of himself nor coming into his own so to speak (becoming individuated), through a correlative relationship by being one with creation in the ongoing changes characteristic of all creatures. For one thing, God is immutable.]

Over against this pantheism it was the task of Christian theology to maintain the distinction between creation and preservation, the self-activity of secondary causes, the freedom of personality, the character of sin, the truth of religion. It did this by rejecting fate and by clearly elucidating the confession of God's providence in distinction from it. The distinguishing feature of the theory of fate is not that all that exists and occurs in time is grounded and determined in God's eternal counsel, but the idea that all existence and occurrence is determined by a power that coincides with the world and that, apart from any consciousness and will, determines all things through blind necessity. According to Cicero, the fate of the Stoa was "an order and series of causes, with one cause producing another from within itself." A further distinction made was that between a mathematical or astral fate, when events on earth were thought to be determined by the stars, and a natural fate, when they were deemed to be determined by the nexus of nature. It is in this latter form that the theory of fate presently appears in pantheism and materialism. It is noteworthy, however, that in recent times also belief in astral fate has been reinvigorated and has its enthusiastic advocates. Now, Christian theology by no means opposes the idea that all things were known and determined by God from eternity. To that extent it even recognized a "fate," and some theologians believed they could also use the word in a good sense. If we remember, says Augustine, that fatum is a derivative of fari and then describe by means of it the eternal and unchanging word by which God sustains all things, the name can be justified. Boethius referred to fate as "a disposition inherent in changeable things by which Providence connects all things in their due order." And even Maresius believed he could make Christian sense of the word. But as a rule people were more cautious. Belief in fate, after all, proceeded from the idea that all things happen as a result of an irresistible blind force having neither consciousness nor will, and those events were called fatalia, which happen apart from the will of God and men by the necessity of a certain order. In this sense, "fate" was most firmly opposed by all Christian theologians, by Augustine and his followers no less than by those who championed free will. "So far from saying that everything happens by fate, we say that nothing happens by fate." On the Christian position, the only "necessity of order" is the wise, omnipotent, loving will of God. This is not to deny, as will appear later, that in the world of creatures there is a nexus of causes and consequences, and that there are firm ordinances. However, the natural order is not behind and above, nor outside of and opposed to, God's will, but grounded in the will of an omnipotent and loving God and Father, governed by that will and serviceable to that will. Nor does it stand, as a blind coercive power, outside of and in opposition to our will, for "the fact is that our choices fall within the order of the causes, which is known for certain to God and is contained in his foreknowledge."

The Problem with Deism

On the other side of this spectrum (from pantheism) stands Deism, which separates God and the world. This position is one that, in total or in part, separates the creatures from God, once they have been created; and then, again in larger or smaller part, it allows them to exist and function on their own power, a power received at the time of creation. Deism thus basically revives the pagan theory of chance. Jerome once stated—more or less echoing Aristotle, Epicurus, Cicero, the Sadducees, and others whose slogan was that “the gods take care of the big things but ignore the small”—that God's providential care did not cover all small insects. Pelagianism, like Cicero, attributed virtue to people's own will and power, while semi-Pelagianism divided the work, attributing some to both God and man. Later, when this system penetrated Catholic theology, no small dissension arose over God's cooperation in providence. The Thomists conceived it as a “natural predetermination,” “an application of energy for the purpose of making it work.” The Molinists, on the other hand, understood by it a kind of “simultaneous concurrence, a merely formal cooperation, by which God—with the concurrence of the other—exerted influence on the same act and effect.”

Socinianism so abstractly and dualistically opposed the infinite to the finite that God could not even create the world out of nothing but only from an eternally existing finite substance. In accordance with this view it also withdrew a large area of the world from God's providence, leaving it to the independent insight and judgment of mankind. By nature the human will is so free that God cannot even beforehand calculate what a person will do in a given case. Only when a decision has been made does God adapt his own action to it. Free causes, accordingly, function in complete independence alongside and outside of God. The relation between God and the world is like that between a mechanical engineer and a machine. After making it and starting it, he leaves it to its own devices and only intervenes if something has to be repaired. The Remonstrants similarly judged that at the creation creatures were endowed with powers enabling them to live independently. Preservation, therefore, was a negative act of God, implying that he did not wish to destroy the essences, powers, and faculties of created things but to leave them to their own vigor to the extent that they were able to flourish and endure by the power with which they had been endowed by creation—at least this view was not judged incorrect. In this connection, concurrence—defined “as a certain natural influence in all things emanating from the perfection of the divine nature”—was rejected. The idea of the predestination of the number of people, of marriages, of the end of life, of the elect, and of the lost, was contested; free will was defended; and all “efficacious providence with respect to sin” was replaced by a negative “permission” or “nonobstruction.” Although Arminianism was condemned at Dordrecht and expelled from the Reformed domain, as an intellectual trend it found acceptance everywhere and penetrated all Christian countries and churches.

The period beginning in the middle of the seventeenth century was marked by a powerful effort to emancipate nature, world, humanity, science, and so forth from God and to make them self-reliant in relation to him, to Christianity, church, and theology. In this respect latitudinarianism, Deism, rationalism, and the Enlightenment were all in agreement. This is the best of all possible worlds; endowed with intellect and will, humanity is self-sufficient; natural law, the forces of nature, natural religion, and natural morality together comprise a reserve of energies with which God endowed the world at the creation and which are now entirely adequate for its existence and development. Revelation, prophecy, miracles, and grace are totally redundant. Deism did not deny the existence of God, creation, or providence. On the contrary, it loved to refer to the "Supreme Being" and discoursed at length on providence. But there was no longer any vitality in this belief. Deism in principle denied that God worked in creation in any way other than in accordance with and through the laws and forces of nature. Thus it was, from the outset, antisupernaturalistic. Preservation was enough; a kind of cooperation or divine influx operative along with every act of a creature was unnecessary. In its eighteenth-century form, this Deism indeed belongs to the past. But in substance in both theory and practice it still holds sway in wide circles. Since, especially in the present [nineteenth] century, our knowledge of nature has greatly expanded and the stability of its laws has been recognized, many people are inclined to separate nature in its pitiless and unchanging character from God's government, to let it rest independently in itself, and to restrict the providence of God to the domain of religion and ethics. But here, of course, providence cannot be taken absolutely either and finds its limit in human freedom. It is not surprising that with such a view the old doctrine of "concurrence" was no longer understood and was set aside as superfluous or incorrect.

On those premises it even follows naturally to do what the "ethical" modernists have done in our country, namely, juxtapose and contrapose natural power and moral power as it were like two deities in the Manichaean manner. This runs the risk that the domain of the latter, like that of the Native Americans, will increasingly shrink and finally be taken over completely by blind irrational forces. This consequence is probably the most serious objection to Deism. By separating God from the world, the infinite from the finite, and placing them dualistically side by side, it turns the two into competing powers that are continually at loggerheads as they vie for sovereignty. Whatever is ascribed to God is taken from the world. The more God's providence is expanded, the more the creature loses its independence and freedom, and conversely, the creature can only maintain its self-activity if it drives God back and deprives him of his sovereignty. Peace between the two is therefore possible only on condition of complete separation.

Deism is essentially irreligious. For the Deist the salvation of humanity consists not in communion with God but in separation from him. The Deist's mind is at ease only in detachment from God, that is, if he can be a practical atheist. And because he realizes he can never free himself from God, he is a fearful creature, always afraid that he will be deprived of a part of his domain. For that reason there are always gradations in Deism; the boundaries between God's activity and that of the world are ever being drawn differently. There are entire, one-half, and three-quarters Pelagians, and so forth, depending on whether the world and humanity are completely or in greater or smaller part withdrawn from God's control. In principle, Deism is always the same: it deactivates God, but one Deist will walk that road further than another. A Deist is a person who in his short life has not found the time to become an atheist. Now, the area that Deism takes out from under God's rule then falls under the sway of another power, be it fate or chance. Also in this regard, Deism constantly gets into conflict with itself. Especially today, now that everyone is so deeply convinced of the stability of the natural order, there is no room in it for chance, and Deism again falls back into the embrace of ancient fate, while chance is mainly reserved for the domain of religious and ethical concerns. But the doctrine of chance is no better than that of fate. "Fate" could, in a pinch, still have a good meaning in the Christian world-and-life view; but chance (casus) and fortune (fortuna) are un-Christian through and through. Something is "fortuitous" only in the eyes of people when at that moment they are ignorant of its cause. But nothing is or can be objectively "fortuitous." All things have a cause, and that cause is ultimately a component in the almighty and all-wise will of God.

AN ATTEMPT AT DEFINITION

The providence of God, thus distinguished from God's knowledge and decree and maintained against pantheism and Deism, is—in the beautiful words of the Heidelberg Catechism—"the almighty and ever-present power of God by which he upholds, as with his hand, heaven and earth and all creatures and so rules them that . . . all things, in fact, come to us, not by chance but from his fatherly hand" (Lord's Day 10, Q. & A. 27). Even thus defined, the doctrine of providence has enormous scope. It actually encompasses the entire implementation of all the decrees that have bearing on the world after it has been called into being by creation. If the act of creation is excepted from providence, it is as full as the free knowledge of God (scientia libera) and the decrees of God, as is everything that exists and occurs in time. It extends to everything that is treated in dogmatics after the doctrine of creation and includes both the works of nature and of grace. All the works of God ad extra, which are subsequent to creation, are works of his providence. Only, the locus of providence does not discuss these works themselves but describes in general the nature of the relation in which God stands to the created world, which is always the same, notwithstanding the many different works that he in his providence accomplishes in the world. For that reason it is also not desirable for us to bring up in this locus a vast array of topics such as miracles, prayer, the end of life, the freedom of the will, sin, theodicy, and so forth, for in part these topics have already been treated earlier in the context of the doctrine of the attributes and decrees of God, and in part they will be fully treated in their own place. The task of theodicy is not confined to the locus of providence alone but rests on the whole field of dogmatics. Hence, the doctrine of providence does not include the material to be considered in the following loci but limits itself to a description of the relation—one that remains the same in all the various works—in which God stands toward his creatures. That relation is expressed by the words "preservation," "concurrence," and "government," which over time were viewed as aspects of providence. Whatever God may do in nature and grace, it is always he who preserves all things, who empowers them by the influx of his energy, and who governs them by his wisdom and omnipotence. Preservation, concurrence, and government, accordingly, are not parts or segments in which the work of providence is divided and which, being materially and temporally separate, succeed one another. Nor do they differ from one another in the sense that preservation relates only to the existence of creatures, concurrence only to their activities, and government exclusively to guidance toward the final goal of these creatures. But they are always integrally connected; they intermesh at all times. From the very beginning preservation is also government, and government is concurrence, and concurrence is preservation. Preservation tells us that nothing exists, not only no substance, but also no power, no activity, no idea, unless it exists totally from, through, and to God. Concurrence makes known to us the same preservation as an activity such that, far from suspending the existence of creatures, it above all affirms and maintains it. And government describes the other two as guiding all things in such a way that the final goal determined by God will be reached. And always, from beginning to end, providence is one simple, almighty, and omnipresent power.

Conceived as such a power and act of God, providence is most intimately connected with, while nevertheless being essentially distinct from, the activity of God in creating the world. Pantheism and Deism, in addressing the problem that is present here, seek to solve it by denying either creation [pantheism] or providence [Deism]. But theism [the orthodox Christian view of God] maintains both and attempts to elucidate for theoretical as well as practical reasons both the unity and the distinction between the two. Always to be a theist [the orthodox Christian view] in the full and true sense of the word, that is, to see God's counsel and hand and work in all things and simultaneously, indeed for that very reason, to develop all available energies and gifts to the highest level of activity—that is the glory of the Christian faith and the secret of the Christian life.

Scripture itself leads the way in taking this approach. On the one hand, it describes the activity of providence as an activity of creation (Ps. 104:30), of making alive (Neh. 9:6), of speaking (Ps. 33:9; 105:31, 34; 107:25; Job 37:6), of sending out his Word and Spirit (Ps. 104:30; 107:25), of commanding (Ps. 147:15; Lam. 3:37), of working (John 5:17), of upholding (Heb. 1:3), of willing (Rev. 4:11), so that all things without exception exist from, through, and to God (Acts 17:28; Rom. 11:36; Col. 1:17). God is never idle. He never stands by passively looking on. With divine potency he is always active [see code438 and code305a, ref. pure act, etc.] in both nature and grace. Providence, therefore, is a positive act, not a giving permission to exist but a causing to exist and working from moment to moment. If it consisted merely in a posture of non-destruction, it would not be God who upheld things, but things would exist in and by themselves, using power granted at the creation. And this is an absurd notion. A creature is, by definition, of itself a completely dependent being: that which does not exist of itself cannot for a moment exist by itself either. If God does not do anything, then nothing exists and nothing happens. “For the power and might of the Creator, who rules and embraces all, makes every creature abide, and if this power ever ceased to govern creatures, their essences would pass away and all nature would perish.” And just as providence is a power and an act, so it is also an almighty and everywhere present power. God is immanently present with his being in all creatures. His providence extends to all creatures; all things exist in him. Scripture posits with the utmost certainty that nothing, however insignificant, falls outside of God's providence. Not just all things in general (Eph. 1:11; Col. 1:17; Heb. 1:3), but even the hairs of one's head (Matt. 10:30), sparrows (Matt. 10:29), the birds of the air (Matt. 6:26), the lilies of the field (Matt. 6:28), the young ravens (Ps. 147:9)—all are the objects of his care. In any case, what is small or large to him who is only great? In the context of the cosmos that which is small is as important in its setting as that which is large, as indispensable and as necessary, and often of even greater significance and of weightier consequence. While providence may be differentiated as “general” (Ps. 104; 148:1–13), “special” (Ps. 139:15ff.; Job 10:9–12; Matt. 12:12; Luke 12:7), and “most special” (1 Tim. 4:10), as a power of God it nevertheless encompasses every single creature. Though Habakkuk (1:14) complains that God by his chastisements makes people like the fish of the sea that are caught in a net and like crawling things that have no ruler (i.e., to protect them from their enemies), he is not thereby saying that God's providence does not extend to all his creatures. In defense of the limited scope of God's providence, people appeal with greater semblance of veracity to 1 Corinthians 9:9 ("Is it for oxen that God is concerned?"). Still, Paul, who everywhere else takes God's sovereignty to be absolute (Acts 17:28; Rom. 11:36; Col. 1:17), by no means denies here that God's concern also includes oxen; he only indicates that this saying is included in the law of God for humanity's sake, not for the sake of oxen. Also, this saying concerning the oxen is there "for our sake" (di' hēmas, 1 Cor. 9:10; cf. Rom. 4:23–24; 15:4; [1 Cor. 10:6;] 2 Tim. 3:16) so that we might learn from it that the gospel worker is worthy of his wages. So then, providence as an activity of God is as great, all-powerful, and omnipresent as creation; it is a continuous or continued creation. The two are one single act and differ only in structure.

When earlier theologians used this language, it was by no means their intention to erase the distinction that exists between creation and providence, as Hodge for one fears.[58] Scripture, on the other hand, represents providence as a resting from the work of creation (Gen. 2:2; Exod. 20:11; 31:17), and further as a seeing (Ps. 14:2; 33:13), and observing (Ps. 33:15; 103:3), all of which presuppose the existence, the self-activity, and the freedom of the creature. These scriptural givens may not be neglected either. Creation and providence are not identical. If providence meant a creating anew every moment, creatures would also have to be produced out of nothing every moment. In that case, the continuity, connectedness, and "order of causes" would be totally lost, and there would be no development or history. All created beings would then exist in appearance only and be devoid of all independence, freedom, and responsibility. God himself would be the cause of sin. Although many theologians called providence a "continuous creation," they by no means meant to erase the difference between the two. They all regarded providence rather as simultaneously also an act of causing creatures to persist in their existence, as a form of preservation that presupposes creation. Augustine, for example, writes that God rested on the seventh day and no longer created any new species, and continues by describing the work of providence in distinction from that of creation as follows: "God moves his entire creation by a hidden power. . . . It is thus that God unfolds the generations that He laid up in creation when first He founded it; and they would not be sent forth to run their course if He who made creatures ceased to exercise His provident rule over them." [59] Providence may sometimes be called a creation, therefore, but it is always distinguished from the first and actual creation by the fact that it is a "continuous creation."

So the two agree in that it is the same omnipotent and omnipresent power of God that is at work both in creation and in providence. The latter act is not inferior to the former since power, divine power, is required for both. Also, creation and providence are naturally not distinct in God himself either, for in him, the Eternal One, there is no variation or shadow due to change. He did not pass from not-creating to creating, nor from creating to preserving. He is invariably the same. Creation and preservation, accordingly, are not objectively and materially distinct as acts of God in God's being, but only in reason. But that understanding is not to say that the distinction is arbitrary and only exists in our mind. No: that distinction is most definitely grounded in God's revelation and derived from it by our thinking. There is a difference between creation and preservation, but that difference does not lie in God's being as such but in the relation that God assumes toward his creatures. What happens to things as a result of creation is one thing; what happens with them as a result of preservation is another. The relation in which God's creatures are placed vis-à-vis God by these two actions differs in each case. This difference cannot be indicated by saying that creation is "out of nothing" and preservation concerns that which exists. Rather, creation calls into being the things that are not, things that have no other existence than that of ideas and decrees in the being of God. By preservation, with the same power, God summons those things that have received an existence distinct from his being and are nevertheless solely and exclusively from, through, and to God. Creation yields existence, while preservation is persistence in existence. The difficulty for the mind to maintain both creation and preservation always arises from the fact that by creation God's creatures have received their own unique existence, which is distinct from God's being, and that that existence may and can never even for a moment be viewed as an existence of and by itself, independent from God.

We are confronted here by a mystery that far surpasses our understanding, and we are always inclined to do less than justice to either one or the other. It is this inclination that underlies pantheism and Deism. Both of these trends proceed from the same error and oppose God and the world to each other as two competing entities. The former sacrifices the world to God, creation to providence, and believes that God's existence can only be a divinely infinite existence if it denies the existence of the world, dissolves it into mere appearance, and allows it to be swallowed up by divine existence. The latter sacrifices God to the world, providence to creation, and believes that creatures come into their own to the extent that they become less dependent on God and distance themselves from God. The Christian, however, confesses that the world and every creature in it have received their own existence, but increase in reality, freedom, and authenticity to the extent that they are more dependent on God and exist from moment to moment from, through, and to God. A creature is the more perfect to the degree that God indwells it more and permeates it with his being. In that respect preservation is even greater than creation, for the latter only initiated the beginning of existence, but the former is the progressive and ever increasing self-communication of God to his creatures. Providence is "the progressive expression in the universe of his divine perfection, the progressive realization in it of the archetypal ideal of perfect wisdom and love."

Notes on Pantheism by Van Til

Van Til states from his book, An Introduction to Systematic Theology p 204: In Paradise God walked and talked with man. Man needs God near to him. Even in the state of sin man has realized something of the need of a God who is near him. In fact, the sinner has brought God too near to him; he has identified the Creator with the creature. In idolatry we have an expression on the part of the sinner that points to his need of a God who is near.

Van Til's mentor, Abraham Kuyper was particularly concerned about the intrusion of pantheism into the church and the West. His principle concern was that by identifying God with ideals like progress, the boundaries between God and the world are blurred, and God becomes severely limited. See his "Pantheism's Destruction of Boundaries," in Methodist Review 75 (1893): 520-37; 762-78. – An Introduction to Systematic Theology, Van Til, pg 320 note 4

In saying that God is a Spirit we do not think of some vague generic concept of spirituality of which God is one particular instance and man another. God is the absolute Spirit. He is the self-contained Spirit. He does not need materiality over against himself in order to individuate himself. He is the self-individuated Spirit. [In other words, I think was Van Til is saying here, that God is not in an act of becoming via a correlative relationship with his creation – i.e., a pantheistic view. He is entirely distinct from his creation and he already is! and that by or of himself, a se. He is not becoming more conscious of himself nor coming into his own so to speak (becoming individuated), through a correlative relationship by being one with creation in the ongoing changes characteristic of all creatures. For one thing, God is immutable.]

Inspiration of the Scriptures Explained

(also, confirms the doctrine of compatibility)

Excerpt from Reformed Dogmatics

by Herman Bavinck, pg 431-432

Bavinck is explaining inspiration; that it is not man acting as a mindless recording device or secretary in the hands of God, the mechanical version, but it is God the Holy Spirit who moves upon certain men that God had prepared in advance, and causes them (God being the first cause) to write down His thoughts without doing violence to their liberty or freedom, i.e., not by coercion. By the way, this is the same modus operandi in God converting the soul, not by coercion, but by a secret power that sweetly moves upon the soul and makes it willing to believe, (see Ps 110:3, Your people shall be volunteers [i.e., willing] in the day of your power. See also, Ezek. 36:26, etc.) That's why it is called amazing grace that saved a wretch like me. This confirms the doctrine of compatibility - –hat God's sovereignty in his eternal decrees, is consistent with man's liberty or creaturely freedom of his will.

A mechanical notion of revelation one-sidedly emphasizes the new, the supernatural element that is present in inspiration, and disregards its connection with the old, the natural. This detaches the Bible writers from their personality, as it were, and lifts them out of the history of their time. In the end it allows them to function only as mindless, inanimate instruments in the hand of the Holy Spirit. To what extent theologians in the past held to such a mechanical view cannot be said in a single sweeping statement and would have to be explored separately in each individual case. It is true that the church fathers already started comparing the prophets and apostles, in the process of writing, with a cither, a lyre, a flute, or a pen in the hand of the Holy Spirit. But we dare not draw too many conclusions from these comparisons. In using these similes they only wanted to indicate that the Bible writers were the secondary authors and that God was the primary author. This is evident from the fact that, on the other hand, they firmly and unanimously rejected the error of the Montanists, who claimed that prophecy and inspiration rendered their mouth-pieces unconscious, and often clearly recognized the self-activity of the biblical authors as well. Still, from time to time, one encounters expressions and ideas that betray a mechanical view. In general, it can be said without fear of contradiction that insight into the historical and psychological mediation of revelation – now taken in a favorable sense – only came to full clarity in modern times and that the mechanical view of inspiration, to the extent that it existed in the past, has increasingly made way for the organic.

This organic view, far from weakening the doctrine of Scripture at this point, enables it more fully to come into its own. It is Scripture itself that requires us to conceive inspiration – like prophecy – organically, not mechanically. Even what it teaches us in general about the relationship between God and this creature prompts us to suspect that also the leading of God's Spirit in divine inspiration will confirm and strengthen, not destroy the self-activity of human beings. For in creation God confers on the world a being of its own, which, though not independent, is distinct from his. In the preservation and government of all things, God maintains this distinct existence of his creatures, causes all of them to function in accordance with their own nature, and guarantees to human being their own personality, rationality, and freedom. God never coerces anyone. He treats human beings, not as blocks of wood, but as intelligent and moral beings. The Logos [Christ], in becoming flesh, does not take some unsuspecting person by surprise, but he enters into human nature, prepares and shapes it by the Spirit into his own appropriate medium. In regeneration and conversion he does not suppress and destroy the powers and gifts of human persons but restores and strengthens them by cleansing them from sin. In short, the revelation between God and his [human] creation, according to Scripture, is not deistic [that God is not involved with his creation at all] or pantheistic [that God and creation are one and the same; God has no personality] – but theistic [belief in one god as creator of the universe, intervening in it and sustaining a personal relation to his creatures], and that is how it will therefore have to be in inspiration as well. Scripture itself teaches this directly and concretely. The Spirit of the Lord entered into the prophets and apostles themselves and so employed and led them that they themselves examined and reflected, spoke and wrote as they did. It is God who speaks through them; at the same time it is they themselves who speak and write. Driven by the Spirit, they themselves yet spoke (2Pet1:21). In the NT the OT Scriptures are frequently quoted by reference to the primary author (Luke 1:70; Acts 1:16; 3:18; 4:25; 28:25), and always in the Letter to the Hebrews (1:5ff), but no less often by reference to the secondary authors [second causes, God being the first cause]. This demonstrates that Moses, David, Isaiah, and others, though led by the Spirit, were in fact in the full sense of the word the authors of their books (Matt. 13:14; 22:43; John 1:23; 45; 5:46; 12:38). All the various components that come under consideration in divine inspiration show that the Spirit of the Lord, so far from suppressing the personality of the prophets and apostles, instead heightens the level of their activity. This is evident first of all from the fact that they were set apart, prepared, and equipped from their youth on, for the task to which God would later call and them (Exod. 3, 4; Jer. 1:5; Acts 7:22; Gal. 1:15). Their native disposition and bent, their character and inclination, their intellect and development, their emotions and willpower are not undone by the calling that later comes to them but, as they themselves had been already shaped by the Holy Spirit in advance, so they are now summoned into service and used by that same Spirit. Their whole personality with all of their gifts and powers are made serviceable to the calling to which they are called.

All this took place in order that the excellency of the power, also of the power of Scripture, may be God's and not ours. Just as every human thought and action is the fruit of the action of God in whom we live and have our being, and is at the same time the fruit of the activity of human beings, so also Scripture is totally the product of the Spirit of God, who speaks through the prophets and apostles, and at the same time totally the product of the activity of the authors. "Everything is divine and everything is human" (θεια παντα και ανθρωπινα παντα). See also page 1174, Edwards' quote on this.

Scriptures having to do with the Doctrine of Original Sin - total Depravity and the Sovereignty of God in Election and in the sovereign disposal of his gifts as opposed to man being sovereign (Arminian's idea of human liberty – his will being independent and self determined) 1Cor2:14 - But the natural man does not receive the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him; nor can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.

Rom 8:7-8 - –or to be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. ⁷Because the carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, nor indeed can be. ⁸So then, those who are in the flesh cannot please God.

Rom 6:17-18 - But God be thanked that though you were slaves of sin, yet you obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine to which you were delivered. And having been set free from sin, you became slaves of righteousness.

Rom 3:11-12 - –There is none righteous, no, not one;

¹¹There is none who understands;

There is none who seeks after God.

¹²They have all turned aside;

They have together become unprofitable;

There is none who does good, no, not one."

Jer 13:23 - –an the Ethiopian change his skin or the leopard its spots?

Then may you also do good who are accustomed to do evil.

Mt 7:18 - A good tree cannot bear bad fruit, nor can a bad tree bear good fruit.

Jer4:22 "For My people are foolish,

They have not known Me.

They are silly children,

And they have no understanding.

They are wise to do evil,

But to do good they have no knowledge."

Heb 11:6 But without faith it is impossible to please Him, for he who comes to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of those who diligently seek Him.

Rom 11:35 - "Or who has first given to Him

Jn 15:4-5 - -Abide in Me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, unless it abides in the vine, neither can you, unless you abide in Me. I am the vine, you are the branches. He who abides in Me, and I in him, bears much fruit; for without Me you can do nothing.

Eph 2:8-9 - For by grace you have been saved through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God, ⁹not of works, lest anyone should boast. [The law of faith and the gospel excludes all human boasting. Taking credit for the decisive cause of salvation, man's will in choosing, provides the foundation for man's boasting.]

Eph 2:5 - even when we were dead in trespasses, made us alive together with Christ (by grace you have been saved), ⁶and raised us up together, and made us sit together in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus, 1Cor 4:7 - -For who makes you differ from another? And what do you have that you did not receive? Now if you did indeed receive it, why do you boast as if you had not received it?

Jn 1:12-13 - But as many as received Him, to them He gave the right to become children of God, to those who believe in His name: ¹³who were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.

Jn 5:21 - -or as the Father raises the dead and gives life to them, even so the Son gives life to whom He will.

Rom 10:20 - -But Isaiah is very bold and says:

"I was found by those who did not seek Me;

I was made manifest to those who did not ask for Me."

1Cor 1:30 - But of Him you are in Christ Jesus, who became for us wisdom from God—and righteousness and sanctification and redemption—

Rom 9:16 - -So then it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy.

Col 2:11-13 - In Him you were also circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, by putting off the body of the sins^[a] of the flesh, by the circumcision of Christ,¹²buried with Him in baptism, in which you also were raised with Him through faith in the working of God, who raised Him from the dead. ¹³And you, being dead in your trespasses and the uncircumcision of your flesh, He has made alive together with Him, having forgiven you all trespasses,

More on God's Sovereign Disposal of His Gifts

It is God who makes one to differ from another, not the person's self-directed will
J Owen

The doctrine of the preference and pre-eminence of Christ is insisted on by the apostle unto the end of this chapter, and therefore I shall not treat of it until we have gone through all the proofs of it produced; nor then but briefly, having already in part spoken of it, in our consideration of his sovereignty and lordship over all.

That which we are peculiarly instructed in by these words is that,-

All pre-eminence and exaltation of one above others depends on the supreme counsel and will of God.

The instance he gives of him who is exalted over all sufficiently confirms our general rule. He had his "name", denoting his glory and excellency, by "inheritance," — a heritage designed for him and given unto him in the counsel, will, and good pleasure of God [aka, his secret will]. He gave him that "name above every name," Philippians 2:9, and that of his own will and pleasure: "It pleased the Father that in him all fullness should dwell," that so "in all things he might have the pre-eminence," Colossians 1:16-19. He foreordained him unto it from eternity, 1 Peter 1:20; and actually exalted him according to his eternal counsel in the fullness of time, Acts 2:36, 5:31.

This prelation, then, of Christ above all depends on the counsel and pleasure of God; and he is herein a pattern of all privilege and preeminence in others.

Grace, mercy, and glory, spiritual things and eternal, are those wherein really there is any difference among the sons of men. Now, that any one in these things is preferred before another, it depends merely on the sole good pleasure of God. No man in these things makes himself to differ from another, neither hath he any thing that he hath not received. " God hath mercy on whom he will have mercy." And this discrimination of all things by the supreme will of God, especially spiritual and eternal, is the spring, fountain, and rule of all that glory which he will manifest and be exalted in unto eternity. [hence the sinners prayer, where man thinks that his own will in choosing makes him differ from another who did not exercise his free will, is presumption.]

The Communication of the Knowledge of God the Father

thru the Son and his sovereign disposal thereof.

Very good. by John Owen - Heb 1:3

Heb. 1, Ver. 3. — Who being the brightness of glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding [or, disposing of] all things by the word of his power, having by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high;

pg 97:

We have been somewhat long in our explication of this description of the person of the Son of God; yet, as we suppose, not any longer than the nature of the things treated of and the manner of their expression necessarily required us to be. We shall therefore here stay a while, before we proceed to the ensuing words of this verse, and take some observations, from what hath been spoken for our direction and refreshment in our passage.

I. All the glorious perfections of the nature of God do belong unto and dwell in the person of the Son. Were it not so, he could not gloriously represent unto us the person of the Father; nor by the contemplation of him could we be led to an acquaintance with the person of the Father. This the apostle here teacheth us, as in the explication of the words we have manifested. Now, because the confirmation of this allusion depends on the proofs and testimonies given of and unto the divine nature of Christ, which I have elsewhere largely insisted on and vindicated from exceptions, I shall not here resume that task, especially considering that the same truth will again occur unto us.

II. The whole manifestation of the nature of God unto us, and all communications of grace, are immediately by and through the person of the Son. He represents him unto us; and through him is everything that is communicated unto us from the fullness of the Deity conveyed [hence we are made partakers of his nature, 2Pet.1:4]. There are sundry signal instances wherein God reveals himself, and communicates from his own infinite fullness unto his creatures, and in all of them he doth it immediately by the Son [that he doesn't go through anybody but directly to the person to whom he communicates]: —

1. In the creation of all things;
2. In their providential rule and disposal;
3. In the revelation of his will and institution of ordinances;
4. In the communication of his Spirit and grace: in none of which is the person of the Father any otherwise immediately represented unto us than in and by the person of the Son.

1. In the creation of all things, God both gave them their being and imparted unto them of his goodness, and manifested his nature unto those that were capable of a holy apprehension of it. Now, all this God did immediately by the Son; not as a subordinate instrument, but as the principal efficient, being his own power and wisdom. This we have manifested in our explication of the last words of the verse foregoing. In express testimony hereunto, see John 1:3; Colossians 1:16; 1 Corinthians 8:6. The Son, as the power and wisdom of the Father, made all things; so that in that work the glory of the Father shines forth in him, and no otherwise. By him was there a communication of being, goodness, and existence unto the creation.

2. In the providential rule and disposal of all things created, God further manifests himself unto his creatures, and further communicates of his goodness unto them. That this also is done in and by the Son, we shall further evidence in the explication of the next words of this verse.

3. The matter is yet more plain as to the revelation of his will, and the institution of ordinances from first to last. It is granted that after the entrance of sin, God did not graciously reveal nor communicate himself unto any of his creatures but by his Son. This might fully be manifested by a consideration of the first promise, the foundation of all future revelations and institutions, with an induction of all ensuing instances. But whereas all revelations and institutions springing from the first promise are completed and finished in the gospel, it may suffice to show that what we assert is true with peculiar reference thereunto. The testimonies given unto it are innumerable. This is the substance and end of the gospel: — to reveal the Father by and in the Son unto us; to declare that through him alone we can be made partakers of his grace and goodness, and that no other way we can have either acquaintance or communion with him. See John 1:18. The whole end of the gospel is to give us “the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ,” 2 Corinthians 4:6; that is, the glory of the invisible God, whom none hath seen at any time, 1 Timothy 6:16; 1 John 4:12. That is to be communicated unto us, But how is this to be done? absolutely and immediately, as it is the glory of the Father? No, but as it “shines forth in the face of Jesus Christ,” or as it is in his person manifested and represented unto us; for he is, as the same apostle says in the same place, 2 Corinthians 4:4, “the image of God.” And herein also, as to the communication of grace and the Spirit, the Scripture is express, and believers are daily instructed in it. See Colossians 1:19; John 1:16; especially 1 John 5:11, 14. Now, the grounds of this order of things lie, —

1. In the essential inbeing of the Father and Son. This our Savior expresseth, John 10:38, “The Father is in me, and I in him.” The same essential properties and nature being in each of the persons, by virtue thereof their persons also are said to be in each other. The person of the Son is in the person of the Father, not as such, not in or by its own personality, but by union of its nature and essential properties, which are not alike, as the persons are, but the same in the one and the other. And this inbeing of the Father in the Son, and of the Son in him, our Savior affirms to be manifested by the works that he wrought, being wrought by the power of the Father, yet as in him, and not as in the Father immediately. See to the same purpose chapter 14:10, 11, and chapter 17:21.

2. The Father being thus in the Son, and the Son in the Father, whereby all the glorious properties of the one do shine forth in the other, the order and economy of the blessed Trinity in subsistence and operation require that the manifestation and communication of the Father unto us be through and by the Son; for as the Father is the original and fountain of the whole Trinity as to subsistence, so as to operation he works not but by the Son, who, having the divine nature communicated unto him by eternal generation [see pg 1289], is to communicate the effects of the divine power, wisdom, and goodness, by temporary operation. And thus he becomes “the brightness of his Father’s glory, and the express image of his person,” namely, by the receiving his glorious nature from him, the whole and all of it, and expressing him in his works of nature and grace unto his creatures.

3. Because in the dispensation and counsel of grace God hath determined that all communication of himself unto us shall be by the Son as incarnate. This the whole gospel is given to testify. So that this truth hath its foundation in the very subsistence of the persons of the Deity, is confirmed by the order, and operation, and voluntary disposition in the covenant of grace.

And this discovers unto us, first, the necessity of coming unto God by Christ. God in himself is said to be “in thick darkness,” as also to dwell “in light,” whereunto no creature can approach; which expressions, though seeming contrary, yet teach us the same thing, — namely, the infinite distance of the divine nature from our apprehensions and conceptions, “no man having seen God at any time.” But this God, invisible, eternal, incomprehensibly glorious, hath implanted sundry characters of his excellencies and left footsteps of his blessed properties on the things that he hath made; that, by the consideration and contemplation of them, we might come to some such acquaintance with him as might encourage us to fear and serve him, and to make him our utmost end. But these expressions of God in all other things, besides his Son Christ Jesus, are all of them partial, revealing only something of him, not all that is necessary to be known that we may live unto him here and enjoy him hereafter; and obscure, not leading us unto any perfect stable knowledge of him [because they are external things]. And hence it is that those who have attempted to come unto God by the light of that manifestation which he hath made of himself any other way than in and by Christ Jesus, bare all failed and come short of his glory. But now, the Lord Christ being “the brightness of his glory,” in whom his glory shines out of the thick darkness that his nature is enwrapped in unto us, and beams out of that inaccessible light which he inhabits; and “the express image of his person,” representing all the perfections of his person fully and clearly unto us, — in him alone can we attain a saving acquaintance with him. On this account he tells Philip, John 14:9, “He that hath seen me hath seen the Father;” the reason of which assertion, taken from the mutual inbeing of Father and Son, and his expression of his mind and glory, he asserts in the next verses. He, then, is the only way and means of coming unto the knowledge and enjoyment of God, because in and by him alone is he fully and perfectly expressed unto us. And therefore this, secondly, is our great guide and direction in all our endeavors after an acceptable access unto Him. Would we come to that acquaintance with the nature, properties, and excellencies of the Father, which poor, weak, finite creatures are capable of attaining in this world, — which is sufficient that we may love him, fear him, serve him, and come unto the enjoyment of him? would we know his love and grace? would we admire his wisdom and holiness? — let us labor to come to an intimate and near acquaintance with his Son Jesus Christ, in whom all these things dwell in their fullness, and by whom they are exhibited, revealed, unfolded unto us; seek the Father in the Son, out of whom not one property of the divine nature can be savingly apprehended or rightly understood, and in whom they are all exposed to our faith and spiritual contemplation. This is our wisdom, to abide in Christ, to abide with him, to learn him; and in him we shall learn, see, and know the Father also.

Φέρων τε τά παντα τω ρηατι της δυναυεως αυτου After the description of the person, the apostle returns unto an assertion of the power of Christ, the Son of God, and therein makes his transition from the kingly and prophetic unto his sacerdotal office; on all which he intends afterwards to enlarge his discourse.

--he Communication of God's Fullness by Christ to the Elect

p59-67 (p 71 online)

..Ind this is the second instance of the first head of the dominion of Christ in this world. He is Lord over persons, angels and men.

The SECOND part of the heirship and dominion of Christ consisteth in his lordship over all things besides; which added to the former comprise the whole creation of God. In the distribution of these premised, the first that occur are spiritual things, which also are of two sorts: — First, Temporal, or such as in this life we are made partakers of; and, Secondly, Eternal, the things that are reserved for them that believe in the state of glory. The former may be reduced unto two heads; for they are all of them either grace or gifts, and Christ is Lord of them all.

First, All that which comes under the name of grace in Scripture, which, flowing from the free and special love of God [free meaning that God's counsel is uninfluenced by any outward force or influence, or by internal necessity - necessity, meaning that the nature of God requires God act accordingly, e.g., people say that because God is love that by necessity, he must love all the same and hence make salvation available to all. But this is not so; he will have mercy on whom he will. He is not bound by this. He is free in the disposal of his gifts. On other things, he is bound, that is, due to the justice of God or his righteousness, to punish all sin - —o exceptions. e.g., either the sinner is punished eternally or the Son is punished in his place; but God cannot simply decide to not punish sin.], tends directly to the spiritual and eternal good of them on whom it is bestowed, may be referred unto four heads; for as the fountain of all these (or the gracious free purpose of the will of God, from whence they all do flow), being antecedent to the mission of Christ the mediator, and immanent in God, it can be no otherwise granted unto him but in respect of its effects; which we shall show that it is. Now, these are: —

1. Pardon of sin, and the free acceptance of the persons of sinners in a way of mercy. This is grace, Ephesians 2:8; Titus 3:5-7; and a saving effect and fruit of the covenant, Jeremiah 31:31-34; Hebrews 8:8-12.

2. The regenerating of the person of a dead sinner, with the purifying and sanctifying of his nature, in a way of spiritual power. This also is grace, and promised in the covenant. And there are three parts of it: — (1.) The infusion of a quickenning principle into the soul of a dead sinner, Romans 8:2; Titus 3:5; John 3:6; Ephesians 2:1-6. (2.) The habitual furnishment of the spiritually-quickenened soul with abiding, radical principles of light, love, and power, fitting it for spiritual obedience, Galatians 5:17. (3.) Actual assistance, in a communication of supplies of strength for every duty and work, Philippians 4:13; John 15:5.

3. Preservation in a condition of acceptance with God, and holy obedience unto him unto the end, is also of especial grace. It is the grace of perseverance, and eminently included in the covenant, as we have elsewhere showed at large.

4. Adoption, as a privilege, with all the privileges that flow from it, is also grace, Ephesians 1:5, 6.

All these, with all those admirable and inexpressible mercies that they branch themselves into, — giving deliverance unto sinners from evil temporal and eternal, raising them to communion with God here, and to the enjoyment of him for ever hereafter, — are called grace, and do belong to the lordship of Christ, as he is heir, lord, and possessor of them all. All the stores of this grace and mercy that are in heaven for sinners are given into his hand, and resigned up to his sovereign disposal, as we shall intimate in general and particular : —

1. In general, Colossians 1:19, “It pleased the Father that in him should all fullness dwell.” There is a fourfold fullness in Christ: — (1.) Of the Deity in his divine nature, Romans 9:5. (2.) Of union in his person, Colossians 2:9. (3.) Of grace in his human nature, John 1:14, 3:34; Luke 2:52, 4:1. (4.) An authoritative fullness, to communicate of it unto others. That is the fullness here intended; for it is in him as the head of the church, verse 18, so as that from him, or that fullness which it pleased the Father to intrust him withal, believers might receive “grace for grace,” John 1:16, 17. Thus he testifies that “all things are delivered to him of his Father,” Matthew 11:27, — put into his power and possession. And they are the things he there intends, on the account whereof he invites sinners weary and laden to come unto him, verse 28, namely, all mercy and grace; which are the things that burdened sinners need and look after. The same is testified John 3:35, 36; and fully chapter 16:15, “All things that the Father hath are mine;” chapter 17:10. All the grace and mercy that are in the heart of God as Father to bestow upon his children, they are all given into the hand of Christ, and are his, or part of his inheritance.

2. In particular: —

(1.) All pardoning grace, for the acceptance of our persons and forgiveness of our sins, is his; he is the Lord of it. Acts 5:31, He is made “a Prince and a Savior, to give repentance and the forgiveness of sins.” Forgiveness of sin is wholly given unto him as to the administration of it, nor doth any one receive it but out of his stores. And what is the dominion of ten thousands of worlds in comparison of this inheritance? Sure he shall be my God and King who hath all forgiveness at his disposal. All that this world can do or give is a thousand times lighter than the dust of the balance, if compared with these good things of the kingdom of Christ.

(2.) All regenerating, quickening, sanctifying, assisting grace is his. [1.] John 5:21, He quickeneth whom he pleaseth. He walks among dead souls, and says to whom he will, ‘Live.’ And, 74 [2.] He sanctifies by his Spirit whom he pleaseth, John 4:14. All the living waters of saving grace are committed to him, and he invites men unto them freely, Cant. 5:l; Isaiah 55:1; Revelation 22:17. And, [3.] All grace actually assisting us unto any duty is his also, for without him we can do nothing, John 15:5; for it is he alone that gives out suitable help in the time of need, Hebrews 4:16. No man was ever quickened, purified, or strengthened, but by him; nor can any dram of this grace be obtained but out of his treasures. Those who pretend to stores of it in their own wills, are so far antichrists.

(3.) The grace of our preservation in our acceptation with God and obedience unto him is solely his, John 10:28. And so also,-

(4.) Are all the blessed and gracious privileges whereof we are made partakers in our adoption, John 1:12. Hebrews 3:6, he is so Lord over the house and family of God as to have the whole inheritance in his power, and the absolute disposal of all the good things belonging unto it.

These are the riches and treasures of the kingdom of Christ, the good things of his house, the revenues of his dominion. The mass of this treasure that lies by him is infinite, the stores of it are inexhaustible; and he is ready, free, gracious, and bountiful, in his communications of them to all the subjects of his dominion. This part of his heirship extends unto, — 1. All the grace and mercy that the Father could find in his own gracious heart to bestow, when he was full of counsels of love, and designed to exalt himself by the way of grace, Ephesians 1:6. 2. To all the grace and mercy which he himself could purchase by the effusion of his blood, Hebrews 9:14; Ephesians 2:13; and indeed these are commensurate, if things in respect of us altogether boundless may be said to be commensurate. 3. All that grace which hath saved the world of sinners which are already in the enjoyment of God, and that shall effectually save all that come to God by him. 4. All that grace which, in the promises of it in the Old Testament, is set out by all that is rich, precious, glorious, — all that is eminent in the whole creation of God; and in the New is called “treasure,” “unsearchable riches,” and “exceeding excellency,” which, being communicated by him to all the subjects of his kingdom, makes every one of them richer than all the potentates of the earth who have no interest in him.

The especial foundation of all this trust is in an eminent manner expressed, Isaiah 53:10-12. His suffering for the sins of all those to whom he intends to communicate of this his fullness [his internal glory], according to the will of God, and the purchase he made in his death, according to the tenor of the covenant of the mediator, makes it just and righteous that he should enjoy this part of his inheritance, Hebrews 2:14, 9:12. The Father says unto him: ‘Seest thou these poor wretched creatures that lie perishing in their blood and under the curse? They had once my image gloriously enstamped on them, and were every way meet for my service; but behold the misery that is come upon them by their sin and rebellion. Sentence is gone forth against them upon their sin; and they want nothing to shut them up under everlasting ruin but the execution of it. Wilt thou undertake to be their savior and deliverer, to save them from their sins, and the wrath to come? Wilt thou make thy soul an offering for their sins, and lay down thy life a ransom for them? Hast thou love enough to wash them in thine own blood, in a nature to be taken of them, being obedient therein unto death, the death of the cross?’ Whereunto he replies: ‘I am content to do thy will, and will undertake this work, and that with joy and delight. Lo, I come for that purpose; my delight is with these sons of men, Psalm 40:8; Proverbs 8:31. What they have taken, I will pay. What is due from them, let it be required at my hand. I am ready to undergo wrath and curse for them, and to pour out my soul unto death.’ ‘It shall be,’ saith the Father, ‘as thou hast spoken, and thou shalt see of the travail of thy soul and be satisfied. I will give thee for a covenant and a leader unto them, and thou shalt be the captain of their salvation. To this end take into thy power and disposal all the treasures of heaven, all mercy and grace, to give out unto them for whom thou hast undertaken. Behold, here are unsearchable hidden treasures, not of many generations, but laid up from eternity. Take all these riches into thy power, and at thy disposal shall they be for ever.’ This is the noble peculiar foundation of this part of the inheritance of Christ.

From what hath been spoken, the rule also whereby the Lord Christ proceedeth in disposing these treasures to the sons of men is made evident. Though he hath all grace committed unto him, yet he bestows not grace upon all. The rule of his procedure herein is God’s election; for the foundation of this whole truth is his undertaking for them who were given him of his Father. See Acts 13:48; Romans 11:7; Ephesians 1:3-8. And the variety which is seen in his actual communication of grace and mercy unto sinners depends upon the sovereign and eternal designation of the persons of them who by him were to obtain mercy, and be made heirs of salvation.

But although the persons are designed and allotted unto him from eternity who were to receive this grace and mercy at his hands, yet as to the manner and all circumstances of his dispensation and communication of them, they are wholly committed unto his own sovereign will and wisdom. Hence some he calls at one time, some at another; some in the morning, that they may glorify grace in working all the day; some in the evening of their lives, that they may exalt pardoning mercy to eternity: on some he bestows much grace, that he may render them useful in the strength of it; on others less that he may keep them humble in a sense of their wants: some he makes rich in light, others in love; some in faith, others in patience; that they may all peculiarly praise him, and set out the fullness of his stores. And hereby, — 1. He glorifies every grace of his Spirit, by making it shine eminently in one or other, as faith in Abraham and Peter, love in David and John, patience in Job; and, 2. He renders his subjects useful one to another, in that they have opportunities upon the defects and fullness of each other to exercise all their graces; and, 3. So he renders his whole body uniform and comely, 1 Corinthians 12:14-27; 4. Keeping every member in humility and dependence, whilst it sees its own wants in some graces that others excel in, Colossians 2:19.

This is another most eminent part of the inheritance and kingdom of Christ.

An Application of the Knowledge of Christ's Glory

- that it be the main object of our contemplation by which we are transformed into his image from glory to glory 2Cor3:18...2Cor4:18 "look not at the things which are seen..", Rms 12:1-2, be transformed by the renewing of your mind...

John Owen, Commentary on Hebrews Ch3 vs 3-6

XI. A diligent, attentive consideration of the person, offices, and work of Jesus Christ, is the most effectual means to free the souls of men from all entanglements of errors and darkness, and to keep them constant in the profession of the truth.

These are the ends for which it is here called for by the apostle. These Hebrews were yet entangled in their old Judaism, and by reason of their temptations, prejudices, and persecutions, were ready to decline from the truth. To free them from the one, and to prevent the other, the apostle calls them to the consideration of what he had delivered, and what he was yet to deliver, concerning the person, offices, and work of Christ. This being the principal intention of the place, we shall abide a little in the confirmation and application of our observation.

What is in this duty considered subjectively was declared in the exposition of the words; what is in its manner of performance, and especial object, must be now further unfolded. And, — 1. There are in it these things ensuing: —

(1.) A diligent searching into the word, wherein Christ is revealed unto us. This himself directs unto, John 5:39. The Scriptures reveal him, declare him, testify of him. To this end are they to be searched, that we may learn and know what they so declare and testify. And this Peter tells us was done by the prophets of old, 1 Peter 1:10, 11. They “searched diligently” into the revelation made in them by the Spirit of the person, suffering, and grace of Christ, with the glory that ensued thereon. Christ is exhibited unto us in the gospel; which is therefore called “The gospel of Christ,” and “The word of Christ,” — that is, concerning him, as our apostle declares, Romans 1:1-3. Both the prophets of old, saith he, and the gospel also, treat concerning the Son of God, Jesus Christ our Lord. Herein, then, consists the first part of this great duty. “SEARCH the Scriptures,” with all the advantage of help afforded, that you may find out, discern, and understand, what is revealed concerning him in them, as he is the end of the law and the fullness of the gospel, the center in whom all the prophecies, promises, rules, and precepts of them do meet. Without this aim in our reading, hearing, searching the word, we labor in vain, and contend uncertainly, as men beating the air. Unto him, and the knowledge of him, is all our study of the Scripture to be referred. And the reason why some, in the perusal of it, have no more light, profit, or advantage, is, because they have not more respect unto Christ in their inquiry. If he be once out of our eye in searching the Scripture, we know not what we do, nor whither we go, no more than doth the mariner at sea without regard to the pole-star. Truths to be believed are like believers themselves. All their life, power, and order, consist in their relation unto Christ; separated from him, they are dead and useless.

(2.) Meditation upon what is discovered unto us is also included in this duty. When a revelation was made of Christ and his work unto the blessed virgin his mother, it is said, she kept the sayings, “and pondered them in her heart,” Luke 2:19; as Eliphaz adviseth all to do, Job 22:22. And the apostle bids us take care that “the word of Christ may dwell in us richly,” Colossians 3:16; — that it may not pass through our minds with some transient effects, as it doth in reading and hearing, if it only casts some glances of light upon the understanding, some motions on the affections; but make its abode and dwell with us, that is, by constant meditation. But this duty is by many spoken unto, and the evil of the neglect of it sufficiently declared.

(3.) A spiritual endeavor, in this search and meditation, to bring the soul unto a conformity with that revelation which is made of Christ in the word. This is the genuine effect of them, if duly attended unto, 2 Corinthians 3:18. The glory of Christ is revealed in the gospel, as a face is represented in a glass. This we behold by a spiritual search into it, and meditation on it. By this intuition we are assimilated unto the glory so revealed. The Holy Ghost thereby brings upon our hearts that very likeness and image which we so contemplate. And although properly this be rather an effect of the duty treated of than any part of it, yet because it is that which we ought continually to aim at, and without the attainment whereof we labor in vain, I reckon it thereunto. When the image of Christ is wrought upon our hearts, and the dying and life of Christ made manifest in us, 2 Corinthians 4:10, then hath this duty its perfect work.

2. The object of it is to be considered. This in our proposition, following the apostle, is confined unto his person, his offices, and his work. These he dealeth with the Hebrews about.

(1.) He treateth about his person, and concerning that proposeth two things especially unto consideration; — [1.] His glorious excellency; [2.] His condescension and grace. The one is the sole subject of the first chapter; the other the principal subject of the second. [1.] He calls them to consider the glorious excellency of the person of Christ. He had instructed them how in his divine nature he was the eternal Son of God, “the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person,” by whom the worlds were made; and therefore deservedly exalted, even as mediator, being incarnate, incomparably above the most glorious beings of all God’s creation. This he would have us especially to regard in our consideration of him. So did the apostles of old. They considered his glory as “the only-begotten of the Father,” therefore “full of grace and truth,” John 1:14. This excellency of the person of Christ brancheth itself into many instances, not here to be recapitulated. It may suffice in general that this is to be the principal object of our meditation. The revelation which he made of himself under the old testament had an especial respect unto this glory. Such is the description of him, Psalm 68:17, 18, applied unto him, Ephesians 4:8; as that also, Isaiah 6:1-3, applied unto him, John 12:41. And it is a signal promise, that under the gospel we shall “see the king in his beauty,” Isaiah 33:17, or see by faith the uncreated excellencies and glory of this king of saints. And indeed the faith of the saints of the old testament did principally respect the glorious person of the Messiah. In other things they were very dark, and little can be gathered from the Scripture of what spiritual apprehension they had concerning other things whereby they were instructed; but their minds and faith were distinctly fixed on his person and his coming, leaving his work and the mystery of redemption unto his own wisdom and grace. Hence had they so many glorious descriptions of him granted unto them; which were always to keep up their hearts in a desire and expectation of him. And now under the new testament, it is the greatest trial of faith, whether it be evangelical, genuine, and thriving, namely, by the respect that it hath to the person of Christ. If that be its immediate and principal object, if it respect other things with regard unto him and in subordination unto him, it is assuredly of a heavenly extract; if otherwise, it may justly be suspected. This is that head of gold which the spouse admires in her beloved, Cant. 5:11. And unspeakable is the influence which the consideration of this glorious excellency of Christ, attended with infinite wisdom and power, hath into our preservation in the truth. [2.] His grace and condescension. This the apostle insists upon, Hebrews 2. His design therein is to show what this glorious and excellent person submitted himself unto, that he might save and deliver sinners. And this he greatly presseth, Philippians 2:5-8. This glorious one humbled himself into the form of a man, of a servant, unto death, the death of the cross. A due mixture of greatness and grace or goodness is the most powerful attractive and loadstone of affections. Hence God, who is infinitely great and infinitely good, is the ultimate object of them. In the person of Christ it is incomparably and inimitably, so that there is nothing in the creation to shadow it out unto us. See Revelation 1:5, 6, 11, 13-16. He who is Alpha and Omega, the first and the last, the prince of the kings of the earth, even he loved us, and washed us in his own blood. Hence unto a believing soul, he becomes “white and ruddy, the chiefest of ten thousand,” Cant. 5:10. See Psalm 45:2-4. This is a means of preservation. Hence the apostle wonders at the Galatians, that they should depart from the truth, after that Jesus Christ had been evidently set forth before their eyes, crucified amongst them, Galatians 3:1; for an evident declaration of him, and representation of his love in the preaching of the gospel, is a sufficient means to preserve men from such miscarriages. We see what a warm, natural, blind devotion will be stirred up in the Papists by the superstitious pictures of Christ which they have amongst them. And if a false means shall be effectual to stir up a false love and devotion, shall not the true, proper, instituted means of the representation of the glory of Christ, in the gospel, be effectual to beget constancy and perseverance in faith and obedience? These things the apostle minds them off concerning his person, to be improved unto the ends proposed.

(2.) Consider him as to his offices. In these verses the apostle minds the Hebrews of his prophetic and sacerdotal; but he directs them to his regal also, which he had treated of, chapter 1. Neither doth he mind them so directly of the offices themselves, as the qualifications of his person on their account. His authority as a king, his mercifulness as our high priest, and his faithfulness as a prophet, or God's apostle, are the things he would have them consider.

[1.] His authority, as king, lord, and heir of all, chapter 1:1-3. His dealing with the Hebrews was principally about the institution of new ordinances of worship, and abolishing of the old. This, sovereign authority was required unto. This the Lord Christ was furnished withal, as the Son, as the heir and lord of all. A due consideration hereof would thoroughly remove all doubts and scruples in this matter. And the neglect hereof is the cause of all that confusion and disorder that is at this day in the world about the worship of God. Men not considering the authority of Christ, either as instituting the ordinances of the gospel, or as judging upon their neglect and abuse, are careless about them, or do not acquiesce in his pleasure in them. This hath proved the ruin of many churches, which, neglecting the authority of Christ, have substituted their own in the room thereof. The consideration, therefore, of this kingly, legislative authority of the Lord Christ by men, as to their present duty and future account, must needs be an effectual means to preserve them in the truth and from backslidings. See Romans 14:9-12; 2 Corinthians 5:9, 10.

[2.] His mercifulness, as the high priest of his church. This he had asserted, chapter 2:17, and that upon a full and evident previous demonstration. Consider him that is so, and as he is so. This, because of its importance, he often presseth, chapter 4:14-16, 7:25-28, 9:11-14, 10:21, 22. And this is of singular use to preserve believers from decays and fainting in the profession of the truth; for from his mercifulness, unspeakable encouragement, strength, and consolation, in obedience and profession of the gospel, may be educed, as in our progress, God assisting, we shall manifest. Want of a due improvement of this encouragement, and the assistance that may be obtained thereby, is the occasion of all the decays and backslidings that are found among professors. What can thrive in the soul, if the love, care, kindness, and ability to save, that are in Christ, — all which are included in this mercifulness, — are neglected?

[3.] His faithfulness. This relates unto his office prophetic, which is by the apostle ascribed unto him, and confirmed to be in him in these verses. Yea, this is that which he would have them immediately and in the first place to consider, and which being once fixed on their minds, those other things must needs have the more effectual influence upon them. For if he be absolutely faithful in his work, his authority and mercy ought surely diligently to be heeded. To this end the apostle compares him in particular with Moses in these verses, and in the next exalts him above him. And no better medium could be used to satisfy the Hebrews, who were sufficiently persuaded of the faithfulness of Moses. He being, then, ultimately to reveal the will of God, and being absolutely faithful in his so doing, is to be attended unto. Men may thence learn what they have to do in the church and worship of God, even to observe and to do whatever he hath commanded, and nothing else, Matthew 28:20; Revelation 1:5, 3:14.

(3.) As his person and offices, so his work also is proposed unto our consideration, for the ends mentioned. This the apostle fully discourseth, chapter 2:9, 10, 14, 15, 17, 18. The specialties of this work are too many to be here so much as recounted. In general, the love and grace that were in it, the greatness of it, the benefit we receive by it, the glory of the wisdom, goodness, grace, holiness, and righteousness that shines forth in it, are the principal immediate objects of our faith and consideration.

These things we have instanced in particular, as those which, being of great importance in themselves, we are likewise directed unto by the series of the apostle's discourse; but we mention them not exclusively unto other concernments of the Lord Christ. Whole Christ, and all of him, is by us diligently to be considered, that we may attain, and we shall attain, the ends laid down in the precedent observation: for, —

1. Our faith and our obedience are our walking with God, Genesis 17:1, or our walking in the truth, 2 John 1:4; 3 John 1:4: and that which is principally incumbent on them that would walk aright, is to have a due regard unto their way. This way is Christ, John 14:6. "I am the way," saith he; "no man cometh unto the Father but by me:" such a way as wayfaring men shall not err in, Isaiah 35:8; such a "living way" as is also a guide. In attendance, therefore, unto him, we shall neither err nor miscarry. And as all mistakes in faith arise from a want of a due respect unto him as the real way of going unto God, so all aberrations in doctrine or worship spring out of a neglect of a due consideration of his person and offices, wherein all truths do center, and whereby they are made effectual and powerful.

2. They that consider him in the way and manner explicated, cannot but take him for their only guide in the things of God. See John 1:14, with chapter 6:68, 69. To whom else should they go or betake themselves? This is foretold concerning him, Isaiah 42:4. And for this duty we have the command of God, Matthew 17:5, "HEAR HIM." This they will do who consider him. And to them who do so, he is given to be a guide and a leader, Isaiah 55:4; and a light, chapter 51:4; and a shepherd, to direct them in the fresh pastures of the gospel with care and tenderness, chapter 40:11. And no soul shall miscarry under his conduct, or wander into danger under his care. But here lies the root of men's failings in this matter, — they seek for truth of themselves and of other men, but not of Christ. What they can find out by their own endeavors, what other men instruct them in or impose upon them, that they receive. Few have that faith, love, and humility, and are given up unto that diligent contemplation of the Lord Christ and his excellencies, which are required in those who really wait for his law so as to learn the truth from him.

If it be yet inquired whether these who duly consider Jesus Christ may not yet mistake the truth and fall into errors? I answer, they may; but, —

(1.) Not into any that are pernicious. He will assuredly preserve such persons from destructive errors. As he hath not prayed that they may be taken out of the world, but preserved in it, so he doth not take them out of all possibility of errors or mistakes, but from such only as may prejudice the eternal condition of their souls.

(2.) They shall not act their mistakes and errors with a spirit of envy, malice, and disquietment against the truth; for none that duly considereth Jesus Christ can be captivated under the power of such a frame of spirit, seeing there is nothing more unlike unto him.

(3.) Even their mistakes are from failures in their consideration of the Lord Christ, either in the matter or manner of it. Either they search not after him with that spiritual diligence which they ought, or they meditate not on the discoveries that are made of him in the word, or they labor not after assimilation and conformity unto him; and upon these neglects it is no wonder if errors and mistakes do arise.

3. Because “all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hid in Christ,” Colossians 2:3; and therefore from him alone are they to be received, and in him alone to be learned. Now, wisdom and knowledge have both of them respect unto truth. Where they are obtained, there truth itself doth dwell. In the due consideration of the Lord Christ are these treasures opened unto us. And although we may not at once clearly and fully discern them, yet we are in the proper way to know them and possess them. There is not the least line of truth, how far soever it may be extended, and how small soever it may at length appear, but the springs of it lie in the person of Christ. And then we learn it aright, when we learn it in the spring, or as it is in him, Ephesians 4:21; which when we have done, we may safely trace it down, and follow it unto its utmost extent. But he that looks on gospel truths as sporades, scattered up and down 645 independently one of another, — who sees not the root, center, and knot of them in Jesus Christ, — it is most probable that when he goes about to gather them for his use, he will also take up things quite of another nature. They say that all moral virtues are knit up in one, that is, righteousness; so that he who hath that hath all the rest, at least radically and virtually. This I know, that all spiritual truths are knit up and centered in him who is “the truth;” and they who have “learned him,” as the apostle speaks, Ephesians 4:20, have with him received the seeds of all truth: which being watered and attended as they ought, will in due time flourish into all their proper branches and fruits; for all things are gathered into one head in him, Ephesians 1:10.

4. The right performance of this duty enlivens, excites, and acts all those graces and gracious affections, which are effectual to preserve us in the truth, and to keep us from decays in our profession. The Lord Christ being the proper object of them, and this consideration consisting in the application of the faculties of our souls unto that object, by a due exercise of those graces, they must needs be increased and augmented thereby; as all grace grows and thrives in and by its exercise, and ordinarily not otherwise. And when any grace is so applied unto Christ as spiritually to touch him, virtue goes forth from him for its strengthening. The neglect then also hereof must of necessity produce the contrary effect, John 15:5, 6. Thus in particular is faith increased; for according as the object of it is cleared, manifested, represented suitable and desirable unto the soul, so is faith itself exited, stirred up, and strengthened. Now, this is no otherwise done but when the soul is enabled graciously to ponder on the person and offices of Christ. There it finds all that is needful unto it to make it happy and blessed, — to procure pardon, peace, righteousness, and glory for it. This faith receives, and is improved by it. So the apostle informs us, 2 Corinthians 3:18. Having boldness and liberty given us in the gospel to consider and behold by faith the glory of Christ, we are thereby transformed into his likeness and image, — namely, by an increase of faith, whereby we “grow up into him who is the head.” And this brings along with it an increase in all other graces, whereby we are preserved in the profession and practice of the truth.

By this means, also, a fountain of godly sorrow is opened in the hearts of believers; which is a precious grace, Zechariah 12:10. The consideration of the Lord Christ as pierced for us, or by us, will melt and humble the soul, or it will never yield unto any ordinance of God.

The spouse, in like manner, in the Canticles, giving an account of her great and incomparable love unto her beloved, manifests that it arose from the exact consideration that she had taken of his person and all that belonged thereunto, chapter 5:9-16. The like may be said of all other graces; and by these must we be preserved, or utterly fail. As to the use of these things, — [this is why doctrine is vital!]

(1.) We may see hence the reason why so many turn aside, and fall off from the truth and ways of the gospel. They have given over a due consideration of Jesus Christ, his person, offices, and mediation, and so have lost the means of their preservation. They have been weary of him, not seeing form or comeliness in him for which he should be desired. What a sad instance have we hereof in those poor deluded creatures, who, neglecting him, pretend to find all light and life within themselves! This is their Beth-el, the beginning of their transgression; for when men have neglected the person of Christ, is it any wonder if they despise his ways and ordinances, as is their manner? Indeed, the ordinances of the gospel, its worship and institutions, have no excellency, no beauty in them, but what ariseth from their relation unto the person and offices of Christ; and if they are neglected, these must needs be burdensome and grievous. And as it is in vain to draw men unto the embracement of them who know him not, who are not acquainted with him, seeing they appear unto them the most grievous and intolerable of all things that can be imposed on them; so they who on any account cease to consider him by faith, as he is proposed unto them in the gospel, cannot long abide in their observation. Give such men the advantages of liberty, and keeping up a reputation of profession without them, — which they suppose a new and singular opinion will furnish them withal, — and they will quickly cast them off as a burden not to be borne. And as it is with gospel worship, so it is with all the articles of faith, or important truths that we are to believe. The center and knot of them all is in the person of Christ. If they are once loosed from thence, if their union in him be dissolved, if men no more endeavor to learn “the truth as it is in Jesus,” or to acquaint themselves with the will of God, as he hath “gathered all things unto a head in him,” they scatter, as it were, of their own accord from their minds; so that it may be they retain no one of them, or if they do so, yet not in a right manner, so as to have an experience of the power of them in obedience. This is the cause of the apostasies amongst us; Christ is neglected, — not considered, not improved. A light within, or a formal worship without, is enthroned in his stead; and thence all sorts of errors and evils do of their own accord ensue. Deal with any whom you see to neglect his ways and truths, and you will find this to be the state of things with them: — they have left off to value and esteem the person of Christ; or they had never any acquaintance with him. And in vain is it to dispute with men about the streams whilst they despise the fountain. The apostle gives us a threefold miscarriage in religion, Colossians 2:18: — [1.] A pretense of a voluntary, uncommanded humility, a pretended mortification, indeed a bare covering of base and filthy pride; [2.] A worshipping of angels, an instance to express all false, self-invented worship; and, [3.] Curiosity in vain speculations, or men’s intruding themselves into the things which they have not seen, setting out things with swelling words of vanity, wherewith in truth they have no acquaintance, whereof they have no experience. And all these, saith he, verse 19, proceed from hence, that they “hold not the Head;”

they have let go the Lord Christ, from whom all truths are to be derived, and consequently all truth itself. Here lies the spring of our frequent apostasies.

(2.) Again, we may hereby examine and try ourselves. Do we at any time find any of the ways, institutions, or ordinances of Christ grievous or burdensome unto us? do we find a secret dislike of them, or not that delight in them which we have formerly enjoyed? If we search into the root of our distempers, we shall find that our hearts and spirits have not been exercised with that consideration of the person and offices of Christ which our duty calls for. We have not been kept in a constant adoration of his majesty, admiration of his excellency, delight in his beauty, joy in his undertaking, holy thoughtfulness of his whole mediation. This hath betrayed us into our lukewarmness and indifferency, and made us faint and weary in his ways. Hence also all endeavors for a recovery from such a frame, that regard only the particular instances that we are sensible of, are languid and successless. He that finds himself faint in or weary of any of the ways of Christ or any duties of obedience unto him, or that discovers an undervaluation of any of the truths of the gospel, as to their use or importance, and thinks to recover himself and retrieve his spirit only by applying himself unto that particular wherein he is sensible of his failure, will labor in the fire and to no purpose. It may be that after some days, or months, or years, he will find himself more at a loss than ever; and that because although he striveth, yet he striveth not lawfully. If we would recover ourselves, we must go to the source and beginning of our decays.

(3.) This tends directly unto our instruction in these perilous days, such as the latter days are foretold to be. All means that ever the devil made use of from the foundation of the world, to draw off or deter men from gospel obedience, are at this day displayed. The world smiles upon apostates, and promiseth them a plentiful supply of such things as the corrupt nature of man esteems desirable. Errors and false worship, with temptations from them, spread themselves with wings of glorious pretences over the 'face of the whole earth. Trials, troubles, storms, persecutions, attend and threaten on every hand; and "he only that endureth unto the end shall be saved." He that, like Jonah, is asleep in this tempest, is at the door of ruin; he that is secure in himself from danger, is in the greatest danger of falling by security. What, then, shall we do? what means shall we use for our preservation? Take the counsel of our blessed apostle, "Holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the apostle and high priest of our profession;" and again, chapter 12:3, "Consider him who endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds." Be much in the consideration of the person, offices, and work of Christ. This will conform you unto him, derive strength from him, arm you with the same mind that was in him, increase all your graces, keep you from being weary, and give you assured victory. He deserves it, you need it; let it not be omitted.

5. This will give direction unto them who are called unto the work of teaching others. The person and offices of Christ are the things which principally they are to insist upon; for that which is the chiefest object of the church's faith ought to be the chiefest subject of our preaching. So Paul tells the Galatians, that in his preaching Christ was evidently crucified before their eyes, Galatians 3:1. He proposed Christ crucified unto their consideration, "determining," as he speaks in another place, "to know nothing amongst them but Jesus Christ, and him crucified." For if the consideration of Christ be such an important duty in believers, certainly the due proposal of him unto their consideration is no less in preachers. Christ alone is to be preached absolutely, and all other truths as they begin, end, and center in him. To propose the Lord Christ as amiable, desirable, useful, and every way worthy of acceptation, is the great duty of the dispensers of the gospel. I have insisted the longer on this observation, because it compriseth the main design of the apostle's words, and is also of singular use to all that profess the gospel. Those which remain shall be only named.

Strive to be Christ-like, as ever you would be lovely in the eyes of God and man. Certainly, my brethren, it is the Spirit of Christ within you, and the beauty of Christ upon you, which only can make you lovely persons; the more you resemble him in holiness, the more will you discover of true excellency and loveliness; and the more frequent and spiritual your converse and communion with Christ is, the more of the beauty and loveliness of Christ will be stamped upon your spirits, changing you into the same image, from glory to glory. John Flavel p 224 v2

Needs must the glory of Christ be unspeakable, who reflects glory upon all that are with him, John 17: 24, and stamps glory upon all that belong to him. Flavel, p 327 v2

Eighthly, To conclude, The teachings of God are transforming teachings; 2 Cor. 3:18. they change the soul into the same image; God casts them, whom he teacheth, into the very mold of those truths which they learn of him, Rom. 6: 17. Flavel p319 sermon 23

Self-examination, trials, afflictions and difficulties code362

Now, from all that hath been spoken unto this proposition, we may learn,—

1. To admire the riches of the grace of God, which hath provided so great salvation for poor sinners. Such and so great as it is, we stood in need of it. Nothing could be abated without our eternal ruin. But when divine wisdom, goodness, love, grace, and mercy, shall set themselves at work, what will they not accomplish? And the effect of them doth the Scripture set forth in these expressions: “So God loved the world;” “God commendeth his love unto us;” “Greater love hath no man than this;” “Riches of grace;” “Treasures of wisdom;” “Exceeding greatness of power;” and the like. In this will God be glorified and admired unto all eternity. And in the contemplation hereof are we to be exercised here and hereafter; and thereby may we grow up into the image of God in Christ, 2 Corinthians 3:18. Which way soever we look, whatever we consider in it, here is that which will entertain our souls with delight and satisfaction. [delight is a grace; God gives us this ability and desire to delight in Him - – spiritual palate so to speak, a point of self-examination, by the way, too, to examine if we have it.] The eternal counsel of God, the person of Christ, his mediation and grace, the promises of the gospel, the evil and wrath we are freed from, the redemption and glory purchased for us, the privileges we are admitted unto a participation of, the consolations and joys of the Spirit, the communion with God that we are called unto, — how glorious are they in the eyes of believers! or assuredly at all times they ought so to be. How can we enough bewail that vanity, whence it is that the mind suffereth itself to be possessed and filled with other things! [Hence, Phil 4:8!! ..think on these things.] Alas, what are they, if compared with the excellency of this love of God in Christ Jesus! Here lies our treasure, here lies our inheritance; why should not our hearts be here also? Were our minds fixed on these things as they ought, how would the glory of them cast out our cares, subdue our fears, sweeten our afflictions and persecutions, and take off our affections from the fading, perishing things of this world, and make us in every condition rejoice in the hope of the glory that shall be revealed! And, indeed, we lose the sweetness of the life of faith, the benefit of our profession, the reward that is in believing, and are made a scorn to the world and a prey unto temptations, because we dwell not enough in the contemplation of this great salvation.

To stir us up, then, hereunto we may consider, —

(1.) The excellency of the things themselves that are proposed unto our meditations. They are the great, the deep, the hidden things of the wisdom and grace of God. Men justify themselves in spending their time and speculations about the things of nature: and indeed such employment is better and more noble than what the generality of men do exercise themselves about; for some seldom raise their thoughts above the dunghills whereon they live, and some stuff their minds with such filthy imaginations as make them an abomination to God, Micah 2:1, 2, — they are conversant only about their own lusts, and making provision to fulfill and satisfy them. But yet what are those things which the better and more refined part of mankind do search and inquire into? Things that came out of nothing, and are returning thitherward apace; things which, when they are known, do not much enrich the mind, nor better it at all as to its eternal condition, nor contribute anything to the advantage of their souls. But these things are eternal, glorious, mysterious, that have the character of all God’s excellencies enstamped upon them, whose knowledge gives the mind its perfection and the soul its blessedness, John 17:3. This made Paul cry out that he accounted all things to be “but loss and dung” in comparison of an acquaintance with them, Philippians 3:8; and the prophets of old to “search diligently” into the nature of them, 1 Peter 1:10-12, as the things which alone deserved to be inquired after; and which inquiry renders them “noble” in whom it is, Acts 17:11, and is that which alone differenceth men in the sight of God, Jeremiah 9:23, 24.

(2.) Our interest and propriety in them. If we are believers, these are our things. The rich man is much in the contemplation of his riches, because they are his own; and the great man, of his power, because of his propriety in it. Men take little delight in being conversant in their minds about things that are not their own. [this is a point of examination to see whether or not you be in the faith!] Now, all these things are ours, if we are Christ’s, 1 Corinthians 3:22, 23. This salvation was prepared for us from all eternity, and we are the heirs of it, Hebrews 1:14. It was purchased for us by Jesus Christ; we have redemption and salvation by his blood. It is made over unto us by the promise of the gospel, and conferred upon us by the Spirit of grace. Are these things to be despised? are they to be cast aside among the things wherein we are least concerned? or can there be any greater evidence that we have no propriety in them than that would be, if our hearts should not be set upon them? What! all these riches ours, all these treasures, this goodly inheritance, this kingdom, this glory, and yet not be constant in thoughts and meditations about them! It is doubtless a sign, at least, that we question our title unto them, and that the evidences we have of them will not endure the trial. But woe unto us if that should be the end of our profession! and if it be otherwise, why are not our minds fixed on that which is our own, and which no man can take from us?

(3.) The profit and advantage which we shall have hereby, which will be much every way; for,

[1.] By this means we shall grow up into a likeness and conformity unto these things in our inward man [or the new man/creation]. Spiritual meditation will assimilate our minds and souls unto that which is the object of it.

So the apostle tells the Romans that they were delivered into the form of the doctrine preached unto them, chapter 6:17. Obeying it by faith, the likeness of it was brought forth upon their souls; and, by the renewing of their minds, they were transformed quite into another image in their souls, chapter 12:2. This the apostle most excellently expresseth, 2 Corinthians 3:18.

A constant believing contemplation of the glory of God in this salvation by Christ, will change the mind into the image and likeness of it, and that by various degrees, until we attain unto perfection, when “we shall know even as we are known.”

Accustoming of our minds unto these things will make them heavenly; and our affections, which will be conformed unto them, holy. This is the way to have Christ dwell plentifully in us, and for ourselves to “grow up into him who is our head.” And is it nothing, to get our minds purged from an evil habit, inclining unto earthly things, or continually forging foolish and hurtful imaginations in our hearts? This meditation will cast the soul into another mold and frame, making the heart “a good treasure,” out of which may be drawn at all times good things, new and old.

[2.] Consolation and supportment under all afflictions will from hence spring up in the soul. When the apostle would describe that property of faith whereby it enables a believer to do and suffer great things joyfully and comfortably, he doth it by its work and effect in this matter. It is, saith he, “the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen," Hebrews 11:1; that is, it brings into the soul, and makes evident unto it, the great things of this salvation, the great things of the love and grace of God therein. And this it doth no otherwise than by a constant contemplation and holy admiration of them. And when this is once done, he multiplies instances to evince what great effects it will produce, especially in its enabling of us to go through difficulties, trials, and afflictions. And the same also he ascribeth unto hope; which is nothing but the soul's waiting and expectation to be made partaker of the fullness of this salvation, whose greatness and satisfactory excellency it doth admire, Romans 5:2-5. When any affliction or tribulation presseth upon a believer, he can readily divert his thoughts from it unto the rich grace of God in this salvation; which will fill his heart with such a sense of his love as shall carry him above all the assaults of his trouble. And a direction to this purpose the apostle pursues at large, Romans 8:15-18, 24, 25, 31- 39. This is a safe harbor for the soul to betake itself unto in every storm; as he teacheth us again, 2 Corinthians 4:16-18. Whatever befalls us in our "outward man," though it should press so sore upon us as to ruin us in this world, yet "we faint not," we despond not; and the reason is, because those things which we suffer bear no proportion unto what we enjoy or expect. And the way whereby this consideration is made effectual unto us, is by a constant contemplation by faith on the great unseen things of this salvation, which takes off our minds and spirits from a valuation of the things which we presently suffer and endure. And this experience assures us to be our only relief in afflictions; which undoubtedly it is our wisdom to be provided for.

[3.] The same may be said concerning persecution, one especial part of affliction, and commonly that which most entangles the minds of them that suffer. Now, no man can endure persecution quietly, patiently, constantly, according to the will of God, especially when the devil pursues his old design of bringing it home unto their persons, Job 2:5, unless he hath in readiness a greater good, which shall in itself and in his own mind outbalance the evil which he suffers. And this the grace of this salvation will do. The soul that is exercised in the contemplation and admiration of it, will despise and triumph over all his outward sufferings which befall him on the account of his interest therein, as all persecution doth. This the apostle declares at large, Romans 8. Verses 31-34, he directs us unto a holy meditation on God's electing love, and on the death and mediation of Christ, the two springs of this meditation; and thence leads us, verses 35, 36, to a supposition of the great and sore persecutions that may befall us in this world; and from the former consideration triumphs over them all, verse 37, with a joy and exultation beyond that of conquerors in a battle, which yet is the greatest that the nature of man is capable of in and about temporal things. When the soul is prepossessed with the glory of this grace and his interest therein, it will assuredly bear him up against all the threatenings, reproaches, and persecutions of this world, even as it did the apostles of old, making them esteem that to be their glory and honor which the world looked on as their shame, Acts 5:41; and without this the heart will be very ready to sink and faint.

[4.] This also will greatly tend unto the confirmation of our faith, by giving us a full experience of the things that we do believe. Then the heart is immovable, when it is established by experience, when we find a substance, a reality, a spiritual nourishment in things proposed unto us. Now, how can this be obtained, unless we are conversant in our minds about them? unless we dwell in our thoughts and affections upon them? for thereby do we taste and find how good the Lord is in this work of his grace. Thus this duty being on many accounts of so great importance, we may do well to consider wherein it consisteth. And there are these four things belonging unto it: —

(1.) Intense prayer for the Spirit of wisdom and revelation, to give us an acquaintance with the mystery and grace of this great salvation. In ourselves we have no inbred knowledge of it, nor can we by our own endeavors attain unto it. We must have a new understanding given us, or we shall not “know him that is true,” 1 John 5:20. For notwithstanding the declaration that is made of this mystery in the gospel, we see that the most of men live in darkness and ignorance of it. It is only the Spirit of God which can search these “deep things of God,” and reveal them unto us, 1 Corinthians 2:10. By him must “he who commanded light to shine out of darkness shine into our hearts, to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ,” 2 Corinthians 4:6.

And therefore the apostle prays for the Ephesians that God would give unto them “the Spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him; that, the eyes of their understandings being enlightened, they may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints, and what is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe,” chapter 1:17-19; and for the Colossians, that they might come unto “all riches of the full assurance of understanding, to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ,” chapter 2:2, — that is, that they might have a spiritual and saving acquaintance with the mystery of this great salvation, the love, grace, and wisdom of God therein, which without this Spirit of wisdom and revelation from above we shall not attain unto.

This, then, in the first place, is to be sought after, this are we to abide in, — constant prayers and supplications for the teaching, instructing, revealing, enlightening work and efficacy of this Spirit, that we may be enabled to look into these deep things of God, that we may in some measure with all saints comprehend them, and grow wise in the mystery of salvation. Solomon tells us how this wisdom is to be obtained: Proverbs 2:3-5, “If thou criest after knowledge, and liftest up thy voice for understanding; if thou seeketh her as for silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures; then shalt thou understand the fear of the LORD, and find the knowledge of God.” It is by praying, crying, supplications, with diligence and perseverance, that we attain this wisdom. Abide herein, or all other attempts will prove but vain. How many poor souls, otherwise weak and simple, have by this means grown exceeding wise in the mystery of God! and how many more, wise in this world, through the neglect of it, do walk in darkness all their days!

(2.) Diligent study of the word, wherein this mystery of God is declared and proposed unto our faith and holy contemplation; but this hath been spoken unto in part already, and must again be considered, and so need not here be insisted on.

(3.) Sincere love unto and delight in the things that are by the Spirit of God revealed unto us, is another part of this duty. Herein our apostle declares what was his frame of heart, Philippians 3:8. How doth his heart, triumph in and rejoice over the knowledge he had obtained of Jesus Christ! and then, indeed, do we know anything of the grace of God aright, when our hearts are affected with what we know. Peter tells us that the saints of old, in their believing, “rejoiced with joy unspeakable and full of glory,” 1 Epist. 1:8. They discovered that in Christ which made their hearts leap within them, and all their affections to overflow with delight and joy. And this is an essential part of this holy admiration, which distinguisheth it from that barren, fruitless, notional speculation of it, which some are contented withal. This are we to stir up our hearts unto in all our meditations of the grace of God, and not to rest until we find them affected, satisfied, and filled with a holy complacency; which is the most eminent evidence of our interest in and union unto the things that are made known unto us.

(4.) All these things are to be attended with thankfulness and praise. This the apostle was full of, and broke forth into, when he entered upon the description of this grace, Ephesians 1:3, 4; and this will be the frame of his heart who is exercised unto a holy admiration of it. When our Lord Jesus Christ considered the grace of God in revealing the mysteries of this salvation unto his disciples, it is said of him that he “rejoiced in spirit,” ἠγαλλιάσατο, Luke 10:21, “his spirit leaped in him;” and he breaks forth into a solemn doxology, giving praise and glory unto God. And is it not their duty to whom they are revealed to do that which, out of love unto them, our Lord Jesus Christ did on their behalf? Thankfulness for the things themselves, thankfulness for the revelation of them, thankfulness for the love of God and the grace of Jesus Christ in the one and the other, is a great part of this duty.

Reflections and Observations on Brainerd's Memoirs .

Code396

The following is an excerpt from the memoirs of David Brainerd by Jonathan Edwards. This has a bearing on the above 270+ pages regarding the glory of God in this respect - —hat God's glory is not revealed in conversions that are false. People are moved by other principles, primarily self-love and other false impressions on their minds. The main purpose of spending so many pages on this subject of God's glory revealed to the elect is to show God's infinite wisdom and power at work in this business and that due to the manifold infinite wisdom and power involved, it will infallibly accomplish its end - that the death of Christ has a specific purpose - to save those that the Father gave him. To say that this might happen if man cooperates with God, that man can resist this effectual call, this glory revealed, is to assign weakness to the Godhead or a wisdom that is not wise enough, or a power that is not powerful enough, a grace that is just a common thing, all of which is blasphemy or heresy.

SECT. V.

Besides what has been already related of Mr. Brainerd's sentiments in his dying state concerning true and false religion, we have his deliberate and solemn thoughts on this subject, further appearing by his preface to Mr. Shepard's diary, before mentioned; which, when he wrote it, he supposed to be (as it proved) one of the last things he should ever write. I shall here insert a part of that preface, as follows:

“How much stress is laid by many upon some things as being effects and evidences of exalted degrees of religion, when they are so far from being of any importance in it, that they are really irreligious, a mixture of self-love, imagination, and spiritual pride, or perhaps the influence of Satan transformed into an angel of light; I say, how much stress is laid on these things by many, I shall not determine: but it is much to be feared, that while God was carrying on a glorious work of grace, and undoubtedly gathering a harvest of souls to himself, (which we should always remember with thankfulness,) numbers of others have at the same time been fatally deluded by the devices of the devil, and their own corrupt hearts. It is to be feared, that the conversions of some have no better foundation than this; viz. that after they have been under some concern for their souls for a while, and, it may be, manifested some very great and uncommon distress and agonies, they have on a sudden imagined they saw Christ, in some posture or other, perhaps on the cross, bleeding and dying for their sins; or it may be, smiling on them, and thereby signifying his love to them: and that these and the like things, though mere imaginations, which have nothing spiritual in them, have instantly removed all their fears and distresses, filled them with raptures of joy, and made them imagine, that they loved Christ with all their hearts; when the bottom of all was nothing but self-love. For when they imagined that Christ had been so good to them as to save them, and as it were to single them out of all the world, they could not but feel some kind of natural gratitude to him; although they never had any spiritual view of his divine glory, excellency, and beauty, and consequently never had any love to him for himself. [this is what Arminianism tends to or is the result of Arminian doctrine, particularly, the sinner's prayer]. Or that instead of having some such imaginary view of Christ as has been mentioned, in order to remove their distress, and give them joy, some having had a passage, or perhaps many passages, of Scripture brought to their minds with power, (as they express it,) such as that, "Son, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee," and the like, they have immediately applied these passages to themselves, supposing that God hereby manifested his peculiar favour to them, as if mentioned by name; never considering, that they are now giving heed to new revelations, there being no such thing revealed in the word of God, as that this or that particular person has, or ever shall have, his sins forgiven; nor yet remembering, that Satan can, with a great deal of seeming pertinency, (and perhaps also with considerable power,) bring Scripture to the minds of men, as he did to Christ himself. And thus these rejoice upon having some scripture suddenly suggested to them, or impressed upon their minds, supposing they are now the children of God, just as did the other upon their imaginary views of Christ. And it is said that some speak of seeing a great light which filled all the place where they were, and dispelled all their darkness, fears, and distresses, and almost ravished their souls. While others have had it warmly suggested to their minds, not by any passage of Scripture, but as it were by a whisper or voice from heaven, "That God loves them, that Christ is theirs," &c. which groundless imaginations and suggestions of Satan have had the same effect upon them, that the delusions before mentioned had on the others. [this is the danger of Pentecostalism or like beliefs where people say they hear from God or God spoke to me on this or that subject, either verbally or by unction; it's design is to get people away from diligent study of scripture and from relying on scripture as the final authority in all religious matters.] And as is the conversion of this sort of persons, so are their after experiences; the whole being built upon imagination, strong impressions, and sudden suggestions made to their minds; whence they are usually extremely confident (as if immediately informed from God) not only of the goodness of their own state, but of their infallible knowledge, and absolute certainty, of the truth of everything they pretend to, under the notion of religion; and thus all reasoning with some of them is utterly excluded.

"But it is remarkable of these, that they are extremely deficient in regard of true poverty of spirit, a sense of exceeding vileness in themselves, such as frequently makes truly gracious souls to groan, being burdened; as also in regard of meekness, love, gentleness towards mankind, and tenderness of conscience in their ordinary affairs and dealings in the world. And it is rare to see them deeply concerned about the principles and ends of their actions, and under fears lest they should not eye the glory of God chiefly, but live to themselves; or this at least is the case in their ordinary conduct, whether civil or religious. But if any one of their particular notions, which their zeal has espoused, be attacked, they are then so conscientious, they must burn, if called to it, for its defense. Yet at the same time, when they are so extremely deficient in regard of these precious divine tempers which have been mentioned, they are usually full of zeal, concern, and fervency in the things of religion, and often discourse of them with much warmth and engagement: and to those who do not know, or do not consider, wherein the essence of true religion consists, namely, in being conformed to the image of Christ, not in point of zeal and fervency only, but in all divine tempers and practices they often appear like the best of men."

It is common with this sort of people to say, that "God is amongst them, his Spirit accompanies their exhortations, and other administrations, and they are sealed by the Holy Ghost," in the remarkable success they have, in the great affections that are stirred up in God's people, &c. but to insinuate, on the contrary, that "he is not with their opponents;" and particularly, "that God has forsaken the standing ministry; and that the time is come, when it is the will of God that they should be put down, and that God's people should forsake them; and that no more success is to be expected to attend their administrations." But where can they find an instance among all their most flaming exhorters, who has been sealed with so incontestable and wonderful success of his labours, as Mr. Brainerd, not only in quickening and comforting God's children, but also in a work of conviction and conversion, (which they own has in a great measure ceased for a long time among themselves,) with a most visible and astonishing manifestation of God's power? And this was on subjects extremely unprepared, and who had been brought up and lived, some of them to old age, in the deepest prejudices against the very first principles of Christianity; and yet we find the divine power accompanying his labours, producing the most remarkable and abiding change, turning the wilderness into a fruitful field, and causing that which was a desert indeed to bud and blossom as the rose! And this, although he was not only one of their greatest opponents in their errors; but also one of those they call the standing ministry; first examined and licensed to preach by such ministers, and sent forth among the heathen by such ministers; and afterwards ordained by such ministers; always directed by them, and united with them in their consistories and administrations: and even abhorring the practice of those who give out, that they ought to be renounced, and separated from, and that teachers may be ordained by laymen.

It cannot be pretended by these men that Mr. Brainerd condemned their religion, only because he was not acquainted with them, and had not opportunity for full observation of the nature, operation, and tendency of their experiences; for he had abundant and peculiar opportunities of such observation and acquaintance. He lived through the late extraordinary time of religious commotion, and saw the beginning and end, the good and the bad of it. He had opportunity to see the various operations and effects that were wrought in this season, more extensively than any person I know of. His native place was about the middle of Connecticut; and he was much conversant in all parts of that colony. He was conversant in the eastern parts of it, after the religion which he condemned began much to prevail there. He was conversant with the zealous people on Long Island, from one end of the island to the other; and also in New Jersey and Pennsylvania; with people of various nations. He had special opportunities in some places in this province, (Massachusetts Bay,) where there has been very much of this sort of religion, and at a time when it greatly prevailed. He had conversed and disputed with abundance of this kind of people in various parts, as he told me; and also informed me, that he had seen something of the same appearances in some of the Indians, to whom he had preached, and had opportunity to see the beginning and end of them. Besides, Mr. Brainerd could speak more feelingly concerning these things, because there was once a time when he was drawn away into an esteem of them, and for a short season had united himself to this kind of people, and partook, in some respects, of their spirit and behaviour. But I proceed to another observation on the foregoing Memoirs.

REFLECT. II.

This history of Mr. Brainerd's may help us to make distinctions among the high religious affections, and remarkable impressions made on the minds of persons, in a time of great awakening, and revival of religion; and may convince us, that there are not only distinctions in theory, invented to save the credit of pretended revivals of religion, and what is called the experience of the operations of the Spirit; but distinctions that do actually take place in the course of events, and have a real and evident foundation in fact.

Many do and will confound things, blend all together, and say, "It is all alike; it is all of the same sort." So there are many that say concerning the religion most generally prevailing among the Separatists, and the affections they manifest, "It is the same that was all over the land seven years ago." And some that have read Mr. Brainerd's Journal, giving an account of the extraordinary things that have come to pass among the Indians in New Jersey, say, "It is evidently the same thing that appeared in many places amongst the English, which has now proved naught, and come to that which is worse than nothing." And all the reason they have thus to determine all to be the same work, and the same spirit, is, that the one manifested high affections, and so do the other; the great affections of the one had some influence on their bodies, and so have the other; the one use the terms conviction, conversion, humiliation, coming to Christ, discoveries, experiences, &c. and so do the other; the impressions on the one are attended with a great deal of zeal, and so it is with the other; the affections of the one dispose them to speak much about things of religion, and so do the other; the one delight much in religious meetings, and so do the other. The agreement that appears in these, and such like things, make them conclude, that surely all is alike, all is the same work. Whereas, on a closer inspection and critical examination, it would appear, that notwithstanding an agreement in such circumstances, yet indeed there is a vast difference, both in essence and fruits. A considerable part of the religious operations that were six or seven years ago, especially towards the latter part of that extraordinary season, was doubtless of the same sort with the religion of the Separatists; but not all: there were many, whose experiences were, like Mr. Brainerd's, in a judgment of charity, genuine and incontestable.

Not only do the opposers of all religion consisting in powerful operations and affections, thus confound things; but many of the pretenders to such religion do so. They who have been the subjects of some sort of vehement, but vain operations on their mind, when they hear the relation of the experiences of some real and eminent Christians, say, that their experiences are of the same sort: and that they are just like the experiences of eminent Christians in former times, of which we have printed accounts. So, I doubt not, but there are many deluded people, if they should read the preceding account of Mr. Brainerd's life, who, reading without much understanding, or careful observation, would say, without hesitation, that some things which they have met with, are of the very same kind with what he expresses: when the agreement is only in some general circumstances, or some particular things that are superficial, and belonging as it were to the profession and outside of religion; but the inward temper of mind, and the fruits in practice, are as opposite and distant as east and west.

Many honest, good people also, and true Christians, do not very well know how to make a difference. The glistening appearance of false religion dazzles their eyes; and they sometimes are so deluded by it, that they look on some of these impressions, which hypocrites tell of, as the brightest experiences. And though they have experienced no such things themselves, they think, it is because they are vastly lower in attainments, and but babes, in comparison of these flaming Christians. Yea, sometimes from their differing so much from those who make so great a show, they doubt whether they have any grace at all. And it is a hard thing, to bring many well-meaning people to make proper distinctions in this case; and especially to maintain and stand by them. Through a certain weakness under which they unhappily labour, they are liable to be overcome with the glare of outward appearances. Thus, if in a sedate hour they are by reasoning brought to allow such and such distinctions, yet the next time they come in the way of the great show of false religion, the dazzling appearance swallows them up, and they are carried away. Thus the devil by his cunning artifices, easily dazzles the feeble sight of men, and puts them beyond a capacity of a proper exercise of consideration, or hearkening to the dictates of calm thought, and cool understanding. When they perceive the great affection, earnest talk, strong voice, assured looks, vast confidence, and bold assertions, of these empty assuming pretenders, they are overcome, lose the possession of their judgment, and say, "Surely these men are in the right, God is with them of a truth:" and so they are carried away, not with light and reason, but, like children, as it were with a strong wind.

This confounding of all things together, that have a fair show, is but acting the part of a child, that going into a shop, where a variety of wares are exposed to sale all of a shining appearance; vessels of gold and silver; diamonds and other precious stones; toys of little value, which are of some base metal gilt; glass polished and painted with curious colours, or cut like diamonds, &c. should esteem all alike, and give as great a price for the vile as for the precious. Or it is like the conduct of some unskillful, rash person, who, finding himself deceived by some of the wares he had bought at that shop, should at once conclude all he there saw was of no value; and pursuant to such a conclusion, when afterwards he has true gold and diamonds offered him, enough to enrich him and enable him to live like a prince all his days, he should throw it all into the sea.

But we must get into another way. The want of distinguishing in things that appertain to experimental religion, is one of the chief miseries of the professing world. It is attended with very many most dismal consequences: multitudes of souls are fatally deluded about themselves, and their own state; and thus are eternally undone. Hypocrites are confirmed in their delusions, and exceedingly puffed up with pride; many sincere Christians are dreadfully perplexed, darkened, tempted, and drawn aside from the way of duty; and sometimes sadly tainted with false religion, to the great dishonour of Christianity, and hurt of their own souls. Some of the most dangerous and pernicious enemies of religion in the world (though called bright Christians) are encouraged and honoured; who ought to be discountenanced and shunned by everybody: and prejudices are begotten and confirmed in vast multitudes, against everything wherein the power and essence of godliness consists; and in the end deism and atheism are promoted. [Arminianism and like doctrines lead to these problems. Many say they are saved because they said the sinner's prayer which is coming to God without being called, and so believe that God has accepted them when in fact they never were accepted. In this way many come into the church and corrupt it and contaminate many sincere believers with false teaching, ungodly life styles, etc., for a false conversion still leaves that person an enemy to God in his heart with no desire to be holy. Besides, Who has directed the Spirit of the Lord? Isa 40:13 And again in Rm 11:34-35, For who has known the mind of the LORD? Or who has become His counselor?" "Or who has first given to Him And it shall be repaid to him? God initiates conversion and directs himself thereto by his own counsel. See also John 3:8.

One of God's Great Purposes: code351 To show the emptiness and vanity of the creature and to magnify Christ.

"Because God's design was to show the emptiness of the creature, and its exceeding insufficiency, therefore God suffered both angels and men quickly to fall, and the old creation quickly to go to ruin." Jonathan Edwards

Fall of the Angels, by Jonathan Edwards pg 610 vol. 2

<http://www.ccel.org/ccel/edwards/works2.xii.ii.html>

Corol. V. Lucifer, while a holy angel, in having the excellency of all those glorious things that were about him, all summed up in him, was a type of Christ, in whom all the glory and excellency of all elect creatures is more properly summed, as the head and foundation of all, just as the brightness of all, that reflects the light of the sun, is summed up in the sun.

And as the devil was the highest of all the angels, so he was the very highest of all God's creatures; he was the top and crown of the whole creation; he was the brightest part of the heaven of heavens, that brightest part of all the creation; he was the head of the angels, that most noble rank of all created beings; and, therefore, when spoken of under that type of him, the Behemoth, he is said to be "the chief of the ways of God," Job xl. 19. And since it is revealed that there is a certain order and government among the angels, the superior angels having some kind of authority over others that are of lower rank; and since Lucifer was the chief of them all, we may suppose that he was the head of the whole society, the captain of the whole host. He was the archangel, the prince of the angels, and all did obeisance unto him. And as the angels, as the ministers of God's providence, have a certain superintendency and rule over the world, or at least over some parts of it that God has committed to their care, hence they are called thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers. Therefore, seeing Lucifer was the head, and captain, and prince of all, and the highest creature in the whole universe, we may suppose that he had, as God's chief servant, and the grand minister of his providence, and the top of the creation, in some respect committed to him power, dominion, and principality over the whole creation, and all the kingdom of providence; and as all the angels are called the sons of God, Lucifer was his first-born, and was the firstborn of every creature. But when it was revealed to him, high and glorious as he was, that he must be a ministering spirit to the race of mankind which he had seen newly created, which appeared so feeble, mean, and despicable, so vastly inferior, not only to him, the prince of the angels, and head of the created universe, but also to the inferior angels, and that he must be subject to one of that race that should hereafter be born, he could not bear it. This occasioned his fall; and now he, with the other angels whom he drew away with him, are fallen, and elect men are translated to supply their places, and are exalted vastly higher in heaven than they. And the Man Jesus Christ, the Chief, and Prince, and Captain of all elect men, is translated and set in the throne that Lucifer, the chief and prince of the angels, left, to be the head of the angels in his stead, the head of principality and power, that all the angels might do obeisance to him; for God said, "Let all the angels of God worship him;" and God made him his first-born instead of Lucifer, higher than all those thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers, and made him, yea, made him in his stead the first-born of every creature, or of the whole creation, and made him also in his stead the bright and morning star, and head and prince of the universe; yea, gave this honour, dignity, and power unto him, in an unspeakably higher and more glorious manner than ever he had done to Lucifer, and appointed him to conquer, subdue, and execute vengeance upon that great rebel. Lucifer aspired to be "like the Most High," but God exalted one of mankind, the race that he envied, and from envy to whom he rebelled against God, to be indeed like the Most High, to a personal union with the eternal Son of God, and exalted him in this union to proper divine honour and dignity, set him at his own right hand on his own throne, and committed to him proper divine power and authority, constituting him as God man, the supreme, absolute, and universal Lord of the universe, and Judge of every creature, the darling of the whole creation, the brightness of God's glory, and express image of his person; as, in his divine nature, he is the NATURAL IMAGE of God. God, in his providence, was pleased thus to show the emptiness and vanity of the creature, by suffering the insufficiency of the highest and most glorious of all creatures, the head and crown of the whole creation, to appear, by his sudden fall from his glorious height into the lowest depth of hatefulness, deformity, and misery. God's design was first to show the creature's emptiness in itself, and then to fill it with himself in eternal, unalterable fullness and glory. To show the emptiness of the creature, the old creation, or the old heavens and earth, were to go to ruin and perish, in some sense, or at least all was to be emptied. Great part of the old creation was actually to sink into total and eternal perdition, as fallen angels and some of fallen men; all mankind was in a sense to be totally: though some of them were to be restored, after they had sensibly been emptied of themselves. And though the highest heaven never was to be destroyed, yet, before it should have its consummate and immutable glory, the highest and most glorious part of it was to perish, and a considerable part of the glorious heavenly inhabitants; and the rest were hereby to be brought to see their own emptiness and utter insufficiency, and so as it were to perish or die as to self-dependence and all self-fulness, and to be brought to an entire dependence on the sovereign grace and all-sufficiency of God, to be communicated to them by his Son as their head. And thus the whole old creation, both heaven and earth, as to all its natural glory and creature-fulness, was to be pulled down; and thus, way was to be made for the creation of the new heavens and new earth, or the setting forth of the whole elect universe in its consummate, everlasting, immutable glory in the fullness of God, in a great, most conspicuous, immediate, and universal dependence on his power and sovereign grace, and also on the glorious and infinitely excellent nature and essence of God, as the infinite fountain of glory and love; the beholding and enjoying of which, and union with which, being the elect creature's all in all, all its strength, all its beauty, all its life, its fruit, its honour, its blessedness.

So many believe that before conversion, man is in the complete image of God when he is not otherwise it wouldn't need to be restored; he is in the likeness or image of Adam, (Gen. 5:3; and see 1Cor15:49, Just as we have borne the image of the man of dust, we shall also bear the image of the man of heaven.) , with no virtue/holiness, i.e., with no true love for God) that would be pleasing to God; he is "empty" of anything good (Romans 7:18 and others). This most disagreed by the Arminians. When God communicates his glory to a person in conversion he is not improving something already there but is putting in something new, hence he is now a new creation. This is the whole point of contention; Arminians believe that man is not totally debased, that he has some spiritual strength or virtue (love for God) or capacity, that enables him to savingly come to God (to believe in Christ) whereas Scripture says he has nothing and can do nothing apart from Christ, Jn15:5. The one view glorifies man; the other glorifies God. That's the battle. You will always have the Judaizers, or the man-centered, synergistic religions, man's efforts contending with God's freedom as the potter over the clay. Man says that free grace is insufficient, that man needs to do something or work something in addition it; that God is not the decisive efficient in salvation - --an is, his deciding is; and God is just waiting for man make up his mind...to make the big choice to choose Christ and then God will respond by saving him. So this communication of God's fullness, his internal glory to the creature is the communicating of himself; communicating his nature to the creature so that he is now a partaker of his nature, the image of God being re-stamped upon his soul or his mind. This is entirely the result of God's free choice and good pleasure of his will and has nothing to do with any merit in or pleading from the creature. To plead otherwise is a gross contradiction. These excerpts will paint this picture clearer. What I am also saying is that this communication is not a common thing; not all have faith (2Thes.3:20). For if this communication is common to all, then there is no hell and all are in heaven. For as Edwards said, "The communion of saints with Christ certainly consist in receiving of his fullness and partaking of his grace, which is spoken of, [John i. 16. "Of his fullness have we all received, and grace for grace." And the partaking of that Spirit which God gives not by measure unto him, the partaking of Christ's holiness and grace, his nature, inclinations, tendencies, affections, love, desires, must be a part of communion with him." "his the diagram I made clearly represents. It unites us to Christ, hence it infallibly saves! This is self evident. This is that glory that Christ said he gave to the elect in John 17:22 to effect their conversion, to unite them to himself. Arminianism appeals to man's carnal notion of self sufficiency - --hat is why it is so attractive to multitudes. It's great thrust is to derogate from the total sufficiency of the free grace of Christ, that man is not spiritually dead but has some degree of true virtue in himself remaining after the fall of Adam to contribute to Christ's work in a cooperative effort to attain salvation (synergism - --an cooperates with God); that God's grace is not sufficient; hence Arminianism is anti-Christ. And in this sense, Arminians believe that one can resist this call of God which is absurd.]

Corol. I. From the last paragraph. This may show us the necessity of a work of humiliation in men as the necessity of man's being emptied of himself in order to a partaking of the benefits of the new creation, and the redemption of Jesus Christ.

Corol. II. This shows that even the elect angels have their eternal life in a way of humiliation, and also dependence on sovereign grace, as well as elect men, though not the same sort of humiliation and dependence in all respects.

To show the emptiness of all creatures in themselves, the ruin of the creation began in heaven, in the very best and highest part of the creation, and in the highest creature in it, the crown and glory of the whole creation; because it was the will of God that a mere creature should not be the head of the creation, but a divine person, and that he should be the crown and glory of the creation. Heaven was the first of the creation that was subject to ruin, and it shall be the last part that shall be renewed or amended by a new creation. There are two parts of the creation connected with the work of redemption; one is the world of man, and that is this visible world; and the other is the world of angels, and that is heaven. The whole is to be changed: the former shall be destroyed, because all men fell, and only an elect number are saved out of it; the other shall not be destroyed, because all the angels did not fall, those that stood supported it, a blessing was left in it, and therefore God said, Destroy it not, and therefore the change that is to be made in that is to be of a contrary nature to destruction; it is to be made infinitely more glorious by a new creation. And therefore God's dealings with respect to the world of angels, are contrary to his dealings with the world of men. The world of men is to be destroyed, and therefore, elect men are taken out of it, and carried into the world of angels, and reprobate men left in it to perish and sink with it. The world of angels is not to be destroyed, but renewed and glorified; and therefore, reprobate angels are taken out of it, and cast into the world of men, and elect angels are kept in it, to be renewed and glorified with it.

Because God's design was to show the emptiness of the creature, and its exceeding insufficiency, therefore God suffered both angels and men quickly to fall, and the old creation quickly to go to ruin.

Some may be ready to think it to be incredible, and what the wisdom of the Creator would not suffer, that the most glorious of all his creatures should fall and be eternally ruined, or that it should be so that the elect angels, those that are beloved of God, should none of them be of equal strength and largeness of capacity with the devil. To this I would say,

1. That the man Christ Jesus that is exalted into the place of Lucifer in heaven, though he be of a rank of creatures of a nature far inferior in capacity to that of the angels, and especially far below the highest of all the angels, yet God can and hath exalted that little worm of littleness and weakness to an immensely greater capacity, dignity, and glory, than Lucifer ever had.
2. God can reward the elect angels that originally are inferior to Lucifer, and can increase their capacity and strength; and there is no reason to think but that he has rewarded, or will reward, elect angels, as well as elect men, with a great exaltation of their nature. And probably Christ did, at his ascension, exalt the natures of some of them at least, so as to exceed all that ever Lucifer had. It seems probable, by Rev. xx. at the beginning; and probably at the day of judgment, the natures of all the angels will be so exalted as to be above the devil in capacity.

Seeing that this was the case with the devil, that before his fall he was the head of the creation, the captain and prince of the angels, and had some kind of superintendency over the whole universe, and seeing his sin was his pride, and affecting to be like the Most High, no wonder that he seeks to reign as god of this world, and affects to be worshipped as God.

That the devil so restlessly endeavours to set p himself in this world, and maintain his dominion here, and to oppose God, and fight against him to the procuring his own continual disappointment and vexation, and to work out his own misery, and at last to bring on his own head his own greatest torment, his everlasting and consummate misery, is the fruit of a curse that God has laid him under for his first ambition, and envy, and opposition to God in heaven. He is therefore made a perfect slave to those lusts that reign over him, and torment him, and will pull down on him eternal destruction.

Concerning Divine Decrees

pg 532 Vol.2 Jonathan Edwards

§ 77. If the grace of God is not disposing and determining, then a gracious man's differing in this respect from another, is not owing to the goodness of God. He owes no thanks to God for it; and so owes no thanks to God, that he is saved, and not others. But how contrary is this to Scripture! Seeing the Scripture speaks of the gift of virtue, and of the possession of it, as a fruit of God's bounty.

§ 78. A man's conformity to the rule of duty, is partly owing to assistance or motive; if his conformity be to ten degrees; and it is in some measure, e. g., to the amount of five degrees, owing to sovereign assistance; then only the remaining five degrees are to be ascribed to the man himself, and therefore there are but five degrees of virtue.

§ 79. Dr. Stebbing says, "that a man is indeed both passive and active in his own conversion," and he represents God as partly the cause of man's conversion, and man himself as partly the cause, p. 208.

Again, Stebbing says, p. 254. "Faith and regeneration are our works, as well as his gifts, i.e., they arise partly from God and partly from ourselves." But if so, on this scheme, they imply virtue so far only as they are our works.

Men's salvation is attributed wholly and entirely to men in their scheme, and none of the praise of it is due to God, as will most evidently appear, if the matter be considered with a little attention. For, 1. They hold that man's salvation is given as a reward of man's virtue; so is pardon of sin, deliverance from hell, and eternal life and glory in heaven; all is for man's virtue. 2. Rewardable virtue wholly consists in the exercise of a man's own free will. They hold that a man's actions are no farther virtuous nor rewardable, than as they are from man himself. If they are partly from some foreign cause, so far they are not rewardable. It being so, that that virtue which is rewardable in man, is entirely from man himself; hence it is to himself wholly that he is to ascribe his obtaining the reward. If the virtue, which is that thing, and that thing only, which obtains the reward, be wholly from man himself, then it will surely follow, that his obtaining the reward is wholly from himself.

All their arguments suppose, that men's actions are no farther virtuous and rewardable, than as they are from themselves, the fruits of their own free will and self-determination. And men's own virtue, they say, is the only condition of salvation, and so must be the only thing by which salvation is obtained. And this being of themselves only, it surely follows, that their obtaining salvation is of themselves only.

They say, their scheme gives almost all the glory to God. "That matter, I suppose, may easily be determined, and it may be made to appear beyond all contest, how much they do ascribe to the man, and how much they do not.

By them, salvation is so far from God, that it is God that gives opportunity to obtain salvation; it is God that gives the offer and makes the promise: but the obtaining of, the thing promised is of men. The being of the promise is of God; but their interest in it is wholly of themselves, of their own free will. And furthermore, it is to be observed, that even God's making the offer, and giving the opportunity to obtain salvation, at least that which consists in salvation from eternal misery, is not of God, so as to be owing to any proper grace or goodness of his. For they suppose he was obliged to make the offer, and it would have been a reproach to his justice, if he had not given an opportunity to obtain salvation. For they hold, it is unjust for God to make men miserable for Adam's sin; and that it is unjust to punish them for that sin that they cannot avoid; and that, therefore, it is unjust for God not to preserve or save all men that do what they can, or use their sincere endeavours to do their duty; and therefore it certainly follows, that it is unjust in God not to give all opportunity to be saved or preserved from misery; and consequently, it is no fruit at all of any grace or kindness in him to give such opportunity, or to make the offer of it. So that, all that is the fruit of God's kindness in man's salvation, is the positive happiness that belongs to salvation. But neither of these two things are in any respect whatsoever the fruit of God's kindness, neither his deliverance from sin, nor from misery in his virtue and holiness; and when hereafter he shall see the misery of the damned, he will have it to consider, that it is owing in no respect to God that he is delivered from that misery. And that good men differ from others that shall burn in hell to all eternity, is wholly owing to themselves. When they, at the day of judgment, shall behold some set on the left hand of the Judge, while they are on his right hand, and shall see how they differ, they may, and, as they would act according to truth, they ought to take all the glory of it unto themselves; and therefore the glory of their salvation belongs to them. For it is evident that a man's making himself to differ with regard to any great spiritual benefit, and his not receiving it from another, but his having it in distinction from others, being from himself, is ground of a man's boasting and glorying in himself, with respect to that benefit, and of boasting of it: I say, it is evident by the apostle's words, "Who maketh thee to differ? Why boastest thou, as though thou hadst not received it?" These words plainly imply it.

It is evident, that it is God's design to exclude man's boasting in the affair of his salvation. Now, let us consider what does give ground for boasting in the apostle's account, and what it is that in his account excludes boasting, or cuts off occasion for it. It is evident by what the apostle says, 1 Cor. i. latter end, that the entireness and universality of our dependence on God, is that which cuts off occasion of boasting; as, our receiving our wisdom, our holiness, and redemption through Christ, and not through ourselves; that Christ is made to us wisdom, justification, holiness, and redemption; and not only so, but that it is of God that we have any part in Christ; Of him are ye in Christ Jesus: nay, further, that it is from God we receive those benefits of wisdom, holiness, &c. through the Saviour that we are interested in.

The import of all these things, if we may trust to scripture representations, is, that God has contrived to exclude our glorying; that we should be wholly and every way dependent on God, for the moral and natural good that belongs to salvation; and that we have all from the hand of God, by his power and grace. And certainly this is wholly inconsistent with the idea that our holiness is wholly from ourselves; and that we are interested in the benefits of Christ rather than others, is wholly of our own decision. And that such a universal dependence is what takes away occasion of taking glory to ourselves, and is a proper ground of an ascription of all the glory of the things belonging to man's salvation to God, is manifest from Rom. xi. 35, 36. “Or who hath first given unto him, and it shall be recompensed to him again? For of him, and to him, and through him, are all things; to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen.”

The words are remarkable, and very significant. If we look into all the foregoing discourse, from the beginning of chapter ix. of which this is the conclusion, by not giving to God, but having all this wholly from, through, and in God, is intended that these things, these great benefits forementioned, are thus from God, without being from or through ourselves. That some of the Jews were distinguished from others in enjoying the privileges of Christians, was not of themselves; not of him that willet, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy. It is of him who has mercy on whom he will have mercy. It is of God who makes of the same lump, a vessel to honour and a vessel unto dishonour. It is not of us, nor our works, but of the calling of God, or of him that calleth, chap. ix. 11. and 23, 24. Not first of our own choice, but of election, chap. ix. 11-27. and chap. xi. 5. It is all of the grace of God in such a manner, as not to be of our works at all; yea, and so as to be utterly inconsistent with its being of our works; chap. xi. 5, 6, 7. In such a manner as not first to be of their seeking; their seeking does not determine, but God's election; chap. xi. 7. It is of God, and not of man, that some were gathered in, that were wild olive branches in themselves, and were more unlikely as to anything in themselves to be branches, than others, verse 17. Their being grafted in, is owing to God's distinguishing goodness, while he was pleased to use severity towards others, ver. 22. Yea, God has so ordered it, on purpose that all should be shut up in unbelief; be left to be so sinful, that he might have mercy on all; so as more visibly to show the salvation of all to be merely dependent on mercy. Then the apostle fitly concludes all this discourse, Rom. xi. 35, 36. “Or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed to him again? For of him, and to him, and through him, are all things; to whom be glory for ever. Amen.”

Again, in the apostle's account, a benefit's being of our works, gives occasion for boasting, and therefore God has contrived that our salvation shall not be of our works, but of mere grace, Rom. iii. 27. Eph. ii. 9. And that neither the salvation, nor the condition of it, shall be of our works, but that, with regard to all, we are God's workmanship and his creation antecedently to our works; and his grace and power in producing this workmanship, and his determination or purpose with regard to them, are all prior to our works and the cause of them. See also Rom. xi. 4, 5, 6.

And it is evident, that man 'saving virtue from himself, and not receiving it from another, and making himself to differ with regard to great spiritual benefits, does give ground for boasting, by the words of the apostle in Rom. iii. 27. And this is allowed by those men in spiritual gifts. And if so in them, more so in greater things; more so in that which in itself is a thousand times more excellent, and of ten thousand times greater importance and benefit.

By the Arminian scheme, that which is infinitely the most excellent thing, viz. virtue and holiness, which the apostle sets forth as being infinitely the most honourable, and will bring the subjects of it to infinitely the greatest and highest honour, that which is infinitely the highest dignity of man's nature of all things that belong to man's salvation; in comparison of which, all things belonging to that salvation are nothing; that which does infinitely more than anything else constitute the difference between them and others, as more excellent, more worthy, more honourable and happy; this is from themselves. With regard to this they have not received of another. With regard to this great thing, they, and they only, make themselves to differ from others; and this difference proceeds not at all from the power or grace of God.

Again, in the apostle's account, this scheme will give occasion to have a great benefit, that appertains to salvation, not of grace, but of works.

Virtue is not only the most honourable attainment, but it is that which men, on the supposition of their being possessed of it, are more apt to glory in, than in anything else whatsoever. For what are men so apt to glory in as their own supposed excellency, as in their supposed virtue? And what sort of glorying is that, which, it is evident in feet, the Scriptures do chiefly guard against? It is glorying in their own righteousness, their own holiness, their own good works. [see Shepard's comment on this! p317]

It is manifest, that in the apostle's account, it is a proper consideration to prevent our boasting, that our distinction from others is not of ourselves, not only in being distinguished in having better gifts and better principles, but in our being made partakers of the great privileges of Christians, such as being engrafted into Christ, and partaking of the fatness of that olive-tree. Rom. xi. 17, 18. "And if some of the branches be broken off, and thou, being a wild olive-tree, wert grafted in amongst them, and with them partakes of the root and fatness of the olive-tree, boast not against the branches."

Here it is manifest, it is the distinction that was made between some and others, that is the thing insisted on; and the apostle, verse 22. calls upon them to consider this great distinction, and to ascribe it to the distinguishing goodness of God only. "Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God; on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness." And its being owing, not to them, but to God and his distinguishing goodness, is the thing the apostle urges as a reason why they should not boast, but magnify God's grace or distinguishing goodness. And if it be a good reason, and the scheme of our salvation be every way so contrived (as the apostle elsewhere signifies) that all occasion of boasting should be precluded, and all reasons given to ascribe all to God's grace; then it is doubtless so ordered, that the greatest privileges, excellency, honour, and happiness of Christians, should be that wherein they do not distinguish themselves, but the difference is owing to God's distinguishing goodness.

Stebbing strongly asserts, God is not the author of that difference that is between some and others, that some are good, and others bad.

§ 80. The Arminians differ among themselves. Dr. Whitby supposes what God does, is only proposing moral motives; but that in attending, adverting, and considering, we exercise our liberty. But Stebbing supposes, that the attention and consideration is itself the thing owing to the Spirit of God; p. 217.

§ 81. Stebbing changes the question, pages 223, 224. He was considering who was the chief glory of our conversion, or of our virtue; and there, answering objections, endeavours to prove the affirmative of another question, viz. whether God is the author of that pardon and salvation, of which conversion and virtue are the condition.

§ 82. Stebbing supposes that one thing wherein the assistance of the Spirit consists, is the giving of a meek, teachable, disinterested temper of mind, to prepare men for faith in Christ; pages 217, 259, and that herein consists that drawing of the Father, John vi. 44. viz. in giving such a temper of mind.

This he calls the preventing grace of God, that goes before conversion. He often speaks of a part that we do, and a part that God does. And he speaks of this as that man which God does. Therefore this, if it be the part which God does, in distinction from the part which we do, (for so he speaks of it,) is wholly done by God. And consequently, here is virtue wholly from God, and not at all from the exercise of our own free will; which is inconsistent with his own, and all other Arminian principles. Stebbing speaks of these preparatory dispositions as virtue, p. 30, 31, 32. yea, as that wherein virtue does in a peculiar manner consist, p. 31. And he there also, viz. page 259. talks inconsistently with himself; for he supposes that this meek and teachable temper is given by God, by his preventing grace; and also supposes, that all that have this, shall surely come to the Father. He says, page 256. "It is certainly true of the meek, disinterested man, that as he will not reject the gospel at first, so he will not be prevailed on by any worldly considerations to forsake it afterwards."

"He who is under no evil bias of mind, by which he may be prejudiced against the truth, (which is the notion of a meek and disinterested man,) such a one, I say, cannot possibly foil of being wrought upon by the preaching of the word, which carries in it all that evidence of truth which reason requires," &c. and his words, page 259 are, John vi. 37, 39. "All that the Father giveth me, shall come unto me;" for to be given of the Father signifies the same thing with being drawn of the Father, as has been already shown. And to be drawn of the Father, signifies to be prepared or fitted for the reception of the gospel, by the preventing grace of God, as has also been proved. Now, this preparedness consisting, as has likewise been shown, in being endued with a meek and disinterested temper of mind; those who are given of the Father, will be the same with Christ's sheep. And the sense of the place is the same with the preceding, where our Saviour says that his sheep hear his voice and follow him, i. e., become his obedient disciples. This text, therefore, being no more than a declaration of what will be certain, and (morally speaking) the necessary effect of that disposition, upon the account of which men are said to be given of the Father, (to wit, that it will lead them to embrace the gospel, when once proposed to them). By these things, the preventing grace of God, the part that God does, in distinction from the part that we do, and that which prevents or goes before what we do, thoroughly decides and determines the case as to our conversion, or our faith and repentance and obedience, notwithstanding all the hand our free will is supposed to have in the case; and which he supposes is what determines man's conversion; and insists upon it most strenuously and magisterially through his whole book. Stebbing supposes the influence of the Spirit necessary to prepare men's hearts, pages 15-18. He (pages 17,18.) speaks of this as what the Spirit does, and as being his preventing grace; and speaks of it as always effectual; so that all such, and only such as have it, will believe. See also pages 28-30. That these dispositions must be effectual; see pages 46-48. This teachable, humble, meek spirit is what Stebbing speaks of everywhere as what the Spirit of God gives antecedent to obedience. He insists upon it, that God's assistance is necessary in order to obedience. In pages 20, 21 he plainly asserts that it is necessary in order to our obedience, and declares that our Saviour has asserted it in express terms in these words, John xv. 5. "Without me ye can do nothing;" i. e. as he says, no good thing. Hence it follows, that this teachable, humble, meek disposition, this good and honest heart, is not the fruit of any good thing we do in the exercise of our free will; but is merely the fruit of divine operation. Here observe well what Stebbing says concerning God's giving grace sufficient for obedience, in answer to prayer. Pages 103-106.

§ 83. No reason in the world can be given, why a meek, humble spirit, and sense of the importance of Christian things, should not be as requisite in order to acceptable prayer, as in order to acceptable hearing and believing the word. It is as much so spoken of. A praying without a good spirit in these and other respects, is represented as no prayer, as ineffectual, and what we have no reason to expect will be answered.

§ 84. If that meekness, &c. depends on some antecedent, self-determined act of theirs, and they be determined by that; then their being Christ's, being his sheep, and therein distinguished from others that are not his sheep, is not properly owing to the Father's gift, but to their own gift. The Father's pleasure is not the thing it is to be ascribed to at all; for the Father does nothing in the case decisively; he acts not at all freely in the case, but acts on an antecedent, firm obligation to the persons themselves; but their own pleasure, undetermined by God, is that which disposes and decides in the matter. How impertinent would it be to insist on the gift of the Father in this case, when the thing he speaks of is not from thence!

& 85. He supposes that the assistance that God gives in order to obedience is giving this good and honest heart; see p. 46, 47. together with p. 40. 45.; and therefore, this good and honest heart is not the fruit of our own obedience, but must be the fruit of assistance that precedes our good works, as he often calls it the preventing grace of God. And therefore, if this grace determines the matter, and will certainly be followed with faith and obedience, then all Arminianism, and his own scheme, comes to the ground. [in short, Arminians contradict themselves often, noted again in §89 below.]

§ 86. Stebbing interprets that passage, Luke xix. 16, 17. which speaks of our being little children, and receiving the kingdom of God as little children, of that meekness and humility, &c. that is antecedent to conversion, which it is apparent Christ elsewhere speaks of as consequent on conversion, at Matt. xviii.

§ 87. It is manifest the power of God overcomes resistance, and great resistance of some sort; otherwise there would be no peculiar greatness of power, as distinguishing it from the power of creatures, manifested in bringing men to be willing to be virtuous; which it is apparent there is, by Matt. xix. 26. “But Jesus beheld them, and said unto them, With men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible.”

§ 88. The Arminian scheme naturally, and by necessary consequence, leads men to take all the glory of all spiritual good (which is immensely the chief, most important, and excellent thing in the whole creation) to ourselves; as much as if we, with regard to those effects, were the supreme, the first cause, self-existent, and independent, and absolutely sovereign disposers. We leave the glory of only the meaner part of creation to God, and take to ourselves all the glory of that which is properly the life, beauty, and glory of the creation, and without which it is all worse than nothing. So that there is nothing left for the great First and Last; no glory for either the Father, Son, or Holy Ghost, in the affair. This is not carrying things too far, but in a consequence truly and certainly to be ascribed to their scheme of things.

§89. He may be said to be the giver of money that offers it to us, without being the proper determiner of our acceptance of it. But if the acceptance of an offer itself be the thing which is supposed to be given, he cannot, in any proper sense whatsoever, be properly said to be the giver of this, who is not the determiner of it. But it is the acceptance of offers, and the proper improvement of opportunities, wherein consists virtue. He may be said to be the giver of money or goods that does not determine the wise choice; but if the wise and good choice itself be said to be the thing given, it supposes that the giver determines the existing of such a wise choice. But now, this is the thing that God is represented as the giver of, when he is spoken of as the giver of virtue, holiness, &c. for virtue and holiness (as all our opponents in these controversies allow and maintain) is the thing wherein a wise and good choice consists. SECTION III.

III. Fullness of faith, in the room of unbelief.

For it is not unknown how strongly this sin keeps every man's palace, and that not Moses, but the Lord Jesus, is the stumbling stone even of the Jews, the peculiar people of God. When men are at their last cast, that the Lord intends to wait to pity no more, at last the Son comes, and an unbelieving heart casts the balance and refuseth him. After that the Lord hath tried men by miraculous preservations, deliverances from Pharaohs, provision as Massah, then Canaan comes to be entered, and men cannot enter because of unbelief. This sin stands in open view, and keep the breach, when all other sins in appearance are beaten out of the field. Now, there is a Spirit of faith, which comes in the room of this unbelief, dispossesseth the soul of the power of it; for there may be some lighter strokes of the Spirit, which are lighter skirmishes with it, but yet it [unbelief] wins field again; as in the stony ground, that believed, but unbelief got head again in time of persecution and temptation, and then they fell away.

Quest. 1. What is this faith, or that fullness or full measure of it?

Ans. I shall not speak here of historical or miraculous faith; the first of which is in the devils, the second in some men only, that may perish afterward. Nor yet of that faith which we call of assurance, we shall not come yet to that. But of that which we call justifying faith, and that which doth first unite to Christ, and justify. Now, this faith is the coming of the soul to Christ. This is the general. For Adam had his life in himself, but now it is lost in us, but laid up in Christ. Col. iii. 3. Now, hence they that would have this life, must go out of themselves to the Lord for it. Now, the motion of the soul between these two extremes of emptiness and death here, to life and fullness there, what is it but faith? Which Adam had not, nor could have in that estate; and, therefore, none of the sons of Adam naturally can share in it.

And that this is faith it appears —

1. From John vi. 35. "I am the bread of life: he that comes to me shall never hunger; and he that believes in me shall never thirst."

". Because unbelief is the departing of the soul from the God of life, Heb. iii. 12. Not from a holy law, but from a living God.

3. Faith is the proper effect of vocation; or rather the chief part thereof. Now, look, as ineffectual vocation is when the Lord calls, but the soul never comes, so effectual vocation is whereby the Lord calls, and the soul answers, and so comes. So that to sit still and see nothing, and do nothing, is not faith, but sloth. No, Christ cannot be in that soul that is yet in himself. Therefore faith is not a passive possibility of the soul to receive Christ, though that may prepare for him, but the going out of a man's self unto Christ.

~ Quest. 2. But may not a man come to Christ, that never shall have mercy from Christ?

Ans. Yes, there may be many lighter strokes, as in temporary believers. The world is at this day full of faith; every man thinks and saith he believes, though his faith be weak. It is men's buckler against all means, they know these sins, but as long as they believe all is well. And it is their comfort in all their troubles, though the Lord kills, yet they will believe. And I say, some men have departed indeed from the Lord; the gospel hath been preached, and they have made out of themselves to Christ, but missed of him. There is a bramble faith that I catcheth and scratcheth Christ, kisseth and betrays him. That coming to Christ therefore which none else have the full measure of, it appears in these particulars.

It is that work of the Spirit whereby a sinner, sensible of his extreme nakedness, emptiness, and wants, being called of God, his whole soul comes out of himself to Christ, for himself. I speak not of assurance, for if that were faith, all reprobates then were bound to believe an untruth, viz., that God the Father loves, and Christ hath died for them.

1. It is a work of God's Spirit, and hence it is called the Spirit of faith, not only because wrought by it, but because the Spirit is in an admirable manner fastened to it, and clasped to the soul, and the soul to Christ by it.

2. The subject in which it is wrought; a sinner sensible of his extreme wants; for faith springs out of the destruction of our own excellency, and ruins of it; like Christ, that did arise a root out of a dry ground; for the Lord's great plot is to advance Christ and his rich grace. Now, look, as it is obscured by bringing anything of our own to it, so it is advanced by fetching all from it; this can never be till the soul is sensible of his nakedness, emptiness, and wants; let Christ be never so sweet, a full soul will loathe him; and I say extreme want. The prodigal never comes home till he dies for hunger; for such is the senselessness of men, and dislike of Christ, that extremities only drive them hither, as Judges v. 6. When the Midianites came, they ran like beasts to their den, and until bread was taken from them, they cry not unto the Lord, but then they do; so men have neither hearts, or, if so, no heads to come to Christ till now; and usually the Lord makes this the ground of the soul's first motion towards Christ. I die here, and because of my wants I therefore come. Pardon sin, because great. Ps. xxv.

11. lie merciful, because it is a stiff-necked people. Exod. xxxiv. 9. That so when the Lord pardons, the soul may have nothing to boast of but misery, and now it is hard to believe. But this is not all.

3. It must be called of God; for else the soul, though never so sensible of misery, could not, would not, durst not come [1Cor. 2:14]; but it would either sink under its burden, or plead against all means; it shall presume, as Judas that had no look of Christ (as Peter had) hangs himself; and hence, (Jer. iii. 23), "Come unto me; their heart answered, We come." For this is usually the objection of the soul when it sees the riches of mercy, What have I to do with it, that am so vile, and have fallen so oft, and rejected the Lord, and am like to do so? I shall sin the more by this means. No, the command of the gospel comes, O, come, notwithstanding all this, nay, because of this, for I will heal you of them. Now, this call hath two things in it. 1. It is particular; for general invitations to believe and come in are made particular to the elect, who else would not come in; and hence, (Is. xliii. 1,) "I have called thee by name." For we shall find that the hearts of men, when they see a promise, cannot think it concerns them; all that hunger shall be satisfied, but shall I? And hence show them it is as particular as the law, they cannot think it is to them; and hence they say sometime the word all is not put in. Now, that is the mighty power of unbelief, a word spoken to all is regarded by none till the Lord make it particular; and hence (Is. ii,) Christ is said to judge the nations: now, when judges ride their circuits, they do not make laws, but only apply laws. One man is brought before them to be condemned; he hopes better, but he is so; now he trembles. Another to be acquitted; he fears, being falsely accused; he is freed, and now he rejoiceth. 2. It is a living call, or powerful call. John v. 25. And hence a man may live under the calls of the minister long, and never come, because it is not made living from the Lord of life; and hence not irresistible. [John 5:25 "Most assuredly, I say to you, the hour is coming, and now is, when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God; and those who hear will live." Now opposed to this is the remark that Jesus makes to the Jews, those who are not his sheep: "You have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His form."³⁸ But you do not have His word abiding in you, because whom He sent, Him you do not believe." "John 5:37-38]

4. Upon this call the whole soul comes out of itself to Christ; for if a man could climb the clouds, and unlock the doors of heaven, and come Elias-like in his body to Christ, he might miss of Christ, as well as those that came and followed Christ, for a time, with their bodies while he lived on the earth. A man may come to Christ with half his soul or heart; there may be some hope and some desires, some love and some cleaving to him, and choice of him really, inwardly, and yet not savingly, because the whole soul is not here come, but half of it. James i. 7, 8. Now, the whole soul then comes, when all the affections and will take their flight to the Lord, and fasten there. When all the affections are gathered from all other things and changed, and so they come to, and embrace the Lord; so that hope waits only here. When will the Lord pity me? Desires that were set on a thousand things before, all long after him, love only tasteth him; the Lord letting in some sight of the freeness of mercy, hope looks out hither; the Lord showing the way, and the way to it, desire breaks down stone walls and all means, and the difficulty of them, to have him. The Lord letting the soul taste the sweetness of Jesus and his grace, the soul joys, and love embraceth, and the will fosters; a carnal heart desires, loves, joys, in other things, and the Lord also, and so hath a false heart. But the whole heart comes hither, and when it is here, thinks one heart too little; nay, one life, one soul; and when any part of the affections are left anywhere else, then the soul mourns, hates that bondage, is ashamed of it, etc. So that the stream of the whole soul runs now hither. Ps. cxix. 2; Jer. iii. 10; Ps. xlv. 10. So it is with the soul, as with them when they were to come out of Egypt, they would not leave child nor hoof behind, lest there should be any occasion of return; as it is with the soul departed from the body, it only minds the Lord it hath taken leave of all, so by faith the whole soul leaves all and comes to the Lord; otherwise the soul is not come to Christ, but reacheth after Christ; like men that waded after the ark, but perished in the waters. Their arms are not long enough, their desires and love are not long enough, to reach Christ; the bent and stream of the soul is set and runs here. It is with the soul as it is with two rivers, both run with all their strength to the sea, but the great river is bigger, and runs faster, yet the other's stream, is wholly carried thither. So some men may be more full of faith than others, yet both run to the sea, and as rivers, they run in their circles, this way and that way, and are sometimes dammed up, yet end there. So the souls of all saints run to this and the other creature, yet they end in the Lord at last. As Peter and John, that ran to the sepulcher, though one outran the other, yet they came both to the Lord at last; when both of them had, for a time, forsook him, though all the world draw the soul back, it cannot live without the Lord; nay, though the Lord beat away the soul from him, yet it follows after him.

5. It is to the Lord for himself; for (John vi,) some came to Christ for loaves, and could have been glad if Christ had been king for it, but did not care for himself; and hence (ver. 27) he points and turns them to himself: some came to him for higher ends, therefore were his disciples, that is, for life from him. But "his flesh and blood, or else you die," it was a hard saying; they could not understand nor see what that meant, and hence forsook him; but when they come and receive him himself, now life is, indeed, theirs.

So that it is Christ's person that this faith first pitcheth on, as it is in marriage, and those that come for this were never sent away. Now, the soul is truly come to him for himself, 1. When himself gives rest to the soul in the want of all things. Heb. iv. 3. If friends, protection, strength, life, glory, be wanting, yet having him, in him I have all these; when all is sold away, not the treasure only, but the field contents him; for it looks on this as better than heaven, than glory; it comforts the soul that the Lord himself should be mine. 2. The soul that taketh him, it is not only to make boast of him, as Capernaum had him, nor to cover sloth, and sin, and delusion by him. I have Christ, and I have no more to care for, etc., but to live on him; (John vi. 57,) "He that eateth me shall live by me." Phil. iii. 9, 10. A man takes not Christ as medicine to ease him, nor as stately hangings to adorn him, but as bread to receive life from him. For many receive Christ, rest they do upon him, and rest, they say, in him, but they do not suck any good from him; nay, before they had any Christ or assurance of him they were better than now. You have nothing to do with the Lord Jesus, you are out of your place. As in Jotham's parable, the olive and vine would not be pulled out of their places, to be set on the tops of other trees, as kings, lest they lose their fatness and sweetness; so, since you have closed with Christ, you have lost your fatness and sweetness that once you had, you are now out of your place; go to your horrors and sorrows again, till the Lord so give himself to you as that you may receive life from him.

Quest. 3. But must all come thus to Christ with their whole soul? will not part of the price serve?

Ans. No, the whole soul must come, and cannot but come.

1. In regard of the jealousy of God; who is like a jealous husband, can bear with many weaknesses, but will have the whole heart; and they that do not shall be destroyed for spiritual whoredom. Ps. 73:27. He should dishonor Christ else, to sell him so cheap.

2. In regard of the excellency of Christ; the Lord draws the soul by the revelation of him. Rom. i. 16, 17; Is. lv. 3, 4. Now, look as men in this world, when they see a seeming good, their whole soul is overpowered to be drawn after it. So here, when such an object is seen, especially the soul having been at his sepulcher weeping, as iron never stirs till the loadstone comes, and then it makes to that only, not to things touched with it; for as "we love him because he loved us first," so Christ loving the soul with all his heart, and his whole heart set upon him, the whole soul is, e contra, set on Christ.

3. In regard else a man can receive nothing from the Lord. Jer. xxix. 12, 13. As it is with conduit pipes, let them be laid, but not reach the conduit head, no water can come to that family, so here; and this is the reason why men live and pray, and receive nothing, their hearts reach not hither. Men's hearts reach but half way to Christ. Tell me else, did you ever not receive?

4. Because else it is, indeed, no coming to him, but a leaning on him or toward him. So as it is with trees, if not cut off quite, or not pulled up quite by the roots, they cannot be set in another orchard; if the tree be left with never so little twigs in the ground, so here; nay, the Lord accounts this worse than if a man had not come at all. Jer. iii. 10. The Lord abhors a double heart, that, Judas-like, forsakes all for the Lord, but then loves the Lord and the bag too. You are not the Lord's. As it was with that man that quarreled about the tree, it leaned over the pales, but the root being found to be there, his it was; so, though he lean on Christ, he is none of his.

Quest. 4. But do all saints come to this measure?

Ans. Ponder these grounds else.

Object. But are not our hearts partly carnal, and so close with the creature?

Ans. True; but yet, —

1. So far as it is carnal, it is lamented heavily; so that they grow not there, but are dying, withering daily. Jer. xxxi. 18, 19. When a man's affections grow out of the world, and there is no fear nor sorrow, in this respect now, no Christ is there.

2. The bent and bias of the soul carries the whole soul hither. For I would not judge of this so much by sudden pangs, as by an inward bent; for the whole soul, in affectionate expressions and actions, may be carried unto Christ, but being without this bent and change of affections, it is unsound, as in Gideon, they would on a hurry make him king; he would not; he knew it was a sudden pang which would die. And the reason is, the true turn of the whole soul is not by turning old affections upon another object, but changing them first by this bent, and so turning them. For a carnal heart may have the first, as the same eye may see the sun and a dunghill, and the eye not changed; so here. Now, when the whole soul is set here, it is never at rest till here.

Quest. 5. But may not hypocrites come to this?

Ans. 1. Then they may be blessed. Ps. cxix. 2.

2. Then they shall never be cast off from Christ. John vi. 37.

3. Then they may partake of that which the Lord only looks for. For why is the Lord angry? The heart is gone from him. Why is the ministry ordained, but to win the whole heart to him? John iii. 19-21. O, therefore, consider whether it hath been thus with you or no. If not, woe to you! O, be very careful here. It is a thousand to one if some part of your heart be not fixed elsewhere. If Christ were at judgment, and should say, "Come, ye blessed," how glad would ye be! O, he saith now, Come, and take myself.

Lawful Blessings Do the Most Hurt

pg 431 His Diary ref. lawful blessings do the most hurt

Oct. 29. I was much troubled about the poverty of the churches; and I saw it was such a misery as I could not well-discern the cause of, nor see any way out; yet I saw we might find out the cause of any evil by the Lord's stroke. Now, he struck us in outward blessings, and hence it is a sign there was our evil: (1.) In not acknowledging all we have from God, (Hos. ii. 8 ;) (2.) In not serving God in the having of them; (3.) In making ourselves secure and hardhearted; for lawful blessings are the secret idols, and do most hurt. And it is then a sign our greatest hurt lies in having, and that the greatest good lies in God's taking them away from us. Whereupon I, considering this, did sweetly content myself that the Lord should take all from us, if it might be not in wrath, but in love, viz., hereby to glorify himself the more, and to take away the fuel of our sin. I saw that if God's people could be joyfully content to part with all to the Lord, prizing the gain of a little holiness more than enough to overbalance all their losses, that the Lord then would do us good.

Nov. 3. On a fast day, at night, in preparation for the duty, the Lord made me sensible of these sins in the churches: (1.) Ignorance of themselves, because of secret evils; (2.) Ignorance of God, because most men were full of dark and doubtful consciences; (3.) Not cleaving to Christ dearly, only; (4.) Neglect of duties, because of our place of security; (5.) Standing against all means, because we grow not better; (6.) Earthliness, because we long not to be with Christ. And I saw sin as my greatest evil. ...I was vile, but God was good only, whom my sins did cross. And I saw what cause I had to loathe myself, and not to seek honor to myself. Will any desire his dunghill to be commended? Will he be grieved if it be not? So my heart began to fall off from seeking honor. The Lord also gave me some glimpse of myself; and a good day and time it was to me.

Nov. 4. On the end of the fast (1.) I went to God, and rested on him as sufficient; (2.) waited on him as efficient, and said, "Now, Lord, do for thy churches, and help in mercy."

" In the beginning of this day I began to consider whether all the country did not fare the worse for my sins; and I saw it was so. And this was a humbling thought to me: and I thought if everyone in particular did think so, and was humbled, it would do well. I saw also that if repentance turn away judgments, then if the question be, who they are that bring judgments, the answer would be, They that think their sins so small as that God is not angry with them at all.

p414 A way of believing for pardon

July 9. Being suddenly surprised by a sin before the sacrament, my conscience was awakened, and my heart checked me for it. Yet the Lord turned the meditation of the evil of this sin to great good to me, viz., not only to set my heart against it and all other sins, but the Lord thereby let in a most glorious light (as I thought) of his gospel, and of the way of believing for pardon, more than ever I had; which was this: —

I saw that the nature and practice of a man awakened with sin was this, viz., when conscience smites him with the fear and terror of God, "Dost think God loves thee, or hath sanctified thee, who dost rush upon such evils again and again? No, he is angry with thee for thy sin." "Hereupon the heart, being desirous of favor, thinks secretly thus: As sin hath provoked God's anger, so, he being merciful, I hope the leaving off my sin, and turning from my sin, will pacify and please the Lord again; and so doth secretly think to please God and pacify God, and so indeed to satisfy God for that sin, and so forsakes sin; and now, in time of sickness or horror, thinks, that the Lord is pacified and pleased with this, according as some scriptures seem to speak. Or else it secretly thinks faith in Christ's blood and turning from sin also, both together, do please, and that now all is quiet. Hereupon, remembering that Christ's blood apprehended by faith was the only atonement, I conceived this was not the way that I should walk in; but rather this: —

1. I saw that when the least sin, as well as the greatest, was committed, my first work was to see that I (in myself considered) must die eternally for that sin, and so should pass sentence upon myself for it. And here I saw that by this the elect did, and that I should, see how cross, and contrary, and grievous sin is to God, who is so incensed by it, as he will be the death of a sinner for it. And so I saw that hereby my soul should be humbled aright, feeling sin by this means, not only as bringing eternal death on me, but as being cross and provoking to God. And this I saw was to be done, not only at first conversion, but all my life; (Jer. xxxi. 20;) that so hereby the soul might increase in humiliation and in a high esteem of the blood of Jesus Christ.

2. I saw that next to this I was to fly to Christ's blood and righteousness for satisfaction and peace. And here I saw three things: (1.) That this was faith, to fly to Christ's death in sense of my own death; (2.) That this act was exceeding pleasing to God, even after all sins; nay, that it did pacify God, not because of the merit of the act, but because of the worth of the object, which is the satisfaction of Christ's death it apprehends, and that this doth please him, because of his good pleasure and purpose of grace, and because he will be so pleased; (3.) That this satisfaction alone, thus apprehended, did perfectly, and without any holiness or reformation of mine, pacify and please the Father; or else I saw that Christ's death and merits were imperfect and insufficient. And if so, if this alone pleased him, then the condition of the gospel was not thus, viz., If you believe in Christ's death for righteousness, pacification, and life, and if you be sanctified and obey the will of Christ, you shall then live, and God the Father will be pacified toward you by both these means; but if you believe in Christ Jesus and his death, by this only you shall please God for whatever sin you have committed. I saw the conscience of a sinner could never be quieted until it did rest on this testimony only, in seeing God pleased that moment wherein it flies out of self to the death of Christ. Now, because I knew the Lord required obedience and sanctification, hence a third thing came clearly to mind.

3. I saw that resting thus on Christ, my conscience should be quieted, that God was now pacified, and that I did now please him fully in point of satisfaction; yet I saw I was now required to do the whole will of God, and to conform thereunto, not in way of satisfaction, to pacify God's eternal anger, but in way of thankfulness for this the Lord's love, in being pleased with me, and that wherein I fell short of it I should be deeply humbled, with Paul, (Rom. vii), but wherein I did anything according thereto, to be thankful for it, as Paul also was, (Rom. vii.), when he was glad that in his mind he served the law of God. Now, because I saw I could do nothing, my will being desperately averse from Christ's will, hence I saw, (1.) If Christ had pacified the Father and pleased divine justice for my sin, that he would also by his death deliver me from my sins. (2.) I saw that Christ did not require me now justified to subsist in myself, and to be self-confident, and to do with and from my own strength, but that he would give me the law of the Spirit of life, which would enable me; and that the obedience he would accept, as a token of thankfulness, was this: (1.) That I should rest and rely upon his death for the Spirit of life, and on his Spirit for the power of it to enable me to do his will continually. (2.) That if the Lord did enable me, I should be exceedingly thankful for it; if not, that I should be exceedingly humbled daily under it; and so still forget things which be behind, and reach to things that be before. Relying on Christ for his Spirit, I saw, did and doth come and arise in all the saints from the law writ in the heart, after it feels God pacified, and the law of God without, which being reconciled together, and the soul feeling its own weakness to please it, hence it relies on the Spirit of Christ Jesus, and thereby finds help; the Spirit within us living on the Spirit without us, as the elementary bodies on the elements in other bodies. So I saw that by faith in Christ's death I pleased the provoked justice and pacified the anger of God; by the law of God writ in my heart and obedience of the Spirit, I was pleased and did now please the law of God, as now given to me by Christ Jesus.

Now, when the Lord did show me all this, I did bless him with my soul for it, and I was taught how to walk more orderly. I saw, (1.) This was the right way of believing and finding favor, because it carried the soul humbly from the beginning to the end, and exalted God's grace. (2.) I saw that hereby the saints came to mourn more for sin (which Familists do not) than any other men. For when I see I must die for sin, that makes me mourn; when I see how cross it is to God, that makes me mourn still; when I believe and see only Christ's death can pacify, and that, I being come to it, it shall pacify, this makes me mourn more, and that bitterly, which no graceless heart can do, or hath cause to do. (3.) I saw that, in preaching duties of obedience to the saints, I should be careful how I set them a measure, or set them to do them, either to pacify anger, or to perform them in their own strength, or to make doing of them an evidence of grace, without inserting, "Unless they go to Christ, and rely on him for his grace," enabling them thereunto; and to preach them to them only as duties of thankfulness; to others as handwritings of death. (4.) Hereby I saw how sanctification was an evidence of reconciliation. (1.) I saw where it was not, there was no reconciliation; (2.) That where it was, there was reconciliation; (3.) That mediately it was an evidence, and I was to take it as an evidence, of reconciliation. Mediately, I say, because faith in Christ's blood doth immediately assure me of it. But this (viz., sanctification) assures me that my faith hath truly apprehended Christ Jesus. (4.) I saw that faith did immediately evidence reconciliation. (1.) Because faith [which is a gift and a promise of the new covenant] is required in the gospel as the only condition; sanctification is required to come after it, is wrought after it, and commanded after it. (2.) Because I saw the apostles had their reconciliation by this evidence. Rom. v. 1, "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God." "3.) I saw that sanctification was not to come in to pacification of God's anger and displeasure, and therefore not immediately to the pacification of conscience. For conscience being smitten with sense of eternal death, nothing can pacify conscience but that which can pacify justice, and that is the death of Christ Jesus, apprehended by faith. Conscience only hath quiet in Christ's death; my peace is only in it; but faith only is that by which I came by it; because faith makes it mine own, brings it near me, and now it quiets me. It is not by an immediate testimony that Christ's death is mine; for that may be a delusion, being without the word; but Christ's death apprehended by me, and so testified by the word and Spirit; the word speaking, every believer shall live; the Spirit of adoption (enabling the soul to see the work of faith in itself) speaking, thou, believer, shalt live. Which Spirit is given immediately after my justification by faith, viz., in my adoption to sonship.

Now having peace by faith, my conscience will question, Is thy faith right? Now my sanctification bears witness to that, and so mediately shows me, that my peace is right. In a word, the matter of my peace, or that wherein I have peace, is Christ's death. The means of this my peace is faith only. The immediate evidence of my peace and pacification is faith apprehending Christ's death. The evidences being, (1.) The word of the gospel; (2.) The Spirit of adoption discovering the work of faith in the heart- The evidence of the truth of faith, and so of my peace, is sanctification. This only I question, whether faith saith, My peace is made, and sanctification saith, Thy faith is good. Only I add, it is possible for some sincere Christians first to see their sanctification and holiness, and so their faith and peace. But the question is, whether they should not first see their faith and peace, and so their sanctification arising from thence; and so, as Mr. Culverwell notes, not build their faith upon their life, but their life upon their faith, and their faith upon God's free grace.

(5.) I saw that the reason why faith in Christ's blood, and not simply in Christ, did justify and pacify, was because a humbled sinner ever feels and sees death before him; and hence the Lord, according to his need, opens Christ and presents him thus to him. As also why Paul called sin a body of death. (1.) Because he saw he must die for it; the remnants of sin were death. (2.) Because they were cross to the life of Christ in him. All this was the day before the sacrament, July 10, 1641. And I thought now I felt some growth, which I came for in other sacraments.

Mourning for Sin

pg 413 T Shepard

July 7. I saw that, notwithstanding all my sins, I should see there was no condemnation to me, nor should I fear it; (1.) being in Christ by faith; (2.) walking after the Spirit, because I resisted and mourned under the flesh and body of death, as Paul did. Yet I saw I should look upon all my sins with an eye of lamentation, as being (1.) cross to God; (2.) so contrary to the life of Christ in me. For I saw that I made a difference of some sins in a Christian: (1.) Some did cause God's fatherly anger, and were more willful, and conscience upbraided me for them; (2.) Others were weaknesses, for which Christ pitied me. And here my heart began to think, What need of such bitter mourning for them? Now I saw the apostle (Rom. vii.) mourned alike for all. He feared none for condemnation; he mourned for all with bitter lamentation. So I was sweetly enlightened, and purposed thus to walk, and not to mourn only for such sins as did hide the face of my God, but for sin in general, which goes against his life, yea, is contrary to the end of Christ's death, and cross to the will of God. And I saw it my duty to mourn, and that bitterly, with unutterable daily sighings under them.

July 2. I saw I was no debtor to the flesh, to serve it, either, (1.) for any good it ever did me, (2,) or by any power over me, by divine justice satisfied in Christ. I saw it my duty not only to pray, but to live by prayer and begging; for I observed how some of God's people did so. Hence I saw I was not to live by providence only, but by prayer, (1.) For myself, body, soul; (2.) For my children and family, at home and abroad; (3.) For the churches. Hereupon I asked the question, Would the Lord have me to live by prayer thus? And I saw he would have me, because he had given me, a heart frameable to his will therein; and it did much refresh me to think that the Lord should desire me to live thus, as if he took delight in my sinful prayers. And so I considered how I might live by prayer. And I saw, (1.) I should see what evils accompany everything I go about; (2.) What good I need to have conveyed by every thing. There are special evils of sin to be avoided, and special good things to be conveyed. And I asked why I was to live by prayer. And I thought, (1.) Because it did honor God; (2.) Kept me from many unknown evils which else would befall me; (3.) Because else I could not have assurance any other prayers should be heard which were not my life. To pray by fits is not the way to find help in time of trouble.

I concluded this day, 1. With some measure of faith; for after prayer I left all I prayed for unto God's rich, free grace. And hence I saw, (1.) That the Lord did take pleasure in such as hope in his mercy ; (2.) That whatsoever I or any had prayed for, God had promised, and therefore purposed to give; and thence I might quiet my heart about God's secret purpose: 2. With resolution, (1.) Whatever God should give me, to attribute it unto grace; (2.) To walk in a way of holiness for the future.

I saw also that my heart was ready to think, I have prayed enough after such a day and such hopes. But I saw, (1.) That though God purposeth mercy, yet he withal intendeth the decree shall bring forth by prayer; (2.) He will therefore have «s pray till the thing be granted; (3.) When the decree hath begun to bring forth, I saw that all the degrees of mercy arise by several degrees of prayer; as when faith is begun, but it is imperfect, prayer must be continued still for all the rest; as the chapped ground opens still wider and wider, till rain fall. -

June 20. On the Sabbath day, in reading Beza on the 6th^{of} Romans, I saw clearly two things: (1.) That the saints, receiving Christ by faith, have good cause to be at perfect peace in their own conscience, there being by Christ no more conscience of sin. (2.) That by this faith they had, by Christ's death, abolishment of sin. And I saw that this faith was an adherence to Christ, and such a kind of adherence to him, and resting on him, as that the soul, by dear esteem and love, clings so to him as that it gets into him. It is so close an adherence, even as the branch gets into the stock. And so I saw faith doth not only cleave to Christ, but it sticks in Christ, and so sucks life and vigor from Christ by esteem and love; and this I prayed for. And by this I saw how many fall short of true faith, whose faith never makes them stick close unto Christ Jesus.

Summary of the Plan of Salvation by the Father

A good summary of the plan of the Father of salvation, the role of the Son and the Holy Spirit. Note all the key terms I highlighted in red. My comments in blue.

John Owen, Commentary on Hebrews 2, pg 378-382 (357-367 online)
http://www.prayermeetings.org/files/John_Owen/Hebrews_1.3-6.pdf

Verse 10. — For it became him for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings.

There are in the words, — 1. The causal connection unto the verse foregoing, — “for.” 2. A design of God intimated as the foundation of the discourse, — which was, to “bring many sons unto glory.” 3. The means he fixed on for the accomplishment of that design, — namely, the appointing unto them a “captain of their salvation.” 4. The especial way of his dedicating him unto that office, — he “made him perfect by sufferings” 5. The reason of this his proceeding and dealing with him, — it “became him” so to do. 6. An amplification of that reason, in a description of his condition, — “him for whom are all things, and by whom are all things.”

1. A reason is rendered in the words of what he had asserted in the foregoing verse, namely, that Jesus, the Messiah, was to suffer death, and by the grace of God to “taste of death for all.” Why he should do this, on what account, what ground, necessity, and reason there was for it, is here declared. It was so to be, “for it became him,” etc.

2. The design of God is expressed in this whole matter, and that was, to “bring many sons unto glory.” And herein the apostle declares the nature of the salvation which was to be wrought by the Messiah, about which the Jews were so greatly mistaken, and consequently in and about the way whereby it was to be wrought. His purpose herein was not now to carry his children into a new Canaan, to bring them into a wealthy country, an earthly kingdom; which must or might have been done by might, and power, and arms, as of old: but his design towards his sons, in and by the Messiah, was of another nature; it was to bring them unto glory, eternal glory with himself in heaven. And so it is no wonder if the way whereby this is to be accomplished be quite of another nature than that whereby their temporal deliverance was wrought, namely, by the death and sufferings of the Messiah himself. And here, in reference unto this design of God, it is supposed, — First, That some who were created for the glory of God had by sin come short of it; so that without a new way of bringing them unto it, it was impossible that they should ever be made partakers of it. This is here supposed by the apostle, and is the foundation of all his doctrine concerning the Messiah. Secondly, That the way whereby God will at length bring them who are designed unto glory thereunto, is by taking of them first into a state of sonship and reconciliation with himself; they must be sons before they are brought to glory. There is a double act of God’s predestination: the first is his designation of some unto grace, to be sons, Ephesians 1:5; the other, his appointment of those sons unto glory; both to be wrought and accomplished by Christ, the captain of their salvation. The latter, and the execution of it, — namely, the bringing of those unto glory who by grace are made sons, — is that which the apostle here expresseth. He dealeth not with the Hebrews in this epistle about the conversion of the elect, the traduction of them into a state of grace and sonship, but of the government of them being made sons, and their guidance unto glory. And therefore the sufferings of Christ, which absolutely and in themselves are the cause of our sonship and reconciliation with God, are mentioned here only as the means whereby Christ entered into a condition of leading sons unto glory, or of saving them who, upon the account of his sufferings, are made sons by grace. But yet this is not so precisely respected neither, but that the apostle withal intimates the necessity of the suffering of Christ, as to the whole effect of it towards the elect. Now these sons, thus to be brought unto glory, are said to be “many,” [i.e., not all] — not all absolutely, not a few, or of the Jews only, which they looked for, but all the elect of God, who are many, Revelation 7:9. And this work, of bringing many sons unto glory, is here signally assigned by the apostle unto God the Father; whose love, wisdom, and grace, believers are principally to eye in the whole work of their salvation, wrought out and accomplished by Jesus Christ. This, therefore, we shall a little insist upon, to declare the grounds and reasons on the account whereof it is to be ascribed unto him, or what acts are peculiarly assigned unto the Father in this work of bringing many sons unto glory; which will secure the ascription of it unto him, and therein our interpretation of the place.

(1.) The eternal designation of them unto that glory whereunto they are to be brought is peculiarly assigned unto him. He “predestinates them to be conformed to the image of his Son,” Romans 8:28-30.

The “God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ chooseth us before the foundation of the world,” and “predestinateth us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ unto himself,” Ephesians 1:3-5; and “he hath from the beginning chosen us unto salvation,” 2 Thessalonians 2:13, 14. And this electing love of God, this eternal purpose of his good pleasure, which he purposed in himself, is the fountain and spring of all other immediate causes of our salvation. From hence faith, Acts 13:45, sanctification, 2 Thessalonians 2:13, holiness, Ephesians 1:4, preservation in grace, 2 Timothy 2:19, the death of Christ for them, John 3:16, and final glory itself, 2 Timothy 2:10, do all ensue and proceed: so that on the account hereof he may be justly said to be the bringer of many sons to glory.

(2.) He was the spring and fountain of that covenant (as in all other operations of the Deity) that was of old between himself and his Son about the salvation and glory of the elect. See Zechariah 6:13; Isaiah 42:1; Proverbs 8:22-31; Isaiah 1:4-9, 53:10-12; Psalm 16:10, 110. He, in his love and grace, is still declared as the proposer both of the duty and of the reward of the mediator, the Son incarnate, as the Son accepts of his terms and proposals, Hebrews 10:5-9. And hence the intenseness of his love, the immutability of his counsel, the holiness of his nature, his righteousness and faithfulness, his infinite wisdom, do all shine forth in the mediation and sufferings of Christ, Romans 3:25, 26, 5:8; 1 John 4:9; Hebrews 6:17, 18; Titus 1:2. Rather than his love should not be satisfied and his counsel accomplished, he spared not his own Son, but gave him unto death for us.

(3.) He signally gave out the first promise, that great foundation of the covenant of grace; and afterwards declared, confirmed, and ratified by his oath, that covenant wherein all the means of bringing the elect unto glory are contained, Genesis 3:15; Jeremiah 31:31-34; Hebrews 8:8-12. The person of the Father is considered as the principal author of the covenant, as the person covenanting and taking us into covenant with himself; the Son, as the Messiah, being considered as the surety and mediator of it, Hebrews 7:22, 9:15, and the purchaser of the promises of it.

(4.) He gave and sent his Son to be a Savior and Redeemer for them and unto them; so that in his whole work, in all that he did and suffered, he obeyed the command and fulfilled the will of the Father. Him did God the Father “send,” and “seal,” and “give,” and “set forth,” as the Scripture everywhere expresseth it. And our Lord Jesus Christ everywhere remits us to the consideration of the love, will, and authority of his Father, in all that he did, taught, or suffered; so seeking the glory of God that sent him.

(5.) He draws his elect, and enables them to come to the Son, to believe in him, and so to obtain life, salvation, and glory by him. “No man,” saith our Savior, “can come to me, except the Father, which hath sent me, draw him,” John 6:44. No man, no, not any one of the elect, can come to Christ, unless the Father, in the pursuit of that love from whence it was that he sent the Son, do put forth the efficacy of his grace to enable him thereunto [this the Arminians object as insufficient; our own wills must cooperate...]: and accordingly he reveals him unto some, when he is hidden from others, Matthew 11:25; for the revelation of Christ unto the soul is the immediate act of the Father, Matthew 16:17.

(6.) Being reconciled unto them by the blood of his Son, he reconciles them unto himself, by giving them pardon and forgiveness of sins in and by the promises of the gospel; without which they cannot come to glory. He is in Christ reconciling us unto himself, by the non-imputation or forgiveness of our sins, 2 Corinthians 5:18-21; forgiving us all our trespasses for Christ's sake, Ephesians 4:32. There are many things concurring unto the pardon of sin that are peculiar acts of the Father.

(7.) He quickens them and sanctifies them by his Spirit, to make them "meet for the inheritance of the saints in light;" that is, for the enjoyment of glory. "He that raised up Jesus from the dead quickens us by his Spirit," Romans 8:11; so "saving us by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he shed on us richly by Jesus Christ," Titus 3:5, 6. This renovation and sanctification by the Holy Ghost, and all supplies of actual grace, enabling us unto obedience [which Adam had not], are everywhere asserted as the grant and work of the Father, "who worketh in us both to will and to do of his own good pleasure." And so in especial is the saving illumination of our minds, to know the mystery of his grace, and discern the things that are of God, 2 Corinthians 4:6; Colossians 2:2; Ephesians 3:14-19; Matthew 11:25.

(8.) As the great Father of the family he adopts them, and makes them his sons, that so he may bring them unto glory. He gives them the power or privilege to become the sons of God, John 1:11; making them heirs and co-heirs with Christ, Romans 8:14-17; sending withal into their hearts the Spirit of adoption [Adam did not have the Spirit of Adoption], enabling them to cry, "Abba, Father," Galatians 4:6. The whole right of adopting children is in the Father; and so is the authoritative translation of them out of the world and kingdom of Satan into his own family and household, with their investiture in all the rights and privileges thereof.

(9.) He confirms them in faith, establisheth them in obedience, preserveth them from dangers and oppositions of all sorts, and in manifold wisdom keeps them through his power unto the glory prepared for them; as 2 Corinthians 1:21, 22; Ephesians 3:20, 21; 1 Peter 1:5; John 17:11.

(10.) He gives them the Holy Ghost as their comforter, with all those blessed and unspeakable benefits which attend that gift of his, Matthew 7:11; Luke 11:13; John 14:16, 17; Galatians 4:6.

In brief, in bringing the elect unto glory, all the sovereign acts of power, wisdom, love, and grace exerted therein, are peculiarly assigned unto the Father, as all ministerial acts are unto the Son as mediator; so that there is no reason why he may not be said, by the way of eminency, to be the ἀγῶγευς, the leader or bringer of his sons unto glory.

And herein lies a great direction unto believers, and a great supportment for their faith. Peter tells us that "by Christ we do believe in God, that raised him up from the dead, and gave him glory; that our faith and hope might be in God," 1 Peter 1:21. Jesus Christ, considered as mediator, is the next, but not the ultimate object of our faith and hope. We so believe in him as by him to believe in God, that is, the Father, whose love is the supreme fountain and spring of our salvation; which the apostle manifests in that double instance of his raising up Christ and giving him glory, thereby declaring himself the principal author of the great work of his mediation. This he directs us unto, so to believe in Christ as that, discerning in and by him the grace, good-will, and love of the Father himself towards us, we may be encouraged to fix our faith and hope on him, seeing he himself loveth us. So that Christ himself had no need to pray for the love of the Father unto us, but only for the communication of the effects of it, John 16:26, 27. And this is the work of faith, when, as we are directed, we pray to the Father in the name of Christ, John 16:23, 24; and we thus place our faith in God the Father, when we conceive of him as the sovereign leader of us unto glory, by all the instances before mentioned. And then doth faith find rest in him, delight, complacency, and satisfaction, as we have elsewhere declared.

The Glory of Christ

Superb on the glory of Christ. Diligence in the exercise of saving faith on contemplating God's glory, things to consider for self-examination. What is the glory of God, etc.

Chapter II.

The glory of the person of Christ, as the only representative of God unto the church.

The glory of Christ is the glory of the person of Christ. So he calls it Τὴν δόξαν τὴν ἐμὴν, John xvii. 24, "That glory which is mine," which belongeth to me, unto my person.

The person of Christ may be considered two ways:— 1. Absolutely in itself. 2. In the susception and discharge of his office, with what ensued thereon. His glory on these distinct accounts is distinct and different; but all equally his own. How in both respects we may behold it by faith [the instrument of faith given at conversion enables us to behold it although imperfectly], is that which we inquire into.

The first thing wherein we may behold the glory of the person of Christ, God and man, which was given him of his Father, consists in the representation of the nature of God, and of the divine person of the Father, unto the church in him; for we behold "the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ," 2 Cor.

iv. 6. Otherwise we know it not, we see it not, we see nothing of it; that is the way of seeing and knowing God, declared in the Scripture as our duty and blessedness. The glory of God comprehends both the holy properties of his nature and the counsels of his will; and “the light of the knowledge” of these things we have only “in the face” or person “of Jesus Christ.” [wholly depicted on the diagram...knowledge of God, and his will...holiness and virtue... love for God] Whatever obscure, imperfect notions we may have of them in other ways, we cannot have φωτισμὸν τῆς γνώσεως τῆς δόξης τοῦ Θεοῦ, “the light of the” illuminating, irradiating “knowledge of the glory of God,” which may enlighten our minds and sanctify your hearts, but only ἐν προσώπῳ, “in the face” or person “of Jesus Christ:” for he is “the image of God,” 2 Cor. iv. 4; “the brightness of the Father’s glory, and the express image of his person,” Heb. i. 3; “the image of the invisible God,” Col. i. 15. I do here only mention these things because I have handled them at large in my discourse of the “Mystery of Godliness,” or the Person of Christ; whereunto I refer the readers for their full declaration and vindication. Herein is he glorious, in that he is the great representative of the nature of God and his will unto us; which without him would have been eternally hid from us, or been invisible unto us, — we should never have seen God at any time, here nor hereafter, John i. 18. see also [John 5:37 - “You have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His form.”]

In his divine person absolutely considered, he is the essential image of God, even the Father. He is in the Father, and the Father in him, in the unity of the same divine essence, John xiv. 10. Now he is with the Father, John i. 1, in the distinction of his person, so is he his essential image, Col. i. 15; Heb. i. 3. In his incarnation he becomes the representative image of God unto the church, 2 Cor. iv. 6; without whom our understandings can make no such approach unto the divine excellencies but that God continues to be unto us what he is in himself, — the “invisible God.” In the face of Jesus Christ we see his glory.

This is the original glory of Christ, given him by his Father [Jn 17:22], and which by faith we may behold. He, and he alone, declares, represents, and makes known, unto angels and men, the essential glory of the invisible God, his attributes and his will; without which, a perpetual comparative darkness would have been the whole creation, especially that part of it here below.

This is the foundation of our religion, the Rock whereon the church is built, the ground of all our hopes of salvation, of life and immortality: all is resolved into this, — namely, the representation that is made of the nature and will of God in the person and office of Christ. If this fail us, we are lost forever; if this Rock stand firm, the church is safe here, and shall be triumphant hereafter.

Herein, then, is the Lord Christ exceedingly glorious. Those who cannot behold this glory of his by faith, — namely, as he is the great divine ordinance to represent God unto us, — they know him not. In their worship of him, they worship but an image of their own devising.

Yea, in the ignorance and neglect hereof consists the formal nature of unbelief, even that which is inevitably ruinous unto the souls of men. He that discerns not the representation of the glory of God in the person of Christ unto the souls of men, is an unbeliever. Such was the state of the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles of old; they did not, they would not, they could not, behold the glory of God in him, nor how he did represent him. That this was both the cause and the formal nature of their unbelief, the apostle declares at large, 1 Cor. i. 21–25. Not to see the wisdom of God, and the power of God, and consequently all the other holy properties of his nature, in Christ, is to be an unbeliever.

The essence of faith consists in a due ascription of glory to God, Rom. iv. 20. This we cannot attain unto without the manifestation of those divine excellencies unto us wherein he is glorious. This is done in Christ alone, so as that we may glorify God in a saving and acceptable manner. He who discerns not the glory of divine wisdom, power, goodness, love, and grace, in the person and office of Christ, with the way of the salvation of sinners by him, is an unbeliever. [So all the ways of salvation, all the doctrines of salvation, the wisdom of the way of it, e.g., election, God's sovereignty, the Priesthood of Christ, Original sin, etc., even though not fully understood, should be seen as beautiful in the eyes of believers due to their new spiritual palate and hence believed, leading one to a holy admiration and fear of God. Many like some doctrines but still have enmity in their hearts for others as the Arminians, Socinians, do. To be staunchly opposed to these doctrines argues one's hypocrisy. All who are still blind, hate the mysteries of the Kingdom or anything truly spiritual.]

Hence the great design of the devil, in the beginning of the preaching of the gospel, was to blind the eyes of men, and fill their minds with prejudices, that they might not behold this glory of his; so the apostle gives an account of his success in this design, 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4, “If our gospel be hid, it is hid unto them that are lost: in whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them.” By various ways and methods of deceit, to secure the reputation he had got of being “god of this world,” by pretences and appearances of supernatural power and wisdom, he labored to blind the eyes of men with prejudices against that glorious light of the gospel which proposed the Lord Christ as the only image of God. This blindness, this darkness is cured in them that believe, by the mighty power of God; for God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, has irradiated our hearts with the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, verse 6, — wherein true saving faith does consist. Under this darkness perished the unbelieving world of Jews and Gentiles: and such is the present condition of all by whom the divine person of Christ is denied; for no mere creature can ever make a perfect representation of God unto us. But we must a little farther inquire into this mystery.

I. Since men fell from God by sin, it is no small part of their misery and punishment, that they are covered with thick darkness and ignorance of the nature of God. They know him not, they have not seen him at any time. Hence is that promise to the church in Christ, Isa. lx. 2, “For, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people: but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee.”

The ancient philosophers made great inquiries into, and obtained many notions of, the Divine Being — its existence and excellencies. And these notions they adorned with great elegance of speech, to allure others unto the admiration of them. Hereon they boasted themselves to be the only wise men in the world, Rom. i. 22, φάσκοντες εἶναι σοφοί, — they boasted that they were the wise. But we must abide in the judgment of the apostle concerning them in their inquiries; he assures us that the world in its wisdom — that is, these wise men in it by their wisdom — knew not God, 1 Cor. i. 21. And he calls the authors of their best notions, Atheists, or men “without God in the world,” Eph. ii. 12. For, —

1. They had no certain guide, rule, nor light, which, being attended unto, might lead them infallibly into the knowledge of the divine nature. All they had of this kind was their own λογισμοὶ, their reasonings or imaginations; whereby they commenced συζητητὰ τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, “the great disputes of the world;” but in them they “waxed vain, and their foolish heart was darkened,” Rom. i. 21. They did at best but endeavour ψηλαφᾶν, “to feel after God,” as men do in the dark after what they cannot clearly discern, Acts xvii. 27. Among others, Cicero’s book, “De Natura Deorum,” gives us an exact account of the intention of the apostle in that expression. And it is at this day not want of wit, but hatred of the mysteries of our religion, which makes so many prone to forego all supernatural revelation, and to betake themselves unto a religion declared, as they suppose, by reason and the light of nature; — like bats and owls, who, being not able to bear the light of the sun, betake themselves unto the twilight, to the dawns of light and darkness.

2. Whatever they did attain, as unto rational notions about things invisible and incomprehensible, yet could they never deliver themselves from such principles and practices in idolatry and all manner of flagitious sins, as that they could be of any benefit unto them. This is so effectually demonstrated by the apostle in the 1st chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, as that we need not to insist upon it.

Men may talk what they please of a light within them, or of the power of reason to conduct them unto that knowledge of God whereby they may live unto him; but if they had nothing else, if they did not boast themselves of that light which has its foundation and original in divine revelation alone, they would not excel them who, in the best management of their own reasonings, “knew not God,” but waxed vain in their imaginations.

With respect unto this universal darkness, — that is, ignorance of God, with horrid confusion accompany it in the minds of men, — Christ is called, and is, the “light of men,” the “light of the world;” because in and by him alone this darkness is dispelled, as he is the “Sun of Righteousness.”

II. This darkness in the minds of men, this ignorance of God, his nature and his will, was the original of all evil unto the world, and yet continues so to be. For, —

1. Hereon did Satan erect his kingdom and throne, obtaining in his design until he bare himself as “the god of this world,” and was so esteemed by the most. He exalted himself by virtue of this darkness (as he is the “prince of darkness”) into the place and room of God, as the object of the religious worship of men. For the things which the Gentiles sacrificed they sacrificed unto devils, and not to God, 1 Cor. x. 20; Lev. xvii. 7; Deut. xxxii. 17; Ps. cvi. 37; Gal. iv. 8. This is the territory of Satan; yea, the power and sceptre of his kingdom in the minds of the “children of disobedience.” Hereby he maintains his dominion unto this day in many and great nations, and with individual persons innumerable.

2. This is the spring of all wickedness and confusion among men themselves. Hence arose that flood of abominations in the old world, which God took away with a flood of desolation: hence were the sins of Sodom and Gomorrah, which he revenged with “fire from heaven.” In brief; all the rage, blood, confusion, desolations, cruelties, oppressions, villainies, which the world has been and is filled withal, whereby the souls of men have been and are flooded into eternal destruction, have all arisen from this corrupt fountain of the ignorance of God.

3. Of such as those described we are the posterity and offspring. Our forefathers in this nation were given up unto as brutish a service of the devil as any nation under the sun. It is therefore an effect of infinite mercy, that the day has dawned on us, poor Gentiles, and that the “day-spring from on high hath visited us.” See the glory of this grace expressed, Eph. iii. 5–10. God might have left us to perish in the blindness and ignorance of our forefathers [which he does to most - —.e., reprobation]; but of his own accord, and by his own powerful grace alone, he has “translated us out of darkness into his marvelous light.” But, alas! the horrible ingratitude of men for the glorious light of the Gospel, and the abuse of it, will issue in a sore revenge.

God was known under the Old Testament by the revelation of his Word, and the institution of his worship. This was the glory and privilege of Israel, as the Psalmist declares, Ps. cxlvii. 19, 20, “He showeth his word unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel. He hath not dealt so with any nation.” The church then knew him; yet so as that they had an apprehension that he dwelt in “thick darkness,” where they could not have any clear views of him, Exod. xx. 21; Deut. v. 22; 1 Kings viii. 12; 2 Chron. vi. 1. And the reason why God so represented himself in darkness unto them, was, to instruct them in their imperfect state, wherein they could not comprehend that glory which should afterward be revealed. For as he is now made known in Christ, we see that “he is light, and in him there is no darkness at all.”

4. Hitherto darkness in general covered the earth, and gross darkness the people, as unto the knowledge of God; only there was a twilight in the church. The day did not yet dawn, the “shadows did not flee away,” nor the “day-star shine” in the hearts of men. But when the “Sun of Righteousness” did arise in his strength and beauty, when the Son of God “appeared in the flesh,” and in the discharge of his office, — God himself, as unto his being, and manner of existence in three distinct persons, with all the glorious properties of the divine nature, was illustriously manifested unto them that did believe; and the light of the knowledge of them dispelled all the shadows that were in the church, and shone into the darkness which was in the world, so as that none continued ignorant of God but those who would not see. See John i. 5, 14, 17, 18; 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4.

Herein is the Lord Christ glorious. And this is that which I shall now speak unto, — namely, how we may behold the glory of Christ in the representation and revelation that is made of God and his glory, in his person and office, unto all that do believe. For it is not so much the declaration of the nature of the things themselves, wherein the glory of Christ does consist, as our way and duty in the beholding of them, which at present is designed.

He calls unto us, saying, “Behold me, — look unto me, — and be saved,” Isa. xlv. 22. What is it that we see in Christ? what do we behold in him? He asketh that question concerning his church, “What will ye see in the Shulamite?” Whereto he answers, “As it were the company of two armies,” Cant. vi. 13; or the two churches of the Old and New Testament, in order and beauty. We may inquire, What shall we, what do we see in him? Do we see him as “the image of the invisible God,” representing him, his nature, properties, and will unto us? Do we see him as the “character,” the “express image of the person of the Father,” so that we have no need of Philip’s request, “Lord, show us the Father?” because having seen him, we have seen the Father also, John xiv. 9.

This is our first saving view of Christ, the first instance of our beholding his glory by faith. So to see him as to see God in him, is to behold his glory; for herein he is eternally glorious. And this is that glory whose view we ought to long for and labour after. And if we see it not, we are yet in darkness; yea, though we say we see, we are blind like others. So David longed and prayed for it, when yet he could behold it only in types and shadows, Ps. lxiii. 1, 2, “O God, thou art my God; early will I seek thee: my soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee; — to see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary.” For there was in the sanctuary an obscure representation of the glory of God in Christ. How much more should we prize that view of it which we may have with open face, though yet “as in a glass!” 2 Cor. iii. 18.

Moses, when he had seen the works of God, which were great and marvellous, yet found not himself satisfied therewith; wherefore, after all, he prays that God “would show him his glory”, Exod. xxxiii. 18. He knew that the ultimate rest, blessedness, and satisfaction of the soul, is not in seeing the works of God, but the glory of God himself. Therefore did he desire some immediate dawns of it upon him in this world: “I beseech thee, show me thy glory.” And if we have right apprehensions of the future state of blessedness, we cannot but have the same desire of seeing more of his glory in this life. But the question is, How we may attain it? If we are left unto ourselves in this inquiry, if we have no other way for it but the immediate rising of our thoughts [Arminianism/Pelagianism] on the immensity of the divine nature, we must come every one to the conclusion that Agur makes on the like consideration, “Surely I am more brutish than any man, and have not the understanding of a man. I neither learned wisdom, nor have the knowledge of the holy. Who has ascended up into heaven, or descended? who has gathered the wind in his fists? who has bound the waters in a garment? who has established all the ends of the earth? what is his name, and what is his son’s name, if thou canst tell?” Prov. xxx. 2–4.

It is in Christ alone that we may have a clear, distinct view of the glory of God and his excellencies. For him, and him alone, has he appointed the representative of himself unto us; and we shall take an account hereof in one or two especial instances. See John i. 18, xiv. 7–10; 2 Cor. iv. 6; Col. i. 15; Eph. iii. 4–10; Heb. i. 3.

1. Infinite wisdom is one of the most glorious properties of the divine nature; it is that which is directive of all the external works of God, wherein the glory of all the other excellencies of God is manifested: wherefore the manifestation of the whole glory of God proceeds originally from infinite wisdom. But, as Job speaks, “Where shall [this] wisdom be found; and what is the place of understanding?” chap. xxviii. 12. “Can we by searching find out God? can we find out the Almighty unto perfection?” chap. xi. 7. As it is in itself an essential, eternal property of the divine nature, we can have no comprehension of it, — we can but adore it in that infinite distance wherein we stand from God; but in its operations and effects it may be discerned, for they are designed of God for its manifestation. Among these, the most excellent is the contrivance of the great work of the salvation of the church. So it is celebrated by the apostle, Eph. iii. 9, 10, “To make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world has been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ: to the intent that now, unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places, might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God.”

If we have any interest in God, if we have any hopes of blessedness in beholding of his glory unto eternity, we cannot but desire a view (such as is attainable) of this infinite, manifold wisdom of God in this life. But it is in Christ alone that we can discern anything of it; for him has the Father chosen and sealed to represent it unto us. All the treasures of this wisdom are hid, laid up, and laid out in him; — herein lies the essence and form of faith. Believers by it do see the wisdom of God in Christ, in his person and office, — Christ the wisdom of God. Unbelievers see it not, as the apostle argues, 1 Cor. i. 22–24.

In beholding the glory of this infinite wisdom of God in Christ, we behold his own glory also, — the glory given him of his Father; for this is his glory, that in and by him, and him alone, the wisdom of God is manifested and represented unto us. When God appointed him as the great and only means of this end [an ordinance], he gave him honour and glory above the whole creation; for it is but little of divine wisdom which the works of it declare, in comparison of what is manifested in Christ Jesus. We no way deny or extenuate the manifestation that is made of the wisdom of God in the works of creation and providence. It is sufficient to detect the folly of atheism and idolatry; and was designed of God unto that end. But its comparative insufficiency — with respect unto the representation of it in Christ as to the ends of knowing God aright and living unto him — the Scripture does abundantly attest. And the abuse of it was catholic [i. e., universal], as the apostle declares, Rom. i. 20, &c. To see this wisdom clearly is our wisdom; and a due apprehension of it fills the souls of believers “with joy unspeakable, and full of glory.”

2. We may also instance in the love of God. The apostle tells us that “God is love,” 1 John iv. 8. Divine love is not to be considered only in its effects, but in its nature and essence; and so it is God himself, for “God is love.” And a blessed revelation this is of the divine nature; it casts out envy, hatred, malice, revenge, with all their fruits, in rage, fierceness, implacability, persecution, murder, into the territories of Satan. They belong not unto God in his nature or acting; for “God is love.” So the same apostle tells us, that he who “slew his brother was of the wicked one,” 1 John iii. 12. He was of the devil, his father, and his works did he do.

But the inquiry is as before, — How shall we have a view of this love, of God as love? by what way or means shall we behold the glory of it? It is hidden from all living, in God himself. The wise philosophers, who discoursed so much of the love of God, knew nothing of this, that “God is love.” The most of the natural notions of men about it are corrupt, and the best of them weak and imperfect. Generally, the thoughts of men about it are, that he is of a facile and easy nature, one that they may make bold withal in all their occasions; as the Psalmist declares, Ps. l. 21. And whereas it must be learned in its effects, operations, and divine ways of its manifestation, those who know not Christ know nothing of them. And many things in providence do interpose to hinder our views of this love; — for although, indeed, “God is love,” yet “his wrath is revealed from heaven against the ungodliness of men;” as all things at this day are filled with evidences of his anger and displeasure. How, then, shall we know, wherein shall we behold, the glory of God in this, that he is love? The apostle declares it in the next words, 1 John iv. 9, “In this was manifested the love of God towards us, because that God sent his only-begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him.” This is the only evidence given us that “God is love.” Hereby alone is the divine nature as such made known unto us, — namely, in the mission, person, and office of the Son of God; without this, all is in darkness as unto the true nature and supreme operation of this divine love.

Herein do we behold the glory of Christ himself, even in this life. This glory was given him of the Father, — namely, that he now should declare and evidence that “God is love;” and he did so, “that in all things he might have the pre-eminence.” Herein we may see how excellent, how beautiful, how glorious and desirable he is, seeing in him alone we have a due representation of God as he is love; which is the most joyful sight of God that any creature can obtain. He who beholds not the glory of Christ herein is utterly ignorant of those heavenly mysteries; — he knoweth neither God nor Christ, — he has neither the Father nor the Son. He knows not God, because he knows not the holy properties of his nature in the principal way designed by infinite wisdom for their manifestation; he knows not Christ, because he sees not the glory of God in him. Wherefore, whatever notions men may have from the light of nature, or from the works of Providence, that there is love in God, — however they may adorn them in elegant, affecting expressions, — yet from them no man can know that “God is love.” In the revelation hereof Christ has the pre-eminence; nor can any man comprehend anything of it aright but in him. It is that which the whole light of the creation cannot discover; for it is the spring and centre of the mystery of godliness.

These things are of the deep things of God, such as belong unto that wisdom of God in a mystery which they that are carnal cannot receive, as the apostle testifies, 1 Cor. ii. 14. But the meanest believer who lives in the exercise of faith, may have an understanding of them so far as is needful unto his love and obedience. The sum of the whole is this: If you would behold the glory of Christ as the great means of your sanctification and consolation, as the only preparation for the beholding of his glory in eternal blessedness, consider what of God is made known and represented unto you in him, wherein God purposed and designed to glorify himself in him. Now, this is all that may be known of God in a saving manner, — especially his wisdom, his love, his goodness, grace, and mercy, whereon the life of our souls does depend; — and the Lord Christ being appointed the only way and means hereof, how exceeding glorious must he be in the eyes of them that do believe!

These things being premised, I shall close this first consideration of that glory of Christ which we behold by faith in this world, with some such observations as may excite us unto the practice of this great duty, and improvement of this great privilege, — the greatest which on this side heaven we can be made partakers of.

There are some who regard not these things at all, but rather despise them. They never entertain any serious thoughts of obtaining a view of the glory of God in Christ, — which is to be unbelievers. They look on him as a teacher that came forth from God to reveal his will, and to teach us his worship; and so indeed he was. But this they say was the sole use of his person in religion, — which is Mohammedanism. The manifestation of all the holy properties of the divine nature, with the representation of them unto angels above and the church in this world, as he is the image of the invisible God, in the constitution of his person and the discharge of his office, are things they regard not; yea, they despise and scorn what is professed concerning them: for pride and contempt of others were always the safest covert of ignorance; otherwise it would seem strange that men should openly boast of their own blindness. But these conceptions of men's minds are influenced by that unbelief of his divine person which maketh havoc of Christianity at this day in the world.

I speak of them whose minds are better disposed towards heavenly things; and unto them I say, Wherefore do you love Jesus Christ? for so you profess to do. Wherefore do you trust in him? wherefore do you honour him? wherefore do you desire to be in heaven with him? Can you give a reason of this hope that is in you, — an account why you do all or any of these things? If you cannot, all that you pretend towards him is but fancy and imagination; you fight uncertainly, as men beating the air. Or is one of your reasons hereof, that in him you do by faith behold that glory of God, with the holy properties of his nature, and their principal operations, in order unto your own salvation and blessedness, which otherwise would have been eternally hid from you? Herein is he “precious unto them that do believe.”

Let us, therefore, as many as are spiritual, be thus minded. Let us make use of this privilege with rejoicing, and be found in the discharge of this duty with diligence. For thus to behold the glory of God is both our privilege and our duty. The duties of the Law were a burden and a yoke; but those of the Gospel are privileges and advantages.

It is a promise concerning the days of the New Testament, that our “eyes shall see the King in his beauty,” Isa. xxxiii. 17. We shall behold the glory of Christ in its lustre and excellency. What is this beauty of the King of saints? Is it not that God is in him, and he is the great representative of his glory unto us? Wherefore, in the contemplation of this glory consists the principal exercise of faith. And who can declare the glory of this privilege, that we who are born in darkness, and deserved to be cast out into utter darkness, should be translated into this marvellous light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ?”

What are all the stained glories, the fading beauties of this world? of all that the devil showed our Saviour from the mount? what are they in comparison of one view of the glory of God represented in Christ, and of the glory of Christ as his great representative?

The most pernicious effect of unbelief under the preaching of the gospel is, that, together with an influence of power from Satan, “it blinds the eyes of men's minds, that they should not see this glory of Christ;” whereon they perish eternally, 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4.

But the most of those who at this day are called Christians are strangers unto this duty. Our Lord Jesus Christ told the Pharisees, that notwithstanding all their boasting of the knowledge of God, they had not “heard his voice at any time, nor seen his shape;” that is, as Moses did. They had no real acquaintance with him, — they had no spiritual view of his glory. And so it is amongst ourselves; notwithstanding the general profession that is of the knowledge of Christ, they are but few who thus behold his glory; and therefore few who are transformed into his image and likeness.

Some men speak much of the imitation of Christ, and following of his example; and it were well if we could see more of it really in effect. But no man shall ever become “like unto him” by bare imitation of his actions, without that view or intuition of his glory which alone is accompanied with a transforming power to change them into the same image.

The truth is, the best of us all are woefully defective in this duty, and many are discouraged from it because a pretence of it in some has degenerated into superstition; but we are loath at any time seriously to engage in it, and come with an unwilling kind of willingness unto the exercise of our minds in it.

Thoughts of this glory of Christ are too high for us, or too hard for us, such as we cannot long delight in; we turn away from them with a kind of weariness: yet are they of the same nature in general with our beholding of the glory of Christ in heaven, wherein there shall be no weariness, or satiety, unto eternity. Is not the cause of it, that we are unspiritual or carnal, having our thoughts and affections wonted to give entertainment unto other things? For this is the principal cause of our unreadiness and incapacity to exercise our minds in and about the great mysteries of the Gospel, 1 Cor. iii. 1–3. And it is so with us, moreover, because we do not stir up ourselves with watchfulness and diligence in continual acting of faith on this blessed object. This is that which keeps many of us at so low an ebb, as unto the powers of a heavenly life and spiritual joys.

Did we abound in this duty, in this exercise of faith, our life in walking before God would be more sweet and pleasant unto us, — our spiritual light and strength would have a daily increase, — we should more represent the glory of Christ in our ways and walking than usually we do, and death itself would be most welcome unto us.

The angels themselves desire to look into the things of the glory of Christ, 1 Peter i. 12. There is in them matter of inquiry and instruction for the most high and holy spirits in heaven. The manifold wisdom of God in them is made known unto “principalities and powers in heavenly places by the church,” Eph. iii. 10. And shall we neglect that which is the object of angelical diligence to inquire into; especially considering that we are more than they concerned in it?

Is Christ, then, thus glorious in our eyes? Do we see the Father in him, or by seeing of him? Do we sedulously daily contemplate on the wisdom, love, grace, goodness, holiness, and righteousness of God, as revealing and manifesting themselves in him? Do we sufficiently consider that the immediate vision of this glory in heaven will be our everlasting blessedness? Does the imperfect view which we have of it here increase our desires after the perfect sight of it above? With respect unto these inquiries I shall briefly speak unto sundry sorts of men.

Some will say they understand not these things, nor any concernment of their own in them. If they are true, yet are they notions which they may safely be without the knowledge of; for, so far as they can discern, they have no influence of Christian practice, or duties of morality; and the preaching of them does but take off the minds of men from more necessary duties. But “if the gospel be hid, it is hid unto them that perish.” And unto the objection I say, —

1. Nothing is more fully and clearly revealed in the gospel, than that unto us Jesus Christ is “the image of the invisible God;” that he is the character of the person of the Father, so as that in seeing him we see the Father also; that we have “the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in his face alone,” as has been proved. This is the principal fundamental mystery and truth of the Gospel; and which if it be not received, believed, owned, all other truths are useless unto our souls. To refer all the testimonies that are given hereunto to the doctrine which he taught, in contradistinction unto his person as acting in the discharge of his office, is anti-evangelical, anti-christian, — turning the whole Gospel into a fable.

2. It is so, that the light of faith is given unto us principally to enable us to behold the glory of God in Christ, — to contemplate on it, as unto all the ends of its manifestation. So is it expressly affirmed, 2 Cor. iv. 6. If we have not this light, as it is communicated by the power of God unto them that do believe, Eph. i. 17–19, we must be strangers unto the whole mystery of the gospel, 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4.

3. That in the beholding of the glory of God in Christ, we behold his glory also. For herein is he infinitely glorious above the whole creation, in that in and by him alone the glory of the invisible God is represented unto us. Herein do our souls live. This is that whereby the image of God is renewed in us, and we are made like unto the first-born.

4. This is so far from being unnecessary unto Christian practice, and the sanctified duties of morality, that he knows not Christ, he knows not the Gospel, he knows not the faith of the catholic church, who imagines that they can be performed acceptably without it. Yea, this is the root whence all other Christian duties do spring, and whereon their grow, whereby they are distinguished from the works of heathens. He is no Christian who believes not that faith in the person of Christ is the spring of all evangelical obedience; or who knows not that faith respects the revelation of the glory of God in him.

If these things are so, as they are the most important truths of the Gospel, and whose denial overthrows the foundation of faith, and is ruinous to Christian religion, certainly it is our duty to live in the constant exercise of faith with respect unto this glory of Christ. And we have sufficient experience of what kind of morality the ignorance of it has produced.

Others there are who may be some way strangers, but are no way enemies, unto this mystery, and to the practical exercise of faith therein. To such I shall tender the ensuing directions:—

1. Reckon in your minds, that this beholding of the glory of Christ by beholding the glory of God, and all his holy properties in him, is the greatest privilege whereof in this life we can be made partakers. The dawning of heaven is in it, and the first-fruits of glory; for this is life eternal, to know the Father, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent, John xvii. 3. Unless you value it, unless you esteem it as such a privilege, you will not enjoy it; and that which is not valued according unto its worth is despised. It is not enough to think it a privilege, an advantage; but it is to be valued above other things, according unto its greatness and excellency. “Destruction and death say, We have heard the fame thereof with our ears,” Job xxviii. 22. And if we do no more, we shall die strangers unto it; we are to “cry after this knowledge, and lift up our voice for this understanding,” if we design to attain it.

2. As it is a great privilege, which requires a due valuation; so it is a great mystery, which requires much spiritual wisdom to the right understanding of it, and to direct in its practice, 1 Cor. ii. 4, 5. Flesh and blood will not reveal it unto us, but we must be taught of God to apprehend it, John i. 12, 13; Matt. xvi. 16, 17. Mere unsanctified reason will never enable us unto, nor guide us in, the discovery of this duty. Men are not so vain as to hope for skill and understanding in the mystery of a secular art or trade, without the diligent use of those means whereby it may be attained; and shall we suppose that we may be furnished with spiritual skill and wisdom in this sacred mystery, without diligence in the use of the means appointed of God for the attaining of it? The principal of them is fervent prayer. Pray, then, with Moses, that God would show you this his glory; pray with the apostle, that “the eyes of your understanding may be enlightened to behold it;” pray that the “God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him.” Fill your minds with spiritual thoughts and contrivances about them. Slothful and lazy souls never obtain one view of this glory; the “lion in the way” deters them from attempting it. Being carnal, they abhor all diligence in the use of spiritual means, such as prayer and meditation on things unto them uneasy, unpleasing, and difficult. Unto others the way partakes of the nature of the end; the means of obtaining a view of the glory of Christ are of the same kind, of the same pleasantness, with that view itself in their proportion.

3. Learn the use hereof from the acting of contrary vicious habits. When the minds of men are vehemently fixed on the pursuit of their lusts, they will be continually ruminating on the objects of them, and have a thousand contrivances about them, until their “eyes become full of adulteries, and they cannot cease from sinning,” as the apostle speaks. The objects of their lusts have framed and raised an image of themselves in their minds, and transformed them into their own likeness. Is this the way of them who “go down to the chambers of death?” Do they thus frame their souls, and make them meet for destruction, until their words, gestures, actions, proclaim the frame of their minds unto all that look upon them? And shall we be slothful and negligent in the contemplation of that glory which transforms our minds into its own likeness, so as that the eyes of our understandings shall be continually filled with it, until we see him and behold him continually, so as never to cease from the holy acts of delight in him and love to him?

4. Would we, then, behold the glory of God as he manifesteth it in and by the holy properties of his nature, with their blessed operations and effects? — without which we have nothing of the power of religion in us, whatever we pretend: this alone is the way of it. Go to the whole creation, and all things contained in it; they can say no more, but, “We have heard the fame and report of these things,” and what we have heard we declare; but it is but a little portion of them that we are acquainted withal. “The heavens,” indeed, “declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handy-work.” “The invisible things of God are understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead.” But, comparatively, it is but little that we can hence learn of these things, as to that we may behold of them in Christ Jesus. How blind herein was the best philosopher in comparison of the meanest of the apostles; yea, of him who is least in the kingdom of heaven!

But herein it is required that we rest not in the notion of this truth, and a bare assent unto the doctrine of it. The affecting power of it upon our hearts is that which we should aim at. Wherein does the blessedness of the saints above consist? Is it not herein, that they behold and see the glory of God in Christ? And what is the effect of it upon those blessed souls? Does it not change them into the same image, or make them like unto Christ? Does it not fill and satiate them with joy, rest, delight, complacency, and ineffable satisfaction? Do we expect, do we desire, the same state of blessedness? It is our present view of the glory of Christ which is our initiation thereinto, if we are exercised in it, until we have an experience of its transforming power in our souls.

These things are, it may be, of little use unto some. Such as are babes in spiritual knowledge and understanding, — either because they are carnal, 1 Cor. iii. 1, 2, or slothful in hearing, Heb. v. 12–14, — are not capable of these divine mysteries. And therefore the apostle did, in an especial manner, declare this wisdom of God in a mystery unto them that were perfect, 1 Cor. ii. 6, 7; — that is, who were more grown in spiritual knowledge, and had their “senses exercised to discern good and evil.” It is unto them who are exercised in the contemplation of invisible things, who delight to walk in the more retired paths of faith and love, that they are precious.

Some few inferences from the whole of what has been declared shall put a close to this part of our Discourse.

1. The holy properties of the divine nature are not only represented unto our faith in Christ, as to their own essential glory, but as they are in the exercise of their powers for the salvation of the church. In him do we behold the wisdom, goodness, love, grace, mercy, and power of God, acting themselves in the contrivance, constitution, and efficacious accomplishment of the great work of our redemption and salvation. This gives, as unto us, an unutterable lustre unto the native amiableness of the divine excellencies. The wisdom and love of God are in themselves infinitely glorious, — infinitely amiable; — nothing can be added unto them, — there can be no increase of their essential glory. Howbeit, as they are eternally resident in the divine nature, and absolutely the same with it, we cannot so comprehend them as to have an endearing, satiating view of their glory, but as they are exerted in the work of the redemption and salvation of the church, — as they are expressed, communicating their blessed effects unto the souls of them that do believe, — which is done only in Christ; so the beams of their glory shine unto us with unspeakable refreshment and joy, 2 Cor. iv. 6. Hence the apostle, on the consideration of the acting of the holy properties of God in this blessed work, falls into that contemplation, “O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor for who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom be glory for ever. Amen,” Rom. xi. 33–36.

2. In and through Christ we do believe in God, 1 Pet. i. 21. This is the life of our souls. God himself, in the infinite perfections of his divine nature, is the ultimate object of our faith. But he is not here the immediate object of it; but the divine way and means of the manifestation of himself and them unto us, are so. Through Christ we believe in God. By our belief in him we come to place our faith ultimately in God himself; and this we can no otherwise do but by beholding the glory of God in him, as has been declared.

3. This is the only way whereby we may attain the saving, sanctifying knowledge of God. Without this, every beam of divine light that shines on us, or gleams from without (as the light shineth into darkness when the darkness comprehendeth it not, John i. 5), every spark that ariseth from the remainders of the light of nature within, does rather amaze the minds of men than lead them into the saving knowledge of God. So a glance of light in a dark night, giving a transient view of various objects, and passing away, does rather amaze than direct a traveller, and leave him more exposed unto wandering than before. Such were all those notions of the Divine Being and his excellencies, which those who boasted themselves to be wise among the heathen embraced and improved. They did but fluctuate in their minds; they did not transform them into the image and likeness of God, as the saving knowledge of him does, Col. iii. 10.

“and have put on the new man who is renewed in knowledge according to the image of Him who created him,”

So the apostle expresseth this truth, “Where is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputer of this world? hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? For after that, in the wisdom of God, the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe. For the Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom: but we preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks foolishness; but unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God,” 1 Cor. i. 20–24.

After it was evident unto all, that the world, the wise, the studious, the contemplative part of it, in the wisdom of God, disposing them into that condition wherein they were left unto themselves, in their own wisdom, their natural light and reason, did not, could not, come to the saving knowledge of God, but were puffed up into a contempt of the only way of the revelation of himself as weakness and folly; — it pleased God then to manifest all their wisdom to be folly, and to establish the only means of the knowledge of himself in Christ Jesus.

Doctrine of Imputation

A Discussion of the doctrine of imputation, the glory of Christ and conjunction between Christ and the church by John Owen from his book, The Glory of Christ. <http://www.ccel.org/ccel/owen/glory.i.xii.html>

The infinite evil of Sin and God's justice in the punishment of it. How is this justice meted out? Why is there so much misery in the world? This goes a long way in explaining one of the biggest objections to Christianity and the existence of a God who is reported to be merciful, loving, etc. My comments in [blue] and Owen's in red for emphasis.

Chapter IX.

The glory of Christ in his intimate conjunction with the church.

What concerns the glory of Christ in the mission of the Holy Ghost unto the church, with all the divine truths that are branched from it, I have at large declared in my discourse concerning the whole dispensation of the Holy Spirit. Here, therefore, it must have no place amongst those many other things which offer themselves unto our contemplation as part of this glory, or intimately belonging thereunto. I shall insist briefly on three only, which cannot be reduced directly unto the former heads.

And the first of these is, — That intimate conjunction that is between Christ and the church; whence it is just and equal in the sight of God, according unto the rules of his eternal righteousness, that what he did and suffered in the discharge of his office, should be esteemed, reckoned, and imputed unto us, as unto all the fruits and benefits of it, as if we had done and suffered the same things ourselves. For this conjunction of his with us was an act of his own mind and will [as opposed to being influenced by any influence from without, i.e., God is sovereign; we are not. This is how God always acts. God is not dependent upon the creature for anything; he does all things according to the counsel of his will, not the counsel of others.] wherein he is ineffably glorious.

The enemies of the glory of Christ and of his cross do take this for granted, that there ought to be such a conjunction between the guilty person and him that suffers for him, as that in him the guilty person may be said, in some sense, to undergo the punishment himself. But then they affirm, on the other hand, that there was no such conjunction between Christ and sinners, — none at all; but that he was a man, as they were men; and otherwise, that he was at the greatest distance from them all as it is possible for one man to be from another, Socin. de Servat. lib. iii. cap. 3 [Socinianism - they do not believe in Christ's deity]. The falseness of this latter assertion, and the gross ignorance of the Scripture, under a pretence of subtlety, in them that make it, will evidently appear in our ensuing Discourse.

The apostle tells us, 1 Peter ii. 24, that in “his own self he bare our sins in his own body on the tree;” and, chap. iii. 18, that he “suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God.” But this seems somewhat strange unto reason. Where is the justice, where is the equity, that the just should suffer for the unjust? Where is divine righteousness herein? For it was an act of God: “The Lord has laid on him the iniquity of us all,” Isa. liii. 6. The equity hereof, with the grounds of it, must be here a little inquired into.

First of all, it is certain that all the elect, the whole church of God, fell in Adam under the curse due to the transgression of the law. It is so also, that in this curse death, both temporal and eternal, was contained. This curse none could undergo and be saved. Nor was it consistent with the righteousness, or holiness, or truth of God, that sin should go unpunished. Wherefore there was a necessity, upon a supposition of God's decree to save his church, of a translation of punishment, — namely, from them who had deserved it, and could not bear it, unto one who had not deserved it, but could bear it.

A supposition of this translation of punishment by divine dispensation is the foundation of Christian religion, yea, of all supernatural revelation contained in the Scripture. This was first intimated in the first promise [Gen3:15]; and afterward explained and confirmed in all the institutions of the Old Testament. For although in the sacrifices of the law, there was a revival of the greatest and most fundamental principle of the law of nature, — namely, that God is to be worshipped with our best, — yet the principal end and use of them was to represent this translation of punishment from the offender unto another, who was to be a sacrifice in his stead.

The reasons of the equity hereof, and the unspeakable glory of Christ herein, is what we now inquire into. And I shall reduce what ought to be spoken hereunto to the ensuing heads:—

I. It is not contrary unto the nature of divine justice, it does not interfere with the principles of natural light in man, that in sundry cases some persons should suffer punishment for the sins and offences of others.

I shall at present give this assertion no other confirmation, but only that God has often done so, who will, who can, do no iniquity.

So he affirms that he will do, Exod. xx. 5, “Visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation.” It is no exception of weight, that they also are sinners, continuing in their fathers’ sins; for the worst of sinners must not be dealt unjustly withal: but they must be so if they are punished for their fathers’ sins, and it be absolutely unlawful that any one should be punished for the sin of another.

So the church affirms, “Our fathers have sinned, and are not; and we have borne their iniquities,” Lam. v. 7. And so it was; for in the Babylonish captivity God punished the sins of their forefathers, especially those committed in the days of Manasseh, 2 Kings xxiii. 26, 27; as afterward, in the final destruction of that church and nation, God punished in them the guilt of all bloody persecutions from the beginning of the world, Luke xi. 50, 51.

So Canaan was cursed for the sin of his father, Gen. ix. 25. Saul’s seven sons were put to death for their father’s bloody cruelty, 2 Sam. xxi. 9, 14. For the sin of David, seventy thousand of the people were destroyed by an angel, concerning whom he said, “It is I that have sinned and done evil; these sheep, what have they done?” 2 Sam. xxiv. 15–17. See also 1 Kings xxi. 29. So was it with all the children or infantry that perished in the flood, or in the conflagration of Sodom and Gomorrah. And other instances of the like nature may be assigned.

It is therefore evident that there is no inconsistency with the nature of divine justice, nor the rules of reason among men, that in sundry cases the sins of some may be punished on others.

II. It is to be observed, that this administration of justice is not promiscuous, — that any whatever may be punished for the sins of any others. There is always a special cause and reason of it; and this is a peculiar conjunction between them who sin and those who are punished for their sins. And two things belong unto this conjunction. 1. Especial relation; 2. Especial mutual interest.

1. There is an especial relation required unto this translation of punishment; such as that between parents and children, as in most of the instances before given; or between a king and subjects, as in the case of David. Hereby the persons sinning and those suffering are constituted one body, wherein if one member offend, another may justly suffer: the back may answer for what the hand takes away.

2. It consists in mutual interest. Those whose sins are punished in others have such an interest in them, as that their being so is a punishment unto themselves. Therefore are such sinners threatened with the punishment and evils that shall befall their posterity or children for their sakes; which is highly penal unto themselves, Numb. xiv. 33, “Your children shall wander in the wilderness forty years, and bear your whoredoms.” The punishment due to their sins is in part transferred unto their children; and therein did the sting of their own punishment also consist.

III. There is a greater, a more intimate conjunction, a nearer relation, a higher mutual interest, between Christ and the church, than ever was or can be between any other persons or relations in the world, whereon it became just and equal in the sight of God that he should suffer for us, and that what he did and suffered would be imputed unto us; which is farther to be cleared.

There neither is nor can be any more than a threefold conjunction between divers distinct persons. The first is natural; the second is moral, whereunto I refer that which is spiritual or mystical; and the third federal, by virtue of mutual compact [e.g., Adam was the federal head of all humanity, so that when he sinned, all sinned; his sin was imputed to all his posterity; that's why we are all born sinners. See Rom5:12 Arminians do not believe in this imputation because they see it as unfair.]. In all three ways is Christ in conjunction with his church, and in every one of them in a way singular and peculiar. [Christ is the federal head of the church, those chosen in eternity to be saved, Eph. 1, to be united to Christ. So what Christ did to atone for sin, etc., resulted in the imputation of righteousness to all the members of his body, the church.]

1. The first conjunction of distinct periods is natural. God has made all mankind “of one blood,” Acts xvii. 26, — whereby there is a cognation and alliance between them all. Hence every man is every man’s brother or neighbour whom loving-kindness is to be showed, Luke x. 36. And this conjunction was between Christ and the church, as the apostle declares, Heb. ii. 14, 15, “Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage.” Hence “both he that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one,” verse 11. His infinite condescension [The Son of God leaving heaven and coming down to our level, humbling himself, suffering, etc.], in coming into this communion and conjunction of nature with us, was before declared; but it is not common, like that between all other men, partakers of the same nature. There are two things wherein it was peculiar and eminent.

(1.) This conjunction between him and the church did not arise from a necessity of nature, but from a voluntary act of his will. [nothing in God's nature required him to do it as opposed to his holiness which requires all sin to be punished; no exceptions; he has to do it and will. Either the guilty person is punished or someone in his place.] The conjunction that is between all others is necessary. Every man is every man’s brother, Whether he will or no, by being a man. Natural generation, communicating to everyone his subsistence in the same nature, prevents [comes before] all acts of their own will and choice. With the Lord Christ it was otherwise, as the text affirms. For such reasons as are there expressed, he did, by an act of his own will, partake of flesh and blood, or came into this conjunction with us. He did it of his own choice, because the children did partake of the same. He would be what the children were. Wherefore the conjunction of Christ in human nature with the church is ineffably distinct from that common conjunction which is amongst all others in the same nature. And, therefore, although it should not be meet amongst mere men, that one should act and suffer in the stead of others, because they are all thus related to one another, as it were, whether they will or no; yet this could not reach the Lord Christ, who, in a strange and wonderful manner, came into this conjunction by a mere act of his own.

(2.) He came into it on this design, and for this only end, — namely, that in our nature, taken to be his own, he might do and suffer what was to be done and suffered for the church: so it is added in the text, “That by death he might destroy him who had the power of death; and deliver them who through fear of death were subject to bondage.” This was the only end of his conjunction in nature with the church; and this puts the case between him and it at a vast distance from what is or may be between other men.

It is a foolish thing to argue, that because a mere participation of the same nature among men is not sufficient to warrant the righteousness of punishing one for another, — therefore the conjunction in the same nature betwixt Christ and the church is not a sufficient and just foundation of his suffering for us, and in our stead. For, by an act of his own will and choice, he did partake of our nature, and that for this very end, that therein he might suffer for us; as the Holy Ghost expressly declares. Amongst others, there neither is nor can be anything of this nature, and so no objection from what is equal or unequal amongst them can arise against what is equal between Christ and the church. And herein is he glorious and precious unto them that believe, as we shall see immediately.

2. There is a mystical conjunction between Christ and the church, which answers all the most strict, real, or moral unions or conjunctions between other persons or things. Such is the conjunction between the head of a body and its members, or the tree of the vine and its branches, which are real; or between a husband and wife, which is moral and real also. That there is such a conjunction between Christ and his church the Scripture plentifully declares, as also that it is the foundation of the equity of his suffering in its stead. So speaks the apostle, Eph. v. 25–32, “Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church,” — that is, his wife, the bride, the Lamb’s wife, — “and gave himself for it,” &c. Being the head and husband of the church, which was to be sanctified and saved, and could be so no otherwise but by his blood and sufferings, he was both meet so to suffer, and it was righteous also that what he did and suffered should be imputed unto them for whom he both did it and suffered. Let the adversaries of the glory of Christ assign any one instance of such a conjunction, union, and relation between any amongst mankind, as is between Christ and the church, and they may give some countenance unto their cavils against his obedience and sufferings in our stead, with the imputation of what he did and suffered unto us. But the glory of Christ is singular herein, and as such it appears unto them by whom the mystery of it is, in any measure, spiritually apprehended. [see 1Cor2:14]

But yet it will be said, that this mystical conjunction of Christ with his church is consequential unto what he did and suffered for it; for it ensues on the conversion of men unto him. For it is by faith that we are implanted into him. Until that be actually wrought in us, we have no mystical conjunction with him. He is not a head or a husband unto unregenerate, unsanctified unbelievers, whilst they continue so to be; and such was the state of the whole church when Christ suffered for us, Rom. v. 8; Eph. ii. 5. There was, therefore, no such mystical conjunction between him and the church as to render it meet and equal that he should suffer in its stead. Wherefore the church is the effect of the work of redemption, — that which rose out of it, which was made and constituted by it; and cannot be so the object of it as that which was to be redeemed by virtue of an antecedent conjunction with it. I answer, —

(1.) Although this mystical conjunction is not actually consummate without an actual participation of the Spirit of Christ, yet the church of the elect was designed antecedently unto all his sufferings to be his spouse and wife, so as that he might love her and suffer for her; so it is said, Hos. xii. 12, “Israel served for a wife, and for a wife he kept sheep.” Howbeit she was not his married wife until after he had served for her, and thereby purchased her to be his wife; yet as he served for her she is called his wife, because of his love unto her, and because she was so designed to be, upon his service. So was the church designed to be the spouse of Christ in the counsel of God [see Eph 1:4 just as He chose us in Him before the foundation of the world...]; whereon he loved her and gave himself for her.

Hence, in the work of redemption the church was the object of it, as designed to be the spouse of Christ; and the effect of it, inasmuch as that thereby it was made meet for the full consummation of that alliance; as the apostle expressly declares, Eph. v. 25–27.

(2.) Antecedently unto all that the Lord Christ did and suffered for the church, there was a supreme act of the will of God the Father, giving all the elect unto him, intrusting them with him, to be redeemed, sanctified, and saved; as himself declares, John xvii. 6, 9; x. 14–16. And on these grounds this mystical conjunction between Christ and the church has its virtue and efficacy before it be actually consummate.

3. There is a federal conjunction between distinct persons: and as this is various, according unto the variety of the interests and ends of them that enter into it; so that is most eminent, where one, by the common consent of all that are concerned, undertakes to be a sponsor or surety for others, to do and answer what on their part is required of them for attaining the ends of the covenant. So did the Lord Christ undertake to be surety of the new covenant in behalf of the church, Heb. vii. 22, and thereon tendered himself unto God, to do and suffer for them, in their stead, and on their behalf, whatever was required, that they might be sanctified and saved. These things I have treated of at large elsewhere, as containing a great part of the mystery of the wisdom of God in the salvation of the church. Here, therefore, I do only observe, that this is that whereby the mystical conjunction that was between Christ and the church, whereon it was meet, just, and equal in the sight of God, that what he did and suffered should be imputed unto us, is completed.

These are some of the foundations of that mystery of transmitting the sins of the church, as to the guilt and punishment of them, from the sinners themselves unto another, every way innocent, pure, and righteous in himself, — which is the life, soul, and centre of all Scripture revelations. And herein is he exceedingly glorious and precious unto them that believe. [to them that do not believe, this is all foolishness, a rock of offense, etc. 1Pet1:8] No heart can conceive, no tongue can express the glory of Christ herein. Now, because his infinite condescension [The Son of God coming down from an infinite height, to take on human flesh, to suffer, be spit upon, to die on the cross for the sins of his people. See Phil2:5-8] and love herein have been spoken to before, I shall here only instance its greatness in some of its effects.

1. It shines forth in the exaltation of the righteousness of God in the forgiveness of sins. There is no more adequate conception of the divine nature, than that of justice in rule and government. Hereunto it belongs to punish sin according unto its desert; and herein consisted the first actings of God as the governor of the rational creation. They did so in the eternal punishment of the angels that sinned, and the casting of Adam out of Paradise, — an emblem also of everlasting ruin. Now, all the church, all the elect of God, are sinners; — they were so in Adam, — they have been and are so in themselves. What does become the justice of God to do thereon? Shall it dismiss them all unpunished? Where, then, is that justice which spared not the angels who sinned, nor Adam at the first? Would this procedure have any consonance thereunto, — be reconcilable unto it? Wherefore the establishment of the righteousness of God on the one hand, and the forgiveness of sin on the other, seem so contradictory, as that many stumble and fall at it eternally. See Rom. x. 3, 4.

But in this interposition of Christ, in this translation of punishment from the church unto him, by virtue of his conjunction therewith, there is a blessed harmony between the righteousness of God and the forgiveness of sins; — the exemplification whereof is his eternal glory. “O blessed change! O sweet permutation!” as Justin Martyr speaks.

By virtue of his union with the church, which of his own accord he entered into, and his undertaking therein to answer for it in the sight of God [the Father], it was a righteous thing with God to lay the punishment of all our sins upon him, so as that he might freely and graciously pardon them all, to the honour and exaltation of his justice, as well as of his grace and mercy, Rom. iii. 24–26.

Herein is he glorious in the sight of God, angels, and men. In him there is at the same time, in the same divine acting, a glorious resplendence of justice and mercy; — of the one in punishing, of the other in pardoning. The appearing inconsistency between the righteousness of God and the salvation of sinners, wherewith the consciences of convinced persons are exercised and terrified, and which is the rock on which most of them split themselves into eternal ruin, is herein removed and taken away. In his cross were divine holiness and vindictive justice exercised and manifested; and through his triumph, grace and mercy are exerted to the utmost. This is that glory which ravisheth the hearts and satiates the souls of them that believe. [Hence John 1:17, For the law was given through Moses, but grace and truth came through Jesus Christ.] For what can they desire more, what is farther needful unto the rest and composure of their souls, than at one view to behold God eternally well pleased in the declaration of his righteousness and the exercise of his mercy, in order unto their salvation? In due apprehensions hereof let my soul live; — in the faith hereof let me die, and let present admiration of this glory make way for the eternal enjoyment of it in its beauty and fullness.

2. He is glorious in that the law of God in its preceptive part [what God commands, e.g., The 10 Commandments... thou shall not murder], or as to the obedience which it required, was perfectly fulfilled and accomplished. That it should be so, was absolutely necessary, from the wisdom, holiness, and righteousness of him by whom it was given. For what could be more remote from those divine perfections, than to give a law which never was to be fulfilled in them unto whom it was given, and who were to have the advantages of it? This could not be done by us; but through the obedience of Christ, by virtue of this his mystical conjunction with the church, the law was so fulfilled in us by being fulfilled for us, as that the glory of God in the giving of it, and annexing eternal rewards unto it, is exceedingly exalted. See Rom. viii. 3, 4.

This is that glory of Christ whereof one view by faith will scatter all the fear, answer all the objections, and give relief against all the despondencies, of poor, tempted, doubting souls; and an anchor it will be unto all believers, which they may cast within the veil, to hold them firm and steadfast in all trials, storms, and temptations in life and death.

The upshot of all this regarding this truth of the execution of God's wrath on sin is that many say that God is not fair! First, we humans, finite creatures with minds darkened and corrupted by sin, grossly misunderstand the infinite evil of sin. God hates it with an infinite hatred. What's fair is for God to cast all of humanity into hell which is what we all deserve. That's fair. But because God in his sovereign will, according to his good pleasure, extended mercy to some in saving a remnant for himself. Because of what the Son of God did in his humiliation and bloody death on the cross to pay for sin on behalf of those for whom he died, and because of his perfect obedience to the law, his righteousness is imputed to them, the church, those who were chosen before the foundation of the world, who he will call in each generation, to take them into favor with himself when they deserved it not. This is the same principle by which many were made sinners by Adam's fall and consequently made obnoxious unto judgment (Adam's in imputed to all his posterity, i.e., all are born sinners), are made righteous by the one man Jesus Christ. So if anyone insists on God being fair, one ought to be careful what one says!

Notes on Happiness and Peace

Notes on the happiness and peace of that the saints have, which is part of that which is given to them at conversion depicted in the diagram; that the saints participate in the happiness that God has and have great joy for it. More on what glory is and the image of God. Before our conversion we did not have this image. We were in Adam's likeness; otherwise, why would God give it to us if we already are in possession of it? What are true riches?

SERMON VIII.

romans ii. 10.

But glory, honour, and peace, to every man that worketh good.

The apostle, having in the preceding verses declared what is the portion of wicked men; viz. indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish; in this verse declares what is the portion assigned to good men. In the words of the text we should observe,

1. The description of a good man; viz. [namely] the man that worketh good. Such men are here described by the fruit which they bring forth. Christ has taught us that the tree is known by its fruit. Paul here describes them by that which most distinguishes them; not by the external privileges which they enjoy, or the light under which they live; but by the fruits which they bring forth. For as the apostle says, in verse 13. "Not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of it shall be justified." That which distinguishes good men from bad, is not that they hear good, or that they profess good, or that they intend good; but that they do good. They are workers of good.

2. The reward of such a man; viz. "glory, honour, and peace;" in which are mentioned three sorts of good that are assigned to them as their portion. 1. Their moral good, expressed by the word glory. Glory shall be given them; i. e. they shall be made excellent and glorious. [see Jn17:22] [this glory, or holiness is most excellent and is the foundation from which all truly virtuous affections] They shall be endued with those excellent and glorious qualifications, which will render them beautiful and lovely. They shall have the image of God, and be partakers of his holiness. Thus the word glory is used by St. Paul, 2 Cor. iii. 18. We are changed into the same image from glory to glory. 2. Their relative good; Honour. They shall be in most honourable circumstances. They shall be advanced to great dignity, receive a relation to God, and Christ, and the heavenly inhabitants, and God shall put honour upon them. 3. Their natural good; Peace: which, as it is used in the Scriptures, signifies happiness; and includes all comfort, joy, and pleasure.

I shall endeavour to show from the text, that glory, honour, and peace are the portion which God has given to all good men. In describing their happiness, I shall consider the successive parts of it; both here and hereafter.

First. I propose to treat of their happiness in this world. Those who are truly good men have been the subjects of a real thorough work of conversion, and have had their hearts turned from sin to God. Of such persons it may be said, that they are truly blessed. They are often pronounced blessed by God. He is infinitely wise, and sees and knows all things. He perfectly knows who are blessed, and who are miserable. He hath said, "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly" "Blessed is he whose sins are forgiven." "Blessed is the man that maketh the Lord his trust." "Blessed are the poor in spirit" "the meek" "the merciful" "the pure in heart"

In considering the happiness of the righteous in this world, I shall pursue the method which the text obviously points out, and shall consider, 1. The excellency; 2. The honour; and, 3. The peace and pleasure, which God bestows upon them in the present life.

I. The excellency or glory. The sum of this consists in their having the image of God upon them. When a person is converted, he has the image of God instamped on him. Coloss. iii. 10. "And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him who created him." And Ephes. iv. 23, 24. "And be renewed in the spirit of your mind, and that ye put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness." They have their eyes opened, and are led into such a sight of God and thorough acquaintance with him, as changes the soul into the image of God's glory.

What can render a creature more excellent than to have the very image of the Creator? and how blessed a change is that which is wrought in conversion, which brings a man thus to be in the image of God! For though the image of God in Christians in this world is very imperfect, yet it is real. The real image of God is most excellent, though it be imperfect.

Hence, "the righteous is more excellent than his neighbor and "the saints are the excellent of the earth." The image of God is their glory, and it may well be called glory, for imperfect as it is, it renders them glorious in the eyes of the angels of heaven. The image of God is a greater beauty in their eyes, than the brightness and glory of the sun in the firmament.

Indeed the saints have no excellency, as they are in and of themselves. In them, that is, in their flesh, dwells no good thing. They are in themselves poor, guilty, vile creatures, and see themselves to be so; but they have an excellency and glory in them, because they have Christ dwelling in them. The excellency that is in them, though it be but as a spark, yet it is something ten thousand times more excellent than any ruby, or the most precious pearl that ever was found on the earth; and that because it is something divine, something of God.

This holy heavenly spark is put into the soul in conversion, and God maintains it there. [We are kept by the power of God. 1Pet1:5] All the powers of hell cannot put it out, for God will keep it alive, and it shall prevail more and more. Though it be but small, yet it is powerful; it has influence over the heart to govern it, and brings forth holy fruits in the life, and will not cease to prevail till it has consumed all the corruption that is left in the heart, and till it has turned the whole soul into a pure, holy, and heavenly flame, till the soul of man becomes like the angels, a flame of fire, and shines as the brightness of the firmament.

II. I would consider the honour to which Christians are advanced in this world; and the sum of this is, that they are the children of God. This is an excellent and glorious degree of honour and dignity to which they are admitted; and that because the Being to whom they are related is an infinitely glorious being, a being of incomprehensible majesty and excellency; and also because the relation is so near and honourable a relation. It is a great honour to be the servant of God. John the Baptist said of Christ, that he was not worthy to stoop down to loose the latchet of Christ's shoes. But Christians are not only admitted to be the servants of God, but his children; and how much more honourable in a family is the relation of children than that of servants! Gal. iv. 7. "Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ." Rom. viii. 16, 17. "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God; and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ, if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together." 1 John iii. 1. "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God!" The honour appears the greater if it be considered how Christians are brought into their relation to God; and that is by Christ. They become the children of God by virtue of their union with the only-begotten and eternal Son of God; they are united to him as his spouse, and members of his body, as his flesh and his bones, and as one spirit; and, therefore, as Christ is the Son of God, so they are sons; therefore are they joint heirs with Christ, because they are joint sons with him. To this end God sent forth his Son, that so they might through him also be sons. Gal. iv. 4, 5. "But when the fullness of time was come, God sent forth his Son made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." And therefore they partaking of the relation of the Son, so are they also of the spirit of the Son; as it follows in the next verse, "and because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father."

Herein Christians are the children of God in a more honourable way than the angels themselves; for the angels are the sons of God by virtue of that relation which they have to God, as they are in themselves singly and separately. But Christians are the children of God, as partaking with Christ, the only-begotten Son, in his sonship, whose sonship is immensely more honourable than that of the angels. And Christians, being the children of God, are honoured of God as such. They are sometimes owned as such by the inward testimony of the Spirit of God. For, as it is found in the verse already cited from Romans, “the Spirit beareth witness with our spirits that we are the children of God.” They are treated as such in the great value God puts upon them, for they are his jewels, those which he has set apart for himself; and he is tender of them as of the apple of his eye. He disregards wicked men in comparison of them. He will give kings for them and princes for their life. He is jealous for them. He is very angry with those that hurt them. If any offend them, it were better for them that a mill-stone were cast about their neck, and they were drowned in the depths of the sea. He loves them with a very great and wonderful love. He pities them as a father pities his children. He will protect them, and defend them, and provide for them, as a father provides for his children. This honour have all they that fear and love God, and trust in the Lord Jesus Christ.

III. Peace and pleasure are also the portion of Christians in this world. Their peace and joy in God begin in the present life, and are no less excellent than the glory with which he invests them, and the honour to which he advances them. We ought here to consider, 1. What foundation they have for peace and joy. 2. What peace and joy they actually have.

1st: Their foundation for peace and joy is in their safety and their riches.

1. They have ground for peace because of their safety. They are safe in Jesus Christ from the wrath of God and from the power of Satan. They that are in Christ shall never perish, for none shall pluck them out of his hand. They are delivered from all their dreadful misery, that indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, which shall come on ungodly men. They were naturally exposed to it, but they are delivered from it; their sins are all forgiven them. The hand-writing is eternally blotted out. Their sins are all done away; God has cast them behind his back, and buried their sorrows in the depths of the sea, and they shall no more come into remembrance. They are most safe from misery, for they are built on Christ their everlasting rock. Who is he that condemns? It is Christ that died, yea, rather, is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God. They have the faithful promise of God for their security, that is established as a sure witness in heaven. They have an interest in that covenant, that is well ordered in all things and sure. “Neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate them from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus.”

2. They have a foundation of unspeakable comfort and joy, because of their riches. They have true and infinite riches. They are the possessors and heirs of something real and substantial, and that is worthy to be called by the name of riches. The things they possess are excellent, more precious than gold and than rubies; all the desirable things of this world cannot equal them, and they have enough of it. The riches that they have given them of God are inexhaustible. It is sufficient for them; there is no end of it. They have a fountain of infinite good for their comfort, and contentment, and joy; for God has given himself to them to be their portion, and he is a God of infinite glory. There is glory in him to engage their contemplation forever and ever, without ever being satiated. And he is also an infinite fountain of love; for God is love, yea, an ocean of love without shore or bottom! The glorious Son of God is theirs; that lovely one, who was from all eternity God’s delight, rejoicing always before him. All his beauty is their portion, and his dying love is theirs, his very heart is theirs, and his glory and happiness in heaven are theirs, so far as their capacity will allow them to partake of it; for he has promised it to them, and has taken possession of it in their name. And the saints are also rich in the principle that is in them. They have inward riches which they carry about with them in their own hearts. They are rich in faith. James ii. 5. "Hearken, my beloved brethren, hath not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him?" They have the grace of God in their hearts, which is a most excellent treasure, and a good foundation of joy; for it is the seed of joy. [Whoever has been born of God does not sin, for His seed remains in him; and he cannot sin, because he has been born of God. 1John3:9 In other words, one cannot continue a life of sin in the manner that he did before he was converted. To be delivered from the dominion of sin necessarily leads to this joy; and saints ought to look ahead to when we are fully redeemed and able to worship God without sin and its hindrances, etc.] Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart. And the seed that is sown in their hearts, is the grace of God there. That is a seed that, however it lies hid, will certainly in due time spring up, and put forth itself, and will bud, and blossom, and will bring forth rich fruit. These riches are the true riches. This is that good which God reserves for his friends. God distributes silver and gold and such like things among his enemies [Abraham gave gifts to his servants [Gen 25:6], because he slights them and regards them not. [hence the insidious consequents of the prosperity gospel] They are contemptible things in his eyes, as we throw husks to swine. But he has reserved better things for his children, of which no ungodly man, though a prince or monarch, shall partake. This is the ground which Christians have of peace and pleasure in this world. However, the saints cannot always take comfort, and do not always taste the sweetness that there is in store for them, by reason of the darkness and clouds that sometimes interpose. But though they may walk in great darkness for a long time, yet they are happy notwithstanding.

2d. They sometimes in this world have the actual enjoyment of peace and pleasure, that are most excellent. Sometimes the clouds that are in the way are removed, and Christians are enabled to behold the ground they have for rejoicing. Though God's glory and love be often hid from them, as it were with a veil, or at least, so as to hinder a clear view of it, yet God sometimes is pleased to remove the veil, to draw the curtain, and to give the saints sweet visions. Sometimes there is, as it were, a window opened in heaven, and Christ shows himself through the lattice; they have sometimes a beam of sweet light breaking forth from above into the soul; and God and the Redeemer sometimes come to them, and make friendly visits to them, and manifest themselves to them. Sometimes Christians have seasons of light and gladness for some considerable period, and at other times their views are more transient. Sometimes their light and joy arise in reading of the Holy Scriptures, sometimes in hearing the word preached, sometimes at the Lord's table, sometimes in the duty of prayer, sometimes in Christian conference, sometimes in meditation when they are about their occupations, as in the time of more set and solemn meditations; and sometimes in the watches of the night.

Those spiritual joys and pleasures which believers possess in this world, are chiefly of three sorts.

1. The joy which they have in a sense of their own good estate; in the sense they have of the pardon of their sins, and their safety from hell; and a sense of the favour of God, and in the hope they have of eternal life.

2. The joy and delight which they have in the apprehension and view of God's excellency and love. The joy of a Christian does not consist merely in the sense of his own good estate, as natural men often are ready to imagine; but there is an excellent, transcendent, soul-satisfying sweetness that sometimes fills the soul in the apprehension of the excellency of God. The soul dwells upon the thought, fixes on it, and takes complacency in God as the greatest good, the most delightful object of its contemplation. This pleasure is the sweetest pleasure that a Christian ever feels, and is the foretaste of the pleasures of heaven itself. Herein sometimes the saints do boast of the clusters of Canaan. This sort of joy is evidence of sincerity above any other joy, a more sure evidence than a rejoicing in our own good estate. From the joy which the Christian has in the view of the glory and excellency of God; the consideration of the love of God to him cannot be excluded. When he rejoices in God as a glorious God, he rejoices in him the more because he is his God, and in consideration of there being a union between him and this God; otherwise, if there were a separation, the view of God's excellency, though it would raise joy one way, would proportionally excite grief another. God is sometimes pleased to manifest his love to the saints, and commonly at those times, when a Christian has the greatest views of God's excellency, he has also of his love; the soul is spiritually sensible of God as being present with it, and as manifesting and communicating himself; and it has sweet communion with God, and tastes the sweetness of his love, and knows a little what is the length, and breadth, and depth, and height of that love which passeth knowledge.

3. The third kind of joy is found in doing that which is to the glory of God. The true love of God makes this sweet and delightful to the soul. The joy of a Christian not only arises in knowing and viewing but also in doing; not only in apprehending God, but also in doing for God. For he loves God not only with a love of complacency, but a love of benevolence also; and as a love of complacency delights in beholding, so does a love of benevolence delight in doing for, the object beloved [delight is a grace!]. The peace and pleasure which the Christian has in these things, is far better and more desirable than the pleasures that this world can afford, and especially than the pleasures of wicked men; and that on the following accounts.

1. There is light in this pleasure. The peace and pleasures of wicked men have their foundation in darkness. When wicked men have any quietness or joy, it is because they are blind, and do not see what is their real condition. If it were not for blindness and delusion, they could have no peace nor comfort in anything. There needs nothing but to open a wicked man's eyes, and let him look about him and see where he is, and it would be enough to destroy all the quietness and comfort of the most prosperous wicked man in the world. But on the contrary, the peace of a godly man, is a peace that arises from light; when he sees things most as they are, then he has most peace; and the distress and trouble which he sometimes feels, arise from clouds and darkness. When a godly man is in the greatest fear and distress, if he did not know what a happy state he were in, he would at the same time rejoice with unspeakable joy; so that his pleasure is not founded, like that of wicked men, in stupidity, but in sensibleness; not in blindness, but in light and sight, and knowledge.

2. There is rest in this pleasure. He that has found this joy, finds a sweet repose and acquiescence of the soul in it. It sweetly calms the soul and allays its disappointments. Christ says, Matt. xi. 28. "Come unto me, all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." There is a sweet contentment in it; the soul that tastes it, desires no better pleasure. There is a satisfaction in it. The soul that has been wandering before, when it comes to taste of this fountain, finds in it that which satisfies its desires and cravings, and discovers that in it which it needs in order to its happiness. John iv. 14. “Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst: but the water that I shall give him, shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life.” It is quite otherwise with the pleasures of ungodly men. There is no true rest in them, they are not enjoyed with inward quietness, there is no true peace enjoyed within, neither do they afford contentment. But those wicked men that have the most worldly pleasures, are yet restlessly inquiring, “Who will show us any good?” “The wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt.” Wicked men in the midst of their enjoyment of pleasure have no true rest, neither do their reflections on it afford rest; but only remorse of conscience, and disquietude of soul, under the guilt that is contracted. But the pleasures of the godly afford rest in the enjoyment, and rest and sweetness in the reflection; it oftentimes calms and refreshes the soul to look on past comforts.

3. There is life in it. It is a pleasure that strengthens and nourishes and preserves the soul, and gives it life, and does not corrupt and destroy and bring it to death, as do sinful pleasures. The pleasures of the wicked are poison to the soul, they tend to enfeeble it, to consume it, and kill it. But the pleasures of the godly feed the soul, and do not consume it; they strengthen, and do not weaken it; they exalt, and do not debase it; they enrich, and do not impoverish it. Death and corruption are the natural fruit of the pleasures of sin, but life is the fruit of spiritual pleasures. Gal. vi. 8. “For he that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption: but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting.” The life in which this joy consists, and to which it tends, is the most excellent life, and the only life worthy of the name; it is spiritual, and the beginning of eternal life: this pleasure is a fountain springing up to everlasting life. John iv. 14.

4. There is substance in it. This pleasure is not a mere shadow, an empty delight, as earthly pleasures are, but it is substantial joy. The pleasures of sin last but a little season, they are the crackling of thorns under a pot, or as the blazing meteors of the night, that appear for a moment, and then vanish. But this pleasure is like the durable light of the stars or the sun. Worldly pleasures are easily overthrown; a little thing will spoil all the pleasures of a king’s court. Haman, in the midst of all his prosperity and greatness, could say, “Yet all this availeth me nothing, so long as I see Mordecai the Jew sitting at the king’s gate.” But the joys of the saints are such as the changes of time cannot overthrow. If God lifts up the light of his countenance, this will compose and rejoice the heart under the saddest tidings. They joy in affliction. Their enemies cannot overthrow this joy; the devil and even death itself cannot overthrow it; but oftentimes it lives, and is in its greatest height, in the midst of the valley of the shadow of death. When in the most tormenting death, how often have the martyrs sung in the midst of the flames, and under the hands of their cruel tormentors! Job xxxv. 10. “But none saith, Where is God my Maker, who giveth songs in the night.”

5. There is holiness in it. It is the excellency of these joys that they are holy joys. They are not like the polluted stream of sinful pleasures, but they are pure and holy. Rev. xxii. 1. “And he showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb.” These pleasures do not defile the soul, but purify it; they do not deform, but beautify it; they not only greatly delight the soul, but render it more excellent; they impart something more of God, more of a divine disposition and temper, dispose to holy actions, and cause the soul to shine as Moses’s face did when he had been conversing with God in the mount, and as Stephen's face, which was as the face of an angel, when he saw heaven opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God. Thus these pleasures make the soul more excellent, and more divine, as well as more happy.

6. There is sometimes glory in it. God sometimes unveils his face, and lets in light more plentifully. This is a delight and joy, the excellency, and sweetness, and admirableness of which cannot be expressed. It is a kind of glory that fills the soul. So excellent is its nature, that the sweetest earthly delight vanishes into nothing, and appears as base and vile as dross and dirt, or as the mere mire of the street. It is bright above all that is earthly, as the sun is brighter than the glow-worm. Of this, the apostle takes notice. 1 Peter i. 8. "Whom having not seen, ye love; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory."

Secondly. I proceed to consider the happiness of the saints in death. It may seem a mystery to the world that men should be happy in death, which the world looks upon as the most terrible of all things; but thus it is to the saints. Their happiness is built upon a rock, and it will stand the shock of death: when the storm and floods of death come with their greatest violence, it stands firm, and neither death nor hell can overthrow it. [this is largely a result of one who is spiritually minded as he ought, growing in knowledge and grace as opposed to one who is negligent in this vital duty. See Owen's book, The Grace and Duty of Being Spiritually Minded. So if believers are not experiencing peace, joy and are greatly fearful of death, then it is because they are not being diligent in their duty of being spiritually minded, studying the scriptures, contemplating on spiritual things, all the mysteries of the Kingdom, etc.; they are being earthly minded and hence are not as stable and joyful, while even in going through trials, as they ought to be.]

Here,

1. Death is rendered no death to them. It is not worthy of the name of death. As the life of a wicked man is not worthy of the name of life, so the death of a godly man is not worthy of the name of death. It is not looked upon as any death at all in the eyes of God, who sees all things as they are, nor is it called death by him. Hence Christ promises, that those who believe in him shall not die. John vi. 50, 51. "This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die. I am the living bread which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread he shall live for ever: and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." It is no death to the saints, because it is no destruction to them. The notion of death implies destruction, or perishing, in it; but the godly are not destroyed by death, death cannot destroy them; for as Christ says, they shall never perish. John iii. 15. "That whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life." A godly man, when he dies, in no wise perishes. There is no end put to his life as a Christian, for that is a spiritual life that remains unquenched by death. A wicked man, when he dies, dies indeed, because then an end is put to all the life which he has; for he has no other life but temporal life; but the life of a Christian is hid with Christ, and safely laid up with him in heaven; and therefore death cannot reach his life, because it cannot reach heaven. Death can no more reach the believer's life than Christ's life. No death can reach Christ our life now, though he died once: but now he has for ever sat down at the right hand of God. He says, for the comfort of his saints, Rev. i. 18. "I am he that liveth and was dead: and behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and death." Death not only cannot destroy a Christian, but it cannot hurt him; Christ carries him on eagle wings aloft on high, out of the reach of death. Death, with respect to him, is disarmed of his power: and every Christian may say, "O death, where is thy sting?" [but, "faith plucks the thorn out of the conscience, Flavel see p 141] Death was once indeed a terrible enemy, but now he has become weak. He spent all his strength on Christ; in killing him, he killed himself; he was conquered then, and has now no power to hurt his followers. Death is now but the shadow of what he would have been if Christ had not conquered him; he was once a lion, but now he is but a lamb. A good man may indeed be harassed with fears of death, and may be much terrified when going through the valley of the shadow of death, but that is no just ground of any terror, and if the saints are terrified, it is only through their infirmity and darkness. As a child is frightened in the dark where there is no danger, because he is a child, so a good man may be affrighted at the terrible looks of death. But he will find this awful appearance to be only a shadow, that can look terribly, but can do nothing terrible. Death may, through the weakness of the saints, trouble them, and exercise them, but he cannot destroy the ground they have for comfort and support. When death comes to a wicked man, all those things on which he built his comfort fail, their foundation is overflowed with a flood. Job xxii. 16. But the foundation of the peace and comfort of the godly man is not shaken at such a time. Oftentimes the saints are actually carried above all the fears and terrors of death; they see that it is but a shadow, and are not afraid: not only their foundation of comfort remains, but that peace and comfort itself is undisturbed, the light shines through the darkness, and the lamb-like nature of death appears through the shadow of the lion. The godly have a God to stand by them when they come to die, in whose love and favour they may shelter themselves, in whose favour is life, yea, life in death; and they have a blessed Saviour to be with them, to uphold them with the right hand of his righteousness. These are the friends they have with them, when they are going to take their leave of all earthly friends. God will be with them when their flesh and heart fails; God will be the strength of their heart, when they are weak and faint, and nature fails. God will put underneath his everlasting arms to support them, and will make all their bed for them in their sickness. Psal. xxxvii. 37. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace."

2. Death is not only no death to them, but it is a translation to a more glorious life, and is turned into a kind of resurrection from the dead. Death is a happy change to them, and a change that is by far more like a resurrection than a death. It is a change from a state of much sin, and sorrow, and darkness, to a state of perfect light, and holiness, and joy. When a saint dies, he awakes, as it were, out of sleep. This life is a dull, lifeless state; there is but a little spiritual life, and a great deal of deadness; there is but a little light, and a great deal of darkness; there is but a little sense, and a great deal of stupidity and senselessness. But when a godly man dies, all this deadness, and darkness, and stupidity, and senselessness are gone forever, and he enters immediately into a state of perfect life, and perfect light, and activity, and joyfulness. A man's conversion is compared to a resurrection, because then a man rises from spiritual death. Eph. ii. 1. "And you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins." But though spiritual life is then begun, yet there are great remains of spiritual death after this, and but little life. But when a godly man dies, he rises from all remains of spiritual death, and comes into a state of perfect life. This body is like a prison to the holy soul, it exceedingly clogs, and hinders, and cramps it in its spiritual exercises and comforts. But when a saint dies, the soul is released from this prison, this grave, and comes into a state of glorious freedom and happiness. So that death is not only deprived of his sting, but is made a servant to the saints, to bring them to Christ in heaven, who is their life. [faith plucks the thorn out of the conscience - —Flavel,] And their ground of comfort does not only last when they are going out of the world, but it is in some respects increased, for then their perfect happiness draws nigh. It is "far better" to depart and be with Christ, than to continue here. And when the saints are enabled to see their own happiness in death, they are enabled exceedingly to rejoice in the midst of the valley of the shadow of death, and to triumph joyfully over the king of terrors. Death to the saints is always a passage or avenue, leading out of a world of vanity, and sin, and misery, into a world of life, light, and glory; but though often a dark avenue, it is at times full of light, the darkness all vanishes away, and the light shines out of that glorious city into which they are entering. It shines through the darkness and fills the soul, and the clouds of death vanish before it. The awful appearance of death is but a mask or disguise that death wears. It is not terrible but joyful in reality, and this light of the new Jerusalem sometimes so clearly shines, that it shines through the frightful disguise, and shows the saints that death is but a servant. Yea, sometimes it is so when death has on its most terrible disguise that ever it wears, and comes in its most dreadful forms, as when the saints are burnt at the stake, and put to all cruel and tormenting deaths. It is oftentimes joyful to the saints when dying, to think that they are now going into the glorious, presence of God, to enjoy God and Christ to the full. The joyful expectation sometimes makes them ready to cry out, Rev. xxii. 20. "Even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly!" and Judges v. 28. "Why is his chariot so long in coming?"

Happiness and Joy of The Saints

with notes on the Doctrine of God

This is a good explanation of the happiness and joy of the saints, the causes and design of it. Subjects: God's favor, seeing God by sight vs. by faith through a glass, true delights, faculty of reason and understanding, the will, the knowledge of God

Excerpt from Sermon IX by Jonathan Edwards p 906-910

<http://www.ccel.org/ccel/edwards/works2.xv.ix.html>

God's favour is sometimes in Scripture called his face: Psal. cxix. 58. where it is translated, "I entreated thy favour with my whole heart;" it is in the original "thy face:" and God's hiding his face, is a very common expression to signify his withholding the testimonies of his favour.

To see God, as in the text, implies the sight of him as glorious and as gracious; a vision of the light of his countenance, both as it is understood of the effulgence of his glory, and the manifestations of his favour and love.

The discoveries which the saints have in this world of the glory and love of God, are often in Scripture called the sight of God. Thus it is said of Abraham, that he saw him who is invisible. Heb. xi. 27. So the saints are said to see as in a glass the glory of the Lord. 2 Cor. iii. 18. "But we all with open face, beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." Christ speaks of the spiritual knowledge of God. John xiv. 7. "If ye had known me, ye would have known my Father also: and from henceforth ye know him, and have seen him." The saints in this world have an earnest of what is future, they have the dawnings of future light.

But the more perfect view which the saints have of God's glory and love in another world, is what is especially called the seeing of God. Then they shall see him as he is. That light which now is but a glimmering, will be brought to clear sunshine; that which is here but the dawning, will become perfect day.

Those intellectual views which will be granted in another world, are called seeing God.

1st: Because the view will be very direct; as when we see things with the bodily eyes. God will, as it were, immediately discover himself to their minds, so that the understanding shall behold the glory and love of God, as a man beholds the countenance of his friend. The discoveries which the saints here have of God's excellency and grace, are immediate in a sense; that is, they do not mainly consist in ratiocination; but yet in another sense they are indirect, that is, they are by means of the gospel, as through a glass; but in heaven God will immediately excite apprehensions of himself, without the use of any such means.

2d. It is called seeing, because it will be most certain. When persons see a thing with their own eyes, it gives them the greatest certainty they can have of it, greater than they can have by any information of others. So the sight that they will have in heaven will exclude all doubting. The knowledge of God which the saints have in this world, has certainty in it, but yet the certainty is liable to be interrupted with temptations, and some degree of doubtings, but there is no such thing in heaven. The looking at the sun does not give a greater nor fuller certainty that it shines.

3d. It is called seeing, because the apprehension of God's glory and love is as clear and lively as when any thing is seen with bodily eyes. When we are actually beholding any thing with our eyes in the meridian light of the sun, it does not give a more lively idea and apprehension of it than the saints in heaven have of the divine excellency and love of God. When we are looking upon things our idea is much more clear and perfect, and the impression stronger on the soul, than when we only think of a thing absent. But the intellectual views that the saints in heaven will have of God, will have far the advantage of bodily sight, it will be a much more perfect way of apprehending. The saints in heaven will see the glory of the body of Christ after the resurrection with bodily eyes, but they will have no more immediate and perfect way of seeing that visible glory than they will of beholding Christ's divine and spiritual glory. They will not want eyes to see that which is spiritual, as well as we can see anything that is corporeal; they will behold God in an ineffable, and to us now inconceivable, manner.

4th: The intellectual sight which the saints will have of God will make them as sensible of his presence, and give them as great advantages for conversing with him, as the sight of the bodily eyes doth an earthly friend; yea, and more too; for when we see our earthly friends with bodily eyes, we have not the most full and direct sight of their principal part, even their souls. We see the qualities, and dispositions, and acts of their minds, no otherwise than by outward signs of speech and behaviour; strictly speaking, we do not see the man, the soul, at all, but only its tabernacle or dwelling.

But their souls will have the most clear sight of the spiritual nature of God itself. They shall behold his attributes and disposition towards them more immediately, and therefore with greater certainty, than it is possible to see anything in the soul of an earthly friend by his speech and behaviour; and therefore their spiritual sight will give them greater advantage for conversing with God, than the sight of earthly friends with bodily eyes, or hearing them with our ears, gives us for conversing with them.

2. I shall now give the reasons why the thus seeing God is that which will make the soul truly happy.

First. It yields a delight suitable to the nature of an intelligent creature. God hath made man, and man only, of all the creatures here below, an intelligent creature; and his reason and understanding are that by which he is distinguished from all inferior ranks of beings. Man's reason is, as it were, a heavenly ray, or, in the language of the wise man, it is "the candle of the Lord." It is that wherein mainly consists the natural image of God, it is the noblest faculty of man, it is that which ought to bear rule over the other powers; being given for that end, that it might govern the soul.

Therefore those delights are most suitable to the nature of man, that are intellectual, which result from the exercises of this noblest, this distinguishing faculty. God, by giving man understanding, made him capable of such delights, and fitted him for them, and designed that such pleasures as those should be his happiness.

Intellectual pleasures consist in the beholding of spiritual excellencies and beauties, but the glorious excellency and beauty of God are far the greatest. God's excellence is the supreme excellence. When the understanding of the reasonable creature dwells here, it dwells at the fountain, and swims in a boundless, bottomless ocean. The love of God is also the most suitable entertainment of the soul of man, which naturally desires the happiness of society, or of union with some other being. The love of so glorious a being is infinitely valuable, and the discoveries of it are capable of ravishing the soul above all other love. It is suitable to the nature of an intelligent being also, as it is that kind of delight that reason approves of. There are many other delights in which men indulge themselves, which, although they are pleasing to the senses and inferior powers, yet are contrary to reason; reason opposes the enjoyment of them, so that unless reason be suppressed and stifled, they cannot be enjoyed without a war in the soul. Reason, the noblest faculty, resists the inferior rebellious powers; and the more reason is in exercise, the more will it resist, and the greater will be the inward war and opposition.

But this delight of seeing God the understanding approves of; it is a thing most agreeable to reason that the soul should delight itself in this, and the more reason is in exercise, the more it approves of it. So that when it is enjoyed, it is with inward peace, and a sweet tranquility of soul; there is nothing in human nature that is opposite to it, but everything agrees and conforms to it.

Secondly. The pleasure which the soul has in seeing God, is not only its delight, but it is at the same time its highest perfection and excellency. Man's true happiness is his perfection and true excellency. When any reasonable creature finds that his excellency and his joy are the same thing, then he is come to right and real happiness, and not before. If a man enjoys any kind of pleasure and lives in it, how much soever he may be taken with what he enjoys, yet if he be not the more excellent for his pleasures, it is a certain sign that he is not a truly happy man. There are many pleasures that men are wont violently to pursue, which are no part of their dignity or perfection, but which, on the contrary, debase the man and make him vile. Instead of rendering the mind beautiful and lovely, they only serve to pollute it; instead of exalting its nature, they make it more akin to that of beasts.

But it is quite the contrary with the pleasure that is to be enjoyed in seeing God. To see God is the highest honour and dignity to which the human nature can attain; that intellectual beholding of him is itself the highest excellency of the understanding. The great cart of the excellency of man is his knowledge and understanding; but the knowledge of God is the most excellent and noble kind of knowledge.

The delight and joy of the soul in that sight are the highest excellency of the other faculty, the will. The heart of man cannot be brought to a higher excellency than to have delight in God, and complacency in the divine excellency and glory. The soul, while it remains under the power of corruption and depravity, cannot have any delight in God's glory: and when its moral relish is so far changed that it is disposed to delight in it [delight is a grace], it is most excellently disposed; and when it actually exercises delight in God, it is the most noble and exalted exercise of which it is capable. So that the soul's seeing of God, and having pleasure and joy in the sight, is the greatest excellency of both the faculties.

Thirdly. The happiness of seeing God is a blessing without any mixture. That pleasure has the best claim to be called man's true happiness, which comes unmixed, and without alloy. But so doth the joy of seeing God; it neither brings any bitterness, nor will it suffer any.

1. This pleasure brings no bitterness with it. That is not the case with other delights, in which natural men are wont to place their happiness; they are bitter sweets, yielding a kind of momentary pleasure in gratifying an appetite, but wormwood and gall are mingled in the cup. He who plucks these roses, finds that they grow on thorns; he who tastes of this honey is sure to find in it a sting. If men place their happiness in them, reason and conscience will certainly give them inward disturbance in their enjoyment. There will be the sting of continual disappointments, for carnal delights are of such a nature that they keep the soul, that places its happiness in them, always big with expectation and in eager pursuit; while they are evermore like shadows, and never yield what is hoped for. They who give themselves up to them, unavoidably bring upon themselves many heavy inconveniences. If they promote their pleasure in any way, they destroy their comforts in many other ways; and this sting ever accompanies them, that they are but short-lived, they will soon vanish, and be no more.

And as to the pleasure found in the enjoyment of earthly friends, there is a bitterness goes also with that. An intense love to any earthly object, though it may afford high enjoyment, yet greatly multiplies our cares and anxieties through the defects and blemishes, the instability and changeableness, of the object, the calamities to which it is exposed, and the short duration of all such friendships, and of the pleasures thence arising.

Some men take a great deal of pleasure in study, in the increase of knowledge: but Solomon, who had great experience, long ago observed that this also is vanity, because he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow. Eccles. i. 17,18. "And I gave my heart to know wisdom, and to know madness and folly: I perceived that this also is vexation of spirit. For in much wisdom is much grief; and lie that increaseth knowledge, increaseth sorrow." But the delight which the sight of God affords to the soul, brings no bitterness with it, there is no disappointment accompanies it, it promises not more than it yields, but on the contrary the pleasure is greater than could be imagined before God was seen. It brings no sting of conscience along with it, it brings no vexing care nor anxiety, it leaves no loathing nor disrelish behind it. [\[faith plucks the thorn out of the conscience Flavel, see pg 141\]](#)

There is nothing in God which gives uneasiness to him who beholds him. The view of one attribute adds to the joy that is raised by another. A sight of the holiness of God, gives unspeakable pleasure to the mind; the idea of it is a perception beyond measure, the most delightful that can exist in a created mind. And then the beholding of God's grace adds to this joy, for the soul then considers that the Being who is so amiable in himself, is so communicative, so disposed to love and benevolence. The view of the majesty of God greatly heightens this joy: to behold such grace and goodness, and such goodness and majesty, united together. Especially will the sight of God's love to himself, the person beholding, increase the pleasure, when he considers that so great and glorious a being loves him, and is his God and friend. Again, the beholding of God's infinite power will still add to the pleasure, for he reflects that he, who is his friend, and loves him with so great a love, can do all things for him. For the beholding of his wisdom, because he thereby knows what is best for him, and knows how so to order things as shall make him most blessed. So the consideration of his eternity and immutability; it will rejoice him to think that his friend and his portion is an eternal and unchangeable friend and portion. The beholding of God's happiness will increase the joy, to consider that he is so happy, who is so much the object of his love. That love of God, in those who shall see God, will cause them exceedingly to rejoice in the happiness of God. Even the sight of God's vindictive justice will add to their joy. This justice of God will appear glorious to them, and will make them prize his love.

2d. This joy is without mixture, not only as it brings not bitterness with it, but also as it will not suffer any. The sight of God excludes everything that is of a nature different from delight. This light is such, as who He excludes darkness.

It is not in the power of any earthly enjoyment to drive and shut out all trouble from the heart. If a man has some things in which he takes comfort and pleasure, there are others that yield him uneasiness and sorrow; if he has some things in the world that are sweet, there are others that are bitter, against which it is not in the power of his pleasures to help him. We never can find anything here below that shall make us so happy, but that we shall have grief and pleasure mixed together. This world, let us make the best of it, will be spotted with black and white, varied with clouds and sunshine, and to them who yield their hearts to it, it will yield pain as well as pleasure. But this pleasure of seeing God can suffer no mixture; for this pleasure of seeing God is so great and strong that it takes the full possession of the heart, it fills it perfectly full, so that there shall be no room for any sorrow, no room in any corner for anything of an adverse nature from joy. There is no darkness that can bear such powerful light. It is impossible that they who see God face to face, who behold his glory and love so immediately as they do in heaven, should have any such thing as grief or pain in their hearts. When once the saints are come into God's presence, tears shall be wiped from their eyes, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away. The pleasure will be so great, as fully and perfectly to employ every faculty; the sight of God's glory and love will be so wonderful, so engaging to the mind, and it shall keep all the powers of it in such strong attention, that the soul will be wholly possessed and taken up.

Again. There will be in what they shall see, a sufficient antidote against everything that would afford uneasiness, or that can have any tendency thereto. If there were sin in the heart before, that used by its exercise to disturb its peace and quiet, and was a seed and spring of trouble, the immediate and full sight of God's glory will at once drive it all away. Sin cannot remain in the heart which thus beholds God, for sin is a principle of enmity against God; but there can no enmity remain in one, who after this manner sees God's glory. It must and will wholly drive away any such principle, and change it into love. The imperfect sight that the saints have of God's glory here, transforms them in part into the same image; but this perfect sight will transform them perfectly. If there be the hatred of enemies, the vision of the love and power of God will be a sufficient antidote against it; so that it can give no uneasiness. If the saint is removed by death from all his earthly friends, and earthly enjoyments, that will give no uneasiness to him, when he sees what a fullness there is in God. He will see that there is all in him, so that he who possesses him can lose nothing: whatever is taken from him he sustains no loss. And whatever else there may be, that would otherwise afford grief and uneasiness to the soul, it cannot affect him who is in the presence of God and sees his face.

Fourthly. This joy of seeing God is the true blessedness of man, because the fountain that supplies it is equal to man's desire and capacity.

When God gave man his capacity of happiness, he doubtless made provision for the filling of it. There was some good which God had in his eye, when he made the vessel, and made it of such dimensions, which he knew to be sufficient to fill it; and doubtless that, whatever it be, is man's true blessedness; and that good which is found not to be commensurate to man's capacity and natural desires, and never can equal it, is certainly not that wherein man's happiness consists. Man's desires and capacities are commensurate one with another. When once the capacity is filled, the soul desires no more.

Now in order to judge how great man's capacity is, we must consider the capacity of his principal and leading faculty, his understanding. So great as is the capacity of that faculty, so great is man's capacity of enjoyment; so great a good as the soul is capable of understanding, so great a good it is capable of enjoying. As great a good as the soul is capable of comprehending in its perception and idea, so great a good is it capable of receiving with the other faculty, the will, which keeps pace with the understanding; and that good which the soul can receive with both faculties, of that is it capable of being made the possessor and enjoyer.

But it is easy to perceive that there is nothing here below that can give men such delight as shall be equal to this faculty. Let a man enjoy as great an affluence of earthly comforts as he will, still there is room; man's nature is capable of a great deal more, there are certain things wanting to which the understanding can extend itself, which he could wish were added.

But the fountain that supplies that joy and delight, which the soul has in seeing God, is sufficient to fill the vessel, because it is infinite. He that sees the glory of God, in his measure beholds that of which there is no end. The understanding may extend itself as far as it will; it doth but take its flight into an endless expanse, and dive into a bottomless ocean. It may discover more and more of the beauty and loveliness of God, but it never will exhaust the fountain. The body of man may as well swallow up the ocean, or his soul embrace immensity, as he can extend his faculties to the utmost of God's excellency.

So in like manner it may be said of the love of God. We can never by soaring and ascending come to the height of it; we can never by descending come to the depth of it; or by measuring, know the length and breadth of it. Eph. iii. 18, 19.

"That ye may be able to comprehend with all saints, what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge; that ye might be filled with all the fullness of God."

So that let the thoughts and desires extend themselves as they will, here is space enough for them, in which they may expand forever. How blessed therefore are they that do see God, who are come to this exhaustless fountain! They have obtained that delight which gives full satisfaction; having come to this pleasure, they neither do nor can desire any more. They can sit down fully contented, and take up with this enjoyment forever and ever, and desire no change. After they have had the pleasure of beholding the face of God millions of ages, it will not grow a dull story; the relish of this delight will be as exquisite as ever, there is enough still for the utmost employment of every faculty.

Fifthly. This delight in the vision of God hath an unfailing foundation. God made man to endure forever, and therefore that which is man's true blessedness, we may conclude has a sure and lasting foundation. As to worldly enjoyments, their foundation is a sandy one, that is continually wearing away, and certainly will at last let the building fall. If we take pleasure in riches, riches in a little while will be gone; if we take pleasure in gratifying our senses, those objects whence we draw our gratifications will perish with the using; and our senses themselves also will be gone, the organs will be worn out, and our whole outward form will turn to dust. If we take pleasure in union with our earthly friends, that union must be broken; the bonds are not durable, but will soon wear asunder.

But he who has the immediate intellectual vision of God's glory and love, and rejoices in that, has his happiness built upon an everlasting rock. Isaiah xxvi. 4. "Trust ye in the Lord forever, for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength." In the Hebrew it is, "in the Lord Jehovah is the Rock of ages."

The glory of God is subject to no changes nor vicissitudes, it will never cease to shine forth. History gives us an account of the sun's light failing, and becoming more faint and dim for many months together; but the glory of God will never be subject to fade. Of the light of that Sun there never will be any eclipse or dimness, but it will shine eternally in its strength. Isa. lx. 19. "The sun shall be no more thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee: but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory." So the love of God, to those who see his face, will never fail, or be subject to any abatement; he loves his saints with an everlasting love. Jer. xxxi. 3. "The Lord hath appeared of old unto me, saying, Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with loving-kindness have I drawn thee." Those streams of pleasure which are at God's right hand, are never dry, but ever flowing and ever full.

How much doth the sense of the sureness of this foundation confirm and heighten the joy! The soul enjoys its delight in a sense of this, free from all fears and jealousies, and with an unspeakable quietness and assurance. Isa. xxxii. 17. "And the work of righteousness shall be peace; and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance forever."

From this part of the subject we may derive several important and useful reflections.

1. Here we may see one instance wherein the revelation of Jesus Christ excels all human wisdom. It was a thing that had been beyond the wisdom of the world, to see wherein man's true happiness consisted; there was a vast variety of opinions about it among the wise men and philosophers of the heathen; indeed on no other subject was there so great difference among them. If I remember right, there were several hundred different opinions reckoned up respecting it, which shows that they were woefully in the dark. Though there were many very wise men among them, men famed through all succeeding ages for their knowledge and wisdom; yet their reason was not sufficient to find out man's true happiness.

We can give reasons for it now that it is revealed, and it seems so rational, that one would think the light of nature sufficient to discover it; but we having always lived in the enjoyment of gospel light, and being accustomed to it, are hardly sensible how dependent we are upon it, and how much we should be in the dark about things that now seem plain to us, if we never had had our reason assisted by revelation.

God hath made foolish the wisdom of this world by the gospel.

1 Cor. i. 20. "Where is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputer of this world? hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?" i. e. he hath shown the foolishness of their wisdom by this brighter light of his revelation.

For all that philosophy and human wisdom could do, it was the gospel that first taught the world wherein mankind's true blessedness consisted, and that taught them the way to attain to it.

2. Hence we learn the great privilege we have, who possess such advantages to come to the blessedness of seeing God. We have the true God revealed to us in the word of God, who is the Being in the sight of whom this happiness is to be enjoyed. We have the glorious attributes and perfections of God declared to us. The glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ is discovered in the gospel which we enjoy, his beauties and glories are there as it were pointed forth by God's own hand to our view; so that we have those means which God hath provided for our obtaining those beginnings of this sight of him which the saints have in this world, in that spiritual knowledge which they have of God, which is absolutely necessary in order to our having it perfectly in another world.

The knowledge which believers have of God and his glory, as appearing in the face of Christ, is the imperfect beginning of this heavenly sight, it is an earnest of it, it is the dawning of the heavenly light; and this beginning must evermore precede, or a perfect vision of God in heaven cannot be obtained; and all those that have this beginning, shall obtain that perfection also. Great therefore is our privilege, that we have the means of this spiritual knowledge. We may in this world see God as in a glass darkly, in order to our seeing him hereafter face to face; and surely our privilege is very great, that he has given us that glass from whence God's glory is reflected. We have not only the discoveries of God's glory in the doctrine of his word, but we have abundant directions how to act, so that we may obtain a perfect and beatific sight of God; one of which we have in our text, and of which I shall speak particularly hereafter.

3. This doctrine may lead us to a sense of the blessedness of the heavenly state, and justly cause us to long after it. In heaven the saints do see God, they enjoy that vision of him of which we have been seeking in its perfection. All clouds and darkness are there removed, they there behold the glory and love of God more immediately, and with greater certainty, and a more strong and lively apprehension, than a man beholds his friend when he is with him, and sees his face by the noon-day sun, and with far greater advantages for conversation and enjoyment.

Well may this make the heavenly state appear a blessed state to us, and make us to breathe after it; well may the consideration of these things make the saints wait for and desire their happy change; well may it make them long for the appearing of Christ. This they know, that when he shall appear, they shall "see him as he is." 1 John iii. 2. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is."

This may well be comforting to the saints under the apprehensions of death, and it is a consideration sufficient to take away the sting of it, and uphold them while walking through the midst of that valley. This also may well comfort and uphold them in all troubles and difficulties they meet with here, that after a little while they shall see God; which will immediately dry up all tears, and drive away all sorrow and sighing, and expel for ever every darksome thought from the heart.

4. Hence we learn that a life of holiness is the pleasantest life in this world, because in such a life we have the imperfect beginnings of a blessed and endless sight of God; and so they have somewhat of true happiness while here, they have the seeds of blessedness sown in their souls, and they begin to shoot forth.

As for all others, those who do not live a holy life, they have nothing at all of true happiness, because they have nothing of the knowledge of God.

Miscellaneous Observations – Heaven

Jonathan Edwards, vol. 2, pg 626

Goodness of God - Love of God Happiness of heaven. God stands in no need of creatures, and is not profited by them; neither can his happiness be said to be added to by the creature. But yet God has a real and proper delight in the excellency and happiness of his creatures: he hath a real delight in the excellency and loveliness of the creature, in his own image in the creature, as that is a manifestation, or expression, or shining forth of his own loveliness. God has a real delight in his own loveliness, and he also has a real delight in the shining forth, or glorifying of it. As it is a fit and condecant thing that God's glory should shine forth, so God delights in its shining forth. So that God has a real delight in the spiritual loveliness of the saints; which delight is not a delight distinct from what he has in himself, but is to be resolved into the delight he has in himself; for he delights in his image in the creature, as he delights in his own being glorified; or as he delights in it, that his own glory shines forth, and so he hath real proper delight in the happiness of his creatures, which also is not distinct from the delight that he has in himself, for it is to be resolved into the delight that he has in his own goodness; for as he delights in his own goodness, so he delights in the exercise of his goodness, and therefore he delights to make the creature happy, and delights to see him made happy, as he delights in exercising goodness, or communicating happiness. This is no proper addition to the happiness of God, because it is that which he eternally and unalterably had. God hath no new delight when he beholds his own glory shining forth in his image in the creature, and when he beholds the creature made happy from the exercises of his goodness; because those and all things are from eternity equally present with God. This delight in God cannot properly be said to be received from the creature, because it consists only in a delight in giving to the creature; neither will it hence follow that God is dependent on the creature for any of his joy, because it is his own act only that this delight is dependent on, and the creature is absolutely dependent on God for that excellency and happiness that God delights in. God cannot be said to be the more happy for the creature, because he is infinitely happy in himself, and he is not dependent on the creature for any thing, nor does he receive any addition from the creature. But yet in one sense it can be truly said that God has the more delight for the loveliness and happiness of the creature, viz. as God would be less happy if he were less good, or if it were possible for him to be hindered in exercising his own goodness, or to be hindered from glorifying himself. God has no addition to his happiness, when he exercises any act of holiness towards his creatures; and yet God has a real delight in the exercises of his own holiness, and would be less happy if he were less holy, or were capable of being hindered from any act of holiness.

The Unreasonableness of Wicked Men

by Jonathon Edwards

And excellent sermon on how sinful men are unreasonable and contradict themselves.

SERMON XI.

Matthew xi. 16, 17, 18, 19.

But whereunto shall I liken this generation? It is like unto children sitting in the markets, and calling unto their fellows, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented. For John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, He hath a devil. The Son of man came, eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a man gluttonous, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners. But wisdom is justified of her children.

The occasion of this discourse was John's sending to Christ two of his disciples, saying, "Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?" When the messengers had gone back, Christ enters into a discourse with the multitude concerning John, of which the verses read are a part, in which Christ reproves the unreasonableness of the Jews in rejecting God's messengers. We may observe in the words the following things:

1. The messengers of God that are here instanced in that they had been rejected, viz. John the Baptist and Christ. The former is spoken of in the context as being on some accounts the greatest of all the prophets that ever came before Christ, as you may see, ver. 9, 10, 11. "But what went ye out for to see? A prophet? yea, I say unto you, and more than a prophet. For this is he of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee. Verily I say unto you, Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist: notwithstanding he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he." The latter, even Christ, was the great prophet of God, the Head and Lord of the prophets, God's only-begotten Son.

2. In what the unreasonableness of their rejecting these messengers of God appears, viz. in their inconsistency with themselves in those objections which they made against them. And here we may observe, 1st: The nature of their objections against these two messengers of God; they objected against their manner of living with respect to their meat and drink.

2d. The different manner of living of those two messengers of God. Christ came eating and drinking, but John came neither eating nor drinking, i. e. John lived on a very coarse and spare diet, as we read, Matt. iii. 4. "And the same John had his raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins; and his meat was locusts and wild honey." He carefully abstained from that free use of pleasant meats and drinks that others allowed themselves in. But Christ came eating and drinking, i. e. freely using the comforts and enjoyments of life, taking indifferently all kinds of food or drink that were wholesome, comfortable, and lawful. This diverse manner of living of John the Baptist and Christ, was agreeable to the diverse errands that they came upon. John's errand was to call men to repentance, to awaken them to a sense of their sin and misery, to bring them to mourn for their sins, and humble themselves before God for them, that they might be prepared for the comforts and blessings of the kingdom of heaven that were to be introduced by Jesus Christ. A life of abstinence from the pleasant things of this world was agreeable to the purpose of awakening the soul, and of leading it to mourning and humiliation for sin, which it was especially John's business to preach and set an example of.

But after John had thus prepared the way with awakenings and repentance, then Christ came to administer comfort to those that were thus prepared for it, to preach good tidings to the meek, to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, to comfort those that mourn; to appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, that he might be glorified. Isa. lxi. 1, 2, 3. And freely eating and drinking, and enjoying the comforts and pleasant things of life, was agreeable to such an errand as this, and therefore Christ, in his first beginning of his public ministry which succeeded John's, declares this to be the business he was come upon. Luke iv. 16, 17, 18, 19. "And he came to Nazareth, where he had been brought up; and, as his custom was, he went into the synagogue on the sabbath day, and stood up for to read. And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Esaias: and when he had opened the book he found the place where it was written, The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind; to set at liberty them that are bruised; to preach the acceptable year of the Lord."

3d. Their unreasonableness appears in the fact, that though the way of living of these two persons was in this respect so diverse, yet they objected against both. John came neither eating nor drinking; and for that they objected against him, and reviled him, as though he was one that was very odd and strange, and beside himself, and under the influence of a diabolical spirit. This objection seemed to manifest a dislike of such a way of living, as though it was their opinion that a man ought not to live thus abstemiously, but should eat and drink freely as other people did. But yet when Christ came and did that, then they objected against that too, and bitterly reproached him for that, and called him a glutton, and wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners. So that there was no escaping their reproaches. If a man of God lived a life of trial and abstinence, they spoke of it as matter of great reproach, and yet if he did not so, they made that a matter of no less reproach. It was a crime with them for a prophet to eat and drink, and it was also a crime to let it alone. So inconsistent were they with themselves, that there was no such thing as a prophet's suiting them; they condemned the doing of that which at the same time they condemned the not doing of, and both they condemned with great bitterness, and virulent and contemptuous reproaches. This plainly showed that their objections against John the Baptist and Christ, were but vain pretences, and that the true reason why they disliked them, was, not the manner of living of either of them with respect to eating and drinking, but because they hated their persons and the business they came upon. When men have a prejudice against other persons they will be ready to find fault with every thing in them, they will find out bad names for their virtues, and will reproach those things in them which they will approve of and commend in others to whose persons they have a liking.

3. The thing to which Christ compares their inconsistency with themselves, to wit, to children who meet their companions in the streets or market-places, and endeavour to aid them in their play, in things of a diverse and contrary nature; for if they pipe unto them with notes manifesting cheerfulness and mirth, that does not suit them; they refuse to fall in with this, as though they did not like such cheerfulness, and as though mourning would suit them better; and then, when they see that they took a contrary course, they mourned with them, but yet neither do they fall in with that, they do not lament with them; so that they comfort them in nothing, neither mirth nor mourning.

So John the Baptist preaching repentance came with tokens of sorrow and mourning, and mean apparel, with a garment of camel's hair, and with a leathern girdle about his loins, and with great abstinence. But Christ when he comes, 919 comes eating and drinking with tokens of comfort and joy; but neither of them suited them. From the text thus explained we shall derive the following-

Doctrine. Wicked men are very inconsistent with themselves. They are so in the following respects: [wicked meaning unconverted; but saved men are not exempt from the effects of sin since much corruption remains after one is converted.]

- I. The dictates of their darkened understandings are inconsistent with themselves.
- II. Their wills are inconsistent with their reason.
- III. Their wills are inconsistent with themselves.
- IV. Their outward show is inconsistent with their hearts.
- V. Their profession is inconsistent with their practice.
- VI. Their practice is inconsistent with their hopes.
- VII. Their practice is inconsistent with itself.

I. Their understandings are inconsistent with themselves. I do not mean, that the faculty of reason and understanding is inconsistent with itself; for the faculty of understanding with which God has endowed man is wholly good and right. It is that wherein the natural image of God consists, and is the excellency of man's nature; and if the faculty of reason be duly improved, it will lead men right. Light is never inconsistent with itself. But the understandings of natural men are perverted and blinded by sin, and are inconsistent with themselves in two ways:

1. Their practical judgment is inconsistent with their own reason. By their practical judgment, I mean that judgment which they make of things that prevail, so as to determine their actions and govern their practice. This in wicked men is in innumerable things contrary to their own reason; for, in forming their judgment of things by which they govern themselves, they do not inquire at the mouth of reason, but at the mouth of their inclinations. Their lusts have a far greater hand in the judgments that they make of things, and by which they govern themselves, than their reason. As for instance; their practical judgment is, that the things of this fading world, the enjoyments of this short life, are things of greater importance than the things of the eternal world; and yet if they inquire at the mouth of their own reason, that tells them the contrary. Their reason tells them that it is most plain and evident that eternal things, things that are to last forever, are of vastly greater importance than the things of time.

So their reason tells them, that it must needs be the part of wisdom and prudence to improve the present time with the utmost diligence and earnestness, and to make ready for death; and yet they are not convinced of it, but their governing opinion is, that it is best to neglect the business of religion for the present, and to enjoy their ease, and sloth, and lusts awhile longer.

Their reason tells them, that it is well worth the while for every man to deny himself outward pleasure for the good of his soul. But their governing opinion or judgment is contrary, viz. that it is not best; and that pleasures, and the gratification of their lusts, are worth more than any benefit they would obtain by seeking their salvation.

The reason of young people tells them that it is their true wisdom to improve the time of youth. Reason tells them that life is very uncertain. But when such persons hear ministers preach concerning the infinite importance of eternal things; the uncertainty of life, the peace and comfort that will be found in a state of happier existence with God; are told how light a thing the difficulty and sufferings of a holy life are in comparison; their reason assents to all this, but their practical judgments are the contrary. When a person has lately died, either in extreme terror and amazement, under a sense of the guilt of a mispent life, or full of joy and comfort, in consequence of a life of holy walking with God; their reason tells them that it would be well worth their while to labour and deny themselves all their lifetime to be ready for death, and to have a solid foundation of peace and comfort laid up against such an hour. But yet their practice is directly the reverse.

2. Some of their judgments of things are inconsistent with others. For instance, in temporal things, they judge that the good which is of long continuance is to be preferred before that which is of short continuance, and that a long-continued calamity is more to be dreaded and avoided than a short one. Their governing judgment is thus in these things, but yet it is the reverse in spiritual things.

Again. Such arguments as they judge to furnish good and clear evidence with them in those things that are agreeable to their sinful inclination, they think not to have any evidence in those things that are contrary to them. In temporal things they think it to be their wisdom to improve times of special advantage, and to watch against that which might insnare them, or endanger their welfare, but in other things they think the reverse. In these things, and many more that might be mentioned, their judgments are inconsistent with themselves.

II. Their wills are inconsistent with their reason. This inconsistency is a consequence of the foregoing; for if their practical judgment be contrary to their own reason, it will follow that their wills are contrary to their reason; for the will ever follows the dictate of the practical judgment.

Their wills are contrary to their reason in two respects.

1. They will those things which their reason tells them are inconsistent with their duty; and so they are inconsistent with themselves, as their wills are inconsistent with their consciences. Conscience is a principle implanted in the heart of every man, and is as essential to his nature as the faculty of reason, for it is a natural and necessary attendant of that faculty. But the wills of wicked men are contrary to it, and inconsistent with it. They choose those things which they know to be evil, and ought not to be chosen; they choose that which their own reason tells them is unreasonable and vile, and unbecoming men, and justly provoking to their Maker, and contrary to the end for which they are made.

Hence arises an inward war in their own minds: their wills and their consciences warring one against another. There is no true peace in their hearts, for they are at war with themselves, and therefore they are like the troubled sea that cannot rest, unless by a course of horrible violations of the dictates of their own conscience, they have proceeded so far in their war against their own consciences as to stupefy conscience, and lay it as it were dead, which is the case of some persons.

2. They will those things which their reason tells them are contrary to their own interest, yea, those things which their own reason tells them are the way to their ruin and misery. At the very same time that wicked men are tempted to commit some sin, and their reason then tells them that it will expose them to the eternal wrath of God, and that it will therefore be a dreadful folly for them to do it, yet they will do it. Or when their reason tells them that the course in which they are going leads to destruction, and represents to them that it is the greatest folly, yet they will go on in it, and run the venture of being everlastingly undone.

So inconsistent are they with themselves, that they do and allow that of which they hope to repent, they choose that now for choosing which at the same time they expect and hope hereafter to charge themselves with great folly, and to be convinced that it is folly, and to lament and bewail it; nay, they would not do it, if they did not expect hereafter to see that it is very foolish in them so to do, and heartily to mourn for it.

In this respect they are so inconsistent with themselves that they are their own worst enemies. They are inconsistent with themselves, as two mortal enemies cannot consist together, or walk together. By choosing those things which their own reason tells them is contrary to their own interest, and tends to their own undoing, they may be said to hate their own souls, and to love their own ruin. Prov. viii. 36. "He that sinneth against me, wrongeth his own soul; all they that hate me, love death."

III. Their wills and dispositions are inconsistent with their wills. The Jews would neither have a prophet to come eating and drinking, nor would they have him otherwise. They knew not what they would have themselves, there was no pleasing them [as are most liberals, politicians, etc. Hence, the reason why is because sin has deceived them and blinded them to a due exercise of reason in concert with corrupt affections.] To eat and drink did not please them; that they reproached as drunkenness, and gluttony: nor did it please them anymore not to eat nor drink; this they reproached no less virulently, as though it were an argument that a man was out of his wits, and possessed by the devil. The inconsistency of wicked men's wills with themselves appears in the following things:

1st They do, in some respects, choose and refuse the same things.

I shall mention some instances.

First. In some respects, many of them wish to be converted from sin to God. They think that they should be ready to give almost all that they have in the world to be converted, and they pray to God to convert them, and seek for conversion, and take advice to that end, and use a great deal of labour for it. But yet if it be considered what conversion is, or what is meant by conversion, viz. the being turned from all their sins to God; they have no desire to be converted, they will not have conversion when it is offered them, when it comes to them they are not willing to be saved from sin, for they are not willing to part with their sins. When they think of the thing in the general, they wish that they were turned from sin; but when it comes to particulars they cannot comply with it, they love their sins too well. When a particular lust comes, and pleads to be indulged and gratified, then in this instance they have no wish to be converted, they are not willing to be turned from their sin altogether, they cannot bear entirely and forever to renounce and reject it. They have a wish to be converted, but not from enjoying their right hands, and right eyes. They pray that they may be thoroughly and savingly converted, and seem to wish and pray for it; but yet when it comes to them, they are not willing for any more than a partial conversion. They cannot comply with a thorough conversion, for a thorough conversion is a turning from every one of their sins; and that proves that they would be willing to be converted from their sins for a little while, but to part with them finally is what they cannot find it in their hearts to comply with.

Secondly. Some wicked men do in certain respects desire that a work of humiliation may be wrought in them, and yet are utterly opposed to humiliation. They do many things that they may be humbled, and pray that they may be brought off from their own righteousness, and yet would by no means let it go, but are indeed building up their own righteousness all the time.

They seem in some respects to wish that they might submit to the justice and sovereignty of God in their condemnation, but yet are utterly averse to any such thing as owning God's justice. They are averse to this submission, as appears from their showing such a spirit of strife with God. They do not believe that God is just and sovereign, and how therefore is it possible that they should desire really to submit to God's justice and sovereignty? They cannot heartily and fervently desire to submit to God as just and sovereign, when they do not believe that he possesses those attributes, but think him unjust and tyrannical.

Thirdly. They in some respects wish that they might come to Christ, but indeed are utterly averse to come to him, so that their will is in this also inconsistent with itself. They pray that they may come to Christ, they are ready to say that they would give all the world for an interest in Christ; and yet they will not have an interest in him, for that is what is offered them, and what Christ is continually inviting and urging them to accept, but they refuse it. It is true they like some things in Christ, they like salvation from the pains of hell, they like that safety from everlasting misery which they hear is to be had in him; but there are other things in him which they do not like, his holiness, his salvation from sin, his kingly office, and therefore they will not accept him as he is. If they could have a part of Christ without the rest they would, but they will not accept of the whole of Christ. Indeed they are not willing to come to Christ and cordially accept of him as a Saviour from hell, for they do not see that he is sufficient to save; and besides, they are not convinced that they have deserved it. There is no such thing as being cordially willing to accept of a Saviour, who offered to deliver us from an unjust and undeserved punishment; for the hearty accepting of him as a Saviour from the punishment, would be allowing the punishment to be just; and God's offering a Saviour from undeserved punishment, is an imposition upon them; a man therefore can never heartily and sincerely accept such an offer. At the same time that natural men seem to wish, and pray, and strive to come to Christ, they are in their hearts bitter enemies to him; and there is no such thing as a sincere willingness to accept of one towards whom at the same time we are bitter enemies.

Fourthly. Natural men in some respects are desirous to go to heaven, and yet are averse to heaven. They are full of designs as to what they will do hereafter that they may go to heaven, but yet have no inclination to that wherein heaven really consists. The employments of heaven, which consist altogether in holy acts and holy contemplation, in holy exercises and holy praises, are that for which they have no desires nor inclination. And for the happiness of heaven they have no relish, but on the contrary, a dislike and an aversion; for the happiness of heaven consists in holy communion with God and Christ, to which their natures are opposite. Nor have they any desire for the company of heaven; and when it is observed what heaven really is, they choose this world before heaven.

Fifthly. They wish to have salvation from misery, but yet are averse to those things wherein salvation consists; and at the same time that they pray to Christ to serve them, they undo themselves as fast as they can, they spend their time daily in working out their own ruin. They pray that they may be delivered from hell, and yet are all the while piling up fuel, and kindling and blowing the fire. Thus their wills are inconsistent with themselves, as they do in some respects choose and refuse the same things.

2. They dislike and refuse spiritual things as they are, and yet refuse to have them otherwise. This was the very case with the Jews in the text, they would not have a prophet come eating and drinking, if he did so, they looked on him very reproachfully; nor yet would they have him not come eating and drinking, for if he did so they called him a mad man, and possessed with a devil, which is a lively specimen of the inconsistency of wicked men, of which we are speaking.

I will mention several instances of this inconsistency on the part of wicked men.

First. They do not like God as he is, and yet they would not like him if he were otherwise. They would not like him if he were otherwise than he is in those very things for which they most dislike him.

1st: They dislike God because he is a holy God. This is the main foundation of the enmity that wicked men have against God. His perfect purity and holiness make them enemies to him, because from this perfection of his nature he necessarily hates sin, and so hates their sins, which they love, and he will not and cannot allow of any sin in them. They are utter enemies to such a holy God. And yet they would not like him if they supposed him to be an unholy being, or if they supposed him to be at all wanting in perfect holiness, for then he could not be depended upon. If he were unholy, they know that if he promised them anything they could have no certain dependence upon it, for an unholy being is liable to break his promises; if he were unholy they could have no dependence on his faithfulness, and therefore they would never be willing to give up themselves to him as their God, for they would not know how he would dispose of them, what he would do with them. If he were to obligate himself by covenant, yet they could have no dependence upon it: and therefore they would by no means accept of such a God to be their God, to rule over them, and dispose of them.

2d. They do not like God, because he is a God of justice. This indeed is a branch of his holiness, for being strictly and perfectly just, he is disposed to execute just punishment on all iniquity. Therefore they are exceeding enemies to him, for they are the persons who are obnoxious, being those that have committed iniquity, and exposed themselves to just punishment; and yet they would not like God if he were an unjust God. If he were an unjust being, that would be an insuperable objection with them against accepting him as their God, for then they would think with themselves, “how do I know how unjustly he may deal with me;” and wicked men, however unjust they are, never like injustice against themselves. And they never would be persuaded to accept of such a God as their Lord and King, for they should then expect to be wronged and abused by him. They would dread committing themselves into the hands of a God that is infinite in power, and can do what he will with them, and has no principle of holiness or justice to keep him from using that power in the most unjust and abusive manner towards them.

Though they are enemies to God because of his justice, yet whenever at any time they think God deals unjustly, they quarrel with him for it. How frequent is it for natural men, when there are any of God's methods of providence, the justice of which they cannot see through, to have their hearts swell with enmity, and to be full of blasphemous, malignant thoughts against God, if they do not even manifest it outwardly by a fretful, discontented behaviour, and murmuring speeches?

3d. They do not like God, because he is an Almighty God, and is able to destroy them when he pleases; nor yet would they like him if he were a weak being and of but little power. They would on this account refuse to close with him as their God, for they would have a God able to do great things for them; they wish to have many things done for them, and they would have a God that can do them.

4th: They do not like God because he is an omniscient God, for hereby he sees all their wickedness. But yet neither would they like him if he did not know all things, for then in many cases he would not know what their case is, and what it requires, and what is best for them. He might ruin them in the disposal of them through mistake, he might not know how to extricate them out of difficulties in which they are or may be involved.

5th: Natural men oftentimes dislike God in the exercises of his infinite sovereign mercy, when it is exercised towards others. They are greatly displeased at God's being so gracious to others; they dislike it much that God bestows converting grace upon them and pardoning mercy, and a title to eternal life upon them. When they hear of their conversion it is unpleasant news, and they find fault with it the more when the persons who seem to have received such mercy are very unworthy, and have been very great sinners; they think of the sins of which they have been guilty, and reckon up all the instances of wickedness they can think of, so that the mercy exercised towards them is the more displeasing because it appears so great in being bestowed on one so unworthy; like the elder brother, Luke xv. 30. "But as soon as this thy son was come, which hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf." And yet they would not like God if he were not infinitely merciful, for then they would have less hopes of obtaining mercy themselves. They are angry because God appears so merciful in the exercises of his grace to others; but yet they would have God merciful, and are at the same time afraid that he is not merciful enough to be willing to pardon their sins, and bestow his blessing on them. Thus natural men do not like God as he is, nor yet would they like him if he were otherwise.

Secondly. They do not like men that are holy, nor yet do they like men that are wicked. They do not like holy men, for they know that such do not approve of that which themselves love, and the lives of the godly are a condemnation of the wickedness of their own hearts and lives. Hence there is an enmity between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. Gen. iii. 15. "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head and thou shall bruise his heel." But although they do not like men if they are godly, so neither do they like them if they are ungodly; they are more forward than the godly are to reprove others for their vice and wickedness, and bitterly to reflect on others for their pride, their covetousness, and their idleness. [This one reason why church is, primarily, not for unbelievers because of the inevitable contamination of the one upon the other, the saints, and hence, why membership rules and statements of faith be agreed upon before being granted membership to keep wolves or false teachers from sneaking in unawares. See Jude 4: "for certain men have crept in unnoticed,"] None are more apt to find fault with wickedness in others than those who are wicked themselves, and one great reason is that other men's lusts clash with theirs. Thus one man's pride crosses the pride of another, for it is the nature of pride to desire to be alone in advancement, to make the person in whom it is affect to be a God, to appropriate all power and all honour to himself as his own prerogative. But such an aim in one man clashes with such an aim in another. Hence there are none that can bear pride in others so ill, as those that are very proud themselves, and there never are such strife and enmity as between proud, haughty men. Proud men love to have others walk humbly before them, and nothing enrages them so much as to have others carry themselves proudly. For the same reason covetous men dislike covetous men, for this lust clashes with the same lust in another. Every covetous man strives to get all into his own hands, to get and keep all that he can to himself from his neighbor. So the lusts of envy, and malice, and revenge, are hated in others by envious and malicious men; because none are so obnoxious to malice, and envy, and revenge, as those that have the most of these qualities. Hence the wicked world on earth, who are at enmity with the church of God for its holiness, do not at all agree together. Though they agree in being alike under the power of wickedness, yet how full is the world of wicked men of strife and contention, of perpetual jars, animosities, and confusion! Rom. i. 29, 30, 31, 32. "Being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, spiteful, proud, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful: who, knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them." So Titus iii. 3. "For we ourselves also were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another." And hence also it comes to pass that devils and wicked men in hell, though they hate angels and saints in heaven for their holiness, have yet no love one to another; though they all agree in being perfectly wicked, yet they hate one another with implacable hatred, and are continually mortifying and tormenting one another; so that hell is a world of perfect malice and contention.

Thirdly. They refuse to accept of heaven as it is; yet they would not like it if it were otherwise. As has been observed before, they have no relish for the holy enjoyments and employments of heaven. They dislike heaven for its holiness, and yet they would not like it if it were unholy; for then they would be liable to the same troubles and vexations in heaven that they meet with in this world. If it were not that heaven differs from this world in holiness, it would be as full of pride and malice, envy, revenge, contention, injustice, violence, and cruelty, as this world is, and so would be as vexatious a world as this is. Wicked men are as liable to the trouble and vexation of the world, which arise from those things, as godly men, and in some respects more so, for they have no divine supports against those things, no safer portion to which their hearts betake themselves.

The Sovereignty of God In Election Seen In God's Exercise of Mercy To His Enemies Is Most Reasonable Argument against the sinner's prayer - Presumption.

Men Naturally God's Enemies

by Jonathan Edwards

ECT. VIII.

God may justly withhold mercy.

If natural men are God's enemies, hence we may learn, how justly God may refuse to show you mercy. For is God obliged to show mercy to his enemies? Is God bound to set his love on them that have no love to him; but hate him with perfect hatred? Is he bound to come and dwell with them that have an aversion to him, and choose to keep at a distance from him, and fly from him as one that is hateful to them? Even should you desire the salvation of your soul, is God bound to comply with your desires, when you always resist and oppose his will? Is God bound to put honour upon you, and to advance you to such dignity as to be a child of the King of kings, and the heir of glory, while at the same time you set him too low to have even the lowest place in your heart?

This doctrine affords a strong argument for the absolute sovereignty of God, with respect to the salvation of sinners. If God is pleased to show mercy to his haters, it is certainly fit that he should do it in a sovereign way, without acting as any way obliged. God will show mercy to his mortal enemies; but then he will not be bound, he will have his liberty to choose the objects of his mercy; to show mercy to what enemy he pleases, and to punish and destroy which of his haters he pleases. And certainly this is a fit and reasonable thing. It is fit that God should distribute saving blessings in this way, and in no other, viz. in a sovereign and arbitrary way. And that ever anybody thought of or devised any other way for God to show mercy, than to have mercy on whom he will have mercy, must arise from ignorance of their own hearts, whereby they were insensible what enemies they naturally are to God. But consider here the following things:

1. How causelessly you are enemies to God. You have no manner of reason for it, either from what God is, or from what he has done. You have no reason for this from what he is. For he is an infinitely lovely and glorious Being; the fountain of all excellency, all that is amiable and lovely in the universe, is originally and eminently in him. Nothing can possibly be conceived of that could be lovely in God, that is not in him, and that in the greatest possible degree.

And you have no reason for this, from what God has done. For he has been a good and bountiful God to you. He has exercised abundance of kindness to you; has carried you from the womb, preserved your life, taken care of you, and provided for you, all your life long. He has exercised great patience and long-suffering towards you. If it had not been for the kindness of God to you, what would have become of you? What would have become of your body? And what, before this time, would have become of your soul? And you are now, every day and hour, maintained by the goodness and bounty of God. Every new breath you draw, is a new gift of his to you. How causelessly then are you such dreadful enemies to God! And how justly might he for it eternally deprive you of all mercy, seeing you do thus requite God for his mercy and kindness to you!

2. Consider, how you would resent it, if others were such enemies to you, as you are to God. If they had their hearts so full of enmity to you; if they treated you with such contempt, and opposed you, as you do God; how would you resent it! Do you not find that you are apt greatly to resent it, when any oppose you, and show an ill spirit towards you? And though you excuse your own enmity against God from your corrupt nature that you brought into the world with you, which you could not help; yet you do not excuse others for being enemies to you from their corrupt nature that they brought into the world, which they could not help; but are ready bitterly to resent it notwithstanding.

Consider therefore, if you, a poor, unworthy, unlovely creature, do so resent it, when you are hated, how may God justly resent it when you are enemies to him, an infinitely glorious Being; and a Being from whom you have received so much kindness!

3. How unreasonable is it for you to imagine that you can oblige God to have respect to you by anything that you can do, continuing still to be his enemy. If you think you have prayed, and read, and done something considerable for God; yet who cares for the seeming kindness of an enemy? [Hence the wicked presumption of the sinner's prayer!] What value would you yourself set upon a man making a show of friendship, when you knew at the same time, that he was inwardly your mortal enemy? Would you look upon yourself obliged for such respect and kindness? Would you not rather abhor it? Would you count such respect to be valued, as Joab's towards Amasa, who took him by the beard, and kissed him, and said, Art thou in health, my brother? And smote him at the same time under the fifth rib, and killed him! What if you do pray to God? Is he obliged to hear the prayers of an enemy? What if you have taken a great deal of pains, is God obliged to give heaven for the prayers of an enemy? He may justly abhor your prayers, and all that you do in religion, as the flattery of a mortal enemy.

Summary/Review of Conversion

Pneumatologia A Discourse concerning the Holy Spirit

by John Owen

Summary/review of conversion, the Holy Spirit, the image of God and its purpose, a new spiritual principle, the grace of regeneration, Original Sin, Pelagianism, warnings of false conversions by John Owen, pg 154-159

This new creature, [remember, there are two creations; the old consisting in natural things, the earth and all its creatures, etc., and then the new creation, the Church, the body of believers with Christ as the head.] therefore, doth not consist in a new course of actions, but in renewed faculties, with new dispositions, power, or ability to them and for them. Hence it is called the "divine nature:" 2 Peter 1:4,

"He hath given unto us exceeding great and precious promises, that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature."

This $\theta\epsilon\iota\alpha\ \phi\upsilon\sigma\iota\varsigma$, this “divine nature,” is not the nature of God, whereof in our own persons we are not subjectively partakers; and yet a nature it is which is a principle of operation, and that divine or spiritual, — namely, an habitual holy principle, wrought in us by God, and bearing his image. By the “promises,” therefore, we are made partakers of a divine, supernatural principle of spiritual actions and operations; which is what we contend for. So the whole of what we intend is declared, Ephesians 4:22-24,

“Put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; and be renewed in the spirit of your mind; and put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness.”

It is the work of regeneration, with respect both to its foundation and progress, that is here described.

1. The foundation of the whole is laid in our being “renewed in the spirit of our mind;” which the same apostle elsewhere calls being “transformed in the renovation of our minds,” Romans 12:2. That this consists in the participation of a new, saving, supernatural light, to enable the mind unto spiritual actings, and to guide it therein, shall be afterward declared. Herein consists our “renovation in knowledge, after the image of him who created us,” Colossians 3:10. And,

2. The principle itself infused into us, created in us, is called the “new man,” Ephesians 4:24, — that is, the new creature before mentioned; and it is called the “new man,” because it consists in the universal change of the whole soul, as it is the principle of all spiritual and moral action. And,

(1.) It is opposed unto the “old man,” “Put off the old man, and put on the new man,” verses 22, 24. Now, this “old man” is the corruption of our nature, as that nature is the principle of all religious, spiritual, and moral actions, as is evident, Romans 6:6. It is not a corrupt conversation, but the principle and root of it; for it is distinguished both from the conversation of men, and those corrupt lusts which are exercised therein, as to that exercise. And,

(2.) It is called the “new man,” because it is the effect and product of God’s creating power, and that in a way of “a new creation,” see Ephesians 1:19; Colossians 2:12, 13; 2 Thessalonians 1:11; and it is here said to be “created after God,” Ephesians 4:24. Now, the object of a creating act is an instantaneous production. Whatever preparations there may be for it and dispositions unto it, the bringing forth of a new form and being by creation is in an instant. This, therefore, cannot consist in a mere reformation of life. So are we said herein to be the “workmanship of God, created in Christ Jesus unto good works,” chapter 2:10. There is a work of God in us preceding all our good works towards him; for before we can work any of them, in order of nature, we must be the workmanship of God, created unto them, or enabled spiritually for the performance of them.

Again: This new man, whereby we are born again, is said to be created in righteousness and true holiness. That there is a respect unto man created in innocency, wherein he was made in the image of God, I suppose will not be denied. It is also expressed Colossians 3:10, “Ye have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him.”

Look, then, what was, or wherein consisted, the image of God in the first man, thereunto answers this new man which is created of God. Now, this did not consist in reformation of life, no, nor in a course of virtuous actions; for he was created in the image of God before he had done anyone good thing at all, or was capable of so doing. But this image of God consisted principally, as we have evinced elsewhere, in the uprightness, rectitude, and ability of his whole soul, his mind, will, and affections, in, unto, and for the obedience that God required of him. This he was endowed withal antecedently unto all voluntary actions whereby he was to live to God. Such, therefore, must be our regeneration, or the creation of this new man in us. It is the begetting, infusing, creating, of a new saving principle of spiritual life, light, and power in the soul, antecedent unto true evangelical reformation of life, in [the] order of nature, [and] enabling men thereunto, according unto the mind of God.

Hereunto accords that of our Savior, Luke 6:43, compared with Matthew 7:18. The fruit followeth the nature of the tree; and there is no way to change the nature of the fruit, but by changing the nature of the tree which brings it forth. Now, all amendment of life in reformation is but fruit, chapter 3:10; but the changing of our nature is antecedent hereunto. This is the constant course and tenor of the Scripture, to distinguish between the grace of regeneration, which it declares to be an immediate supernatural work of God in us and upon us, and all that obedience, holiness, righteousness, virtue, or whatever is good in us, which is the consequent, product, and effect of it. Yea, God hath declared this expressly in his covenant, Ezekiel 36:25-27; Jeremiah 31:33, 32:39, 40. The method of God’s proceeding with us in his covenant is, that he first washeth and cleanseth our natures, takes away the heart of stone, gives a heart of flesh, writes his law in our hearts, puts his Spirit in us; wherein, as shall be evidenced, the grace of regeneration doth consist. The effect and consequent hereof is, that we shall walk in his statutes, keep his judgments and do them, — that is, reform our lives, and yield all holy obedience unto God. Wherefore these things are distinguished as causes and effects. See to the same purpose, Romans 6:3-6; Colossians 3:1-5; Ephesians 2:10, 4:23-25. This I insist upon still, on supposition that by “reformation of life” all actual obedience is intended; for as to that kind of life which is properly called a moral course of life, in opposition to open debaucheries and unrighteousness, which doth not proceed from an internal principle of saving grace, it is so far from being regeneration or grace, as that it is a thing of no acceptance with God absolutely, whatever use or reputation it may be of in the world.

And yet farther: This work is described to consist in the sanctification of the whole spirit, soul, and body, 1 Thessalonians 5:23. And if this be that which some men intend by “reformation of life” and “moral virtue,” they must needs win much esteem for their clearness and perspicuity in teaching spiritual things; for who would not admire them for such a definition of morality, — namely, that it is the principal sanctification of the whole spirit, soul, and body, of a believer, by the Holy Ghost? But not to dwell longer on this subject, there is no description of the work of regeneration in the Scripture, in its nature, causes, or effects, no name given unto it, no promise made of it, nothing spoken of the ways, means, or power, by which it is wrought, but is inconsistent with this bold Pelagian figment, which is destructive of the grace of Jesus Christ.

The ground of this imagination, that regeneration consists in a moral reformation of life, ariseth from a denial of original sin, or an inherent, habitual corruption of nature; for the masters unto the men of this persuasion tell us that whatever is of vice or defilement in us, it is contracted by a custom of sinning only. And their conceptions hereof do regulate their opinions about regeneration; for if man be not originally corrupted and polluted, if his nature be not depraved, if it be not possessed by, and under the power of, evil dispositions and inclinations, it is certain that he stands in no need of an inward spiritual renovation of it. It is enough for such an one that, by change of life, he renounce a custom of sinning, and reform his conversation according to the gospel; which in himself he hath power to do. But as it hath been in part already manifested, and will fully, God assisting, be evinced afterward, that in our regeneration the native ignorance, darkness, and blindness of our minds are dispelled, saving and spiritual light being introduced by the power of God's grace into them; that the pravity and stubbornness of our wills are removed and taken away, a new principle of spiritual life and righteousness being bestowed on them; and that the disorder and rebellion of our affections are cured by the infusion of the love of God into our souls: so the corrupt imagination of the contrary opinion, directly opposite to the doctrine of the Scriptures, the faith of the ancient church, and the experience of all sincere believers, hath amongst us of late nothing but ignorance and ready confidence produced to give countenance unto it.

Thirdly, The work of the Holy Spirit in regeneration doth not consist, in enthusiastical raptures, ecstasies, voices, or anything of the like kind. It may be some such things have been, by some deluded persons, apprehended or pretended unto; but the countenancing of any such imaginations is falsely and injuriously charged on them who maintain the powerful and effectual work of the Holy Spirit in our regeneration. And this some are prone to do; wherein whether they discover more of their ignorance or of their malice I know not, but nothing is more common with them. All whom in this matter they dissent from, so far as they know what they say or whereof they affirm, do teach men to look after enthusiastic inspirations or unaccountable raptures, and to esteem them for conversion unto God, although, in the meantime, they live in a neglect of holiness and righteousness of conversation. I answer, If there be those who do so, we doubt not but that, without their repentance, the wrath of God will come upon them, as upon other children of disobedience. And yet, in the meantime, we cannot but call aloud that others would discover their diligence in attendance unto these things, who, as far as I can discern, do cry up the names of virtue and righteousness in opposition to the grace of Jesus Christ, and that holiness which is a fruit thereof. But for the reproach now under consideration, it is, as applied, no other but a calumny and false accusation; and that it is so, the writings and preachings of those who have most diligently labored in the declaration of the work of the Holy Spirit in our regeneration will bear testimony at the great day of the Lord. We may, therefore, as unto this negative principle, observe three things: —

1. That the Holy Spirit in this work doth ordinarily put forth his power in and by the use of means. He worketh also on men suitably unto their natures, even as the faculties of their souls, their minds, wills, and affections, are meet to be affected and wrought upon. He doth not come upon them with involuntary raptures, using their faculties and powers as the evil spirit wrests the bodies of them whom he possesseth. His whole work, therefore, is rationally to be accounted for by and unto them who believe the Scripture, and have received the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive. The formal efficiency of the Spirit, indeed, in the putting forth the exceeding greatness of his power in our quickening, — which the ancient church constantly calleth his “inspiration of grace,” both in private writing and canons of councils, — is no otherwise to be comprehended by us than any other creating act of divine power; for as we hear the wind, but know not whence it cometh, and whither it goeth, “so is every one that is born of the Spirit.” Yet these two things are certain herein: —

(1.) That he worketh nothing, nor any other way, nor by any other means, than what are determined and declared in the word. By that, therefore, may and must everything really belonging, or pretended to belong, unto this work of regeneration, be tried and examined.

(2.) That he acts nothing contrary unto, puts no force upon, any of the faculties of our souls, but works in them and by them suitably to their natures; and being more intimate unto them, as Austin speaks, than they are unto themselves, by an almighty facility he produceth the effect which he intendeth.

This great work, therefore, neither in part nor whole consists in raptures, ecstasies, visions, enthusiastic inspirations, but in the effect of the power of the Spirit of God on the souls of men, by and according to his word, both of the law and the gospel. And those who charge these things on them who have asserted, declared, and preached it according to the Scriptures, do it, probably, to countenance themselves in their hatred of them and of the work itself. Wherefore, —

2. Where, by reason of distempers of mind, disorder of fancy, or long continuance of distressing fears and sorrows, in and under such preparatory works of the Spirit, which sometimes cut men to their hearts in the sense of their sin, and sinful, lost condition, any do fall into apprehensions or imaginations of anything extraordinary in the ways before mentioned, if it be not quickly and strictly brought unto the rule, and discarded thereby, it may be of great danger unto their souls, and is never of any solid use or advantage. Such apprehensions, for the most part, are either conceptions of distempered minds and discomposed fancies, or delusions of Satan transforming himself into an angel of light, which the doctrine of regeneration ought not to be accountable for. Yet I must say, —

3. That so it is come to pass, that many of those who have been really made partakers of this gracious work of the Holy Spirit have been looked on in the world, which knows them not, as mad, enthusiastic, and fanatical. So the captains of the host esteemed the prophet that came to anoint Jehu, 2 Kings 9:11. And the kindred of our Savior, when he began to preach the gospel, said he was “beside himself,” or ecstatical, Mark 3:21, and “they went out to lay hold on him.” So Festus judged of Paul, Acts 26:24, 25. And the author of the Book of Wisdom gives us an account what acknowledgments some will make when it shall be too late, as to their own advantage: Chapter 5:3-5, “They shall say, crying out, because of the trouble of their minds, This is he whom we accounted a scorn, and a common reproach. We fools esteemed his life madness, and his latter end to have been shameful, but how is he reckoned among the sons of God, and his lot is among the holy ones!" From what hath been spoken it appears, —

Fourthly, That the work of the Spirit of God in regenerating the souls of men is diligently to be inquired into by the preachers of the gospel, and all to whom the word is dispensed. For the former sort, there is a peculiar reason for their attendance unto this duty; for they are used and employed in the work itself by the Spirit of God, and are by him made instrumental for the effecting of this new birth and life. So the apostle Paul styles himself the father of them who were converted to God or regenerated through the word of his ministry: 1 Corinthians 4:15,

"Though ye have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers: for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel."

He was used in the ministry of the word for their regeneration, and therefore was their spiritual father, and he only, though the work was afterward carried on by others. And if men are fathers in the gospel to no more than are converted unto God by their personal ministry, it will be no advantage unto any one day to have assumed that title, when it hath had no foundation in that work as to its effectual success. So, speaking of Onesimus, who was converted by him in prison, he calls him "his son, whom he had begotten in his bonds," Philemon 10. And this he declared to have been prescribed unto him as the principal end of his ministry, in the commission he had for preaching the gospel, Acts 26:17, 18. Christ said unto him,

"I send thee unto the Gentiles, to open their eyes, to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God;"

which is a description of the work under consideration. And this is the principal end of our ministry also. Now, certainly it is the duty of ministers to understand the work about which they are employed, as far as they are able, that they may not work in the dark and fight uncertainly, as men beating the air. What the Scripture hath revealed concerning it, as to its nature and the manner of its operation, as to its causes, effects, fruits, evidences, they ought diligently to inquire into. To be spiritually skilled therein is one of the principal furnishings of any for the work of the ministry, without which they will never be able to divide the word aright, nor show themselves workmen that need not be ashamed. Yet it is scarcely imaginable with what rage and perversity of spirit, with what scornful expressions, this whole work is traduced and exposed to contempt. Those who have labored herein are said "to prescribe long and tedious trains of conversion, to set down nice and subtle processes of regeneration, to fill people's heads with innumerable swarms of superstitious fears and scruples about the due degrees of godly sorrow, and the certain symptoms of a thorough humiliation," f85 pp. 306,

Could any mistake be charged on particular persons in these things, or the prescribing of rules about conversion to God and regeneration that are not warranted by the word of truth, it were not amiss to reflect upon them and refute them; but the intention of these expressions is evident, and the reproach in them is cast upon the work of God itself: and I must profess that I believe the degeneracy from the truth and power of Christian religion, the ignorance of the principal doctrines of the gospel, and that scorn which is cast, in these and the like expressions, on the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, by such as not only profess themselves to be ministers, but of a higher degree than ordinary, will be sadly ominous unto the whole state of the reformed church amongst us, if not timely repressed and corrected. But what at present I affirm in this matter is, —

1. That it is a duty indispensably incumbent on all ministers of the gospel to acquaint themselves thoroughly with the nature of this work, that they may be able to comply with the will of God and grace of the Spirit in the effecting and accomplishment of it upon the souls of them unto whom they dispense the word. Neither, without some competent knowledge hereof, can they discharge any one part of their duty and office in a right manner. If all that hear them are born dead in trespasses and sins, if they are appointed of God to be the instruments of their regeneration, it is a madness, which must one day be accounted for, to neglect a sedulous inquiry into the nature of this work, and the means whereby it is wrought. And the ignorance hereof or negligence herein, with the want of an experience of the power of this work in their own souls, is one great cause of that lifeless and unprofitable ministry which is among us.

2. It is likewise the duty of all to whom the word is preached to inquire also into it. It is unto such to whom the apostle speaks, 2 Corinthians 13:5,

“Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?”

It is the concernment of all individual Christians, or professors of Christian religion, to try and examine themselves what work of the Spirit of God there hath been upon their hearts; and none will deter them from it but those who have a design to hoodwink them to perdition. And, —

(1.) The doctrine of it is revealed and taught us; for “secret things belong unto the LORD our God, but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of the law,” Deuteronomy 29:29. 282 And we speak not of curious inquiries into or after hidden things, or the secret, veiled actions of the Holy Spirit; but only of an upright endeavor to search into and comprehend the doctrine concerning this work, to this very end, that we might understand it.

(2.) It is of such importance unto all our duties and all our comforts to have a due apprehension of the nature of this work, and of our own concernment therein, that an inquiry into the one and the other cannot be neglected without the greatest folly and madness. Whereunto we may add,

(3.) The danger that there is of men being deceived in this matter, which is the hinge whereon their eternal state and condition doth absolutely turn and depend. And certain it is that very many in the world do deceive themselves herein: for they evidently live under one of these pernicious mistakes, — namely, either,

[1.] That men may go to heaven, or “enter into the kingdom of God,” and not be “born again,” contrary to that of our Savior, John 3:5; or,

[2.] That men may be “born again,” and yet live in sin, contrary to 1 John 3:9.

The Ordo Salutis

Regeneration - Justification

Code466

By G Vos, RD, pg 611

1. What is understood under the ordo salutis, the “order of salvation”?

The series of acts and steps in which the salvation obtained by Christ is subjectively appropriated by the elect. In Scripture sōtēria, salus, has a double meaning, one more subjective and one more objective, according to whether it includes the act of saving or of being saved. In the first sense it naturally extends much farther than in the subjective appropriation of salvation. Christ is called sōtēria not merely because He applies His merits but because He has likewise obtained them. His satisfaction was the principal act of salvation. In the second sense it is narrower in scope and in fact covers what one understands under the designation “soteriology.”

That the subjective application of the salvation obtained by Christ does not occur at once or arbitrarily. In the abstract, it would be possible for God to take hold of and relocate each one of the elect into the heaven of glory at a single point in time. He has His good reasons that He did not do this. There are a multiplicity of relationships and conditions to which all the operations of grace have a certain connection. If the change came about all at once, then not a single one of these would enter into the consciousness of the believer, but everything would be thrown together in a chaotic revolution. None of the acts or steps would throw light on the others; the base could not be distinguished from the top or the top from the base. The fullness of God’s works of grace and the rich variety of His acts of salvation would not be prized and appreciated.

The opposite of all this is true. There is order and regularity in the application of salvation as well as in every other area of creation. The acts and operations each have their own fixed place, from which they cannot be uprooted. They are connected to each other from what follows and from what precedes; they have their basis and their result. Consequently, the Scripture gives us an ordered sequence (e.g., Rom 8:28–30). At the same time, this order shows us that even in what is most subjective the purpose of God may not be limited to the satisfaction of the creature’s longing for blessedness. If this were so, then the order that is slow and in many respects tests the patience of the children of God would be lost. But here, too, God works first of all to glorify Himself according to the principles of an eternal order and an immanent propriety.

3. Does unanimity rule among the theologians in the identification of the different steps that belong to the order of salvation?

No, a great variety rules in sequence as well as in completeness. All do not enumerate the same steps. When they all have the same things, they are given in a different sequence. Different terms are used for one and the same thing.

4. Enumerate some points of difference that are important for proper differentiation.

a) An important point is the varying and unclear definition of the concept of regeneration. For many theologians the locus on regeneration is completely lacking, although many federalists are an exception here. At the same time these theologians do of course know of regeneration, and its specific character has not escaped them entirely.

1. Some identify “regeneration” (regeneratio) with “conversion” (conversio). This is quite customary with the dogmatists of the 17th century. The Canons of Dort teach in chapters 3 and 4, article 11: “Furthermore, when God accomplishes His good pleasure in the elect or works true conversion in them ... He not only powerfully illumines their mind by the Holy Spirit ... but by the effective power of the same regenerating Spirit, He penetrates to the inmost parts of the man, opens the closed heart ... infuses new qualities into the will, and makes the dead living ... (article 12) and this is that—so often proclaimed in the Holy Scriptures—regeneration, new creation, resurrection from the dead and making alive, which God, without us, works in us.” Owen also expresses himself in a similar way.

Some, however, sought to avoid the lack of clarity that may originate from this usage by a more precise distinction between two kinds of conversion. So Turretin makes mention of a double conversio. The first is habitual and passive. It consists in producing a habit or disposition of the soul: “Habitual or passive conversion occurs through the infusion of supernatural habits by the Holy Spirit.” The second conversion is called active and effective conversion. It is the exercising in faith and repentance of the already implanted habitus: “Active or effective conversion occurs through the exercise of those good habits by which the acts of faith and of repentance are both given by God and elicited in man.” He then adds, however, that it is better to call the first kind of conversion “regeneration,” because it refers to the new birth by which man is renewed according to the image of his Maker, and to limit the term “conversion” to the second kind, since in it the activity of man is not excluded.

2. The majority by far summarize regeneration and conversion under the concept of internal calling. Wollebius says, “Particular calling is termed: (a) new creation, (b) regeneration, etc.” In the schools it is called (a) effectual election, (b) effectual calling, (c) internal calling. Accordingly, some speak first about calling, then about faith, then about conversion, so that calling apparently takes the place of regeneration (e.g., the Leiden Synopsis). Calling is often enough described as an implanting into Christ, a union with Christ, an indissoluble joining of the person of the elect with the person of the Mediator, all of them concepts that bring regeneration to mind clearly enough.

3. Others take the concept of regeneration in a very wide sense, as almost completely synonymous with sanctificatio, “sanctification,” and under that notion understand the entire process by which the old nature of man is transformed into a new nature resembling the image of God. Calvin says (Institutes, 3.3.9), “Therefore, in a word, I describe poenitentia [repentance] as regeneration, of which the goal is none other than that the image of God, defiled and nearly wiped out in us by the transgression of Adam, is restored in us.... And this restoration is not completed in one moment or in one day or one year; but with continual, yes, even slow steps God removes corruption from his elect.” Later we will see why this wider use of the term has a certain right.

b) Another important point that lacks clarity lies in the concept of calling. While for this concept some still have all the emphasis fall on the immediacy of the action and thus identify internal calling with regeneration, others hold to the obvious thought that calling already presupposes a life and the capacity to hear, and so must be distinguished from the initial begetting of life.

c) Also, the concept of poenitentia, “repentance,” is not always clearly distinguished. Sometimes this word is taken to mean long processes that accompany the whole of life here on earth, sometimes for instantaneous actions at a critical moment. As seen above, Calvin identifies poenitentia, regeneratio, sanctificatio.

5. Does one also find here and there an attempt to divide the different stages of the way of salvation in an orderly manner?

Yes, we can find an example of that in the classification of Voetius. He distinguishes three kinds of acts of God as belonging to the application of salvation:

a) Acts that only effect a change in our state in relation to God. To these belong reconciliatio, “reconciliation”; justificatio, “justification”; adoptio, “adoption as children.”

b) Acts that are directed to the will of man with moral suasion but do not take hold or transform inwardly and omnipotently, such as external calling and what belongs to it. Voetius calls these “moral acts.”

c) Acts that bring about a real and inherent change in the subject. Regeneration, glorification, etc., are counted among them. As we will see, the main features are drawn quite correctly here.

6. What distinctions must we make with a view to arriving at a clear overview of these different acts in their mutual connection?

a) The first great distinction that needs to be kept in view is the one between judicial acts, which change a judicial relationship of man, and re-creating acts (in the widest sense of the word), which bring about a change in the actual condition of man. An act of the first kind, for example, is justification; one of the second kind is sanctification. The first kind changes the status; the second changes the condition of the one regarding whom or in whom it takes place.

b) Another distinction of equally great importance teaches us to divide between what occurs under, and in, or for the consciousness of the sinner. Some acts in the application of salvation derive their meaning completely from the fact that they are executed in the light of the consciousness, be it by God or by the man in whom God works. Others, by their nature, can only affect the deeper essence of man that does not appear in the light of the consciousness. Accordingly, they occur without man himself being able to understand and observe them. An example of this latter kind is regeneration. A sinner is as little conscious of his rebirth as a child is conscious of its birth, apart from the consequences by which it makes itself known. An example of the other kind is justification, consisting in a communication to the sinner's consciousness of acquittal and the merits of Christ.

c) Next, one can distinguish between the removal of the old and the establishment of the new in man. Sin is not a mere lack. If it were this, it could suffice for the Holy Spirit to make up what is lacking, and the distinction in view here would make no sense. Sin, however, is more—a positive power that must be removed and destroyed—and in its place must be introduced a positively operating principle of good. Regeneration, preferably, is an act that belongs to the establishment of the new. Repentance, by contrast, we can better reckon to the removal of the old, although here, as in the two earlier cases, we cannot sharply separate the two. Rather, these two—removing the old and establishing the new— accompany each other at every point of their way.

d) Finally, one must carefully distinguish between the beginning, the sudden breakthrough, of an act of grace and its further impact and development. The beginning of God's work of grace always has something distinctive by which it is sharply delineated from the development that follows. Now, in a certain sense one can maintain that regeneration and sanctification are parts of a great process of renewal that begins where the Holy Spirit first lays a hand on someone and ends where the heaven of glory is reached. Still, regeneration and sanctification are essentially distinguished. No less different from each other are the initial crisis in the conscious life of man that one is accustomed to call conversion and the further killing of the old man that continues throughout the whole of life.

7. What may be established further concerning the relationship between these different groups?

a) Our first principle is that the judicial relationships are the basis on which the moral acts of re-creation rest in their entirety. However, one should be completely clear what is intended here: it is not that justification as it takes place in the consciousness of the sinner must precede his regeneration in time. This would presuppose an impossibility. Justification surely occurs by faith, and faith as an expression of life in no way tolerates separation from the principle of life that is imparted in the essence of man. Believing without regeneration is no more conceivable than consciousness in a child without natural birth. So, in relation to time, the change of the unconscious condition certainly precedes the change in the conscious state. In contrast, it is completely otherwise if we ask about the logical relationship and put the question as follows: Is someone justified because he is regenerated, or is he regenerated because he will be justified? The answer here according to all of Scripture and according to the Protestant principle can only be the latter. For God, justification in His view is the basis, regeneration the consequence. If wrath and a relationship of punishment continued to exist, no new life would be able to germinate. God cannot communicate subjective habitual grace unless objective satisfaction of His justice is offered with specific application to the individual person. And not only does God, in infusing habitual grace, have in view the judicial relationship, restored or to be restored, but also in his conscious justification the sinner receives the insight that all that is habitual, which is already or will be worked in him, has its basis and origin in acquittal for the sake of Christ. And, accordingly, in the consciousness of God and in the consciousness of the sinner what occurs outwardly in the sphere of justice precedes what occurs inwardly in his moral condition.

b) It is equally necessary to hold firmly that for habitual grace, action on the unconscious essence precedes action on the conscious life. This is but an application of the general rule that what lies on the surface of life stems from the hidden impetus of the depth of life. From the root comes the mysterious life that is at work in the stem and the branches and causes fruit to ripen. So, if we place regeneration and conversion, or regeneration and faith, next to each other, conversion and faith cannot be first in time; on the contrary, regeneration precedes. If one sometimes hears the opposite sequence defended, this rests on a misconception to which we will have to return later.

c) One certainly needs to pay attention to the fact that the two distinctions, of acts that fall within the sphere of justice and acts that fall within the sphere of habitual grace, on the one hand, and of acts of grace that affect the root and acts of grace that affect the branches, on the other, do not run in parallel. Certainly, a saving act that falls in the judicial sphere is always a conscious act, in the original sense for the consciousness of God, in a derivative sense for the consciousness of the sinner. An act that produces habitual grace, however, is not always an act that works in the unconscious life. It can do so, and does, for example, in regeneration, but it need not do that and does not in sanctification and glorification. These two distinctions intersect each other.

9. Are the distinctions made here based on Scripture or are they merely human attempts to bring about an order in the multiplicity of phenomena of the work of grace?

They are based on Scripture and not only have practical significance but also reflect real relationships that exist between the different virtues of God. Therefore, one cannot change them without the greatest danger, for what one changes is not a subsidiary viewpoint, a perspective, but the fundamental conception of religion. That can be shown in particular on each of the points advanced above.

Concerning the first, the distinction between judicial actions and re-creating acts of grace, on this point the Roman Catholic and the Protestant churches diverge. The former thinks that the changed judicial relationship must have for its basis a change in the moral condition of the sinner, and so with that reintroduces the principle of justification by works that the Apostle Paul so powerfully combated. The latter maintains that all improvement and conversion must have acquittal in God's tribunal as its starting point, and so, on the contrary, makes works a consequence of justification. In the first case, man gets part of the honor for himself; in the second, God gets all the glory. But danger threatens here not only from the side of historic Roman Catholicism. There is a neo-Romanism that unconsciously honors the same principle. The endeavor is fairly common at present to deny the necessity of change in the judicial sphere as a condition for moral improvement. Almost all the emphasis falls on the ethical, on the reformation of man, as if there is no need to take account of God's justice. This is the opposite of antinomianism; it is a denial rather than a misuse of free grace. The character and capacities of man are elevated as a measure of the favor of God, and moral perfection is insisted on with full force. One would characterize this direction as moral legalism and distinguish it, as such, from the ceremonial legalism of the Jews and the Roman Catholic legalism that coincides with it. Under the appearance of holding high the moral ideal, it is in fact active in attacking this ideal at its heart, for only one who has a thorough sense of the guilt and inner accursedness of evil can possess an unadulterated appreciation and admiration of the good, which is a normal consequence of the former. Whoever preaches transformation without justification does not have the right conception of sin and improvement. He reckons only with the external side of sin under a utilitarian aspect; its deeper spiritual significance totally escapes him. By far the greatest part of the ethics presently preached from pulpits is of this kind. It demands a sanctification under which the indispensable foundation of justification is utterly lacking. From this, in part, is to be explained the ease with which some, despite the clear witness of Scripture, eliminate the doctrine of eternal punishment. The foundation of this doctrine is lacking in the conscience—namely, a deep sense of the necessity that God's justice be maintained. And the end of all this will be the weakening and falsifying of all moral distinctions.

It is almost superfluous to show that Scripture never loses sight of the order indicated above against Roman Catholicism and neo-Romanism. Paul's entire teaching rests on this distinction between sanctification and justification. A Christian loves much after much has been forgiven him, not the reverse: that much has been forgiven him because he loves much. The lost son received forgiveness before anything else. And the same thought recurs everywhere, so strongly in Paul that his opponents could take the occasion to hurl at him the recrimination of antinomianism (cf. Rom 6:1ff.), and he was forced to show expressly how moral transformation infallibly followed imputation—indeed, how in one and the same baptism both were pictured and the images of both fused together.

Also on the second point, Scripture does not leave us in the dark. It always distinguishes between what occurs beneath and in the consciousness. Romans 8:28–30 presents the chain of salvation with its different links. The practical purpose that the apostle has with this is to strengthen the believer in the consciousness that future glory cannot elude him. In line with that, he now enumerates precisely the acts of salvation that fall within the light of the consciousness, which enable looking forward and backward—namely, calling and justification as lying between election and glorification. This is a proof, therefore, of the genuinely biblical character of the distinction made, for what moves Paul here to limit himself to calling and justification is nothing other than the principle of that distinction that while some operations of grace are recognizable by the consciousness, others are not.

This principle, too, is of utmost weight. Whoever doubts that, along with the influence of grace in the conscious life, God's acts of grace intervene much more deeply and affect the inner essence of man, can do so only on the basis of a superficial view of sin. To allow everything to terminate in conscious life presupposes a Pelagian view of sin and all that is connected with it. What occurs in the consciousness naturally works mediately, persuasively, countering resistance. Only insofar as it surges from the inside out is grace entirely grace, a supernatural operation of power, an exclusive work of God. The distinction between foundational acts of grace at the outset, which intervene in a creative manner at critical moments, and the further ongoing uniform activity of grace is in no need of demonstration as scriptural. It is necessary, however, to emphasize that distinction because here, too, some seek to substitute slow development from natural causes for a sudden change worked by God.

10. What points must be examined in general before we proceed to discussing the particular acts of grace?

- a) The relationship between these operations of grace and the work of the Holy Spirit in the sphere of nature.
- b) The relationship between the operations of special grace and common grace, gratia communis.
- c) The relationship between special grace and Holy Scripture. d) The relationship between special grace and the person of the Mediator and the person of the Holy Spirit.

11. What is the nature of the relationship between the work of the Holy Spirit in the sphere of nature and that of grace?

a) A relationship of analogy or correspondence. In the kingdom of nature the Holy Spirit has His specific task, as well as the Father and the Son. He is the person who by His working leads things to their destined goal and development—who creates and maintains life in the realm of the organic, the rational, the reasonable. Likewise, in the kingdom of grace the Holy Spirit is the one who leads the elect sinner to his destined goal and development by creating and maintaining new life in him.

b) A relationship of subordination. What God does for someone through the Holy Spirit in the sphere of nature is not unconnected with what He intends for him in the kingdom of grace. The entire life of the elect, including that part that precedes their implanting into Christ, is ordered by God with a view to its final destined end. It is not immaterial how and where someone is born, which influences work on him, how he is raised, which direction the development of his life takes. Since the place to be occupied by someone in the kingdom of grace is determined by God and coheres closely with all of his earlier development, the latter cannot be left out of consideration in determining the former.

c) Notwithstanding this analogy and this subordination, there exists an essential difference between the working of the Holy Spirit in the sphere of nature and in the kingdom of grace. The latter is a new order of things that cannot be explained by the former, but rests on an immediate intervention of God's Spirit. Grace is not nature. It is certainly true that one also calls grace the natural guiding actions of God, with which He deals with the elect before their regeneration (gratia praeparans). But taking the word in this broad sense is not meant to deny the specific difference between the operations of the Spirit in nature and in grace. The word "grace" still has a twofold sense: (1) An attribute in God is called grace; (2) an influence on man that transcends natural influence bears that name. If now something that falls within the sphere of nature is called grace, then it is because the gracious purpose of God adheres to it. One and the same act can occur with respect to two persons and be grace in this sense for the one but not for the other. Still, the act remains specifically the same, and by this purpose is not set outside the sphere of nature. It is absolutely necessary to maintain the sharpest contrast between nature and grace.

12. What is the relationship between the operations of common grace and the special grace of the Holy Spirit?

To understand correctly the difference between these two in connection with the preceding distinction, we must move out of the sphere of nature into the sphere of revelation. This revelation is itself the product of a wholly supernatural act of grace. The announcement of the truth of God and the inspiration of the Holy Spirit lie both beyond and above nature. At the same time, however, that truth is given in natural forms. It is expressed in words written with letters, words that can be heard by the natural ear and read by the natural eye. As we hope to see, it is not the most proper and highest end of the truth to accomplish its work outwardly in this way; rather, it reaches its proper goal only when an entirely supernatural work of the Holy Spirit accompanies it. That it works in this way as well, however, no one can doubt. The only question, though, is how? If it were simply directed to man and nothing more, this encounter would only result in opposition and reaction from a soul that is sinful and hostile to God. That this nevertheless does not occur, but that even in those who are not regenerate the moral power of the truth is manifested, shows that there is an accompanying working of God's Spirit. That working of the Spirit is given to all in greater or lesser degree. It comes down, then, to separating it sharply from special grace, in which only the elect share. So that the distinction would already appear in the term, it has been called common grace, and what contrasts with it, special or particular grace. One further needs to give attention to making distinctions on the following points:

a) Common grace brings about no change in the nature of man as special grace does. Whatever may also be its external manifestations, it does not regenerate man.

b) A second distinction is connected with this. Common grace is also limited to making man receptive to the influence of the truth that works on him from his consciousness. It works persuasively, by offering motives to the will and by making use of inclinations that are already present, not by creating new habits in man. It can certainly bring the external good still present in man to development, but it cannot produce what is spiritually good from that. It can cause a seed of external righteousness to germinate, but it is not capable of implanting the seed of regeneration.

c) All that works in this manner can also be resisted. Since it is directed toward individual motives from outside, the possibility always exists that the unrenewed nature will overrule all these motives and render common grace powerless. It is otherwise with efficacious grace. It does not offer motives for doing good to a will that in its nature is evil, but transforms the will itself from the innermost recesses of its nature, not by countering it but by re-creating it. Hence, common grace is termed resistible; efficacious grace, with a somewhat oblique label, irresistible.

13. Does one sometimes also speak of "common grace" in a still broader sense?

Yes, one sometimes also applies the word to the restraining action of the Holy Spirit that, where revelation is not known, is joined with the natural knowledge of God and hinders the breaking out of sin in its most dreadful extremes.

14. From what may we discern in some measure what should be ascribed to the operation of this common grace?

We have seen in the doctrine of election that God's Word rightly ascribes the hardening of sinners to the withdrawal of common grace. It calls this being given over to a perverse mind and shows from experience what dreadful dimensions sin assumes where this hardening sets in. On the other hand, it also describes for us the fate of the lost who are devoid of common grace. Consequently, everything that hinders the process of death that sin brings in producing the complete dissolution of moral and social life for the individual and for society is to be ascribed to gratia communis in the broadest sense of the word.

15. Can you show that Scripture teaches such an operation of the Holy Spirit?

Yes, it is said of the generation that lived before the flood that God's Spirit contended with them and contended in vain, that the patience of God at the time of this contending held back His punishment, but that finally this operation of grace ceased since it was resisted and scorned (Gen 6:3; cf. 1 Pet 3:19–20; 4:6). Stephen cried out to the Jews, "You always resist the Holy Spirit; as your fathers did, so do you" (Acts 7:51). Also, Isaiah 63:10 mentions a grieving of the Holy Spirit.

16. How far can this common operation of the Holy Spirit go?

We must assume that it always remains distinguished specifically from regenerating grace. So, concerning the operation itself, one really cannot speak of it approaching the grace of regeneration. What lies between these two is not a gradual but a principial difference. Whatever else one may do to a dead person, one cannot say that actions are performed on him that bring him close to life. Since, however, the infusion of life eludes our sight and we can judge it only by its outward manifestation, so the possibility always continues to exist that common grace reveals itself in forms that are hardly to be distinguished from the actions of the regenerate. Temporary faith, of which Scripture speaks in very strong terms, must be counted among these cases. And often the sole criterion for recognition lies in the passing of time itself.

17. Are the effects of common grace divorced from any connection with regenerating grace, which works only in the elect? No; if by common grace someone has received a certain measure of insight into the truth prior to his regeneration, be it then also in a non-saving way, its fruits are not lost. When saving grace comes upon us, it imparts new worth to all the old that was already present with us earlier. It only must be maintained that it never is the old as such that continues to work after regeneration, but the old is placed in a new light and with completely new qualities. The knowledge of saving faith is very much connected with historical knowledge that someone gained prior to his regeneration, but it would still certainly be wrong to maintain that a regenerate person does not know, in his faith, in an essentially different way than the unregenerate person.

18. Has the doctrine of common grace also been misused? [very good here!]

Yes, some have wished to find in it a solution to the question why saving grace befalls only some and not all—in other words, an explanation of God's sovereign election. Shedd says the following: "The non-elect receives common grace, and common grace would incline human will if it were not defeated by the human will. If the sinner should make no hostile opposition, common grace would be equivalent to saving grace. To say that common grace if not resisted by the sinner would be equivalent to regenerating grace is not the same as to say that common grace if assisted by the sinner would be equivalent to regenerating grace. In the first instance, God would be the sole author of regeneration; in the second He would not be.” Yet in another place he maintains, “Regeneration rests upon God’s election ... upon special grace and not upon common grace.” Thus it is not very clear what he intends. If, of themselves, all sinners already resist common grace, then it makes no sense to say that it would regenerate them if they did not resist it, for non-resisting means the same as being no longer sinful. If, on the other hand, a sinner is able to resist and not resist common grace, and some are really in the latter category, then for them, according to this conception, regenerating grace becomes completely superfluous. Common grace should work on them and regenerate them. This idea is completely false. God’s election lies above every consideration of the use of common grace. One can only go this far: Those who resist common grace such that God withdraws it do not belong to the elect. They are then abandoned to the hardening from which salvation is no longer possible. On the other hand, it cannot be maintained that a good use of common grace always leads to receiving saving grace or is even a characteristic of election. Certainly in a negative sense, if someone resists common grace, then this is a bad sign. But we may not go further.

Regeneration and Calling

1. What is regeneration?

Regeneration is an immediate re-creation of the sinful nature by God the Holy Spirit and an implanting into the body of Christ.

2. Is it a judicial or a re-creating act?

The latter. In regeneration the condition and not the state of man is changed.

3. Does regeneration occur in the consciousness or below the consciousness?

Below the consciousness. It is totally independent from what occurs in the consciousness. It can therefore be effected where the consciousness slumbers.

4. Is regeneration a slow process or an instantaneous action?

It is an instantaneous action that is the basis for a long development in grace.

5. Is regeneration concerned with the removal of the old or the enlivening of the new? Regeneration includes both. However, one can rightly maintain that the latter has prominence.

6. Is regeneration a mediate or an immediate act of God?

It is immediate in the strict sense. No instrument is employed for it.

7. Which words in Scripture designate regeneration?

a)The first term is gennēthēnai anōthen [Greek word], which appears in John 3:3, 7; gennēthēnai ex hydatos kai pneumatatos (John 3:5); palinngenesia (Titus 3:5); anagennēthēnai (1 Pet 1:3, 23); ek theou gennēthēnai (1 John 2:29; 3:9; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18).

1.Concerning the places where gennēthēnai appears, the passive meaning of this term must be noted first. It literally means “to be generated.” By this is expressed as strongly as possible that regeneration is an act of God, in which man remains passive. When one considers the birth of a child it could perhaps still be maintained that it is accompanied by some movement of the child itself. But “to be regenerated” excludes any such movement in principle and fixes us on the activity of the one who regenerates.

2.Anōthen gennēthēnai does not mean, as Meyer and others assert, “being born from above.” It is certainly true that anōthen can have this local meaning, but the context shows that this is not the case here. After all, in John 3:4 anōthen is replaced by deuteron, “for the second time.” And Nicodemus is not surprised by the fact that this birth must come from above, but by the fact that it must take place a second time. If he had thought “from above,” he could not have posed the question, “Can someone enter a second time into his mother’s womb and be born?” “Again,” however, has the deeper meaning “anew” here, so what is required is an absolute beginning. Not that half of what is connected with generation or birth must be repeated, but man must again undergo being born anew. Compare Galatians 4:9: “which you want to serve again [palin] anew [anōthen].”

3.Thus, something occurs that is a repetition of the first birth. The point of similarity is this: In natural birth man has received from his father and mother a carnal, corrupt nature: “What is born of the flesh is flesh” (John 3:6); “... are born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man” (John 1:13). In regeneration he receives a spiritual nature. The similarity does not go further. It is by no means being denied that the first birth is connected with the genesis of the substance of the soul and the formation of the person, while by regeneration the substance is not removed and replaced by another, but, like the person, it remains the same as it was before.

4.It is a birth ex hydatos kai pneumatatos, “of water and Spirit.” This refers to baptism, and, according to a sacramental manner of speaking, what is attributed to the sign belongs to the thing signified. Baptism portrays two things: the washing away and cleansing of what is sinful, and the imparting of what is pure and new. “Water” and “Spirit” thus stand for the two sides of God’s re-creative work: “the removal of the old” and “the imparting of the new.” Compare Ezekiel 36:25–27, where they are likewise placed side by side: “I will sprinkle clean water on you, and you shall be clean.... And I will give you a new heart, and a new spirit I will put within you.... And I will give you my Spirit.” One should note that “water” and “Spirit” occur here without an article, because baptism does not so much have in view a specific application of water and a specific activity of the Spirit as the character of water and Spirit in general. The water is the cleansing element; the Spirit is the generator of life. Thus, all told: “For someone a renewal of nature must take place, in which he is cleansed of sin and receives new life within himself.”

5. The same sense is present in Titus 3:5. Baptism is a bath from which one emerges washed and renewed. Thus, the work of regeneration has two sides: cleansing and renewal. The Holy Spirit is the one who effects this, and He is richly poured out by Jesus Christ the Savior (Titus 3:6). The palingenesia spoken of here puts the emphasis more on what occurs in man; it is literally “regeneration.”

We believe, accordingly, that by regeneration is to be understood: (1) an act done exclusively by God; (2) a renewal of nature; (3) an act that has two sides—the removal of the old life [by the cleansing of water] [and an imparting of a new life [by the Spirit]; (4) an act in which the Holy Spirit appears as the one who produces this new life; (5) an act in which the Holy Spirit works out of Christ and jointly with Christ.

b) In Paul we have a series of terms that clearly express the same matter: “For neither is circumcision anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creation [kainē ktisis]” (Gal 6:15). “Therefore, if anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation” (2 Cor 5:17). “For we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works” (Eph 2:10). “Even when we were dead in trespasses, He made us alive with Christ” (Eph 2:5). “From Him you are in Christ Jesus, who has become to us wisdom from God and righteousness and sanctification and redemption” (1 Cor 1:30). “For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has set me free from the law of sin and death” (Rom 8:2). “We then were buried with Him by baptism into death, so that as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, we too should walk in newness of life” (Rom 6:4).

Here, too, we reach the same result: (1) Regeneration is an immediate work of God by which man is totally passive, a new creation; (2) it effects a renewal of nature; (3) it has two sides, a burial of the old man and an enlivening of the new; (4) the Holy Spirit is the one who produces this new life; (5) the Holy Spirit does this jointly with Christ; it is the law of the Spirit of the life in Christ that frees from the law of sin and of death.

c) Particular mention is due those scriptural passages that speak of regeneration as a renewal of the heart. “Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a steadfast spirit deep within me” (Psa 51:10). “I will remove the heart of stone from their flesh and give them a heart of flesh” (Ezek 11:19). It is necessary at this point to keep in view accurately the biblical concept of “heart,” levav, lev, kardia, in contrast to psychē and pneuma, nephesh, and ruach, which were already discussed earlier. The heart is the seat of the potency that determines our nature, the center of our being that indicates the direction and predisposition of all that occurs in our spiritual life. It is therefore something that lies still more deeply than personal self-consciousness, for the latter is merely the reflection in the conscious life of the unity and uniformity of the soul, as we saw earlier in the scriptural terms psychē, nephesh. What is meant by “heart” can become clear from Proverbs 4:23, “Keep your heart with all vigilance, for out of it flow the issues of life.” The heart is therefore also the place where the Holy Spirit, who renews the nature and governs the new life, makes His abode. “The love of God has been poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us” (Rom 5:5). “God has sent the Spirit of His Son into your hearts” (Gal 4:6). To the heart is ascribed the predisposition and basic inclinations in which the personality and nature manifest themselves: “according to your hardness and your impenitent heart” (Rom 2:5); “an honest and good heart” (Luke 8:15); “love from a pure heart” (1 Tim 1:5); “an evil, unbelieving heart” (Heb 3:12); “a true heart” (Heb 10:22); “the pure in heart” (Matt 5:8). In all these cases, psychē could not be used. The “heart,” therefore, is something that man cannot judge, that evades our observation, and that only God in His omniscience knows and searches (Matt 15:8; Luke 16:15). All that is good wells up from the heart, and all that is evil arises from the heart. “The good man brings forth good out of the good treasure of his heart” (Luke 6:45). “For from within, out of the heart of man, arise evil thoughts, sexual immorality, etc.” (Mark 7:21).

It is now of the greatest importance for the doctrine of regeneration that it is presented as a renewal of the heart. Over the heart lies the veil, and in the heart shines the light [see diagram!] (2 Cor 3:15; 4:6; 2 Pet 1:19); with the heart one believes (Rom 10:10); the heart is directed to the love of God holiness communicated to the will – see Edwards on this at [code34b, and Vos at code453] (2 Thess 3:5). Therefore, by this, every conception that in the renewal of man God works from the circumference to the center is excluded. On the contrary, He works from the center to the periphery, regenerates the heart, and by this in principle the nature is reversed in all its expressions, or at least given a formative capacity that works against the old nature.

8. How is the usage of scriptural language regarding “calling” connected with the doctrine of regeneration?

As we know, many older theologians treat regeneration under “calling.” They speak of a twofold calling: an external calling (vocatio externa) that occurs through the preaching of the Word, and an internal or effectual calling (vocatio interna, vocatio efficax) that occurs through the operation of the Holy Spirit in the heart. These terms are not chosen arbitrarily. They occupy a rather large place in scriptural usage, and since theological terminology ought to keep as closely as possible to God’s Word, we may not push them aside. However, the question arises whether in Scripture “calling” is in fact understood as the same thing that we have come to know as “regeneration.” The answer to this must be twofold: yes, concerning the essence of the thing; no, concerning the viewpoint from which the same thing is considered. The difference is in the following two points:

- a) Regeneration occurs below the consciousness; it cannot be observed by man himself and is altogether independent of every relationship that he could adopt toward it. To speak with complete precision, one cannot assume a stance toward his regeneration, since it is not placed objectively before his consciousness. It is otherwise with calling. This occurs in the consciousness, is directed to the consciousness, and demands a certain relationship to the consciousness. This is already contained in the term “calling.” A calling comes from outside; a rebirth works from the inside out.
- b) Connected with this, regeneration is a physical act. Calling is a teleological act, directed to a certain end. One is regenerated from one condition into another; one is called to something.

With calling a certain endpoint is brought into view, with the prospect that one would reach this endpoint, or also a certain rule prescribed that one should follow. One would now be able to say that if this representation is correct (as will presently be shown in detail), then it is a contradiction in adjecto [in terms] to speak of an “internal calling.” If “calling” is always something that comes from outside and presupposes a hearing, then calling cannot be internal, and it is a misuse of the word to indicate regeneration by it.

It cannot be doubted that by the use of “calling” in the sense described above, the older theology has obscured the two points of difference mentioned. Still, in this use it was led by a correct consideration. What drove it was the conviction that the working of God’s grace may not be detached from the Word of God. If one speaks solely of regeneration, that still does not include anything that recalls that the Word is a necessary concomitant element of re-creating grace. If, on the other hand, one speaks of calling, everyone immediately senses that saving grace closely follows the proclamation of objective truth and does not go beyond the limits drawn by this proclamation, even though it is not coextensive with the external hearing of the gospel. Hence some have spoken of an “external calling.” To that is then tied the internal calling, in order by the similarity of the name to be reminded anew what connection God had laid between His Word and grace.

With that, however, the use of the term “internal calling” for “regeneration” is not yet fully justified. While a thing may be always accompanied by another thing, I still have no right to designate it by the name of the other, especially if the specific essence of the thing is thereby overlooked. Thus, there must be another ground for the designation “internal calling.” That ground is as follows: One can present God’s work of grace under two viewpoints—as it occurs below the consciousness, and as it is reflected in the consciousness. The former is a more complete and theological view, the latter a more partial and practical view.

Vos states later: At regeneration that spiritual death is broken in principle, in sanctification the struggle is continued,” pg 1101

Is there a space of time between regeneration the effectual calling? This is interesting and makes sense.

Now, the fact that the first Christian congregations were mostly gathered by the sudden conscious addition of believers led inadvertently to the last, more practical view. The implanting of life in the heart and the hearing of that newly awakened life at the calling of the gospel occurred practically in the same moment. There were no reasons to presuppose a passing of time between the two. Because it coincided in this way with calling, regeneration could appropriately be termed “calling.” Or, expressed more precisely, regeneration, as the invisible background, could for the moment be left out of consideration. The first thing one noted about it was calling. And now it needs to be granted that calling did not enter the consciousness as an external, general conception and offer of the gospel. It entered the consciousness of those who were being added as it was applied (made personal and compelling by the Holy Spirit), so that they immediately realized that an internal change had taken place that had been accomplished by an act of God’s power. When a sinner hears this calling of God, he does not deliberate or reason, but is drawn and irresistibly compelled to follow. [That’s the way it was with me!! There was no choice involved; one moment I was blind; the next moment I could see and believed; it wasn't a choice between serving Satan or God as though I was before a candy bar and was trying to decide which candy bar I wanted. It was one moment I was in darkness, not believing, then in a flash, I was believing!] Thus a certain reflex of the nature of regeneration appears in his consciousness, and that is calling. One will therefore easily perceive what ground there is for continuing to speak of an internal calling and to place it next to external calling as distinguished from it and yet closely connected with it by name. When regeneration has worked on the consciousness, it immediately manifests itself as a totally new perception of the omnipotent might of the Word of God, to which one must submit, a Word that speaks as a word of power and, as it were, creates the obedience of faith. Thus, as one is called with power in his conscious life and comes, so at the center of his being one is called out with creating omnipotence from death and brought over into life as by a powerful creating word of God. And both lie so closely to one another that one may designate them with one name.

By this, however, is indicated the particular limitation of the concept of "calling." It cannot be applied everywhere. Only in a place where, without remaining hidden for a long time, internal re-creation immediately manifests itself in the consciousness can one rightly speak of regeneration as "internal calling." [It is] not with the same right, on the other hand, when one has to do with children. For them, regeneration does not as yet take the form of a calling—that is, it does not manifest itself in their consciousness as an act of God by which, also for their own awareness, they are called out from the one condition into the other. Of a child one says that it is regenerated and not that it is called.

The question now is only whether one has grounds to assume for adults that regeneration and calling are separated by a considerable period of time. A further distinction must be made here. For those who do not yet live under the administration of the covenant of grace, there is no ground to suppose such an interval. There the seed of regeneration is implanted and usually sprouts immediately. With the children of the covenant, the possibility always exists that they were born again long before their consciousness is awakened. If such is the case with those who die before they are able to comprehend, it is difficult to see why this could not also be the case with many who later give evidence of true godliness and yet who are unable to point to a specific time in their conscious life at which they were effectually called. Conversely, however, there is no evidence that such early regeneration is the rule for children of the covenant. We cannot bind God here. In particular, the idea that someone would be regenerated, and yet in his own consciousness would remain uncalled for years on end, seems unacceptable, for it presupposes an illusory connection between what is internal and what is external.

9. Show from Scripture that calling is viewed in this way.

a) First, concerning the use of the term for external calling, that is, the proclamation of the gospel, we have the use of the word as of an invitation to a wedding (Matt 22:3, 9; Luke 14:8; cf. John 2:2, "and Jesus was also called," that is, invited; 1 Cor 10:27). In Matthew 20:16 [Textus Receptus] we have a contrast between the many "called," klētoi, and the few "chosen," eklektōi. Here, external calling is not only distinguished from internal calling but even separated from it. What is spoken of is a calling of sinners to conversion (Luke 5:32).

b) That calling is a work of grace taking place in the consciousness is established from Romans 8:30, as developed above. Besides, it follows from the imagery of 1 Peter 2:9: “So that you may proclaim the excellencies of the one who called you out of darkness into His marvelous light.” Clearly, light nowhere stands for life as something unconscious, but always for life as it manifests itself in the consciousness. To be brought out of darkness into the light thus means to be brought from the alienation of the consciousness from God into clarity in the awareness of being allied with God, and to a clear knowledge of the truth.

c) Next, as we have said, calling is an act directed to a certain goal and revealing that goal to the consciousness of the one called. Also, where the word of internal efficacious calling is present, it clearly never loses this character of a concept of purpose, as already appears from the fact that it can be connected with the preposition “to,” eis, or “in,” en. God calls believers “to” eternal life (1 Tim 6:12); “into the fellowship of His Son Jesus Christ our Lord” (1 Cor 1:9); “to freedom” (Gal 5:13); “not to impurity but to sanctification” (1 Thess 4:7); “to peace” (1 Cor 7:15); “to one hope of calling” (Eph 4:4); “in one body” (Col 3:15); “so that you may inherit blessing” (1 Pet 3:9).

Calling, then, is also always presented by Paul as a ground of comfort for the believer that enables him to look beyond his own shortcomings and instances of unfaithfulness and to the unfaltering faithfulness of the God who calls. In calling, God, as it were, has bound Himself to the believer and established the covenant bond, so that from now on there is no longer any doubt whether he will reach the goal. “The gifts and calling of God are irrevocable” (Rom 11:29). “He who calls you is faithful, who will also do it” (1 Thess 5:24). The idea of calling deserves more attention than it has so far had. The fact that it has become the general name for regeneration has caused its specific meaning to be lost from sight. And yet in its distinctiveness it is a rich concept that in the letters of Paul, for example, occupies a prominent place.

d) Naturally, all this does not detract from calling as an act of power. This is already included in the word. “Calling” is not persuading or discussing, but bringing about an instantaneous effect by a word or the naming of a name, so that the one who is called comes. In this sense calling—as internal, efficacious calling—extends just as far as election. “Those He foreordained, these He also called, and those He called, these He also justified” [Rom 8:30]. The called are the same as the elect. They are “called according to His purpose” (Rom 8:28); named “called saints” (1 Cor 1:2; Rom 1:7; 1 Thess 2:12; 4:7). It is expressly said, then, that calling is an act of omnipotence: “God calls the things that are not as though they were” (Rom 4:17, where the reference is to the extraordinary birth of Isaac). And in Romans 9:11, it is said “that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works but of Him who calls.” Here calling stands as God’s work par excellence over against man’s work, and it is testified of God’s election that it is intended to reveal how salvation is entirely of the God who calls.

10. How then can you define external calling?

As the presentation of the gospel to sinners in general by the preaching of the Word.

11. How, on the other hand, can internal or effectual calling be defined?

As the transferring of the elect sinner in his own consciousness from the state of alienation from God into the state of fellowship with God (the covenant of grace), and that certainly by means of the external word, applied internally by the Holy Spirit.

12. How can one relate internal calling and regeneration to each other?

By saying that:

a) If we consider the one who calls, God, regeneration is an effect of calling. "Calling" then means the act of calling, as it is in God and as it embraces the sinner.

b) If we consider being called as what occurs in the one who is called, then calling is the effect of regeneration, for the ear is first opened by the latter so that it can recognize the voice of the God who calls. "Calling" then means being called and knowing oneself to be called.

c) If we take the matter in its full scope, we must say that calling, as it were, encompasses regeneration from beginning to end. It precedes and follows it, according to whether one draws attention to the consciousness of God or to the consciousness of the sinner who is called. It hardly needs to be mentioned that this preceding and following is not to be taken in a strictly temporal sense.

13. Is it necessary to say that the sequence of the acts of grace is: (1) calling, (2) regeneration?

Some have proposed that in order to, in this way, arrive at a clear distinction. Although one can now readily say, in the sense just described, that regeneration follows calling, there are still objections to this manner of representation.

a) In doing this one runs the danger of losing sight of the fact that calling has an essential significance for the consciousness of the sinner. In fact, one then restricts the name to the action of God in order to call the other, the effect of the action as that which causes change, regeneration.

b) On the other hand, it is wrong to so restrict regeneration that it becomes only the product, the outcome, the transition, while the activity of God is omitted. Scripture emphasizes that we are regenerated, that God regenerates us according to His will, etc. (Jas 1:18).

14. What ground does one have to understand the concept of regeneration in the wider sense, which, for example, Calvin ascribes to it?

This is based on some scriptural passages that do not speak directly of regeneration but of "a putting off of the old man" and "a putting on of the new man" and "a being renewed in the spirit of the mind" (Eph 4:22–24). Romans 12:2 speaks of the same thing. Second Corinthians 4:16 speaks of a renewal in the inner man that takes place day by day.

All these expressions, however, have in view more the transformation of something old than the creation of something new. And it is just the new principle of life poured into the sinner that in its outworking brings about this transformation of the old. Renewal is not regeneration, but presupposes regeneration. Thus the command can come to man that he must make for himself “a new heart and a new spirit.” However, nowhere in Scripture is the command directed to someone that he must regenerate himself. That command always comes in the form of “arise from the dead.”

15. Who is the author of regeneration?

a) It is God the Father by way of eminence. Since regeneration appears as something completely new, it fits with the economy of the Father that regeneration is ascribed to Him. “According to his great mercy, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ has begotten us again to a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead” (1 Pet 1:3; cf. also Jas 1:18; Eph 2:5; and the expression “born of God,” 1 John 5:1, 4, 18).

b) The Son is related to regeneration in more than one way.

1. He is the meriting cause. He has obtained the Holy Spirit, who works all subjective grace, and so has also obtained regeneration (Rom 5:18).

2. He is the head to whom believers are joined as members by regeneration, and who thus lives in them and expresses His life in them (Gal 2:20).

3. He is the image into which the believers are transformed in regeneration and to which continually they are also being increasingly conformed (1 Cor 15:49; Gal 4:19).

c) The Holy Spirit is the one who effects regeneration for the sake of the Father and the Son in the heart of the sinner, as He in general organizes the mystical body of Christ.

16. Is regeneration a mediate or immediate act of God? Is it or is it not brought about by any instrument?

God does not use any kind of instrument in regenerating a sinner. An instrument is never used to create something new, but always only to effect a change in what already exists. With a surgical instrument some part of a living body can be treated, a diseased part removed, but the most advanced instrument cannot possibly produce life in a dead body.

17. Is not the Word of God an instrument by which regeneration is achieved? No. On the one hand, this would lead us to the Pelagian or semi-Pelagian view, or, on the other hand, cause us to revert to the Lutheran idea of an inherent magical capacity for the Word of God. In order to reach clarity on this point, one must make plain how truth works on man. It in fact works in a spiritual sense, as every physical instrument does in a physical sense, but then not in such a way that the act would lie entirely in the cause. It is always the case that the cause acts, and that to which it is directed then reacts, and so the effect occurs. The result, therefore, depends as much on the object that undergoes the action as on the acting cause.

Now, if the truth is the cause, then it will only produce effects in us because our soul responds, reacts to it. If the truth is to have an effect in which there is life, then this can only be as it brings about an expression of life in my soul as the response. So, in order for the truth to become effective instrumentally for life, I already need to have life in me. Therefore, anyone who has the truth accomplishing regeneration through motivations teaches that man is not entirely dead. [Key point to counter Pelagian/Arminianism] That is, he teaches in a Pelagian or semi-Pelagian fashion. A motivation works on me only through what I am. A motivation that awakens a reaction in me will leave my neighbor unmoved, not because the motivation is different, but simply because the person with whom it is brought in contact differs from me. If we want to escape this Pelagianism, then nothing remains except, with the Lutherans, to locate life in the Word.

However, one may then perceive clearly that every analogy between the Word as causa efficiens [efficient cause] and every ordinary causa instrumentalis [instrumental cause] collapses. Not one instrument works in this way, by causing an overflowing of an inherent power. On close inspection, then, for Lutherans, too, the Word is no longer a means of grace or an instrument of grace; it has become a source of grace. It takes the place of God, for it belongs only to God to act so immediately on things that His effective power does not engage their reaction. Rather, as He works entirely alone, He imparts qualities to them or changes their habits. Basically, therefore, the Lutherans gain nothing when they suppose they are maintaining the instrumentality of the Word. The Word slips out of their hands and becomes a magic wand.

18. What by nature is the disposition of man toward the truth?

Scripture declares that by virtue of his natural birth, man is flesh, and the mind of the flesh is enmity against God [Rom 8:7]. Now, it is in the truth that God Himself is brought into contact with this sinful flesh. For this reason already, the result of this contact cannot be the beginning of spiritual life. Indeed, it cannot change hate when the hated object is brought nearer. That would rather incite hate. Yet, according to this instrumental understanding of regeneration, it would be sufficient to place the object of enmity before the inimical consciousness in order immediately to change enmity into love.

26. Does regeneration consist in a change of the soul's capacities, of either one or more of these capacities?

This, too, cannot be said. Such a change does indeed flow from regeneration. When God re-creates man, there is in fact an enlightening of his mind, a reversing of his will, and a purifying of his affections. But these three sides of the spiritual life of man are most closely tied to each other; in its root, they are one. That unity may be incomprehensible and inconceivable for us, since it never comes into the light of our consciousness. And all of which we ourselves are aware is always thinking, willing, and feeling. But still, that unity exists as surely as the unity of our soul exists. There is a hidden source from which our life springs where these three streams are one, a stem from which these three branches sprout. At this source, God performs His miracle of regeneration. There He infuses the new principle of life. And since it is the source that pollutes the water, the stem that sends up the sap of life into the branches, so from this implanting of life a new disposition and efficacy flows for our understanding, our will, and our affections (Matt 12:33, 35; 15:19). Pg 657

27. Can you show that the re-creation of a single capacity is not sufficient to regenerate the sinner if God does not renew the root of his life and thereby also regenerate the other capacities?

This can easily be shown. If we assume, as some have done, that God produces only an enlightening in the intellect of the sinner and leaves the person's will unchanged, what will be the consequence of this? Man, with his enlightened intellect, will then see for himself the things of God, all the truths of salvation in their proper objective relations, and be able to explain the ins and outs of everything in the minutest detail, as a mechanic takes apart a machine and puts it together. His will, however, will directly oppose the truth, even though he grasps with his intellect the obligation to submit himself to it. The intellect alone cannot overturn the will or incline it. One is indeed accustomed to saying [that] the intellect pronounces its judgment, and then the will follows the final judgment of the intellect. This, however, is very misleading without further explanation. Clearly, the will follows the judgment of the intellect in a moral being, but what this final judgment of the intellect will be depends again, in turn, on the will. In expressing its judgment, the intellect is subservient to the will. Our will has a certain tendency: good or evil, holy or unholy, acting with God's will or against it. Our intellect judges what decision of our will squares with it, and on that basis the will follows this judgment of the intellect. The opposite view is purely rationalistic. Our will does not simply let itself be commanded by the intellect. The known truth always works through the reaction of the inclinations of our will. If, now, every good tendency is lacking in the will, then there is nothing on which the truth can act and to which it can react, and all the knowledge of angels will not produce a better disposition of the will. A sinner whose intellect was enlightened and who kept his old, completely sinful will would be the most miserable and terrifying creature in the world—the victim of the most dreadful disharmony—for his sinful will and his sinful pure knowledge would constantly work against each other. But such cases do not occur. God gives no one a saving enlightening of the intellect without at the same time renewing the will.

The situation is no different with the relationship between the will and the affections, or the capacity for emotion. Our will does not work apart from our emotional life any more than the intellect works apart from the will. In all the operations of the will, the impulse of the emotions plays a part that accompanies every spiritual function to a greater or lesser degree. He whose will is united with God's will engenders a delight in the law of God according to the inner man [Rom 7:22]. On the other hand, he whose will works against God's will finds enjoyment in sin.

If we now were to assume that God has re-created the will but left the capacity for emotion unchanged, the result would again be an untenable situation. Man would will what God wills, but it would leave him entirely unmoved and unfeeling, without any involvement of the heart. He would fulfill the commandments of the Lord with his will like a machine. Every warmth and ardor would be absent. Indeed, worse than this, if his unclesed affections were still in him, at the same time he fulfilled the Lord's will he would detest it, so that his condition would be called most lamentable.

Finally, without an enlightened intellect neither a sanctified will nor a cleansed emotional life would avail. It is true: Someone who has a good will and pure emotions knows more and better than someone whose will is hardened and whose emotions are depraved. But that is only true where the condition of the intellect is the same for both. The best will and purest emotions cannot enlighten a darkened intellect. The light must come, not from within the will, but from outside it. And as long as that is lacking, the will and the emotions cannot work rightly.

28. To what extent can one say that the enlightenment of the intellect precedes the operation of the will and emotions?

It does not precede so far as proper, immediate regeneration is concerned. In regeneration, the re-creation of intellect, will, and emotion occurs simultaneously in a single moment, without one of these three preceding the others. On the other hand, certainly one can speak of a precedence concerning the manifestation of regeneration in the consciousness. The will and the affections cannot operate unless they have content, an object with which they are occupied. This object, this content, must have been given to them by the capacity to know, and certainly been given in the right form— that is, by an enlightened intellect. For this reason, the enlightened intellect is first in order of the three capacities in which regeneration manifests itself. And so it can appear that the will only need be suffused with the light of the intellect in order to reach out immediately toward what is known. However, this is no more than appearance. Basically, the will was already changed, for that will, too, was embedded in the root of life, in which the miraculous change was wrought by God's Spirit.

29. Show that regeneration produces an enlightening of the intellect.

This is presupposed everywhere, even to the extent that the images in which regeneration is pictured to us are often derived from the noetic life. "For God, who said that light should shine out of darkness, has shone in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor 4:6). "The natural man does not understand the things that are of the Spirit of God ... and he cannot understand them because they are spiritually discerned. But the spiritual man judges all things, but he himself is judged by no one" (1 Cor 2:14–15). In this last passage it is even said of believers that they have the mind, the gift of spiritual discernment, of Christ (1 Cor 2:16; cf. further Eph 1:18; Phil 1:9; Col 3:10; 1 John 4:7; 5:20).

The difference between this knowledge of one who is regenerated and that of a natural man may only be experienced and can never be sufficiently described. It does not exclusively consist in the degree of more or less clarity, but it is a difference in quality. It rests on the entire change of being. Before regeneration, one can certainly have in himself and reproduce logical concepts and the connection of these concepts—indeed, make himself thoroughly familiar with them—but the right consciousness of the reality to which they correspond is lacking. One cannot empathize with them and penetrate them. It is, in a word, an external and not an experiential knowledge that one has of the truth. This analogy cannot be maintained in all respects, but still it has been said: As someone blind from birth cannot form a conception of colors, so someone who is unregenerate has no comprehension of the spiritual sense of God's truth.

30. Show that regeneration produces a renewing of the will.

This is taught, among other places, in Philippians 2:13: "It is God who works in you, both to will and to work for His good pleasure." If this applies to the continuation of spiritual life, so will it apply all the more to its beginning (cf. Heb 13:21; Psa 110:3; 2 Thess 3:6).

31. How does God move the will of man?

In a manner that accords with the freedom and the spontaneous character of the will—not, therefore, by placing Himself against the will and bending it with force [see code380b]; also not by a physical or unspiritual power that occurs in baptism, as the Roman Catholics contend; but by bringing about a reversal in the root of life, out of which the will itself arises. The result of this, then, is that the will of itself works in the opposite direction than was previously the case, and that no longer unwillingly but spontaneously, willingly.

32. Do we mean that the Holy Spirit only changes the expressions of the will—"willing"—or that He also renews the more deeply lying will, the direction of the will, the tendency of the soul?

The latter is meant. What takes place is not merely a change in actions but a change in the permanent disposition of the will. Even if for an instant there is no expression of the will—if, for example, a regenerate person is in an unconscious condition—even then there is a great difference between him and an unregenerate person in an unconscious condition. The will of the former is directed toward God; the will of the latter away from God. Single actions of the will are only manifestations of this difference in disposition. The so-called "exercise scheme" of Emmons teaches that there is nothing in the soul but a succession of expressions of the will, "exercises," and that to initiate such a succession is the work of regeneration. This is both theologically and psychologically wrong. There is much more in the soul than its substance and expressions of conscious life. The substance has its capacities, and these have their dispositions that must first be reversed before a good action can begin.

33. Show that regeneration also produces a recreation of the emotional life of man.

Scripture speaks of believers having a joy in Christ Jesus that is inexpressible and glorious (1 Pet 1:8). Through regeneration, a life comes into existence that can hunger and thirst after God and His righteousness. Hunger and thirst presuppose not merely a tendency of the will toward God but also that emotion accompanies it. Natural hunger and thirst create a physical feeling; spiritual hunger and thirst a spiritual feeling (Psa 42:1–2; 63:1–2). No less is spiritual sorrow mentioned as the characteristic of a regenerated person (Matt 5:4; Psa 34:18; Isa 66:2).

34. Is the entire nature of man renewed by regeneration, so that nothing remains to be renewed?

No, for everything would then be included in regeneration, and sanctification would become superfluous. The conception of Scripture is much more that the renewing activity of the Holy Spirit does not immediately remove all evil from us and replace it with a completely holy and good person, but that He effects renewal at one point in order from there to cause His renewing and sanctifying work to take hold in increasingly wider circles. Thus, there is sin within the regenerate as well as within the unregenerate. Also, as long as the former is here on earth, he cannot perform anything into which sin does not flow. His best works are still tainted with evil. But while in the sinner before his regeneration there cannot be a single thought or motion of the will or expression of emotion that arises from a good foundation, since evil always lurks in the deepest foundation of life, in the regenerate person another foundation has now been laid, a new principle created; spiritual life is present. Now, it does remain true that all the actions of this spiritual life, as soon as they press toward the circumference of life, inevitably become tarnished by the sinful remnants of his nature. But in their origin they are still something entirely different than the most pleasing deeds of the sinner dead in sin. It is also true that this new principle of life, worked by the Holy Spirit, does not have the power in itself to be able to survive. If it were left to itself, it would soon be overgrown and smothered by the weeds. But it does not exist on its own. The eternal power of life of the Holy Spirit is behind it and works in it. Therefore, not only can it not die, but it must also prove to be more powerful than the sin that has remained in its nature.

Every attempt, however, to try explaining psychologically how this new principle of life relates to sin committed after regeneration will certainly have to fail. We only know from Scripture and experience that in the regenerate a noticeable conflict exists, so that occasionally some have spoken of two persons, which of course can only apply in a very figurative sense. Still, to make the matter clear, one perhaps gets the farthest with images. We are reminded of the grafting-in of a cultivated sprig on a wild stem, by which the latter, although not immediately becoming completely cultivated, still so functions that it produces cultivated fruit. Some have used the image of a body maimed, damaged, and already in the process of disintegration, in which by a miracle the principle of life has been restored. The body will start to move and raise itself up; a dead body cannot do that. In no way, however, will the mutilation and the traces of disintegration therefore disappear. More likely, for a long time these will still recall death and will hinder the body in its expressions of life. Although such images remain deficient, they still provide a general idea of the characteristic situation in which the regenerate is placed by his re-creation.

The apostle has depicted the discord meant here in Romans 7:14–25. The facts established by him here are the following:

a) In the regenerate there is sin not only existing in single actions but a deeply rooted evil: “I know that no good dwells in me, that is, in my flesh” [Rom 7:18]. The apostle has called this sin “indwelling sin” (Rom 7:17, 20), which proves sufficiently that it is continually present; it is a sinful disposition, inherited pollution. It is a law in the members, thus something permanent.

b) Yet in the regenerate there is also something good. That already appears from the specific form in which the previous statement was expressed—“in me, that is, in my flesh” dwells no good (Rom 7:18). Thus, the apostle can speak of himself from two angles. If he spoke of himself as he was in himself, apart from the activity of the Holy Spirit, thus as flesh, then no good dwells in him. If, on the other hand, he spoke of himself insofar as the Holy Spirit maintained a new life in him, then there was something good in him.

c) This new principle, worked by the Holy Spirit and based on the indwelling of the Holy Spirit and only maintained by that indwelling, touches the deepest ground of his life. It was deeper than indwelling sin. [Owen denominates this new principle as faith, love and grace all in one principle. Also, keep in mind that even faith, its operation, is dependent upon God as all other graces are. They don't act of themselves; our dependence upon God is absolute; we are not self-sufficient autonomous beings - see Code465b] That appears from the words with which the apostle sets these two against each other. He no longer does it (namely, the evil), but the sin that dwells in him. Thus: he over against the sin that dwells in him. This is not said to excuse the evil, but only to show that the power of sin was still so great and even at work against the new life. So, in verses 22 and 23, the "inner man" and "the mind" are against "the members." The "inner" here is what is regenerated and new in man (cf. 2 Cor 4:16; Eph 3:16; 1 Pet 3:4). The "members" are the same again as "flesh"—that is, the depraved nature as it is apart from the new implanted principle of life. The "mind" is the same again as the "inner man." All this shows that the new principle of life in the regenerate Christian confronts his still-sinful nature (both soul and body) as a living soul confronts a dead, decomposing body. This, then, is also the image the apostle uses in verse 24. Indwelling sin is like a body of death. It is as if a hideous corpse embraces and captures him. He cannot save himself from that embrace.

d) Nevertheless, the new life within him also pervades his conscious thinking, willing, and feeling. After all, in him there is a willing of the good (Rom 7:19) and a not willing of the evil, a taking delight in the law of God after the inner man, a disapproval of what he himself does, a consenting that the law is good. These are all expressions of the new life, however much the apostle also had to add that it was not granted to him to fulfill this good to which his new man testified.

e) The conclusion that the apostle finally draws from this state of affairs is that only the grace of God can deliver him from this indwelling corruption. It is not by the native activity of the new life in obedience to the law that the corruption is purged, but by the continuing grace of God. The law alone does not bring about sanctification. As the Holy Spirit has created the new life, He must also continue working it out and mortifying the flesh (cf. Gal 2:20; 5:17).

35. Is regeneration to be viewed such that in it this new principle of life is infused into man and what is contained in that principle now comes to expression of itself?

No. Also, this coming-to-expression of the life once given—its impact on the intellect, will, and emotional life—cannot occur independent of the ongoing grace of God. But the difference lies in this: that in regeneration proper, the soul is wholly passive. It does not work, but is worked on, undergoes change, while in further stages this soul, made alive by God, becomes itself the subject of its expression of life. Nevertheless, it is also the case that it must be continuously enabled for these expressions by the grace of the Holy Spirit.

36. In what relation does regeneration stand to the subsequent saving actions of God?

It has already been noted that in these subsequent actions man himself is made the thinking, willing, and feeling subject of what takes place in him. Conversion and faith, worked by God, do not merely pass from God onto the root of his life (like regeneration), but through the root of his life outwardly. It is man himself who repents of his sins, who exercises faith, is with Christ, etc., while it is not man himself who regenerates himself or lets himself be regenerated. Clearly, these spiritual activities of repenting, believing, etc., presuppose a principle of spiritual life that in fact has become man's own. The renewed life must be his life if he is to be able to manifest repentance and exercise faith. However, to possess life in general is not sufficient. Or, expressed more precisely, life in general and in the abstract without some determination of powers and capacities does not exist. It belongs to the nature of life that it comprises a multiplicity in unity. In every seed the functions of life are present, and therefore we must assume that in the regenerate and in the life of the regenerate God also gives the capacity in principle to be able to perform the different activities of life. Thus, regeneration first makes possible all that subsequently takes place in a sinner. It not only precedes but is in a living connection with all that takes place subsequently. However, one may not think of the capacities of this spiritual life as developed dispositions. They are only present as a predisposition, as potentiality in seed form. Indeed, the seed of what a child learns to do later is given at its birth. But that does not mean that the habitus to perform certain activities is the same with a child as with an adult. This is the same in regeneration. With and in the spiritual life infused, a regenerated child certainly receives the disposition to believe. But that disposition develops. A regenerate adult, who has exercised faith for years on end, possesses that disposition in a much different condition. And yet in principle, the habitus in both is one.

37. What distinguishes more recent views concerning regeneration?

a) First, we have here the theory of trichotomy, which develops a distinctive doctrine of regeneration from its basic tenets. There are three parts in man: "body," "soul," and "spirit." In general, sin has its seat only in the life of the soul, not in the pneuma, or "spirit." As soon as it penetrates to the spirit, man becomes incapable of being saved, for that is to commit the sin against the Holy Spirit. The angels are incapable of being saved, since being only spirit, they are completely imprisoned in sin. In regeneration the Spirit of God produces a strengthening of the pneuma in man. This is no longer sinful, but still weakened. All that is necessary exists in this strengthening. When the spirit, thus strengthened, begins to govern the lower passions again, man has become "spiritual."

One sees immediately that this is merely a "refined rationalism." Sin in man, the depravity of his nature, is sought in a discrepancy between the lower and higher capacities. He is saved as the higher capacities of his reason (for this concept of "spirit" finally amounts to that) suppress the lower. He is called "spiritual," not because the Holy Spirit has made His abode in him, but because he again is led by his own "spirit" or "reason."

b) Then we have the decidedly pantheistic or pantheistically tinted soteriology of the “mediating theologians.” Their Christology is false and, like it, their soteriology also proceeds from the idea of the unity between God and man. In the Mediator there are not two unmixed natures, but one mingled divine-human nature. God and man are melded together into a third entity: a divine-human life. This is the same life, then, that is communicated to man in regeneration. He partakes of the life that is in Christ. Not in our sense—as he is united to Christ the Head by the Spirit and as the Spirit, who is at work from Christ, works and maintains a personal life in him—but literally, as a part of the life of Christ passes over into him. Here, therefore, the mystical union is misused in a pantheistic sense.

It is accompanied, further, by another misconception: that this life, since it is the same in substance in each regenerated person as in Christ, need not be generated anew each time by the Holy Spirit, but that it is resident in the Church and passes from the Church to the individual. Communion with the Church brings the higher life. This is a return to Romanism. The entire judicial work of the Mediator is pushed to the background.

Finally, on this view, one cannot speak of regeneration so long as the divine-human life of Christ did not yet exist. During the Old Testament dispensation, no one was regenerated. All this is sufficient to make us see that here we no longer have to do with a Christian but with a philosophical system that, as much as it still can, uses Christian terms in order to be accredited within Christian circles and to preserve for itself the name of Christian.

38. What name do the theologians use to express the uniqueness of regenerating grace?

They use the word “physical.” Regeneration consists of a physical action wrought by God. “Physical” here contrasts with “moral.” They intend with that to emphasize that God’s work is not morally persuasive. Currently, however, the word “physical” is currently used in a sense that can lead to misunderstanding. Physics is a natural science, and it is usually knowledge of material nature. Physical is what works in a natural or material way. In that sense, regeneration is the opposite of physical. It is therefore better to say that it is supernatural, hyperphysical. Also, God’s omnipotent activity is not the same everywhere as to its manner of working. It works differently on matter than on spirit. But on the spirit it can work in a twofold fashion: by means of the consciousness, and below the consciousness. The latter occurs in regeneration.

39. Is regeneration resistible—that is, can a person resist it and undo it?

It is irresistible. And not in the sense that regeneration is merely more powerful than all resistance, but that even the thought of resistance is out of the question. Regeneration lays hold of the subject that would wish or be able to offer resistance, even in its deepest depth, and changes it. Saying that it can be resisted would always be based on the conception that it confronts its object. It does not do this but works immanently within the heart of man.

[Greek words didn't copy over in actual Greek letters, but English letters]

1. What words in Scripture are used for the concept of conversion?

The first and most important word is metanoia. The verb that belongs with it is metanoein. Both words are composed of the preposition meta and the noun nous. Metanoia, therefore, is a change, an alteration of nous [mind]. Now we need only to specify what is meant by nous. Nous is related to gignōskein, Latin noscere, English “to know.” This already points us to conscious life. Conversion is a change of what occurs in our consciousness. However, one would take the concept of nous far too narrowly if one were to limit it to intellectual, theoretical consciousness. It is much wider. Nous is synonymous with syneidēsis, “conscience,” moral consciousness: “both their mind and their conscience are defiled” (Titus 1:15); “one person regards one day above the others, but another regards all days alike. Let each one be fully convinced in his own mind [nous]” (Rom 14:5). When one changes his nous, this means more than receiving new knowledge, new concepts, and a new conscious content. The direction, the quality of his conscious life is changed. While previously all his thinking and endeavoring moved apart from God and something else stood in the center, now it is so reversed that it moves around God and for God, and He comes to stand in the center. The word metanoia, however, does not put the emphasis so much on the point of departure and the point of arrival as on the change and reversal.

The change expressed by this word has reference further:

a) To intellectual life, thus theoretical consciousness: “with meekness instructing those that oppose, if God may someday grant them repentance leading to a knowledge of the truth” (2 Tim 2:25). The unconverted consciousness finds itself entangled in a world of erroneous concepts. For that person, God’s truth is not the highest reality. His train of thought does not revolve around God. Through conversion, that becomes different. The consciousness, insofar as it involves thinking, loses its worldly sinful independence and submits to the wisdom of God. In this respect, conversion thus coincides with the faith of the regenerate. Above it has already been pointed out that what the regenerate knew and believed previously in a solely historical way he now also knows and believes in an essentially different way. His faith, which has now become spiritual, is directed entirely to the testimony of God. Thereafter, the knowledge of saving faith and all that accompanies it must also be brought to bear. The doctrine of sin and grace in the consciousness of the converted sinner receives the weight due it. The knowledge of spiritual faith in the wider sense belongs essentially to the manifestation of conversion. Faith is a part of conversion.

b) By no means, however, does metanoia remain limited to the consciousness of the intellect. The consciousness of the life of the will likewise shares in it. In the conscious willing of the unconverted there is an impulse that is active against God and self-seeking. In the conscious volition of the converted there is an impulse that is active toward God and away from himself. The will was first turned away from God and is now converted to God. On this point, too, faith coheres most closely with conversion. In all believing, there is a letting go of ourselves and a resting in another. In conversion, faith—of which the seed was given in regeneration—turns to God to rest in His testimony. The will, insofar as it is involved in believing, now turns to God (Acts 8:22, “Therefore repent of this your wickedness; Heb 6:1, “Not laying again a foundation of repentance from dead works”).

c) Conversion also extends to the life of the emotions. [or the affections] While for the unconverted the spiritual things of God are an arid desert, for the converted they become a source of lively delight. While formerly the reality of the relationship to which he stood toward God left him cold and indifferent, his heart now reacts immediately to it.

d) In all three respects, however, metanoia includes a conscious opposition to the former condition. This is an essential element in the concept, and one should therefore attend to it very carefully. Being converted does not mean simply going from one direction of consciousness to another so far as the intellect, will, and emotions are concerned. It means, in doing this, that at the same time there is present in the new direction of intellect, will, and emotions a conscious aversion to the former direction. In other words, metanoia has a positive side, but it also has a negative side. A new knowledge arises in the one converted, but at the same time he is conscious that his old knowledge was foolishness and ignorance. A new volition impels the one converted, but at the same time he becomes conscious of a deep aversion toward his old volition that worked against God. A new emotion controls the one converted, but in it he similarly has a consciousness of a deep sorrow over his former condition.

Conversion, therefore, looks back as well as forward. In their functioning, the new capacities that are now turned toward God look back in a conscious fashion on their former activity that was turned away from God. This is the element of repentance in conversion along with the element of faith. All the activities mentioned under (a), (b), and (c) go back to faith, insofar as it has its seat in the intellect and will, and at the same time is accompanied by the emotions. What is meant here is repentance—that is, a true, deep-seated knowledge of and a strong aversion, an active abhorrence, toward the earlier relationship toward God. “Now I rejoice, not because you were grieved but because you were grieved leading to repentance [eis metanoian]. For godly sorrow produces repentance without regret that leads to salvation, but the sorrow of the world produces death” (2 Cor 7:9–10). “And if he sins against you seven times in a day, and returns to you seven times in a day saying, ‘I repent’ [metanoēō], you must forgive him” (Luke 17:4).

2. What is another word used in Scripture for “conversion”?

The word epistrophē, which occurs only once in the New Testament, in Acts 15:3. On the other hand, the verb epistrephein is used much more. It has a somewhat wider scope than metanoein. It not only puts the emphasis on the change of direction in the conscious life, but it also expresses that a new relationship comes about by this change. Hence it can be used with metanoein; for example, “Repent [metanoein], therefore, and turn back [epistrephein]” (Acts 3:19). While metanoein is sometimes used exclusively for repentance, in epistrephein faith is necessarily included. Repentance (metanoia) and faith can be mentioned together, but not conversion (epistrophē) and faith: “repentance toward God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ” (Acts 20:21)—here one finds metanoia. Where these two words [epistrophē and metanoia] are distinguished, the former lets the focus fall more on the positive direction of faith, the latter more on the retrospective attitude of repentance.

3. What word does the Hebrew use for conversion?

The noun shuvah and the verb shwb. In the Septuagint this is nearly always translated by epistrephein (1 Sam 7:3; 1 Kgs 8:33).

4. Is there still another word that is used by the New Testament?

The word metamelesthai. This literally means “to be concerned about something afterwards”: “and afterward he repented and went”; “and even when you saw it, afterward you did not repent in order to believe” (Matt 21:29, 32). Thus the emphasis here is on the element of repentance. However, from the texts just cited above, it appears that it is incorrect to understand the difference between this word and metanoein as if the former merely indicates a sensation of emotion by which the will is not yet changed—thus superficial sorrow, worldly sadness, that is a result of the common grace of the Holy Spirit but that faith need not follow—while the latter always indicates heartfelt conversion that presupposes regeneration. Metanoia can occur a few times for regret. For example, “And if he is sorrowful, forgive him” (Luke 17:3). The difference lies only in this: that metamelesthai points exclusively to the negative, retrospective side of repentance. Metanoia is richer in content. Included in it is the element of will; it consists of a firm intention, of an active change of the will; there is action. Hence, metanoein appears in the imperative mood: “be converted.” But, in contrast, metamelesthai, “be sorrowful,” never does, for emotion as such cannot be commanded.

5. What is distinctive of most of these words?

They are almost always active terms, something by which they are distinguished in use from the words for regeneration. There it was “to be regenerated” (anagennasthai). Here it is “to convert oneself”—a proof that after regeneration, as soon as it penetrates into the conscious life, the gracious activity of God makes the subject itself active. Here, man is no longer purely passive; he is not only acted on but impelled to action.

6. What is conversion called in Latin?

In Latin three words are used:

a) Poenitentia, “having remorse,” connected with poena, “punishment.” In it the element of “penitence,” “contrition,” comes to the fore. One may compare this with the English word “repentance” (from repenitere). In the Roman Catholic church, however, poenitentia more and more received an external sense. “Penance” was placed as an independent sacrament alongside the others. It has reference to a Christian who has fallen into mortal sin, and so does not have initial conversion in view. It consists of three parts:

1. Contritio, sincere remorse, to be distinguished from attritio. The latter abhors and hates sin because of its terrible consequences; contritio, on the other hand, for its own sake. If, however, attritio is concerned with the eternal consequences of sin and not merely its temporal consequences, it is also sufficient.
2. Confessio, or “confession,” acknowledgement of sin before an ecclesiastical judge.
3. Satisfactio, “satisfaction” of temporal punishment, likewise prescribed by an ecclesiastical judge. Through this wholly external understanding, the word poenitentia acquired a bad sound, so that some preferred not to use it any longer.

b) Another Latin word is conversio. This is essentially the same in meaning as epistrophē. It comes from convertere, “to turn around,” and therefore points to the about-face and the changed direction that comes into the life of the sinner at conversion.

c) A third term is the much-used resipiscentia, literally, “becoming wise again,” from resipiscere, “to return to one’s senses.” It agrees to a great extent with metanoia. The difference is only that the prefix “re” calls to mind the abnormality of the former state of the consciousness. What supervenes in becoming wise again is not something new but just what should have been present originally—what is normal.

7. How do you best describe conversion according to what we have found?

It is active: that act of God by which He turns the regenerate man in his consciousness to Himself by faith and repentance. It is passive: that conscious act of the regenerate man in which by God’s grace he turns to God in repentance and faith.

8. Does conversion take place in the judicial sphere, or in the sphere of dispositional re-creating grace?

Properly speaking, conversion lies in the sphere of re-creating grace. It does not change the state but the condition of man. However, in conversion, an awareness that the sinner is worthy of damnation is awakened in him, and in connection with that, faith is given, which in its turn leads to justification. Conversion, therefore, is also connected with what occurs in the judicial sphere.

9. Is conversion an act of grace that takes place below the consciousness or in the consciousness?

As we saw from the name metanoia, conversion does not take place below the consciousness but in the consciousness. There is, of course, a transition of the activity of life from the new principle of life into the consciousness. The first dawning of conversion must thus start from below the consciousness. But, as the whole work of God, it is itself reflected in the light of man's consciousness.

10. Does conversion have in view the removal of the old man or the enlivening of the new man?

Actually, already in regeneration the old is replaced at the core of our being by a new principle of life. And, conversely, conversion flows from the outworking and penetration of this new life into the consciousness. Thus, to this extent one cannot say that conversion removes the old; rather, it is a continuation and extension of the activity of the new. Still, with that, not everything is said. When a new principle of life has been introduced at the core of a man's being, then his entire existence is still not yet reversed by it. In his consciousness, particularly, he still holds on to the old, lives in the old, and turns away from God. The center of the circle of his life may lie in God, while he does not see or seek that center in God but elsewhere. This, then, is what is changed in conversion. In his consciousness, in his own awareness, the sinner learns to see the lostness and untenability of his former position and his former condition, and the result of this is that he is also loosed from the old in his conscious life. And conversely, he learns to understand and appropriate with a clear consciousness the permanency and safety of his new position and his new condition. He adopts the standpoint of someone who lives for God. Thus we find that, for the consciousness, conversion in fact has the same two sides that we encounter in regeneration, but nevertheless for both the second, positive side of regeneration is the basis.

Different answers must be given to this question. For regeneration, it was impossible to speak of a continuation or repetition. By the nature of the case, someone can only be born once. On the other hand, the consciousness of man goes up and down—is now darker, then clearer, subject to fluctuations and changes. It lies on the surface, on the outside of life, and consequently can be seized by the still-continually-impure nature, so that in a certain sense it again turns away from God. Thus, the possibility exists for a continuing and repeated conversion. The Christian needs to die daily in repentance and made alive in faith. The old man must be crucified anew again and again so that the new man can arise with all the more power.

Still, it remains true that in its specific sense, conversion is something that occurs once and can only occur once, and that consequently it stands out as a crisis in the life of sinners. Thus, the old theologians had every right to bring conversion into the closest connection with regeneration and to regard conversion as the reverse side of the latter. Only where the consciousness is wholly fallen and turned away from God can it experience this great reversal, to which some give the designation of “first conversion.” Afterward, the contrast between the old and the new can no longer appear with the sharpness that it has in the first days of the activity of the new life. And at a later point it is tempered by the consciousness of justification that can never be entirely lost where it has once occurred. Although one must thus agree that the distance between first conversion and continuing conversion is not the same as the absolute difference between regeneration and the development of life, there still remains sufficient place for a distinction.

12. Is conversion exclusively a work of God, or is man also active in it?

In it, man is worked on by God’s grace such that he converts himself—that is, consciously turns from sin and turns to God. The subject that is active here is, however, the regenerated man, not the old, natural man.

13. What is the connection of conversion to effectual calling?

The closest connection. Conversion is the direct consequence of this calling. It is not as if the sinner converted himself to God by his own hand. Rather, conversion is always accompanied by a lively awareness that it is God who calls us to Himself. In the concept of calling, precisely that is expressed as clearly as possible. The difference between true conversion and a superficial moral improvement lies precisely in this point. The moral reformation of which the unregenerate speaks is a work that he himself performs and by which he places himself against the Lord. It is something, moreover, by which he continually relies on himself and exclusively considers himself and his own interests. It is a sorrow of a sinner according to himself.

In genuine conversion, man feels that he is under the working God. It may be that under the crushing and the death of repentance, he does not draw from conversion the comfort that he should be able to draw from it. But with that, he already senses that he is still placed in a direct relationship with God, to be approved by Him. And no less does the converted person reckon with and think of God, and is primarily concerned for His holy rights. In discussing calling above, it was pointed out how the man in whom the consciousness of the new life awakens for the first time is under the impression that God effectually draws him to Himself and omnipotently calls forth life from him. He says, “Convert me, so I shall be converted!” Precisely by that it comes about that, for his consciousness, regeneration and calling nearly fuse.

14. What is the connection of conversion to faith?

Conversion consists of repentance and faith. So faith is a part of conversion. Still, to arrive at clarity one needs to make a twofold distinction: There is a faith in the wider and in the narrower sense.

In the wider sense, we understand faith to be an acceptance as true of all that God declares; in the narrower sense, it is an acceptance as true of the declaration of God that in Christ He will forgive sin. By the former is not meant ordinary historical faith that can also be present in a sinner apart from regeneration and conversion. With conversion, a new faith awakens in the sinner with respect also to what he formerly believed in a merely historical fashion. An unconverted and unregenerate sinner can know that he is a sinner and deserving of condemnation in Adam. He knows this by historical faith. When conversion comes, however, he now begins to believe this in a much deeper sense, so that it becomes a reality for him with which he reckons and that is effective in his life. This is not saving faith in the narrower sense of the word, but it is still something entirely different than historical faith [or temporary faith; a faith that does not save]. Here, for the consciousness of the sinner by the action of the Holy Spirit, the content of historical faith is made into living, active truth, to which he must react. He knows it differently and agrees to it differently than was the case previously. Now, that truth is directly addressed by God to his consciousness and the power of the presence of God speaks from it. Also, it is now regarded as a truth that has a special, personal application to the sinner himself, while previously it was regarded as a general, collectively applicable truth. It is indifferent what name one gives to all this, whether one calls it conviction, repentance, or awareness of sin, provided one only recognizes that it falls under the general concept of the illuminating and enlightened knowledge that is only encountered in the regenerate in conversion and by which they learn to take into account the relationship in which they stand to God.

In this wider sense, one will have to say that faith accompanies conversion from its inception. Conversion is never a blind impulse by which man, without knowing why, would be driven to God. Knowledge is an essential element that never can be completely missing. It is a calling that draws and impels man, not a mystical something that has nothing to do with the truth.

It is another question how far saving faith in the narrower sense belongs to conversion. If someone is under conviction of sin and the reality of his situation is placed before his eyes by the faith just described, that does not yet actually include that he also exercises a faith that surrenders. Awareness of sin and of deserving damnation is logically a different concept than trusting in the Mediator. It is not only a different concept, but also a concept that must precede the latter. Without the conviction of sin, the act—the exercise—of faith is unthinkable. Also, believing in Christ is something reasonable that occurs in the light of truth, not a blind, mystical urge. Thus it is not subject to any doubt that, in order, repentance and the knowledge of sin precede surrendering faith. However, one should keep the following in view:

- a) That this can only apply to the act of faith and not to its disposition. The latter is given in regeneration and so, in order, also precedes repentance. It underlies faith in the wider sense as well as in the narrower sense. Only by this disposition does it become possible for the sinner to see the reality of his relationship with God. It is the basis of both the activity of the intellect of the converted person, by which he sees the things of God correctly, and the inclination of his will, by which he agrees with God's declaration. Indeed, when God declares that the sinner is lost and deserving damnation, then there belongs to believing this witness not only an enlightened intellect but also a will bent to His. And the disposition that is the root of both of these can only precede repentance if it is to be the true repentance of conversion.

b) The distinction made here is a logical one and not a chronological one or a distinction in time. It is not as if the sinner is first brought to the knowledge of himself, of his lost condition and of his relationship as a sinner toward God, and then, after having spent considerable time in this situation, suddenly comes to the knowledge of Christ and His righteousness. Without doubt such cases do occur. There have been those converted who have wrestled before God for days and weeks almost without hope as lost, without the glimmer of faith occurring in their consciousness. But we may not make the presence or absence of such a condition a distinguishing mark of true conversion. One can even assume that this experience does not occur in the majority of those converted. Still, it is so that a historical knowledge of Christ is present from the outset in all those converted who come to repentance. God's way of proceeding is such that He only works conversion where one lives under the ministry of the Word, and so where a certain degree of knowledge of the truths of salvation is found. Where the notion of the Mediator is already in the consciousness, then from the first moment of conversion on it will generate a lesser or greater activity of the faith that accompanies repentance. In this way the activity of repentance and faith can coincide chronologically, and the one can affect the other. The knowledge of Christ and His righteousness do not remain without influence on the sinner's consciousness of guilt, but shape it. And in many cases it will be impossible to indicate precisely what first entered the consciousness clearly: repentance, or faith.

c) Conversion also includes the source of sanctification. Now, the rule is firm that there cannot be genuine Christian sanctification that does not grow on the root of justification. And justification, in turn, is only given to saving faith. At the same time, this includes that conversion as a source of sanctification presupposes the activity of faith. It is also entirely impossible that the sinner would try to do something good for God and devote himself to God as a pleasing sacrifice as long as he feels that he lies under the curse and does not have the consciousness, at least in principle, to be cleansed by the merits of Christ and to be accepted by God. The entire positive side of conversion—actively turning toward God—is inseparable from justifying faith. We see here again how the various saving acts of God, however much they can and must be distinguished logically, nevertheless may not be separated from one another as if they did not affect each other. Rather, they involve each other at every point and are interwoven with each other. We found that regeneration is included in effectual calling. We now find, in approximately the same sense, that justification is surrounded by the various activities of conversion.

15. Who is the author of conversion?

God, as we are taught in Acts 11:18: “So then to the Gentiles also God has granted repentance unto life.” Here, it is called a gift of God. “Whether God may at some time grant them repentance leading to a knowledge of the truth” (2 Tim 2:25).

16. In conversion, does God work solely through means, or is there in addition also an immediate working?

In conversion there is a twofold working of God:

a) Mediate working through the Word of God. Both through the law as well as through the gospel, God affects the consciousness of sinners in order to bring about conversion in them. Through the law, repentance is generated, for by the law is the knowledge of sin [Rom 3:20]. Through the gospel, faith is generated, for faith is by hearing [Rom 10:17]. Still, one must not separate these two too sharply. In the law there is already an adumbration of the gospel, and in the gospel there is an eloquent testimony to, a crushing proclamation of, the law. The cross of the Mediator not only proclaims that satisfaction is accomplished and pardon may be obtained, but at the same time points to what the sinner had deserved for himself and what would happen with him if God were to deal with him in justice. Hence, Scripture describes the crisis of repentance, in which man abandons himself and learns to distance himself from all self-righteousness, as a “being crucified with Christ,” a “mortifying of the old man.” “For through the law I died to the law”—something that is further clarified by the words, “I have been crucified with Christ” (Gal 2:19–20). “Knowing this, that our old man was crucified with Him, so that the body of sin might be abolished, so that we no longer serve sin” (Rom 6:6). In baptism there is a picturing of this repentance as death: “Therefore we were buried with him by baptism into death” (Rom 6:4).

b) Besides this mediate working of God, in conversion there is also a direct, immediate working—a working linked with the new principle of life already infused into the soul but that then directly, without the intervention of any means, implements this principle. Also, this new principle does not possess in itself the capacity to flow outwardly and lay hold of the consciousness of the sinner. It is Lutheran and Remonstrant [Arminianism] to think that God gives powers in the regenerate man over which he can now dispose freely, which he can use or can leave unused or, if need be, can discard and lose. Conversion is as little an uncertain work as regeneration. God works in His children to will and to work for His good pleasure. Even the best seed does not germinate and grow without the fructifying and nourishing working of the Spirit. In this working of the Spirit, there is an immediate working (Phil 2:13). Not only the disposition of faith but also the act of believing is sustained by the working of God's grace. [Hence, 1Pet. 1:5, who are kept by the power of God through faith for salvation ready to be revealed in the last time. It is an ongoing action by the Spirit; we are dependent upon God for everything! Ongoing believing, repenting, living, thinking, etc.! See Edwards' comments at code] The old theologians distinguish these two acts of conversion, or of the converting God, as moral and physical, ethical and material action. The word "physical" is used here in the same sense as in regeneration.

17. Is the word "conversion" always used in the same sense in Scripture?

No, it occurs with more than one meaning, and one must take the greatest care not to confuse these with each other or to apply to the one what is meant by another.

- a) Conversion is used for a change in the outlook of a nation—thus, in an external religious sense. So, for example, it occurs of the Ninevites, who were converted by Jonah's preaching (Jonah 3:10; Matt 12:41; cf. Isa 19:22).
- b) A godless person can convert in his outward life to a virtuous one without being regenerated (Psa 7:12; Jer 18:11).
- c) After being caught in a condition of lifelessness and barrenness, a believer can convert from it to a new faith (Rev 2:5; Jas 5:19–20).
- d) A regenerate person can come for the first time to exercise repentance and faith. This is conversion as discussed here.

18. Is conversion absolutely necessary?

Everyone who is saved must come to a true knowledge of his sins and to a believing appreciation of the merits of the Mediator. If he is regenerated in adult life, he has lived in a conscious estrangement from God. It can therefore not be otherwise than that the about-face of this consciousness must be registered very sharply in his life, and in such a case, one beholds the crisis that is called conversion.

The possibility exists, however, that children are regenerated before they come to exercise discernment. To what extent that takes place cannot be decided. The Bible provides us with only two instances: namely, those of the Prophet Jeremiah and John the Baptist. However, where such a case occurs, the possibility also exists that the child does not first need to be brought over from a conscious condition of estrangement from God into that of conversion to God, but that of its own accord, in growing up, it already lives in the latter condition. There are young people who cannot point to a particular time for their conversion, and who can recall that, as far back as their consciousness reaches, they have always been active for God with a repentant and believing heart. There, the course is not marked by crisis, but is more protracted. Still, there too the essential elements of conversion are present. But they are more diffused.

Arminianism, Impetration & Intercession of Christ

More on the limited atonement, impetration and intercession of our high priest, Jesus Christ, what he purchased and for whom, Arminianism examined further, the general ransom, faith, the blood of Christ procuring [impetration] the good things and applying them to the elect in due time, etc.

Death of Death in the Death of Christ

by John Owen
Book II Chapter IV.

Of the distinction of impetration and application — The use and abuse thereof; with the opinion of the adversaries upon the whole matter in controversy unfolded; and the question on both sides stated.

The farther reasons whereby the precedent discourse may be confirmed, I defer until I come to oppose some argument to the general ransom. For the present, I shall only take away that general answer which is usually given to the places of Scripture produced, to waive the sense of them; which is φάρμακον πάνσοφον to our adversaries, and serves them, as they suppose, to bear up all the weight wherewith in this case they are urged:—

I. They say, then, that in the oblation of Christ, and concerning the good things by him procured, two things are to be considered:— First, The impetration, or obtaining of them; and, secondly, The application of them to particular persons. “The first,” say they, “is general, in respect to all. Christ obtained and procured all good things by his death of his Father, — reconciliation, redemption, forgiveness of sins, — for all and every man in the world, if they will believe and lay hold upon him: but in respect of application, they are actually bestowed and conferred but on a few; because but a few believe, which is the condition on which they are bestowed. And in this latter sense are the texts of Scripture which we have argued, all of them, to be understood. So that they do no whit impeach the universality of merit, which they assert; but only the universality of application, which they also deny.” Now, this answer is commonly set forth by them in various terms and divers dresses, according as it seems best to them that use it, and most subservient to their several opinions; for, —

First, Some of them say that Christ, by his death and passion, did absolutely, according to the intention of God, purchase for all and every man, dying for them, remission of sins and reconciliation with God, or a restitution into a state of grace and favour; all which shall be actually beneficial to them, provided that they do believe. So the Arminians.

Secondly, Some, 26 again, that Christ died for all indeed, but conditionally for some, if they do believe, or will so do (which he knows they cannot of themselves); and absolutely for his own, even them on whom he purposeth to bestow faith and grace, so as actually to be made possessors of the good things by him purchased. So Camero, and the divines of France, which follow a new method by him devised.

Thirdly, Some 27 distinguish of a twofold reconciliation and redemption; — one wrought by Christ with God for man, which, say they, is general for all and every man; secondly, a reconciliation wrought by Christ in man unto God, bringing them actually into peace with him.

And sundry other ways there are whereby men express their conceptions in this business. The sum of all comes to this, and the weight of all lies upon that distinction which we before recounted; — namely, that in respect of impetration, Christ obtained redemption and reconciliation for all; in respect of application, it is bestowed only on them who do believe and continue therein.

II. Their arguments whereby they prove the generality of the ransom and universality of the reconciliation must afterward be considered: for the present, we handle only the distinction itself, the meaning and misapplication whereof I shall briefly declare; which will appear if we consider, —

First, The true nature and meaning of this distinction, and the true use thereof; for we do acknowledge that it may be used in a sound sense and right meaning, which way soever you express it, either by impetration and application, or by procuring reconciliation with God and a working of reconciliation in us. For by impetration we mean the meritorious purchase of all good things made by Christ for us with and of his Father; and by application, the actual enjoyment of those good things upon our believing; — as, if a man pay a price for the redeeming of captives, the paying of the price supplieth the room of the impetration of which we speak; and the freeing of the captives is as the application of it. Yet, then, we must observe, —

First, That this distinction hath no place in the intention and purpose of Christ, but only in respect of the things procured by him; for in his purpose they are both united, his full end and aim being to deliver us from all evil, and procure all good actually to be bestowed upon us. But in respect of the things themselves, they may be considered either as procured by Christ, or as bestowed on us.

Secondly, That the will of God is not at all conditional in this business, as though he gave Christ to obtain peace, reconciliation, and forgiveness of sins, upon condition that we do believe. There is a condition in the things, but none in the will of God; that is absolute that such things should be procured and bestowed.

Thirdly, That all the things which Christ obtained for us are not bestowed upon condition, but some of them absolutely. And as for those that are bestowed upon condition, the condition on which they are bestowed is actually purchased and procured for us, upon no condition but only by virtue of the purchase. For instance: Christ hath purchased remission of sins and eternal life for us, to be enjoyed on our believing, upon the condition of faith. But faith itself, which is the condition of them, on whose performance they are bestowed, that he hath procured for us absolutely, on no condition at all; for what condition soever can be proposed, on which the Lord should bestow faith, I shall afterward show it vain, and to run into a circle

Fourthly, That both these, impetration and application, have for their objects the same individual persons; that, look, for whomsoever Christ obtained any good thing by his death, unto them it shall certainly be applied, upon them it shall actually be bestowed: so that it cannot be said that he obtained any thing for any one, which that one shall not or doth not in due time enjoy. For whomsoever he wrought reconciliation with God, in them doth he work reconciliation unto God. The one is not extended to some to whom the other doth not reach. Now, because this being established, the opposite interpretation and misapplication of this distinction vanisheth, I shall briefly confirm it with reasons:—

First, If the application of the good things procured be the end why they are procured, for whose sake alone Christ doth obtain them, then they must be applied to all for whom they are obtained; for otherwise Christ faileth of his end and aim, which must not be granted. But that this application was the end of the obtaining of all good things for us appeareth, — First, Because if it were otherwise, and Christ did not aim at the applying of them, but only at their obtaining, then might the death of Christ have had its full effect and issue without the application of redemption and salvation to any one soul, that being not aimed at, and so, notwithstanding all that he did for us, every soul in the world might have perished eternally; which, whether it can stand with the dignity and sufficiency of his oblation, with the purpose of his Father, and his own intention, who “came into the world to save sinners, — that which was lost,” and to “bring many sons unto glory,” let all judge. Secondly, God, in that action of sending his Son, laying the weight of iniquity upon him, and giving him up to an accursed death, must be affirmed to be altogether uncertain what event all this should have in respect of us. For, did he intend that we should be saved by it? — then the application of it is that which he aimed at, as we assert: did he not? — certainty, he was uncertain what end it should have; which is blasphemy, and exceeding contrary to Scripture and right reason. Did he appoint a Saviour without thought of them that were to be saved? a Redeemer, not determining who should be redeemed? Did he resolve of a means, not determining the end? It is an assertion opposite to all the glorious properties of God. [you'll find that the assertions of the Arminians necessarily lead to many absurdities.]

Secondly, If that which is obtained by any do, by virtue of that action whereby it is obtained, become his in right for whom it is obtained, then for whomsoever any thing is by Christ obtained, it is to them applied; for that must be made theirs in fact which is theirs in right. But it is most certain that whatsoever is obtained for any is theirs by right for whom it is obtained. The very sense of the word, whether you call it merit, impetration, purchase, acquisition, or obtaining, doth bespeak a right in them for whose good the merit is effected and the purchase made. [right reason, which Arminian thought is void of] Can that be said to be obtained for me which is no wise mine? When I obtain anything by prayer or entreaty of any one, it being obtained, it is mine own. That which is obtained by one is granted by him of whom it is obtained; and if granted, it is granted by him to them for whom it is obtained. But they will say, “It is obtained upon condition; and until the condition be fulfilled no right doth accrue.” I answer, If this condition be equally purchased and obtained, with other things that are to be bestowed on that condition, then this hinders not but that every thing is to be applied that is procured. But if it be uncertain whether this condition will be fulfilled or not, then, — first, This makes God uncertain what end the death of his Son will have; secondly, This doth not answer but deny the thing we are in proving, which is confirmed. [again, right reasoning!]

Thirdly, Because the Scripture, perpetually conjoining these two things together, will not suffer us so to sever them as that the one should belong to some and not to others, as though they could have several persons for their objects: as Isa. liii. 11, “By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many,” — there is the application of all good things; “for he shall bear their iniquities,” — there is the impetration. He justifieth all whose iniquities he bore. As also verse 5 of that chapter, “But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and by his stripes we are healed.” His wounding and our healing, impetration and application, his chastisement and our peace, are inseparably associated. So Rom. iv. 25, “He was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification.” So chap. v. 18, “By the righteousness of one” (that is, his impetration), “the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life,” in the application. See there who are called “All men,” most clearly. Chap. viii. 32–34, “He spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things? Who shall lay anything to the charge of God’s elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us.” From which words we have these several reasons of our assertion:— First, That for whom God gives his Son, to them, in him, he freely gives all things; therefore, all things obtained by his death must be bestowed, and are, on them for whom he died, verse 32. Secondly, They for whom Christ died are justified, are God’s elect, cannot be condemned, nor can anything be laid to their charge; all that he hath purchased for them must be applied to them, for by virtue thereof it is that they are so saved, verses 33, 34. Thirdly, For whom Christ died, for them he maketh intercession. Now, his intercession is for the application of those things, as is confessed, and therein he is always heard. Those to whom the one belongs, theirs also is the other. So, John x. 10, the coming of Christ is, that “his might have life, and have it abundantly;” as also 1 John iv. 9. Heb. x. 10, “By the which will we are sanctified,” — that is the application; “through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ,” — that is the means of impetration: “for by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified,” verse 14. In brief, it is proved by all those places which we produced rightly to assign the end of the death of Christ. So that this may be rested on, as I conceive, as firm and immovable, that the impetration of good things by Christ, and the application of them, respect the same individual persons.

Secondly, We may consider the meaning of those who seek to maintain universal redemption by this distinction in it, and to what use they do apply it. “Christ,” say they, “died for all men, and by his death purchased reconciliation with God for them and forgiveness of sins: which to some is applied, and they become actually reconciled to God, and have their sins forgiven them; but to others not, who, therefore, perish in the state of irreconciliation and enmity, under the guilt of their sins. This application,” say they, “is not procured nor purchased by Christ, — for then, he dying for all, all must be actually reconciled and have their sins forgiven them and be saved, — but it attends the fulfilling of the condition which God is pleased to prescribe unto them, that is, believing:” which, say some, they can do by their own strength, though not in terms, yet by direct consequence; others not, but God must give it. So that when it is said in the Scripture, Christ hath reconciled us to God, redeemed us, saved us by his blood, underwent the punishment of our sins, and so made satisfaction for us, they assert that no more is meant but that Christ did that which upon the fulfilling of the condition that is of us required, these things will follow. To the death of Christ, indeed, they assign many glorious things; but what they give on the one hand they take away with the other, by suspending the enjoyment of them on a condition by us to be fulfilled, not by him procured; and in terms assert that the proper and full end of the death of Christ was the doing of that whereby God, his justice being satisfied, might save sinners if he would, and on what condition it pleased him. — that a door of grace might be opened to all that would come in, and not that actual justification and remission of sins, life, and immortality were procured by him, but only a possibility of those things, that so it might be. Now, that all the venom that lies under this exposition and abuse of this distinction may the better appear, I shall set down the whole mind of them that use it in a few assertions, that it may be clearly seen what we do oppose.

First, “God,” say they, “considering all mankind as fallen from that grace and favour in Adam wherein they were created, and excluded utterly from the attainment of salvation by virtue of the covenant of works which was at the first made with him, yet by his infinite goodness was inclined to desire the happiness of them, all and every one, that they might be delivered from misery, and be brought unto himself;” which inclination of his they call his universal love and antecedent will, whereby he would desirously have them all to be saved; out of which love he sendeth Christ.

Obs. 1. That God hath any natural or necessary inclination, by his goodness, or any other property, to do good to us, or any of his creatures, we do deny. Every thing that concerns us is an act of his free will and good pleasure, and not a natural, necessary act of his Deity, as shall be declared.

Obs. 2. The ascribing an antecedent conditional will unto God, whose fulfilling and accomplishment should depend on any free, contingent act or work of ours, is injurious to his wisdom, power, and sovereignty, and cannot well be excused from blasphemy; and is contrary to Rom. ix. 19, “Who hath resisted his will?” I say, —

Obs. 3. A common affection and inclination to do good to all doth not seem to set out the freedom, fulness, and dimensions of that most intense love of God which is asserted in the Scripture to be the cause of sending his Son; as John iii. 16, “God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son.” Eph. i. 9, “Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself.” Col. i. 19, “It pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell.” Rom. v. 8, “God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.” These two 28 I shall, by the Lord’s assistance, fully clear, if the Lord give life and strength, and his people encouragement, to go through with the second part of this controversy.

Obs. 4. We deny that all mankind are the object of that love of God which moved him to send his Son to die; God having “made some for the day of evil,” Prov. xvi. 4; “hated them before they were born,” Rom. ix. 11, 13; “before of old ordained them to condemnation,” Jude 4; being “fitted to destruction,” Rom. ix. 22; “made to be taken and destroyed,” 2 Pet. ii. 12; “appointed to wrath,” 1 Thess. v. 9; to “go to their own place,” Acts i. 25.

Secondly, “The justice of God being injured by sin, unless something might be done for the satisfaction thereof, that love of God whereby he wouldeth good to all sinners could no way be brought forth into act, but must have its eternal residence in the bosom of God without any effect produced.”

Obs. 1. That neither Scripture nor right reason will enforce nor prove an utter and absolute want of power in God to save sinners by his own absolute will, without satisfaction to his justice, [in other words, God just can't forgive sin by his will of forgiving alone; he must punish it which his justice requires by necessity, either the violator or a substitutionary sacrifice, i.e., Christ.] supposing his purpose that so it should be; indeed, it could not be otherwise. But, without the consideration of that, certainly he could have effected it. It doth not imply any violating of his holy nature.

Obs. 2. An actual and necessary velleity, for the doing of anything which cannot possibly be accomplished without some work fulfilled outwardly of him, is opposite to his eternal blessedness and all-sufficiency.

Thirdly, "God, therefore, to fulfil that general love and good-will of his towards all, and that it might put forth itself in such a way as should seem good to him, to satisfy his justice, which stood in the way, and was the only hinderance, he sent his Son into the world to die."

The failing of this assertion we shall lay forth, when we come to declare that love whereof the sending of Christ was the proper issue and effect.

Fourthly, "Wherefore, the proper and immediate end and aim of the purpose of God in sending his Son to die for all men was, that he might, what way it pleased him, save sinners, his justice which hindered being satisfied," — as Arminius; or, "That he might will to save sinners," — as Corvinus. "And the intention of Christ was, to make such satisfaction to the justice of God as that he might obtain to himself a power of saving, upon what conditions it seemed good to his Father to prescribe."

Obs. 1. Whether this was the intention of the Father in sending his Son or no, let it be judged. Something was said before, upon the examination of those places of Scripture which describe his purpose; let it be known from them whether God, in sending of his Son, intended to procure to himself a liberty to save us if he would, or to obtain certain salvation for his elect.

Obs. 2. That such a possibility of salvation, or, at the utmost, a velleity or willing of it, upon an uncertain condition, to be by us fulfilled, should be the full, proper, and only immediate end of the death of Christ, will yet scarcely down with tender spirits.

Obs. 3. The expression, of procuring to himself ability to save, upon a condition to be prescribed, seems not to answer that certain purpose of our Saviour in laying down his life, which the Scripture saith was to "save his sheep," and to "bring many sons to glory," as before; nor hath it any ground in Scripture.

Fifthly, "Christ, therefore, obtained for all and every one reconciliation with God, remission of sins, life and salvation; not that they should actually be partakers of these things, but that God (his justice now not hindering) might and would prescribe a condition to be by them fulfilled, whereupon he would actually apply it, and make them partake of all those good things purchased by Christ." And here comes their distinction of impetration and application, which we before intimated; and thereabout, in the explication of this assertion, they are wondrously divided.

Some say that this proceeds so far, that all men are thereby received into a new covenant, in which redemption Adam was a common person as well as in his fall from the old, and all we again restored in him; so that none shall be damned that do not sin actually against the condition where they are born, and fall from the state where into all men are assumed through the death of Christ.

So Boræus, Corvinus; and one of late, in plain terms, that all are reconciled, redeemed, saved, and justified in Christ; though how he could not understand (More, p. 10). But others, more warily, deny this, and assert that by nature we are all children of wrath, and that until we come to Christ the wrath of God abideth on all, so that it is not actually removed from any: so the assertors of the efficacy of grace in France.

Again, some say that Christ by this satisfaction removed original sin in all, and, by consequent, that only; so that all infants, though of Turks and Pagans, out of the covenant, dying before they come to the use of reason, must undoubtedly be saved, that being removed in all, even the calamity, guilt, and alienation contracted by our first fall, whereby God may save all upon a new condition. But others of them, more warily, observing that the blood of Christ is said to “cleanse from all sin,” (1 John i. 7; 1 Pet. i. 18, 19; Isa. liii. 6), say he died for all sinners alike; absolutely for none, but conditionally for all. Farther, some of them affirm that after the satisfaction of Christ, or the consideration of it in God’s prescience, it was absolutely undetermined what condition should be prescribed, so that the Lord might have reduced all again to the law and covenant of works; so Corvinus: others, that a procuring of a new way of salvation by faith was a part of the fruit of the death of Christ; so More, p. 35.

Again, some of them, that the condition prescribed is by our own strength, with the help of such means as God at all times, and in all places, and unto all, is ready to afford, to be performed; others deny this, and affirm that effectual grace flowing peculiarly from election is necessary to believing: the first establishing the idol of free-will to maintain their own assertion; others overthrowing their own assertion for the establishment of grace. So Amyraldus, Camero, etc.

Moreover, some say that the love of God in the sending of Christ is equal to all: others go a strain higher, and maintain an inequality in the love of God, although he send his Son to die for all, and though greater love there cannot be than that whereby the Lord sent his Son to die for us, as Rom. viii. 32; and so they say that Christ purchased a greater good for some, and less for others. And here they put themselves upon innumerable uncouth distinctions, or rather (as one calleth them), extinctions, blotting out all sense, and reason, and true meaning of the Scripture. [The final issue of all Arminian thinking.] Witness Testardus, Amyraldus, and, as everyone may see that can but read English, in T. M[ore.] Hence that multiplicity of the several ends of the death of Christ, — some that are the fruits of his ransom and satisfaction, and some that are I know not what; besides his dying for some so and so, for others so and so, this way and that way; — hiding themselves in innumerable unintelligible expressions, that it is a most difficult thing to know what they mean, and harder to find out their mind than to answer their reasons.

In one particular they agree well enough, — namely, in denying that faith is procured or merited for us by the death of Christ. So far they are all of them constant to their own principles, for once to grant it would overturn the whole fabric of universal redemption; but, in assigning the cause of faith they go asunder again.

Some say that God sent Christ to die for all men, but only conditionally, if they did and would believe; — as though, if they believed, Christ died for them; if not, he died not; and so make the act the cause of its own object: other some, that he died absolutely for all, to procure all good things for them, which yet they should not enjoy until they fulfil the condition that was to be prescribed unto them. Yet all conclude that in his death Christ had no more respect unto the elect than others, to sustain their persons, or to be in their room, but that he was a public person in the room of all mankind.

III. Concerning the close of all this, in respect of the event and immediate product of the death of Christ, divers have diversely expressed themselves; some placing it in the power, some in the will, of God; some in the opening of a door of grace; some in a right purchased to himself of saving whom he pleased; some that in respect of us he had no end at all, but that all mankind might have perished after he had done all. Others make divers and distinct ends, not almost to be reckoned, of this one act of Christ, according to the diversity of the persons for whom he died, whom they grant to be distinguished and differenced by a foregoing decree; but to what purpose the Lord should send his Son to die for them whom he himself had determined not to save, but at least to pass by and leave to remediless ruin for their sins, I cannot see, nor the meaning of the twofold destination by some invented. Such is the powerful force and evidence of truth that it scatters all its opposers, and makes them fly to several hiding-corners; who, if they are not willing to yield and submit themselves, they shall surely lie down in darkness and error. None of these, or the like intricate and involved impedites distinctions, hath [truth] itself need of; into none of such poor shifts and devices doth it compel its abettors; it needeth not any windings and turnings to bring itself into a defensible posture; it is not liable to contradictions in its own fundamentals: for, without any farther circumstances, the whole of it in this business may be thus summed up:—

“God, out of his infinite love to his elect, sent his dear Son in the fulness of time, whom he had promised in the beginning of the world, and made effectual by that promise, to die, pay a ransom of infinite value and dignity, for the purchasing of eternal redemption, and bringing unto himself all and every one of those whom he had before ordained to eternal life, for the praise of his own glory.” So that freedom from all the evil from which we are delivered, and an enjoyment of all the good things that are bestowed on us, in our traduction from death to life, from hell and wrath to heaven and glory, are the proper issues and effects of the death of Christ, as the meritorious cause of them all; which may, in all the parts of it, be cleared by these few assertions:—

First, The fountain and cause of God’s sending Christ is his eternal love to his elect, and to them alone; which I shall not now farther confirm, reserving it for the second general head of this whole controversy.

Secondly, The value, worth, and dignity of the ransom which Christ gave himself to be, and of the price which he paid, was infinite and immeasurable; fit for the accomplishing of any end and the procuring of any good, for all and every one for whom it was intended, had they been millions of men more than ever were created. Of this also afterward. See Acts xx. 28, “God purchased his church with his own blood.” 1 Pet. i. 18, 19, “Redeemed not with silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ;” and that answering the mind and intention of Almighty God, John xiv. 31, “As the Father gave me commandment, even so I do;" who would have such a price paid as might be the foundation of that economy and dispensation of his love and grace which he intended, and of the way whereby he would have it dispensed. Acts xiii. 38, 39, "Through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins; and by him all that believe are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses." 2 Cor. v. 20, 21, "We are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God. For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him."

Thirdly, The intention and aim of the Father in this great work was, a bringing of those many sons to glory, — namely, his elect, whom by his free grace he had chosen from amongst all men, of all sorts, nations, and conditions, to take them into a new covenant of grace with himself, the former being as to them, in respect of the event, null and abolished; of which covenant Jesus Christ is the first and chief promise, as he that was to procure for them all other good things promised therein, as shall be proved.

Fourthly, The things purchased or procured for those persons, — which are the proper effects of the death and ransom of Christ, in due time certainly to become theirs in possession and enjoyment, — are, remission of sin, freedom from wrath and the curse of the law, justification, sanctification, and reconciliation with God, and eternal life; for the will of his Father sending him for these, his own intention in laying down his life for them, and the truth of the purchase made by him, is the foundation of his intercession, begun on earth and continued in heaven; whereby he, whom his Father always hears, desires and demands that the good things procured by him may be actually bestowed on them, all and every one, for whom they were procured. So that the whole of what we assert in this great business is exceedingly clear and apparent, without any intricacy or the least difficulty at all; not clouded with strange expressions and unnecessary divulsions and tearings of one thing from another, as is the opposite opinion: which in the next place shall be dealt withal by arguments confirming the one and everting the other. But because the whole strength thereof lieth in, and the weight of all lieth on, that one distinction we before spoke of, by our adversaries diversely expressed and held out, we will a little farther consider that, and then come to our arguments, and so to the answering of the opposed objections.

One important reason why I am adding these excerpts to this exposition is to show the preciousness of this whole process, the preciousness of what Christ did; it is not a common thing! It is so immense, incorporating all the wisdom and power of God to do what he willed to do, that to say that this is common to all is to attribute gross imperfection in the Godhead, everting all common sense, calling that which is good evil and what is evil good. So by spending much time in the contemplation of these things you should gain a greater appreciation for them and put them upon the high pedestal on which they belong, leading you to approach God with a holy admiration and fear.

"Woe to those who call evil good, and good evil; Who put darkness for light, and light for darkness; Who put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter!" Isa5:20

This excerpt adds to the previous one on particularity in redemption, reprobation, election, did Christ die for all, the meaning of the word to know or foreknow which is to show favor or love. So in Romans 8:29, foreknew means those who God chose to love or show favor, a saving favor.

Book III Ch2 Death of Death by Owen

Chapter II.

Containing three other arguments.

Arg. III. If Jesus Christ died for all men, — that is, purchased and procured for them, according to the mind and will of God, all those things which we recounted, and the Scripture setteth forth, to be the effects and fruits of his death, which may be summed up in this one phrase, “eternal redemption,” — then he did this, and that according to the purpose of God, either absolutely or upon some condition by them to be fulfilled. If absolutely, then ought all and every one, absolutely and infallibly, to be made actual partakers of that eternal redemption so purchased; for what, I pray, should hinder the enjoyment of that to any which God absolutely intended, and Christ absolutely purchased for them? If upon condition, then he did either procure this condition for them, or he did not? If he did procure this condition for them, — that is, that it should be bestowed on them and wrought within them, — then he did it either absolutely again, or upon a condition. If absolutely, then are we as we were before; for to procure anything for another, to be conferred on him upon such a condition, and withal to procure that condition absolutely to be bestowed on him, is equivalent to the absolute procuring of the thing itself. For so we affirm, in this very business: Christ procured salvation for us, to be bestowed conditionally, if we do believe; but faith itself, that he hath absolutely procured, without prescribing of any condition. Whence we affirm, that the purchasing of salvation for us is equivalent to what it would have been if it had been so purchased as to have been absolutely bestowed, in respect of the event and issue. So that thus also must all be absolutely saved. But if this condition be procured upon condition, let that be assigned, and we will renew our quære [query] concerning the procuring of that, whether it were absolute or conditional, and so never rest until they come to fix somewhere, or still run into a circle.

But, on the other side, is not this condition procured by him on whose performance all the good things purchased by him are to be actually enjoyed? Then, first, This condition must be made known to all, as Arg. ii. Secondly, All men are able of themselves to perform this condition, or they are not. If they are, then, seeing that condition is faith in the promises, as is on all sides confessed, are all men of themselves, by the power of their own free-will, able to believe [which Arminians hold to]; which is contrary to the Scriptures [doctrine of Original Sin; see 1Cor2:14], as, by the Lord’s assistance, shall be declared. If they cannot, but that this faith must be bestowed on them and wrought within them by the free grace of God, then when God gave his Son to die for them, to procure eternal redemption for them all, upon condition that they did believe, he either purposed to work faith in them all by his grace, that they might believe, or he did not? If he did, why doth not he actually perform it, seeing “he is of one mind, and who can turn him?” why do not all believe? why have not all men faith? Or doth he fail of his purpose? If he did not purpose to bestow faith on them all, or (which is all one) if he purposed not to bestow faith on all (for the will of God doth not consist in a pure negation of anything, — what he doth not will that it should be, he wills that it should not be), then the sum of it comes to this:— That God gave Christ to die for all men, but upon this condition, that they perform that which of themselves without him they cannot perform, and purposed that, for his part, he would not accomplish it in them.

Now, if this be not extreme madness, to assign a will unto God of doing that which himself knows and orders that it shall never be done, of granting a thing upon a condition which without his help cannot be any good at all should arise to any by such a purpose as this, such a giving of a Redeemer? Is it agreeable to the goodness of God to intend so great a good as is the redemption purchased by Christ, and to pretend that he would have it profitable for them, when he knows that they can no more fulfil the condition which he requires, that it may be by them enjoyed, than Lazarus could of himself come out of the grave? Doth it beseem the wisdom of God, to purpose that which he knows shall never be fulfilled? If a man should promise to give a thousand pounds to a blind man upon condition that he will open his eyes and see, — which he knows well enough he cannot do, — were that promise to be supposed to come from a heart-pitying of his poverty, and not rather from a mind to illude and mock at his misery? If the king should promise to pay a ransom for the captives at Algiers, upon condition that they would conquer their tyrants and come away, — which he knows full well they cannot do, — were this a kingly act? Or, as if a man should pay a price to redeem captives, but not that their chains may be taken away, without which they cannot come out of prison; or promise dead men great rewards upon condition they live again of themselves; — are not these to as much end as the obtaining of salvation for men upon condition that they do believe, without obtaining that condition for them? Were not this the assigning such a will and purpose as this to Jesus Christ: — “I will obtain eternal life to be bestowed on men, and become theirs, by the application of the benefits of my death; but upon this condition, that they do believe. But as I will not reveal my mind and will in this business, nor this condition itself, to innumerable of them, so concerning the rest I know they are no ways able of themselves, — no more than Lazarus was to rise, or a blind man is to see, — to perform the condition that I do require, and without which none of the good things intended for them can ever become theirs; neither will I procure that condition ever to be fulfilled in them. That is, I do will that that shall be done which I do not only know shall never be done, but that it cannot be done, because I will not do that without which it can never be accomplished”? Now, whether such a will and purpose as this beseem the wisdom and goodness of our Saviour, let the reader judge. In brief; an intention of doing good unto any one upon the performance of such a condition as the intender knows is absolutely above the strength of him of whom it is required, — especially if he know that it can no way be done but by his concurrence, and he is resolved not to yield that assistance which is necessary to the actual accomplishment of it, — is a vain fruitless flourish. That Christ, then, should obtain of his Father eternal redemption, and the Lord should through his Son intend it for them who shall never be made partakers of it, because they cannot perform, and God and Christ have purposed not to bestow, the condition on which alone it is to be made actually theirs, is unworthy of Christ, and unprofitable to them for whom it is obtained; which that anything that Christ obtained for the sons of men should be unto them, is a hard saying indeed. Again; if God through Christ purpose to save all if they do believe, because he died for all, and this faith be not purchased by Christ, nor are men able of themselves to believe, how comes it to pass that any are saved?

[If it be answered], “God bestows faith on some, not on others,” I reply, Is this distinguishing grace purchased for those some comparatively, in respect of those that are passed by without it? If it be, then did not Christ die equally for all, for he died that some might have faith, not others; yea, in comparison, he cannot be said to die for those other some at all, not dying that they might have faith, without which he knew that all the fulfilled, and which help he purposed not to grant, let all judge. Is this anything but to delude poor creatures? Is it possible that rest would be unprofitable and fruitless. But is it not purchased for them by Christ? Then have those that be saved no more to thank Christ for than those that are damned; which were strange, and contrary to Rev. i. 5, 6, “Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father,” etc. For my part, I do conceive that Christ hath obtained salvation for men, not upon condition if they would receive it, but so fully and perfectly that certainly they should receive it. He purchased salvation, to be bestowed on them that do believe; but withal faith, that they might believe. Neither can it be objected, that, according to our doctrine, God requires anything of men that they cannot do, yea, faith to believe in Christ: for, — First, Commands do not signify what is God’s intention should be done, but what is our duty to do; which may be made known to us whether we be able to perform it or not: it signifieth no intention or purpose of God. Secondly, For the promises which are proposed together with the command to believe:— First, they do not hold out the intent and purpose of God, that Christ should die for us if we do believe; which is absurd, — that the act should be the constituter of its own object, which must be before it, and is presupposed to be before we are desired to believe it: nor, secondly, the purpose of God that the death of Christ should be profitable to us if we do believe; which we before confuted: but, thirdly, only that faith is the way to salvation which God hath appointed; so that all that do believe shall undoubtedly be saved, these two things, faith and salvation, being inseparably linked together, as shall be declared.

Arg. IV. If all mankind be, in and by the eternal purpose of God, distinguished into two sorts and conditions, severally and distinctly described and set forth in the Scripture, and Christ be peculiarly affirmed to die for one of these sorts, and nowhere for them of the other, then did he not die for all; for of the one sort he dies for all and every one, and of the other for no one at all. But, —

First, There is such a discriminating distinguishment among men, by the eternal purpose of God, as those whom he “loves” and those whom he “hates,” Rom. ix. 13; whom he “knoweth,” and whom he “knoweth not:” John x. 14, “I know my sheep;” 2 Tim. ii. 19, “The Lord knoweth them that are his;” Rom. viii. 29, “Whom he did foreknow;” chap. xi. 2, “His people which he foreknew;” “I know you not,” Matt. xxv. 12: so John xiii. 18, “I speak not of you all; I know whom I have chosen.” Those that are appointed to life and glory, and those that are appointed to and fitted for destruction, — “elect” and “reprobate;” those that were “ordained to eternal life,” and those who “before were of old ordained to condemnation:” as Eph. i. 4, “He hath chosen us in him;” Acts xiii. 48, “Ordained to eternal life;” Rom. viii. 30, “Whom he did predestinate, them he also called: and whom he called, them he also justified: and whom he justified, them he also glorified.” So, on the other side, 1 Thess. v. 9, “God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation;” Rom. ix. 18–21, “He hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel to honour, and another to dishonour?” Jude 4, “Ordained to this condemnation;” 2 Pet. ii. 12, “Made to be taken and destroyed;” “Sheep and goats,” Matt. xxv. 32; John x. passim. Those on whom he hath “mercy,” and those whom he “hardeneth,” Rom. ix. 18. Those that are his “peculiar people” and “the children of promise,” that are “not of the world,” his “church;” and those that, in opposition to them, are “the world,” “not prayed for,” “not his people:”

as Tit. ii. 14; Gal. iv. 28; John xv. 19, xvii. 9; Col. i. 24; John xi. 52; Heb. ii. 10, 12, 13. Which distinction of men is everywhere ascribed to the purpose, will, and good pleasure of God: Prov. xvi. 4, "The Lord hath made all things for himself, even the wicked for the day of evil." Matt. xi. 25, 26, "I thank thee, O Father, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight." Rom. ix. 11, 12, "The children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth; it was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger." Verses 16, 17, "So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy. For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might show my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth." Chap. viii. 28–30, "Who are the called according to his purpose. For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren. Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called: and whom he called, them he also justified: and whom he justified them he also glorified." So that the first part of the proposition is clear from the Scripture.

Now, Christ is said expressly and punctually to die for them on the one side: for his "people," Matt. i. 21; his "sheep," John x. 11, 14; his "church," Acts xx. 28, Eph. v. 25, as distinguished from the world, Rom. v. 8, 9, John xi. 51, 52; his "elect," Rom. viii. 32–34; his "children," Heb. ii. 12, 13; — as before more at large. Whence we may surely conclude that Christ died not for all and every one, — to wit, not for those he "never knew," whom he "hateth," whom he "hardeneth," on whom he "will not show mercy," who "were before of old ordained to condemnation;" in a word, for a reprobate, for the world, for which he would not pray. That which some except, that though Christ be said to die for his "sheep," for his "elect," his "chosen," yet he is not said to die for them only, — that term is nowhere expressed, is of no value; for is it not without any forced interpretation, in common sense, and according to the usual course of speaking, to distinguish men into two such opposite conditions as elect and reprobate, sheep and goats, and then affirm that he died for his elect, [is it not] equivalent to this, he died for his elect only? Is not the sense as clearly restrained as if that restrictive term had been added? Or is that term always added in the Scripture in every indefinite assertion, which yet must of necessity be limited and restrained as if it were expressly added? as where our Saviour saith, "I am the way, the truth, and the life," John xiv. 6; — he doth not say that he only is so, and yet of necessity it must be so understood. As also in that, Col. i. 19, "It pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell;" — he doth not express the limitation "only," and yet it were no less than blasphemy to suppose a possibility of extending the affirmation to any other. So that this exception, notwithstanding this argument, is, as far as I can see, unanswerable; which also might be farther urged by a more large explication of God's purpose of election and reprobation, showing how the death of Christ was a means set apart and appointed for the saving of his elect, and not at all undergone and suffered for those which, in his eternal counsel, he did determine should perish for their sins, and so never be made partakers of the benefits thereof. But of this more must be spoken, if the Lord preserve us, and give assistance for the other part of this controversy, concerning the cause of sending Christ.

Arg. V. That is not to be asserted and affirmed which the Scripture doth not anywhere go before us in; but the Scripture nowhere saith Christ died for all men, much less for all and every man (between which two there is a wide difference, as shall be declared): therefore, this is not to be asserted. It is true, Christ is said to give his life “a ransom for all,” but nowhere for all men. And because it is affirmed expressly in other places that he died for many, for his church, for them that believe, for the children that God gave him, for us, some of all sorts, though not expressly, yet clearly in terms equivalent, Rev. v. 9, 10, it must be clearly proved that where all is mentioned, it cannot be taken for all believers, all his elect, his whole church, all the children that God gave him, some of all sorts, before a universal affirmative can be thence concluded. And if men will but consider the particular places, and contain themselves until they have done what is required, we shall be at quiet, I am persuaded, in this business.

Arminianism Defined

code173

This is an excellent definition of Arminianism, part of the introduction to John Owen's book, The Death of Death in the Death of Christ by John Owen

Reader,

There are two rotten pillars on which the fabric of late Arminianism (an egg of the old Pelagianism, which we had well hoped had been long since chilled, but is sit upon and brooded by the wanton wits of our degenerate and apostate spirits) doth principally stand.

The one is, That God loveth all alike, Cain as well as Abel, Judas as the rest of the apostles.

The other is, That God giveth (nay is bound, “ex debito,” so to do) both Christ, the great gift of his eternal love, for all alike to work out their redemption, and “vires credendi,” power to believe in Christ to all alike to whom he gives the gospel; whereby that redemption may effectually be applied for their salvation, if they please to make right use of that which is so put into their power.

The former destroys the free and special grace of God, by making it universal; the latter gives cause to man of glorying in himself rather than in God, — God concurring no farther to the salvation of a believer than a reprobate. Christ died for both alike; — God giving power of accepting Christ to both alike, men themselves determining the whole matter by their free-will; Christ making both savable, themselves make them to be saved.

This cursed doctrine of theirs crosseth the main drift of the holy Scripture; which is to abase and pull down the pride of man, to make him even to despair of himself, and to advance and set up the glory of God’s free grace from the beginning to the end of man’s salvation. His hand hath laid the foundation of his spiritual house; his hand shall also finish it.

The reverend and learned author of this book hath received strength from God (like another Samson) to pull down this rotten house upon the head of those Philistines who would uphold it. Read it diligently, and I doubt not but you will say with me, there is such variety of choice matter running through every vein of each discourse here handled, and carried along with such strength of sound and deep judgment, and with such life and power of a heavenly spirit, and all expressed in such pithy and pregnant words of wisdom, that you will both delight in the reading and praise God for the writer. That both he and it may be more and more profitable shall be my hearty prayers. — The unworthiest of the ministers of the gospel, Stanley Gower.2

Chapter V.

Of application and impetration.

The allowable use of this distinction, how it may be taken in a sound sense, the several ways whereby men have expressed the thing which in these words is intimated, and some arguments for the overthrowing of the false use of it, however expressed, we have before intimated and declared. Now, seeing that this is the $\pi\rho\omega\tau\omicron\nu$ $\psi\epsilon\ddot{\upsilon}\delta\omicron\varsigma$ of the opposite opinion, understood in the sense and according to the use they make of it, I shall give it one blow more, and leave it, I hope, a-dying.

I shall, then, briefly declare, that although these two things may admit of a distinction, yet they cannot of a separation, but that for whomsoever Christ obtained good, to them it might be applied; and for whomsoever he wrought reconciliation with God, they must actually unto God be reconciled. So that the blood of Christ, and his death in the virtue of it, cannot be looked on, as some do, as a medicine in a box, laid up for all that shall come to have any of it, and so applied now to one, then to another, without any respect or difference, as though it should be intended no more for one than for another; so that although he hath obtained all the good that he hath purchased for us, yet it is left indifferent and uncertain whether it shall ever be ours or no: for it is well known, that notwithstanding those glorious things that are assigned by the Arminians to the death of Christ, which they say he purchased for all, as remission of sins, reconciliation with God, and the like, yet they for whom this purchase and procurement is made may be damned, as the greatest part are, and certainly shall be. Now, that there should be such a distance between these two, —

First, It is contrary to common sense or our usual form of speaking, which must be wrested, and our understandings forced to apprehend it. When a man hath obtained an office, or any other obtained it for him, can it be said that it is uncertain whether he shall have it or no? If it be obtained for him, is it not his in right, thorough perhaps not in possession? That which is impetrated or obtained by petition is his by whom it is obtained. It is to offer violence to common sense to say a thing may be a man's, or it may not be his, when it is obtained for him; for in so saying we say it is his. And so it is in the purchase made by Jesus Christ, and the good things obtained by him for all them for whom he died.

Secondly, It is contrary to all reason in the world, that the death of Christ, in God's intention, should be applied to any one that shall have no share in the merits of that death. God's will that Christ should die for any, is his intention that he shall have a share in the death of Christ, that it should belong to him, — that is, be applied to him; for that is, in this case, said to be applied to any that is his in any respect, according to the will of God. But now the death of Christ, according to the opinion we oppose, is so applied to all, and yet the fruits of this death are never so much as once made known to far the greatest part of those all.

Thirdly, [It is contrary to reason] that a ransom should be paid for captives, upon compact for their deliverance, and yet upon the payment those captives not be made free and set at liberty. The death of Christ is a ransom, Matt. xx. 28, paid by compact for the deliverance of captives for whom it was a ransom; and the promise wherein his Father stood engaged to him at his undertaking to be a Saviour, and undergoing the office imposed on him, was their deliverance, as was before declared, upon his performance of these things: on that [being done, that] the greatest number of these captives should never be released, seems strange and very improbable.

Fourthly, It is contrary to Scripture, as was before at large declared. See [also book iii.] chap. x.

But now, all this our adversaries suppose they shall wipe away with one slight distinction, that will make, as they say, all we affirm in this kind to vanish; and that is this: "It is true," say they, "all things that are absolutely procured and obtained for any do presently become theirs in right for whom they are obtained; but things that are obtained upon condition become not theirs until the condition be fulfilled. Now, Christ hath purchased, by his death for all, all good things, not absolutely, but upon condition; and until that condition come to be fulfilled, unless they perform what is required, they have neither part nor portion, right unto nor possession of them." Also, what this condition is they give in, in sundry terms; some call it a not resisting of this redemption offered to them; some, a yielding to the invitation of the gospel; some, in plain terms, faith. Now, be it so that Christ purchaseth all things for us, to be bestowed on this condition, that we do believe it, then I affirm that, —

First, Certainly this condition ought to be revealed to all for whom this purchase is made, if it be intended for them in good earnest. All for whom he died must have means to know that his death will do them good if they believe; especially it being in his power alone to grant them these means who intends good to them by his death. If I should entreat a physician that could cure such a disease to cure all that came unto him, but should let many rest ignorant of the grant which I had procured of the physician, and none but myself could acquaint them with it, whereby they might go to him and be healed, could I be supposed to intend the healing of those people? Doubtless no. The application is easy.

Secondly, This condition of them to be required is in their power to perform, or it is not. If it be, then have all men power to believe; which is false: if it be not, then the Lord will grant them grace to perform it, or he will not. If he will, why then do not all believe? why are not all saved? if he will not, then this impetration, or obtaining salvation and redemption for all by the blood of Jesus Christ, comes at length to this:— God intendeth that he shall die for all, to procure for them remission of sins, reconciliation with him, eternal redemption and glory; but yet so that they shall never have the least good by these glorious things, unless they perform that which he knows they are no way able to do, and which none but himself can enable them to perform, and which concerning far the greatest part of them he is resolved not to do. Is this to intend that Christ should die for them for their good? or rather, that he should die for them to expose them to shame and misery? Is it not all one as if a man should promise a blind man a thousand pounds upon condition that he will see.

Thirdly, This condition of faith is procured for us by the death of Christ, or it is not. If they say it be not, then the chiefest grace, and without which redemption itself (express it how you please) is of no value, doth not depend on the grace of Christ as the meritorious procuring cause thereof; — which, first, is exceedingly injurious to our blessed Saviour, and serves only to diminish the honour and love due to him; secondly, is contrary to Scripture: Tit. iii. 5, 6; 2 Cor. v. 21, “He became sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.” And how we can become the righteousness of God but by believing, I know not. Yea, expressly saith the apostle, “It is given to us for Christ’s sake, on the behalf of Christ, to believe in him,” Phil. i. 29; “God blessing us with all spiritual blessing in him,” Eph. i. 3, whereof surely faith is not the least. If it be a fruit of the death of Christ, why is it not bestowed on all, since he died for all, especially since the whole impetration of redemption is altogether unprofitable without it? If they do invent a condition upon which this is bestowed, the vanity of that shall be afterward discovered. For the present, if this condition be, So they do not refuse or resist the means of grace, then I ask, if the fruit of the death of Christ shall be applied to all that fulfil this condition of not refusing or not resisting the means of grace? If not, then why is that produced? If so, then all must be saved that have not, or do not resist, the means of grace; that is, all pagans, infidels, and those infants to whom the gospel was never preached.

Fourthly, This whole assertion tends to make Christ but a half mediator, that should procure the end, but not the means conducing thereunto. So that, notwithstanding this exception and new distinction, our assertion stands firm, — That the fruits of the death of Christ, in respect of impetration of good and application to us, ought not to be divided; and our arguments to confirm it are unshaken.

For a close of all; that which in this cause we affirm may be summed up in this: Christ did not die for any upon condition, if they do believe; but he died for all God’s elect, that they should believe, and believing have eternal life. Faith itself is among the principal effects and fruits of the death of Christ; as shall be declared. It is nowhere said in Scripture, nor can it reasonably be affirmed, that if we believe, Christ died for us, as though our believing should make that to be which otherwise was not, — the act create the object [which is essentially witchcraft]; but Christ died for us that we might believe. Salvation, indeed, is bestowed conditionally; but faith, which is the condition, is absolutely procured. The question being thus stated, the difference laid open, and the thing in controversy made known, we proceed, in the next place, to draw forth some of those arguments, demonstrations, testimonies, and proofs, whereby the truth we maintain is established, in which it is contained, and upon which it is firmly founded: only desiring the reader to retain some notions in his mind of those fundamentals which in general we laid down before; they standing in such relation to the arguments which we shall use, that I am confident not one of them can be thoroughly answered before they be everted.

Universalism Explained - Arguments Against It

code175

The Death of Death in the Death of Christ

by John Owen

Book 3 Ch 1 p124-126

Book III Chapter I.

Arguments against the universality of redemption — The two first; from the nature of the new covenant, and the dispensation thereof.

Argument I. The first argument may be taken from the nature of the covenant of grace, which was established, ratified, and confirmed in and by the death of Christ; that was the testament whereof he was the testator, which was ratified in his death, and whence his blood is called “The blood of the new testament,” Matt. xxvi. 28. Neither can any effects thereof be extended beyond the compass of this covenant. But now this covenant was not made universally with all, but particularly only with some, and therefore those alone were intended in the benefits of the death of Christ.

The assumption appears from the nature of the covenant itself, described clearly, Jer. xxxi. 31, 32, “I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah: not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt; which my covenant they brake, though I was an husband to them, saith the Lord;” — and Heb. viii. 9–11, “Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord. For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws in their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people: and they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest.” Wherein, first, the condition of the covenant is not said to be required, but it is absolutely promised: “I will put my fear in their hearts.” And this is the main difference between the old covenant of works and the new one of grace, that in that the Lord did only require the fulfilling of the condition prescribed, but in this be promiseth to effect it in them himself with whom the covenant is made. And without this spiritual efficacy, the truth is, the new covenant would be as weak and unprofitable, for the end of a covenant (the bringing, of us and binding of us to God), as the old. For in what consisted the weakness and unprofitableness of the old covenant, for which God in his mercy abolished it? Was it not in this, because, by reason of sin, we were no way able to fulfil the condition thereof, “Do this, and live?” Otherwise the connection is still true, that “he that doeth these things shall live.” And are we of ourselves any way more able to fulfil the condition of the new covenant? Is it not as easy for a man by his own strength to fulfil the whole law, as to repent and savingly believe the promise of the gospel? This, then, is one main difference of these two covenants, — that the Lord did in the old only require the condition; now, in the new, he will also effect it in all the federates, to whom this covenant is extended. And if the Lord should only exact the obedience required in the covenant of us, and not work and effect it also in us, the new covenant would be a show to increase our misery, and not a serious imparting and communicating of grace and mercy. If, then, this be the nature of the new testament, — as appears from the very words of it, and might abundantly be proved, — that the condition of the covenant should certainly, by free grace, be wrought and accomplished in all that are taken into covenant, then no more are in this covenant than in whom those conditions of it are effected.

But thus, as is apparent, it is not with all; for “all men have not faith,” — it is “of the elect of God:” therefore, it is not made with all, nor is the compass thereof to be extended beyond the remnant that are according to election. Yea, every blessing of the new covenant being certainly common, and to be communicated to all the covenantees, either faith is none of them, or all must have it, if the covenant itself be general. But some may say that it is true God promiseth to write his law in our hearts, and put his fear in our inward parts; but it is upon condition. Give me that condition, and I will yield the cause. Is it if they do believe? Nothing else can be imagined. That is, if they have the law written in their hearts (as everyone that believes hath), then God promiseth to write his law in their hearts! Is this probable, friends? is it likely? I cannot, then, be persuaded that God hath made a covenant of grace with all, especially those who never heard a word of covenant, grace, or condition of it, much less received grace for the fulfilling of the condition; without which the whole would be altogether unprofitable and useless. The covenant is made with Adam, and he is acquainted with it, Gen. iii. 15, — renewed with Noah, and not hidden from him, — again established with Abraham, accompanied with a full and rich declaration of the chief promises of it, Gen. xii.; which is most certain not to be effected towards all, as afterwards will appear. Yea, that first distinction, between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent is enough to overthrow the pretended universality of the covenant of grace; for who dares affirm that God entered into a covenant of grace with the seed of the serpent?

Most apparent, then, it is that the new covenant of grace, and the promises thereof, are all of them of distinguishing mercy, restrained to the people whom God did foreknow; and so not extended universally to all. Now, the blood of Jesus Christ being the blood of this covenant, and his oblation intended only for the procurement of the good things intended and promised thereby, — for he was the surety thereof, Heb. vii. 22, and of that only, — it cannot be conceived to have respect unto all, or any but only those that are intended in this covenant.

1. Begin we with the first, — that the extending of the death of Christ unto a universality, in respect of the object, hath nothing in it, as peculiar unto it, that can give the least ground of consolation unto them whom God would have to be comforted. That gospel consolation, properly so called, being a fruit of actual reconciliation with God, is proper and peculiar only to believers, I laid down before, and suppose it to be a truth out of all question and debate. Now, that no consolation can be made out to them as such, from any thing which is peculiar to the persuasion of a general ransom, is easily proved by these following reasons:—

(1.) No consolation can arise unto believers from that which is nowhere in the Scripture proposed as a ground, cause, or matter of consolation, as the general ransom is not: for, — first, That which hath no being can have no affection nor operation; secondly, All the foundations and materials of consolation are things particular, and peculiar only to some, as shall be declared.

(2.) No consolation can accrue unto believers from that which is common unto them with those whom, — first, God would not have comforted; secondly, that shall assuredly perish to eternity; thirdly, that stand in open rebellion against Christ; fourthly, that never hear one word of gospel or consolation. Now, to all these, and such as these, doth the foundation of consolation, as proposed with and arising from the general ransom, equally appertain with the choicest of believers.

(3.) Let a man try in the time, not of disputation, but of desertion and temptation, what consolation or peace to his soul he can obtain from such a collection as this, “Christ died for all men; I am a man: therefore, Christ died for me.” Will not his own heart tell him, that notwithstanding all that he is assured of in that conclusion, the wrath of God may abide on him for evermore? Doth he not see that, notwithstanding this, the Lord showeth so little love unto millions of millions of the sons of men, of whom the former collection (according to the present opinion) is true as well as of himself, as that he doth not once reveal himself or his Son unto them? What good will it do me to know that Christ died for me, if notwithstanding that I may perish forever? If you intend me any consolation from that which is common unto all, you must tell me what it is which all enjoy which will satisfy my desires, which are carried out after assurance of the love of God in Christ. If you give me no more to comfort me than what you give, or might have given, to Judas, can you expect I should receive settlement and consolation? Truly, miserable comforters are ye all, physicians of no value, Job’s visitors, — skillful only to add affliction unto the afflicted.

“But be of good comfort,” will Arminians say; “Christ is a propitiation for all sinners, and now thou knowest thyself so to be.” Ans. True; but is Christ a propitiation for all the sins of those sinners? If so, how can any of them perish? If not, what good will this do me, whose sins perhaps (as unbelief) are such as for which Christ was not a propitiation? “But exclude not thyself; God excludeth none; the love which caused him to send his Son was general towards all.” Tell not me of God’s excluding; I have sufficiently excluded myself. Will he powerfully take me in? Hath Christ not only purchased that I shall be admitted, but procured me ability to enter into his Father’s arms? “Why, he hath opened a door of salvation to all.” Alas! is it not a vain endeavour, to open a grave for a dead man to come out? Who lights a candle for a blind man to see by? To open a door for him to come out of prison who is blind, and lame, and bound, yea dead, is rather to deride his misery than to procure him liberty. Never tell me that will yield me strong consolation, under the enjoyment whereof the greatest portion of men perish everlastingly.

2. The opinion concerning a general ransom is so far from yielding firm consolation unto believers from the death of Christ, that it quite overthrows all the choice ingredients of strong consolation which flow there hence; and that, — first, By strange divisions and divulsions of one thing from another, which ought to be conjoined to make up one certain foundation of confidence; secondly, By denying the efficacy of his death towards them for whom he died: both which are necessary attendants of that persuasion.

First, They so divide the impetration of redemption and the application thereof, — the first being in their judgments the only proper immediate fruit and effect of the death of Christ, — that the one may belong to millions who have no share in the other; yea, that redemption may be obtained for all, and yet no one have it so applied unto them as to be saved thereby. Now, the first of these, such as it is, is an ineffectual possible redemption, notwithstanding which all the sons of men might perish everlastingly, being the whole object of the death of Christ (as is asserted), separated and divided from all such application of redemption unto any as might make it profitable and useful in the least measure (for they deny this application to be a fruit of the death of Christ; if it were, why is it not common to all for whom he died?) What comfort this can in the least degree afford to any poor soul will not dive into my apprehension. “What shall I do?” saith the sinner; “the iniquity of my heels compasseth me about. I have no rest in my bones by reason of my sin: and now, whither shall I cause my sorrow to go?” Be of good cheer; Christ died for sinners. “Yea, but shall the fruits of his death be certainly applied unto all them for whom he died? If not, I may perish forever.” Here let them that can, answer him, according to the principles of Universalists, without sending him to his own strength in believing, or that which, in the close, will be resolved into it, “et erit mihi magnus Apollo:” and if they send him thither, they acknowledge the consolation concerning which they boast properly to proceed from ourselves, and not from the death of Christ.

Secondly, Their separating between the oblation and intercession of Jesus Christ makes little for the consolation of believers, yea, indeed, quite everts it.

There are, amongst others, two eminent places of Scripture wherein the Holy Ghost holdeth forth consolation to believers, against these two general causes of all their troubles and sorrows, — namely, their afflictions and their sins. The first is Rom. viii. 32–34, the other 1 John ii. 1, 2; in both which places the apostles make the bottom of the consolation which they hold out to believers in their afflictions and failings to be that strait bond and inseparable connection that is between these two, with the identity of their objects, — namely, the oblation and intercession of Jesus Christ. Let the reader consult both the texts, and he shall find that on this lies the stress, and herein consists the strength, of the several proposals for the consolation of believers; which, in both places, is principally intended. A more direct undertaking for this end and purpose cannot be produced. Now, the authors of universal redemption do all of them divide and separate these two; they allow of no connection between them, nor dependence of one upon another, farther than is effected by the will of man. His oblation they stretch to all; his intercession to a few only. Now, the death of Christ, separated from his resurrection and intercession, being nowhere proposed as a ground of consolation, yea, positively declared to be unsuitable to any such purpose, 1 Cor. xv. 14, certainly they who hold it out as so done are no friends to Christian consolation.

Thirdly, Their denial of the procurement of faith, grace, holiness, — the whole intendment of the new covenant, — and perseverance therein, by the death and blood-shedding of Jesus Christ, unto all them, or any of them, for whom he died, doth not appear to be so suitable an assertion for to raise consolation from his cross as is vainly pretended. I pray, what solid consolation can be drawn from such dry breasts as from whence none of these things do flow? That they have not immediate dependence on the death of Christ, according to the persuasion of the assertors of universal grace, hath been before declared, and is by themselves not only confessed, but undertaken to be proved. Now, where should a soul look for these things, but in the purchase of Christ? Whence should they flow, but from his side? Or is there any consolation to be had without them? Is not the strongest plea for these things, at the throne of grace, the procurement of the Lord Jesus? What promise is there of anything without him? Are not all the promises of God yea and amen in him? Is there any attainment of these things in our own strength? Is this the consolation you afford us, to send us from free grace to free will? Whither, I pray, according to this persuasion, should a poor soul go that finds himself in want of these things? “To God, who gives all freely.” But doth God bless us with any spiritual blessings but only in Jesus Christ? Doth he bless us with anything in him but what he hath procured for us? Is not all grace as well procured by as dispensed in a Mediator? Is this a way to comfort a soul, and that from the death of Christ, to let him know that Christ did not procure those things for him without which he cannot be comforted? “Credat Apella.”

It is, then, most apparent, that the general ransom (which is pretended) is so far from being the bottom of any solid consolation unto them whose due it is, that it is directly destructive of, and diametrically opposed unto, all those ways whereby the Lord hath declared himself willing that we should receive comfort from the death of his Son, drying up the breast from whence, and poisoning the streams whereby, it should be conveyed unto our souls.

3. The next thing we have to do is, to manifest that the doctrine of the effectual redemption of the elect only by the blood of Jesus is not liable to any just exception as to this particular, nor doth any way abridge believers of any part or portion of that consolation which God is willing they should receive. That alone which, by the opposers of it, with any colour of reason, is objected (for as for the exclamation of shutting out innumerable souls from any share in the blood of Christ, seeing confessedly they are reprobate unbelievers and persons finally impenitent, we are not at all moved at it), comes to this head:— “That there is nothing in the Scripture whereby any man can assure himself that Christ died for him in particular, unless we grant that he died for all.”

First, That this is notoriously false, the experience of all believers who, by the grace of God, have assured their hearts of their share and interest in Christ as held out unto them in the promise, without the least thought of universal redemption, is a sufficient testimony. Secondly, That the assurance arising from a practical syllogism, whereof one proposition is true in the word, and the second by the witness of the Spirit in the heart, is infallible, hath hitherto been acknowledged by all. Now, such assurance may all believers have that Christ died for them, with an intention and purpose to save their souls. For instance: all believers may draw out the truth of the word and the faith created¹ in their hearts into this conclusion:— [First,] “Christ died for all believers,” — that is, all who choose him and rest upon him as an all-sufficient Saviour; not that he died for them as such, but that all such are of those for whom he died. He died not for believers as believers, though he died for all believers; but for all the elect as elect, who, by the benefit of his death, do become believers, and so obtain assurance that he died for them. [As] for such of those that are elected who are not yet believers, though Christ died for them, yet we deny that they can have any assurance of it whilst they continue such. You suppose it a foul contradiction, if a man should be said to have assurance that Christ died for him in particular, and yet continue an unbeliever. This first proposition, as in the beginning laid down, is true in the word, in innumerable places. Secondly, The heart of a believer, in the witness of the Spirit, assumes, “But I believe in Christ;” that is, “I choose him for my Saviour, cast and roll myself on him alone for salvation, and give up myself unto him, to be disposed of unto mercy in his own way.” Of the truth of this proposition in the heart of a believer, and the infallibility of it, there are also many testimonies in the word, as is known to all; from whence the conclusion is, “Therefore the Lord Jesus Christ died for me in particular, with an intention and purpose to save me.”

This is such a collection as all believers, and none but believers, can justly make, so that it is peculiar to them alone; and unto those only is this treasure of consolation to be imparted. The sufficiency of the death of Christ for the saving of every one, without exception, that comes unto him, is enough to fill all the invitations and entreaties of the gospel unto sinners, to induce them to believe; which when, by the grace of Christ, they do, closing with the promise, the fore-mentioned infallible assurance of the intention and purpose of Christ to redeem them by his death, Matt. i. 21, is made known unto them. Now, whether this be not a better bottom and foundation for a man to assure his soul unto rest and peace upon, than that reasoning which our opposers in this business must, suitably to their own principles, lay as a common stone, — namely, “Christ died for all men; I am a man: therefore Christ died for me,” — let any man judge; especially considering that indeed the first proposition is absolutely false, and the conclusion, if it could be true, yet, according to their persuasion, can be no more ground of consolation than Adam’s fall. All this is spoken not as though either one opinion or other were able of itself to give consolation, which God alone, in the sovereignty of his free grace, can and doth create; but only to show what principles are suitable to the means whereby he worketh on and towards his elect.

4. The drawing of gospel consolation from the death of Christ, as held out to be effectual towards the elect only, for whom alone he died, should close up our discourse; but considering, first, how abundantly this hath been done by divers eminent and faithful labourers in the vineyard of the Lord already; secondly, how it is the daily task of the preachers of the gospel to make it out to the people of God; thirdly, how it would carry me out, besides my purpose, to speak of things in a practical, so atheological way, having designed this discourse to be purely polemical; and, fourthly, that such things are no more expected nor welcome to wise and learned men, in controversies of this nature, than knotty, crabbed, scholastic objections in popular sermons and doctrinal discourses, intended merely for edification, — I shall not proceed therein. Only, for a close, I desire the reader to peruse that one place, Rom. viii. 32–34; and I make no doubt but that he will, if not infected with the leaven of the error opposed, conclude with me, that if there be any comfort, any consolation, any assurance, any rest, any peace, any joy, any refreshment, any exultation of spirit, to be obtained here below, it is all to be had in the blood of Jesus long since shed, and his intercession still continued; as both are united and appropriated to the elect of God, by the precious effects and fruits of them both drawn to believe and preserved in believing, to the obtaining of an immortal crown of glory, that shall not fade away.

The Meaning of the Word, World

code176

[An analysis of the word world by John Owen, The Death of Death in the Death of Christ; my comments in \[blue\]](#)

Book IV Ch II p213-217 (p325 online)

Secondly, The second thing controverted is the object of this love, pressed by the word “world;” which our adversaries would have to signify all and every man; we, the elect of God scattered abroad in the world, with a tacit opposition to the nation of the Jews, who alone, excluding all other nations (some few proselytes excepted), before the actual exhibition of Christ in the flesh, had all the benefits of the promises appropriated to them, Rom. ix. 4; in which privilege now all nations were to have an equal share. To confirm the exposition of the word as used by the Universalists, nothing of weight, that ever yet I could see, is brought forth, but only the word itself; for neither the love mentioned in the beginning, nor the design pointed at in the end of the verse, will possibly agree with the sense which they impose on that word in the middle. Besides, how weak and infirm an inference from the word world, by reason of its ambiguous and wonderful various acceptations, is, we have at large declared before.

Three poor shifts I find in the great champions of this course, to prove that the word world doth not signify the elect. Justly we might have expected some reasons to prove that it signified or implied all and every man in the world, which was their own assertion; but of this ye have a deep silence, being conscious, no doubt, of their disability for any such performance. Only, as I said, three pretended arguments they bring to disprove that which none went about to prove, — namely, that by the world is meant the elect as such; for though we conceive the persons here designed directly men in and of the world, to be all and only God’s elect, yet we do not say that they are here so considered, but rather under another notion, as men scattered over all the world, in themselves subject to misery and sin. So that whosoever will oppose our exposition of this place must either, first, prove that by the world here must be necessarily understood all and every man in the world; or, secondly, that it cannot be taken indefinitely for men in the world which materially are elect, though not considered under that formality. So that all those vain flourishes which some men make with these words, by putting the word elect into the room of the word world, and then coining absurd consequences, are quite beside the business in hand. Yet, farther, we deny that by a supply of the word elect into the text any absurdity or untruth will justly follow. Yea, and that flourish which is usually so made is but a bugbear to frighten weak ones; for, suppose we should read it thus, “God so loved the elect, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish,” what inconvenience will now follow? “Why,” say they, “that some of the elect, whom God so loved as to send his Son for, may perish.” Why, I pray? Is it because he sent his Son that they might not perish? or what other cause? “No; but because it is said, that whosoever of them believeth on him should not perish; which intimates that some of them might not believe.” Very good! But where is any such intimation? God designs the salvation of all them in express words for whom he sends his Son; and certainly all that shall be saved shall believe. But it is in the word whosoever, which is distributive of the world into those that believe and those that believe not. Ans. First, If this word whosoever be distributive, then it is restrictive of the love of God to some, and not to others, — to one part of the distribution, and not to the other. And if it do not restrain the love of God, intending the salvation of some, then it is not distributive of the fore-mentioned object of it; and if it do restrain it, then all are not intended in the love which moved God to give his Son. Secondly, I deny that the word here is distributive of the object of God’s love, but only declarative of his end and aim in giving Christ in the pursuit of that love, — to wit, that all believers might be saved. So that the sense is, “God so loved his elect throughout the world, that he gave his Son with this intention, that by him believers might be saved.” And this is all that is by any (besides a few worthless cavils) objected from this place to disprove our interpretation; which we shall now confirm both positively and negatively:—

First, Our first reason is taken from what was before proved concerning the nature of that love which is here said to have the world for its object, which cannot be extended to all and everyone in the world, as will be confessed by all. Now, such is the world, here, as is beloved with that love which we have here described, and proved to be here intended; — even such a love as is, first, the most transcendent and remarkable; secondly, an eternal act of the will of God; thirdly, the cause of sending Christ; fourthly, of giving all good things in and with him; fifthly, an assured fountain and spring of salvation to all beloved with it. So that the world beloved with this love cannot possibly be all and everyone in the world.

Secondly, The word world in the next verse, which carries along the sense of this, and is a continuation of the same matter, being a discovery of the intention of God in giving his Son, must needs signify the elect and believers, at least only those who in the event are saved; therefore so also in this. It is true, the word world is three times used in that verse in a dissonant sense, by an inversion not unusual in the Scripture, as was before declared. It is the latter place that this hath reference to, and is of the same signification with the world in verse 16, “That the world through him might be saved,” — ἵνα σωθῆ, “that it should be saved.” It discovers the aim, purpose, and intention of God, what it was towards the world that he so loved, even its salvation. Now, if this be understood of any but believers, God fails of his aim and intention, which as yet we dare not grant.

Thirdly, It is not unusual with the Scripture to call God's chosen people by the name of the world, as also of all flesh, all nations, all families of the earth, and the like general expressions; and therefore no wonder if here they are so called, the intension of the place being to exalt and magnify the love of God towards them, which receives no small advancement from their being every way a world. So are they termed where Christ is said to be their Saviour, John iv. 42; which certainly he is only of them who are saved. A Saviour of men not saved is strange. Also John vi. 51, where he is said to give himself for their life. Clearly, verse 33 of the same chapter, he "giveth life unto the world:" which whether it be any but his elect let all men judge; for Christ himself affirms that he gives life only to his "sheep," and that those to whom he gives life "shall never perish," chap. x. 27, 28. So Rom. iv. 13, Abraham is said by faith to be "heir of the world;" who, verse 11, is called to be father of the faithful. And Rom. xi. 12, the fall of the Jews is said to be "the riches of the world;" which world compriseth only believers of all sorts in the world, as the apostle affirmed that the word bare fruit "in all the world," Col. i. 6. This is that "world" which "God reconcileth to himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them," 2 Cor. v. 19; which is attended with blessedness in all them to whom that non-imputation belongeth, Rom. iv. 8. And for divers evident reasons is it that they have this appellation; as, — First, to distinguish the object of this love of God from the nature angelical, which utterly perished in all the fallen individuals; which the Scripture also carefully doth in express terms, Heb. ii. 16, and by calling this love of God $\phi\lambda\nu\theta\rho\omega\pi\acute{\iota}\alpha$, Tit. iii. 4. Secondly, To evert and reject the boasting of the Jews, as though all the means of grace and all the benefits intended were to them appropriated. Thirdly, To denote that great difference and distinction between the old administration of the covenant, when it was tied up to one people, family, and nation, and the new, when all boundaries being broken up, the fulness of the Gentiles and the corners of the world were to be made obedient to the sceptre of Christ. Fourthly, To manifest the condition of the elect themselves, who are thus beloved, for the declaration of the free grace of God towards them, they being divested of all qualifications but only those that bespeak them terrene, earthly, lost, miserable, corrupted. So that thus much at least may easily be obtained, that from the word itself nothing can be opposed justly to our exposition of this place, as hath been already declared, and shall be farther made manifest.

Fourthly, If everyone in the world be intended, why doth not the Lord, in the pursuit of this love, reveal Jesus Christ to everyone whom he so loved? Strange! that the Lord should so love men as to give his only-begotten Son for them, and yet not once by any means signify this his love to them, as to innumerable he doth not! — that he should love them, and yet order things so, in his wise dispensation, that this love should be altogether in vain and fruitless! — love them, and yet determine that they shall receive no good by his love, though his love indeed be a willing of the greatest good to them!

Fifthly, Unless ye will grant, — first, Some to be beloved and hated also from eternity; secondly, The love of God towards innumerable to be fruitless and vain; thirdly, The Son of God to be given to them who, first, never hear word of him; secondly, have no power granted to believe in him; fourthly, That God is mutable in his love, or else still loveth those that be in hell; fifthly, That he doth not give all things to them to whom he gives his Son, contrary to Rom. viii. 32; sixthly, That he knows not certainly beforehand who shall believe and be saved; — unless, I say, all these blasphemies and absurdities be granted, it cannot be maintained that by the world here is meant all and every one of mankind, but only men in common scattered throughout the world, which are the elect.

The third difference about these words is, concerning the means whereby this love of the Father, whose object is said to be the world is made out unto them. Now, this is by believing, ἵνα πᾶς ὁ πιστεύων, — “that whosoever believeth,” or “that every believer.” The intention of these words we take to be, the designing or manifesting of the way whereby the elect of God come to be partakers of the fruits of the love here set forth, — namely, by faith in Christ, God having appointed that for the only way whereby he will communicate unto us the life that is in his Son. To this something was said before, having proved that the term whosoever is not distributive of the object of the love of God; to which, also, we may add these following reasons:—

First, If the object be here restrained, so that some only believe and are saved of them for whose sake Christ is sent, then this restriction and determination of the fruits of this love dependeth on the will of God, or on the persons themselves. If on the persons themselves, then make they themselves to differ from others; contrary to 1 Cor. iv. 7. If on the will of God, then you make the sense of the place, as to this particular, to be, “God so loved all as that but some of them should partake of the fruits of his love.” To what end, then, I pray, did he love those other some? Is not this, “Out with the sword, and run the dragon through with the spear?”

Secondly, Seeing that these words, that whosoever believeth, do peculiarly point out the aim and intention of God in this business, if it do restrain the object beloved, then the salvation of believers is confessedly the aim of God in this business, and that distinguished from others; and if so, the general ransom is an empty sound, having no dependence on the purpose of God, his intention being carried out in the giving of his Son only to the salvation of believers, and that determinately, unless you will assign unto him a nescience of them that should believe.

These words, then, whosoever believeth, containing a designation of the means whereby the Lord will bring us to a participation of life through his Son, whom he gave for us; and the following words, of having life everlasting, making out the whole counsel of God in this matter, subordinate to his own glory; it followeth, —

That God gave not his Son, — 1. For them who never do believe; 2. Much less for them who never hear of him, and so evidently want [lack] means of faith; 3. For them on whom he hath determined not to bestow effectual grace, that they might believe.

Let now the reader take up the several parts of these opposite expositions, weigh all, try all things, especially that which is especially to be considered, the love of God, and so inquire seriously whether it be only a general affection, and a natural velleity to the good of all, which may stand with the perishing of all and every one so beloved, or the peculiar, transcendent love of the Father to his elect, as before laid down; and then determine whether a general ransom, fruitless in respect of the most for whom it was paid, or the effectual redemption of the elect only, have the firmest and strongest foundation in these words of our Saviour; withal remembering that they are produced as the strongest supportment of the adverse cause, with which, it is most apparent, both the cause of sending Christ and the end intended by the Lord in so doing, as they are here expressed, are altogether inconsistent.

Dangers of False Doctrine, Arminianism

by Thomas Shepard

This is heavy -

This is the danger of promoting or holding to false doctrine (e.g. Arminianism) or not preaching the whole council of God. And this would include a person just being satisfied with the elementary principles of Christ and not going into the mysteries of God...just staying or being content with staying on the surface of things. Angels desire to look into these mysteries; should we not also? hence 2Cor3:18, Rom. 12:1, etc. Mysteries include the hypostatic union, unconditional election, limited atonement, God's decrees, foreknowledge, freedom of the will, God's sovereignty, man's total dependence upon God morally and physically...the wisdom and way of salvation, the offices of Christ: prophet, king and priest, and so on. This is the problem of not preaching the whole council of God to the church (i.e., just preaching a sugar coated messages and stories or a message without salt so as not to offend); first, it plays to the carnal apprehensions of men and hence keeps them in bondage to their lusts; secondly, it does not feed the sheep. Such preaching is subject to God's displeasure as Jesus exhibited to the lawyers, "Woe to you lawyers! For you have taken away the key of knowledge. You did not enter in yourselves, and those who were entering in you hindered." Lk 11:52.

And Matt 23:15, "Woe to you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! For you travel land and sea to win one proselyte, and when he is won, you make him twice as much a son of hell as yourselves."

A Wholesome Caveat - A Time for Liberty

By Thomas Shepard - 1640s

This is certain: when the soul will not subject itself to God, he goes about to subject God to him, nay, to his lusts. Is 43:24 "Thou hast made me to serve with thy sins." (KJV) For one of them must stoop, and a man would have the Lord be merciful, patient and pitiful to him, when he is in league with his lusts: now this the Lord will not do. [And this is the main reason why the sinner's prayer is a sham, a wicked presumption. It is a person, a natural man, wanting the Lord to stoop to him while he is yet still in league with his lusts! (see Ps50:16-) That is the real language of the heart of the person making this prayer; for this person is not saved while he is making this prayer, hence cannot receive or know anything truly spiritual (1Cor.2:14) the supposed object of his prayer. All he wants is what God has but does not truly want God for who he is. Hence the sinner's prayer or any attempt to come to God by a human prayer, is the height of man's rebellion and declaration of his independence from God and is exceedingly provoking. The only way to God is by effectual vocation.] And hence, if he does not destroy him, he withdraws himself from serving of the creature, and hence other evils take hold of it, and bring it under. When Adam stood and was for God, all creatures served him, and the riches of God's goodness preserved him, the Lord communicated the sweet of his government or service to him; but when turned away from the right ways of God, now, if the Lord should serve him by governing of him in goodness, he should serve a lust, and bow to the creature, nay, to a lust, which is a viler thing than for one creature to fall down and worship another. Therefore, now, hence it comes to pass, because the Lord will not be a servant to any man's lust, there must be some other government that must seize upon them. [see Rom. 1:26] Hence set all the saints in the churches with their faces subjected to the Lord, his good will and righteous ways, and then his goodness shall flow down upon them in and through Christ; for otherwise we have nothing to do with good, but when we are set right for God. Hos. 2:19 "I will betroth thee unto me forever, yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness, in judgment, in loving kindness, and mercy," etc. The Lord will then command all creatures to be serviceable to his church and people. Ver. 21, 22 But on the contrary, misery must needs seize upon the soul that doth cast off the government of the Lord Jesus. Thus much for the general explication of the point. Now, in particular –

1. What is this government or service of God?
2. What is that bondage he captivates his unto?
3. Why doth the Lord do thus?

Ques. 1. What is this government or service of God which being shaken off, the Lord gives them over to bondage?

Ans. There is a double government of the Lord over his people.

1. Internal or inward, of which our Saviour speaks. Luke xvii 21. The kingdom of God (saith Christ) comes not by observation and outward pomp; "For behold the kingdom of God is within you." And this is nothing else in general, but when the Lord does by his Spirit in the word of his grace cause the whole soul willingly to submit and subject itself to the whole will of God so far as it is made known to it; this is the inward kingdom of God and government of Christ in the soul. Rom viii 14 "So many as are led by the Spirit are the sons of God." Ps cx 2 "The Lord shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion," etc., 2 Cor. x 4, "For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds." Ver. 5, "Bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ." There are mighty boisterous distempers but the Lord, when he comes in his kingdom, to sit upon the royal throne of the hearts of his people, now they fly; and this is the inward kingdom of Christ, like a poor subject pardoned and received to favor, he is before the face of the prince continually attending on him. Rev vii 14, 15 "These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Ver. 15 "Therefore are they before the throne of God. and serve him day and night in his temple," etc. Now, this is meant in part by God's service in these days; do you think the Lord cared for thousands of rams? No, but to walk humbly. Micah vi. Did he care for temple and ordinances? No, but (Isa. 1:19) "If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land." Neh. ix 20 "In these days he gave them his good Spirit to instruct them."

2. External or outward, the end and instigation of which was to set up and help forward the inward; for external ordinances are nothing in themselves, mean things but as they are appointed and sanctified for this end, they are most glorious; and therefore Christ threatens the Jews (Matt xxi 43) that the kingdom should be taken from them. What was that? Surely not inward, for that they had, not but the outward and external means called God's kingdom; all these helps and means shall be taken from you and all laid ruinous. Now, his external kingdom of Christ is double.

1. The external kingdom or government of God by his church in the administration and execution, and subjection to the blessed ordinances of God, wherein the power and kingdom of Christ is seen; and thus, (Dan ii 44 45 vii 27) "It shall be given to the saints of the Most High," etc. Not to profane herds of beasts or cages of unclean birds, but to the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all the princes of the world shall subject themselves to this kingdom of Christ.

This outward kingdom Christ administereth amongst his people in this world: and this was part of the Lord's government over his people herein, though various from our form now.

2. Of the commonwealth which may have divers forms, and had in the time of Israel; but it receiving its law from God and governing for God, hence it was the government of God, and subjection hereunto was subjection and service to God himself. And hence. when the people cast off Samuel, 1 Sam viii 7, "They have not rejected thee but me." Rev xi 15, "The kingdoms of the world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever." For although the commonwealth of Israel was made up of the church and hence Josephus calls it a theocracy where the Lord governed and yet the same thing had divers (yootc-greek), forms and respects, and hence there was a diverse government then, and hence made diverse, 2 Chron xix 5 8 "Jehoshaphat sets judges in the land throughout all the fenced cities." Such is the wildness, boldness, and carelessness of men's hearts, that they do not only need laws but watchmen over them to see they be kept, and hence the Lord appointed some chief, some judges in every city, and also some in every village, as by proportion may be gathered, Exod xviii; every ten men had one over them. Now, this was the blessed wisdom of God to put all into sweet subordination one unto another for himself.

1. Everyone professing his name is made for God, for Christ, "as Lord of lords unto whom every knee must bow," and inwardly subject.

2. Hence the Lord (it being not good to leave man to himself) erects a kingdom of the church with his own power and authority and government in it for that end.

3. This being poor and shiftless against inward and outward revenge, hence the Lord sets up kingdoms of the world, which either rule for this end or these ends or not. If they do not, they are to answer it and shall one day to Christ, "whom God hath made head over all things to the church." Eph. i 22. If they do, then their government, judgment and kingdom is the Lord's in a special manner; and hence break the yoke of subjection to any one of these, you cast off Christ the Lord's government and service; and being so linked together, in truth if you break one you break all, and this will provoke the Lord to make you kiss the clink, and to put your necks under iron bondage that refuse subjection to him.

Ques 2. What is that bondage or other government to which the Lord gives over his people when they have cast off his government: this will provoke the Lord if the Lord be cast off, and the casting off the government of Christ will bring the most famous kingdoms, churches and families into bondage; you will say, What is this bondage? When is it that the Lord takes his season for the execution of it?

Ans 1. The Lord takes his own times to do it; these were a twelvemonth before the Lord sent Shishak. Here he was more quick. Nebuchadnezzar comes at last, and many years it is before the Lord doth it.

2. The Lord is various in working as he is wonderful and hath divers ways or means of bondage, he hath more prisons and chains than one.

1. Sometimes the Lord opens the door of a kingdom or state for the inroad of some foreign, or it may be barbarous enemy, breaking in sometimes by power, coming in sometimes by craft, and then ruling like lions, which the Lord makes to vex and prick the people of God; thus here their lives were spared, but liberties lost. Thus, Judg. ii 13 14, "They forsook the Lord and served Baal and Ashtaroth;" and in verse 14, "The anger of the Lord waxed hot against Israel and he delivered them into the hands of spoilers that spoiled them." Ver 15, "Whithersoever they went out, the hand of the Lord was against them for evil." And this the Lord doth many times suddenly, that one would never think that ever the Lord should be so sudden; the Lord can be as quick to punish as man to sin, and that pg 291 unexpectedly. Eccl ix 12, "Man knows not his time, but is taken like fish in an evil net suddenly." Lam iv 12, "The kingdoms of the earth and all the inhabitants of the world would not have believed." Judg. v 8, "They set up new gods and war was in the gate."

2. Sometimes the Lord turns the edge of that lawful authority God hath set over them against themselves, to be a heavy scourge from God upon them. Thus it was with Israel in Egypt, Ex i 8, 9 there arose a king which knew not Joseph, and it is said then they were oppressed. Thus Jeroboam, whom the ten tribes chose, (Hos v 11) he oppressed the people, he will be innovating, and this becomes their oppression. Thus the people under the reign of degenerate Solomon, (though their complaint might be in part unjust). Such is the venom of sin and unsubduedness to the kingdom of God, that the Lord turns light into darkness and makes an aching head matter of sorrow to all the state and body of people. Eccl x 16, "Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child." And one man shall do a world of hurt, one Shebna or Amaziah, and this the Lord doth in justice many times for casting off his government justice many for casting off his government.

3. Sometimes the Lord gives a people up into the hands of one another to be mutual oppressors of each other, that a man's neighbor shall be his oppressor. Zech xi 9, "I will pity no more the inhabitants of the land, I will deliver them every one into his neighbor's hands. I will feed you no more; that which dieth, let it die, and that which is cut off, let it be cut off and let the rest eat every one the flesh of another." Sometimes the Lord is pleased to send marvelous straits into a place that men are forced to imbondage themselves sometimes by words as bitter as death, as sharp as arrows; the Lord is pleased for the forsaking of his righteous ways, to make a man's self rip his own bowels, the father against the child, the master shall be a scourge to the servant, and the servant shall be a scourge to his master, weary him of his life, the government of the Lord in a man's heart or family being cast off; (Micah vii 4 5), "Trust not in a friend." No greater bondage in the world than for men professing the Lord to be desperately set one against another.

4. By taking from a people all that righteous power of government the Lord hath set over them, when a people despising the Lord and inward government first, (for there all begins), and so not prizing what they have, nor praying for them, nor subjecting to them, the Lord hereupon sends some sickness or some other evil that they are either suddenly taken away or gradually; and when they are gone, all sink, or else such cross carriages that as Moses said, so say they, "I cannot bear this people." Thus Judges xxi 25 "Men did what was right in own eyes when there was no king in Israel." No state so miserable as an anarchy, when everyone is a slave, because everyone will be a master. Thus, Isa. 3:1,2,6, "Be a ruler to us." No, I will not undertake to rule. So 2Chron xv 3, 5, when without a teaching priest, then no peace at all; men will not be under government of them, you shall not have them; they shall rest in peace; and you shall then know the want of them.

5. By giving them over to Satan's and their own hearts' lusts, that seeing they will not serve the Lord, they shall serve their lusts and their sins, that now the Lord he hath left off chastising of men, and conscience shall check no more, prosper, saith the Lord, and go on in thy sin. Ps 81:12 "So I gave them up to their own hearts lusts and they walked after their own counsels." Rev 22:11, "Let him that is filthy be filthy still.'

When the Lord shall give a man over to Satan not only to winnow him, to let out the chaff and so to make the grain the purer, or to buffet them as he did Paul, but to insnare them and hold them, that he shall not only tempt, but his temptations shall take and not only take, but holds (2 Tim ii ult) "who are taken captive by him at his will;" taken alive, as a snare doth, that now a man is beyond the reach of all means, only peradventure God may give repentance. Is i 5, "Why should ye be stricken anymore? ye will revolt yet more and more." The Lord leaves smiting and says, Go on and prosper in thy sin; and which is the worst of all, Satan shall so Wind him and harden him, fill him with pride, passion, lying hatred of God's people, caviling against the Lord's ways of grace, slighting of his betters, despising of wholesome counsel from his dearest friends, that he knows not that gray hairs are upon him. And after this, when God hath cast out, it may be the church doth also, a most fearful bondage that the Lord gives such a soul over unto.

There are two reasons of this point which I collect only from the story in this chapter.

Reason 1. In regard of the righteous judgment of God. It is just and equal that he that will not be ruled by this blessed Lord Jesus, he should be ruled by his lusts; he that will not be in subjection to a merciful Christ, he should be in bondage to unmerciful men: this a humbled heart will acknowledge, as these do here. (Ver 6) They acknowledged the Lord to be righteous. Man being fallen, it had been righteous with God to have left all men as the angels that fell in chains of darkness forever. But among his church and people the Lord sends the gospel to proclaim liberty, and with it sends Christ with his Spirit, to come to the prison doors of poor sinners, to give repentance as well as remission of sins; and now, if they will not come out of their bondage, accept of the Lord's liberty, it is exceeding righteous to deal with them as we do with prisoners condemned to die; if the prince comes to the prison doors, and says, I am come to give thee thy life, nay, and here is pardon, nay, favor, and to pull off thy chains also; now, if he says, No, I had rather be in prison, everyone will say it is just, and as it was in the year of jubilee, he that would not go free was to be a bondman forever. It is very righteous to give men their own choice; it is no wrong to let them have their own will: if, indeed, the laws of Christ were Draco's laws, hard and heavy, there were something to object; but they are most sweet, and for which of all other blessings men have cause to bless him. Ps cxlvii ult.

Reason 2. In regard of the mercy or merciful wisdom of the Lord toward his church and people, especially his peculiar ones, that hereby they keep the closer to the Lord, set a higher price upon the rules and government of the Lord, love his kingdom the more and the liberties thereof and use them better when they have them again, so here, "that they may know my service," etc. How sweet it is. Experience, we say, is the mistress of fools; such is the foolishness of men's hearts that men are many times never truly taught a truth till they are taught it by sense, Prov. v 11, "and thou mourn at last when thy flesh is consumed:" tell a man of all the glory of the saints, they never understand it till they feel it; tell men of the woe of their ways, they will not believe it till they see it. Ps xxxii 9, "Be not as the horse or mule, that hath no understanding, whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle." Hos x 11, "Ephraim is like a heifer that is taught." Like untamed horses that will cast their rider unless they be held under and backed, and then they are gentle, so it is here; and truly it is long before a man can learn the sweet of Christ's government; hence Israel must be long in Egyptian bondage, and many long miseries, so that, if there be either justice or mercy in the Lord, he will do this and this point shall be true.

Use 1. Hence, then, see that the greatest liberty and sweetest liberty is to be under the government of Christ Jesus, although men do not think so; hence the Lord tells them here "they shall know my service:" they might have replied, "We do know it. No, till they be in bonds they know it not, nor can not learn it. So it is now; and hence, let men observe while they live loosely, and are guided by their own wisdom, for their own ends, according to their own will, at peradventures, at rovers, as they please, they do think this liberty very sweet and it is better than to be curbed in. But let the Lord strike an arrow in the heart of these wild bucks that have broke park and pale, send affliction and an iron yoke of sorrow upon them, or distress of conscience, if there be any sense and feeling left, they will bemoan themselves and say, I did think my liberty sweet, but now I see it is bitter in a sinful way, and the Lord's way was most sweet by their own confession. Hence Ps ii 3, "Let us break their bands," etc. But O, now hence learn this truth, and digest it thoroughly that the greatest liberty lies here. Do not, in thy judgment, think Christian liberty lies in being freed from the law as a rule of obedience in respect of the matter of it to be done, nor in thy practice. But know though thou didst meet with a thousand sorrows with it and griefs yet it is sweet. Christ's "yoke" Matt xi 30 "is easy and his burden light." What, when not a hole to hide his head in, when a reproach of men, a worm and no man, when he bore the Father's wrath? Yes, when he was meek under it, "Not mine but thy will be done," it was then most sweet, 1 Kings ix 21, 22 To be a servant to Solomon is no bondage, Ps cxix 32, "I will run, when thou shalt enlarge my heart."

Use 2. Hence see the reason why the Lord hath deprived his churches of their liberty, and his government over them at sundry times, and hath put them under iron yokes and bonds and sore pressures; the reason is shown; they have either openly or more secretly cast off the government of the Lord; here hath been the very wound, the ail of all churches famous and glorious. Ps lxxxix 14 "O, that they had hearkened! I should then soon have subdued their enemies.' The cause is not so hard to find to a discerning spirit who is privy in any measure to the counsels of God, 1 Kings ix 8 9, Solomon hath a promise that "the Lord's eyes and heart shall be to his people" which are under him; but if once they slip the collar, then woe, and why? "Because they forsook the Lord that brought them out of Egypt;" they had liberty but they cast it off.

What do you think was the moving cause of all those bloody persecutions when the blood of dogs was more precious than of Christian churches? Were not they godly? Yes, I do not doubt of it. But as it was here, though humbled, they must be in bondage, because they had cast off the government of the Lord Jesus. And hence in the apostle's time evil times were come, sad apostasies from the truth, and because it was long before they were low enough. And hence, (Rev vi), till the fifth seal was opened; no crying, as it was with Israel in bondage, no prayer to purpose, and because the Lord saw they would abuse all liberties if they had them. And hence in Constantine's time when peace came in, contention came with it, and so abused all that their peace was their poison. And hence, in the primitive churches, they began to cast off the government of the Lord Jesus murmurings there were; hence came persecution; but they were a precious people and made blessed use of it. And the Lord couples their chief persecution with their rest. And it is said, Acts ix 31, "Then had the churches rest." etc.

And what do you think of the reason of the long reign of Antichrist, exalting himself above God and all that is called God, bringing the church under the heaviest bondage for body and soul that ever the earth saw. Men did not love the truth, either speculative to guide their minds, or practical to rule their wills, and hence left to this day.

What is the cause of bleeding Germany's woe? O, poor Germany! whence the gospel first brake out in its full strength, that now it is a field of blood, that men in woods like satyrs are afraid of men and men in cities glad to eat the entrails of beasts and sometimes the flesh of their own babes to preserve their lives. What, was there no evil. but the common condition of the church to be under the cross? Ask them, they cannot tell what ails them but curse the emperor and Swedes, etc. O, think of it with sorrow, in secret for them that know it not themselves, they have secretly, I say, secretly cast off the government of a merciful Christ, and hence are under the hand of unmerciful men.

What is the cause in our native country, notwithstanding all prayers and tears no deliverance? Truly men do not know it, but the Lord sees it, they know not how to use their liberty.

And for ourselves what shall I say? I cannot but bless God and wonder to see how it is with many and rejoice to see many precious holy ones to whom one day in God's court is sweeter than a thousand elsewhere; but I must profess, and cannot but mourn for others, men that were eminent under bondage but never worse than here; as if the Lord should say, Look, here be your eminent ones; look and fear and mourn, you ministers of my house; here be the people you had thought had been converted and that of all others such a one would never have fallen so; one an opinion takes him, another a lot, another loose company, another his lust, another goes proud, another fierce, another murmuring. What, should I name all? O, that my words might be healing! etc.

Use 3. Hence see what will become of us that are now under the government of the Lord, if ever we cast it off, either inward or outward, or both. We are not dearer to him than his people Israel here, nay, Judah. When old Israel, the great and numerous tribes of Israel, had set up calves, little Judah and Benjamin received the priests; and yet they fell, and were in bondage. I know we are not yet in bondage; yet it is not more unseasonable to speak now than for the Lord to Solomon, 1 Kings ix.

Quest. But there being much unsubduedness in the hearts of the best, how shall one know when there be such sins for which the Lord will cast from under his government?

Ans. 1 When men do not loathe their own hearts for the unprofitableness, but loathe God's ordinances secretly and grow weary of them as of their burdens because of the unprofitableness of them, when a people find not that special good by them, which recompenseth all losses, and so prize them, but lay blame on them because unfruitful to them, Mai iii 13. He speaks to a people got out of captivity, "Your words have been stout against me;" no, say, they, "It is in vain to serve the Lord; what profit is there in this?" You must conceive they had profit they many losses, were very poor, as ver. 11, a temptation which a proud heart can not endure above any; here is now no profit in mourning, fasting, etc., and God's own people began to think so; and hence ver 16, "Then they spake often one to another;" there was good effect of his sermon. Now what follows"? Chapter iv 1, Hence the wicked shall come and cut off branch and root in Antiochus's time; there is a burning day a coming that shall burn down house, root and branch; and hence, Matt xxi 43, "The kingdom shall be given to them that bring forth fruit." You will say, We do; no, thy own mouth shall condemn thee: you do not you find no good by all the ordinances of God and hence come those questions; what warrant for such an ordinance? The bottom is, they never felt good of it, and hence grow weary of it. Well, if it be your burden, the Lord will ease you of it.

2. When you see men (professing the fear of God) mutually naturally contentious and continuing so; I say contentious with saints which they say they love, and which they are by covenant bound to love, either from some conceived wrong, and hence can not forgive, as Christ doth them; or from a prejudice groundless opinion, They care not for me, nor I for them; or from a spirit of scornful censoriousness, what are such and such? or because distasted because of some reproof in their sin or by some opinion or by some worldly conveniency or laying out lots or restraint of some liberty, etc., or because of some sin; now can sit and censure; and I say, when this is mutual; for a godly man may be contended with, but he prays and mourns and pities, unless it be at some time, but when it shall continually abide so fierce and implacable, Eccles vii 9, "Anger resteth in the bosom of fools." When a man shall be glad of an occasion of difference, that so he may depart and have something to quiet conscience for breach of covenant, that there can be no healing, but bellies of pigs are more dear than bowels of saints, and when quiet, upon the least occasion apt to pick holes and quarrel; now, it is time for the Lord to give over to another government. Zech xi 14 15, When brotherhood is broken, then an idol shepherd is set up. Ex ii, Moses was sent to deliver Israel, but he finds two Hebrews oppressed, striving, and must not be checked neither; well then farewell deliverance if you be of that spirit; you shall love one another better if ever the Lord doth that for you. It hath been the wisdom of some princes, when their subjects have been at civil wars, to call them forth to a common enemy, and there they can agree. O, brethren there is no sin like this and yet none so slighted. You shall know what it is either by being yoked under enemies or sins; the first of these breaking bonds of union to Christ, the other with his members.

Use 4. Hence see the reason why many men are delivered up to the bondage of their own lusts, the most sad bondage and power of Satan, who have seemed to be delivered from it; truly they have cast off the government of the Lord. Men wonder why in this country men are more vile than ever they were, men that gave great hopes; the reason is this; they have seemed to be under Christ's government, but secretly cast it off; and hence filthy and vile lusts are their apparitors and pursuivants etc.

The Eternal Counsel of His Will – explained

The implications. Particular redemption - limited atonement, consolation to all that believe explained, the heirs of promise, the immutability of his counsel, the deceitfulness of sin, man's corruption and pretenses to unbelief. The cities of refuge explained. Hope explained.

Heb 6:17-20 John Owen, Commentary on Hebrews Vol. 21 pg 252-280

Ver. 17-20. — Wherein God, willing more abundantly to manifest unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, interposed himself by an oath: that by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to deceive, we might have strong [prevailing] consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us: which we have as an anchor of the soul, both safe and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil; whither the forerunner is for us entered, Jesus, made an high priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.

Sundry things are observable in these words. 1. The introduction unto the application of the foregoing discourse to the use of all believers. Wherein [we have], 2. The design of God in the confirmation of his promise by his oath; which was to “manifest the immutability of his counsel.” And this is amplified, (1.) By the frame, purpose, or mind of God therein; he was “willing.” (2.) By the manner how he would declare his mind herein; “more abundantly,” — namely, than could be done by a single promise. It gave not a further stability unto his word, but manifested his willingness to have it believed. 3. The persons are described unto whom God was thus willing to show the immutability of his counsel; who are “the heirs of promise,” — that is, all and only those who are so. 4. The way is expressed whereby God would thus manifest the immutability of his counsel; namely, “by two immutable things,” — that is, his promise and his oath: which, 5. Are proved to be sufficient evidences thereof, from the nature of him by whom they are made and given; it was “impossible that God should lie.” 6. The especial end of this whole design of God, with respect unto all the heirs of promise, is said to be that “they might have strong consolation.” 7. And thereon they are further described by the way and means they use to obtain the promise and the consolation designed unto them therein; they “flee for refuge to the hope set before them.” 8. The efficacy whereof is declared from the nature of it, in comparison unto an anchor; “which we have as an anchor:” further amplified, (1.) From its properties, — it is “sure,” or “safe and steadfast;” and also, (2.) From its use, — “it enters into that within the veil.” 9. And this use is so expressed that occasion may be thence taken to return unto that from which he had digressed Hebrews 5:11, namely, the priesthood of Christ. And, 10. The mention thereof he so introduceth, according to his usual manner, as also to manifest the great benefit and advantage of our entering by hope into that within the veil; namely, (1.) Because Christ is there; (2.) Because he is entered thither as “our forerunner;” (3.) From the office wherewith he is there vested, “made an high priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec,” as he had declared, Hebrews 5:10: all which must be opened as they occur in the text.

1. Ev ω— that is, say many, ἐφ' ᾧ “for which cause.” Respect may be had unto the words immediately foregoing, “An oath” among men” is to them an end of all strife:” so a reason is thence inferred why God should interpose himself by an oath in this matter. And the words are rendered by some, as we have seen, “propter quod,” or “propterea;” “in” for “propter” is not unusual. And this then is the coherence, ‘Whereas mankind doth consent herein, that an oath, in things capable of no other proof or demonstration, shall end controversies, satisfy doubts, and put an issue to contradictions, differences, and strife; God took the same way, in an infinite gracious condescension, to give full satisfaction in this matter unto the “heirs of promise.” For what could they require further? Will they not rest in the oath of God, who in doubtful cases do and will acquiesce in the oaths of men? What way could be more suited unto their peace and consolation? And such is God’s love and grace, that he would omit nothing that might tend thereunto, though in such a way of condescension as no creature would, or could, or ought to have expected, before infinite wisdom and mercy had declared themselves therein.’ Or, this expression may respect the whole subject-matter treated of; and so the words are rendered “in quo,” or “in qua re;” “in which case or matter.” And this our translation seems to respect, rendering it “wherein.” Then the words direct unto the introduction of the end of God’s oath, expressed in the words following, ‘In this matter God sware by himself, that thereby the “heirs of promise,” might not only be settled in faith, but moreover receive therewithal strong consolation.’ And this import of the words we shall adhere unto.

Θεός βουλόμενος, “God willing.” Hereinto all that follows is resolved; it is all founded in the will of God. And two things may be denoted hereby: (1.) The inclination and disposition of the mind of God; he was free, he was not averse from it. This is that which is generally intended, when we say we are willing unto anything that is proposed unto us; that is, we are free, and not averse unto it. So may God be said to be willing, to have an inclination and an affection unto the work, or to be ready for it, as he speaks in another place, “with his whole heart, and with his whole soul,” Jeremiah 32:41. But although there be a truth herein, as to the mind and will of God towards believers and their consolation, yet it is not what is here peculiarly intended. Wherefore, (2.) A determinate act and purpose of the will of God is designed herein, Θεός βουλόμενος is “God purposing” or “determining.” So is the same act of God expressed by Θελων ο Θεος, Romans 9:22, — “What if God, willing to shew his wrath;” that is, purposing or determining so to do, And this Θεός βουλόμενος, as it respects το αμεταθετον της βουλης, is the same with χατα την βουλην του ζεληματος, Ephesians 1:11. Wherefore “God willing,” is God in sovereign grace, and from especial love, freely “purposing” and “determining” in himself to do the thing expressed, unto the relief and comfort of believers.

The sovereign will of God is the sole spring and cause of all the grace, mercy, and consolation, that believers are made partakers of in this world. So is it here proposed; thereinto alone is all grace and consolation resolved. God wills it should be so. Man being fallen off from the grace and love of God, and being every way come short of his glory, had no way left, in nor by himself, to obtain any grace, any relief, any mercy, any consolation. Neither was there any the least obligation on God, in point of justice, promise, or covenant, to give any grace unto, to bestow any mercy or favor upon, apostatized sinners; wherefore these things could have no rise, spring, or cause, but in a free, gracious act of the sovereign will and pleasure of God. [That is the key which most oppose, i.e., Arminians, Catholics, etc.] And thereunto in the Scripture are they constantly assigned. Whether absolutely, that grace is bestowed on any, or comparatively, on one and not another, it is all from the will of God. “For herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins,” 1 John 4:10. Christ himself, with all the grace and mercy we have by him, is from the free love and will of God. So is our election, Ephesians 1:4, 5; our vocation, 1 Corinthians 1:26, 27; our regeneration, John 1:13, James 1:18; our recovery from sin, Hosea 14:4; so is our peace and all our consolation; whence he is called “the God of all grace,” 1 Peter 5:10; and “the God of patience and consolation,” Romans 15:5; — the author and sovereign disposer of them all.

So is it also with respect unto grace and mercy considered comparatively, as collated on one and not on another, Romans 9:15, 16; 1 Corinthians 4:7. There is no other spring or fountain of any grace or mercy. It may be some may hope to educe grace out of their own wills and endeavors, and to obtain mercy by their own duties and obedience [e.g., the sinner's prayer or any other human prayer as opposed to being called; after conversion, this call, we are to seek God for more grace, but saving or converting grace is all from God's will and act and not of ourselves, our own merit or anything we do; we receive it and he enables us to do so - Eph. 2:8]; but the Scripture knows no such thing, nor do believers find it in their experience.

Let them who have received the least of grace and mercy know from whence they have received it, and whereunto they are beholding for it. [Hence, 1Cor.4:7: “For who makes you differ from another? And what do you have that you did not receive? Now if you did indeed receive it, why do you boast as if you had not received it?”] A due consideration of this sovereign spring of all grace and consolation will greatly influence our minds in and unto all the principal duties of obedience: such as thankfulness to God, Ephesians 1:3-5; humility in ourselves, 1 Corinthians 4:7; compassion towards others, 2 Timothy 2:25, 26.

Let those who stand in need of grace and mercy (as who doth not?) expect them wholly from the sovereign will and pleasure of God, James 1:5; who is “gracious unto whom he will be gracious” Our own endeavors are means in this kind for obtaining grace in the measures and degrees of it; but it is the will of God alone that is the cause of it all, 2 Timothy 1:9.

2. What God was thus willing unto is expressed; and that was “more abundantly to declare the immutability of his counsel.” And we may inquire concerning it, (1.) What is meant by the “counsel” of God; (2.) How that counsel of God was and is “immutable;” (3.) How it was “declared” so to be; (4.) How it was “abundantly” so declared: —

(1.) The “counsel” of God is the eternal purpose of his will, called his counsel because of the infinite wisdom wherewith it is always accompanied. So that which is called the “good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself,” Ephesians 1:9, is termed “the counsel of his own will,” verse 11. Counsel among men, is a rational deliberation about causes, means, effects, and ends, according to the nature of things advised about, and the proper interests of them who do deliberate. In this sense counsel is not to be attributed unto God. For as the infinite, sovereign wisdom of his being admits not of his taking counsel with any other; so the infinite simplicity of his nature and understanding, comprehending all things in one single act of his mind, allows not of formal counsel or deliberation. The first, therefore, of these the Scripture explodes, Isaiah 40:13, Romans 11:34; and although in the latter way God be frequently introduced as one deliberating, or taking counsel with himself, it is not the manner of doing, but the effect, or the thing done, which is intended. So it is in like manner where God is said to hearken, to hear, to see; whereby his infinite knowledge and understanding of all things are intended, these being the mediums whereby we who are to be instructed do come to know and understand what so we do. Whereas, therefore, the end of counsel, or all rational deliberation, is to find out the true and stable directions of wisdom, the acts of the will of God being accompanied with infinite wisdom are called his counsel. For we are not to look upon the purposes and decrees of God as mere acts of will and pleasure, but as those which are effects of infinite wisdom, and therefore most reasonable, although the reasons of them be sometimes unknown unto us. Hence the apostle issueth his discourse of God’s eternal decrees of election and reprobation in an admiration of the infinite wisdom of God whence they proceeded, and wherewith they were accompanied, Romans 11:33-36.

In particular, the counsel of God in this place, is the holy, wise purpose of his will, to give his Son Jesus Christ to be of the seed of Abraham, for the salvation of all the elect, or heirs of promise; and that in such a way, and accompanied with all such good things, as might secure their faith and consolation. This is the counsel of God, which contained all the grace and mercy of the promise, with the securing them unto believers.

(2.) Of this counsel it is affirmed that it was “immutable,” not subject unto change. To ἀμεταθετον, is “quod μετατιθεσθαι nequit,” “that cannot be altered.” But the design of God here was, not to make his counsel unchangeable, but to declare it so to be; for all the purposes of God, all the eternal acts of his will, considered in themselves, are immutable. See Isaiah 46:10; Psalm 33:11; Proverbs 19:21, 21:30. And their immutability is a necessary consequent of the immutability of the nature of God, “with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning,” James 1:17. “The Strength of Israel is not a man, that he should repent,” 1 Samuel 15:29. And in opposition unto all change or mutability, it is said of God, [Greek word] Psalm 102:27; which the apostle renders by Σὺ ὁ αὐτός εἰ, “Thou art He,” - always in all respects one and the same. Hence among the Jews [Hebrew word], “He,” is a name of God, expressing his immutable self-subsistence. But it will be said, that there are in the Scriptures many declarations of God’s altering his purposes and counsels, and repenting him of what he had before determined, being grieved at what he had done, Genesis 6:6; 1 Samuel:2:30.

It is agreed by all that those expressions of” repenting, “grieving,” and the like, are figurative, wherein no such affections are intended as these words signify in created natures, but only an event of things like that which proceedeth from such affections.

And as to the changes themselves expressed, the schoolmen say not amiss, “Vult Deus mutationem, non mutat voluntatem;” — “He willeth a change, he changeth not his will.”

But fully to remove these difficulties, the purposes of God and the counsels of his will may be considered either in themselves, or in the declaration that is made concerning their execution. In themselves they are absolutely immutable, no more subject unto change than is the divine nature itself. The declarations which God makes concerning their execution or accomplishment are of two sorts: —

[1.] There are some of them wherein there is necessarily included a respect unto some antecedent moral rule, which puts an express condition into the 315 declarations, although it be not expressed, and is always in like cases to be understood. Thus God commands the prophet to declare, “Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown,” Jonah 3:4. Here seems to be an absolute declaration of the purpose of God, without any condition annexed, a positive prediction of what he would do, and should come to pass. Either God must change his purpose, or Nineveh must be overthrown. [But whereas this destruction was foretold for sin, and impenitency therein, there was an antecedent moral rule in the case, which gives it as complete a condition as if it had been expressed in words; and that is, that repentance from sin will free from the punishment of sin. So that the prediction had this limitation, by an antecedent rule, “Unless they repent.” And God declares that this rule puts a condition into all his threatenings, Jeremiah 18:7, 8. And this was the course of God’s dealing with the house of Eli, 1 Samuel 2:30. God doth neither suspend his purpose on what men will do, nor take up conditional resolutions with respect thereunto. He doth not purpose one thing, and then change his resolution upon contingent emergencies; for “he is of one mind, and who can turn him?” Job 23:13 [comment: in other words, God is not the “great responder” as Edwards notes. Salvation is not something made available if man repents and believes as Arminians suppose (and in doing so deny man’s total depravity), from out of the goo the sinner’s prayer emerged, coming to God without being called.] Nor doth he determine that if men do so on the one hand, that he will do so; and if otherwise, that he will do otherwise. For instance, there was no such decree or purpose of God, as that if Nineveh did repent it should not be destroyed, and if it did not repent it should perish. For he could not so purpose unless he did not foresee what Nineveh would do; which to affirm is to deny his very being and Godhead. But in order to accomplish his purpose that Nineveh should not perish at that time, he threatens it with destruction in a way of prediction; which turned the minds of the inhabitants to attend unto that antecedent moral rule which put a condition into the prediction, whereby they were saved.

[2.] In the declaration of some of God’s counsels and purposes, as to the execution and accomplishment, there is no respect unto any such antecedent moral rule as should give them either limitation or condition. [similar to my comment above; God is not dependent upon what man does.] God takes the whole in such cases absolutely on himself, both as to the ordering and disposing of all things and means unto the end intended. Such was the counsel of God concerning the sending of his Son to be of the seed of Abraham, and the blessing that should ensue thereon. No alteration could possibly, on any account, be made herein, neither by the sin nor unbelief of them concerned, nor by anything that might befall them in this world. Such was the counsel of God, and such the immutability of it, here intended: as it was absolutely unchangeable in itself, so, as to man’s concern and interest in it, it was attended with no condition or reserve.

(3.) This immutability God was willing επιδειξαι, to “show,” “manifest,” “declare,” “make known.” It is not his counsel absolutely, but the immutability of his counsel, that God designed to evidence. His counsel he made known in his promise. All the gracious actings of God towards us are the executing of his holy, immutable purposes, Ephesians 1:11. And all the promises of God are the declarations of those purposes. And they also in themselves are immutable; for they depend on the essential truth of God: Titus 1:2, “In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began.” God’s essential veracity is engaged in his promises. And they are so expressly the declaration of his purposes, that when God had only purposed to give us eternal life in Christ, he is said to have promised it; namely, before the world began. And this declareth the nature of unbelief: “He that believeth not God, hath made him a liar,” 1 John 5:10; because his essential truth is engaged in his promise. And to make God a liar, is to deny his being; which every unbeliever doth as he is able. But whereas God intended not only the confirmation of the faith of the heirs of promise, but also their consolation under all their difficulties and temptations, he would give a peculiar evidence of the immutability of that counsel which they embraced by faith as tendered in the promise. For what was done did not satisfy the fullness of grace and love which he would declare in this matter, no, though it were done so “abundantly;” but, —

(4.) He would do it περισσοτερον, “more abundantly;” that is, beyond what was absolutely necessary in this case. The promise of God, who is the “God of truth,” is sufficient to give us security; nor could it be by us discovered how the goodness of God itself should require a further procedure. Yet because something further might be useful, for the reasons and ends before declared, he would add a further confirmation unto his word. And herein as the divine goodness and condescension are evidently manifested, so it likewise appears what weight God lays upon the assuring of our faith and confidence. For in this case he swears by himself, who hath taught us not so to use his name but in things of great consequence 317 and moment. This is the sense of the word if it respect the assurance given, which is “more abundant” than it could be in or by a single promise. But περισσοτερον may refer unto God himself, who gives this assurance; and then it is as muck as “ex abundantia:” — when God, who is truth itself, might justly have required faith of us on his single promise, yet, “ex abundantia,” from a superabounding love and care, he would confirm it by his oath. Either sense suits the apostle’s design.

3. It is declared who they were to whom God intended to give this evidence of the immutability of his counsel; and that is, τοις κληρονομοις της επαγγελιας, — to “the heirs of promise;” that is, believers, all believers both under the old and new testament. It may be, indeed, that those of the Hebrews were in the first place intended; for unto them did the promise belong in the first place, as they were the natural seed of Abraham, and unto them was it first to be declared and proposed upon its accomplishment, Acts 2:39, 3:25, 26, 13:46. But it is not they alone who are intended. All the children of the faith of Abraham are heirs also, Galatians 4:28, 29. It is therefore with respect unto all believers absolutely that God confirmed his promise with his oath, though the natural seed of Abraham were respected in the first place, until they cut off themselves by their unbelief. See Luke 1:72, 73; Micah 7:20.

Believers are called “heirs of the promise” on a double account: (1.) With respect unto the promise itself; (2.) With respect unto the matter of the promise, or the thing promised. This distinction is evidently founded on Hebrews 11:13, 17, 39, compared. For look in what sense they are said to be “heirs of the promise,” therein they are not actually possessed of it; for an heir is only in expectancy of that whereof he is an heir. Wherefore take the promise in the first sense formally, and it is the elect of God as such who are the heirs of it. God hath designed them unto an interest therein and a participation thereof; and he confirmed it with his oath, that they might be induced and encouraged to believe it, to mix it with faith, and so come to inherit it, or to be made actual partakers of it. To this purpose our apostle disputeth at large, Romans 9:6-12. In the latter sense, taking the promise materially for the thing promised, they are heirs of it who have an actual interest in it by faith; and partaking of the present grace and mercy wherewith it is accompanied, as pledges of future glory, have a right unto the whole inheritance. Thus all believers, and they only, are “heirs of the promise,” Romans 8:17; “heirs of God,” — that is, of the whole inheritance that he hath provided for his children. And I take the words in this latter sense: for it is not the first believing of these heirs of the promise, that they might be justified, which is intended; but their establishment in faith, whereby they may be comforted, or have “strong consolation.” But whereas this declaration of the immutability of God’s counsel is made in the promise of the gospel, which is universal, or at least indefinitely proposed unto all, how it comes here to be cast under this limitation, that it is made to elect believers, or the heirs of promise only, shall be immediately declared.

4. What God did in this matter, for the ends mentioned, is summarily expressed; εμεστευσεν ορχψ, — “he interposed himself by an oath,” “fidejussit jurejurando.” He that confirmeth anything by an oath is “fidejussor,” — “one that gives security to faith.” And “fidejussor” in the law is interventor,” — “one who interposeth or cometh between and engageth himself to give security.” This state of things is therefore here supposed: — God had given out that promise whose nature we have before declared. Hereon he required the faith of them unto whom it was given, and that justly; for what could any reasonably require further, to give them sufficient ground of assurance? But although all things were clear and satisfactory on the part of God, yet many fears, doubts, and objections, would be ready to arise on the part of believers themselves; as there did in Abraham, unto whom the promise was first made, with respect unto that signal pledge of its accomplishment in the birth of Isaac. In this case, though God was no way obliged to give them further caution or security, yet, out of his infinite love and condescension, he will give them a higher pledge and evidence of his faithfulness, and interposeth himself by an oath. He mediated by an oath, — he interposed himself between the promise and the faith of believers, to undertake under that solemnity for the accomplishment of it; and swearing by himself, he takes it on his life, his holiness, his being, his truth, to make it good [i.e., He, Christ, is our surety]. The truths which from these words thus opened we are instructed in, are these that follow: —

Obs. I. The purpose of God for the saving of the elect by Jesus Christ is an act of infinite wisdom as well as of sovereign grace.

Hence it is called “the counsel of his will,” or an act of his will accompanied with infinite wisdom, which is the counsel of God. And among all the holy properties of his nature, the manifestation of whose glory he designed therein, there is none more expressly and frequently mentioned than his wisdom. And it is declared, —

1. As that which no created understanding, of men or angels, is able perfectly to comprehend, neither in the counsel nor in the effects of it. Hence our apostle shutteth up his contemplation of the ways, paths, and effects of this wisdom, with that rapture of admiration, Romans 11:33- 36, “O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor? or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom be glory forever. Amen.” The whole issue of our contemplation of the wisdom of God, in the eternal projection of our salvation by Jesus Christ, is only an admiration of that abyss which we cannot dive into, with a humble ascription of glory to God thereon. And as to the especial effects of this wisdom, the angels themselves desire to bow down, with a humble diligence in their inquiry into them, 1 Peter 1:12. And on these considerations our apostle concludes, that “without controversy” the work hereof is a “great mystery,” 1 Timothy 3:16; which we may adore, but cannot comprehend. See the name of Christ, Isaiah 9:6.

2. As that wherein God hath expressly designed to glorify himself unto eternity. This is the end of all the free acts and purposes of the will of God; neither can they have any other, though all other things may be subordinate thereunto. Now no property of the divine nature is so conspicuous, in the disposal of things unto their proper end, as that of wisdom, whose peculiar work and effect it is. Wherefore the great end which God will ultimately effect being his own glory in Christ, and the salvation of the elect by him, the wisdom whereby it was contrived must needs be eminent and glorious. So the apostle tells us, “Then is the end, when Christ shall have delivered up the kingdom unto God, even the Father,” and he also in his human nature subjects himself unto him, “that God may be all in all,” 1 Corinthians 15:24, 28: — that is, when the Lord Christ hath finished the whole work of his mediation, and brought all his elect unto the enjoyment of God, then shall “God be all in all;” or, therein, or thereby, he will be forever exalted and glorified, when it shall be manifest how all this great work came forth from him, and is issued in him, Jude 1:25, 1 Timothy 1:17.

3. The whole work is therefore expressly called “the wisdom of God,” because of those characters and impressions thereof that are upon it, and because it is a peculiar effect thereof. So our apostle tells us that Christ crucified “is the power of God, and the wisdom of God,” 1 Corinthians 1:24; and that the gospel whereby it is declared “is “the wisdom of God in a mystery,” 1 Corinthians 2:7: and the whole intended is both expressly and fully laid down, Ephesians 3:8-11, “Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ; and to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ: to the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God, according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord.” The “purpose” mentioned in the close of these words, is the same with the “counsel” of God’s will in this place. And this purpose was the fountain, spring, and cause, of all those glorious and admirable things whose declaration was committed unto the apostle, as the great publisher of the gospel unto the Gentiles; by the effects whereof such mysteries were unfolded as the angels themselves in heaven did not before understand. ‘And what was it,’ saith the apostle, ‘that was declared, manifested, and known thereby? It was πολυποικιλος σοφια του Θεου, “the manifold wisdom of God,” or the infinite wisdom of God, exerting itself in such wonderful variety of holy, wise operations, as no mind of men nor angels can comprehend.’ [So that if God left salvation up to man's will, his corrupt will, then, as Arminians suppose, it is possible that no one would choose Christ! (which would actually be the case) But, not only is this not the case, but it would argue God as being unwise and lacking in power, that he cannot prosecute the desires of his heart; i.e., imperfection in the Godhead.] And, —

4. On this account are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge said to be hid in Jesus Christ, Colossians 2:3. There is not only in him, and the work of his mediation, “the wisdom of God,” — that is, both exerted and manifested, — but “all the treasures of it;” that is, God will not produce any effect out of the stores of his infinite wisdom, but what is suitable and subservient unto what he hath designed in and by Jesus Christ. And may we not, —

(1.) Hence see the horrible depravation of nature which by sin is befallen the minds, reasons, and understandings of men? For from hence alone it is that this purpose of God, which was an act of infinite wisdom; that the work which he hath wrought pursuant thereof, whereon are impressed the characters of his manifold wisdom; are esteemed folly, or foolish things unto them. So far are men by nature from seeing an excellency of divine wisdom in them, that they cannot suffer them to pass as things tolerably rational, but brand them as foolish, or folly itself. This our apostle declares and at large insisteth on, 1Corinthians 1. Had the mind of man fixed on any other reason for the rejection of this counsel of God, some excuse might be pretended for it; but to reject that as folly which God sets forth and declares as the principal instance of his infinite wisdom, this discovereth the horror of its depravation. And those in whom this blindness is prevalent may be referred unto three sorts: —

[1.] Such as by whom the gospel is absolutely rejected as a foolish thing, unbecoming the wisdom of God to propose, and their own wisdom to receive. As this was the state of the Jews, and Pagan world of old, and as it is the condition of the Mohammedans and relics of the Heathens at this day, so I wish that the poison and contagion of this wickedness were not farther diffused. But, alas! we see many every day who, on the account of their outward circumstances, live in some kind of compliance with the name and profession of the gospel, who yet discover themselves sufficiently to hate, despise, and condemn the mystery of it, and the wisdom of God therein. [So many deny the limited atonement or believe in a general ransom, etc., due to prejudices, traditions and other conceits.]

[2.] Such as own the gospel in the letter of it, but look on the mystery of it, or the counsel of God therein, as foolishness. Hence all the principal parts of it, as the incarnation of Christ, the hypostatical union of his person, his sacrifice and oblation, the atonement and satisfaction made by his death, the imputation of his righteousness, the election of grace, with the power and efficacy of it in our conversion, are all of them either directly exploded as foolish, or wrested unto senses suited unto their own low and carnal apprehensions. And this sort of men do swarm amongst us at this day like to locusts when a north-east wind hath filled every place with them. [Wow! Well said.]

[3.] There are multitudes, whose choice of their outward conditions being prevented by the providence of God, so that they are brought forth and fixed where the gospel passeth current in the world without any open control, who do see no reason why, with the first sort, they should openly reject it, nor will be at the pains, with the second sort, to corrupt it, but yet practically esteem it a foolish thing to give place unto its power on their hearts, and do really esteem them foolish who labor so to do. And this is openly the condition of the generality of those who live under the dispensation of the gospel in the world.

I have named these things only to reflect thereby on that horrible depravation which, by corruption of nature, is come upon the mind and reason of mankind. And it is in none more evident than in those who most boast of the contrary. And, —

(2.) We may learn from hence, that there is no greater evidence of thriving in spiritual light and understanding, than when we find our souls affected with, and raised unto a holy admiration of the wisdom and counsel of God, which are declared in the gospel.

Obs. II. The life and assurance of our present comfort and future glory depend on the immutability of God's counsel. — To secure these things unto us, God shows us that immutability. Our own endeavors are to be used to the same end; for we are to "give all diligence to make our calling and election sure." But all depends on the unchangeable purpose of the will of God, which alone is able to bear the charge of so great a work. But this must be further spoken unto on the next verse.

Obs. III. The purpose of God concerning the salvation of the elect by Jesus Christ became immutable from hence, that the determination of his will was accompanied with infinite wisdom. It was his "counsel."

All the certainty that is amongst men, as to the accomplishment of any end designed by them, depends on the exercise of wisdom in finding out and applying suitable means thereunto. And because their wisdom is weak in all things, and in most no better than folly, — whence generally they fix first on ends unprofitable, and then make use of means weak and unsuited unto their purpose, — it is that all their affairs are wrapped up in uncertainties, and most of them end in disappointment and confusion. But as God fixeth on those ends which perfectly comply with his own infinite holiness and sovereignty, whence they are necessarily good and holy; so he doth not first do so, and then make choice of various means that proffer themselves unto those ends. But, in his infinite wisdom, ends and means lie before him in one vein, and fall together under his unalterable determination. Two things, therefore, may be considered in the wisdom of God giving immutability to his counsel concerning the salvation of the elect by Jesus Christ: —

1. Thereby he saw at once not only whatever was needful for the accomplishing of it, but that which would infallibly effect it. He chose not probable and likely means for it, and such as might do it, unless some great obstruction did arise, — such as whose efficacy might be suspended on any conditions and emergencies; but such as should infallibly and inevitably reach the end intended. In the first covenant, wherein God had not immutably decreed to preserve mankind absolutely in their primitive estate, he made use of such means for their preservation as might effect it in case they were not wanting unto themselves, or that obedience which they were enabled to perform. This man neglecting, the means appointed of God as to their success depending thereon by God's own appointment, that end which in their own nature they tended unto was not attained; and that because God had not immutably determined it. But now, whereas God engaged himself in an unchangeable purpose, in his infinite wisdom he fixeth on such means for its accomplishment as shall not depend on any thing whereby their efficacy might be frustrated. Such were his sending of his Son to be incarnate, and the dispensation of grace of the new covenant, which is in its nature infallibly effectual unto the end whereunto it is designed. [Remember, Adam was not promised continual supplies of grace, whereas in the new covenant, believers are!]

2. God, in his infinite wisdom, foresaw all the interveniencies on our part that might obstruct the certain accomplishment of the promise. The promise was first given indefinitely unto all mankind, in our first parents; but soon after, the wickedness of the whole world, with their absolute contempt of the grace of the promise, was such as that any creature would conceive that it would be of none effect, being so visibly, so universally rejected and despised. But a perfect view hereof lying under the wisdom of God, he provided against it, for the immutability of his purpose and infallibility of his promise, by singling out first one, then another, and at last the whole posterity of Abraham, towards whom the promise should be accomplished. But yet, after a long season, there came the last and uttermost trial of the whole matter: for the generality of the seed of Abraham rejected the promise also; whereby it appeared really to have been frustrated, and to be of none effect, as our apostle declares in his answer to that objection, Romans 9:6. But instead of changing his purpose, God then more fully discovered wherein the immutability of his counsel did consist, and whereon it did depend; as Galatians 3:8. And this was, that all along, and under all those apostasies, he ever had, and ever will have in the world, an elect people, chosen by him before the foundation of the world, in and towards whom his purpose is immutable and his promise infallible. No interveniency can possibly shake or alter what hath been settled by infinite wisdom. There is not a particular believer but is made so sensible of his own unworthiness, that, at one time or another, he cannot but be almost brought to a loss how it should be that such a one as he should ever inherit the promise; but God foresaw all that hath befallen us, or will do so, and hath, in his infinite wisdom, provided against all interveniencies, that his purpose might not be changed, nor his promise frustrated.

Obs. IV. Infinite goodness, as acting itself in Christ, was not satisfied in providing and preparing good things for believers, but it would also show and declare it unto them, for their present consolation.

God was “willing to show to the heirs of promise;” and the end was, that they might have “strong consolation.” As it is with a good, wise father and an obedient son: The father is possessed of a large and profitable estate, and as the son hath a present allowance suitable to his condition, so, being obedient, he hath a just expectation that in due time he shall enjoy the whole inheritance: this being usual amongst men, and that which the law of nature directs unto; for parents are to lay up for their children, and not children for their parents. But the whole being yet absolutely in the father’s power, it is possible he may otherwise dispose of it, and it may not come to the right heir. But now, if the father seeth his son on some occasion to want encouragement, or he be to put him on any difficult service, where he may meet with storms and dangers, he will show unto him his deed of settlement, wherein he hath irrevocably confirmed unto him the whole inheritance. So God deals with believers, with his children, in this case. He is rich in grace, mercy, and glory; and all his children are heirs of it, “heirs of God, and co-heirs with Christ,” Romans 8:17; — that is, of the whole inheritance that God hath provided for his children. This they have an expectation of by the promise, according to the law of the new covenant. But although their state be thus secured by their being heirs of the promise, yet God, knowing that they have a difficult work and warfare to go through withal, and what it is to serve him in temptations, for their encouragement and consolation he produceth and showeth them his irrevocable deed of settlement; namely, his promise confirmed by his oath, whereby the whole inheritance is infallibly secured unto them. He was free and willing to “show it unto the heirs of promise.” At first God gave out a mere precept as the declaration of his will, and a promise couched in a threatening. This was that which divine goodness, acting in a way of nature, did require, and whereof man had no cause to complain; for as the mind of God was sufficiently declared therein, so man in himself had no grounds of discouragement from a compliance therewith. And God might so deal with us all, giving out the whole revelation of his will in a system of precepts, as some seem to suppose that he hath done. But things are now changed on two accounts. For, —

1. It was herein the peculiar design of God to glorify his goodness, love, grace, and mercy, by Jesus Christ; and he will do it in an abundant manner. He had before glorified his eternal power and infinite wisdom, in the creation of the world and all things therein contained, Psalm 19:1-3; Romans 1:20. And he had glorified his holiness and righteousness, in giving of the law accompanied with eternal rewards and punishments. But “grace and truth” (in the provision of it, and the accomplishment of the promise) “came by Jesus Christ,” John 1:17. And therefore, that the Lord Christ in all this may have the pre-eminence, he will do it in an abundant and unconceivable manner, above the former declarations of his glory in any other of his attributes. Hence in the Scripture the communication of grace is expressed in words that may intimate its exceeding, and passing all understanding: Romans 5:20, Υπερπερισσευσεν η χαρις— “Grace” did by Christ “more than abound.” To abound, expresseth the largest comprehensible measures and degrees; but that which doth “more than abound,” who can conceive? 1 Timothy 1:14, Υπερπλεονασε δε η χαρις του Κυριου, — “The grace of our Lord did more than abound;’ it exceeded all comprehension. So that glory which is the effect of this grace is said to be given υπερξολην εις υπερξολην, 2 Corinthians 4:17; that is, in an excellency and exceeding greatness no way to be conceived. So, plainly the apostle calls the grace of God in Christ υπερζαλλοντα πλουτον, Ephesians 2:7, — “excelling riches.” That we may know his meaning, he calls it again, Ephesians 3:8, ανεξιχνιαστον αλουον, — “riches whereof there is no investigation.” In the pursuit of this design to exercise and manifest the infinite fullness of his love and goodness, he will not satisfy himself with a mere declaration of his will, but he will have those concerned in it to know it, to understand it, to have the present comfort of it; and because they could not do that without satisfaction in the immutability of his counsel, he evidenceth that unto them by all means possible. And thereby he sufficiently manifests how willing he is, how well-pleasing it is unto him, that our faith in him should be firm and steadfast.

2. Man is now fallen into a condition of sin and misery. And herein is he filled with so many fears, discouragements, and despondencies, that it is the difficultest thing in the world to raise him unto any hopes of mercy or favor from God. In this lost, forlorn estate, divine goodness, by an infinite condescension, accommodates itself unto our weakness and our distress. He doth not, therefore, only propose his mind and will unto us as unto grace and glory, but useth all ways possible to ingenerate in us a confidence of his willingness to bring us unto a participation of them. He doth everything that may direct and encourage us to take a steadfast view of the excellency and immutability of his counsel in this matter. Hence a great part of the Scripture, the revelation of God’s will, is taken up in promises, exhortations, invitations, discourses and expressions of love, kindness, and compassion. And in particular, although the promise itself was an abundant security for faith to rest upon, as to the immutability of God’s counsel, yet, to obviate all pretences and cast out all excuses, he confirms it with his oath. And although he did this in particular and expressly unto Abraham, yet he takes all believers, who are his seed, into a participation of the same privilege with him, and manifests how that in swearing unto him he sware also unto them all. And two things do hence naturally ensue: —

(1.) The unspeakable encouragement unto believing, which is given unto all unto whom this counsel of God and its immutability are proposed. The essential truth of God and his oath are openly and manifestly engaged unto these two things. [1.] That nothing but unbelief shall keep off any from the enjoyment of the promise; [2.] That all believers, whatever difficulties they may meet withal in themselves, or objections against themselves, shall certainly and infallibly enjoy the promise and be saved. And the immutability of God's counsel herein he hath made so evident, that there is no room for any objection against it. This is tendered unto you unto whom the gospel is proposed. Greater encouragement unto believing, and more certainty of the event, you shall never have in this world, you cannot have, — God will not, God cannot give. All persons not yet come up unto believing, unto whom this peace with God is preached, are distinguished into two sorts, — “them that are nigh,” and “them that are afar off,” Ephesians 2:17. This, in the first place, expresseth the Jews and Gentiles; but, in a parity of reason, it must be extended unto others. Some are comparatively “nigh,” such as have been affected with the word, and brought unto inquiries whether they should believe or no; and there are some “afar off,” who as yet have taken little notice of these things. Herein is both a call and encouragement unto both. To the first, to determine their wills in the choice of Christ in the promise; unto the other, to look up unto him, though from the ends of the earth. But I must not enlarge.

(2.) It discovers the heinous nature of unbelief. The gospel, which is a message of love, peace, mercy, and grace, yet never makes mention of unbelief but it annexeth damnation unto it: “He that believeth not shall be damned.” And although they shall also perish unto whom the gospel is not preached, Romans 2:12, yet the gospel, though it speaks not exclusively unto others, yet principally it declares the inevitable destruction, the everlasting damnation, of them who believe not when the promise is declared to them, 2 Thessalonians 1:6-10; however, it declares that they shall fall under a sorer death and destruction than any others, 2 Corinthians 2:16. And the reason of this severity is taken partly from the nature of unbelief, and partly from the aggravation of it. The nature of unbelief consists in a refusal of the testimony of God, so making him a liar, 1 John 5:10; and in esteeming that which he proposeth as his power and wisdom, to be weakness and folly. Hence there is no way of sin or rebellion against God whatever that casts such scorn and indignity upon him. So that it is in itself the greatest of sins, as well as the root and cause of them. Yet such is the blindness of corrupted nature, that many who will boggle at other sins, especially such as look with a severe threatening aspect on a natural conscience, as adultery, theft, and murder, yet concern themselves not at all in this unbelief, but rather approve themselves in their infidelity. Yet is there not one unto whom the gospel is preached, but if he do not really receive the Lord Christ as tendered in the promise, he doth what lies in him to declare God to be a liar, foolish in his counsels and weak in his operations. And what account this will come unto is not hard to discern. Moreover, it is also from the aggravation that it is accompanied withal, from the nature of the thing itself and the way whereby it is proposed unto us: “How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?” Hebrews 2:3. We may look only on that which lies before us; namely, the infinite condescension of divine goodness, in showing, manifesting, and declaring, the immutability of his counsel by oath. Whereas, therefore, he hath done all to this end that was possible to be done, and more than ever would have entered into the heart of any creature to desire or expect, the woeful condition of unbelievers, both as to this sin and the misery which will follow thereon, is inexpressible. For those that will despise all that God will do, yea all that he can do, to give them assurance of the truth and stability of his promises, given in a way of grace, have no reason to expect, nor shall receive any thing, but what he will do and can do in a way of justice and vengeance.

Obs. V. It is not all mankind universally, but a certain number of persons, under certain qualifications, to whom God designs to manifest the immutability of his counsel, and to communicate the effects thereof.

It is only the “heirs of promise” whom God intendeth. But herein two things are to be considered 1. The outward revelation or administration of these things; and, 2. God’s purpose therein. The former is made promiscuously and indefinitely unto all to whom the gospel is preached; for therein is contained a declaration of the immutability of God’s counsel and his willingness to have it known. But if God did design the communication of the effect of it in the same latitude with the outward administration of it, then must he be thought to fail in his purpose towards the greatest part of them, who receive it not. This is that which the apostle disputes upon, Romans 9. Having supposed that the generality of the Jews, of the posterity of Abraham according to the flesh, were cut off from the promise by unbelief, and declared his sense thereon, verses 1-3, he raiseth an objection against that supposition, verse 6, ‘That if it were so, “the promise of God was of none effect,” for unto them all it was given and declared.’ Hereunto the apostle answers and replies in that and the following verses, 7-21. And the substance of his answer is, that although the promise was promiscuously proposed unto all, yet the grace of it was intended only unto the elect; as he also further declares, Hebrews 11:7. But why then doth God thus cause the declaration to be made promiscuously and indefinitely unto all, if it be some only whom he designs unto a participation of the effects of his counsel and good things promised? I answer, —

Let us always remember that in these things we have to do with Him who is greater than we, and who giveth no account of his matters. What if God will take this way of procedure, and give no reason of it? who are we, that we should dispute against God? Wherefore our apostle having at large discoursed this whole matter, and pleaded the absolute freedom of God to do whatever he pleaseth, winds up the whole in a resignation of all unto his sovereignty, with a deep admiration of his unsearchable wisdom; wherein it is our duty to acquiesce, Romans 11:33-36. But yet I may add, —

That the nature of the thing itself doth require this dispensation of the promise indefinitely to all, though the benefit of it be designed to some only; for the way whereby God will give a participation of the promise unto the heirs of it being by the administration of his word, and such means as are meet to work on the minds of men to persuade and prevail with them unto faith and obedience, he would not do it by immediate revelation or respiration, and the like extra-ordinary operations of his Spirit alone, but by such ways as are suited to glorify himself and his grace in the rational minds of his creatures capable thereof. Now this could no way be done, nor can unto this day, but by the declaration and preaching of the promise, with commands, motives, and encouragements unto believing. In this work all those whom he employs are utterly ignorant who they are who are heirs of the promise, until they are discovered by their actual believing: wherefore they have no other way, but in the first place to propose the promise promiscuously unto all that will attend unto it, leaving the singling out of its proper heirs unto the sovereign grace of God. So the word is preached unto all indefinitely, and “the election obtaineth,” whilst “the rest are hardened.”

Obs. VI. God alone knows the due measure of divine condescension, or what becomes the divine nature therein. — Who could have once apprehended, who durst have done so, that the holy God should swear by himself, to confirm his word and truth unto such worthless creatures as we are? Indeed there is yet a more transcendent act of divine condescension, namely, the incarnation of the Son of God, the glory whereof will be the object of the admiration of men and angels unto eternity; for, alas! what created understanding could ever have raised itself unto a thought that the eternal Word should be made flesh? God alone, who is infinitely wise, only wise, knew what became the holiness of his being and his goodness therein. And so is it, in its measure, in this of his oath. And as we are with holy confidence to make use of what he hath done in this kind, seeing not to do so is to despise the highest expression of his goodness; so we are not in any thing to draw divine condescension beyond divine expressions.

Obs. VII. So unspeakable is the weakness of our faith, that we stand in need of unconceivable divine condescension for its confirmation. — The immutability of God's counsel is the foundation of our faith; until this be manifest, it is impossible that ever faith should be sure and steadfast. But who would not think that God's declaration thereof by the way of promise were every way sufficient thereunto? But God knew that we yet stood in need of more; not that there was want of sufficient evidence in his promise, but such a want of stability in us as stood in need of a superabundant confirmation, as we shall see in the next verse: —

Ver. 18. — "That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us."

Two things in general the apostle further designs in this verse: 1. That the declaration which God had made of the immutability of his counsel in this matter was every way sufficient and satisfactory. 2. What was the especial end and design which he had therein towards the heirs of promise.

For the FIRST, he doth it by declaring the evidence given and the nature of it; which consisted in "two immutable things," — δια δυο πραγματος αμεταθετων. Πραγμα is an "act" or deed, such as we make and deliver when we convey anything from one to another, — an instrument of an assurance. This is the promise and the oath of God. Security is given by them, both from their own nature, and also because they are two, — two witnesses whereby the thing intended is established. But what need was there of two such things? Is it because one of these was weak, infirm, alterable, such as may be justly challenged or excepted against, that the other is added to strengthen and confirm it? 'No,' saith the apostle, 'both of them are equally "immutable."' Wherefore we must still carry along with us the infinite and unconceivable condescension of God in this matter, who, to obviate our temptations, and relieve us under our weaknesses, is pleased to give this variety unto his divine testimony, which he did "ex abundantia;" not only beyond what he was any way obliged unto, but whatever we could desire or expect.

For, secondly, this makes the evidence absolute and uncontrollable, that as they are two things which are produced to make it good, so they are both of them equally immutable, — such as neither in their own nature nor in their execution were any way exposed or liable unto alteration. For the promise itself was absolute, and the thing promised depended on no condition in us, — on nothing without God himself. [Arminians say that we must believe first; that's the condition in order to receive the good things of the gospel; but the very thing given is the ability to believe, i.e., faith! This is why the sinner's prayer approach is so widely accepted.] For there was in the promise itself all the springs of all that is good, and of deliverance from all that is evil; so that on every side it brings along with it the condition of its own accomplishment. But whereas God in the covenant of works did give no promise unto mankind but what was conditional, and suspended on such things on our part as might or might not be, — whence it came to pass that we sinned and came short of it, — God in the giving out of this promise, which is the foundation of the covenant of grace, to assure us that it is utterly of another nature, and such as on no occurrence is liable unto change, confirms it with his oath.

Moreover, the apostle confirmeth this testimony yet further from the nature of Him by whom it was given: ἵνα οὐκ ἄδυνατον ψευσασθαι Θεον, — “In” (or “by”) “which it was impossible that God should lie” or “deceive.” is not absolutely “to lie,” but by any means “to deceive” him who hath cause to trust what we say or do. The highest security among men consists in a promise confirmed with an oath; and this is, and must be, unto them “an end of all strife,” for higher they cannot go. But yet it is possible there may be a lie and deceit in their testimony, and he who trusts unto them may be deceived, as it often falls out in the world; for although the things themselves are good, and such as would secure the interest of truth only, yet men that use them are changeable, yea liars. But it is God who makes use of them in our case; and therefore it is impossible that he should lie. God having made this double engagement of his truth and faithfulness, it is utterly impossible that he should deceive any one thereby.

But why doth the apostle put an emphasis upon this, that by these things it was impossible that God should lie, or deceive? for it is necessary unto God, from his own being, that it should in all things be impossible for him to lie. He cannot lie, he cannot deceive, he cannot deny himself, or his word; these things are repugnant unto his being. I answer, that the apostle speaks not of the nature of the things themselves, but of their manifestation with respect unto us. Nothing was added to the promise of God to render it more certain, firm, and stable; but an addition was made unto it to give our minds greater security. God's immutability in promising, and impossibility in deceiving, are both equally from his nature; but the distinct proposition of them is needful unto our encouragement and establishment.

Obs. VIII. Fallen, sinful man stands in need of the utmost encouragement that divine condescension can extend unto, to prevail with him to receive and lay hold of the promise of grace and mercy by Jesus Christ.

There is nothing that we are so prone unto, as to distrust the promises of God; nothing that we are with more difficulty won over unto, than to mix them with faith [And this we do by the duty of contemplation or meditation on all those things we are supposed to learn by studying the word and being thus spiritually minded thereby. Contemplation of bible truths is an act of saving faith; we contemplate those things we love, the love of God being given to us upon our conversion; hence faith worketh by love. See 2Cor3:18] To evidence this we may consider, —

1. That the first entrance of sin into the world was by a disbelief of the truth of God; yea, that very sin formally consisted in an apprehension that God, in his promises and threatenings, had a mind to deceive us, Genesis 3:4-6. And as sin thus laid its foundation by the craft of Satan, so it endeavors to carry on its building. It continually suggests to the hearts and minds of men that they shall certainly be deceived in trusting to God's promises. For, —

(1.) Secret thoughts there are in the hearts of men, — which are “deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked,” — that neither the promises nor threatenings of God are true, in the terms and sense wherein they are proposed unto them. They neither think that it shall be so bad with any as he threateneth, nor so well as he promiseth. Did men believe the threatenings of God as to the fearful and eternal ruin of sinners, it were not possible they should live in sin as they do, without any endeavor of amendment, so to flee from the wrath to come. Nor do they think in their hearts that it shall be with them that believe according as God hath promised. They say in their hearts, “The LORD will not do good, neither will he do evil,” Zephaniah 1:12, — namely, as he hath either promised or threatened.

(2.) Men think that there are still some reserves and latent conditions in the promises and threatenings of God, and that God knows it shall be otherwise than they seem to portend. By this imagination Satan deceived our first parents as to the truth of God in his threatening. He persuaded them that there was a reserve therein, that was directly contrary unto what the words of it declared; and that by transgressing of his command they should not die, but be wise and like himself. And still men suppose that the promises propose a fair ground, indeed, but that if they should go to build upon it, there is a mine under it, which would be sprung at one time or another, unto their ruin. They cannot apprehend that it shall be with them according unto and as the promise doth declare. If they should attempt to believe, yet one latent condition or other would defeat them of obtaining it; whereas, indeed, the whole and entire condition of enjoying the promise is faith alone.

(3.) Whatever may be the truth of the promise, yet they cannot conceive that God intends them therein; whereas yet there is no declaration or intention of God, whereby our duty is to be regulated and whereon we shall be judged, but what is contained and expressed in the proposal of the promise itself.

On these and the like grounds, the great contest in the world, between God and man, is whether God be true or a liar in his promise. It is not thus directly stated in the minds of men, for they have many other pretences why they do not believe; but this is that which it is resolved into. For “he that receiveth not the testimony of God, maketh him a liar.” So was it with the people in the wilderness, whose carcasses fell therein because of their unbelief. The reasons they pretended and pleaded why they would not attempt to enter the land of Canaan, were, that the people were strong, and giants among them, and the cities walled, Numbers 13:28, 32, 33; but the true reason was, their unbelief of God's promise: wherefore God expresseth the sense of his indignation against them with that scheme of reproach, “Ye shall bear your iniquities, and ye shall know my breach of promise,” Numbers 14:34, or ‘see what your unbelief hath brought you unto.’ And no otherwise is it with all unbelievers at present, as our apostle at large declares, Hebrews 3 of this epistle. Other things are pretended as the causes of their unbelief, but it is their dissatisfaction in the truth of God that is the true and only cause of it. And as this sufficiently manifests the heinousness of unbelief, so it glorifies the righteousness of God in the condemnation of unbelievers.

2. The curse of the law having, by the guilt of sin, been admitted unto a dominion over the whole soul, it is a great thing to receive and admit of a testimony to the contrary, such as the promise is. What the law speaks, it speaks unto them that are under it, as all men are by nature. And it speaks in the heart of every man that the sinner must die. Conscience complies also, and adds its suffrage thereunto. This fixeth a conclusion in the mind that so it will be, whatever may be offered unto the contrary. But so is the testimony of God in the promise, namely, that there is a way of life and salvation for sinners; and that God offereth this way and an interest therein unto us. Nothing but the exceeding greatness of the power of grace can enable a guilty sinner in this case to “set to his seal that God is true.”

3. When the promise comes, and is proposed unto us, for the most part it finds us deeply engaged into, and, as to ourselves, immutably fixed on other things, that are inconsistent with faith in the promises. Some are interested in divers lusts and pleasures; some are filled with inveterate prejudices, through a vain conversation received by tradition from their fathers; and some have some good hopes in themselves, that in the way wherein they are, by the religion which they profess, and the duties which they perform, they may in time arrive unto what they aim at. When the promise is proposed, the first thing included therein is an utter relinquishment of all these things. As it is a promise of grace, so it excludes everything but grace. Wherefore, when it is proposed unto any, it doth not only require that it be believed, or God be believed therein, but also, that in order thereunto we part with and utterly renounce all hopes and confidences in ourselves, from what we are or expect to be, and betake ourselves for life and salvation unto the promise alone. Some imagine that it is a very easy thing to believe, and that the souls of men are but deceived, when they are called off from the duties that light and conviction put them upon to the way of faith in the promise; but the truth is, that what from its own nature, and from what is required thereunto or comprised therein, it is, as the most important, so the highest and greatest duty that we are called unto, and which men would of their own choice rather grind in a mill of the most burdensome duties than once apply their minds unto.

4. The guilt of sin hath filled the mind of every sinner with innumerable fears, doubts, and confusions, that are very difficultly satisfied or removed; yea, the remainders of them do abide in believers themselves, and oftentimes fill them with great perplexities. And these, when the promise is proposed unto them, arise and follow one another like the waves of the sea, James 1:6. No sooner is one of them answered or waived, but immediately another supplies its room. And in them all doth unbelief put forth its power.

And on these grounds it is that poor sinners have such need of the reduplication of divine assurances, that, notwithstanding all pretences unto the contrary, the promise of grace in Christ shall be made good and be accomplished unto them.

SECONDLY, The especial design of God, in this dispensation and condescension, ἵνα εἰχόμεν ἰσχυρὰν παραχρησῶν, etc.; — “that we might have a strong consolation.” Being engaged in the application of his instance, in the promise and oath of God given unto Abraham, the apostle here plainly dismisseth the consideration of things past under the old testament, in those blessings and temporal things which were typical of things spiritual, and applies the whole unto present believers, and therein unto all those of future ages, — “that we might have.” And herein he builds on this principle, that whatever

God promised, designed, sware unto Abraham, that he did so promise unto all believers whatever; so that every promise of the covenant belongeth equally unto them with him or any other. And two things the apostle lays down concerning such believers: 1. What God designs unto them; 2. Such a description of them as contains the qualifications necessary unto a participation of what is so designed:

1. The first is παρακλησις. It sometimes signifies “exhortation,” an encouraging, persuasive exhortation. And in that sense it is here taken by some expositors, as Theophylact and OEcumenius; — ‘that we might have thereby a prevalent “exhortation” unto faith and patience in believing.’ But “comfort” or “consolation” is the most usual signification of the word in the New Testament, as I have showed elsewhere; and that sense of the word alone can be here intended. A consolation it is that ariseth from the assurance of faith, and of our interest thereby in the promises of God. This is that which relieves our souls against all fears, doubts, and troubles; for it either obviates and prevents them, or it outbalanceth them, and bears up our souls against them. For comfort is the relief of the mind, whatever it be, against sorrow and trouble.

And this consolation which God intends and designs for believers is ισχυρα— “solamen fortissimum,” “forte,” “validum,” “potens;” “strong,” “powerful,” “prevalent.” Strong so as to be prevalent against opposition, is that which is intended. There are comforts to be taken, or are often taken, from earthly things; but they are weak, languid, and such as fade and die upon the first appearance of a vigorous opposition; but this consolation is strong and prevalent against all creature-oppositions whatever. Strong; that is, such as will abide against all opposition, — a strong tower, an impregnable fortress, a munition of rocks. For it is not the abounding of consolation in us, but the prevalency of the causes of it against opposition, that is intended.

2. There is the description of the persons unto whom God designs this consolation by the promise, confirmed with his oath: Οι χαταφυγοντες χρατησαι της προχειμενης. There are three things in this description of believers, or the heirs of the promise: (1.) The way whereby they seek for relief; they “flee for refuge.” (2.) The relief itself which they seek after; which is “the hope set before them.” (3.) The way whereby they are made partakers of it; they “lay hold upon it:” —

(1.) They are Οι χαταφυγοντες : say we, that “flee for refuge;” “qui cursum corripunt.” It is the judgment of many that here is an allusion unto him who had slain a man unawares under the law, whose safety and life depended on his speedy flight into one of the cities of refuge, Numbers 35:11, 12. And hereunto our translators had undoubtedly respect, whereon they rendered the word, “fleeing for refuge.” And indeed the word itself signifies such an action as is there ascribed unto the man-slayer. For χαταφυγειν, properly, “cursum corripere,” hath respect unto two things: [1.] An apprehension of danger, or a real surprisal with it, whereon a man takes his flight for deliverance. And so it was with the man-slayer; his apprehension of the approach of the avenger of blood, to take away his life, stirred him up χαταφυγειν, — to flee from the place and condition wherein he was, lest evil should overtake him. [2.] Speed and diligence in an endeavor to attain that place, or company, or end, which a man proposeth unto himself as the means of his deliverance, and whereby he hopes to find safety. He that doth so flee casts off all tergiversation [equivocating, or making excuses], stirs up himself, gives no place to sloth or vain hopes, and useth his utmost diligence in the pursuit of his safety. And hereby doth the Holy Ghost lively express the state and condition of all the heirs of promise in this matter. In themselves by nature, as they are children of the first Adam, they are all exposed, upon the guilt of sin original and actual, unto the sentence of the law. God by various means is pleased to awaken them unto the consideration of the danger wherein they are, the execution of that curse which they are obnoxious unto being impendent over them. In this condition they see a necessity of seeking out for relief, as knowing that if it be not obtained they must perish, and that eternally. Love of sin, compliance with the world, hopes of righteousness of their own, do all endeavor variously to retard and hinder them in their design; but when God proceeds to shut them up, to sharpen their convictions, and continually to represent their condition unto them, giving them to conclude that there is no hope in their present condition, at length they stir up themselves unto a speedy flight to the “hope set before them” in the promise. And, —

(2.) That is the second thing to be inquired into, namely, what is this “hope” that is “set before us,” and how it is so: [1.] Most expositors take “hope” here, by a metonymy of the subject, for the thing hoped for; that is, grace and glory, justification and salvation by Jesus Christ. These things are the subject-matter of the promises, which we desire and hope after. And unto these we may be said to flee for relief or refuge, when in our expectation of them we are supported and comforted. [2.] Some take “hope” subjectively, for the grace of hope itself. And this we are said to “flee unto,” — that is, speedily to betake ourselves unto the exercise of it, as founded in the promises of God, foregoing all other expectations; wherein we shall find assured consolation. [3.] “Hope,” by a metonymy of the effect for the cause, may express the promise itself, which is the cause and means of ingenerating hope in us. And this I take to be the proper meaning of the place, and which is not exclusive of the other senses mentioned. The promise being proposed unto us, is the cause and object of our faith, on the account of the faithfulness of God therein. Faith brings forth hope, whose object is the same promise, or the good things thereof, as proposed from the same faithfulness. Thence is itself called “the hope,” as that without which we could have none, there being neither cause of it nor object for it. And this hope is said to be “set before us,” or to be proposed unto us; which it is in the declaration of the promise or the dispensation of the gospel. Therein it is proposed as the object of our faith and hope, as the means of the strong consolation which God is so abundantly willing that we should receive. And this renders the whole metaphor plain and easy: for it is evident how the promise, with all that we hope for thereby, is “set before us” and proposed unto us in the gospel; as also how we “flee” or betake ourselves thereunto in all distresses for relief. And it is more natural to allow of this metonymical expression in the word “hope,” than to admit of so rough a catachresis in the other part of the words, wherein the grace of hope within us should be said to be “set before us.”

(3.) With respect hereunto we are said to “flee κρατησαι;” that is, εις το κρατησαι, — “to lay hold on,” “fortiter apprehendere,” “constanter retinere.” The signification of this word, frequently used by our apostle, I have on sundry occasions before declared. It is “injecta manu, totis viribus retinere;” — to hold fast what we lay hold on, with all our might and power. There will be many endeavors to strike off the hand of faith from laying hold on the promise; and many more to loosen its hold when it hath taken it; but it is in its nature, and it is a part of our duty, “strongly to lay hold upon,” and “firmly to retain” the promise, when we have reached unto it. And there seems in the whole metaphor to be an allusion unto those who run in a race: for whereas they have a prize or βραζειον set before them, they first stir up themselves with all their strength to speed towards the mark; which when they have attained, they both lay fast hold on and bear it away with them as their own. So it is with believers, as to the promise proposed unto them or set before them. They reach out after it, lay hold upon it, reserve it, as to their interest in it, as the only means of their deliverance and salvation, and of that consolation which in every condition they stand in need of. And from the words so opened we may observe, that, —

Obs. IX. Sense of danger and ruin from sin is the first thing which occasions a soul to look out after Christ in the promise. — It is implied in the word χταφυγειν, which includes a respect unto danger to be avoided; whence we render it, “flee for refuge.” As the Lord Christ came to seek and save that which was lost, to call not the righteous but sinners to repentance, to be a physician to the sick and not to the whole; so if men are not sensible of their lost condition, of the sin and sickness of their souls, they will never in good earnest look out after him. And therefore, as those by whom conviction of sin and humiliation for it are despised, as they are by many, despise Christ himself also, who is “the end of the law” and all its convictions “for righteousness;” so the profession of Christ and hopes of salvation by him, is in vain in all those who were never truly made sensible of sin, and the danger of eternal ruin thereby.

Obs. X. A full conviction of sin is a great and shaking surprisal unto a guilty soul. — Hence is such a one here tacitly compared unto him who had killed a man at unawares, He was just before in a condition of peace and safety, fearing no man, but with quietness and assurance attending his own occasions; but having now slain a man at unawares, he finds all things on a sudden changed round about him. Fear within and danger from without do beset him on every hand. If he seeth any man, he supposeth him the avenger of blood; and if he seeth no man, solitude is dreadful unto him. No otherwise is it with them who are thoroughly convinced of sin. They were alive, as the apostle speaks, Romans 7, and at peace; fearing no more evil than they felt, — perhaps persuading themselves that all things were well between God and their souls, or not much solicitous whether they were or no. In this state the commandment comes and discovers their guilt, and danger thereon; and unveils the curse, which until now was hidden from them, as the avenger of blood ready to execute the sentence of the law. This being a thing which they never expected nor feared, fills them with great surprisals. Hence are those cries of such persons, “What shall we do to be saved?” that argue a great distress and no small amazement. And those who know nothing of these things are utterly ignorant both of sin and grace.

Obs. XI. The revelation or discovery of the promise, or of Christ in the promise, is that alone which directs convinced sinners into their proper course and way. This is the setting of a hope before them, wherein they are called to look unto their strong tower as prisoners of hope, that they may be brought out of the pit through the blood of the everlasting covenant. — The man-slayer probably might have many contrivances suggested in his mind how he might escape the danger whereunto he was exposed. To leave his present habitation, to lie hid, to betake himself unto woods or deserts, and the like vain hopes, might present themselves unto him. But all these things did but keep him out of his way, and divert him from his duty; and the longer he entertained them in his thoughts, the more his danger was increased and his life hazarded. It was the remembrance alone of the city of refuge, set before him in the law, that directed him to his proper duty, and set him in his way unto safety. It is no otherwise with persons under the convictions of sin. Many things present themselves unto their minds, with hopes of relief attending them. Sin itself with a continuance therein will do so; so also will sloth, and the procrastination of present duty; but especially some duties themselves, — a righteousness by the works of the law will do so, and with many is effectual unto their ruin. Whilst these, or any of them, are attended unto, the way of duty and safety is hidden from the eyes of sinners. But when the promise, Christ in the promise, is proposed unto them, is “set before them,” so soon as they direct their eyes that way, they see their course plain before them, and what it is they must betake themselves unto, if they intend a deliverance out of the condition wherein they are.

Obs. XII. Where there is the least of saving faith, upon the first discovery of Christ in the promise it will stir up the whole soul to make out towards him, and a participation of him. — As faith is begotten in the soul by the promise, so the first natural, genuine act of it tends unto a further interest in and participation of that promise. In going to Christ upon his call and invitation, in laying hold upon him in the promise, consists the nature, life, and being of the duty, obedience, and grace, of that faith which is in the heirs of promise.

Obs. XIII. It is the duty and wisdom of all those unto whom Christ in the promise is once discovered, by any gospel means or ordinance once set before them, to admit of no delay of a thorough closing with him. — Many things, yea, things innumerable, will offer themselves with subtlety and violence unto that end; yea, all the craft and power of the gates of hell will engage to the same purpose; but as faith, being really set on work, will prevail against them all, so it is our duty to avoid them, as those which, under specious pretences, strike at the life and eternal welfare of our souls.

Obs. XIV. There is a spiritual strength and vigor required unto the securing of our interest in the promise, — χρατησαι, “to lay fast and firm hold upon it.” — The greatness of our concern therein, the opposition that will be made thereunto, the love wherewith our faith ought to be accompanied, do require the utmost of our strength and diligence herein.

Obs. XV. The promise is an assured refuge unto all sin-distressed souls who betake themselves thereunto.

Obs. XVI. Where any souls, convinced of sin by the charge of the law, and of their own lost condition thereon, do betake themselves unto the promise for relief, God is abundantly willing that they should receive strong consolation. For herein doth the nature of that faith consist which hath the promise of pardon, justification, and salvation, given unto it. And hereon I might enlarge, to manifest the true nature of that faith which hath the promises, but I must not too far digress.

The Doctrine of Predestination

Chapter Five
The Doctrine of Predestination

1. What parts, in succession, come up for discussion concerning this doctrine?

a) The grounds why we assign it a separate place in the doctrine of the decrees. b) The scriptural terms that are important for predestination and election. c) The systematic development of the doctrine of election in connection with other areas of doctrine. d) The major deviating opinions and our criticism of them.

2. Why in Reformed dogmatics is the doctrine of election treated separately after the doctrine of the decrees?

In order to show the importance of this doctrine in the entire system. Also, as the doctrine of salvation follows consideration of creation and providence, so here the particular decree of predestination follows the general decree of God.

3. Did Lutheran dogmatics also usually put predestination toward the beginning in its treatment?

Yes; certainly initially. Melanchthon began his Loci Communes with its treatment. Later, it was different. The doctrine of election was now placed at the beginning of soteriology. This came about because Lutheran theology had undergone a total change.

4. At what points is the doctrine of predestination or election related to the rest of Reformed doctrine as a whole?

a) It is a direct consequence of the Reformed concept of God's sovereignty, as that has been shaped based on Scripture. In the century of the Reformation one arrived at the doctrine of election along a twofold path. Luther came to predestination from man and his salvation. Zwingli and Calvin did so from God. Zwingli deduced predestination directly from providence (the decrees) and comes close to pantheism. Calvin expressed himself more soberly. But he, too, postulated that God is everything and the creature is nothing, that the creature, even in its highest importance, remains subordinate to God and must serve Him. Whoever gives up the doctrine of predestination must therefore also drop the doctrine of the sovereignty of God and subsequently falsify biblical teaching at numerous places.

b) The doctrine of human inability after the fall is inseparably connected with predestination, so that one must maintain them both together or drop them both together. One of the two; it depends on God or it depends on man who will be saved. If one chooses the first, then one has accepted predestination. If one chooses the second, then this is possible only under two presuppositions. Either one must be Pelagian and say man has not become lacking in ability through his fall; then he is able to decide for himself. Or one must say man was at first lacking in ability, but God does something to man, in fact to all men without distinction, whereby they again become able to make a decision. But then A, who is saved, must have something good that B, who is not saved, does not have. And A must have this good of himself because he received precisely the same grace as B. In any case, here the inability of man is denied, whether one propounds that denial in a Pelagian or a semi-Pelagian fashion. Luther arrived at election by reasoning back to it from man's inability (Concerning the Bondage of the Will, against Erasmus). Later Lutheran theology had to give up absolute predestination. To the same extent that it did this, however, it had to diminish the inability of man. According to it, man has the ability to resist supernatural grace.

c) Predestination or election is related to mystical union and the body of Christ. The elect form a body. In a body the members must be fitted to each other and are intended for each other. If this body of Christ originated accidentally by the free-will choice of individual men, then there would be no guarantee that it would become a properly proportioned body. God must decide in advance how many ought to belong to it, who those many shall be, and when they should be fitted into it. Predestination is nothing other than the decision of God concerning these matters.

d) Predestination is no less related to the doctrine of the merits of Christ. This, too, cannot remain the same if one denies election. If we ask what Christ earned for us, the answer is:

1. Satisfaction of our debt of guilt by His passive obedience. 2. Eternal life by His active obedience. According to Scripture, however, to eternal office belongs the application of the merits of the Mediator in its entirety. To that application belongs the Holy Spirit, who works regeneration, faith, conversion. If now man himself decides by not believing or believing of himself, then faith is a work of man and no longer a fruit of the merits of Christ. Christ cannot have merited for us what we ourselves provide. And so it is, not only with faith but with all other parts of the application of salvation. Denial of predestination includes, so viewed, a denial of the actual merits of the Mediator.

e) Predestination also relates to the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints. Four possibilities exist:

1. God lets both coming into the state of grace and remaining in the state of grace depend on the free will of man.

2. God, by sovereign election, decides both coming into the state of grace and the persevering of those who have once come into it.

3. God leaves it to man in his free will the decision whether he will come into the state of grace, but decides sovereignly that whoever is once in that state cannot fall from it again. 4. God sovereignly determines that certain persons will come into the state of grace, but for the rest leaves it to their free decision whether they will again fall from it or persevere in it. One sees immediately how absurd the third conception is. Sinful man in his entirety is said to be able to decide, but not the regenerate man. Nor is the fourth conception tenable. Once God's sovereignty is at play, man can no longer thwart it subsequently. Conception 1 is completely Pelagian. So then, what remains is the conception mentioned under 2, and this is precisely the Reformed opinion.

5. What is the first term to be treated here, which is used by Scripture in connection with the doctrine of predestination?

The Hebrew, יָדָע; Greek, γινώσκειν, προγινώσκειν, "to know," "to foreknow"; πρόγνωσις, "foreknowledge." In Romans 8:29–30, προέγνω, "those He has foreknown," stands at the beginning.

6. In order to understand this term correctly, what must be decided first?

Whether it is meant and used in its Classical Greek meaning or its HebrewHellenistic meaning. "Knowing" for the Jew is an entirely different concept than for the Greek mind. The question now is simply: How does God's word understand it?

7. Where would the Classical Greek meaning lead us?

To a Remonstrant understanding of election. In Classical Greek usage, "to know" is "to become acquainted with something" or "to acquire knowledge regarding something." In this sense Arminian theology has always insisted that God's "foreknowledge" is an awareness in advance of one or another quality in sinners, which then guided Him in His election. For example, God knew the elect beforehand as believers who would persevere in good works. This is why He chose them.

8. Is the concept "foreknowing" in this sense completely absent in the New Testament?

It appears, but nowhere in relation to election as having for its object foreseen faith and good works. See 2 Peter 3:17: "You ... knowing this beforehand, take care lest you are led astray by the seduction of heinous men"; Acts 26:5: "As they have previously known me for a long time."

9. From what at the outset does it appear that the concept cannot have such a meaning in the places it is used for election?

From the fact that nowhere is added what God had known in advance in man. If we had to do with foreknowledge in this sense, such an addition would be essential. If I know something beforehand, then everything depends on what I know or sense beforehand.

Now, “foreknowing” and “foreknowledge” occur for election (in Rom 8:29; 11:2; 1 Pet 1:2, 20). “Knowing” in its special meaning is used (in Matt 7:23; 1 Cor 8:3; Gal 4:9; 2 Tim 2:19). Nowhere here is it mentioned that God has foreknown or known in persons. Compare that with the two texts mentioned in the answer to question 8, where something is mentioned.

10. Prove that in Romans 8:28–29, God’s “foreknowledge” cannot mean foreseeing.

The context as a whole and the aim of the apostle’s argument as a whole make that impossible here. The apostle intends to show that for those who love God, all things work together for good. He reasons as follows: Love for God is a consequence of the calling of God, that is, of that omnipotent act by which God has made alive those who are His.

This calling of God as an act in time does not stand alone. It had a reverse side in eternity. Believers are called according to the purpose of God. Again, however, this purpose did not stand alone as a cold determination of will, but something lay behind it that the apostle calls “foreknowledge.”

Here the ascent backward from link to link ceases: calling—purpose— foreknowledge, and the descent begins from foreknowledge. The foreknowledge was such that a predestinating to the form of son resulted: “Those whom He has known beforehand, He has also ordained beforehand to be conformed to the image of His Son, in order that He might be the firstborn among many brothers.” Hereby the sense of “foreknowledge” is already decided in principle. It is something like what a father feels toward his son, his future son. It is a knowing of love. Since behind God’s purpose such a fatherly love functioned with respect to the elect, it ordained the form of son for all those who were the objects of its free choice. Given the fatherly and free character of this love, it is absolutely excluded for the apostle that this fatherly love can be blocked by anything in the realization of its being decreed. With divine certainty and with irresistible power this love aims at its highest goal, the complete glorification of the children in the image of likeness to Christ. It must carry through step by step in its working: “Those whom He knew, those He also called; those whom He called, those He also justified; those whom He justified, those He also glorified.” That is the sense of the sequence. Everything follows with infallible certainty from the unique character of the foreknowledge of God.

Now one may wonder whether anything still remains of this beautiful argument and this natural tie, if one is forced to give “foreknowledge” the meaning of “foreseeing.” Then everything becomes unintelligible and artificial. The divine act that stands at the beginning of the entire sequence then becomes something dependent and is no longer fit to be the basis, firm in itself, of the rest. We have a root that must draw its sap from the trunk and branches and at the same time must still also guarantee that trunk and branches will not wither—a contradiction.

Further, it may be noted that the likeness to the image of the Son to which believers are predestined refers to His glory as Mediator, not to the divine glory that He possessed from eternity. Only of the former will the elect obtain a likeness (though at a far distance).

11. Prove that in Romans 11:2, as well, “foreknowledge” must have a similar meaning and cannot be “foreseeing.”

Here the apostle intends to show how impossible, indeed, how absurd it would be that God would reject Israel, His people. “Rejecting” and “knowing in advance” therefore exclude each other according to the thinking of the apostle. In the midst of Israel’s apostasy and disobedience, he maintains its future salvation, for God, having once foreknown His people, cannot again reject them. One need only attempt to insert the concept of “obtaining knowledge beforehand” and the argument immediately becomes nonsense. In the face of Israel’s actual apostasy how can it ever serve as an argument for its future restoration that God has still foreseen something good in Israel? It is completely the reverse: Precisely because in His free choice God took into account not what Israel would be in itself but exclusively His own good pleasure, precisely because the covenant relationship did not originate with Israel but with Him, precisely because of that, He cannot reject them.

12. May something be deduced from 1 Peter 1:2 concerning the nature of God’s foreknowledge?

No, but certainly from 1 Peter 1:20. Here Christ is the object of foreknowledge. And then, of course, according to His human nature. Now by the nature of the case it makes no sense to say that the Father knew something beforehand in the human nature of the Mediator, for that human nature was entirely the result of God’s election itself. Without election the Son would not have assumed a human nature. What is a result cannot at the same time be a ground or source. Therefore, it is certain that here this foreknowledge cannot be considered foresight of something that already existed for God outside His counsel.

13. What is the meaning of the word “know” in Matthew 7:23?

Here the word does not refer to “election” in the strict sense but is nonetheless used in a way that can shed light on its meaning elsewhere. Christ says that on the day of judgment He will say to many, “I never knew you.” This cannot mean, “I did not know anything of or about you, ... you worker of iniquity.” A knowing in the sense of “having knowledge of” is thus certainly present, but not a knowing in the other sense. Christ means to say, “I have not entered into a personal relationship with you.” On the day of judgment the lost, as it were, will insist forcefully on the knowledge Christ has by saying: “Did we not prophesy in your name?” However, He says to them, “I never knew you!” On His side had been lacking just that knowing love, that friendship, to which from their side they now appeal.

14. What about 1 Corinthians 8:3?

Here Paul contrasts with the pride of those who think they know something love for God as that in which the inner worth of Christian character lies. That worth must not be sought in knowledge that puffs up. That it lies in love is shown by Paul from this, that all who love God are known by God, as Calvin says, are valued, highly esteemed. Here there is a fine play on words in the contrast between the knowledge of man in his confusion and being known by God that truly settles everything.

15. How about Galatians 4:9?

First, the fact that the Galatians know God is advanced by the apostle as the ground why they must not turn back again to the weak and impoverished elementary principles of the world. But according to the apostle, there is something else that weighs even more heavily. God has known them. That is, He has placed Himself to them in a relationship of love, as a father to His children. If now, knowing this, they turn back to the weak and impoverished elementary principles of the world, they make themselves guilty of ingratitude to the worst degree. All this shows that being known by God must be something still greater and more glorious than knowing God. That rules out the explanation that foreseeing is in view.

16. What is the case in 2 Timothy 2:19?

Here, too, the words, "The Lord knows those who are His," must not be taken as an intellectual knowledge. It means that God stands in the closest relationship to His children. The apostasy of those who had occupied a prominent place in the congregation is spoken of, and that from their apostasy one could despair of his own perseverance, especially since the pernicious doctrine of these erring spirits was spreading like gangrene. It is of no comfort in the face of that to consider that God indeed knows who are His and who will remain faithful to Him. But it is certainly a comfort in such circumstances to be able to remember that the Lord stands in the closest relationship of love to His own and therefore cannot allow them to fall away. Compare in John 10:27–28 the bond there is between the shepherd's knowing and the sheep's not perishing.

17. What is the main objection to the conception of God's foreknowledge maintained here?

That it does not indicate what it is that God could have foreknown in the objects of His choice.

a) Some answer, faith. That is the old Remonstrant answer, but it is simply inconsistent with the teaching of Scripture that calls faith a gift of God and in particular, with the Pauline contrast between faith and works that does not permit that one make of the former a kind of work of man, an evangelical obedience.

b) Others say, love. This conflicts even more with the antithesis just mentioned, which would then have to say that man is saved not by external works but by internal works of the law.

c) There is no place for something that God would have been able to foresee or to know beforehand in man. However subtly one may also sublimate the little He must have seen in man by speaking of a kind of receptivity that must be the opposite of all doing and working, it is still always a receptivity that man himself has rendered and to that extent an activity must correspond to it so that again it is "of those who work" and not of the God who shows mercy.

18. What is the development of the idea of foreknowledge?

The Hebrew יָדַע, “to know,” is as good as the same in meaning as בָּחַר, “to choose,” “to know.” It takes on that meaning as follows: To take note of something closely, to be interested in it, to penetrate to its essence, to care about it—it is in all cases a sign of loving interest that wants to be most closely united with its object. We say, “To understand someone in some matter,” or, “He has not understood me in this.” Accordingly, divine knowing includes the following:

a) God was first in this act of predestination. The relationship between Him and the objects of His choice originated entirely from Him. Only because He willed to know them and in fact did know them did they become something for Him. That is the element of sovereignty. As an earthly sovereign, if he is pleased with his knowledge of someone or takes note of him, only through this knowledge makes him something of significance, so it is with the knowing of God.

b) This knowledge or foreknowledge of God is not an act of cold arbitrariness but an act of love in which the Lord, as it were, has been absorbed in knowing and contemplating His beloved from eternity. c) It does not stand on its own but carries in itself the impulse for a range of divine acts of salvation. The knowing of God is fruitful; it brings forth grace and glory.

19. Can you show this by some citations from the Old Testament?

Yes, in Hosea 13:4–5, just where Israel’s sin and declensions are spoken of, “But I am the LORD your God from the land of Egypt ... I knew you in the wilderness, in the land of great drought”; in Amos 3:2, where Israel’s unfaithfulness is no less in the foreground, it is said, “You only of all the families of the earth have I known; therefore I will afflict you for your unrighteousness.” In Psalm 144:3 the question is raised: “O LORD, what is man that you know him, or the son of man that you consider him?” (cf. also Psa 8:4). By means of the Septuagint the Hebrew meaning was then transferred to the Greek word.

29. What is the third word mentioned here?

Προορίζειν, which we find used in Romans 8:29, where it immediately follows “foreknow.” It means “to predestine.” It is distinguished from both preceding terms because it requires an addition. To say that someone is foreknown or elect provides, at least in the language of Scripture, a complete thought. To say that someone is predestined immediately elicits the question, “To what?” Ὀρίζειν means “to establish boundaries,” “to make a determination, a reckoning.” Furthermore, it is a completely neutral word, that is, it can be used for good as well as for evil. Election and foreknowledge have only a good sense; predestination also has a bad sense. Compare Acts 2:23, where the ὠρισμένη βουλή ... τοῦ θεοῦ, “the determined counsel of God,” occurs as that by which Christ was handed over (cf. also 4:28).

Besides in Romans 8:29, the more specific meaning of “predestined” appears in Ephesians 1:5, 11, “Who has predestined us for adoption as sons,” and, “in Him we have obtained an inheritance, we who were predestined according to the purpose of Him who works all things according to the counsel of His will.”

The purpose of election is a certain relationship; the purpose of predestination is a certain status, a condition, an image, a destiny. Compare “those whom He has also predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son.” Thus, here it is a likeness, conformity to Christ, which is the object of predestination. In this connection one should think of His glory as Mediator, as was noted above.

30. Are the two concepts of “election” and “predestination” always so sharply differentiated?

No, sometimes the former can also be used for the latter; for example, in James 2:5, “Has not God chosen the poor of this world to be rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom?”

31. Is there still another word in use for election?

Yes, namely the word “purpose,” for example in Romans 8:28, “who are called according to His purpose.”

Purpose, πρόθεσις from προτιθέναι. The word differs from προορίζειν by the emphasis falling more on the willing side of God’s decree of predestination. In all God’s decree there is an act of the mind and an act of the will; [See Owen on this act of the will – code455b] so also in the decree of predestination. By the former the idea is formed, its destiny delineated, by the latter God with a resolute will establishes what He has thus determined for Himself in order to bring about its reality.

Sometimes “purpose” can also be understood in a more comprehensive sense, so that it includes “foreknowledge” and “election”; 2 Timothy 1:9, “Who has saved us and called us to a holy calling ... in His own purpose and grace, which He gave us in Christ Jesus before times eternal.”

Romans 9:11 speaks of a “purpose according to election.” By this the apostle means that God’s purpose was an electing, approving purpose, a purpose that makes distinctions. It was a purpose of choice.

56. What was the starting point of predestination with respect to believers?

Scripture teaches us that it is to be found in God’s eternal love. To begin with, that is present in the word “foreknowledge” as we have developed its meaning above. This foreknowledge is a free sovereign love. And “foreknowledge” is put first by the apostle in the series of acts that form the foundation of the salvation of the sinner (Rom 8:29). Furthermore, this love of God is characterized for us by foreknowledge as a personal love. God did not merely love a part, a kernel, a remnant of humanity. God, we must say, loved particular people, a John, a Paul, etc. It was a knowing by name, a personal knowing, something moreover already included in the term “knowing” itself. A love other than personal is in itself not possible. Love is in its nature something personal. Finally, we must hold that for us nothing lies in back of this love. One may not even put mercy in back of it. And certainly not for the following reasons: Mere mercy is not something personal. Anyone who is in misery has as such a claim to our mercy. Mercy distinguishes itself just by this natural, general character from love. Thus, if in election one wishes to make mercy the starting point, one abandons a personal starting point. It would then have to be said: God saw us in our sin and by this, our miserable condition, was moved to compassion to save us in Christ. And that compassion then set God's love into motion. But then one could rightly ask whether all sinners did not stand equally miserable before God and whether equal misery should not have produced equal mercy for all. If one answers "no," then one concedes that besides mercy there was still something else that caused it to remain specifically with certain specific persons. And this something else can only lie in the love of God. It was there before mercy. And by it mercy was awakened and actuated. Only so is it also true that the ground of election does not in any respect lie in us, not even in our miserable lost condition. God loved us and saved us not because but despite our being miserable. Scripture considers this from the same point of view: "God who is rich in mercy on account of His great love with which He has loved us ..." (Eph 2:4). Here mercy is clearly derived from love and not the reverse.

Limited Atonement

The Blessings or Better things in the promise include faith!

Let reason be put back on the throne and cast all prejudice aside, this following explanation is excellent in helping to understand the atonement being limited to God's elect. Subjects covered: The good things procured by the death of Christ - faith and other graces, eternal life, Arminianism's problem regarding the giving of faith.

The Death of Death in the Death of Christ by John Owen, Book III Ch. IV

Arg. IX. Before I come to press the argument intended, I must premise some few things; as, —

1. Whatever is freely bestowed upon us, in and through Christ, that is all wholly the procurement and merit of the death of Christ. Nothing is bestowed through him on those that are his which he hath not purchased; the price whereby he made his purchase being his own blood, 1 Pet. i. 18, 19; for the covenant between his Father and him, of making out all spiritual blessings to them that were given unto him, was expressly founded on this condition, "That he should make his soul an offering for sin," Isa. liii. 10.

2. That confessedly, on all sides, faith is, in men of understanding, of such absolute indispensable necessity unto salvation, — there being no sacrifice to be admitted for the want of it under the new covenant, — that, whatever God hath done in his love, sending his Son, and whatever Christ hath done or doth, in his oblation and intercession for all or some, without this in us, is, in regard of the event, of no value, worth, or profit unto us, but serveth only to increase and aggravate condemnation; for, whatsoever is accomplished besides, that is most certainly true, "He that believeth not shall be damned," Mark xvi. 16. (So that if there is in ourselves a power of believing, and the act of it do proceed from that power, and is our own also, then certainly and undeniably it is in our power to make the love of God and death of Christ effectual towards us or not, and that by believing we actually do the one by an act of our own; which is so evident that the most ingenious and perspicacious of our adversaries have in terms confessed it, as I have declared elsewhere).²⁹ Such being, then, the absolute necessity of faith, it seems to me that the cause of that must needs be the prime and principal cause of salvation, as being the cause of that without which the whole would not be, and by which the whole is, and is effectual.

3. I shall give those that to us in this are contrary-minded their choice and option, so that they will answer directly, categorically, and without uncouth, insignificant, cloudy distinctions, whether our Saviour, by his death and intercession (which we proved to be conjoined), did merit or procure faith for us, or no? or, which is all one, whether faith be a fruit and effect of the death of Christ, or no? And according to their answer I will proceed.

First, if they answer affirmatively, that it is, or that Christ did procure it by his death (provided always that they do not wilfully equivocate, and when I speak of faith as it is a grace in a particular person, taking it subjectively, they understand faith as it is the doctrine of faith, or the way of salvation declared in the gospel, taking it objectively, which is another thing, and beside the present question; although, by the way, I must tell them that we deny the granting of that new way of salvation, in bringing life and immortality to light by the gospel in Christ, to be procured for us by Christ, himself being the chiefest part of this way, yea, the way itself: and that he should himself be procured by his own death and oblation is a very strange, contradictory assertion, beseeming them who have used it (More, p. 35.) It is true, indeed, a full and plenary carrying of his elect to life and glory by that way we ascribe to him, and maintain it against all; but the granting of that way was of the same free grace and unprocured love which was also the cause of granting himself unto us, Gen. iii. 15.); — if, I say, they answer thus affirmatively, then I demand whether Christ procured faith for all for whom he died absolutely, or upon some condition on their part to be fulfilled? If absolutely, then surely, if he died for all, they must all absolutely believe; for that which is absolutely procured for any is absolutely his, no doubt. He that hath absolutely procured an inheritance, by what means soever, who can hinder, that it should not be his? But this is contrary to that of the apostle, “All men have not faith,” 2 Thess. iii. 2; and, “Faith is of the elect of God,” Tit. i. 1. If they say that he procured it for them, that is, to be bestowed on them conditionally, I desire that they would answer bona fide, and roundly, in terms without equivocation or blind distinctions, assign that condition, that we may know what it is, seeing it is a thing of so infinite concernment to all our souls. Let me know this condition which ye will maintain, and en herbam amici! the cause is yours. Is it, as some say, if they do not resist the grace of God? Now, what is it not to resist the grace of God? is it not to obey it? And what is it to obey the grace of God? is it not to believe? So the condition of faith is faith itself. Christ procured that they should believe, upon condition that they do believe! Are these things so? But they can assign a condition, on our part required, of faith, that is not faith itself. Can they do it? Let us hear it, then, and we will renew our inquiry concerning that condition, whether it be procured by Christ or no. If not, then is the cause of faith still resolved into ourselves; Christ is not the author and finisher of it. If it be then are we just where we were before, and must follow with our queries whether that condition was procured absolutely or upon condition. Depinge ubi sistam.

But, secondly, if they will answer negatively, as, agreeably to their own principles, they ought to do, and deny that faith is procured by the death of Christ, then, —

1. They must maintain that it is an act of our own wills, so our own as not to be wrought in us by grace; and that it is wholly situated in our power to perform that spiritual act, nothing being bestowed upon us by free grace, in and through Christ (as was before declared), but what by him, in his death and oblation, was procured: which is contrary, — (1.) To express Scripture in exceeding many places, which I shall not recount: (2.) To the very nature of the being of the new covenant, which doth not prescribe and require the condition of it, but effectually work it in all the covenantees, Jer. xxxi. 33, 34; Ezek. xxxvi. 26; Heb. viii. 10, 11: (3.) To the advancement of the free grace of God, in setting up the power of free-will, in the state of corrupted nature, to the slighting and undervaluing thereof. (4.) To the received doctrine of our natural depravedness and disability to anything that is good; yea, by evident unstrained consequence, overthrowing that fundamental article of original sin: yea, (5.) To right reason, which will never grant that the natural faculty is able of itself, without some spiritual elevation, to produce an act purely spiritual; as 1 Cor. ii. 14.

2. They must resolve almost the sole cause of our salvation into ourselves ultimately, it being in our own power to make all that God and Christ do unto that end effectual, or to frustrate their utmost endeavours for that purpose: for all that is done, whether in the Father's loving us and sending his Son to die for us, or in the Son's offering himself for an oblation in our stead, or for us (in our behalf), is confessedly, as before, of no value nor worth, in respect of any profitable issue, unless we believe; which that we shall do, Christ hath not effected nor procured by his death, neither can the Lord so work it in us but that the sole casting voice (if I may so say), whether we will believe or no, is left to ourselves. Now, whether this be not to assign unto ourselves the cause of our own happiness, and to make us the chief builders of our own glory, let all judge.

These things being thus premised, I shall briefly prove that which is denied, namely, that faith is procured for us by the death of Christ; and so, consequently, he died not for all and every one, for "all men have not faith:" and this we may do by these following reasons:—

1. The death of Jesus Christ purchased holiness and sanctification for us, as was at large proved, Arg. viii.; but faith, as it is a grace of the Spirit inherent in us, is formally a part of our sanctification and holiness: therefore he procured faith for us. The assumption is most certain, and not denied; the proposition was sufficiently confirmed in the foregoing argument; and I see not what may be excepted against the truth of the whole. If any shall except, and say that Christ might procure for us some part of holiness (for we speak of parts, and not of degrees and measure), but not all, as the sanctification of hope, love, meekness, and the like, I ask, — first, What warrant have we for any such distinction between the graces of the Spirit, that some of them should be of the purchasing of Christ, others of our own store? secondly, Whether we are more prone of ourselves to believe, and more able, than to love and hope? and where may we have a ground for that?

2. All the fruits of election are purchased for us by Jesus Christ; for "we are chosen in him," Eph. i. 4, as the only cause and fountain of all those good things which the Lord chooseth us to, for the praise of his glorious grace, that in all things he might have the pre-eminence. That even the act of believing is not from us but the work of God, [John 6:29 and Phil. 1:29, Eph. 2:8 thereby eliminating any grounds for man's boasting in himself.] I hope I need not be solicitous about the proving of this, that the Lord Jesus is the only way and means by and for whom the Lord will certainly and actually collate upon his elect all the fruits and effects or intendments of that love whereby he chose them. But now faith is a fruit, a principal fruit, of our election; for saith the apostle, “We are chosen in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy,” Eph. i. 4, — of which holiness, faith, purifying the heart, is a principal share. “Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called,” Rom. viii. 30; that is, with that calling which is according to his purpose, effectually working faith in them by the mighty operation of his Spirit, “according to the exceeding greatness of his power,” Eph. i. 19. And so they “believe” (God making them differ from others, 1 Cor. iv. 7, in the enjoyment of the means) “who are ordained to eternal life,” Acts xiii. 48. Their being ordained to eternal life was the fountain from whence their faith did flow; and so “the election hath obtained, and the rest were blinded,” Rom. xi. 7.

3. All the blessings of the new covenant are procured and purchased by him in whom the promises thereof are ratified, and to whom they are made; for all the good things thereof are contained in and exhibited by those promises, through the working of the Spirit of God. Now, concerning the promises of the covenant, and their being confirmed in Christ, and made unto his, as Gal. iii. 16, with what is to be understood in those expressions, was before declared. Therefore, all the good things of the covenant are the effects, fruits, and purchase of the death of Christ, he and all things for 257him being the substance and whole of it. Farther; that faith is of the good things of the new covenant is apparent from the description thereof, Jer. xxxi. 33, 34; Heb. viii. 10–12; Ezek. xxxvi. 25–27, with divers other places, as might clearly be manifested if we affected copiousness in causa facili.

4. That without which it is utterly impossible that we should be saved must of necessity be procured by him by whom we are fully and effectually saved. Let them that can, declare how he can be said to procure salvation fully and effectually for us, and not be the author and purchaser of that (for he is the author of our salvation by the way of purchase) without which it is utterly impossible we should attain salvation. Now, without faith it is utterly impossible that ever any should attain salvation, Heb. xi. 6, Mark xvi. 16; but Jesus Christ, according to his name, doth perfectly save us, Matt. i. 21, procuring for us “eternal redemption,” Heb. ix. 12, being, “able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by him,” chap. vii. 25: and therefore must faith also be within the compass of those things that are procured by him.

5. The Scripture is clear, in express terms, and such as are so equivalent that they are not liable to any evasion; as Phil. i. 29, “It is given unto us, ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ, on the behalf of Christ, for Christ’s sake, to believe on him.” Faith, or belief, is the gift, and Christ the procurer of it: “God hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in him in heavenly places,” Eph. i. 3. If faith be a spiritual blessing, it is bestowed on us “in him,” and so also for his sake; if it be not, it is not worth contending about in this sense and way: so that, let others look which way they will, I desire to look unto Jesus as the “author and finisher of our faith,” Heb. xii. 2. Divers other reasons, arguments, and places of Scripture might be added for the confirmation of this truth; but I hope I have said enough, and do not desire to say all. The sum of the whole reason may be reduced to this head, — namely, if the fruit and effect procured and wrought by the death of Christ absolutely, not depending on any condition in man to be fulfilled, be not common to all, then did not Christ die for all; but the supposal is true, as is evident in the grace of faith, which being procured by the death of Christ, to be absolutely bestowed on them for whom he died, is not common to all: therefore, our Saviour did not die for all.

Arg. X. We argue from the type to the antitype, or the thing signified by it; which will evidently restrain the oblation of Christ to God's elect. The people of Israel were certainly, in all remarkable things that happened unto them, typical of the church of God; as the apostle at large [declares], 1 Cor. x. 11. Especially, their institutions and ordinances were all representative of the spiritual things of the gospel; their priests, altar, sacrifices, were but all shadows of the good things to come in Jesus Christ; their Canaan was a type of heaven, Heb. iv. 3, 9; as also Jerusalem or Sion, Gal. iv. 26, Heb. xii. 22. The whole people itself was a type of God's church, his elect, his chosen and called people: whence as they were called a "holy people, a royal priesthood;" so also, in allusion to them, are believers, 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9. Yea, God's people are in innumerable places called his "Israel," as it is farther expounded, Heb. viii. 8. A true Israelite is as much as a true believer, John i. 47; and he is a Jew who is so in the hidden man of the heart. I hope it need not be proved that that people, as delivered from bondage, preserved, taken nigh unto God, brought into Canaan, was typical of God's spiritual church, of elect believers. Whence we thus argue:— Those only are really and spiritually redeemed by Jesus Christ who were designed, signified, typified by the people of Israel in their carnal, typical redemption (for no reason in the world can be rendered why some should be typed out in the same condition, partakers of the same good, and not others); but by the people of the Jews, in their deliverance from Egypt, bringing into Canaan, with all their ordinances and institutions, only the elect, the church of God, was typed out, as was before proved. And, in truth, it is the most senseless thing in the world, to imagine that the Jews were under a type to all the whole world, or indeed to any but God's chosen ones, as is proved at large, Heb. ix., x. Were the Jews and their ordinances types to the seven nations whom they destroyed and supplanted in Canaan? were they so to Egyptians, infidels, and haters of God and his Christ? We conclude, then, assuredly, from that just proportion that ought to be observed between the types and the things typified, that only the elect of God, his church and chosen ones, are redeemed by Jesus Christ.

This is a very good proof of the better things promised in the new covenant are to be applied, and infallibly so, to those for whom Christ died - that these two things are inseparable which Arminians separate. Those who are in hell never had these things communicated to them, hence Christ did not die for them. Had he died for them, they would have received them and been saved.

Death of Death in the Death of Christ

by John Owen

Book III Chapter IV. p137

Of sanctification, and of the cause of faith, and the procurement thereof by the death of Christ.

Arg. VIII. Another argument may be taken from the effect and fruit of the death of Christ unto sanctification, which we thus propose:— If the blood of Jesus Christ doth wash, purge, cleanse, and sanctify them for whom it was shed, or for whom he was a sacrifice, then certainly he died, shed his blood, or was a sacrifice, only for them that in the event are washed, purged, cleansed, and sanctified; — which that all or every one is not is most apparent, faith being the first principle of the heart's purification, Acts xv. 9, and "all men have not faith," 2 Thess. iii. 2; it is "of the elect of God," Tit. i. 1. The consequence, I conceive, is undeniable, and not to be avoided with any distinctions. But now we shall make it evident that the blood of Christ is effectual for all those ends of washing, purging, and sanctifying, which we before recounted. [Note the appeal to reason. The scriptures are reasonable. But do to sin and God's judgments, many are bereft of reason and have been given over to futile thinking. Also, traditions, religious conceits and prejudices cloud our thinking - this affects all of us to varying degrees.] And this we shall do; — first, from the types of it; and, secondly, by plain expressions concerning the thing itself:—

First, For the type, that which we shall now consider is the sacrifice of expiation, which the apostle so expressly compareth with the sacrifice and oblation of Christ. Of this he affirmeth, Heb. ix. 13, that it legally sanctified them for whom it was a sacrifice. "For," saith he, "the blood of bulls and goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh." Now, that which was done carnally and legally in the type must be spiritually effected in the antitype, — the sacrifice of Christ, typified by that bloody sacrifice of beasts. This the apostle asserteth in the verse following. "How much more," saith he, "shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?" If I know anything, that answer of Arminius and some others to this, — namely, that the sacrifice did sanctify, not as offered but as sprinkled, and the blood of Christ, not in respect of the oblation, but of its application, answereth it, — is weak and unsatisfactory; for it only asserts a division between the oblation and application of the blood of Christ, which, though we allow to be distinguished, yet such a division we are now disproving. And to weaken our argument, the same division which we disprove is proposed; which, if any, is an easy, facile way of answering. We grant that the blood of Christ sanctifieth in respect of the application of the good things procured by it, but withal prove that it is so applied to all for whom it was an oblation; and that because it is said to sanctify and purge, and must answer the type, which did sanctify to the purifying of the flesh.

Secondly, It is expressly, in divers places affirmed of the blood-shedding and death of our Saviour, that it doth effect these things, and that it was intended for that purpose [This is true. Arminians object; they say, as do many nowadays, that salvation is just made available; you have to chose it before these things are granted to you, that is, the condition of receiving the gift of faith is that you believe or have faith, which as stated before, is a gross inconsistency, the cart before the house so to speak, as Owen pointed out earlier.] Many places for the clearing of this were before recounted. I shall now repeat so many of them as shall be sufficient to give strength to the argument in hand, omitting those which before were produced, only desiring that all those places which point out the end of the death of Christ may be considered as of force to establish the truth of this argument.

Rom. vi. 5, 6, "For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection: knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin." The words of the latter verse yield a reason of the former assertion in verse 5, — namely, that a participation in the death of Christ shall certainly be accompanied with conformity to him in his resurrection; that is, both to life spiritual, as also to eternal: “Because our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed.” That is, our sinful corruption and depravation of nature are, by his death and crucifying, effectually and meritoriously slain, and disabled from such a rule and dominion over us as that we should be servants any longer unto them; which is apparently the sense of the place, seeing it is laid as a foundation to press forward unto all decrees of sanctification and freedom from the power of sin.

The same apostle also tells us, 2 Cor. i. 20, that “all the promises of God are in him yea, and in him Amen, unto the glory of God by us.” “Yea, and Amen,” — confirmed, ratified, unchangeably established, and irrevocably made over to us. Now, this was done “in him,” — that is, in his death and blood-shedding, for the confirmation of the testament, whereof these promises are the conveyance of the legacies to us, — confirmed by the “death of him, the testator,” Heb. ix. 16: for he was “the surety of this better testament,” chap. vii. 22; which testament or “covenant he confirmed with many,” by his being “cut off” for them, Dan. ix. 26, 27. Now, what are the promises that are thus confirmed unto us, and established by the blood of Christ? The sum of them you have, Jer. xxxi. 33, 34; whence they are repeated by the apostle, Heb. viii. 10–12, to set out the nature of that covenant which was ratified in the blood of Jesus, in which you have a summary description of all that free grace towards us, both in sanctification, verses 10, 11, and in justification, verse 12. Amongst these promises, also, is that most famous one of circumcising our hearts, and of giving new hearts and spirits unto us: as Deut. xxx. 6; Ezek. xxxvi. 26. So that our whole sanctification, holiness, with justification and reconciliation unto God, is procured by, and established unto us with, unchangeable promises in the death and blood-shedding of Christ, “the heavenly or spiritual things” being purified with that sacrifice of his, Heb. ix. 23; “For we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins,” Col. i. 14; “By death he destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil,” that he might “deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage,” Heb. ii. 14, 15. [See? The death of Christ has inseparably attached to it the blessings or better things that will infallibly be applied to those for whom Christ died. But those who are under the covenant of works reject this because they have a strong tendency to trust in their own righteousness like the Pharisees did.]

Do but take notice of those two most clear places, Tit. ii. 14, Eph. v. 25, 26: in both which our cleansing and sanctification is assigned to be the end and intendment of Christ the worker; and therefore the certain effect of his death and oblation, which was the work, as was before proved. And I shall add but one place more to prove that which I am sorry that I need produce any one to do, — to wit, that the blood of Christ purgeth us from all our sin, and it is, 1 Cor. i. 30, “Who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption.” Of which, because it is clear enough, I need not spend time to prove that he was thus made unto us of God, inasmuch as he set him forth to be “a propitiation through faith in his blood;” as Rom. iii. 25. So that our sanctification, with all other effects of free grace, are the immediate procurement of the death of Christ. And of the things that have been spoken this is the sum:— Sanctification and holiness is the certain fruit and effect of the death of Christ in all them for whom he died; but all and every one are not partakers of this sanctification, this purging, cleansing, and working of holiness: therefore, Christ died not for all and every one, “quod erat demonstrandum.”

It is altogether in vain to except, as some do, that the death of Christ is not the sole cause of these things, for they are not actually wrought in any without the intervention of the Spirit's working in them, and faith apprehending the death of Christ: for, — First, Though many total causes of the same kind cannot concur to the producing of the same effect, yet several causes of several kinds may concur to one effect, and be the sole causes in that kind wherein they are causes. The Spirit of God is the cause of sanctification and holiness; but what kind of cause, I pray? Even such an one as is immediately and really efficient of the effect. Faith is the cause of pardon of sin; but what cause? in what kind? Why merely as an instrument, apprehending the righteousness of Christ. Now, do these causes, whereof one is efficient, the other instrumental, both natural and real, hinder that the blood of Christ may not only concur, but also be the sole cause, moral and meritorious, of these things? Doubtless, they do not. Nay, they do suppose it so to be, or else they would in this work be neither instruments nor efficient, that being the sole foundation of the Spirit's operation and efficiency, and the sole cause of faith's being and existence. A man is detained captive by his enemy, and one goes to him that detains him, and pays a ransom for his delivery; who thereupon grants a warrant to the keepers of the prison that they shall knock off his shackles, take away his rags, let him have new clothes, according to the agreement, saying, "Deliver him, for I have found a ransom." Because the jailer knocks off his shackles, and the warrant of the judge is brought for his discharge, shall he or we say that the price and ransom which was paid was not the cause, yes, the sole cause of his delivery? Considering that none of these latter had been, had not the ransom been paid, they are no less the effect of that ransom than his own delivery. In our delivery from the bondage of sin, it is true, there are other things, in other kinds, which do concur besides the death of Christ, as the operation of the Spirit and the grace of God; but these being in one kind, and that in another, these also being no less the fruit and effect of the death of Christ than our deliverance wrought by them, it is most apparent that that is the only main cause of the whole. Secondly, To take off utterly this exception, with all of the like kind, we affirm that faith itself is a proper immediate fruit and procurement of the death of Christ in all them for whom he died; which (because, if it be true, it utterly overthrows the general ransom, or universal redemption; and if it be not true, I will very willingly lay down this whole controversy, and be very indifferent which way it be determined, for go it which way it will, free-will must be established), I will prove apart by itself in the next argument.

Some Objections to Particular Redemption (or Limited Atonement) Answered

G Vos, Reformed Dogmatics,

pg 507

64. To what do the opponents of particular satisfaction appeal?

Mainly to three things:

- a) To the universal offer of the gospel, concerning which all agree.
- b) To a series of Scriptural passages that speak of bearing the sins of the entire world and of dying for all.
- c) To some passages that make mention of a death of those for whom Christ has already died.

65. How should the first of these (the universal offer of the gospel) be judged?

The objection is that the presentation of the gospel becomes a meaningless form for those who do not share in the satisfaction of Christ. If we look more closely, this general objection involves three specific objections that are usually not sharply distinguished from each other, yet are essentially different.

- a) It is irreconcilable with the truthfulness of God that He would offer the gospel and the merits of Christ in it to those for whom He Himself did not intend them. God would thereby give the impression that He wills to do something that in fact He does not will.
- b) On our position, ministers of the gospel, one thinks, lose the right to direct a general invitation to people.
- c) The hearers of the gospel could not have confidence to rely on the suretyship and the satisfaction of Christ as long as they have not received infallible assurance that they personally belong to the elect. My confidence in believing can only rest on the fact that Christ has suffered for me. If He has not suffered for all, then I will first need to know whether I belong among those for whom He has surely suffered before I can have solid ground under me.

66. What may be said to counter the first form of this objection?

- a) That the offer of the gospel is not and does not present itself to be a revelation of God's secret will or of the will of His decree. If this were so, a contradiction would in fact exist that would detract from God's love of truth. If the following had to be concluded: God has the firm intention to bring them personally to salvation and now it depends on A or B whether you will meet God's purpose or disappoint Him—if this was the content of the gospel—then particular election and satisfaction would indeed be excluded. This, however, is not the content of our gospel or of the gospel of Scripture. This gospel does not express itself concerning the secret will of God but speaks of His revealed will. We understand this revealed will to include the command of God that comes to man and in each particular instance is determined by the specific relationship of man to God. Now, there is no doubt that it is the obligation of man to accept the possibility of redemption that is offered to him in the gospel, hopefully and gratefully. God can make that demand, and the gospel comes with that demand to all men.

b) That the content of the gospel, as it is presented to all without distinction, is a declaration of the will of God that A and B, etc., may personally be saved, but that still in this regard should always be considered a conditional will. It is not only that we are not dealing with God's secret will; we are also dealing with His revealed will under a specific condition. In God there is no unsatisfied desire that has silence imposed on it by His secret will. The desire of God can be understood as follows: If you believed, then the good pleasure of God would rest upon this act of faith. This conditional character is thus always to be kept in view and kept in the foreground.

c) It is true that in the sense just described the gospel comes to many for whom Christ has not died. But at the same time it is true that these are precisely those who willfully despise the sacrifice of Christ. It may never be portrayed as if countless sinners who, eager for salvation, are seeking a ransom [and] now have to be dismissed with the explanation, "This ransom was not meant for you." In doing that, one would be entertaining purely abstract possibilities that under the present circumstances could never become reality. The truth is that not a single instance of this kind can occur. God's ordaining is such that all those for whom Christ in His purposing has not died are precisely the same as those who reject Christ by their unbelief. Even if satisfaction were universal, this can make no difference regarding their personal attitude toward it. In reality, they would no more share in it then than now.

d) As noted above, the gospel is intended to deprive man of every excuse and to place the magnitude of his corruption in the clearest light. That is why God does not let the gospel be proclaimed only to the elect but also brings it indiscriminately to all men (as far as it in fact reaches them and, in principle, as far as we can bring it to them). Now a sifting takes place. But now, too, sin in its inner essence comes to full flowering because it becomes unbelief in the face of grace. It belongs to God's righteousness toward sin that it will also reveal its true character to sinners themselves. The preaching of the gospel contributes to this. This came out most clearly at the time of the appearance of the Mediator on earth in the flesh. Unbelief reacted against Him, the incarnation of grace, in the most decisive way. Naturally, aggravation of guilt is inseparable from this reaction of sin and its related development. However, no one can dispute God's right to bring man into contact with the gospel, even if by that his judgment becomes more severe. Whoever disputes this right takes an Arminian standpoint and tacitly assumes that God owed satisfaction to man. It is the obligation of man to accept in faith everything that God presents to him. And once this obligation is present, God cannot act unjustly when He punishes the failure to meet this obligation, regardless of whether man is able to fulfill his duty.

e) Preaching has as its goal to call everyone it reaches: “If you will, take freely from the water of life” [Rev 22:17]; and “If you come, He will by no means cast you out” [John 6:37]. But it has neither the calling nor the right to make of this “willing” something other than Scripture means by it. It is not to be presented in a Methodistic manner as a sudden, uncaused act of will, a kind of experiment that can be independent of all antecedent conditions. The willing to which Scripture alludes is the willing of faith, of saving faith, the deepest act a person can do, in which his entire being shares and concurs—an act that becomes entirely impossible and incomprehensible without a prior attitude of repentance, to which it is linked and from which it in part results. Thus to will, along with putting aside all confidence in one’s self, is to have such a delight in the work of Christ and such an inner conviction of its sufficiency that we reach out for it with all the strength that is in us.

Now, the freest preaching of the gospel must make clear that such a willing is the only means by which we can become partakers of Christ. If one will not be untruthful, then the significance of faith may never disappear. And the preventive against this difficulty is a preaching of the law accompanying the preaching of the gospel. Whoever does not first bring the sinner to an awareness of his lost condition will also not elicit true faith in his heart by preaching. It is simply not true that everyone has a right to Christ who just chooses to believe at whim. The faith to which the recent methods of evangelism incite is something irrational. The faith of Scripture is a faith supernaturally wrought by the Spirit of God but still not an unnatural faith.

Love, the Two Kinds, Common and Special

code180

John Owen on the two major types of love, common and special (saving). This is very important.

From

The Death of Death in the Death of Christ

Book 4 Chap 2 p 21 p207 Love

1. The first place we pitch upon is that which by our adversaries is first propounded, and not a little rested upon; and yet, notwithstanding their clamorous claim, there are not a few who think that very text as fit and ready to overthrow their whole opinion as Goliath's sword to cut off his own head, many unanswerable arguments against the universality of redemption being easily deduced from the words of that text. The great peaceable King of his church guide us to make good the interest of truth to the place in controversy which through him we shall attempt; — first, by opening the words; and, secondly, by balancing of reasonings and arguments from them. And this place is John iii. 16, “God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life.”

This place, I say, the Universalists exceedingly boast in; for which we are persuaded they have so little cause, that we doubt not but, with the Lord's assistance, to demonstrate that it is destructive to their whole defence: to which end I will give you, in brief, a double paraphrase of the words, the first containing their sense, the latter ours. Thus, then, our adversaries explain these words:— “ ‘God so loved,’ had such a natural inclination, velleity, and propensity to the good of ‘the world,’ Adam, with all and every one of his posterity, of all ages, times, and conditions (whereof some were in heaven, some in hell long before), ‘that he gave his only-begotten Son,’ causing him to be incarnate in the fulness of time, to die, not with a purpose and resolution to save any, but ‘that whosoever,’ what persons soever of those which he had propensity unto, ‘believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life,’ should have this fruit and issue, that he should escape death and hell, and live eternally.” In which explication of the sense of the place these things are to be observed:—

First, What is that love which was the cause of the sending or giving of Christ; which they make to be a natural propensity to the good of all. Secondly, Who are the objects of this love; all and every man of all generations. Thirdly, Wherein this giving consisteth; of which I cannot find whether they mean by it the appointment of Christ to be a recoverer, or his actual exhibition in the flesh for the accomplishment of his ministration. Fourthly, Whosoever, they make distributive of the persons in the world, and so not restrictive in the intention to some. Fifthly, That life eternal is the fruit obtained by believers, but not the end intended by God.

Now, look a little, in the second place, at what we conceive to be the mind of God in those words; whose aim we take to be the advancement and setting forth of the free love of God to lost sinners,

[free, meaning according to his good pleasure and not because one asks for it, in which case it would not be free, i.e., not grace but work. See Rms11:6] in sending Christ to procure for them eternal redemption, as may appear in this following paraphrase:—

“ ‘God’ the Father ‘so loved,’ had such a peculiar, transcendent love, being an unchangeable purpose and act of his will concerning their salvation, towards ‘the world,’ miserable, sinful, lost men of all sorts, not only Jews but Gentiles also, which he peculiarly loved, ‘that,’ intending their salvation, as in the last words, for the praise of his glorious grace, ‘he gave,’ he prepared a way to prevent their everlasting destruction, by appointing and sending ‘his only-begotten Son’ to be an all-sufficient Saviour to all that look up unto him, ‘that whosoever believeth in him,’ all believers whatsoever, and only they, ‘should not perish, but have everlasting life,’ and so effectually be brought to the obtaining of those glorious things through him which the Lord in his free love had designed for them.”

In which enlargement of the words, for the setting forth of what we conceive to be the mind of the Holy Ghost in them, these things are to be observed:—

First, What we understand by the “love” of God, even that act of his will which was the cause of sending his Son Jesus Christ, being the most eminent act of love and favour to the creature; for love is velle alicui bonum, “to will good to any.” And never did God will greater good to the creature than in appointing his Son for their redemption. Notwithstanding, I would have it observed that I do not make the purpose of sending or giving Christ to be absolutely subordinate to God’s love to his elect, as though that were the end of the other absolutely, but rather that they are both co-ordinate to the same supreme end, or the manifestation of God’s glory by the way of mercy tempered with justice; but in respect of our apprehension, that is the relation wherein they stand one to another. Now, this love we say to be that, greater than which there is none.

Secondly, By the “world,” we understand the elect of God only, though not considered in this place as such, but under such a notion as, being true of them, serves for the farther exaltation of God’s love towards them, which is the end here designed; and this is, as they are poor, miserable, lost creatures in the world, of the world, scattered abroad in all places of the world, not tied to Jews or Greeks, but dispersed in any nation, kindred, and language under heaven.

Thirdly, “ἵνα πᾶς ὁ πιστεύων,” is to us, “that every believer,” and is declarative of the intention of God in sending or giving his Son, containing no distribution of the world beloved, but a direction to the persons whose good was intended, that love being an unchangeable intention of the chiefest good.

Fourthly, “Should not perish, but have life everlasting,” contains an expression of the particular aim and intention of God in this business; which is, the certain salvation of believers by Christ. And this, in general, is the interpretation of the words which we adhere unto, which will yield us sundry arguments, sufficient each of them to evert the general ransom; which, that they may be the better bottomed, and the more clearly convincing, we will lay down and compare the several words and expressions of this place, about whose interpretation we differ, with the reason of our rejecting the one sense and embracing the other:—

The first difference in the interpretation of this place is about the cause of sending Christ; called here love. The second, about the object of this love; called here the world. Thirdly, Concerning the intention of God in sending his Son; said to be that believers might be saved.

For the First, By “love” in this place, all our adversaries agree that a natural affection and propensity in God to the good of the creature, lost under sin, in general, which moved him to take some way whereby it might possibly be remedied, is intended. We, on the contrary, say that by love here is not meant an inclination or propensity of his nature, but an act of his will [code455b] (where we conceive his love to be seated), and eternal purpose to do good to man, being the most transcendent and eminent act of God’s love to the creature.

That both these may be weighed, to see which is most agreeable to the mind of the Holy Ghost, I shall give you, first, some of the reasons whereby we oppose the former interpretation; and, secondly, those whereby we confirm our own.

First, if no natural affection, whereby he should necessarily be carried to any thing without himself, can or ought to be ascribed unto God, then no such thing is here intended in the word love; for that cannot be here intended which is not in God at all. But now, that there neither is nor can be any such natural affection in God is most apparent, and may be evidenced by many demonstrations. I shall briefly recount a few of them:—

First, Nothing that includes any imperfection is to be assigned to Almighty God: he is God all-sufficient; he is our rock, and his work is perfect. But a natural affection in God to the good and salvation of all, being never completed nor perfected, carrieth along with it a great deal of imperfection and weakness; and not only so, but it must also needs be exceedingly prejudicial to the absolute blessedness and happiness of Almighty God. Look, how much anything wants [lacks, comes short of] of the fulfilling of that whereunto it is carried out with any desire, natural or voluntary, so much it wanteth of blessedness and happiness. So that, without impairing of the infinite blessedness of the ever-blessed God, no natural affection unto anything never to be accomplished can be ascribed unto him, such as this general love to all is supposed to be.

Secondly, If the Lord hath such a natural affection to all, as to love them so far as to send his Son to die for them, whence is it that this affection of his doth not receive accomplishment? whence is it that it is hindered, and doth not produce its effects? why doth not the Lord engage his power for the fulfilling of his desire? “It doth not seem good to his infinite wisdom,” say they, “so to do.” Then is there an affection in God to that which, in his wisdom, he cannot prosecute. This among the sons of men, the worms of the earth, would be called a brutish affection.

Thirdly, No affection or natural propensity to good is to be ascribed to God which the Scripture nowhere assigns to him, and is contrary to what the Scripture doth assign unto him. Now, the Scripture doth nowhere assign unto God any natural affection whereby he should be naturally inclined to the good of the creature; the place to prove it clearly is yet to be produced. And that it is contrary to what the Scripture assigns him is apparent; for it describes him to be free in showing mercy, every act of it being by him performed freely, even as he pleaseth, for “he hath mercy on whom he will have mercy.”

Now, if every act of mercy showed unto any do proceed from the free distinguishing will of God (as is apparent), certainly there can be in him no such natural affection. See [code439, Common Love vs. Divine Love for more in depth comment in Owen's alluding to God's impassibility.] And the truth is, if the Lord should not show mercy, and be carried out towards the creature, merely upon his own distinguishing will, but should naturally be moved to show mercy to the miserable, he should, first, be no more merciful to men than to devils, nor, secondly, to those that are saved than to those that are damned: for that which is natural must be equal in all its operations; and that which is natural to God must be eternal. Many more effectual reasons are produced by our divines for the denial of this natural affection in God, in the resolution of the Arminian distinction (I call it so, as now by them abused) of God's antecedent and consequent will, to whom the learned reader may repair for satisfaction. So that the love mentioned in this place is not that natural affection to all in general, which is not. But, —

Secondly, It is the special love of God to his elect, as we affirm, and so, consequently, not any such thing as our adversaries suppose to be intended by it, — namely, a velleity or natural inclination to the good of all. For, —

First, The love here intimated is absolutely the most eminent and transcendent love that ever God showed or bare towards any miserable creature; yea, the intention of our Saviour is so to set it forth, as is apparent by the emphatical expression of it used in this place. The particles "so," "that," declare no less, pointing out an eximiousness peculiarly remarkable in the thing whereof the affirmation is [made], above any other thing in the same kind. Expositors usually lay weight upon almost every particular word of the verse, for the exaltation and demonstration of the love here mentioned. "So," that is, in such a degree, to such a remarkable, astonishable height: "God," the glorious, all-sufficient God, that could have manifested his justice to eternity in the condemnation of all sinners, and no way wanted them to be partakers of his blessedness: "loved," with such an earnest, intense affection, consisting in an eternal, unchangeable act and purpose of his will, for the bestowing of the chiefest good (the choicest effectual love): "the world," men in the world, of the world, subject to the iniquities and miseries of the world, lying in their blood, having nothing to render them commendable in his eyes, or before him: "that he gave," did not, as he made all the world at first, speak the word and it was done, but proceeded higher, to the performance of a great deal more and longer work, wherein he was to do more than exercise an act of his almighty power, as before; and therefore gave "his Son;" not any favourite or other well-pleasing creature; not sun, moon, or stars; not the rich treasure of his creation (all too mean, and coming short of expressing this love); but his Son: "begotten Son," and that not so called by reason of some near approaches to him, and filial, obediencial reverence of him, as the angels are called the sons of God; for it was not an angel that he gave, which yet had been an expression of most intense love; nor yet any son by adoption, as believers are the sons of God; but his begotten Son, begotten of his own person from eternity; and that "his only-begotten Son;" not any one of his sons, but whereas he had or hath but one only-begotten Son, always in his bosom, his Isaac, he gave him:— than which how could the infinite wisdom of God make or give any higher testimony of his love? especially if ye will add what is here evidently included, though the time was not as yet come that it should be openly expressed, namely, whereunto he gave his Son, his only one; not to be a king, and worshipped in the first place, — but he "spared him not, but delivered him up" to death "for us all," Rom. viii. 32. Whereunto, for a close of all, cast your eyes upon his design and purpose in this whole business, and ye shall find that it was that believers, those whom he thus loved, “might not perish,” — that is, undergo the utmost misery and wrath to eternity, which they had deserved, — “but have everlasting life,” eternal glory with himself, which of themselves they could no way attain; and ye will easily grant that “greater love hath no man than this.” Now, if the love here mentioned be the greatest, highest, and chiefest of all, certainly it cannot be that common affection towards all that we discussed before: for the love whereby men are actually and eternally saved is greater than that which may consist with the perishing of men to eternity.

Secondly, The Scripture positively asserts this very love as the chiefest act of the love of God, and that which he would have us take notice of in the first place: Rom. v. 8, “God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us;” and fully, 1 John iv. 9, 10, “In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only-begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins.” In both which places the eminency of this love is set forth exceeding emphatically to believers, with such expressions as can no way be accommodated to a natural velleity to the good of all.

Thirdly, That seeing all love in God is but velle alicui bonum, to will good to them that are beloved, they certainly are the object of his love to whom he intends that good which is the issue and effect of that love; but now the issue of this love or good intended, being not perishing, and obtaining eternal life through Christ, happens alone to, and is bestowed on, only elect believers: therefore, they certainly are the object of this love, and they alone; — which was the thing we had to declare.

Fourthly, That love which is the cause of giving Christ is also always the cause of the bestowing of all other good things: Rom. viii. 32, “He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?” Therefore, if the love there mentioned be the cause of sending Christ, as it is, it must also cause all other things to be given with him, and so can be towards none but those who have those things bestowed on them; which are only the elect, only believers. Who else have grace here, or glory hereafter?

Fifthly, The word here, which is ἠγάπησε, signifieth, in its native importance, valde dilexit, — to love so as to rest in that love; which how it can stand with hatred, and an eternal purpose of not bestowing effectual grace, which is in the Lord towards some, will not easily be made apparent. And now let the Christian reader judge, whether by the love of God, in this place mentioned, be to be understood a natural velleity or inclination in God to the good of all, both elect and reprobate, or the peculiar love of God to his elect, being the fountain of the chiefest good that ever was bestowed on the sons of men. This is the first difference about the interpretation of these words.

go to Book IV Ch VI Owen more on love

Book 4 Ch 6 p283 (395 online)

Proof 13. “The blessing of life hath streamed in this doctrine of the love of God to mankind; yea, in the tender and spiritual discovery of the grace of God to mankind (in the ransom given and atonement made by Christ for all men, with the fruits thereof) hath God, in the first place, overcome his chosen ones to believe and turn to God, Acts xiii. 48; Tit. ii. 11, 13, iii. 4, 5.”

Ans. First, That the freedom of God's grace, and the transcendency of his eternal love towards men, with the sending of his Son to die for them, to recover them to himself from sin and Satan, is a most effectual motive, and (when set on by the Spirit of grace) a most certain operative principle of the conversion of God's elect, we most willingly acknowledge. It is that wherein our hearts rejoice, whereby they were endeared, and for which we desire to return thankful obedience every moment. But that ever this was effectual, extending this love to all, or at least that any effectualness is in that aggravation of it, we utterly deny; and that, — 1. Because it is false, and a corrupting of the word of God, as hath been showed; and of a lie there can be no good consequence. 2. It quite enervates and plucks out the efficacy of this heavenly motive, by turning the most intense and incomparable love of God towards his elect into a common desire, wishing, and affection of his nature (which, indeed, is opposite to his nature), failing of its end and purpose; which might consist with the eternal destruction of all mankind, as I shall abundantly demonstrate, if Providence call me to the other part of this controversy, concerning the cause of sending Jesus Christ.

Secondly, There is nothing of this common love to all in the places urged; for, — 1. The “grace” mentioned, Tit. ii. 11, 13, is the grace that certainly brings salvation, which that common love doth not, and was the cause of sending Christ, “that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works;” where our redemption and sanctification are asserted to be the immediate end of the oblation of Jesus Christ; which how destructive it is to universal redemption hath been formerly declared. 2. So also is that “love and kindness” mentioned, chap. iii. 4, 5, such as by which we receive the “washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost,” verse 5; and justification, and adoption to heirship of eternal life, verse 7; — which, whether it be a common or a peculiar love, let all men judge. 3. Acts xiii. 47 (for verse 48, there cited, contains as clear a restriction of this love of God to his elect, as can be desired) sets out the extent of the mercy of God in Christ, through the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles also, and not only to the Jews, as was foretold by Isaiah, chap. xlix. 6; which is far enough from giving any colour to the universality of grace, it being nothing but the same affirmation which ye have John xi. 52, of “gathering together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad.”

Evangelism: Is it ok to tell someone that Jesus loves him? Impetration and Intercession of Christ

I have some thoughts on that approach in evangelism; first, I can't see anywhere in the bible where any of the apostles or Jesus used that approach, saying to someone that Jesus loved them. Certainly Jesus would have said this to Nicodemus or the Jews, or the woman at the well, or the children that were coming to him or the lady begging bread at the table or anyone else. Are you thinking that Jesus loves all and everyone salvifically, the love described in John 3:16? If so then certainly all shall be saved since God does all his pleasure (Isa46:10). But that can't be since most go to hell and few are saved. So if Christ loves everyone, then he died for everyone; and if he died for everyone, then he purchased all those things that are yea and amen for those who are in Christ. As the surety of the covenant and our mediator, He purchased with his blood all those things that are for ones' eternal blessedness such as faith, sanctification, justification and eternal life, right? And certainly these are given to those for whom he died which are those whom he loves and prays for! - the two are inseparable. But there's the same problem; most go to hell. Now your response may be that the reason why they go there is due to their unbelief. But did not Christ die for all our sins including unbelief? And was not the ability to believe part of the promise for which Christ died to obtain which is given to those for whom he died, i.e., the gift of faith? (See Acts 2:8 and Phil 1:29, "For to you it has been granted on behalf of Christ, not only to believe in Him, but also to suffer for His sake,") which we do not ask for otherwise it is no gift but a wage and if it is a wage then it is no longer grace! Rm11:6 As Martin Luther said, "No one can give himself faith; it is a gift of God." Did Paul not say in Romans 9:32 say, "He who did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things? i.e., faith, grace, and eternal life hereafter! And then you have John saying in Rev. 1:5-6, "*To Him who loved us and washed^[a] us from our sins in His own blood, ⁶ and has made us kings and priests to His God and Father, to Him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen." These two things, impetration, the procuring of those things, and his intercession are inseparable - those he loved in eternity are those he died for and are those who will infallibly receive all those good things. Christ's intercession is inseparable from his oblation, which are the duties of a high priest. Christ, as our high priest, prays for those for whom he died just as the high priest under the law prayed for the people; and his prayers are always heard by God, i.e., are successful so that He is able to save to the uttermost. (Rm 8:34, Heb7:25)*

Certainly those in hell were not given all things else they wouldn't be there. And if they didn't get those things, then by definition, God did not favor them or love them, i.e., he did not die for them. And now the passage where Jesus says to many, depart from me you workers of iniquity, for I never knew you makes this more evident. Certainly if he loves all and everyone he would "know" them; that is, he would show them favor, i.e., love them enough to die for them and save them. To argue otherwise is to assign imperfection to the Godhead among other things.

So this is what I would say to someone if the opportunity arose: Repent from your sin and believe in Christ for salvation; say to them as Jesus told Nicodemus, You must be born again. People need to know that they are exposed to eternal torments. Paul said "Knowing, therefore, the terror of the Lord, we persuade men;" 2Cor5:1. Then let the Holy Spirit convert or not according to His good pleasure, for his love, his transcendent love to the Church, the highest form of love, is this: an act of his will: I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy. Rm9:15 This love in John 3:16 is not an affection in God that desires or wishes the good of all, else he would be obliged to save all, and it would be contrary to his nature for him not to save all. John Owen distinguishes between a common love or desire to do good to all vs. a saving or special love which is an act of his distinguishing will:

... No affection or natural propensity to good is to be ascribed to God which the Scripture nowhere assigns to him, and is contrary to what the Scripture doth assign unto him. Now, the Scripture doth nowhere assign unto God any natural affection whereby he should be naturally inclined to the good of the creature; the place to prove it clearly is yet to be produced. And that it is contrary to what the Scripture assigns him is apparent; for it describes him to be free in showing mercy, every act of it being by him performed freely, even as he pleaseth, for "he hath mercy on whom he will have mercy." Now, if every act of mercy showed unto any do proceed from the free distinguishing will of God (as is apparent), certainly there can be in him no such natural affection. And the truth is, if the Lord should not show mercy, and be carried out towards the creature, merely upon his own distinguishing will, but should naturally be moved to show mercy to the miserable, he should, first, be no more merciful to men than to devils, nor, secondly, to those that are saved than to those that are damned: for that which is natural must be equal in all its operations; and that which is natural to God must be eternal. Many more effectual reasons are produced by our divines for the denial of this natural affection in God, in the resolution of the Arminian distinction (I call it so, as now by them abused) of God's antecedent and consequent will, to whom the learned reader may repair for satisfaction. So that the love mentioned in this place is not that natural affection to all in general, which is not. But, —

Secondly, It is the special love of God to his elect, as we affirm, and so, consequently, not any such thing as our adversaries suppose to be intended by it, — namely, a velleity or natural inclination to the good of all. For, — John Owen

There are many logical/reasonable consequents to this doctrine that do not flow from the doctrine of the general ransom (that God loves all equally and died for all and wants to save all) that time doesn't permit to go into now.

The death of Christ procured faith, grace and holiness for those for whom he died. "He has chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world that we would be holy and without blame before Him in love." Eph1:4 We are purified by faith: Acts 15:8-9 - "So God, who knows the heart, acknowledged them by giving them the Holy Spirit, just as He did to us, ⁹ and made no distinction between us and them, purifying their hearts by faith." We are given faith as a gift. Eph 2:8 All this is in one big package not to be separated. Therefore, if God's will is that the elect would be made holy and faith is that instrument that enables one to be so (purifying their hearts by faith), then Christ by his death procured faith to be bestowed on his elect ones. This is the essence of the main difference between the old and new covenants, what makes the new better than the old. The condition to eternal life under the old covenant was obedience; do this and live. But the law could not effect it due to sinful flesh. In the new, the condition is promised - Christ, our surety, did what we could not do under the old, and provides this condition by bestowing it (faith, grace and holiness; faith, grace and truth in another place Owen notes) on his elect enabling them to obey, believe and please God.

The following commentary by John Owen will expound on this truth and then I will give some concluding remarks at the end.

Book 1 Ch VI p67 John Owen Death of Death in the Death of Christ

Chapter VI.

The means used by the fore-recounted agents in this work.

Our next employment, following the order of execution, not intention, will be the discovery or laying down of the means in this work; which are, indeed, no other but the several actions before recounted, but now to be considered under another respect, — as they are a means ordained for the obtaining of a proposed end; of which afterward. Now, because the several actions of Father and Spirit were all exercised towards Christ, and terminated in him, as God and man, he only and his performances are to be considered as the means in this work, the several concurrences of both the other persons before mentioned being presupposed as necessarily antecedent or concomitant.

The means, then, used or ordained by these agents for the end proposed is that whole economy or dispensation carried along to the end, from whence our Saviour Jesus Christ is called a Mediator; which may be, and are usually, as I mentioned before, distinguished into two parts: — First, his oblation; secondly, his intercession.

By his oblation we do not design only the particular offering of himself upon the cross an offering to his Father, as the Lamb of God without spot or blemish, when he bare our sins or carried them up with him in his own body on the tree, which was the sum and complement of his oblation and that wherein it did chiefly consist; but also his whole humiliation, or state of emptying himself, whether by yielding voluntary obedience unto the law, as being made under it, that he might be the end thereof to them that believe, Rom. x. 4, or by his subjection to the curse of the law, in the antecedent misery and suffering of life, as well as by submitting to death, the death of the cross: for no action of his as mediator is to be excluded from a concurrence to make up the whole means in this work. Neither by his intercession do I understand only that heavenly appearance of his in the most holy place for the applying unto us all good things purchased and procured by his oblation; but also every act of his exaltation conducing thereunto, from his resurrection to his “sitting down at the right hand of the Majesty on high, angels, and principalities, and powers, being made subject unto him.” Of all which his resurrection, being the basis, as it were, and the foundation of the rest (“for if he is not risen, then is our faith in vain,” 1 Cor. xv. 13, 14; and then are we “yet in our sins,” verse 17; “of all men most miserable,” verse 19), is especially to be considered, as that to which a great part of the effect is often ascribed; for “he was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification,” Rom. iv. 25; — where, and in such other places, by his resurrection the whole following dispensation and the perpetual intercession of Christ for us in heaven is intended; for “God raised up his son Jesus to bless us, in turning every one of us from our iniquities,” Acts iii. 26.

Now, this whole dispensation, with especial regard to the death and blood-shedding of Christ, is the means we speak of, agreeably to what was said before of such in general; for it is not a thing in itself desirable for its own sake. The death of Christ had nothing in it (we speak of his sufferings distinguished from his obedience) that was good, but only as it conduced to a farther end, even the end proposed for the manifestation of God’s glorious grace. What good was it, that Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and people of Israel, should, with such horrid villainy and cruelty, gather themselves together against God’s holy child, whom he had anointed? Acts iv. 27: or what good was it, that the Son of God should be made sin and a curse, to be bruised, afflicted, and to undergo such wrath as the whole frame of nature, as it were, trembled to behold? What good, what beauty and form is in all this, that it should be desired in itself and for itself? Doubtless none at all. It must, then, be looked upon as a means conducing to such an end; the glory and lustre thereof must quite take away all the darkness and confusion that was about the thing itself. And even so it was intended by the blessed agents in it, by “whose determinate counsel and foreknowledge he was delivered and slain,” Acts ii. 23; there being done unto him “whatsoever his hand and counsel had determined,” chap. iv. 28: which what it was must be afterward declared. Now, concerning the whole some things are to be observed:—

That though the oblation and intercession of Jesus Christ are distinct acts in themselves and have distinct immediate products and issues assigned oftentimes unto them (which I should now have laid down, but that I must take up this in another place), yet they are not in any respect or regard to be divided or separated, as that the one should have any respect to any persons or anything which the other also doth not in its kind equally respect. But there is this manifold union between them:—

First, In that they are both alike intended for the obtaining and accomplishing the same entire and complete end proposed, — to wit, the effectual bringing of many sons to glory, for the praise of God’s grace; of which afterward.

Secondly, That what persons soever the one respecteth, in the good things it obtaineth, the same, all, and none else, doth the other respect, in applying the good things so obtained; for “he was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification,” Rom. iv. 25. That is, in brief, the object of the one is of no larger extent than the object of the other; or, for whom Christ offered himself, for all those, and only those, doth he intercede, according to his own word, “For their sake I sanctify myself” (to be an oblation), “that they also might be sanctified through the truth,” John xvii. 19.

Thirdly, That the oblation of Christ is, as it were, the foundation of his intercession, inasmuch as by the oblation was procured everything that, by virtue of his intercession, is bestowed; and that because the sole end why Christ procured anything by his death was that it might be applied to them for whom it was so procured. The sum is, that the oblation and intercession of Jesus Christ are one entire means for the producing of the same effect, the very end of the oblation being that all those things which are bestowed by the intercession of Christ, and without whose application it should certainly fail of the end proposed in it, be effected accordingly; so that it cannot be affirmed that the death or offering of Christ concerned any one person or thing more, in respect of procuring any good, than his intercession doth for the collating of it: for, interceding there for all good purchased, and prevailing in all his intercessions (for the Father always hears his Son), it is evident that every one for whom Christ died must actually have applied unto him all the good things purchased by his death; which, because it is evidently destructive to the adverse cause, we must a little stay to confirm it, only telling you the main proof of it lies in our following proposal of assigning the proper end intended and effected by the death of Christ, so that the chief proof must be deferred until then. I shall now only propose those reasons which may be handled apart, not merely depending upon that.

The Love Gospel

Arguments against witnessing to people that Jesus loves them, etc. Love to God from natural principles and self-love vs. from a true sight of His glory.

Excerpts from On Religious Affections by Jonathan Edwards p275 Vol. 1

<http://www.ccel.org/ccel/edwards/works1.vii.iv.iii.html>

That kind of affection to God or Jesus Christ, which thus properly arises from self-love, cannot be a truly gracious and spiritual love; as appears from what has been said already. For self-love is a principle entirely natural, and as much in the hearts of devils as angels; and therefore surely nothing that is the mere result of it, can be supernatural and divine, in the manner before described.*

[*footnote: "There is a natural love to Christ, as to one that doth thee good, and for thine own ends; and spiritual, for himself, whereby the Lord only is exalted." Shepard's Par. of the Ten Virgins, P. I. p. 25] (pg. 49 in the book, Ch6 Sect. 5)

Christ plainly speaks of this kind of love, as what is nothing beyond the love of wicked men, Luke vi. 32. "If ye love them that love you, what thank have ye? for sinners also love those that love them." And the devil himself knew that a mercenary respect to God, only for benefits received or depended on, (which is all one,) is worthless in the sight of God; Job i. 9, 10. "Doth Job serve God for nought? hast not thou made an hedge about him, and about his house," etc. [hence the insidious nature of the Prosperity Gospel] God would never have implicitly allowed the objection to have been good, in case the accusation had been true, by allowing that matter to be tried, and Job to be so dealt with, that it might appear in the event, whether Job's respect to God was thus mercenary or no. Whereas the proof of the goodness of his respect was put upon that issue. [Telling people that God loves them as a witnessing method will foster this kind of returned love that is common to all and thus may easily be mistaken for a divine love for God when it is nothing more than what is common to all yet consistent with going to hell and hence is a fatal security most popular in today's evangelism, serving much in the way of quieting conscience and stifling any serious self-examination.]

It is unreasonable to think otherwise, than that the first foundation of a true love to God, is that whereby he is in himself lovely, or worthy to be loved, or the supreme loveliness of his nature. This is certainly what makes him chiefly amiable. What chiefly makes a man or any creature lovely, is his excellency; and so what chiefly renders God lovely, and must undoubtedly be the chief ground of true love, is his excellency.

footnote: Thomas Shepard: "For faith springs out of the destruction of our own excellency, and ruins of it; like Christ, that did arise a root out of dry ground; for the Lord's great plot is to advance Christ and his rich grace. Now, look, as it is obscured by bringing anything of our own to it, so it is advanced by fetching all from it; this can never be till the soul is sensible of his nakedness, emptiness, and wants; let Christ be never so sweet, a full soul will loathe him till he dies of hunger; for such is the senselessness of men, and dislike of Christ, that extremities only drive them hither, as Judges 5:6." p318-19 Parable of the Ten Virgins

God's nature, or the divinity, is infinitely excellent; yea it is infinite beauty, brightness, and glory itself. But how can that be true Love of this excellent and lovely nature, which is not built on the foundation of its true loveliness! How can that be true love of beauty and brightness, which is not for beauty and brightness' sake? how can that be a true prizing of that which is in itself infinitely worthy and precious, which is not for the sake of its worthiness and preciousness? This infinite excellency of the divine nature, as it is in itself, is the true ground of all that is good in God in any respect; but how can a man truly love God, without loving him for that excellency, which is the foundation of all that is good or desirable in him? They whose affection to God is founded first on his profitableness to them, begin at the wrong end; they regard God only for the utmost limit of the stream of divine good, where it touches them, and reaches their interest. They have no respect to that infinite glory of God's nature, which is the original good, and the true fountain of all good, and of loveliness of every kind.*

A natural principle of self-love may be the foundation of great affections towards God and Christ, without seeing anything of the beauty and glory of the divine nature. There is a certain gratitude that is a mere natural thing. Gratitude is one of the natural affections, as well as anger; and there is a gratitude that arises from self-love, very much in the same manner that anger does. Anger in men is an affection excited against, or in opposition to, another, for something in him that crosses self-love: gratitude is an affection one has towards another, for loving or gratifying him, or for something in him that suits self-love. And there may be a kind of gratitude, without any true or proper love; as there may be anger without hatred; as in parents towards their children, with whom they may be angry, and yet at the same time have a strong habitual love to them. Of this gratitude Christ declares, (Luke vi.) Sinners love those that love them; even the publicans, who were some of the most carnal and profligate sort of men, (Matt. v. 46.) This is the principle wrought upon by bribery, in unjust judges; and which even the brute beasts exercise; a dog will love his master that is kind to him. And we see in innumerable instances, that mere nature is sufficient to excite gratitude in men, or to affect their hearts with thankfulness to others for kindnesses received; and sometimes towards them against whom at the same time they have an habitual enmity. Thus Saul was once and again greatly affected, and even dissolved with gratitude towards David, for sparing his life; and yet remained an habitual enemy to him. And as men, from mere nature, may be thus affected towards men; so they may towards God. Nothing hinders, but that the same self-love may work after the same manner towards God, as towards men. And we have manifest instances of it in Scripture; as indeed the children of Israel, who sang God's praises at the Red sea, but soon forgot his works. Naaman the Syrian was greatly affected with the miraculous cure of his leprosy. His heart was engaged thenceforward to worship the God who had healed him, excepting when it would expose him to be ruined in his temporal interest. So was Nebuchadnezzar greatly affected with God's goodness to him, in restoring him to his reason and kingdom, after his dwelling with the beasts.

Gratitude being thus a natural principle, ingratitude is so much the more vile and heinous; because it shows a dreadful prevalence of wickedness, when it even overbears and suppresses the better principles of human nature. It is mentioned as an evidence of the high degree of wickedness in many of the heathen, that they were without natural affection, Rom. ii. 31. But that the want of gratitude, or natural affection, are evidences of a high degree of vice, is no argument that all gratitude and natural affection has the nature of virtue, or saving grace.

Self-love, through the exercise of a mere natural gratitude, may be the foundation of a sort of love to God many ways. A kind of love may arise from a false notion of God, that men have some way imbibed; as though he were only goodness and mercy, and no revenging justice; or as though the exercises of his goodness were necessary, and not free and sovereign; or as though his goodness were dependent on what is in them, and as it were constrained by them. Men on such grounds as these, may love a God of their own forming in their imaginations, when they are far from loving such a God as reigns in heaven. [The term necessary: in other words God, by necessity, must show kindness and favor to all, hence God is not free to chose to whom he will have mercy. God is the potter and he does as he pleases; he is not bound to show mercy all the time, i.e., by necessity, which would make him not free to do as he pleases, to show favor on some and not on others, e.g., as he does in election.]

Did Christ Die For All And Every One?

John Owen, from his work, The Death of Death of the Death of Christ, speaks to the doctrine of limited atonement or particularity in redemption, that is, did Christ die for all? Did He purchase all things for those for whom he died? Are the benefits of his death common to all? Does everyone have the ability to believe on his own? I highly recommend reading the whole book.

Book III, Ch IV

Arg. IX. Before I come to press the argument intended, I must premise some few things; as, —

1. Whatever is freely bestowed upon us, in and through Christ, that is all wholly the procurement and merit of the death of Christ. Nothing is bestowed through him on those that are his which he hath not purchased; the price whereby he made his purchase being his own blood, 1 Pet. i. 18, 19; for the covenant between his Father and him, of making out all spiritual blessings to them that were given unto him, was expressly founded on this condition, “That he should make his soul an offering for sin,” Isa. liii. 10.

2. That confessedly, on all sides, faith is, in men of understanding, of such absolute indispensable necessity unto salvation, — there being no sacrifice to be admitted for the want of it under the new covenant, — that, whatever God hath done in his love, sending his Son, and whatever Christ hath done or doth, in his oblation and intercession [which are inseparable] for all or some, without this in us, is, in regard of the event, of no value, worth, or profit unto us, but serveth only to increase and aggravate condemnation; for, whatsoever is accomplished besides, that is most certainly true, “He that believeth not shall be damned,” Mark xvi. 16. (So that if there is in ourselves a power of believing, and the act of it do proceed from that power, and is our own also, then certainly and undeniably it is in our power to make the love of God and death of Christ effectual towards us or not, and that by believing we actually do the one by an act of our own; which is so evident that the most ingenious and perspicacious of our adversaries have in terms confessed it, as I have declared elsewhere [the Arminian position]).²⁹ Such being, then, the absolute necessity of faith, it seems to me that the cause of that must needs be the prime and principal cause of salvation, as being the cause of that without which the whole would not be, and by which the whole is, and is effectual.

3. I shall give those that to us in this are contrary-minded, their choice and option, so that they will answer directly, categorically, and without uncouth, insignificant, cloudy distinctions, whether our Saviour, by his death and intercession (which we proved to be conjoined), did merit or procure faith for us, or no? or, which is all one, whether faith be a fruit and effect of the death of Christ, or no? And according to their answer I will proceed.

First, If they answer affirmatively, that it is, or that Christ did procure it by his death (provided always that they do not willfully equivocate, and when I speak of faith as it is a grace in a particular person, taking it subjectively, they understand faith as it is the doctrine of faith, or the way of salvation declared in the gospel, taking it objectively, which is another thing, and beside the present question;

although, by the way, I must tell them that we deny the granting of that new way of salvation, in bringing life and immortality to light by the gospel in Christ, to be procured for us by Christ, himself being the chiefest part of this way, yea, the way itself: and that he should himself be procured by his own death and oblation is a very strange, contradictory assertion, beseeming them who have used it (More, p. 35.) It is true, indeed, a full and plenary carrying of his elect to life and glory by that way we ascribe to him, and maintain it against all; but the granting of that way was of the same free grace and unprocured love which was also the cause of granting himself unto us, Gen. iii. 15. [the original promise in obscure terms]; — if, I say, they answer thus affirmatively, then I demand whether Christ procured faith for all for whom he died absolutely, or upon some condition on their part to be fulfilled? If absolutely, then surely, if he died for all, they must all absolutely believe; for that which is absolutely procured for any is absolutely his, no doubt. He that hath absolutely procured an inheritance, by what means soever, who can hinder, that it should not be his? But this is contrary to that of the apostle, “All men have not faith,” 2 Thess. iii. 2; and, “Faith is of the elect of God,” Tit. i. 1. If they say that he procured it for them, that is, to be bestowed on them conditionally [which is the Arminian position], I desire that they would answer bona fide, and roundly, in terms without equivocation or blind distinctions, assign that condition, that we may know what it is, seeing it is a thing of so infinite concernment to all our souls. Let me know this condition which ye will maintain, and en herbam amici!30 the cause is yours. Is it, as some say, if they do not resist the grace of God? Now, what is it not to resist the grace of God? is it not to obey it? And what is it to obey the grace of God? is it not to believe? So the condition of faith is faith itself [the Arminian position!]. Christ procured that they should believe, upon condition that they do believe! [seen in the Sinner's prayer!] Are these things so? But they can assign a condition, on our part required, of faith, that is not faith itself. Can they do it? Let us hear it, then, and we will renew our inquiry concerning that condition, whether it be procured by Christ or no. If not, then is the cause of faith still resolved into ourselves; Christ is not the author and finisher of it. If it be, then are we just where we were before, and must follow with our queries whether that condition was procured absolutely or upon condition. Depinge ubi sistam.

But, secondly, if they will answer negatively, as, agreeably to their own principles, they ought to do, and deny that faith is procured by the death of Christ, then, —

1. They must maintain that it is an act of our own wills, so our own as not to be wrought in us by grace; and that it is wholly situated in our power to perform that spiritual act, nothing being bestowed upon us by free grace, in and through Christ (as was before declared), but what by him, in his death and oblation, was procured: which is contrary, — (1.) To express Scripture in exceeding many places, which I shall not recount: (2.) To the very nature of the being of the new covenant, which doth not prescribe and require the condition of it, but effectually work it in all the covenantees, Jer. xxxi. 33, 34; Ezek. xxxvi. 26; Heb. viii. 10, 11; (3.) To the advancement of the free grace of God, in setting up the power of free-will, in the state of corrupted nature, to the slighting and undervaluing thereof [to the undervaluing of God's free and sovereign grace which is a gift not of ourselves]. (4.) To the received doctrine of our natural depravedness and disability to anything that is good; yea, by evident unstrained consequence, overthrowing that fundamental article of original sin; yea, (5.) To right reason, which will never grant that the natural faculty is able of itself, without some spiritual elevation, to produce an act purely spiritual; as 1 Cor. ii. 14.

2. They must resolve almost the sole cause of our salvation into ourselves ultimately, it being in our own power to make all that God and Christ do unto that end effectual, or to frustrate their utmost endeavours for that purpose: for all that is done, whether in the Father's loving us and sending his Son to die for us, or in the Son's offering himself for an oblation in our stead, or for us (in our behalf), is confessedly, as before, of no value nor worth, in respect of any profitable issue, unless we believe [the condition]; which that we shall do, Christ hath not effected nor procured by his death, neither can the Lord so work it in us but that the sole casting voice (if I may so say), whether we will believe or no, is left to ourselves. Now, whether this be not to assign unto ourselves the cause of our own happiness, and to make us the chief builders of our own glory, let all judge.

These things being thus premised, I shall briefly prove that which is denied, namely, that faith is procured for us by the death of Christ; and so, consequently, he died not for all and every one, for "all men have not faith:" and this we may do by these following reasons:—

1. The death of Jesus Christ purchased holiness and sanctification for us, as was at large proved, Arg. viii.; but faith, as it is a grace of the Spirit inherent in us, is formally a part of our sanctification and holiness: therefore he procured faith for us.

[hence Eph1:4 - "just as He chose us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love," see this point below

The assumption is most certain, and not denied; the proposition was sufficiently confirmed in the foregoing argument; and I see not what may be excepted against the truth of the whole. If any shall except, and say that Christ might procure for us some part of holiness (for we speak of parts, and not of degrees and measure), but not all, as the sanctification of hope, love, meekness, and the like, I ask, — first, What warrant have we for any such distinction between the graces of the Spirit, that some of them should be of the purchasing of Christ, others of our own store? secondly, Whether we are more prone of ourselves to believe, and more able, than to love and hope? and where may we have a ground for that?

2. All the fruits of election are purchased for us by Jesus Christ; for "we are chosen in him," Eph. i. 4, as the only cause and fountain of all those good things [those things noted in Romans 8:32...how shall He not with Him freely give us all things? that is, all graces and glory hereafter!] which the Lord chooseth us to, for the praise of his glorious grace, that in all things he might have the pre-eminence. I hope I need not be solicitous about the proving of this, that the Lord Jesus is the only way and means by and for whom the Lord will certainly and actually collate upon his elect all the fruits and effects or intendments of that love whereby he chose them. But now faith is a fruit, a principal fruit, of our election; for saith the apostle, "We are chosen in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy," Eph. i. 4, — of which holiness, faith, purifying the heart, is a principal share. "Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called," Rom. viii. 30; that is, with that calling which is according to his purpose, effectually working faith in them by the mighty operation of his Spirit, "according to the exceeding greatness of his power," Eph. i. 19. And so they "believe" (God making them differ from others, 1 Cor. iv. 7, in the enjoyment of the means) "who are ordained to eternal life," Acts xiii. 48. Their being ordained to eternal life was the fountain from whence their faith did flow; and so "the election hath obtained, and the rest were blinded," Rom. xi. 7.

3. All the blessings of the new covenant are procured and purchased by him in whom the promises thereof are ratified, and to whom they are made; for all the good things thereof are contained in and exhibited by those promises, through the working of the Spirit of God. Now, concerning the promises of the covenant, and their being confirmed in Christ, and made unto his, as Gal. iii. 16, with what is to be understood in those expressions, was before declared. Therefore, all the good things of the covenant are the effects, fruits, and purchase of the death of Christ, he and all things for him being the substance and whole of it. Farther; that faith is of the good things of the new covenant is apparent from the description thereof, Jer. xxxi. 33, 34; Heb. viii. 10–12; Ezek. xxxvi. 25–27, with divers other places, as might clearly be manifested if we affected copiousness in causa facili. [\[excellent analysis!\]](#)

4. That without which it is utterly impossible that we should be saved must of necessity be procured by him by whom we are fully and effectually saved. Let them that can, declare how he can be said to procure salvation fully and effectually for us, and not be the author and purchaser of that (for he is the author of our salvation by the way of purchase) without which it is utterly impossible we should attain salvation. Now, without faith it is utterly impossible that ever any should attain salvation, Heb. xi. 6, Mark xvi. 16; but Jesus Christ, according to his name, doth perfectly save us, Matt. i. 21, procuring for us "eternal redemption," Heb. ix. 12, being, "able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by him," chap. vii. 25: and therefore must faith also be within the compass of those things that are procured by him.

5. The Scripture is clear, in express terms, and such as are so equivalent that they are not liable to any evasion; as Phil. i. 29, "It is given unto us, ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ, on the behalf of Christ, for Christ's sake, to believe on him." Faith, or belief, is the gift, and Christ the procurer of it: "God hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in him in heavenly places," Eph. i. 3. If faith be a spiritual blessing, it is bestowed on us "in him," and so also for his sake; if it be not, it is not worth contending about in this sense and way: so that, let others look which way they will, I desire to look unto Jesus as the "author and finisher of our faith," Heb. xii. 2. Divers other reasons, arguments, and places of Scripture might be added for the confirmation of this truth; but I hope I have said enough, and do not desire to say all. The sum of the whole reason may be reduced to this head, — namely, if the fruit and effect procured and wrought by the death of Christ absolutely, not depending on any condition in man to be fulfilled, be not common to all, then did not Christ die for all; but the supposal is true, as is evident in the grace of faith, which being procured by the death of Christ, to be absolutely bestowed on them for whom he died, is not common to all: therefore, our Saviour did not die for all.

Arg. X. We argue from the type to the antitype, or the thing signified by it; which will evidently restrain the oblation of Christ to God's elect. The people of Israel were certainly, in all remarkable things that happened unto them, typical of the church of God; as the apostle at large [declares], 1 Cor. x. 11. Especially, their institutions and ordinances were all representative of the spiritual things of the gospel; their priests, altar, sacrifices, were but all shadows of the good things to come in Jesus Christ; their Canaan was a type of heaven, Heb. iv. 3, 9; as also Jerusalem or Sion, Gal. iv. 26, Heb. xii. 22. The whole people itself was a type of God's church, his elect, his chosen and called people: whence as they were called a “holy people, a royal priesthood;” so also, in allusion to them, are believers, 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9. Yea, God’s people are in innumerable places called his “Israel,” as it is farther expounded, Heb. viii. 8. A true Israelite is as much as a true believer, John i. 47; and he is a Jew who is so in the hidden man of the heart. I hope it need not be proved that that people, as delivered from bondage, preserved, taken nigh unto God, brought into Canaan, was typical of God’s spiritual church, of elect believers. Whence we thus argue:— Those only are really and spiritually redeemed by Jesus Christ who were designed, signified, typified by the people of Israel in their carnal, typical redemption (for no reason in the world can be rendered why some should be typed out in the same condition, partakers of the same good, and not others); but by the people of the Jews, in their deliverance from Egypt, bringing into Canaan, with all their ordinances and institutions, only the elect, the church of God, was typed out, as was before proved. And, in truth, it is the most senseless thing in the world, to imagine that the Jews were under a type to all the whole world, or indeed to any but God’s chosen ones, as is proved at large, Heb. ix., x. Were the Jews and their ordinances types to the seven nations whom they destroyed and supplanted in Canaan? were they so to Egyptians, infidels, and haters of God and his Christ? We conclude, then, assuredly, from that just proportion that ought to be observed between the types and the things typified, that only the elect of God, his church and chosen ones, are redeemed by Jesus Christ.

John Owen, Heb 9:1, on covenants, the certainty of them being carried out by God due to his good pleasure of his will which is always accomplished despite man's stubbornness, hard heart or declaration of his so called liberty or autonomy, and also by the excellency, dignity, merit and efficacy of the sacrifice of Christ above the legal sacrifices under the old covenant.

Ver. 1. —Then verily even that first [covenant] had ordinances of worship, and also a worldly sanctuary

Obs. I. Every covenant of God had its proper privileges and advantages. — Even the first covenant had so, and those such as were excellent in themselves, though not comparable with them of the new. For to make any covenant with men, is an eminent fruit of goodness, grace, and condescension in God; whereon he will annex such privileges thereunto as may evince it so to be.

(2.) This first covenant had two things in general: —

[1.] Διχαίωματα λατρειας [right worship in Greek]. Both translations and interpreters have cast some difficulty on the meaning of these words, in themselves plain and evident. Διχαίωματα are מִצְוָה [Hebrew word]. And the word is generally rendered by δικαίωμα in the Greek versions, and next unto that by νομιχον; that which is “legal” and “right.” The Vulgar Latin renders it by “justificationes;” from the inclusion of “jus,” “justum” in the signification of it. In the New Testament it is used, Luke 1:6; Romans 1:32, 2:26, 5:16, 8:4; Hebrews 9:1, 10; Revelation 15:4, 19:8. And in no one place doth it signify “institution;” but it may be better rendered “righteousness”. When alone we so translate it, Romans 5:16. In the context and construction wherein it is here placed, it can have no signification but that of “ordinances,” “rites,” “institutions,” “statutes;” — the constant sense of מִצְוָה, determined both by its derivation and invariable use. Wherefore all inquiries on these words, in what sense the rites of the law may be called “justifications,” or whether “because the observation of them did justify before men,” or were signs of our justification before God, are all useless and needless. What there is of just and right in the signification of the word, respects the right of God in the constitution and imposition of these ordinances. They were appointments of God, which he had right to prescribe; whence their observation on the part of the church was just and equal.

These ordinances or statutes were so λατρειας, “of service;” that is, as we render it, “divine service.” Latreia is originally of as large a signification as Λατρεία [worship], and denotes any service whatever. But it is here, and constantly in the New Testament, as is also the verb λατρεύω [worship], restrained unto “divine service,” John 16:2; Romans 9:4, 12:1; “cultus,” “of worship:” and so were it better rendered than by “divine service.” In one place it signifies by itself as much as δικαίωματα λατρειας doth here, Romans 9:4, “Unto whom belongeth the giving of the law, χαί η λατρεία, —”and the worship;” that is, δικαίωματα λατρειας, “the ordinances of worship,” — the ordinances of the ceremonial law. For although God was served in and according to the commands of the moral law, or the unchangeable prescriptions, “the ten words;” and also in the duties required in the due observance of the judicial law; yet this λατρεία, or [Hebrew word], was the immediate worship of the tabernacle, and the services of the priests that belonged thereunto. Hence the Jews call all idolatry and superstition [Hebrew word], — “strange worship.”

And this was that part of divine worship about which God had so many controversies with the people of Israel under the old testament; for they were always apt to run into noxious extremes about it [same with a lot of Christian churches especially in the Pentecostal churches]. For the most part they were prone to neglect it, and to run into all manner of superstition and idolatry. For the law of this worship was a hedge that God had set about them, to keep them from those abominations; and if at any time they brake over it, or neglected it, and let it fall, they failed not to rush into the most abominable idolatry. On the other hand, oftentimes they placed all their trust and confidence, for their acceptance with God and blessing from him, on the external observance of the ordinances and institutions of it. And hereby they countenanced themselves not only in a neglect of moral duties and spiritual obedience, but in a course of flagitious sins and wickednesses. To repress these exorbitancies with respect unto both these extremes, the ministry of the prophets was in an especial manner directed. And we may observe some things here in our passage, as included in the apostle’s assertion, though not any part of his present design: —

Obs. II. There was never any covenant between God and man but it had some ordinances or arbitrary institutions of external divine worship annexed unto it. —The original covenant of works had the ordinances of the tree of life, and of the knowledge of good and evil; the laws whereof belonged not unto that of natural light and reason. The covenant of Sinai, whereof the apostle speaks, had a multiplication of them. Nor is the new covenant destitute of them or their necessary observance. All public worship, and the sacraments of the church are of this nature. For whereas it is ingrafted in natural light that some external worship is to be given unto God, he would have it of his own prescription, and not, as unto the modes of it, left unto the inventions of men. And because God hath always, in every covenant, prescribed the external worship and all the duties of it which he will accept, it cannot but be dangerous for us to make any additions thereunto. Had he prescribed none at any time, seeing some are necessary in the light of nature, it would follow by just consequence that they were left unto the finding out and appointment of men; but he having done this himself, “let not us add unto his words, lest he reprove us, and we be found liars.” And in his institution of these ordinances of external worship there is both a demonstration of his sovereignty and an especial trial of our obedience, in things whereof we have no reason but his mere will and pleasure.

Obs. III. It is a hard and rare thing to have the minds of men kept upright with God in the observation of the institutions of divine worship. — Adam lost himself and us all by his failure therein. The old church seldom attained unto it, but continually wandered into one of the extremes mentioned before. And at this day there are very few in the world who judge a diligent observation of divine institutions to be a thing of any great importance. By some they are neglected, by some corrupted with additions of their own, and by some they are exalted above their proper place and use, and turned into an occasion of neglecting more important duties. And the reason of this difficulty is, because faith hath not that assistance and encouragement from innate principles of reason, and that sensible experience of this kind of obedience, as it hath in that which is moral, internal, and spiritual.

[2.] That these ordinances of divine worship might be duly observed and rightly performed under the first covenant, there was a place appointed of God for their solemnization. It had to τε αγιον χοσμιχον, —“also a worldly sanctuary.” He renders wsivhek [Hebrew word] by αγιον properly a” holy place,” a “sanctuary” And why he calls it χοσμιχον, or “worldly,” we must inquire. And some things must be premised unto the exposition of these words: —

1st. The apostle, treating of the services, sacrifices, and place of worship, under the old testament, doth not instance in nor insist upon the temple, with its fabric and the order of its services, but in the tabernacle set up by Moses in the wilderness And this he doth for the ensuing reasons: —

(1st.) Because his principal design is to confirm the pre-eminence of the new covenant above the old. To this end he compares them together in their first introduction and establishment, with what did belong unto them therein. And as this in the new covenant was the priesthood, mediation, and sacrifice of Christ; so in the old it was the tabernacle with the services and sacrifices that belonged unto it. These the first covenant was accompanied with and established by; and therefore were they peculiarly to be compared with the tabernacle of Christ, and the sacrifice that he offered therein. This is the principal reason why in this disputation he hath all along respect unto the tabernacle, and not unto the temple.

(2dly.) Although the temple, with its glorious fabric and excellent order, added much unto the outward beauty and splendor of the sacred worship, yet was it no more but a large exemplification of what was virtually contained in the tabernacle and the institutions of it, from whence it derived all its glory; and therefore these Hebrews principally rested in and boasted of the revelation made unto Moses, and his institutions. And the excellency of the worship of the new covenant being manifested above that of the tabernacle, there is no plea left for the additional outward glory of the temple.

2dly. Designing to treat of this holy tent or tabernacle, he confines himself unto the first general distribution of it, Exodus 26:33, "And thou shalt hang up the veil under the taches, that thou mayest bring in thither within the veil the ark of the testimony: and the veil shall divide unto you between the holy and the most holy;" the holy utensils of which two parts he afterwards distinctly describes. The whole was called vD;q]mi; which he renders by to< a[gion, "the holy place," or "sanctuary." The tabernacle of witness erected in the wilderness in two parts, the holy and the most holy, with the utensils of them, is that whose description he undertakes.

It is observed by the apostle, that the first covenant had this sanctuary; 1st. Because so soon as God had made that covenant with the people, he prescribed unto them the erection and making of this sanctuary, containing all the solemn means of the administration of the covenant itself. 2dly. Because it was the principal mercy, privilege, and advantage, that the people were made partakers of by virtue of that covenant. And it belongs unto the exposition of the text, as to the design of the apostle in it, that we consider what that privilege was, or wherein it did consist. And, —

(1st.) This tabernacle, with what belonged thereunto, was a visible pledge of the presence of God among the people, owning, blessing, and protecting of them; and it was a pledge of God's own institution. In imitation whereof, the superstitious heathens invented ways of obliging their idol gods to be present among them for the same ends. Hence was that prayer at the removal of the tabernacle and the ark therein, Numbers 10:35, 36, "Rise up, LORD, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate thee flee before thee." And when it rested he said, "Return, O LORD, unto the many thousands of Israel." And thence the ark was called "the ark of God's strength" (see Psalm 68:1, 2, 132:8; 2 Chronicles 6:41), because it was a pledge of God's putting forth his strength and power in the behalf of the people. And according unto this institution, it was a most effectual means to strengthen their faith and confidence in God; for what could they desire more, in reference thereunto, than to enjoy such a gracious earnest of his powerful presence among them? But when they ceased to trust in God, and put their confidence in the things themselves, — which were no otherwise useful but as they were pledges of his presence, — they proved their ruin. Hereof we have a fatal instance in their bringing the ark into the field, in their battle against the Philistines, 1 Samuel 4:3-11. And it will fare no better with others who shall rest satisfied with outward institutions of divine worship, neglecting the end of them all, which is faith and trust in God, Jeremiah 7:4. But men of corrupt minds had rather place their trust in anything but God: for they find that they can do so and yet continue in their sins; as those did in the prophet, verses 8-10. But none can trust in God unless he relinquish all sin whatever; all other pretended trust in him is but the entitling of him unto our own wickedness. [this is the key, the ark of God's strength points to Christ our high priest who by his merit and strength, will save his people! Matt.1:21. Not maybe, if man cooperates with God, which Arminians and most other people believe, but he will do it for who can stay his hand or resist his will? Dan 4:35 & Rom 9:19. But unregenerate minds don't see it this way; they see themselves as autonomous, not dependent upon

God; they see their wills as self-directed and so forth - so God's eternal decrees are a threat to this autonomy or liberty and so they reject it.

(2dly.) It was the pledge and means of God's residence or dwelling among them, which expresseth the peculiar manner of his presence, mentioned in general before. The tabernacle was God's house; nor did he promise at any time to dwell among them but with respect thereunto, Exodus 15:17, 25:8, 29:44-46; Numbers 5:3. And the consideration hereof was a powerful motive unto holiness, fear, and reverence; unto which ends it is everywhere pressed in the Scripture. [And this is the point of the infallibility of the new covenant; that sin would be atoned and God's people, his elect, would be delivered, that the ministry of Christ as our high priest, being pre-eminent, would not fail. These outward ceremonies and ordinances mainly served to encourage old testament believers because they saw through the eyes of faith what they pointed to, that is, Christ the Redeemer. That the real salvation and will of God would not fail, is not up to man's deciding or his will as Arminians suppose. Thus these privileges are a help to believers but serve as aggravations of the sins of reprobates at the last day - and to God's glory in his justice. And I think this is why the ordinance of infant baptism is seen as a privilege for the same reason behind these other ordinances - it acts as a means to strengthen faith or to center one's attention and confidence in God - not in the child at this young age since he cannot exercise reason yet, but in the believing parents who are over him and have responsibility to raise him up in the fear and admonition of the Lord. John Owen speaks more in infant baptism as does Thomas Shepard.

(3dly.) It was a fixed seat of all divine worship, wherein the truth and purity of it were to be preserved. Had the observation of the ordinances of divine service been left unto the memories of private persons, it would quickly have issued in all manner of foolish practices, or have been utterly neglected; but God appointed this sanctuary for the preservation of the purity of his worship, as well as for the solemnity thereof. See Deuteronomy 12:8-11. Here was the book of the law laid up; according unto the prescript whereof the priests were obliged in all generations to take care of the public worship of God.

(4thly.) It was principally the privilege and glory of the church of Israel, in that it was a continual representation of the incarnation of the Son of God; a type of his coming in the flesh to dwell among us, and, by the one sacrifice of himself, to make reconciliation with God and atonement for sins. It was such an expression of the idea of the mind of God concerning the person and mediation of Christ, as in his wisdom and grace he thought meet to intrust the church withal. Hence was that severe injunction, that all things concerning it should be made "according unto the pattern showed in the mount;" for what could the wisdom of men do in the prefiguration of that mystery, which they had no comprehension of?

But yet this sanctuary the apostle calls kosmikon, "worldly." Expositors both ancient and modern do even weary themselves in their inquiries why the apostle calls this sanctuary "worldly." But I think they do so without cause, the reason of the appellation being evident in his design and the context. And there is a difficulty added unto it by the Latin translation, which renders the word "seculare," which denotes "continuance" or duration. This expresseth the Hebrew [Hebrew word]; but that the apostle renders by aijwn, and not by kosmov, and therefore here hath no respect unto it. The sense that many fix upon is, that he intends the outward court of the temple, whereinto the Gentiles or men of the world were admitted, whence it was called “worldly,” and not sacred. But this exposition, though countenanced by many of the ancients, is contrary unto the whole design of the apostle. For, 1st. He speaks of the tabernacle, wherein was no such outward court; nor indeed was there any such belonging to the temple, whatever some pretend. 2dly. The whole sanctuary whereof he speaks he immediately distributes into two parts, as they were divided by the veil, namely, the holy and the most holy place; which were the two parts of the tabernacle itself. 3dly. He treats of the sanctuary only with respect unto the divine service to be performed in it by the priests, which they did not in any outward court whereinto the Gentiles might be admitted.

Wherefore the apostle terms this sanctuary “worldly,” because it was every way in and of this world. For, 1st. The place of it was on the earth, in this world; in opposition whereunto the sanctuary of the new covenant is in heaven, Hebrews 8:2. 2dly. Although the materials of it were as durable as any thing in that kind that could be procured, as gold and shittim-wood, because they were to be of a long continuance, yet were they “worldly;” that is, “caduca,” fading and perishing things, as are all things of the world; God intimating thereby that they were not to have an everlasting continuance. Gold, and wood, and silk, and hair, however curiously wrought and carefully preserved, are but for a time. 3dly. All the services of it, all its sacrifices, in themselves, separated from their typical, representative use, were all worldly; and their efficacy extended only unto worldly things, as the apostle proves in this chapter. 4thly. On these accounts the apostle calls it worldly; yet not absolutely so, but in opposition unto that which is heavenly. All things in the ministration of the new covenant are heavenly. So is the priest, his sacrifice, tabernacle, and altar, as we shall see in the process of the apostle’s discourse. And we may observe from the whole, —

Obs. IV. That divine institution alone is that which renders anything acceptable unto God. — Although the things that belonged unto the sanctuary, and the sanctuary itself, were in themselves but worldly, yet being divine ordinances, they had a glory in them, and were in their season accepted with God.

Obs. V. God can animate outward, carnal things with a hidden, invisible spring of glory and efficacy. — So he did this sanctuary with its relation unto Christ; which was an object of faith, which no eye of flesh could behold.

Obs. VI. All divine service or worship must be resolved into divine ordination or institution. — A worship not ordained of God is not accepted of God. “It had ordinances of worship.” Obs. VII. A worldly sanctuary is enough for them whose service is worldly; and these things the men of the world are satisfied with.

Obs. XIV. There is a signal glory put upon the undertaking of Christ to make reconciliation for the church by the sacrifice of himself.

3. This undertaking of Christ is signaled by the remark that is put on the declaration of it, ἰδοῦ, "Behold." A glorious spectacle it was, to God, to angels, and to men. To God, as it was filled with the highest effects of infinite goodness, wisdom, and grace; which all shone forth in their greatest elevation and were glorified therein. It was so unto angels, as that whereon their confirmation and establishment in glory did depend, Ephesians 1:10; which therefore they endeavored with fear and reverence to look into, 1 Peter 1:12. "And as unto men, that is, the church of the elect, nothing could be so glorious in their sight, nothing so desirable. By this call of Christ, "Behold, I come," the eyes of all creatures in heaven and earth ought to be fixed on him, to behold the glorious work he had undertaken, and the accomplishment of it.

4. There is what he thus proposed himself for, saying, "Behold me."

(1.) This in general is expressed by himself, "I come." This coming of Christ, what it was and wherein it did consist, was declared before. It was by assuming the body that was prepared for him. This was the foundation of the whole work he had to do, wherein he came forth like the rising sun, with light in his wings, or as a giant rejoicing to run a race.

The faith of the old testament was, that he was thus to come: and this is the life of the new, that he is come. They by whom this is denied do overthrow the faith of the gospel. This is the spirit of antichrist, 1 John 4:1-3. And this may be done two ways:

[1.] Directly and expressly;

[2.] By just consequence.

Directly it is done by them who deny the reality of his human nature, as many did of old, affirming that he had only an ethereal, aerial, or phantastical body; for if he came not in the flesh, he is not come at all. So also it is by them who deny the divine person of Christ, and his pre-existence therein, before the assumption of the human nature; for they deny that these are the words of him when resolved, and spoken before his coming. He that did not exist before in the divine nature, could not promise to come in the human. And indirectly it is denied by all those who, either in doctrines or practices, deny the ends of his coming; and they are many, — which I shall not now mention. [Matt 1:21, he came to save his people from their sins; as I said before this does not depend on man's cooperation as Arminians suppose, making salvation only a possibility. But Christ came to do the will of the Father as our surety which was to save those who were given to him (John 6:37-39 and other places) Our very cooperation, if you want to call it that which is summed up in our obedience in believing, is the very thing promised in the covenant, that being by free donation, is the gift of faith that is not of ourselves! By Christ being our surety, he did what we were not able to do, due to the weakness of sinful flesh, hence he will infallibly succeed in his mission as our high priest; that's the whole point of him being our surety. He will not fail of his mission. And also he intercedes for us so as to be able to save to the uttermost Heb 7:25. Otherwise we have little consolation or peace resting in our own ability to believe.]

It may be objected against this fundamental truth, 'That if the Son of God would undertake this work of reconciliation between God and man, why did he not do the will of God by his mighty power and grace, and not by this way of coming in the flesh, which was attended with all dishonor, reproaches, sufferings, and death itself.' But besides what I have at large elsewhere discoursed concerning the necessity and suitableness of this way of his coming unto the manifestation of all the glorious properties of the nature of God, I shall only say, that God, and he alone, knew what was necessary unto the accomplishment of his will; and if it might have been otherwise effected, he would have spared his only Son, and not have given him up unto death.

(2.) The end for which he thus promiseth to come, is to do the will of God: "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God."

The will of God is taken two ways: First, for his eternal purpose and design, called "the counsel of his will," Ephesians 1:11; and most commonly his "will" itself, — the will of God as unto what he will do, or cause to be done. Secondly, for the declaration of his will and pleasure as unto what he will have us to do in a way of duty and obedience; that is, the rule of our obedience [or prescriptive will]. It is the will of God in the former sense that is here intended; as is evident from the next verse, where it is said that "by this will of God we are sanctified;" that is, our sins were expiated according to the will of God. But neither is the other sense absolutely excluded; for the Lord Christ came so to fulfill the will of God's purpose, as that we may be enabled to fulfill the will of his command. Yea, and he himself had a command from God to lay down his life for the accomplishment of this work. [Arminians in saying that salvation depends on man's will in deciding infers that Christ will fail in his mission which is blaspheme.]

This following description of the will of God will help you see the impropriety of the sinner's prayer ref. the word freely.

Wherefore this will of God, which Christ came to fulfill, is that which elsewhere is expressed by εὐδοχία, προθεσις, βουλή, του ζηληματος, Ephesians 1:5, 11 etc.; — his "good pleasure," his purpose, the "counsel of his will," his "good pleasure which he purposed in himself;" that is, freely, without any cause or reason taken from us, to call, justify, sanctify, and save to the uttermost, or to bring them unto eternal glory. This he had purposed from eternity, to the praise of the glory of his grace. How this might be effected and accomplished, God had hid in his own bosom from the beginning of the world, Ephesians 3:8, 9; so as that it was beyond the wisdom and indagation [a searching or inquiring] of all angels and men to make a discovery of. Howbeit, even from the beginning he declared that such a work he had graciously designed; and he gave in the first promise [Gen3:15], and otherwise, some obscure intimations of the nature of it, for a foundation of the faith in them that were called. Afterwards God was pleased, in his sovereign authority over the church, for their good, and unto his own glory, to make a representation of this whole work in the institutions of the law, especially in the sacrifices thereof. But hereon the church began to think (at least many of them did so) that those sacrifices themselves were to be the only means of accomplishing this will of God, in the expiation of sin, with the salvation of the church. But God had now, by various ways and means, witnessed unto the church that indeed he never appointed them unto any such end, nor would rest in them; and the church itself found by experience that they would never pacify conscience, and that the strict performance of them was a yoke and burden. In this state of things, when the fullness of time was come, the glorious counsels of God, namely, of the Father, Son, and Spirit, brake forth with light, like the sun in its strength from under a cloud, in the tender made of himself by Jesus Christ unto the Father, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God." [Heb10:9] This, this is the way, the only way, whereby the will of God might be accomplished. Herein were all the riches of divine wisdom displayed, all the treasures of grace laid open, all shadows and clouds dispelled, and the open door of salvation evidenced unto all.

(3.) This will of God Christ came to do, του ποιησαι, to effect, “to establish and perfectly to fulfill it.” How he did so the apostle fully declareth in this epistle. He did it in the whole work of his mediation, from the susception of our nature in the womb, unto what he doth in his supreme agency in heaven at the right hand of God. He did all things to accomplish this eternal purpose of the will of God. [As you get a clearer view of this you should see the error of the Arminian view, that after all Christ has done, man is able to frustrate his will. Arminians separate what God has put together, e.g., the death of Christ is applied to all, but his intercession is not, since most acknowledge that there is a hell and many go there. Take for instance 1Cor5:21 “For He made Him who knew no sin to be sin for us, that we might become the righteousness of God in Him.” He was made sin for us is inseparably connected to that we might become the righteousness of God in Him. The word “might” is not a statement of probability but a necessary consequent; that he will do it. There are many such like passages as this. So for all those for whom Christ died, salvation has been perfected, made sure. Another example is the Golden Chain of Redemption, Rom. 8:29-39 - for those he calls he justifies and glorifies and intercedes for. All these acts of God are inseparable. It can be concluded therefore that those in hell God never called or spoke to; he never knew them - Matt7:23.]

This seems to me the first sense of the place. Howbeit I would not, as I said before, exclude the former mentioned also; for our Lord in all that he did was the servant of the Father, and received especial command for all that he did. “This commandment,” saith he, “have I received of my]Father.” Hence in this sense also he came to do the will of God. He fulfilled the will of his purpose, by obedience unto the will of his command. Hence it is added in the psalm, that he “delighted to do the will of God;” and that “his law was in the midst of his bowels.” His delight in the will of God, as unto the laying down of his life at the command of God, was necessary unto this doing of his will. And we may observe, —

Obs. XV. The foundation of the whole glorious work of the salvation of the church was laid in the sovereign will, pleasure, and grace of God, even the Father. Christ came only to do his will.

Obs. XVI. The coming of Christ in the flesh was, in the wisdom, righteousness, and holiness of God, necessary to fulfill his will, that we might be saved unto his glory.

Obs. XVII. The fundamental motive unto the Lord Christ, in his undertaking the work of mediation, was the will and glory of God: “Lo, I come to do thy will.”

5. The last thing in this context is the ground and rule of this undertaking of the Lord Christ and this is the glory of the truth of God in his promises recorded in the Word: “In the volume of the book it is written of me, that I should fulfill thy will, O God.” There is a difficulty in these words, both as to the translation of the original text and as unto the application of them. And therefore critical observations have been multiplied about them; which it is not my way or work to repeat. Those that are learned know where to find them, and those that are not so will not be edified by them. What is the true meaning and intention of the Holy Spirit in them is what we are to inquire into.

The Socinian expositors have a peculiar conceit on this place. They suppose the apostle useth this expression, εν κεφαλιδι, to denote some especial chapter or place in the law. This they conjecture to be that of Deuteronomy 17:18, 19: “And it shall be, when he” (the king to be chosen) “sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write him a copy of this law in a book, out of that which is before the priests the Levites: and it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life; that he may learn to fear the LORD his God, to keep all the words of this law and these statutes, to do them.” David, they say, spoke those words in the psalm; and it is nowhere said that he should come to do the will of God but in this place of Deuteronomy, as he was to be the king of that people. But there can be nothing more fond than this empty conjecture. For, —

(1.) David is not at all intended in these words of the psalmist, any otherwise but as he was the penman of the Holy Ghost, and a type of Christ, on which account he speaks in his name. They are the words of Christ, which David was inspired by the Holy Ghost to declare and utter. Neither would David speak these words concerning himself; because he that speaks doth absolutely prefer his own obedience, as unto worth and efficacy, before all God’s holy institutions: he presents it unto God, as that which is more useful unto the church than all the sacrifices which God had ordained. This David could not do justly.

(2.) There is nothing spoken in this place of Deuteronomy concerning the sacerdotal office, but only of the regal. And in this place of the psalmist there is no respect unto the kingly office, but only unto the priesthood; for comparison is made with the sacrifices of the law. But the offering of these sacrifices was expressly forbidden unto the kings; as is manifest in the instance of king Uzziah, 2 Chronicles 26:18-20. Besides, there is in that place of Deuteronomy no more respect had unto David than unto Saul, or Jeroboam, or any other that was to be king of that people. There is nothing in it that belongs unto David in a peculiar manner.

(3.) The words there recorded contain a mere prescription of duty, no prediction of the event; which for the most part was contrary unto what is required. But the words of the psalmist are a prophecy, a divine prediction and promise, which must be actually accomplished. Nor doth our Lord Christ in them declare what was prescribed unto him, but what he did undertake to do, and the record that was made of that undertaking of his.

(4.) There is not one word in that place of Moses concerning the removal of sacrifices and burnt-offerings; which, as the apostle declares, is the principal thing intended in those of the psalmist. Yea, the contrary, as unto the season intended, is expressly asserted; for the king was to read in the book of the law continually, that he might observe and do all that is written therein, a great part whereof consists in the institution and observation of sacrifices.

(5.) This interpretation of the words utterly overthrows what they dispute for immediately before; that is, that the entrance mentioned of Christ into the world, was not indeed his coming into this world, but his going out of it, and entering into heaven. For it cannot be denied but that the obedience of reading the law continually, and doing of it, is to be attended unto in this world, and not in heaven; and this they seem to acknowledge, so as to recall their own exposition. Other absurdities, which are very many in this place, I shall not insist upon.

Ev κεφαλιδι, we with many others render, in answer unto the Hebrew, “in the volume” or “roll.” Ribera contends that this translation of the word, “the volume” or “roll of the book,” is absurd “Because,” saith he, “the book itself was a volume or a roll; and so it is as if he had said, in the roll of the roll.” But rpise [Hebrew word], which we translate a “book,” doth not signify a book as written in a roll, but only an enunciation or declaration of anything. We now call any book of greater quantity a volume. But hogim [Hebrew word] is properly a “roll;” and the words used by the psalmist do signify that the declaration of the will of God made in this matter was written in a roll, the roll which contains all the revelations of his mind. And the word used by the apostle is not remote from this signification, as may be seen in sundry classic authors; — κεφαλis, “volumen;” because a roll is made round, after the fashion of the head of a man.

As the book itself was one roll, so the head of it, the beginning of it, amongst the first things written in it, is this recorded concerning the coming of Christ to do the will of God. This includeth both senses of the word; in the head, in the beginning of the roll, namely, of that part of the Scripture which was written when David penned this psalm. Now this can be no other but the first promise, which is recorded, Genesis 3:15. Then it was first declared, then it was first written and enrolled, that the Lord Christ, the Son of God, should be made of the seed of the woman, and in our nature come to do the will of God, and to deliver the church from that woeful estate whereinto it was brought by the craft of Satan. In this promise, and the writing of it in the head of the volume, lies the verification of the psalmist’s assertion, “In the volume of the book it is written.” Howbeit the following declarations of the will of God herein are not excluded, nor ought so to be. Hence are we herein directed unto the whole volume of the Law; for indeed it is nothing but a prediction of the coming, of Christ, and a presignification of what he had to do. ‘That book which God has given to the church as the only guide of its faith, — the Bible; (that is, the book, all other books being of no consideration in comparison of it;) that book wherein all divine precepts and promises are enrolled or recorded: in this book, in the volume of it, this is the principal subject, especially in the head of the roll, or the beginning of it, namely, in the first promise, it is so written of me.’ God commanded this great truth of the coming of Christ to be so enrolled, for the encouragement of the faith of them that should believe. And we may observe, that, —

Obs. XVIII. God’s records in the roll of his book are the foundation and warranty of the faith of the church, in the Head and members. [This, Arminians, Catholics, and all false religions including unregenerate men seek to undermine by vain philosophies, by corrupting true doctrine and twisting the scriptures, etc.]

Obs. XIX. The Lord Christ, in all that he did and suffered, had continual respect unto what was written of him. See Matthew 26:24.

Obs. XX. In the record of these words, (1.) God was glorified in his truth and faithfulness, (2.) Christ was secured in his work, and the undertaking of it. (3.) A testimony was given unto his person and office. (4.) Direction is given unto the church, in all wherein they have to do with God, what they should attend unto, — namely, what is written. (5.) The things which concern Christ, the mediator, are the head of what is contained in the same records.

Ver. 8-10. — “Above when he said, Sacrifice, and offering, and burnt offerings, and [offerings] for sin, thou wouldest not, neither hadst pleasure [therein]; (which are offered by the law;) then said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second. By the which will we are sanctified, through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once [for all].”

The use and signification of most of the words of these verses have already in our passage been spoken unto.

There are two things in these three verses: 1. The application of the testimony taken out of the psalmist unto the present argument of the apostle, verses 8, 9. 2. An inference from the whole, unto the proof of the only cause and means of the sanctification of the church, the argument he was now engaged in, verse 10.

As to the first of these, or the application of the testimony of the psalmist, and his resuming it, we may consider, —

1. What he designed to prove thereby: and this was, that by the introduction and establishment of the sacrifice of Christ in the church there was an end put to all legal sacrifices. And he adds thereunto, that the ground and reason of this great alteration of things in the church, by the will of God, was the utter insufficiency of those legal sacrifices in themselves for the expiation of sin and sanctification of the church. In verse 9 he gives us this sum of his design, “He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second.” [The sinner's prayer is legal by its nature and all preachers that promote are legal preachers; it is no different than all the legal sacrifices of the old testament that could not take away sin or please God in any way because they are not of faith; the only way to God is by effectual vocation or the effectual call of God where he opens the eyes, takes out the heart of stone, gives faith, etc. Prior to that no one seek God aright. 1Cor2:14, Phil 1:29, Eph2:8]

2. The apostle doth not here directly argue from the matter or substance of the testimony itself, but from the order of the words, and the regard they have in their order unto one another. For there is in them a twofold proposition; one concerning the rejection of legal sacrifices, and the other an introduction and tender of Christ and his mediation. And he declares, from the order of the words in the psalmist, that these things are inseparable; namely, the taking away of legal sacrifices, and the establishment of that of Christ.

3. This order in the words of the apostle is declared in that distribution of ανωτερον and τοτε, “above” and “then.” Ανωτερον, “above;” — that is, in the first place, — these his words or sayings, recorded in the first place.

4. There are in the words themselves these three things: —

(1.) There is a distribution made of the legal sacrifices into their general heads, with respect unto the will of God concerning them all: “Sacrifices and offering, and whole burnt-offerings, and sacrifice for sin.” And in that distribution he adds another property of them, namely, they were required according to the law.

[1.] He had respect not only unto the removal of the sacrifices, but also of the law itself, whereby they were retained; so he enters on his present disputation with the imperfection of the law itself, verse 1.

[2.] Allowing these sacrifices and offerings all that they could pretend unto, namely, that they were established by the law, yet notwithstanding this, God rejects them as unto the expiation of sin and the salvation of the church. For he excludes the consideration of all other things which were not appointed by the law, as those which God abhorred in themselves, and so could have no place in this matter And we may observe, that, —

Obs. XXI. Whereas the apostle doth plainly distinguish and distribute all sacrifices and offerings into those on the one side which were offered by the law, and that one offering of the body of Christ on the other side, the pretended sacrifice of the mass is utterly rejected from any place in the worship of God.

Obs. XXII. God, as the sovereign lawgiver, had always power and authority to make what alteration he pleased in the orders and institutions of his worship.

Obs. XXIII. That sovereign authority is that; alone which our faith and obedience respect in all ordinances of worship.

(2.) After this was stated and delivered, when the mind of God was expressly declared as unto his rejection of legal sacrifices and offerings, tote, “then he said;” — after that, in order thereon, upon the grounds before mentioned, “he said, Sacrifice,” etc. In the former words he declared the mind- of God, and in the latter his own intention and resolution to comply with his will, in order unto another way of atonement for sin: “Lo, I come to do thy will, O God;” — which words have been opened before.

(3.) In the last place, he declares what was intimated and signified in this order, or in those things being thus spoken unto; sacrifices, on the one hand, which was the first; and the coming of Christ, which was the second, in this order and opposition. It is evident, —

[1.] That these words, [Hebrew word], “He taketh away the first,” do intend sacrifices and offerings. But he did not so do it immediately at the speaking of these words, for they continued for the space of some hundreds of years afterwards; but he did so declaratively, as unto the indication of the time, namely, when the “second” should be introduced.

[2.] The end of this removal of the “first,” was “the establishment of the second.” This “second,” say some, is the will of God; but the opposition made before is not between the will of God and the legal sacrifices, but between those sacrifices and the coming of Christ to do the will of God. Wherefore it is the way of the expiation of sin, and of the complete sanctification of the church by the coming, and mediation, and sacrifice of Christ., that is this “second,” the thing spoken of in the second place; this God would “establish,” approve, confirm, and render unchangeable.

Obs. XXIV. As all things from the beginning made way for the coming of Christ in the minds of them that did believe, so everything was to be removed out of the way that would hinder his coming, and the discharge of the work he had undertaken law, temple, sacrifices, must all be removed to give way unto his coming. So is it testified by his forerunner, Luke 3:4- 6, "As it is written in the book of the words of Esaias the prophet, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight. Every valley shall be filled, and every mountain and hill shall be brought low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough ways shall be made smooth; and all flesh shall see the salvation of God." So it must be in our own hearts; all things must give way unto him, or he will not come and make his habitation in them.

Ver. 10. — "By the which will we are sanctified, through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once [for all.]"

From the whole context the apostle makes an inference, which is comprehensive of the substance of the gospel, and the description of the grace of God which is established thereby.

Having affirmed, in Christ's own words, that he came to do the will of God, he shows what was that will of God which he came to do, what was the design of God in it and the effect of it, and by what means it was accomplished; which things are to be inquired into: as, 1. What is the will of God which he intends; "By the which will." 2. What was the design of it, what God aimed at in this act of his will, and what is accomplished thereby; "We are sanctified." 3. The way and means whereby this effect proceedeth from the will of God; namely, "Through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ," in opposition to legal sacrifices. 4. The manner of it, in opposition unto their repetition; it was "once for all." But the sense of the whole will be more clear, if we consider, —

1. The end aimed at in the first place, namely, the sanctification of the church. And sundry things must be observed concerning it: —

(1.) That the apostle changeth his phrase of speech into the first person, "We are sanctified;" that is, all those believers whereof the gospel church-state was constituted, in opposition unto the church-state of the Hebrews and those that did adhere unto it: so he speaks before, as also Hebrews 4:3, "We who have believed do enter into rest." For it might be asked of him, 'You who thus overthrow the efficacy of legal sacrifices, what have you yourselves attained in your relinquishment of them?' 'We have,' saith he, 'that sanctification, that dedication unto God, that peace with him, and that expiation of sin, that all those sacrifices could not effect.' And observe, —

Obs. XXV. Truth is never so effectually declared, as when it is confirmed by the experience of its power in them that believe it and make profession of it. [Those who have been truly converted know by experience that they had nothing to do with it; they were entirely passive; they did not do the sinner's prayer or any other work to recommend themselves to God. One minute they were blind; the next instant they could see.] This was that which gave them the confidence which the apostle exhorts them to hold fast and firm unto the end.

Obs. XXVI. It is a holy glorying in God, and no unlawful boasting, for men openly to profess what they are made partakers of by the grace of God and blood of Christ. Yea, it is a necessary duty for men so to do, when anything is set up in competition with them or opposition unto them.

Obs. XXVII. It is the best security in differences in and about religion, (such as these wherein the apostle is engaged, the greatest and highest that ever were,) when men have an internal experience of the truth which they do profess. [If you profess free grace, then God called you out of darkness, not you calling God.]

(2.) The words he useth are in the preterperfect tense, ηγιασμενοι εσμεν, and relate not only unto the things, but the time of the offering of the body of Christ. For although all that is intended herein did not immediately follow on the death of Christ, yet were they all in it, as the effects in their proper cause, to be produced by virtue of it in their times and seasons; and the principal effect intended was the immediate consequent thereof.

(3.) This end of God, through the offering of the body of Christ, was the sanctification of the church: “We are sanctified.” The principal notion of sanctification in the New Testament, is the effecting of real, internal holiness in the persons of them that do believe, by the change of their hearts and lives. But the word is not here so to be restrained, nor is it used in that sense by our apostle in this epistle, or very rarely. It is here plainly comprehensive of all that he hath denied unto the law, priesthood, and sacrifices of the old testament, with the whole church-state of the Hebrews under it, and the effects of their ordinances and services; as, [1.] A complete dedication unto God, in opposition unto the typical one which the people were partakers of by the sprinkling of the blood of calves and goats upon them, Exodus 24. [2.] A complete church-state for the celebration of the spiritual worship of God, by the administration of the Spirit, wherein the law could make nothing perfect. [3.] Peace with God upon a full and perfect expiation of sin; which he denies unto the sacrifices of the law, verses [4.] Real, internal purification or sanctification of our natures and persons from all inward filth and defilement of them; which he proves at large that the carnal ordinances of the law could not effect of themselves, reaching no farther than the purification of the flesh. [5.] Hereunto also belong the privileges of the gospel, in liberty, boldness, immediate access unto God, the means of that access, by Christ our high priest, and confidence therein; in opposition unto that fear, bondage, distance, and exclusion from the holy place of the presence of God, which they of old were kept under. All these things are comprised in this expression of the apostle, “We are sanctified.”

The designation of such a state for the church, and the present introduction of it by the preaching of the gospel, is that whose confirmation the apostle principally designs in this whole discourse; the sum whereof he gives us, Hebrews 11:40, “God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect.”

2. The whole fountain and principal cause of this state, this grace, is the will of God, even that will which our Savior tendered to accomplish, “By the which will we are sanctified.” In the original it is, “In which will;” “in” for “by,” which is usual. Wherefore we say properly, “by which will;” for it is the supreme efficient cause of our sanctification that is intended. [This is a far cry from the Arminian view, that salvation is up to man's deciding and not God's will!] And in that expression of our Savior, “Lo, I come to do thy will, O God,” it is evident, (1.) That it was the will, that is, the counsel, the purpose, the decree of God, that the church should be sanctified. (2.) That our Lord Christ knew that this was the will of God, the will of the Father, in whose bosom he was [intimately familiar with His will]. And, (3.) That God had determined (which he also knew and declared) that legal sacrifices could not accomplish and make effectual this his will, so as the church might be sanctified thereon. Wherefore the will of God here intended (as was intimated before) is nothing but the eternal, gracious, free act or purpose of his will, whereby he determined or purposed in himself to recover a church out of lost mankind, to sanctify them unto himself, and to bring them unto the enjoyment of himself hereafter. See Ephesians 1:4-9. [To say otherwise as Arminians, Catholics, etc., do is to say that God did not accomplish his will and could not because man frustrated it which argues weakness in God, disagreement in the Godhead and many other absurdities.]

And this act of the will [see code455b ref. act of the will] of God was, (1.) Free and sovereign, without any meritorious cause, or anything that should dispose him thereunto without himself: “He purposed in himself.” There are everywhere blessed effects ascribed to it, but no cause anywhere. All that is designed unto us in it, as unto the communication of it in its effects, were its effects, not its cause. See Ephesians 1:4, and this place. The whole mediation of Christ, especially his death and suffering, was the means of its accomplishment, and not the procuring cause of it. (2.) It was accompanied with infinite wisdom, whereby provision was made for his own glory, and the means and way of the accomplishment of his will. He would not admit the legal sacrifices as the means and way of its accomplishment, because they could not provide for those ends; for “it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins.” (3.) It was immutable and irrevocable, it depended not upon any condition in anything or person without himself: “He purposed in himself.” Nor was it capable of any change or alteration from oppositions or interveniencies. (4.) It follows hereon that it must be infallibly effectual, in the actual accomplishment of what was designed in it, — everything in its order and season; it cannot in anything be frustrated or disappointed. The whole church in every age shall be sanctified by it. This will of God some would have not to be any internal act of his will, but only the thing willed by him, name]y, the sacrifice of Christ; and that for this reason, because it is opposed to legal sacrifices, which the act of God’s will cannot be. But the mistake is evident; for the will of God here intended is not at all opposed unto the legal sacrifices, but only as to the means of the accomplishment of it, which they were not, nor could be.

Obs. XXVIII. The sovereign will and pleasure of God, acting itself in infinite wisdom and grace, is the sole, supreme, original cause of the salvation of the church, Romans 9:10, 11.

3. The means of accomplishment and making effectual of this will of God, is the “offering of the body of Jesus Christ.” Some copies after ἡγιασμενοι εσμεν read οι, and then the sense must be supplied by the repetition of ἡγιασμενοι in the close of that verse, “who by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ were once sanctified.” But there is no color for this supply, for the word “once” doth directly respect the offering of Christ, as the following verses, wherein it is explained, and the dignity of this sacrifice thence demonstrated, do prove. Wherefore this article belongs not unto the text, for it is not in the best copies, nor is taken notice of in our translation. Why and in what sense the sacrifice of Christ is called the “offering of his body,” was before declared. And “by which,” δια της, refers not to the cause of our sanctification, which is the will of God, but unto the effect itself. Our sanctification is wrought, effected, accomplished by the offering of the body of Christ, (1.) In that the expiation of our sin and reconciliation with God were perfectly wrought thereby: (2.) In that the whole church of the elect was thereby dedicated unto God; which privilege they are called into the actual participation of through faith in the blood of Christ: (3.) In that thereby all the old legal sacrifices, and all that yoke, and burden, and bondage wherewith they were accompanied, are taken out of the way, Ephesians 2:15, 16: (4.) In that he redeemed us thereby from the whole curse of the law, as given originally in the law of nature, and also renewed in the covenant of Sinai: (5.) In that thereby he ratified and confirmed the new covenant, and all the promises of it, and all the grace contained in them, to be effectually communicated unto us: (6.) In that he thereby procured for us, and received into his own disposition, in the behalf of the church, effectually to communicate all grace and mercy unto our souls and consciences. In brief, whatever was prepared in the will of God for the good of the church, it is all communicated unto us through the offering of the body of Christ, in such a way as tendeth unto the glory of God and the assured salvation of the church.

This “offering of the body of Jesus Christ” is the glorious center of all the counsels of the wisdom of God, of all the purposes of his will for the sanctification of the church. For, (1.) No other way or means could effect it: (2.) This will do it infallibly; for Christ crucified is the wisdom of God and the power of God unto this end. This is the anchor of our faith, whereon alone it rests.

4. The last thing in the words gives us the manner of the offering of the body of Christ. It was done ἐφάπαξ: “once for all,” say we, — once only; it was never before that one time, nor shall ever be afterwards, — “there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins.” And this demonstrates both the dignity and efficacy of his sacrifice. Of such worth and dignity it was, that God absolutely acquiesced therein, and smelled a savor of eternal rest in it: and of such efficacy, that the sanctification of the church was perfected by it, so that it needed no repetition. It also made way for the following state of Christ himself, which was to be a state of glory, absolute and perfect, inconsistent with the repetition of the same sacrifice of himself. For, as the apostle shows, verses 12, 13, after this sacrifice offered, he had no more to do but to enter into glory. So absurd is that imagination of the Socinians, that he offered his expiatory sacrifice in heaven, that he did not, he could not enter into glory, until he had completely offered his sacrifice, the memorial whereof he carried into the holy place. And the apostle lays great weight on this consideration, as that which is the foundation of the faith of the church. He mentions it often, and argues from it as the principal argument to prove its excellency above the sacrifices of the law. And this very foundation is destroyed by those who fancy unto themselves a renewed offering of the body of Christ every day in the mass. Nothing can be more directly contrary unto this assertion of the apostle, whatever color they may put upon their practice, or whatever pretense they may give unto it.

Wherefore the apostle in the next verses argues from the dignity and efficacy of the sacrifice of Christ, by its difference from and opposition unto the legal sacrifices, which were often repeated. [And this and what is said in the previous few pages is why salvation is ordered in all things, and sure! 2Sam23:5]

Hence the purpose of Christ's sufferings and death was designed without fail to procure the salvation of God's elect infallibly with the ultimate end, to give God all the glory due to him. The nature of God; the end for which God entered into covenant to save man, a manifestation of his glory.

(2.) Again, some things are made lawful or good, or suited unto the glory, honor, or satisfaction and complacency, of them that make the covenant, by virtue of somewhat arising in or from the covenant itself. And of this sort are most of the things that are disposed in the covenant between the Father and the Son under consideration. They become good and desirable, and suited unto their glory and honor, not as considered absolutely and in themselves, but with respect unto that order, dependence, and mutual relation, that they are cast into by and in the covenant.

Such was the penal suffering of the human nature of Christ under the sentence and curse of the law. This in itself absolutely considered, without respect unto the ends of the covenant, would neither have been good in itself, nor have had any tendency unto the glory of God; for what excellency of the nature of God could have been demonstrated in the penal sufferings of one absolutely and in all respects innocent? Nay, it was utterly impossible that an innocent person, considered absolutely as such, should suffer penally under the sentence and curse of the law; for the law denounceth punishment unto no such person. Guilt and punishment are related; and where the one is not, real, or supposed, or imputed, the other cannot be. But now, in the terms of this covenant, leading unto the limitations and use of these sufferings, they are made good, and tend unto the glory of God, as we shall see. So the pardoning and saving of sinners absolutely could have had no tendency unto the glory of God; for what evidence of righteousness would there have been therein, that the great Ruler of all the world should pass by the offenses of men without animadverting upon them? What justice would have appeared, or what demonstration of the holiness of the nature of God would there have been therein? Besides, it was impossible, seeing it is the judgment of God that they who commit sin are worthy of death. But, as we shall see, through the terms and conditions of this covenant, this is rendered righteous, holy, and good, and eminently conducing to the glory of God.

15. The matter of this covenant, or the things and ends about which and for which it was entered into, are nextly to be considered. These are the things which, as we observed before, are to be disposed of unto the honor, and as it were mutual advantage, of them that make the covenant. And the matter of this covenant in general is the saving of sinners, in and by ways and means suited unto the manifestation of the glory of God. So it is compendiously expressed where the execution of it is declared, John 3:16, "God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." And upon the coming of the Son into the world he was called Jesus, because he was to "save his people from their sins," Matthew 1:21; even Jesus the deliverer, who saves us from the wrath to come, 1 Thessalonians, 1:10. To declare this design of God, or his will and purpose in and by Jesus Christ to save his elect from sin and death, to bring his many sons unto glory, or the full enjoyment of himself unto eternity, is the principal design of the whole Scripture, and whereunto the whole revelation of God unto men may be reduced. This was that on the prospect whereof the Son or Wisdom of God rejoiced before him, and had his delights with the children of men before the foundation of the world, Proverbs 8:30, 31. Man having utterly lost himself by sin, coming short thereby of the glory of God, and being made obnoxious unto everlasting destruction, the prevision whereof was in order of nature antecedent unto this covenant, as hath been declared, the Father and Son do enter into a holy mutual agreement concerning the recovery and salvation of the elect in a way of grace. This we place as the matter of this covenant, the thing contracted and agreed about. The distinction of the parts of it into persons and things, the order and respect in it of one thing unto another, are not of our present consideration; the explanation of them belongs unto the covenant of grace which God is pleased to enter into with believers by Jesus Christ. But this was that in general that was to be disposed of unto the mutual complacency and satisfaction of Father and Son.

16. The end of these things, both of the covenant and the disposition of all things made thereby, was the especial glory both of the one and the other. God doth all things for himself. He can have no ultimate end in anything but himself alone, unless there should be anything better than himself or above himself. But yet in himself he is not capable of any accession of glory by anything that he intendeth or doth. He is absolutely, infinitely, eternally perfect, in himself and all his glorious properties, so that nothing can be added unto him. His end therefore must be, not the obtaining of glory unto himself, but the manifestation of the glory that is in himself. When the holy properties of his nature are exercised in external works, and are thereby expressed, declared, and made known, then is God glorified. The end therefore in general of this covenant, which regulated the disposal of the whole matter of it, was the exercise, exaltation, and manifestation, of the glorious properties of the divine nature; other supreme end and ultimate it could have none, as hath been declared. Now, such is the mutual respect of all the holy properties of God in their exercise, and such their oneness in the same divine being, that if any one of them be exerted, manifested, and thereby glorified, the residue of them must be therein and thereby glorified also, because that nature is glorified in which they are, and whereunto they do belong. But yet, in several particular works of God, his design is firstly, immediately, and directly, to exercise in a peculiarly eminent manner, and therein to advance and glorify, one or more of his glorious properties, and the rest consequentially in and by them. So in some of his works he doth peculiarly glorify justice, in some mercy, in some his power. We may therefore, as to the end of this holy, eternal compact, consider what are those properties of the divine nature which were peculiarly engaged in it, and are peculiarly exerted in its execution, and were therefore designed to be exalted in a peculiar manner. Now these are three: —

(1.) Wisdom, attended with sovereignty. (2.) Justice, springing from holiness. (3.) Grace, mercy, goodness, love, which are various denominations of the same divine excellency.

That this covenant sprang from these properties of the divine nature, that the execution of it is the work and effect of them all, and that it is designed to manifest and glorify them, or God in and by them, unto eternity, the Scripture doth fully declare.

(1.) The infinite, sovereign wisdom of God, even the Father, exerted itself, — [1.] In passing by the angels in their fallen condition, and fixing on the recovery of man, Hebrews 2:16; 2 Peter 2:4; Jude 6. [2.] In the projection or provision of the way in general to bring about the salvation of man, by the interposition of his Son, with what he did and suffered in the pursuit hereof, Acts 2:23, 4:28. [3.] In the disposal of all things in that way in such a holy and glorious order, as that marks and footsteps of infinite divine wisdom should be imprinted on every part and passage of it, 1 Corinthians 1:23-31; Romans 11:33-36; Ephesians 3:10, 11.

(2.) His justice, accompanied with or springing from holiness, gave as it were the especial determination unto the way to be insisted on for the accomplishment of the end aimed at, and it was effectually exerted in the execution of it; for upon a supposition that God would pardon and save sinners, it was his eternal justice which required that it should be brought about by the sufferings of the Son, and it was itself expressed and exercised in those sufferings, as we shall afterwards more fully declare, Romans 3:25, 26, 8:3; Galatians 3:13; 2 Corinthians 5:21.

(3.) Grace, love, goodness, or mercy, chiefly induced unto the whole. And these the Scriptures most commonly cast the work upon, or resolve it into. See John 3:16, 17; Romans 5:8, 11:6; 1 Corinthians 1:29-31; Ephesians 1:5-7, 3:7, 8.

In these things, in the exercise, manifestation, and exaltation, of these glorious excellencies of the divine nature, with their effects in and upon the obedience of angels and men, doth consist that peculiar glory which God, even the Father, aims at in this covenant, and which supplies the place of that security or advantage which amongst men is intended in such compacts.

17. There must also, moreover, be an especial and peculiar honor of the Son, the other party covenanting, intended therein; and was so accordingly, and is in like manner accomplished. And this was twofold: — First, what he had conjunctly with the Father, as he is of the same nature with him, “over all, God blessed for ever;” for on this account the divine excellencies before mentioned belong unto him, or are his, and in their exaltation is he exalted. But as his undertaking herein was peculiar, so he was to have a peculiar honor and glory thereby, not as God, but as the Mediator of the covenant of grace, which sprang from hence. For the accomplishment of the ends of this covenant, as we shall see, he parted for a season with the glory of his interest in those divine perfections, emptying himself, or making himself of no reputation, Philippians 2:5- 9. And he was to have an illustrious recovery of the glory of his interest in them, when he was “declared to be the Son of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead,” Romans 1:4, when he was again glorified with the Father, with that glory which he had with him before the world was, John 17:5, — namely, that peculiar glory which he had and assumed upon his undertaking to be a Savior and Redeemer unto mankind, then when his delights were with the sons of men, and he rejoiced before the Father, and was his delight on that account. And this, secondly, was attended with that peculiar glorious exaltation which in his human nature he received upon the accomplishment of the terms and conditions of this covenant. What this glory was, and wherein it doth consist, I have manifested at large in the Exposition on Hebrews 1:3. See Isaiah 53:12; Psalm 110:1, 6, 2:8, 9; Zechariah 9:10; Psalm 72:8; Romans 14:11; Isaiah 45:23; Matthew 28:18; Philippians 2:10; Hebrews 12:2, etc.

Perseverance of the Saints

PERSEVERANCE OF THE SAINTS

Scripture speaks of the perseverance of the saints in the same way it does about sanctification. It admonishes believers to persevere to the end (Matt. 24: 13; Rom. 2: 7–8); to remain in Christ, in his word, in his love (John 15: 1–10; 1 John 2: 6, 24, 27; 3: 6, 24; 4: 12ff.); to continue in the faith, not shifting (Col. 1: 23; Heb. 2: 1; 3: 14; 6: 11); to be faithful to death (Rev. 2: 10, 26). Sometimes it speaks as if apostasy is a possibility: “If you think you are standing, watch out that you do not fall” (1 Cor. 10: 12); it warns against superciliousness and threatens heavy punishment for unfaithfulness (Ezek. 18: 24; Matt. 13: 20–21; John 15: 2; Rom. 11: 20, 22; 2 Tim. 2: 12; Heb. 4: 1; 6: 4–8; 10: 26–31; 2 Pet. 2: 18–22). It even seems to name various persons in whose lives there was a falling away: David in committing adultery, Solomon in his idolatry, Hymenaeus and Alexander (1 Tim. 1: 19–20; 2 Tim. 2: 17–18), Demas (2 Tim. 4: 10), false prophets and teachers who deny the Lord who bought them (2 Pet. 2: 1), believers who have fallen away from grace and the faith (Gal. 5: 4; 1 Tim. 4: 1). On the basis of these texts, Pelagians, Roman Catholics, Socinians, Remonstrants, Mennonites, Quakers, Methodists, and so forth, and even Lutherans have taught the possibility of a complete loss of the grace received. [C. Vitringa, Doctr. III, 415ff.] Augustine, on the other hand, arrived at the confession of the perseverance of the saints. However, since he deemed uncertainty and fear with respect to salvation beneficial in the life of believers, he held that those who had been born again in baptism could lose the grace they had received, but if they belonged to the number of the predestined, they would in any case receive it back before their death. Hence while believers could totally lose the grace received, the elect could not finally lose it. In the Catholic and later Roman church, many theologians, in earlier and later times, agreed with him; still the Reformed, and the Reformed alone, maintained this doctrine and linked it with the assurance of faith. [U. Zwingli]

Now the question with respect to this doctrine of perseverance is not whether those who have obtained a true saving faith could not, if left to themselves, lose it again by their own fault and sins; nor whether sometimes all the activity, boldness, and comfort of faith actually ceases, and faith itself goes into hiding under the cares of life and the delights of the world. The question is whether God upholds, continues, and completes the work of grace he has begun, or whether he sometimes permits it to be totally ruined by the power of sin. Perseverance is not an activity of the human person but a gift from God. Augustine saw this very clearly. Only he made a distinction between two kinds of grace and considered possible a grace of regeneration and faith that by itself was amissible and that, for its continued existence, had to be augmented from without by a second grace, the grace of perseverance.

That second grace, then, is a superadded gift, has no connection with the first, and has in fact no influence whatever outside the Christian life. Among the Reformed the doctrine of perseverance was very different. It is a gift of God. He watches over it and sees to it that the work of grace is continued and completed. He does not, however, do this apart from believers but through them. In regeneration and faith, he grants a grace that as such bears an inamissible character; he grants a life that is by nature eternal; he bestows the benefits of calling, justification, and glorification that are mutually and unbreakably interconnected. All of the above-mentioned admonitions and threats that Scripture addresses to believers, therefore, do not prove a thing against the doctrine of perseverance. They are rather the way in which God himself confirms his promise and gift through believers. They are the means by which perseverance in life is realized. After all, perseverance is also not coercive but, as a gift of God, impacts humans in a spiritual manner. It is precisely God's will, by admonition and warning, morally to lead believers to heavenly blessedness and by the grace of the Holy Spirit to prompt them willingly to persevere in faith and love. It is therefore completely mistaken to reason from the admonitions of Holy Scripture to the possibility of a total loss of grace. This conclusion is as illegitimate as when, in the case of Christ, people infer from his temptation and struggle that he was able to sin. The certainty of the outcome does not render the means superfluous but is inseparably connected with them in the decree of God. Paul knew with certainty that in the case of shipwreck no one would lose one's life, yet he declares, "Unless these men stay in the ship, you cannot be saved" (Acts 27: 22, 31).

As for the examples Scripture is said to cite as instances of real apostasy, it is impossible to prove that all these persons (1) either had truly received the grace of regeneration (Hymeneus, Alexander, Demas, persons referred to in 1 Tim. 4: 1; 2 Pet. 2: 1); (2) or really lost it in their fall and later received it back again (David, Solomon); (3) or really did receive it but never got it back (Heb. 6: 4–8; 10: 26–31; 2 Pet. 2: 18–22). These last texts seem to present the most formidable obstacle to the confession of the perseverance of the saints. Still this is an illusion. For, also those who hold to the possibility of falling away have to accept that the reference here is to a very particular sin. Even according to themselves, while grace is amissible, it can be regained after total loss. The opinion of Montanists and Novatians, who infer from these passages that the lapsed may never be readmitted to membership in the church, has been universally rejected by Christian churches. When Scripture expressly states that it is impossible to restore to repentance those who are in view in these texts (Heb. 6: 4; 10: 26; 2 Pet. 2: 20; 1 John 5: 16), it cannot be denied that the reference is to a sin that carries with it a judgment of hardening and that makes repentance impossible. And of such a sin—also according to the confession of those who hold to the impossibility of a falling away—there is only one, namely, the sin of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. Now if this is true, then the doctrine of the falling away of saints leads to the conclusion that either the sin of blaspheming the Holy Spirit can be committed also, or even perhaps only, by those who are born again, or the above-mentioned texts lose all their evidential value against the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints. But this is not all. For those who consider total apostasy a possibility have to make a distinction between the sins by which the grace of regeneration is lost and other sins by which it is not lost. In other words, they are compelled to resort to the Roman Catholic distinction between mortal and venial sins, unless they would hold that that grace is lost by every—even the most minor—sin. But by adopting this view, they would falsify the whole of morality, misconstrue the nature of sin, and introduce an oppressive casuistry that would ensnare the believer's conscience. Furthermore, on this view one cannot arrive at the assurance of faith, achieve the ability to work in peace, and experience the quiet development and growth of the Christian life. Continuity can be lost at any moment. Hollaz tries to argue that regeneration can be lost three, four, or more times and still be recovered. Finally, the doctrine of the possible apostasy of the saints is so far from escaping the difficulties it seeks to avoid that it rather magnifies and increases them. For if in this connection it holds on to the immutability of God's foreknowledge, then finally only those are saved whom God has eternally known would be, and the human will cannot undo the certainty of this outcome. Or it must proceed to deny predestination and foreknowledge in every sense of these terms, thus making everything uncertain and unstable, including the love of the Father, the grace of the Son, and the communion of the Holy Spirit. God may have manifested his love; Christ may have died for sinners; the Holy Spirit may have implanted rebirth and faith in the heart of people; the believer may be able to say with Paul: "I delight in the law of God in my inmost self" (Rom. 7: 22). Yet ultimately, right up until the hour of one's death—indeed, why not also on the other side of the grave?—the human will remains the decisive and all-controlling power [the very thing that Arminians staunchly defend just as most everyone else does especially the unregenerate]. Everything will be as that will determines it will be.

Scripture, however, teaches a very different doctrine. The Old Testament already clearly states that the covenant of grace does not depend on the obedience of human beings. It does indeed carry with it the obligation to walk in the way of the covenant but that covenant itself rests solely in God's compassion. If the Israelites nevertheless again and again become unfaithful and adulterous, the prophets do not conclude from this that God changes, that his covenant wavers and that his promises fail. On the contrary: God cannot and may not break his covenant. He has voluntarily—with a solemn oath—bound himself by it to Israel. His fame, his name, and his honor depend on it. He cannot abandon his people. His covenant is an everlasting covenant that cannot waver. He himself will give to his people a new heart and a new spirit, inscribe the law in their inmost self, and cause them to walk in his statutes. And later, when Paul confronts the same fact of Israel's unfaithfulness, his heart filled with grief, he does not conclude from this that the word of God has failed, but continues to believe that God has compassion on whom he will, that his gifts and calling are irrevocable, and that not all who are descended from Israel belong to Israel (Rom. 9–11).

Similarly, John testifies of those who fell away: they were not of us or else they would have continued with us (1 John 2: 19). Whatever apostasy occurs in Christianity, it may never prompt us to question the unchanging faithfulness of God, the certainty of his counsel, the enduring character of his covenant, or the trustworthiness of his promises. One should sooner abandon all creatures than fail to trust his word. And that word in its totality is one immensely rich promise to the heirs of the kingdom. It is not just a handful of texts that teach the perseverance of the saints: the entire gospel sustains and confirms it. The Father has chosen them before the foundation of the world (Eph. 1: 4), ordained them to eternal life (Acts 13: 48), to be conformed to the image of his Son (Rom. 8: 29). This election stands (Rom. 9: 11; Heb. 6: 17) and in due time carries with it the calling and justification and glorification (Rom. 8: 30). Christ, in whom all the promises of God are Yes and Amen (2 Cor. 1: 20), died for those who were given him by the Father (John 17: 6, 12) in order that he might give them eternal life and not lose a single one of them (6: 40; 17: 2); he therefore gives them eternal life and they will never be lost in all eternity; no one

Ver. 25. — “Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.”

Obs. VII. The consideration of the office-power of Christ is of great use unto the faith of the church. To this end we may observe,—

1. That the foundation of all the benefits which are received by Christ, — that is, of the spiritual and eternal salvation of the church, — is laid in his condescending to undertake the office of a mediator between God and man. And as this was the greatest effect of divine wisdom and grace, so it is the first cause, the root and spring, of all spiritual blessings unto us. This the whole Scripture beareth testimony unto, Hebrews 10:7; 1 John 3:16. This is the fundamental article of faith evangelical. And the want of laying this foundation aright, as it occasioneth many to apostatize from the gospel unto a natural religion, so it weakeneth and disordereth the faith of many believers. But this is the first ground of all friendship between God and man.

2. Having undertaken that office, all the actings of it for us and towards us, or towards God in our behalf, are circumscribed and limited by that office. We have no ground of faith to expect anything from him or by him but what belongs unto the office that he hath undertaken. Neither are we, in our addresses unto him and expectations from him, to consider him absolutely as God, the eternal Son of God only, but as the mediator between God and man. We can look for no more from a king but what he can justly do as a king, nor from any other person in office; no more are we to look for from Christ himself.

3. This office of Christ in general, as the mediator and sponsor of the new covenant, is distinguished into three especial offices, of a king, a prophet, and a priest. Whatever, therefore, we receive from Christ, or by him, we do it as he acts in that threefold capacity, or in one of those offices, a king, a priest, or a prophet. Whatever he hath done for us, or continueth to do, whatever he doth over us, for us, or towards us, he doth it in and under one of these capacities; for unto them may all his office-relation unto us be reduced. And the kindness of all those other relations wherein he stands unto us, — as of a shepherd, the bishop of our souls, of an husband, of a brother, a friend, — he puts forth and exerciseth in the acts and actings of these offices.

4. All these offices, whether vested jointly in any one other person, or severally and distinctly in several persons, as they were under the old testament, could never extend their acts and effects unto all the occasions and necessities of the church. The business of our apostle, in this chapter, is to prove that the office of the priesthood as vested in Aaron and his successors made nothing perfect, did not consummate the church-state, nor could effect its salvation. The kingly office, as it was typically managed by David and others, was remote from answering that rule and safety which the church stood in need of. Neither did nor could anyone prophet, no, nor yet all the prophets together, reveal and declare the whole counsel of God. But, —

5. These offices as they were in Christ did perfectly answer, and yet do, all that belongs to the redemption, sanctification, protection, and salvation, of the church. And this they do on two accounts: —

(1.) Because they were committed unto him in a more full, ample, and unlimited manner, than either they were or could be unto others, on purpose that they might answer all the ends of God's grace towards the church. So, as he was made a king, not this or that degree or enlargement of power was committed unto him, but "all power in heaven and in earth," over all the creation of God, in all things, spiritual, temporal, and eternal. See our description and delineation of this power, on Hebrews 1:2, 3. As a prophet, he did not receive this or that particular revelation from God, but "all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge were laid up in him," and he knew the whole mind and counsel of God, as coming forth from his divine bosom. And as unto his sacerdotal office, we are now engaged in an inquiry into its especial nature, as differing from, and exalted above, whatever was committed unto any of the sons of men under that name.

(2.) The principal reason of the all-sufficiency of the office-power and ability of Christ is taken from his own person, which alone was capable of a trust of such a power, and able to execute it unto all the ends of it. He alone, who was God and man in one person, was capable of being such a king, priest, and prophet, as was able to save the church unto the uttermost.

Wherefore, in the consideration of this office-power of Christ, wherein all our salvation doth depend, we have two things to attend unto: (1.) His person who bears these offices, and who alone is fit and able so to do; and, (2.) The especial nature of the office as committed unto him. On these grounds he was able to do infinitely more as a priest than all the priests of the order of Aaron could do. So the apostle expresseth it in the next words.

Thirdly, "He is able to save;" $\chi\alpha\iota\ \sigma\omega\zeta\epsilon\iota\nu$, — "even to save," "to save also;" not for this or that particular end, but absolutely, — "even to save." The general sense of this word is limited and determined in the use and application of it throughout the Scripture. Not any temporal deliverances, but that which is supernatural, spiritual, and eternal, is intended thereby. And, —

1. The notion of the word includeth in it a supposition of some evil or danger that we are delivered from. This is sin, with its consequents of misery, in the curse of the law and the wrath to come. Wherefore it is said of Christ, that "he saves his people from their sins," Matthew 1:21; "from the curse," Galatians 3:13; and "from the wrath to come," 1 Thessalonians 1:10. In these things all that is or can be evil unto our nature, here or unto eternity, are included.

2. The bringing of us into an estate of present grace and right unto future blessedness, with the enjoyment of it in its appointed season, is intended in it; for although this be not included in the first notion of the word, yet it belongs unto the nature of the thing intended. This salvation, called therefore “great’ and “eternal salvation,” doth not merely respect the evil we are delivered from, but the contrary good also, in the present favor and future enjoyment of God. And concerning this salvation two things are to be considered: —

1. That there is power and ability required unto this work: “he is able to save.” It was no easy thing to take away sin, to subdue Satan, to fulfill the law, to make peace with God, to procure pardon, to purchase grace and glory, with all other things great and glorious, that belong unto this salvation. And it is the great concernment of faith well to fix this principle, that he who hath undertaken this work is able to accomplish it, and that by the means he hath designed to use, and the way wherein he will proceed. We are apt to pass this over without any inquiry into it, and to take it for granted that God is able to do whatever he pleaseth; but it is not of the absolute power of God whereof we speak, but of the power of God, or of Christ, put forth in such a peculiar way. And the want of faith herein is the first and most proper part of unbelief. Wherefore, as God engageth his omnipotency, or all-sufficiency, as the foundation of all his covenant actings towards us, Genesis 17:1; so he often pleadeth the same power to assure us of the accomplishment of his promises, Isaiah 40:28, 29. And it is expressly asserted as the principal ground of faith, Romans 4:21, 11:23; 1 Corinthians 10:13; Ephesians 3:20; 2 Timothy 1:12; Jude 1:24; and often in this epistle.

2. It is here supposed that the discharge of Christ’s priestly office is the way designed to save us by, or to effect this great work of salvation. No other way or means is appointed of God unto this end. Here we must look for it, or go without it. Wherefore the inquiry is necessary, whether, in the discharge of this office, and within the bounds and limits of it, he be able to save us with this salvation. For indeed many are like those “sons of Belial” who said of Saul, when God had anointed him king, “How shall this man save us? and despised him,” 1 Samuel 10:27. They understand not how Christ is able to save them by his priesthood; and therefore, under various pretences, they trust to themselves, and despise him. All false religion is but a choice of other things for men to place their trust in, with a neglect of Christ. And all superstition grows on the same root, in all effects or instances of it, be they great or small. Wherefore I say, we are to consider whether this office, and the acts of it, be suited and meet for the effecting of all things that belong to this salvation. For if we find them not so, we cannot believe that he is a priest able to save us. But they evidence themselves to be otherwise, unless our minds are darkened by the power of unbelief; as we shall see in the particulars afterwards insisted on by our apostle. And we are here taught, that, —

Obs. VIII. It is good to secure this first ground of evangelical faith, that the Lord Christ, as vested with his offices, and in the exercise of them, is able to save us.

Salvation is that which all sinners, who have fallen under any convictions, do seek after. And it is from God they look for it. He alone, they know, can save them; and unless he do so, they cannot be saved. And that he can do so, they seem for a while to make no question, although they greatly doubt whether he will or no. Here, under these general apprehensions of the power of God, they cannot long abide, but must proceed to inquire into the way whereby he will save them, if ever they be saved. And this the whole Scripture testifieth to be no otherwise but by Jesus Christ. For “there is no salvation in any other; neither is there any other name under heaven given among men, whereby they must be saved,” Acts 4:12. When their thoughts are thus limited unto Christ alone, their next inquiry is, “How shall this man save us?" And hereon are they directed unto his offices, especially his priesthood, whereby he undertakes to deliver them from the guilt of their sins, and to bring them into favor with God. Is it not therefore highly incumbent on them to satisfy themselves herein, that Christ is able to save them in the exercise of this office? for if he be not, there is no salvation to be obtained. And when men are come thus far, as that they will not question in general but that the Lord Christ, in the discharge of his sacerdotal office, is able to save sinners in general, yet unbelief will keep them off from acquiescing in this power of his, as so limited, for their own salvation. As Naaman had thoughts in general that Elisha could cure men of their leprosy, yet he would not believe that he could cure them in the way and by the means he prescribed. He thought he would have taken another course with him, more suited unto his apprehensions, as a means for his recovery. Hereon he turns away in a rage; which if he had not by good advice been recalled from, he had lived and died under the plague of his leprosy, 2 Kings 5:10-14. When persons are reduced to look for salvation only by Christ, and do apprehend in general that he can save sinners, yet oftentimes, when they come to inquire into the way and manner of it, by the exercise of his priestly office, they cannot close with it. Away they turn again into themselves; from which if they are not recovered, they must die in their sins. Unless, therefore, we do well and distinctly fix this foundation of faith, that Christ as a priest is able to save us, or is able to do so in the discharge of his sacerdotal office, we shall never make one firm step in our progress. To this end we must consider, —

That the Lord Christ as mediator, and in the discharge of his office, is "the power of God, and the wisdom of God." So saith our apostle, "Christ crucified is, to them that believe, the power of God, and the wisdom of God," 1 Corinthians 1:23, 24. His death is both an effect of divine power and wisdom; and thereby do they exert their efficacy unto the utmost, for the attaining of the end designed in it. Wherefore we are to look unto this priesthood of Christ, as that which divine wisdom hath appointed as the only way and means whereby we may be saved. And if there be any defect therein, — if Christ, in the discharge of it, be not able to save us, notwithstanding the difficulties which unto us seem insuperable, — it must be charged on divine wisdom, as that which was wanting in the contrivance of a due means unto its end. And so it is done by the world; for the apostle testifieth that this "wisdom of God" is looked on and esteemed by men as mere "foolishness." The way proposed in it, to save sinners by the cross of Christ, is accounted as folly by all unbelievers, whatever else they pretend as the reason of their unbelief. But this faith is to fix upon; namely, that although we yet see not how it may be done, nor have the experience of it in our own souls, yet this being the way which infinite wisdom hath fixed on, there is no defect in it, but Christ by it is able to save us. For the very first notion which we have of wisdom as divine and infinite, is, that we are to acquiesce in its contrivances and determinations, though we cannot comprehend the reasons or ways of them. Besides, the Lord Christ is herein also "the power of God." God in him and by him puts forth his omnipotent power for the accomplishing of the effect and end aimed at. Wherefore, although we are not to look for our salvation from the power of God absolutely considered, yet are we to look for it from the same omnipotency as acting itself in and by Jesus Christ. This is the way whereby infinite wisdom hath chosen to act omnipotent power; and into them is faith herein to be resolved.

1. He is able to save also εἰς τὸ παντελές. The word may have a double sense; for it may respect the perfection of the work, or its duration: and so it is variously rendered; "to the uttermost," that is, completely; or "evermore," that is, "always" or "forever." So the Syriac translation carries it.

Take the word in the first sense, and the meaning is, that he will not effect or work out this or that part of our salvation, do one thing or another that belongs unto it, and leave what remains unto ourselves or others; but “he is our Rock, and his work is perfect.”

Whatever belongs unto our entire, complete salvation, he is able to effect it. The general notion of the most that are called Christians lies directly against this truth. In the latter sense two things may be intended: (1.) That after an entrance is made into this work, and men begin to be made partakers of deliverance thereby, there may great oppositions be made against it, in temptations, trials, sins, and death, before it be brought unto perfection; but our Lord Christ, as our faithful high priest, fainteth not in his work, but is able to carry us through all these difficulties, and will do so, until it be finished forever in heaven. (2.) That this salvation is durable, perpetual, eternal, Isaiah 45:17. “Salvare in aeternum;” to procure “salutem aeternam.” But “favores sunt ampliandi,” and there is nothing hinders but that we may take the words in such a comprehensive sense as to include the meaning of both these interpretations. He is able to save completely as to all parts, fully as to all causes, and for ever in duration. And we may observe, —

Obs. IX. Whatever hinderances and difficulties lie in the way of the salvation of believers, whatever oppositions do rise against it, the Lord Christ is able, by virtue of his sacerdotal office, and in the exercise of it, to carry the work through them all unto eternal perfection.

In the assertion of the ability of Christ in this matter, there is a supposition of a work whereunto great power and efficacy is required; and whereas it is emphatically affirmed, that “he is able to save unto the uttermost,” it is supposed that great oppositions and difficulties do lie in the way of its accomplishment. But these things are commonly spoken unto by our practical divines, and I shall not therefore insist upon them.

2. The whole is further declared by instancing in those who are to be saved, or made partakers of this salvation. “He is able to save to the uttermost,” but yet all are not to be saved by him; yea, they are but few that are so. Of the most it may be said, “They will not come unto him that they may have life.” Wherefore those whom he is thus able to save, and doth save accordingly, are all those, and only those, “who come unto God by him.”

To “come to God” hath a double sense in the Scripture; for it is sometimes expressive of faith, sometimes of worship.

(1.) To come to God, is to believe. Faith or believing is a coming to God. So Christ calling us unto faith in him, calleth us to come unto him, Matthew 11:28. And unbelief is a refusal to come to him, “Ye will not come unto me, that ye may have life.” Faith in God through him, is coming to the Father by him, John 14:6; so to come to God by Christ, is through him to believe in God, 1 Peter 1:21.

(2.) Our access unto God in his worship, is our coming unto him. So is it most frequently expressed in the Old Testament, — “Drawing nigh unto God.” And the expression is taken from the approach that was made unto the tabernacle in and with all holy services. Worship is an approximation unto God, Psalm 78:28. So our apostle calls those who worshipped God in the ordinances of the law, τοῦς προσερχομενους, Hebrews 10:1, — the “comers,” the worshippers; not those that come to the worship, but those who by that worship come to God. In answer hereunto, our evangelical worship is προσαγωγη, — an “access,” an approximation, a drawing nigh or coming to God, Ephesians 2:18; Hebrews 10:22.

The latter sense is principally here intended; for the discourse of the apostle is concerning the state of the church under the new testament, with the advantage of it above that of old, by its relation unto the priesthood of Christ. They came of old to God with their worship by the high priest of the law; but those high priests could not save them in any sense. But the high priest of the new testament can “save to the uttermost” all gospel worshippers, — “all that come to God by him.” But the former sense of the word is also included and supposed herein. They that come unto God by Christ, are such as, believing in him, do give up themselves in holy obedience to worship God in and by him.

So is the way expressed of this coming unto God, δι αυτου— that is, “by him” as a high priest; as it is at large explained by the apostle, Hebrews 10:19-22.

Now, to come unto God by Jesus Christ in all holy worship, so as thereon to be interested in his saving power as the high priest of the church, is so to come. (1.) In obedience unto his authority, as to the way and manner of it; (2.) With affiance in his mediation, as to the acceptance of it; (3.) With faith in his person, as the foundation of it.

(1.) It is to come in obedience unto his authority, and that on a double account: [1.] Of the way of coming. It is not by legal institutions, it is not by our own inventions; it is only by his appointment, Matthew 28:20. To come to God any other way, gives us no interest in the care or saving power of Christ, John 15:7, 8. [2.] Of that especial respect which we have in our souls and consciences unto his sovereign rule over us.

(2.) With affiance in his mediation. And therein faith hath respect unto two things: [1.] The sacrifice he hath offered, the atonement and reconciliation he hath made for us, whereon our whole liberty of access unto God doth depend, Hebrews 10:19-22. [2.] To his intercession, whereby he procures actual acceptance for our persons and our duties, Hebrews 4:16; 1 John 2:1.

(3.) The foundation of the whole is faith in his person as vested with his holy office, and in the discharge of it. It is so to believe in him, as to believe that “he is able to save to the uttermost all that come unto God by him.” This is the ground whereon, in our holy worship we assemble in his name, Matthew 18:20; and make all our supplications unto God in his name, John 16:26; — that is, by an exercise of faith and trust in him, that by and through him we shall be accepted with God.

Obs. X. The salvation of all sincere gospel worshippers is secured by the actings of the Lord Christ in the discharge of his priestly office.

Obs. XI. Attendance unto the service, the worship of God in the gospel, is required to interest us in the saving care and power of our high priest. — Men deceive themselves, who look to be saved by him, but take no care to come to God in holy worship by him. Nor is it an easy or common thing so to do. All men pretend unto divine worship, some one way, some another, and in words they interpose the name of Christ therein; but really to come to God by him is a matter of another import. Two things are indispensably required thereunto: (1.) That the principle of saving faith be antecedent unto it; (2.) That the exercise of faith be concomitant with it. Unless we are true believers, our worship will not be accepted; and unless we are in the exercise of faith on God through Christ in the performance of it, it gives no glory to him, it brings no advantage unto ourselves.

Obs. XII. Those who endeavor to come unto God any other way but by Christ, as by saints and angels, may do well to consider whether they have any such office in heaven as by virtue whereof they are able to save them to the uttermost. — That this is done by those of the Roman church, cannot with any modesty be denied; yea, it is avowed by them. For when they are charged with the wickedness of their doctrine and practice in this matter, evacuating the mediation of Christ, they reply, that they admit of no mediators of reconciliation with God, but only of intercession. Be it so. Ability to save to the utmost is here ascribed unto our high priest upon the account of his intercession. A respect unto his oblation, whereby he made reconciliation, is included; but it is the efficacy of his intercession that is expressly regarded: for being “reconciled by his death, we shall be saved by his life,” Romans 5:10. He, therefore, alone is the mediator of intercession, who is able, by virtue of his office, to save us to the utmost, through that intercession of his.

The Priesthood of Christ. His offices: king, prophet and priest - this further describes the wisdom of the way of salvation, its divine purpose in perfecting the salvation of the elect - that it will infallibly be accomplished as this text further delineates and make clearer. It is the duty of Christ our high priest to do certain things to accomplish God's will in saving his church, which he will infallibly accomplish otherwise it argue weakness and imperfection in the Godhead. This is common sense or right reason to unprejudiced minds. Most people do not realize all that goes into Christ's mission and so on the weakest grounds are ready to unwittingly assign weakness and imperfection to the Godhead by believing sophisms and crafty arguments of the opposers to this doctrine. This Owen describes here in a closely related instance:

Such a loathsome appearance of vizards and pretenses for the extenuating of sin, and countenancing of men in the practice of it, was never before presented to the eyes of men. The main of their design, as is now manifest, has been so to interpret Scripture laws, rules, and precepts, as to accommodate them all to that course of corrupt conversation which prevails generally in the world, even among them who are called Christians, — “Gratum opus agricolis;” — a work exceedingly acceptable and obliging to all sorts of men, who, if not given up to open atheism, would rejoice in nothing more than in a reconciliation between the rule of their consciences and their lusts, that they might sin freely, without trouble or remorse. To this end, having learned the inclinations and temptations of men from their private confessions, and finding it a thing neither possible in itself, nor at all conducive to their own interest, to endeavor their reformation by and recovery to the fixed, stable rule of truth and duty, they have, by their false glosses, subtle distinctions, and refined imaginations, made it to justify and countenance them in the highest abominations, and in ways leading constantly to the practice of them.

And there is nothing, in their whole course, which faithful interpreters of the mind of God ought more carefully to avoid, than a falling in any instance into that evil which these men have made it their design to promote and pursue. The world, indeed, seems to be weary of the just, righteous, holy ways of God, and of that exactness in walking according to his institutions and commands which it will be one day known that he does require. But the way to put a stop to this declension, is not by accommodating the commands of God to the corrupt courses and ways of men. The truths of God and the holiness of his precepts must be pleaded and defended, though the world dislike them here and perish hereafter. His law must not be made to lackey after the wills of men, nor be dissolved by vain interpretations, because they complain they cannot, indeed because they will not, comply with it. Our Lord Jesus Christ came not to destroy the law and the prophets, but to fulfill them, and to supply men with spiritual strength to fulfill them also. It is evil to break the least commandment; but there is a great aggravation of that evil in them that shall teach men so to do. And this cannot be done but by giving such expositions of them as by virtue whereof men may think themselves freed from an obligation to that obedience which indeed they do require. Wherefore, though some should say now, as they did of old, concerning any command of God, "Behold, what a weariness it is! and what profit is it to keep his ordinances?" yet the law of God is not to be changed to give them relief. We are therefore, in this matter, to have no consideration of the present course of the world, nor of the weariness of professors in the ways of strict obedience. The sacred truth and will of God in all his commands is singly and sincerely to be inquired after.

I proceed with the Priesthood of Christ and its necessary consequents:

The Nature of the Priesthood of Christ by John Owen p 149-155 (180-87 online)

http://www.prayermeetings.org/files/John_Owen/Hebrews_Introduction_Observations.pdf

It is so in like manner with his prophetic office. God raised him up from among his brethren to be the prophet of his church, to reveal his will; and by him he spake to us. See Exposition on Hebrews 1:1, 2. His whole work as a prophet is to reveal the will of God, and therein to teach and instruct us. Men, therefore, are the immediate object of the powers, duties, and acts of this office.

And that which we further observe from hence is this, that there is no one thing that the Lord Christ acts immediately towards the church, but that it belongs unto and proceeds from one or the other of these powers or offices. If anyone be otherwise minded, let him prove the contrary by instances, if he be able. The Scripture affordeth none to that purpose. It followeth hence, therefore, that God is the object of the actings of Christ in his priestly office. For if he be not so, then, — (1.) There is no room nor place in his whole mediation for any such office, seeing all he performs towards us belongs unto the other. And therefore those by whom this is denied do upon the matter at length contend that indeed he hath no such office. And if this be so, — (2.) It doth not belong unto Christ as mediator to deal with God in any of the concerns of his people; for he must do so as a priest, or not at all. And then we have no advocate with the Father; which is utterly abhorrent from the common faith of Christianity. And this absurd supposition shall be afterwards removed by express testimonies to the contrary. Take away this fundamental principle, that Christ as mediator deals with God for us, and you overthrow the faith of all Christians. (3.) This would render the whole instruction intended for the church in the Aaronical priesthood and sacrifices useless and impertinent, nothing of the like nature being signified thereby; for that, as we have proved, openly respected God in the first place. And on this supposition the accommodation of it unto the priesthood of Christ by our apostle would be altogether vain. (4.) It is contrary to the common notion of the nature of the priesthood amongst mankind; for none yet ever owned such an office in things religious, but apprehended the use of it to be in doing the things with God that were to be done on the behalf of men. And hereby, as was observed, would the faith and consolation of all believers, which are resolved into what the Lord Christ hath done and doth for them with God, be utterly overthrown.

5. Again; the same truth is undeniably evinced from the nature of sacerdotal acts and duties. These are, as it is stated by common consent, those two of oblation and intercession. And both these are expressly ascribed unto the Lord Jesus Christ as he is a high priest, and nothing else immediately as he is so. The actual help and aid which he gives us is the fruit and effect of these sacerdotal actings. The sole inquiry, therefore, in this matter is, What or who is the immediate object of oblation and intercession? Is this God, or man? Did Christ offer himself as a sacrifice unto God, or unto us? Doth he intercede with God for us, or with us only? A man would suppose that the absurdity of these imaginations, so expressly contrary to the Scripture and the common sense of mankind, should even shame our adversaries from the defense of them. But they are not so obtuse or so barren in their invention as to want [lack] evasions at any time. “Quid si manifesto tenentur? anguilla sicut elabentur.” They therefore tell us, “It is true, if you take oblation and intercession in their proper sense, then God, and none other, must be their immediate object; but as they are ascribed unto Christ they are used only metaphorically, and do indeed denote such actions of his towards the church as have some allusion unto oblation and intercession properly so called.” But I say, — (1.) There was never such a metaphor heard of before, as that one thing should be called by the name of another, between which there is no peculiar similitude, as there is none between offering unto God and giving grace unto men. (2.) Who hath given them this authority to turn what they please into metaphors; by which means they may, when they have a mind to it, make an allegory, and consequently a fable, of the whole Scripture? It is expressly affirmed that the Lord Christ is a high priest. Nothing is in the notion of that office, taken properly, that is unworthy of him, no more than in those of king and prophet. No intimation is given us, directly or indirectly, that this office is ascribed unto him metaphorically. As such he is said to make oblation and intercession to God, — the things wherein the exercise of the priestly office doth consist. What confidence is it, now, to deny that he doth these things properly and immediately with God as a high priest, by an arbitrary introduction of a metaphor which the Scripture giveth not the least countenance unto!

6. We might, moreover, plead the use and end of the sacrifice which he offered as a high priest, which was to make expiation of sin and atonement for it. But because we differ with our adversaries about the sense of these expressions also, I shall not make use of them as the medium of an argument until the precise signification of them be evinced and determined; which shall be done, God willing, in our consideration of the nature of the sacrifice itself. Wherefore I shall close this head of our disputation with some express testimonies confirming the truth in hand.

To this purpose speaks our apostle, Hebrews 8:3, "For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices: wherefore it is of necessity that this man have somewhat also to offer." The things which the high priests had of old to offer as gifts and sacrifices, they offered unto God. This I presume is unquestionable; for God commanded them that all their gifts and sacrifices should be offered unto him upon his altar, consecrated for that purpose. To have done otherwise had been the highest idolatry. But Christ, if he be a high priest, must, saith the apostle, of necessity have somewhat to offer, as they did, and after the same manner; that is, unto God. If this he did not, there is nothing of reason or sense in the apostle's inference; for what necessity can there be, because the high priests of old did offer sacrifices to God, that then if Jesus Christ be a high priest he must do something of another kind? They have nothing to say upon these instances, but to confess the words and deny the thing, and then tell us that they agree to the words, but differ about their interpretation, — the interpretation they suggest being a direct denial of the thing itself; whereof more afterwards.

To the same purpose speaks our apostle, chap. 5:1; which place hath been before vindicated, and is so fully in the ensuing Exposition, whereunto the reader is referred. And this consideration discovereth much of the general nature, use, and end, of the priesthood of Christ, which we inquire after; for it is hence evident that it is the power, office, and duty, whereby he makes an interposition between God and us, — that is, with God on our behalf. And there are two general ends of this interposition, as the Scripture testifies, and which the common faith of Christians relies upon. And these are, — (1.) "Averruncatio mali," the removal of all sorts of evil from us, every thing that did or might befall us in a way of evil, hurt, damage, or punishment, on the account of our sins and apostasy from God. (2.) "Acquisitio boni," the procuring and obtaining for us everything that is good, with respect unto our reconciliation to God, peace with him, and the enjoyment of him. And these are intended in the general acts of his office; for, — first, his oblation principally and firstly respects the making atonement for sin, and the turning away of the wrath that was due unto us as sinners; wherein he was Jesus, the deliverer, who saves us from the wrath to come. And this is all that is included in the nature of oblation as absolutely considered: But as the oblation of Christ was founded on the covenant before described, it had a further prospect. For with respect unto the obedience which therein he yielded unto God, according to the terms of that covenant, it was not only satisfactory, but meritorious; that is, by the sacrifice of himself he did not only turn away the wrath which was due unto us, but also obtained for us "eternal redemption," with all the grace and glory thereunto belonging. There remains nothing to be done on our behalf, after the once offering of himself, whereby he "perfected for ever them that are sanctified," but only the actual application of these good things unto us, or our actual instating in the possession of them. Hereunto is his intercession, the second duty of his priestly office, designed; the especial nature whereof must be elsewhere declared and vindicated.

7. For the further clearing of the whole subject of our inquiry, we must yet consider both the call of Christ unto this office, his actual inauguration, and his discharge of it, both when and where; for all these belong unto its nature.

The call of the Lord Christ unto this office is expressly asserted by our apostle, chap. 5:4-6, "And no man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron. So also Christ glorified not himself to be made an high priest; but he that said unto him, Thou art my Son, today have I begotten thee. As he saith also in another place, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.” If the reader desire to see the particulars wherein the call of Christ consisted, its comparison with the call of Aaron, preference before it, or exaltation above it, he may consult our Exposition on that place, from whence I shall repeat nothing here. In general I say, that the call of Christ unto the office of the priesthood consisted in that eternal covenant which was between the Father and him concerning his undertaking the work of our recovery and salvation, which I have at large before described. He was not made a priest by virtue of any vocal command, as Aaron was called by a command given unto Moses unto that purpose, Exodus 28:1; nor by virtue of any established law, which gave the posterity of Aaron their succession to that office; but he was called by an immediate transaction between him and the Father before the world was. This call of his, therefore, may be considered either with respect unto designation or manifestation. As it intends the designation of Christ unto his office, so it is expressed in these words of God the Father to him, “Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee;” which what they import in the covenant transactions between the Father and the Son hath been before declared. The manifestation of this call consisted originally in the first promise given concerning his incarnation and undertaking of the work of our redemption, Genesis 3:15. With respect hereunto he says, Psalm 40:7 — “Then said I, Lo, I come: in the volume of the book,” — that is, “in the beginning of the sacred volume,” as our apostle renders it, ἐν κεφαλίδι, “in the head” of it, Hebrews 10:7; that is, in that first promise, recorded in the beginning of the Scripture, wherein his own consent was tacitly included, and the virtue of his office and sacrifice established, whence he became the “Lamb slain from the foundation of the world.” And more need not be added in this place concerning this call of Christ unto the office of the priesthood.

8. His actual inauguration into it, and susception of it, is next to be considered. And he was vested with all his offices from his conception and nativity. There was no time wherein he was, as to his human nature, and was not the king, priest, and prophet of his church; for he received all his offices by the unction of the Spirit, when God “anointed him with the oil of gladness above his fellows.” And this was done fundamentally in his incarnation, when he was conceived and sanctified by the Holy Spirit, communicated unto him not by measure. And so he was born “Christ the Lord,” Luke 2:11. He was born one anointed by the Holy Ghost, Lord, and consequently priest and prophet, — all which offices were communicated by unction. Together with those graces, gifts, and abilities, which were necessary to their discharge, right, title, and authority for their exercise in their proper seasons were conveyed unto him thereby. [this is more proof that what Jesus came down from heaven to do, he will do! Mt1:21, not maybe if man so decides to cooperate. To say otherwise is to say that Jesus failed in his mission which is blaspheme. If Christ be made wisdom for us then to say that he failed in his mission to save all and everyone that he allegedly died for is to say that his way of salvation is unwise or not wise enough.] And in these two doth all office and power consist.

The actual exercise of all the offices of Christ was regulated by the will of the Father, his own wisdom and compliance therewithal, with the order and nature of the things themselves about which he was to be conversant therein. He was anointed to be the great prophet of the church from the womb; yet he entered not upon the public discharge of that office until after his baptism, when his commission and call thereunto were proclaimed from heaven, Matthew 3:17. So also was he “Christ the Lord,” — that is, the king of the church; yet began he not visibly to exercise that office in his own person until the mission of his apostles with authority from him to preach the gospel, Matthew 10. So had God disposed of things, and so did the nature of the work which he had to do require. And as to his priestly office, he neither did nor could enter upon the exercise and discharge of it until the end of his prophetical ministry; for he could not do it but by his death, which was to put an end unto that ministry here on the earth, excepting only the instructions which he gave to his apostles after his resurrection, Acts 1:3.

But to propose the whole matter somewhat more distinctly, there are three things that concurred unto the inauguration of the Lord Christ unto this office, or there were degrees of it: — (1.) His real unction by the Holy Ghost with an all-fullness of gifts and graces, at his incarnation. This whole work of the Spirit, with its effects, I have elsewhere at large discussed, and shall not further insist upon it. (2.) His declarative unction at his baptism, when the Spirit descended upon him, and filled him with power for the exercise of all the gifts and graces he had received for the discharge of his whole office. [Christ was given the tools to do what he came to do. This connotes divine power toward the infallible accomplishment of his eternal purpose and it is thus it is being willingly stupid to say that Christ might do it if man cooperates thus defeating the whole purpose of Christ having these gifts and powers from the Father.] (3.) Unto both these there succeeded an especial dedication to the actual performance of the duties of this office. And this was his own act, which he had power for from God. This himself expresseth, John 17:19, “I sanctify,” that is, I consecrate or dedicate, “myself.” For of real sanctification, by purification and further infusion of grace, he was not capable; and the communication of real grace to the human nature was the work of the Holy Ghost; he did not so sanctify himself. But he did dedicate, separate, and consecrate himself unto God, in the discharge of this office. It doth also respect the sacrifice which he was to offer: ‘I consecrate and give up myself to be a sacrifice.’ But he who was to be the sacrifice was also to be the sacrificer. This consecration, therefore, respected his person, and what he was to do as the sacrificer, no less than what he was to suffer as a sacrifice; for this also was necessary, and every high priest was so consecrated.

In that prayer, therefore, of our Savior, John 17, do I place the beginning and entrance of the exercise of his priestly office. Whatever he did after this unto the moment of his death belonged principally thereunto. Sundry things, I confess, fell in occasionally afterwards, wherein he acted his prophetical office in bearing witness unto the truth; but the scope of all his 187 ensuing actions and passions respect his priestly office only: for although his sacrifice, precisely considered, consisted in his actual offering of himself on the cross, yet his sacerdotal actings with reference unto it are not to be confined thereunto. And what these actings were, without an inquiry into the nature of his sacrifice, which I have designed for the subject of another discourse, I shall briefly recount.

The three offices of Christ (Kingly, Prophetic and Priestly), particularly his priestly office with his intercession for the saints, perfecting forever their salvation, those who are being sanctified - that is, his saving work is not up to man's will but God's and is therefore perfected in its accomplishment; all the good things in the covenant will infallibly be applied to the elect - it is certain for those for whom he died, thus making his atonement limited in scope as opposed to universal. Other subjects covered: perseverance of the saints, the spring of all gracious communications to the saints. The purpose of this excerpt by John Owen is to cement in your mind the certainty of the salvation of God's elect as opposed to the Arminians' notion that God intends no specific persons to be saved but that whosoever chooses to be saved will be saved which leaves open the possibility that none might be saved if no one chooses Christ, which they hold to. But that's not the case due to God's eternal counsel of his will, his good pleasure that is always accomplished, that he determined to save some, namely, the elect or the remnant, i.e., his church. So, because Christ liveth forever, we will live; i.e., not die eternal death but be saved, hence, infallibly saved. Life of the Son by eternal generation (see pg1289). The false way of Catholicism.

Commentary on Hebrews

Ver. 23-25. — And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death: but this [man], because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood. Wherefore he is able to save them also to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

The apostle in these words proceedeth unto his last argument from the consideration of the priesthood of Christ, as typed and represented by that of Melchisedec. And his intention is still to prove the excellency of it above the Levitical, and of his person above theirs. And in particular, he makes it manifest that “the bringing in of the better hope” did “perfect” or “consummate” all things, which the law could not do.

Obs. X. The salvation of all sincere gospel worshippers is secured by the actings of the Lord Christ in the discharge of his priestly office. [That is a huge point! For if Christ does not save all that he desires to save, then he failed in his mission which imperfection to assign to God is blaspheme.]

Obs. XI. Attendance unto the service, the worship of God in the gospel, is required to interest us in the saving care and power of our high priest. — Men deceive themselves, who look to be saved by him, but take no care to come to God in holy worship by him. Nor is it an easy or common thing so to do. All men pretend unto divine worship, some one way, some another, and in words they interpose the name of Christ therein; but really to come to God by him is a matter of another import. Two things are indispensably required thereunto: (1.) That the principle of saving faith be antecedent unto it; (2.) That the exercise of faith be concomitant with it. Unless we are true believers, our worship will not be accepted; and unless we are in the exercise of faith on God through Christ in the performance of it, it gives no glory to him, it brings no advantage unto ourselves.

Obs. XII. Those who endeavor to come unto God any other way but by Christ, as by saints and angels, may do well to consider whether they have any such office in heaven as by virtue whereof they are able to save them to the uttermost. — That this is done by those of the Roman church, cannot with any modesty be denied; yea, it is avowed by them. For when they are charged with the wickedness of their doctrine and practice in this matter, evacuating the mediation of Christ, they reply, that they admit of no mediators of reconciliation with God, but only of intercession. Be it so. Ability to save to the utmost is here ascribed unto our high priest upon the account of his intercession. A respect unto his oblation, whereby he made reconciliation, is included; but it is the efficacy of his intercession that is expressly regarded: for being “reconciled by his death, we shall be saved by his life,” Romans 5:10. He, therefore, alone is the mediator of intercession, who is able, by virtue of his office, to save us to the utmost, through that intercession of his. [Heb 7:25]

Those by whom they choose to go to God are able to save them, or they are not. If they are not, is it not the greatest folly and madness imaginable, whilst we seek after salvation, to set Him aside on any occasion, in any one instance, who can save us to the utmost, and betake ourselves unto them who cannot save us at all? If they are able to save us in any sense, it is either by virtue of some office and office-power that they are invested withal in heaven, (as ministers are, in the discharge of their office, said to “save them that hear them,” 1 Timothy 4:16; that is, ministerially and instrumentally,) or without any such office. If they can do so without any office, they can do more than Jesus Christ can do; for he is able to do it by virtue of his office only. And if it might have been otherwise, what need was there that Christ should undertake and discharge this office of the priesthood, and that our apostle should so labor to prove the excellency of this his office, only to satisfy us that he is able to save them that come to God by him? If they do it by virtue of any office committed to them, let it be named what it is. Are they priests in heaven for ever after the order of Melchisedec? Dishonor enough is done unto Christ, by making any sacrificing priests on the earth, as they do in their mass; but to make interceding priests in heaven also, is the highest reproach unto him. Or are they the kings or prophets of the church? or under what name or title is this power intrusted with them? Such imaginations are most foreign from true Christian religion. A holy, painful minister on the earth can do much more towards the saving of the souls of men, than any saint or angel in heaven. For the work of doing it ministerially, by the dispensation of the word, is committed unto them in the way of office; but office in the church beareth none in heaven, but only Jesus Christ.

And what is the reason why men should so readily close with other means, other mediators of intercession, to go to God by them? For when they pray to saints, although they should only pray unto them to intercede for them, as some of them pretend, (however openly and manifestly against their express and avowed practice,) yet do they go to God by them. For to speak of any religious prayer, and yet not to look on it in general as a going or coming to God, is a fond and senseless imagination.

Wherefore, whenever they pray to saints, — as most of them do more than to Jesus Christ, — their design is to go to God by them. But what is it that should induce them hereunto? Our Lord Christ hath told us that “he is the way;” and that “no man cometh unto the Father but by him,” John 14:6. What reason can any man give why he should not believe him, but, although he hath said that “no man cometh unto the Father but by him,” should yet attempt to go another way? Have others more power in these things than he, so as it is advisable on that account to make our application unto them? Where is it said of any saints or angels, or all of them together, that they are able to save to the uttermost all that come to God by them? or where is any one word spoken of their power or interest in heaven unto that purpose? But it will be said, ‘That we may be relieved and saved, we stand not in need of power only, but of love, pity, and compassion: and although the saints have less ability than Christ, yet they may have more of love and compassion for us. For some of them, it may be, were our kindred, or progenitors, or countrymen, or such as may have an especial kindness for us: especially the blessed Virgin, and other female saints, are, by their natural constitution as well as their grace,’ (who would not think so?) ‘mightily inclined unto pity and compassion.’ And indeed they are marvellous things which some of them tell us concerning the blessed Virgin in this case, and her condescension in the pursuit of her love and pity. But yet this imagination is the highest pitch of folly and ingratitude. Certainly nothing can more stir up the indignation of God, than to have any creatures in heaven or earth, or all together, equaled in love and compassion to Jesus Christ. He that doth not know that there is an unparalleled eminency of these in him, who is not in some measure instructed in the cause and effect of them, knows no more of the gospel than a Jew. There is more love, pity, and compassion, in Christ Jesus, towards every poor sinner that comes unto God by him, than all the saints in heaven are able to comprehend. And if kindred or alliance may be of consideration in this matter, he is more nearly related unto us than father or mother, or wife or children, or all together; we being not only “bone of his bones, and flesh of his flesh,” but so joined to him as to be “one spirit” with him.

But it will yet be said, ‘That it is on none of these considerations that men choose to go unto God by other mediators of intercession; only whereas the Lord Christ is so great, and so gloriously exalted at the right hand of the Majesty on high, they dare not always presumptuously intrude into his glorious presence; and therefore they make use of the saints, who are more cognate unto us, and not clothed with such terrible majesty. And in going unto God by the friends of Christ, they please him as well as if they went immediately by himself.’ Ans. (1.) He is an unbeliever, unto whom the glorious exaltation of the Lord Christ is a discouragement from going unto him, or by him unto God on the throne of grace. For all the glory, power, and majesty of Christ in heaven, are proposed unto believers, to encourage them to come unto him, and to put their trust in him. But this is the talk of men who, whatever devotion they pretend unto, indeed know nothing really of what it is to pray, to believe, to trust in Christ, or by him to draw near with boldness unto the throne of grace. See Hebrews 4:14-16. (2.) All the glory, power, and majesty of Jesus Christ, as exalted in heaven as our mediator, are but means effectually to exert and exercise his love and compassion towards us: “He liveth for ever to make intercession for us.” But we proceed.

Fourthly, The close of this verse gives us the special reasons and confirmation of all the efficacy that the apostle hath assigned unto the priesthood of Christ: ζων εις το εντμυχανειν υπερ αυτων, — “Always living to make intercession for them.” And three things must be considered in these words: —

1. The state and condition of Christ as a high priest: “he liveth always,” or “forever.” 2. What he doth as a high priest in that state and condition: he “maketh intercession for us.” 3. The connection of these things, their mutual regard, or the relation of the work of Christ unto his state and condition; the one is the end of the other: “he liveth for ever to make intercession for us.”

First, As to his state and condition, “he liveth for ever.” He is always living. The Lord Christ, in his divine person, hath a threefold life in heaven. The one he lives in himself; the other for himself; and the last for us.

1. The eternal life of God in his divine nature. This he liveth in himself: “As the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given unto the Son to have life in himself,” John 5:26. He hath given it him by eternal generation [see pg 1289], in a communication unto him of all the divine properties. And he that hath “life in himself,” a life independent on any other, he is the “living one,” the “living God.” No creature can have life in himself; for “in God we live, and move, and have our being.” He is hereby “Alpha and Omega, the first and the last,” — the beginning and end of all, Revelation 1:11; because he is the “living one,” verse 18. And this life of Christ is the foundation of the efficacy of all his mediatory actings, namely, that he was, in his own divine person, the living God, Acts 20:28; 1 Corinthians 2:8; 1 John 3:16. But this is not the immediate cause of his mediatory effects, nor is it here intended.

2. There is a life which he liveth for himself; namely, a life of inconceivable glory in his human nature, He led a mortal life in this world, a life obnoxious unto misery and death, and died accordingly. This life is now changed into that of immortal, eternal glory. “Henceforth he dieth no more, death hath no more power over him.” And not only so, but this life of his is unto him the cause of, and is attended with, all that ineffable glory which he now enjoys in heaven. This life he lives for himself; it is his reward, the glory and honor that he is crowned withal All the endowments, all the enjoyments, and the whole eternal exaltation of the human nature in the person of Christ, belong unto this life of glory. And the glorious exaltation of that individual human nature which the Son of God assumed, far above all principalities and powers, and every name that is named, in this world, or the world to come, is the principal part of the design of infinite wisdom in the work of the new creation. But neither is this life here intended.

3. The Lord Christ lives a mediatory life in heaven, a life for us. So saith our apostle, he was made a “priest after the power of an endless life;” whereof we have treated before. He lives as king, prophet, and priest, of the church. So he describes himself, Revelation 1:18, “I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore; and have the keys of hell and of death.” As he died for us, so he liveth for us; and is intrusted with all power over the church’s adversaries, for its good. As he died for us, so he liveth for us in heaven; and therefore he tells us, that “because he liveth we shall live also,” John 14:19. Now this life differeth not essentially from that life of glory in the human nature which he liveth for himself in heaven; only it denoteth one especial end of it, and that only for a season. The Lord Christ will have the life in himself, the divine life, unto all eternity; and so also will he have the life of glory in the human nature; but he shall cease to live this mediatory life for us when the work of his mediation is accomplished, 1 Corinthians 15:28; but he shall lead this life always for us, until the whole work committed unto him be accomplished, and shall lead it as a life of glory in himself unto eternity.

Obs. XIII. It is a matter of strong consolation unto the church, that Christ lives in heaven for us.

It is a spring of unspeakable joy unto all true believers, that he lives a life of immortality and glory in and for himself in heaven. Who can call to mind all the miseries which he underwent in this world, all the reproach and scorn that was cast upon him by his enemies of all sorts, all the wrath that the whole world is yet filled withal against him, and not be refreshed, rejoiced, transported, with a spiritual view by faith of all that majesty and glory which he is now in the eternal possession of? So was it with Stephen, Acts 7:56, And therefore, in all the appearances and representations which he hath made of himself since his ascension into heaven, he hath manifested his present glory, Acts 26:13; Revelation 1:13-18. And the due consideration hereof cannot but be a matter of unspeakable refreshment unto all that love him in sincerity.

Secondly, But herein lieth the life of the church's consolation, that he continues to live a mediatory life in heaven for us also. It is not, I fear, so considered nor so improved as it ought to be. That Christ died for us, all who own the gospel profess in words; though some so explain their faith, or rather their infidelity, as to deny its proper use, and to evacuate its proper ends. That so he lived for us here in this world, as that his life was some way or other unto our advantage, at least thus far, that he could not have died if he had not lived before, all men will grant, even those by whom the principal end of this life, namely, to fulfill the law for us, is peremptorily denied; but that Christ now lives a life of glory in heaven, that most men think is for himself alone. But the text speaks to the contrary: "He liveth for ever to make intercession for us." Neither is this the only end of his present mediatory life in heaven, though this only be here expressed. Should I undertake to show the ends of the present mediatory life of Christ for the church, it would be too great and long a decursion from the text. However, the whole of the work of this life of his may be reduced into these three heads: 1. His immediate actings towards the church itself, which respects his prophetic office. 2. His actings for the church in the world, by virtue and power of his kingly office. 3. His actings with God the Father in their behalf, in the discharge of his sacerdotal office.

1. The first consisteth in his sending and giving the Holy Ghost unto the church. He lives forever to send the Holy Spirit unto his disciples. Without this constant effect of the present mediatory life of Christ the being of the church would fail, it could not subsist one moment. For hereon depends, (1.) All saving light to understand the word of God, or spiritual things in a spiritual manner; wherein he continueth the exercise of his prophetic office: (2.) All habitual grace, whereby the souls of the elect are quickened and regenerated: (3.) All supplies of actual grace; which the whole church hath from him every moment, and without which it could yield no obedience unto God: (4.) All spiritual gifts, the sole foundation and means of the church's edification, and without which it can have no real benefit by any gospel ordinances or administrations: (5.) All comfort and all consolation, which in all variety of occurrences the church doth stand in need of: which things I have elsewhere spoken unto at large.

2. His actings by virtue of his mediatory life for the church in the world are also various; wherein he exerciseth his kingly power, that power which is given unto him as he is "head over all things unto the church," Ephesians 1:22. Hence is the whole preservation of the church in this world by glorious effects of divine wisdom and power. Hence doth proceed the present controls that are given unto its adversaries. And hence will proceed their future destruction; for he must reign until all his enemies be made his footstool. In the exercise of this life, wherein the keys of hell and of death are committed unto him, doth he put forth his mighty power over the world, Satan, death, the grave, and hell, for the eternal security and salvation of the church. Did he not live this life for us in heaven, neither the whole church nor any one member of it could be preserved one moment from utter ruin. But hereby are all their adversaries continually disappointed.

3. By virtue of this life he acts with God on the behalf of the church. And the only way whereby he doth this, in the discharge of his priestly office, is expressed here in the text, "He liveth for ever to make intercession for them." Now this expression containing the whole of what the Lord Christ, as the high priest of the church, doth now with God for them, and whereon the certainty of our salvation doth depend, it must with some diligence be inquired into.

Expositors, especially those of the Roman church, inquire with many disputes into the external form of the intercession of Christ, as namely, whether it be oral and vocal, or no. And they produce many testimonies out of the ancients upon the one side and the other. And great weight is laid by some on the difference and determination of it. For whereas Ribera grants that the dispute is more about words and the manner of expression, than the matter itself; Tena affirms that what he says is most false. And it is evident that the testimonies produced by themselves out of the ancients, as Chrysostom, Theophylact, Ambrose, Austin, and so to Rupertus and Thomas, are expressly contradictory to one another. Now, although our principal concernment lieth in the internal form and efficacy of the intercession of our high priest, rather than in the outward manner of it, yet, so far as that also is revealed, we may inquire into it. And we shall find that the true stating of it tends unto the encouragement and establishment of our faith. And the things ensuing may be observed unto this purpose: —

(1.) The Socinian figment about the nature of the intercession of Christ is of no consideration; for, by a strange violence offered unto the nature of things, and the signification of words, they contend that this intercession is nothing but the power of Christ to communicate actually all good things, the whole effect of his mediation, unto believers. That Christ hath such a power is no way questioned; but that this power in the exercise of it is his intercession, is a most fond imagination. That which casts them on this absurd conception of things, is their hatred of the priestly office of Christ, as exercised towards God on our behalf. But I have elsewhere sufficiently disputed against this fiction.

(2.) The intercession of Christ was under the old testament typed out three ways: [1.] By the living fire that was continually on the altar. Herewith were all sacrifices to be kindled and burned; which thence were called μυγναι, "firings." [But this principally typified his prayers; when he "offered himself unto God through the eternal Spirit;" which he did with "strong cries and supplications," or "intercessions," Hebrews 5:7. Hereby, and the actings of the eternal Spirit therein, he kindled and fired in himself a" sacrifice to God of a sweet-smelling savor," Ephesians 5:2. 658 [2.] [By the dymit, or "daily sacrifice" of morning and evening for the whole people. See the institution of it, Exodus 29:38-42. For although that sacrifice had in it the nature of an expiatory oblation, because it was by blood, yet the principal end of it was to make continual application of the great, solemn, annual expiation, unto the consciences of the people. [3.] By the incense that was burned in the sanctuary. And this was of two sorts: 1st. That wherewith the high priest entered once a-year into the most holy place, on the day of expiation. For he might not enter in, yea, he was to die if he did, unless in his entrance he filled the place and covered the ark and mercy-seat with a cloud of incense, Leviticus 16:12, 13; — which incense was to be fired with burning coals from the altar of burnt-offerings. So did our high priest: he filled heaven at his entrance with the sweet savor of his intercession, kindled with the coals of that eternal Fire wherewith he offered himself unto God. 2dly. The incense that was burned every day in the sanctuary by the priests in their courses. This represented prayer, Psalm 141:2; and was always accompanied with it, Luke 1:9, 10. This also was a type of the continual efficacy of the intercession of Christ, Revelation 8:4. But the former was the most solemn representation of it. In that anniversary sacrifice, whereof we must treat afterwards at large, there was atonement made for all the sins and transgressions of the people, Leviticus 16:21. And it was consummated by carrying some of the blood, as a representation of it, into the most holy place, sprinkling it before the ark of the covenant and the mercy-seat. This was done but once in the year. To keep this in remembrance, and to make application of the benefits of it unto the consciences of the worshippers, the daily sacrifice was appointed. So doth the intercession of Christ make continual application of his great sacrifice and atonement, whence it derives its efficacy. And as the fire on the altar kindled all the renewed sacrifices, which were to be repeated and multiplied, because of their weakness and imperfection; so doth the intercession of Christ make effectual the one perfect sacrifice which he offered once for all, in the various applications of it unto the consciences of believers, Hebrews 10:2.

(3.) The actual intercession of Christ in heaven, as the second act of his sacerdotal office, is a fundamental article of our faith, and a principal foundation of the church's consolation. So is it asserted to be, 1 John 2:1, 2. And it is expressed by our apostle as that whereby the death of Christ is made effectual unto us, Romans 8:34; for it compriseth the whole care and all the actings of Christ, as our high priest, with God in the behalf of the church. This, therefore, is the immediate spring of all gracious communications unto us. For hereby doth he act his own care, love, and compassion; and from thence do we receive all mercy, all supplies of grace and consolation needful unto our duties, temptations, and trials. Hereon depends all our encouragement to make our application unto God, to come with boldness of faith unto the throne of grace, Hebrews 4:15, 16, 10:21, 22. Wherefore, whatever apprehensions we may attain of the manner of it, the thing itself is the center of our faith, hope, and consolation.

(4.) It is no way unworthy or unbecoming the human nature of Christ, in its glorious exaltation, to pray unto God. It was in and by the human nature that the Lord Christ exercised and executed all the duties of his offices whilst he was on earth; and he continueth to discharge what remains of them in the same nature still. And however that nature be glorified, it is the same essentially that it was when he was in this world. To ascribe another kind of nature unto him, under pretense of a more divine glory, is to deny his being, and to substitute a fancy of our own in his room. So, then, the human nature of Christ, however exalted and glorified, is human nature still, subsisting in dependence on God and subjection unto him. Hence God gives him new revelations now, in his glorified condition, Revelation 1:1. With respect hereunto he acted of old as the angel of the covenant, with express prayers for the church, Zechariah 1:12, 13. So the command given him to intercede by the way of petition, request, or prayer, Psalm 2:8, "Ask of me," respects his state of exaltation at the right hand of God, when he was "declared to be the Son of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead," Psalm 2:7, 8; Romans 1:4. And the incense which he offereth with the prayers of the saints, Revelation 8:3, 4, is no other but his own intercession, whereby their prayers are made acceptable unto God.

(5.) This praying of Christ at present is no other but such as may become him who sits at the right hand of the Majesty on high. There must, therefore, needs be a great difference, as to the outward manner, between his present intercession in heaven and his praying whilst he was on the earth, especially at some seasons. For being encompassed here with temptations and difficulties, he cast himself at the feet of God, with “strong cries, tears, and supplications,” Hebrews 5:7. This would not become his present glorious state; nor is he liable or exposed unto any of the causes or occasions of that kind of treating with God. And yet at another time whilst he was in this world, he gave us the best estimate and representation of his present intercession that we are able to comprehend. And this was in his prayer recorded John 17. For therein his confidence in God, his union in and with him, the declaration of his will and desires, are all expressed in such a manner as to give us the best understanding of his present intercession. For a created nature can rise no higher, to express an interest in God, with a oneness of mind and will, than is therein declared. And as the prayers with cries and tears, when he offered himself unto God, were peculiarly typed by the fire on the altar; so was this solemn prayer represented by that cloud of incense wherewith the high priest covered the ark and the mercy-seat at his entrance into the most holy place. In the virtue of this holy cloud of incense did he enter the holy place not made with hands. Or we may apprehend its relation unto the types in this order: His prayer, John 17, was the preparation of the sweet spices whereof the incense was made and compounded, Exodus 30:34. His sufferings that ensued thereon were as the breaking and bruising of those spices; wherein all his graces had their most fervent exercise, as spices yield their strongest savor under their bruising. At his entrance into the holy place this incense was fired with coals from the altar; that is, the efficacy of his oblation, wherein he had offered himself unto God through the eternal Spirit, rendered his prayer as incense covering the ark and mercy-seat, — that is, procuring the fruits of the atonement made before God. [Amen!! In other words the office of Christ was not made for Him to sit back and just make salvation available if man decides he wants it; God purposely and actively works, using this means, his office of priest, to atone for sin, intercede for those for whom he died, procure those good things necessary for man's eternal blessedness and to apply it to them for that end without fail. Otherwise he fails at his task as a high priest which is impossible. See point 7 & 8 below]

(6.) It must be granted that there is no need of the use of words in the immediate presence of God. God needs not our words whilst we are here on earth, as it were absent from him; for he is present with us, and all things are naked and open before him. But we need the use of them for many reasons, which I have elsewhere declared. But in the glorious presence of God, when we shall behold him as the Lord Christ doth, in the most eminent manner, face to face, it cannot be understood what need or use we can have of words to express ourselves unto God, in prayers or praises. And the souls of men, in their separate state and condition, can have no use of voice or words; yet are they said to cry and pray with a loud voice, because they do so virtually and effectually, Revelation 6:9, 10. However, I will not determine what outward transactions are necessary, unto the glory of God in this matter, before the angels and saints that are about his throne. For there is yet a church-state in heaven, wherein we have communion, Hebrews 12:22-24. What solemn outward, and, as it were, visible transactions of worship, are required thereunto, we know not. And, it may be, the representation of God's throne, and his worship, Revelation 4:5, wherein the “Lamb in the midst of the throne” hath the principal part, may not belong only unto what is done in the church here below. And somewhat yet there is which shall cease, and not be any more after the day of judgment, 1 Corinthians 15:26, 28.

(7.) It must be granted, that the virtue, efficacy, and prevalency of the intercession of the Lord Christ, depends upon and flows from his oblation and sacrifice. This we are plainly taught from the types of it of old. For the incense and carrying of blood into the holy place, after the expiatory sacrifice, the great type of his oblation of himself, did both of them receive their efficacy and had respect unto the sacrifice offered without. Besides, it is expressly said that the Lord Christ, “by the one offering of himself, obtained for us eternal redemption,” and “forever perfected them that are sanctified.” Wherefore nothing remains for his intercession but the application of the fruits of his oblation unto all them for whom he offered himself in sacrifice, according as their conditions and occasions do require. Wherefore, —

(8.) The safest conception and apprehension that we can have of the intercession of Christ, as to the manner of it, is his continual appearance for us in the presence of God, by virtue of his office as the “high priest over the house of God,” representing the efficacy of his oblation, accompanied with tender care, love, and desires for the welfare, supply, deliverance, and salvation of the church. Three things, therefore, concur hereunto: [1.] The presentation of his person before the throne of God on our behalf, Hebrews 9:24. This renders it sacerdotal. His appearance in person for us is required thereunto. [2.] The representation of his death, oblation, and sacrifice for us; which gives power, life, and efficacy unto his intercession. Thence he appears “in the midst of the throne as a Lamb that had been slain,” Revelation 5:6. Both these are required to make his intercession sacerdotal. But, [3.] Both these do not render it prayer or intercession; for intercession is prayer, 1 Timothy 2:1, Romans:8:26. Wherefore there is in it, moreover, a putting up, a requesting, and offering unto God, of his desires and will for the church, attended with care, love, and compassion, Zechariah 1:12.

Thus far, then, may we proceed: (1.) It is a part of his sacerdotal office; he intercedes for us as the “high priest over the house of God.” (2.) It is the first and principal way whereby he acts and exerciseth his love, compassion, and care towards the church. (3.) That he hath respect therein unto every individual believer, and all their especial occasions: “If any man sin, we have an advocate.” (4.) That there is in his intercession an effectual signification of his will and desire unto his Father; for it hath the nature of prayer in it, and by it he expresseth his dependence upon God. (5.) That it respects the application of all the fruits, effects, and benefits, of his whole mediation unto the church; for this is the formal nature of it, that it is the way and means appointed of God, in the holy dispensation of himself and his grace unto mankind, whereby the continual application of all the benefits of the death of Christ, and all effects of the promises of the covenant, shall be communicated unto us, unto his praise and glory. (6.) The efficacy of this intercession as it is sacerdotal depends wholly on the antecedent oblation and sacrifice of himself; which is therefore as it were represented unto God therein. This is evident from the nature and order of the typical institutions whereby it was prefigured, and whereunto by our apostle it is accommodated. But what belongs unto the manner of the transaction of these things in heaven I know not.

The third thing observed, was the connection of the two things mentioned, or their relation one unto another; namely, the perpetual life of Christ and his intercession: “He liveth for ever to make intercession.” His intercession is the end of his mediatory life; not absolutely, nor only, but principally. He lives to rule his church; he lives to subdue his enemies, for he must reign until they are all made his footstool; he lives to give the Holy Spirit in all his blessed effects unto believers. But because all these things proceed originally by an emanation of power and grace from God, and are given out into the hand of Christ upon his intercession, that may well be esteemed the principal end of his mediatory life. So he speaks expressly concerning that great fruit and effect of this life of him, in sending of the Spirit: "I will pray the Father," I will intercede with him for it, "and he shall send you another comforter," John 14:16. And the power which he exerts in the subduing and destruction of the enemies of his kingdom, is expressly promised unto him upon his intercession for it, Psalm 2:8, 9; for this intercession of Christ is the great ordinance of God for the exercise of his power towards, and the communication of his grace unto the church, unto his praise and glory. So doth our high priest live to make intercession for us. Many things we may from hence observe: —

Obs. XIV. So great and glorious is the work of saving believers unto the utmost, that it is necessary that the Lord Christ should lead a mediatory life in heaven, for the perfecting and accomplishment of it; "He liveth for ever to make intercession for us." — It is generally acknowledged that sinners could not be saved without the death of Christ; but that believers could not be saved without the life of Christ following it, is not so much considered. See Romans 5:10, 8:34, 35, etc.

"For if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God through the death of His Son, much more, having been reconciled, we shall be saved by His life."
Romans 5:10

"Who is he who condemns? It is Christ who died, and furthermore is also risen, who is even at the right hand of God, who also makes intercession for us. ³⁵ Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?" Romans 8:34-35

It is, it may be, thought by some, that when he had declared the name of God, and revealed the whole counsel of his will; when he had given us the great example of love and holiness in his life; when he had fulfilled all righteousness, redeemed us by his blood, and made atonement for our sins by the oblation of himself; confirming his truth and acceptation with God in all these things by his resurrection from the dead, wherein he was "declared to be the Son of God with power;" that he might have now left us to deal for ourselves, and to build our eternal safety on the foundation that he had laid. But, alas! when all this was done, if he had only ascended into his own glory, to enjoy his majesty, honor, and dominion, without continuing his life and office in our behalf, we had been left poor and helpless; so that both we and all our right unto a heavenly inheritance should have been made a prey unto every subtle and powerful adversary. He could, therefore, no otherwise comfort his disciples, when he was leaving this world, but by promising that "he would not leave them orphans," John 14:18; that is, that he would still continue to act for them, to be their patron, and to exercise the office of a mediator and advocate with the Father for them. Without this he knew they must be orphans; that is, such as are not able to defend themselves from injuries, nor secure their own right unto their inheritance.

The sure foundations of our eternal salvation were laid in his death and resurrection. So it is said, that when God laid the foundation of the earth, and placed the corner-stone thereof, "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy," Job 38:7. Although the foundations were only laid, yet that being done by infinite power and wisdom, which would infallibly accomplish and perfect the whole, it was a blessed cause of praise and ascribing glory to God. Yet were the continued actings of the same power required unto the perfection of it. The foundation of the new creation was laid gloriously in the death and resurrection of Christ, so as to be the matter of triumphant praises unto God. [The foundation being the Promise given to Adam in Gen. 3:15] Such is the triumph thereon described, Colossians 2:15; 1 Timothy 3:16.

"Having disarmed principalities and powers, He made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them in it." Col. 2:15

[Notice he triumphed over them. He did not fail of his mission to save all that were given him of the Father. See John 6:39 Christ lost no one! One has to be completely bereft of all reason and filled with much prejudice to deny this fact, that Christ died only for those whom were chosen before time began, i.e., the elect. Anything coming short of this robs God of his glory due to Him.]

"And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness:

God was manifested in the flesh,
Justified in the Spirit,
Seen by angels,
Preached among the Gentiles,
Believed on in the world,
Received up in glory." 1Tim. 3:15

And it may be observed, that as on the laying of the foundation of the earth, all the holy angels triumphed in the expression and demonstration of the infinite wisdom, power, and goodness of God, which they beheld; so in the foundation of the new creation, the apostate angels, who repined at it, and opposed it unto their power, were led captives, carried in triumph, and made the footstool of the glory of Christ. But all this joy and triumph is built on the security of the unchangeable love, care, and power of Jesus Christ, gloriously to accomplish the work which he had undertaken; for had he left it when he left the earth, it had never been finished; for great was that part of the work which yet remained to be perfected.

Neither could the remainder of this work be committed unto any other hand. He employeth others under him in his work, to act ministerially in his name and authority. So he useth the ministry of angels and men. But did not he himself continue to act in them, by them, with them, and without them, the whole work would fail and be disappointed. In one instance of the revelation of the will of God concerning the state of the church, by the opening of the book wherein it was recorded, there was none found worthy in heaven or earth to do it, but the Lamb that was slain, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, Revelation 5:1-7. How much less is any creature able to accomplish all that remains for the saving of the church unto the utmost!

Who can express the opposition that continues to be made unto this work of completing the salvation of believers? What power is able to conflict and conquer the remaining strength of sin, the opposition of Satan and the world? How innumerable are the temptations which every individual believer is exposed unto, each of them in its own nature ruinous and pernicious!

God alone knoweth all things perfectly, in infinite wisdom, and as they are. He alone knows how great a work it is to save believers unto the utmost; what wisdom, what power, what grace and mercy, are requisite thereunto. He alone knows what is meet unto the way and manner of it, so as it may be perfected unto his own glory. His infinite wisdom alone hath found out and determined the glorious and mysterious ways of the emanation of divine power and grace unto this end. Upon all these grounds, unto all these purposes, hath he appointed the continual intercession of the Lord Christ in the most holy place. This he saw needful and expedient, unto the salvation of the church and his own glory. So will he exert his own almighty power unto those ends. The good Lord help me to believe and adore the mystery of it. [Anyone who says as Arminians suppose, that man's salvation is up to man's will in choosing, that that is the efficient cause of his salvation; that if man doesn't make this choice God cannot save him, then that person is against Christ, is denigrating his infinite wisdom and power; i.e., is anti-Christ.]

Obs. XV. The most glorious prospect that we can take into the things that are within the veil, into the remaining transactions of the work of our salvation in the most holy place, is in the representation that is made unto us of the intercession of Christ. — Of old when Moses went into the tabernacle, all the people looked after him, until he entered in; and then the pillar of the cloud stood at the door of it, that none might see into the holy place, Exodus 33:8, 9. And when the Lord Christ was taken into heaven, the disciples looked after him, until a cloud interposed at the tabernacle door, and took him out of their sight, Acts 1:9. And when the high priest was to enter into the tabernacle, to carry the blood of the sacrifice of expiation into the most holy place, no man, be he priest or not, was suffered to enter into or abide in the tabernacle, Leviticus 16:17. Our high priest is now likewise entered into the most holy place, within the second veil, where no eye can pierce unto him. Yet is he there as a high priest; which makes heaven itself to be a glorious temple, and a place as yet for the exercise of an instituted ordinance, such as the priesthood of Christ is. But who can look into, who can comprehend the glories of those heavenly administrations? Some have pretended a view into the orders and service of the whole choir of angels, but have given us only a report of their own imaginations. What is the glory of the throne of God, what the order and ministry of his saints and holy ones, what is the manner of the worship that is given unto Him that sits on the throne, and to the Lamb, the Scripture doth sparingly deliver, as knowing our disability, whilst we are clothed with flesh and inhabit tabernacles of clay, to comprehend aright such transcendent glories. The best and most steady view we can have of these things, is in the account which is given us of the intercession of Christ. For herein we see him by faith yet vested with the office of the priesthood, and continuing in the discharge of it This makes heaven a temple, as was said, and the seat of instituted worship, Revelation 7:15. Hence, in his appearance unto John, he was “clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt about the paps with a golden girdle;” both which were sacerdotal vestments, Revelation 1:13. Herein is God continually glorified; hereby is the salvation of the church continually carried on and consummated. This is the work of heaven, which we may safely contemplate by faith.

Obs. XVI The intercession of Christ is the great evidence of the continuance of his love and care, his pity and compassion, towards his church. — Had he only continued to rule the church as its king and lord, he had manifested his glorious power, his righteousness, and faithfulness. “The scepter of his kingdom is a scepter of righteousness.” But mercy and compassion, love and tenderness, are constantly ascribed unto him as our high priest. See Hebrews 4:15, 5:1, 2. So the great exercise of his sacerdotal office, in laying down his life for us, and expiating our sins by his blood, is still peculiarly ascribed unto his love, Galatians 2:20; Ephesians 5:2; Revelation 1:5. Wherefore these properties of love and compassion belong peculiarly unto the Lord Christ as our high priest. All men, who have any spiritual experience and understanding, will acknowledge how great the concernment of believers is in these things, and how all their consolation in this world depends upon them. He whose soul hath not been refreshed with a due apprehension of the unspeakable love, tenderness, and compassion of Jesus Christ, is a stranger unto the life of faith, and unto all true spiritual consolation. But how shall we know that the Lord Christ is thus tender, loving, and compassionate, that he continueth so to be; or what evidence or testimony have we of it? It is true he was eminently so when he was upon the earth in the days of his flesh, and when he laid down his life for us. We know not what change may be wrought in nature itself, by this investiture with glory; nor how inconsistent these affections are, which in us cannot be separated from some weakness and sorrow, with his present state and dignity. Nor can any solid satisfaction be received by curious contemplations of the nature of glorified affections. But herein we have an infallible demonstration of it, that he yet continueth in the exercise of that office with respect whereunto all these affections of love, pity, and compassion, are ascribed unto him. As our high priest, δύναται συμπαθεῖν, he is “able to suffer,” to “condole with,” to have “compassion on” his poor tempted ones, Hebrews 4:15. All these affections doth he continually act and exercise in his intercession. From a sense it is of their wants and weaknesses, of their distresses and temptations, of their states and duties, accompanied with inexpressible love and compassion, that he continually intercedes for them. For he doth so, that their sins may be pardoned, their temptations subdued, their sorrows removed, their trials sanctified, and their persons saved; and doing this continually as a high priest, he is in the continual exercise of love, care, pity, and compassion.

Union with Christ

expounded regarding believers being a kingdom of priests

from The Duty of Pastors

1. by John Owen, Ch3 p39

(1.) All faithful ministers of the gospel, inasmuch as they are ingrafted into Christ and are true believers, may, as all other true Christians, be called priests; but this inasmuch as they are members of Christ, not ministers of the gospel. It respecteth their persons, not their function, or not them as such. Now, I conceive it may give some light to this discourse if we consider the grounds and reasons of this metaphorical appellation, in divers places of the gospel ascribed to the worshippers of Christ,28 and how the analogy which the present dispensation holds with what was established under the administration of the Old Testament may take place; for there we find the Lord thus bespeaking his people, “Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation,” Exod. xix. 6: so that it should seem that there was then a twofold priesthood; — a ritual priesthood, conferred upon the tribe of Levi; and a royal priesthood, belonging to the whole people. The first is quite abrogated and swallowed up in the priesthood of Christ; the other is put over unto us under the gospel, being ascribed to them and us, and every one in covenant with God, not directly and properly, as denoting the function peculiarly so called, but comparatively, with reference had to them that are without: for as those who were properly called priests had a nearer access unto God than the rest of the people, especially in his solemn worship, so all the people that are in covenant with God have such an approximation. Unto him by virtue thereof, in comparison of them that are without, that in respect thereof they are said to be priests. Now, the outward covenant, made with them who were the children of Abraham after the flesh, was representative of the covenant of grace made with the children of promise, and that whole people typified the hidden elect people of God; so that of both there is the same reason. Thus, as “the priests the sons of Levi” are said to “come near unto God,” Deut. xxi. 5, and God tells them that “him whom he hath chosen, he will cause to come near unto him,” Num. xvi. 5, — chosen by a particular calling “ad munus,” to the office of the ritual priesthood; so in regard of that other kind, comparatively so called, it is said of the whole people, “What nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the Lord our God is in all things that we call upon him for?” Deut. iv. 7. Their approaching nigh unto God made them all a nation of priests, in comparison of those “dogs” and unclean Gentiles that were out of the covenant. Now, this prerogative is often appropriated to the faithful in the New Testament: for “through Christ we have access by one Spirit unto the Father,” Eph. ii. 18; and chap. iii. 12, “We have boldness and access with confidence;” so James iv. 8, “Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you;” — which access and approximation unto God seemed, as before was spoken, to be uttered in allusion to the priests of the old law, who had this privilege above others in the public worship, in which respect only things then were typical; since, because we enjoy that prerogative in the truth of the thing itself, which they had only in type, we also are called priests. And as they were said to “draw nigh” in reference to the rest of the people, so we in respect of them who are “strangers from the covenants,” that now are said to be “afar off,” Eph. ii. 17, and hereafter shall be “without;” for “without are dogs,” etc., Rev. xxii. 15. Thus, this metaphorical appellation of priests is, in the first place an intimation of that transcendent privilege of grace and favour which Jesus Christ hath purchased for every one that is sanctified with the blood of the covenant.

(2.) We have an interest in this appellation of priests by virtue of our union with Christ. Being one with our high priest, we also are priests. There is a twofold union between Christ and us; — the one, by his taking upon him our nature; the other, by bestowing on us his Spirit: for as in his incarnation he took upon him our flesh and blood by the work of the Spirit, so in our regeneration he bestoweth on us his flesh and blood by the operation of the same Spirit. Yea, so strict is this latter union which we have with Christ, that as the former is truly said to be a union of two natures into one person, so this of many persons into one nature; for by it we are “made partakers of the divine nature,” 2 Pet. i. 4, becoming “members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones,” Eph. v. 30. We are so parts of him, of his mystical body, that we and he become thereby, as it were, one Christ: “For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body: so also is Christ, 1 Cor. xii. 12. And the ground of this is, because the same Spirit is in him and us. In him, indeed, dwelleth the fulness of it, when it is bestowed upon us only by measure; but yet it is still the same Spirit, and so makes us, according to his own prayer, one with him, as the soul of man, being one, makes the whole body with it to be but one man. Two men cannot be one, because they have two souls; no more could we be one with Christ were it not the same Spirit in him and us. Now, let a man be never so big or tall, so that his feet rest upon the earth and his head reach to heaven, yet, having but one soul, he is still but one man. Now, though Christ for the present, in respect of our nature assumed, be never so far remote and distant from us in heaven, yet, by the effectual energy and inhabitation of the same Spirit, he is still the head of that one body whereof we are members, still but one with us. Hence ariseth to us a twofold right to the title of priests:—

[1.] Because being in him, and members of him, we are accounted to have done, in him and with him, whatsoever he hath done for us: We are “dead with him,” Rom. vi. 8; “buried with him,” verse 4; “quicken together with him,” Eph. ii. 5; “risen with him,” Col. iii. 1; being “raised up,” we “sit together with him in heavenly places,” Eph. ii. 6. Now, all these in Christ were in some sense sacerdotal; wherefore we, having an interest in their performance, by reason of that heavenly participation derived from them unto us, and being united unto him that in them was so properly, are therefore called priests.

[2.] By virtue of this union there is such an analogy between that which Christ hath done for us as a priest and what he worketh in us by his Holy Spirit, that those acts of ours come to be called by the same name with his, and we for them to be termed priests. Thus, because Christ’s death and shedding of his blood, so offering up himself by the eternal Spirit, was a true, proper sacrifice for sin, even our spiritual death unto sin is described to be such, both in the nature of it, to be an offering or sacrifice (for, “I beseech you, brethren,” saith St Paul, “by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice,” etc., Rom. xii. 1), and for the manner of it; our “old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed,” Rom. vi. 6.

(3.) We are priests as we are Christians, or partakers of a holy unction, whereby we are anointed to the participation of all Christ’s glorious offices. We are not called Christians for nothing. If truly we are so, then have we an “unction from the Holy One,” whereby we “know all things,” 1 John ii. 20. And thus also were all God’s people under the old covenant, when God gave that caution concerning them, “Touch not my Christians, 29 and do my prophets no harm,” Ps. cv. 15. The unction, then, of the Holy Spirit implies a participation of all those endowments which were typified by the anointing with oil in the Old Testament, and invests us with the privileges, in a spiritual acceptation, of all the sorts of men which then were so anointed, — to wit, of kings, priests, and prophets: so that by being made Christians (everyone is not so that bears that name), we are ingrafted into Christ, and do attain to a kind of holy and intimate communion with him in all his glorious offices; and in that regard are called priests.

(4.) The sacrifices we are enjoined to offer give ground to this appellation. Now, they are of divers sorts, though all in general eucharistical; — as, first, Of prayers and thanksgivings: Ps. cxvi. 17, “I will offer unto thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and will call upon the name of the Lord;” and again, “Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense, and the lifting up of my hands as the evening sacrifice.” Ps. cxli. 2: so Heb. xiii. 15, “Let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God,” — that is, the “fruit of our lips.” Secondly, Of good works: Heb. xiii. 16, “To do good and to communicate forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased.” Thirdly, Αὐτοθυσίας, or self slaughter, crucifying the old man, killing sin, and offering up our souls and bodies an acceptable sacrifice unto God, Rom. xii. 1. Fourthly,

The sweet incense of martyrdom: “Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, etc., Phil. ii. 17. Now, these and sundry other services acceptable to God, receiving this appellation in the Scripture, denominate the performers of them priests. Now, here it must be observed, that these aforenamed holy duties are called “sacrifices,” not properly, but metaphorically only, — not in regard of the external acts, as were those under the law, but in regard of the internal purity of heart from whence they proceed. And because pure sacrifices, by his own appointment, were heretofore the most acceptable service of Almighty God, therefore now, when he would declare himself to be very much delighted with the spiritual acts of our duty, he calls them “oblations,” “incense,” “sacrifices,” “offerings,” etc.; to intimate, also, a participation with Him in his offices who properly and directly is the only priest of his church, and by the communication of the virtue of whose sacrifice we are made priests, not having authority in our own names to go unto God for others, but having liberty, through him, and in his name, to go unto God for ourselves.

Not to lose myself and reader in this digression, the sum is, — The unspeakable blessings which the priesthood of Christ hath obtained for us are a strong obligation for the duty of praise and thanksgiving; of which that in some measure we may discharge ourselves, he hath furnished us with sacrifices of that kind to be offered unto God. For our own parts, we are poor, and blind, and lame, and naked; neither in the field nor in the fold, in our hearts nor among our actions, can we find anything worth the presenting unto him: wherefore, he himself provides them for us; especially for that purpose sanctifying and consecrating our souls and bodies with the sprinkling of his blood and the unction of the Holy Spirit. Farther; he hath erected an altar (to sanctify our gifts) in heaven, before the throne of grace, which, being spread over with his blood, is consecrated unto God, that the sacrifices of his servants may for ever appear thereon. Add to this, what he also hath added, the eternal and never-expiring fire of the favour of God, which kindleth and consumes the sacrifices laid on that altar. And to the end that all this may be rightly accomplished, he hath consecrated us with his blood to be kings and priests to God for evermore. So that the close of this discourse will be, that all true believers, by virtue of their interest in Jesus Christ, are in the holy Scripture, by reason of divers allusions called priests; which name, in the sense before related, belonging unto them as such, cannot, on this ground, be ascribed to any part of them distinguished any ways from the rest by virtue of such distinction.

2. The second thing I observe concerning the business in hand is, that the offering up unto God of some metaphorical sacrifices, in a peculiar manner, is appropriate unto men set apart for the work of the ministry; as the slaying of men’s lusts, and the offering up of them, being converted by the preaching of the gospel, unto God. So St Paul of his ministry, Rom. xv. 16, “That I should be the minister of Jesus Christ unto the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable,” etc. Ministers preaching the gospel to the conversion of souls are said to kill men’s lusts, and offer them up unto God as the fruit of their calling, as Abel brought unto him an acceptable sacrifice of the fruit of his flock; and so also in respect of divers other acts of their duty, which they perform in the name of their congregations.

Christ: Putting away sin explained

This explains what Christ did with respect to sin, what is "sin" and what is "putting it away." This will further clear the certainty of Christ's work as our high priest, that all for whom Christ died will surely be saved, hence 2Sam23:5 "ordered in all things, sure". This is opposed to the Arminian view that insists that all hinges on man's cooperation with God, whether they decide to accept Christ or not. Many do not see all that this duty of the priesthood entails which contributes much to their minimizing the import of this important act. It is central to understanding the scope of the atonement as being limited and the consequent awe experienced on one's heart.

pg 402-405 Commentary on Hebrews 8:1-10

With respect unto this season so stated, three things are affirmed of Christ in the following words: 1. What he did; "he appeared." 2. Unto what end; "to take away sin." 3. By what means; "by the sacrifice of himself."

But there is some difficulty in the distinction of these words, and so variety in their interpretation, which must be removed. For these words, δια της ξυσιας αυτου, "by the sacrifice of himself," may be referred either unto εις αθητησιν αμαρτιας, "the putting away of sin," that goes before; or unto πεφανερωται, "was manifest," that follows after. In the first way the sense is, 'He was manifested to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself;' — in the latter, 'He appeared by the sacrifice of himself to put away sin;' which confines his appearance unto his sacrifice; which sense is expressed by the Vulgar translation, "per hostiam suam apparuit." "He appeared by his own host," say the Rhemists. But the former reading of the words is evidently unto the mind of the apostle; for his appearance was what he did in general with respect unto the end mentioned, and the way whereby he did it.

1. There is what he did, — "he appeared," "he was manifested." Some say that this appearance of Christ is the same with his appearance in the presence of God for us, mentioned in the foregoing verse. But it is, as another word that is used, so another thing that is intended. That appearance was after his sacrifice, this is in order unto it; that is in heaven, this was on earth; that is still continued, this is that which was already accomplished, at the time limited by the apostle. Wherefore this "appearance," this φανερωσις or "manifestation" of Christ in the end of the world, is the same with his being "manifested in the flesh," 1 Timothy 3:16; or his coming into the world, or taking on him the seed of Abraham, to this end, that he might suffer and offer himself unto God. For what is affirmed is opposed unto what is spoken immediately before, namely, of his suffering often since the foundation of the world. This he did not do, but appeared, was manifested, (that is, in the flesh,) in the end of the world, to suffer and to expiate sin. Nor is the word ever used to express the appearance of Christ before God in heaven. His [Hebrew word] is his coming into the world by his incarnation, unto the discharge of his office; his appearance before God in heaven is his εμφανισμος; and his illustrious appearance at the last day is his φανερωσις, though that word be used also to express his glorious manifestation by the gospel, 2 Timothy 1:10. See 1 Timothy 3:16; 1 John 3:8; Titus 2:13. This, therefore, is the meaning of the word: 'Christ did not come into the world, he was not manifested in the flesh, often since the foundation of the world, that he might often suffer and offer; but he did so, he so appeared, was so manifested, in the end of the world.’

2. The end of this appearance of Christ was to “put away sin.” And we must inquire both what is meant by “sin,” and what by the “putting of it away.” Wherefore by “sin,” the apostle intends the whole of its nature and effects, in its root and fruits, in its guilt, power, and punishment; sin absolutely and universally; sin as it was an apostasy from God, as it was the cause of all distance between God and us, as it was the work of the devil; sin in all that it was and all that it could effect, or all the consequents of it; sin in its whole empire and dominion, — as it entered by the fall of Adam, invaded our nature in its power, oppressed our persons with its guilt, filled the whole world with its fruits, gave existence and right unto death and hell, with power to Satan to rule in and over mankind; sin, that rendered us obnoxious unto the curse of God and eternal punishment. In the whole extent of sin, “he appeared to put it away;” — that is, with respect unto the church, that is sanctified by his blood, and dedicated unto God.

Αθετησις, which we render “putting away,” is “abrogatio,” “dissolutio,” “destructio;” an “abrogation,” “disannulling,” “destroying,” “disarming.” It is the name of taking away the force, power, and obligation of a law. The power of sin, as unto all its effects and consequents, whether sinful or penal, is called its law, the “law of sin,” Romans 8:2. And of this law, as of others, there are two parts or powers: (1.) Its obligation unto punishment, after the nature of all penal laws; hence it is called “the law of death,” that whereon sinners are bound over unto eternal death. This force it borrows from its relation unto the law of God and the curse thereof. (2.) Its impelling, ruling power, subjectively in the minds of men, leading them captive into all enmity and disobedience unto God, Romans 7:23. Christ appeared to abrogate this law of sin, to deprive it of its whole power, (1.) That it should not condemn us any more, nor bind us over to punishment. This he did by making atonement for it, by the expiation of it, undergoing in his own suffering the penalty due unto it; which of necessity he was to suffer as often as he offered himself. Herein consisted the Αθετησις or “abrogation” of its law principally. (2.) By the destruction of its subjective power, purging our consciences from dead works, in the way that hath been declared. This was the principal end of the appearance of Christ in the world, 1 John 3:8. [If Christ did this for all that were ever born, how can anyone go to hell?? Hence Christ did not die for all but only the church for whom he shed his blood, washed in His blood, etc. Hence many have this wrong view due to an undervaluation of Christ's work and its necessary consequents.]

3. The way whereby he did this, was “by the sacrifice of himself,” — δια της ξυσιας αυτου for εαυτου: that sacrifice wherein he both suffered and offered himself unto God. For that both are included, the opposition made unto his often suffering doth evince. This, therefore, is the design and meaning of these words: — to evidence that Christ did not offer himself unto God often, more than once, as the high priest offered every year, before his entrance into the holy place, the apostle declares the end and effect of his offering or sacrifice, which rendered the repetition of it needless. It was one, once offered, in the end of the world; nor need be offered any more, because of the total abolition and destruction of sin at once made thereby. What else concerns the things themselves spoken of will be comprised under the ensuing observations.

Obs. III. It is the prerogative of God, and the effect of his wisdom, to determine the times and seasons of the dispensation of himself and his grace unto the church. — Hereon it depended alone that Christ “appeared in the end of the world,” not sooner nor later, as to the parts of that season. Many things do evidence a condescency unto divine wisdom in the determination of that season; as, 1. He testified his displeasure against sin, in suffering the generality of mankind to lie so long under the fatal effects of their apostasy, without relief or remedy, Acts 14:16, 17:30; Romans 1:21-24, 26. 2. He did it to exercise the faith of the church, called by virtue of the promise, in the expectation of its accomplishment. And by the various ways whereby God cherished their faith and hope was he glorified in all ages, Luke 1:70; Matthew 13:17; Luke 10:24; 1 Peter 1:10, 11; Haggai 2:7. 3. To prepare the church for the reception of him, partly by the glorious representation made of him in the tabernacle and temple with their worship, partly by the burden of legal institutions laid on them until his coming, Galatians 3:24. 4. To give the world a full and sufficient trial of what might be attained towards happiness and blessedness by the excellency of all things here below. Men had time to try what was in wisdom, learning, moral virtue, power, rule, dominion, riches, arts, and whatever else is valuable unto rational natures. They were all exalted unto their height, in their possession and exercise, before the appearance of Christ; and all manifested their own insufficiency to give the least real relief unto mankind from under the fruits of their apostasy from God. See 1 Corinthians 1:5. To give time unto Satan to fix and establish his kingdom in the world, that the destruction of him and it might be the more conspicuous and glorious. These, and sundry other things of a like nature, do evince that there was a condescency unto divine wisdom in the determination of the season of the appearance of Christ in the flesh; howbeit it is ultimately to be resolved into his sovereign will and pleasure.

Obs. IV. God had a design of infinite wisdom and grace in his sending of Christ, and his appearance in the world thereon, which could not be frustrated. "He appeared to put away sin." The footsteps of divine wisdom and grace herein I have inquired into in a peculiar treatise, and shall not here insist on the same argument.

Obs. V. Sin had erected a dominion, a tyranny over all men, as by a law. — Unless this law be abrogated and abolished, we can have neither deliverance nor liberty. Men generally think that they serve themselves of sin, in the accomplishment of their lusts and gratification of the flesh; but they are indeed servants of it and slaves unto it. It hath gotten a power to command their obedience unto it, and a power to bind them over to eternal death for the disobedience unto God therein. As unto what belongs unto this law and power, see my discourse of Indwelling Sin.

Obs. VI. No power of man, of any mere creature, was able to evacuate, disannul, or abolish this law of sin; for, —

Obs. VII. The destruction and dissolution of this law and power of sin, was the great end of the coming of Christ for the discharge of his priestly office in the sacrifice of himself; No other way could it be effected. And, —

Obs. VIII. It is the glory of Christ, it is the safety of the church, that by his one offering, by the sacrifice of himself once for all, he hath abolished sin as unto the law and condemning power of it.

God's Chief End in Creation

by Jonathan Edwards -

This will help in understanding the primary or ultimate end in why God created the universe; it puts everything in perspective - that it is all about God's glory - God is the center of it, not man. The focus nowadays is one what God can do for me whether it be saving me or giving me peace or any other good thing. So much of modern Christianity is about what man can get from God. This is the wrong view and creates many pernicious effects often to the ruin of a multitude of souls. Understanding this will help you approach God with reverence and godly fear as opposed to a carnal confidence which God hates. Also, excellent comments on the image of God, its purpose.

<http://www.ccel.org/ccel/edwards/works1.iv.iii.i.html>

Some things observed in general, which reason dictates. Having observed these things, to prevent confusion, I now proceed to consider what may, and what may not, be supposed to be God's ultimate end in the creation of the world.

Indeed this affair seems properly to be an affair of divine revelation. In order to be determined what was designed, in the creating of the astonishing fabric of the universe we behold, it becomes us to attend to, and rely on what HE has told us, who was the architect. He best knows his own heart, and what his own ends and designs were, in the wonderful works which he has wrought. Nor is it to be supposed that mankind—who, while destitute of revelation, by the utmost improvements of their own reason, and advances in science and philosophy, could come to no clear and established determination who the author of the world was—would ever have obtained any tolerable settled judgment of the end which the author of it proposed to himself in so vast, complicated, and wonderful a work of his hands. And though it be true, that the revelation which God has given to men, as a light shining in a dark place, has been the occasion of great improvement of their faculties, and has taught men how to use their reason; and though mankind now, through the long-continued assistance they have had by this divine light, have come to great attainments in the habitual exercise of reason; yet I confess it would be relying too much on reason, to determine the affair of God's last end in the creation of the world, without being herein principally guided by divine revelation, since God has given a revelation containing instructions concerning this very matter. Nevertheless, as objections have chiefly been made, against what I think the Scriptures have truly revealed, from the pretended dictates of reason, I would, in the first place, soberly consider in a few things, what seems rational to be supposed concerning this affair;—and then proceed to consider what light divine revelation gives us in it.

As to the first of these, I think the following things appear to be the dictates of reason:

1. That no notion of God's last end in the creation of the world, is agreeable to reason, which would truly imply any indigence, insufficiency, and mutability in God; or any dependence of the Creator on the creature, for any part of his perfection or happiness. Because it is evident, by both Scripture and reason, that God is infinitely, eternally, unchangeably, and independently glorious and happy: that he cannot be profited by, or receive anything from the creature, or be the subject of any sufferings, or diminution of his glory and felicity, from any other being. [This again shows that "all" that the Father gave the Son will be saved infallibly! John 6:37-39; that God will not fail of his purpose to save "all" of them; that God did not die for all and everyone that was ever born with the desire to save them all as many suppose, but only those he chose in eternity, the elect. So "all" is used in the restrictive sense, meaning the elect; those God will not fail to save. Otherwise, if one assumes that Christ died for all and everyone, acknowledging that most go to hell, then God failed in his purpose which is to assign imperfection to the Godhead which is blaspheme. "For we may justly infer what God intends, by what he actually does; because he does nothing inadvertently, or without design" as Edwards points out later in his discourse, p99; and because God is not dependent upon the creature's wills as fickle and corrupt as they are, then God only intended to save his elect.] (code465b) The notion of God creating the world, in order to receive any thing properly from the creature, is not only contrary to the nature of God, but inconsistent with the notion of creation; which implies a being receiving its existence, and all that belongs to it, out of nothing. And this implies the most perfect, absolute, and universal derivation and dependence. Now, if the creature receives its ALL from God, entirely and perfectly, how is it possible that it should have anything to add to God, to make him in any respect more than he was before, and so the Creator become dependent on the creature? (code156a & code319a [see Hermon Bavinck's similar comments on this:

He has no goal outside himself but is self-sufficient, all-sufficient (Ps. 50:8ff.; Isa. 40:28ff.; Hab. 2:20). He receives nothing, but only gives. All things need him; he needs nothing or nobody. He always aims at himself because he cannot rest in anything other than himself. Inasmuch as he himself is the absolutely good and perfect one, he may not love anything else except with a view to himself. He may not and cannot be content with less than absolute perfection. When he loves others, he loves himself in them: his own virtues, works, and gifts. P211 Vol. 2 Reformed Dogmatics, God's delight in his creatures is part and parcel of his delight in himself. p251; He does not seek the creature [as an end in itself], but through the creature he seeks himself. He is and always remains his own end. P435]

Cornelius Van Til states:

Once more: Not only do all facts reveal God but they, in revealing him, manifest his attitude toward men. God is love. He loves himself above all else. He loved himself from all eternity when he had as yet made no creatures to love. But when he made creatures, he made them lovable like himself. He loved them because in loving them, he loved himself above all else. He made man perfect. And loving mankind, he offered them eternal life. It was seriously meant. It was no farce. All men disobey God. All came under his wrath and curse. God continued to love himself; he therefore had to punish every insult to his holiness. Pg 132 Common Grace & the Gospel

2. Whatsoever is good and valuable in itself, is worthy that God should value it with an ultimate respect. It is therefore worthy to be made the last end of his operation; if it be properly capable of being attained. For it may be supposed that some things, valuable and excellent in themselves, are not properly capable of being attained in any divine operation; because their existence, in all possible respects, must be conceived of as prior to any divine operation. Thus God's existence and infinite perfection, though infinitely valuable in themselves, cannot be supposed to be the end of any divine operation; for we cannot conceive of them as, in any respect, consequent on any works of God. But whatever is in itself valuable, absolutely so, and is capable of being sought and attained, is worthy to be made a last end or the divine operation—Therefore,

3. Whatever that be which is in itself most valuable, and was so originally, prior to the creation of the world, and which is attainable by the creation, if there be any thing which was superior in value to all others, that must be worthy to be God's last end in the creation; and also worthy to be his highest end.—In consequence of this it will follow,

4. That if God himself be, in any respect, properly capable of being his own end in the creation of the world, then it is reasonable to suppose that he had respect to himself, as his last and highest end, in this work; because he is worthy in himself to be so, being infinitely the greatest and best of beings. All things else, with regard to worthiness, importance, and excellence, are perfectly as nothing in comparison of him. And therefore, if God has respect to things according to their nature and proportions, he must necessarily have the greatest respect to himself. It would be against the perfection of his nature, his wisdom, holiness, and perfect rectitude, whereby he is disposed to do everything that is fit to be done, to suppose otherwise. At least, a great part of the moral rectitude of God, whereby he is disposed to everything that is fit, suitable, and amiable in itself, consists in his having the highest regard to that which is in itself highest and best. The moral rectitude of God must consist in a due respect to things that are objects of moral respect; that is, to intelligent beings capable of moral actions and relations. And therefore it must chiefly consist in giving due respect to that Being to whom most is due; for God is infinitely the most worthy of regard. The worthiness of others is as nothing to his; so that to him belongs all possible respect. To him belongs the whole of the respect that any intelligent being is capable of. To him belongs all the heart. Therefore, if moral rectitude of heart consists in paying the respect of the heart which is due, or which fitness and suitableness requires, fitness requires infinitely the greatest regard to be paid to God; and the denying of supreme regard here would be a conduct infinitely the most unfit. Hence it will follow, that the moral rectitude of the disposition, inclination, or affection of God chiefly consists in a regard to himself, infinitely above his regard to all other beings; or, in other words, his holiness consists in this. [This is key!! See code469a]

And if it be thus fit that God should have a supreme regard to himself, then it is fit that this supreme regard should appear in those things by which he makes himself known, or by his word and works, i.e. in what he says, and in what he does. If it be an infinitely amiable thing in God, that he should have a supreme regard to himself, then it is an amiable thing that he should act as having a chief regard to himself; or act in such a manner, as to show that he has such a regard: that what is highest in God's heart, may be highest in his actions and conduct. And if it was God's intention, as there is great reason to think it was, that his works should exhibit an image of himself their author, that it might brightly appear by his works what manner of being he is, and afford a proper representation of his divine excellencies, and especially his moral excellence, consisting in the disposition of his heart; then it is reasonable to suppose that his works are so wrought as to show this supreme respect to himself, wherein his moral excellence primarily consists. See code469a

Some further observations concerning those things which reason leads us to suppose God aimed at in the creation of the world.

From what was last observed, it seems to be the most proper way of proceeding—as we would see what light reason will give us, respecting the particular end or ends, God had ultimately in view in the creation of the world—to consider, what thing or things are actually the effect or consequence of the creation of the world, that are simply and originally valuable in themselves. And this is what I would directly proceed to, without entering on any tedious metaphysical inquiries, wherein fitness, or amiableness, consists; referring what I say to the dictates of the reader’s mind, on sedate and calm reflection.

1. It seems a thing in itself proper and desirable, that the glorious attributes of God, which consist in a sufficiency to certain acts and effects, should be exerted in the production of such effects as might manifest his infinite power, wisdom, righteousness, goodness, &c. If the world had not been created, these attributes never would have had any exercise. The power of God, which is a sufficiency in him to produce great effects, must for ever have been dormant and useless as to any effect. The divine wisdom and prudence would have had no exercise in any wise contrivance, any prudent proceeding, or disposal of things; for there would have been no objects of contrivance or disposal. The same might be observed of God’s justice, goodness, and truth. Indeed God might have known as perfectly that he possessed these attributes, if they never had been exerted or expressed in any effect. But then, if the attributes which consist in a sufficiency for correspondent effects, are in themselves excellent, the exercises of them must likewise be excellent. If it be an excellent thing, that there should be a sufficiency for a certain kind of action or operation, the excellency of such a sufficiency must consist in its relation to this kind of operation or effect; but that could not be, unless the operation itself were excellent. A sufficiency for any work is no further valuable, than the work itself is valuable.¹⁹⁵

footnote 195:

“The end of wisdom (says Mr. G. Tennent, in his sermon at the opening of the Presbyterian church of Philadelphia) is design; the end of power is action; the end of goodness is doing good. To suppose these perfections not to be exerted would be to represent them as insignificant. Of what use would God’s wisdom be, if it had nothing to design or direct? To what purpose his almightiness, if it never brought anything to pass? And of what avail his goodness, if it never did any good?”

As God therefore esteems these attributes themselves valuable, and delights in them; so it is natural to suppose that he delights in their proper exercise and expression. For the same reason that he esteems his own sufficiency wisely to contrive and dispose effects, he also will esteem the wise contrivance and disposition itself. And for the same reason, as he delights in his own disposition to do justly, and to dispose of things according to truth and just proportion; so he must delight in such a righteous disposal itself. [This is a main reason why salvation is perfected for the elect so as to display this excellency of his nature - that unconditional election is true; to say that salvation depends on the feeble, corrupt wills of men is to completely take away from this objective and detract greatly from the glory of God and argues weakness and imperfection in God who can't do what his heart most wants to do. God is not dependent upon the creature but the creature wholly dependent upon God; he is the potter not man! Arminian theology is grossly inconsistent with God's glory. This is very important to see.]

2. It seems to be a thing in itself fit and desirable, that the glorious perfections of God should be known, and the operations and expressions of them seen, by other beings besides himself. If it be fit that God's power and wisdom, &c. should be exercised and expressed in some effects, and not lie eternally dormant, then it seems proper that these exercises should appear, and not be totally hidden and unknown. For if they are, it will be just the same, as to the above purpose, as if they were not. God as perfectly knew himself and his perfections, had as perfect an idea of the exercises and effects they were sufficient for, antecedently to any such actual operations of them, and since, [was "since. If"] if therefore, it be nevertheless a thing in itself valuable, and worthy to be desired, that these glorious perfections be actually exhibited in their correspondent effects; then it seems also, that the knowledge of these perfections and discoveries is valuable in itself absolutely considered; and that it is desirable that this knowledge should exist. It is a thing infinitely good in itself, that God's glory should be known by a glorious society of created beings. And that there should be in them an increasing knowledge of God to all eternity, is worthy to be regarded by him, to whom it belongs to order what is fittest and best. If existence is more worthy than defect and non-entity, and if any created existence is in itself worthy to be, then knowledge is; and if any knowledge, then the most excellent sort of knowledge, viz. that of God and his glory. This knowledge is one of the highest, most real, and substantial parts of all created existence, most remote from non-entity and defect.

3. As it is desirable in itself that God's glory should be known, so when known it seems equally reasonable it should be esteemed and delighted in, answerably to its dignity. There is no more reason to esteem it a suitable thing, that there should be an idea in the understanding corresponding unto the glorious object, than that there should be a corresponding affection in the will. If the perfection itself be excellent, the knowledge of it is excellent, and so is the esteem and love of it excellent. And as it is fit that God should love and esteem his own excellence, it is also fit that he should value and esteem the love of his excellency. And if it becomes a being highly to value himself, it is fit that he should love to have himself valued and esteemed. If the idea of God's perfection in the understanding be valuable, then the love of the heart seems to be more especially valuable, as moral beauty especially consists in the disposition and affection of the heart. [Hence true virtue, i.e., holiness, consists in a love for God]

4. [code190] As there is an infinite fulness of all possible good in God—a fulness of every perfection, of all excellency and beauty, and of infinite happiness—and as this fulness is capable of communication, or emanation ad extra [outside himself]; so it seems a thing amiable and valuable in itself that this infinite fountain of good should send forth abundant streams. And as this is in itself excellent, so a disposition to this in the Divine Being, must he looked upon as an excellent disposition. Such an emanation of good is, in some sense, a multiplication of it. So far as the stream may be looked upon as anything besides the fountain, so far it may be looked on as an increase of good. And if the fulness of good that is in the fountain, is in itself excellent, then the emanation, which is as it were an increase, repetition, or multiplication of it, is excellent. Thus it is fit, since there is an infinite fountain of light and knowledge, that this light should shine forth in beams of communicated knowledge and understanding [1John 5:20, "...and has given us an understanding, that we may know Him who is true;" - also the light in 2Cor. 4:6!]; and, as there is an infinite fountain of holiness, moral excellence, and beauty, that so it should flow out in communicated holiness. And that, as there is an infinite fulness of joy and happiness, so these should have an emanation, and become a fountain flowing out in abundant streams, as beams from the sun.

Thus it appears reasonable to suppose, that it was God's last end, that there might be a glorious and abundant emanation of his infinite fulness of good ad extra, or without himself; and that the disposition to communicate himself, or diffuse his own fulness,¹⁹⁶ was what moved him to create the world.

footnote 196:

I shall often use the phrase God's fulness, as signifying and comprehending all the good which is in God natural and moral, either excellence or happiness; partly, because I know of no better phrase to be used in this general meaning; and partly, because I am led hereto by some of the inspired writers, particularly the apostle Paul, who often useth the phrase in this sense.

But here I observe, that there would be some impropriety in saying, that a disposition in God to communicate himself to the creature, moved him to create the world. For an inclination in God to communicate himself to an object, seems to presuppose the existence of the object, at least in idea. But the diffusive disposition that excited God to give creatures existence, was rather a communicative disposition in general, or a disposition in the fulness of the divinity to flow out and diffuse itself. Thus the disposition there is in the root and stock of a tree to diffuse sap and life, is doubtless the reason of their communication to its buds, leaves, and fruits, after these exist. But a disposition to communicate of its life and sap to its fruits, is not so properly the cause of its producing those fruits, as its disposition to diffuse its sap and life in general. Therefore, to speak strictly according to truth, we may suppose, that a disposition in God, as an original property of his nature, to an emanation of his own infinite fulness, was what excited him to create the world; and so, that the emanation itself was aimed at by him as a last end of the creation. See Bavinck's comments on the Eternal Generation of the Son, and God's fecundity, at [code192a]

Interesting comments on this subject of why God created the world from an excerpt from Thomas Weinandy in his book, Does God Suffer, pp143-144 & 79. The key idea described here is God's freedom in what he does as opposed to having to do something as though he is indebted to mankind. The main point of these quotes is to show that God is self-sufficient and does not need anything from the creature nor can he receive anything from the creature, or be affected by the creature (God's impassibility/immutability/simplicity prohibits this). So the only reason why God created the world was to display his glory and the infinite love that he has for himself – in fact, he loves the creature with a view to himself and believers - this is the amazing part - participate in that love for God. I think Edwards' reasons give a more complete answer to this question than Weinandy or Philo.

The transcendent independence of the Trinity, as Wholly Other, allows the act of creation to be a sheer act of goodness and freedom. Because they possess no self-fulfilling needs, they are motivated solely by their beneficent and altruistic love to bring others into existence and so bestow upon them their goodness. Commenting on Dionysius, Aquinas states:

Divine love did 'not' allow 'him to remain in himself without fruit,' that is, without the production of creatures, but love 'moved him to operate according' to a most excellent mode of operation according as he produced all things in being (esse). For from love of his goodness it proceeded that he willed to pour out and to communicate his goodness to others, insofar as it is possible, namely, by way of similitude, and that his goodness did not remain in him, but flowed out to others.⁸⁴

⁸⁴W. Hill states that 'Divine loving cannot be conceived as an accidental or contingent accretion; it is rather constitutive of God's very being in its pure actuality and so cannot be thought of as enhancing his own being intrinsically. The sole beneficiaries of such love are creatures loved for their own sakes.'

R. Sokolowski also states:

Finally, it should be apparent that what seemed like a kind of indifference of God toward the world, in the claim that God is not perfected by creation, is really the condition for a greater generosity and benevolence in creation. If God is not perfected by creating, then he does not create out of any sort of need, and his creating is all the more free and generous. There is no self-interest and no ambiguity in the goodness and benevolence of creation. And the pure generosity of creation tells us about the nature of the giver of this gift. The nature of the action tells us what the agent is like, and along with the generosity of redemption, it establishes the context for our own response in charity, first toward God and then toward others...Because of the abundance of the life of the Trinity, God becomes even more independent in his nature of any involvement with anything that is not divine. This independence of nature, of course, does not become indifferent rather it defines both creation and redemption as all the more generous and necessitated. 'Creation and Christian Understanding,' pp184 and 186.

In a similar fashion, Weinandy (pg 79) comments again and quotes Philo's view:

God is impassible in that he does not undergo change of emotional states as do humans, but he is nonetheless utterly passionate in his love, mercy and goodness because, as the eternal and self-existing God, he is all perfect and unchanging in these attributes. Implicitly for Philo, the attributes which establish that God is immutable and impassible – being imperishable, incorruptible, eternal, self-existent, and all perfect – are the same attributes which allow him to be the living, merciful, loving and providential creator. As Philo states:

But God has given nothing to himself, for he has not need of anything; but he has given the world to the world, and its parts he has bestowed on themselves and on one another, and also on the universe, and without having judged anything to be worthy of grace, (for he gives all his good things without grudging to the universe and to its parts), he merely has regard to his own everlasting goodness, thinking the doing of good to be a line of conduct suitable to his own happy and blessed nature; so that if any one were to ask me, what was the cause of the creation of the world, having learnt from Moses, I should answer, that the goodness of the living God, being the most important of his graces, is in itself the cause.

God's Chief End in Creation - God's Glory

Jonathan Edwards

Ch II SECT. VI.

Wherein is considered what is meant by the glory of God and the name of God in Scripture, when spoken of as God's ends in his works.

Having thus considered, what are spoken of in the Holy Scriptures, as the ends which God had ultimately in view in the creation of the world, I now proceed particularly to inquire what they are, and how the terms are to be understood?

1. Let us begin with the phrase, the glory of god—And here I might observe, that it is sometimes used to signify the second person in the Trinity; but it is not necessary, at this time, to prove it from particular passages of Scripture. Omitting this, I proceed to observe some things concerning the Hebrew word (Hebrew word) which is most commonly used in the Old Testament, where we have the word glory in the English Bible. The root it comes from, is either the verb, (Hebrew word) which signifies to be heavy, or make heavy, or from the adjective (Hebrew word) which signifies heavy or weighty. These, as seems pretty manifest, are the primary signification of these words, though they have also other meanings, which seem to be derivative. The noun (Hebrew word) signifies gravity, heaviness, greatness, and abundance. Of very many places it will be sufficient to specify a few. Prov. xxvii. 3. 2 Sam. xiv. 26. 1 Kings xii. 11. Psal. xxxviii. 4. Isa. xxx. 27. And as the weight of bodies arises from two things, density and magnitude; so we find the word used to signify dense, Exod. xix. 16. (NOT ENGLISH) nubes gravis, Vulg. densissima;) a dense cloud; and is very often used for great. Isa. xxxii. 2. Gen. v. 9. 1 Kings x. 2. 2 Kings vi. 14. and xviii. 17. Isa. xxxvi. 2. etc.

The Hebrew word (תפארת) which is commonly translated glory, is used in such a manner as might be expected from this signification of the words from whence it comes. Sometimes it is used to signify what is internal, inherent, or in the possession of the person: and sometimes for emanation, exhibition, or communication of this internal glory; and sometimes for the knowledge, or sense of these, in those to whom the exhibition or communication is made; or an expression of this knowledge, sense or effect. And here I would note, that agreeable to the use of this word in the Old Testament, is the Greek word (Hebrew word) in the New. For as the word (Hebrew word) is generally translated by the just mentioned Greek word (Hebrew word) in the Septuagint; so it is apparent, that this word is designed to be used to signify the same thing in the New Testament with the other in the Old. This might be abundantly proved, by comparing particular places of the Old Testament; but probably it will not be denied. I therefore proceed particularly to consider these words, with regard to their use in Scripture, in each of the forementioned ways.

1. The word glory denotes sometimes what is internal. When the word is used to signify what is within, or in the possession of the subject, it very commonly signifies excellency, dignity, or worthiness of regard. This, according to the Hebrew idiom, is, as it were, the weight of a thing, as that by which it is heavy; as to be light, is to be worthless, without value, contemptible. Numb. xxi. 5. "This light bread." 1 Sam. xviii. 2 3. "Seemeth it a light thing." Judg. ix. 4 "Light persons," i.e. worthless, vain, vile persons. So Zeph. iii. 4. To set light by is to despise, 2 Sam. xix. 43. Belshazzar's vileness in the sight of God is represented by his being Tekel, weighed in the balances and found light, Dan. v. 27. And as the weight of a thing arises from its magnitude, and its specific gravity conjunctly; so the word glory is very commonly used to signify the excellency of a person or a thing, as consisting either in greatness, or in beauty, or in both conjunctly; as will abundantly appear by considering the places referred to in the margin. 209

Sometimes that internal, great and excellent good, which is called glory, is rather in possession, than inherent. Any one may be called heavy, that possesses an abundance; and he that is empty and destitute, may be called light. Thus we find riches are sometimes called glory. Gen. xxxi. 1. "And of that which was our fathers' hath he gotten all this glory." Esth. v. 11. "Haman told them of the glory of his riches." Psal. xlix. 16, 17. "Be not afraid when one is made rich, when the glory of his house is increased. For when he dieth, he shall carry nothing away, his glory shall not descend after him." Nah. ii. 9. "Take ye the spoil of silver, take the spoil of gold; for there is none end of the store and glory out of the pleasant furniture."

And it is often put for a great height of prosperity, and fulness of good in general. Gen. xlv. 13. "You shall tell my father of all my glory in Egypt." Job xix. 9. "He hath stripped me of my glory." Isa. x. 3. "Where will you leave your glory." Ver. 16. "Therefore shall the Lord of hosts send among his fat ones leanness, and under his glory shall he kindle a burning, like the burning of a fire." Isa. xvii. 3, 4. "The kingdom shall cease from Damascus, and the remnant of Syria; they shall be as the glory of the children of Israel. And in that day, it shall come to pass, that the glory of Jacob shall he made thin, and the fatness of his flesh shall be made lean." Isa. xxi. 16. "And all the glory of Kedar shall fail." Isa. lxi. 6. "Ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves." 2. The word glory is used in Scripture often to express the exhibition, emanation, or communication of the internal glory. Hence it often signifies an effulgence, or shining brightness, by an emanation of beams of light. Thus the brightness of the sun, and moon, and stars, is called their glory, in 1 Cor. xv. 41. But in particular, the word is very often thus used, when applied to God and Christ. As in Ezek. i. 28. "As the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain, so was the appearance of the brightness round about. This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord." And chap. x. 4. "Then the glory of the Lord went up from the cherub, and stood over the threshold of the house, and the house was filled with the cloud, and the court was full of the brightness of the Lord's glory." Isa. vi. 1, 2, 3. "I saw the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, and his train filled the temple. Above it stood the seraphim—And one cried to another and said, Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts, the whole earth is full of his glory." Compared with John xii. 41. "These things said Esaias, when he saw his glory and spake of him." Ezek. xliii. 2. "And behold the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east.—And the earth shined with his glory." Isa. xxiv. 23. "Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously." Isa. lx. 1, 2. "Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. For behold the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people; but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee." Together with verse 19. "The sun shall be no more thy light by day, neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee; but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory." Luke ii. 9. "The glory of the Lord shone round about them." Acts xxii. 11. "And when I could not see for the glory of that light." In 2 Cor. iii. 7. the shining of Moses's face is called the glory of his countenance. And to this Christ's glory is compared, verse 18. "But we all with open face, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory." And so chap. iv. 4. "Lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them." Ver. 6. "For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." Heb. i. 3. "Who is the brightness of his glory." The apostle Peter, speaking of that emanation of exceeding brightness, from the bright cloud that overshadowed the disciples in the mount of transfiguration, and of the shining of Christ's face at that time, says, 2 Pet. i. 17. "For he received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Rev. xviii. 1. "Another angel came down from heaven, having great power, and the earth was lightened with his glory." Rev. xxi. 11. "Having the glory of God, and her light was like unto a stone most precious, like a jasper stone, clear as crystal." Ver. 23. "And the city had no need of the sun nor of the moon to shine in it,: for the glory of God did lighten it." See the word for a visible effulgence or emanation of light in the places to be seen in the margin. 211

The word glory, as applied to God or Christ, sometimes evidently signifies the communications of God's fulness, and means much the same thing with God's abundant goodness and grace. So Eph. iii. 16. "That he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man." The expression, "According to the riches of his glory," is apparently equivalent to that in the same epistle, chap. i. 7. "According to the riches of his grace." And chap. ii. 7. "The exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness towards us, through Christ Jesus." In like manner is the word glory used in Phil. iv. 19. "But my God shall supply all your need, according to his riches in glory, by Christ Jesus." And Rom. ix. 23. "And that he might make known the riches of his glory, on the vessels of his mercy." In this and the foregoing verse, the apostle speaks of God's making known two things, his great wrath, and his rich grace. The former on the vessels of wrath, ver. 22. The latter, which he calls the riches of his glory, on the vessels of mercy, ver. 23. So when Moses says, "I beseech thee show me thy glory;" 212 God granting his request, makes answer, "I will make all my goodness to pass before thee Exod. xxxiii. 18, 19. 213

What we find in John xii. 23-32, is worthy of particular notice in this place. The words and behaviour of Christ, of which we have here an account, argue two things.

(1.) That the happiness and salvation of men, was an end that Christ ultimately aimed at in his labours and sufferings. The very same things which were observed before, (chapter second, section third,) concerning God's glory, are in the same manner observable, concerning the salvation of men. Christ, in the near approach of the most extreme difficulties which attended his undertaking, comforts himself in a certain prospect of obtaining the glory of God, as his great end. And at the same time, and exactly in the same manner, is the salvation of men mentioned, as the end of these great labours and sufferings, which satisfied his soul in the prospect of undergoing them. (Compare the 23rd and 24th verses; and also the 28th and 29th verses; ver. 31 and 32.)

(2.) The glory of God, and the emanations and fruits of his grace in man's salvation, are so spoken of by Christ on this occasion in just the same manner, that it would be quite unnatural to understand him as speaking of two distinct things. Such is the connexion, that what he says of the latter, must most naturally be understood as exegetical of the former. He first speaks of his own glory, and the glory of his Father, as the great end that should be obtained by what he was about to suffer; and then explains and amplifies this, in what he expresses of the salvation of men that shall be obtained by it. Thus, in the 23rd verse, he says, "The hour is come that the Son of Man should be glorified." And in what next follows, he evidently shows how he was to be glorified, or wherein his glory consisted: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a corn of wheat fall into the ground, and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." 214 As much fruit is the glory of the seed, so is the multitude of redeemed ones, which should spring from his death, his glory. 215 [\[This glory is that which was designed in the eternal counsel of God, in that covenant between the Father and the Son; surely this glory will not suffer imperfection as Arminian doctrine tends to, that those for whom Christ died will surely be saved and only them.\]](#) footnote 215: Here may be remembered what was before observed of the church being so often spoken of as the glory and fulness of Christ.

So concerning the glory of his Father, in the 27th and following verses. "Now is my soul troubled, and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour! But for this cause came I unto this hour. Father, glorify thy name. Then came there a voice from heaven, saying, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again." In an assurance of this, which this voice declared, Christ was greatly comforted and his soul even exulted under the view of his approaching sufferings. See [Isa 53:10] And what this glory was, in which Christ's soul was so comforted on this occasion, his own words plainly show. When the people said, it thundered; and others said, an angel spake to him; then Christ tells them what this voice meant. Ver. 30-32. "Jesus answered and said, This voice came not because of me, but for your sakes. Now is the judgment of this world; now shall the prince of this world be cast out. And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." By this behaviour and these speeches of our Redeemer, it appears, that the expressions of divine grace, in the sanctification and happiness of the redeemed, are especially that glory of his, and his Father, which was the joy that was set before him, for which he endured the cross, and despised the shame: and that this glory especially was the end of the travail of his soul, in obtaining which end he was satisfied. (Isa. liii. 10, 11.)

This is agreeable to what has been just observed, of God's glory being so often represented by an effulgence, or emanation, or communication of light, from a luminary or fountain of light. What can so naturally and aptly represent 118 the emanation of the internal glory of God; or the flowing forth and abundant communication of that infinite fulness of good that is in God? Light is very often in Scripture put for comfort, joy, happiness, and for good in general.²¹⁶

footnote 216: Exod. vi. 3 — "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts, the whole earth is full of his glory." In the original, His glory is the fulness of the whole earth: which signifies much more than the words of the translation. God's glory, consisting especially in his holiness, is that, in the sight or communications of which man's fulness, i.e. his holiness and happiness, consists. By God's glory here, there seems to be respect to those effulgent beams that filled the temple: these beams signifying God's glory shining forth and communicated. This effulgence or communication, is the fulness of all intelligent creatures, who have no fulness of their own.

3. Again, the word glory, as applied to God in Scripture, implies the view or knowledge of God's excellency. The exhibition of glory is to the view of beholders. The manifestation of glory, the emanation or effulgence of brightness, has relation to the eye. Light or brightness is a quality that has relation to the sense of seeing; we see the luminary by its light. And knowledge is often expressed in Scripture by light. The word glory very often in Scripture signifies, or implies, honour, as any one may soon see by casting his eye on a concordance. But [Heb. 3:3] honour implies the knowledge of the dignity and excellency of him who hath the honour; and this is often more especially signified by the word glory, when applied to God. Num. xiv. 21. "But as truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord," i. e. All the inhabitants of the earth shall see the manifestations I will make of my perfect holiness and hatred of sin, and so of my infinite excellence. This appears by the context. So Ezek. xxxix. 21, 22, 23. "And I will set my glory among the heathen, and all the heathen shall see my judgment that I have executed, and my hand that I have laid upon them. So the house of Israel shall know that I am the Lord their God. And the heathen shall know that the house of Israel went into captivity for their iniquity." And it is manifest in many places, where we read of God glorifying himself, or of his being glorified, that one thing, directly intended, is making known his divine greatness and excellency. [Arminians and many others cast doubts on this by their false teachings on the scope of the atonement as I have mentioned earlier.]

4. Again, glory, as the word is used in Scripture, often signifies or implies praise. This appears from what was observed before, that glory very often signifies honour, which is much the same thing with praise, viz. high esteem and the expression of it in words and actions. And it is manifest that the words glory and praise, are often used as equivalent expressions in Scripture. Psal. i. 23. "Whoso offereth praise, glorifieth me." Psal. xxii. 23. "Ye that fear the Lord, praise him; all ye seed of Israel, glorify him." Isa. xlii. 8. "My glory I will not give unto another, nor my praise to graven images." Ver. xlii 12. "Let them give glory unto the Lord, and declare his praise in the islands." Isa. xlvi. 9-11. "For my name's sake will I defer mine anger; for my praise will I refrain for thee.—For mine own sake will I do it; for—I will not give my glory unto another." Jer. xiii. 11. "That they might be unto me for a people, and for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory." Eph. i. 6. "To the praise of the glory of his grace." Ver. 12. "To the praise of his glory." So Ver. 14. The phrase is apparently equivalent to this, Phil. i. 11. "Which are by Jesus Christ unto the praise and glory of God." 2 Cor. iv. 15. "That the abundant grace might, through the thanksgiving of many, redound to the glory of God."

It is manifest the praise of God, as the phrase is used in Scripture, implies the high esteem and love of the heart, exalting thoughts of God, and complacence in his excellence and perfection. This is manifest to everyone acquainted with the Scripture. However, if any need satisfaction, they may, among innumerable other places which might be mentioned, turn to those in the in the margin. 218

It also implies joy in God, or rejoicing in his perfections, as is manifest by Psal. xxxiii. 2. "Rejoice in the Lord, O ye righteous, for praise is comely for the upright." [Certainly God would not be rejoicing if he couldn't save all that he desired to save, right? But because he only desired to save and does save all his elect, those he chose before the foundation of the world, he rejoices! How can anything be excellent in God if he can't do that which his heart most desires to do?? Hence he desires to save all in the restrictive sense, i.e., the elect, and he does it perfectly. Hence false doctrine leads to an undervaluation of God.] Other passages to the same purpose, see in the margin. 219 How often do we read of singing praise! But singing is commonly an expression of joy. It is called, making a joyful noise. And as it is often used, it implies gratitude or love to God for his benefits to us. 220

II. Having thus considered what is implied in the phrase, the glory of God, as we find it used in Scripture; I proceed to inquire what is meant by the name of God.

God's name and his glory, at least very often, signify the same thing in Scripture. As it has been observed concerning the glory of God, that it sometimes signifies the second person 221 in the Trinity; the same might be shown of the name of God, if it were needful in this place. But that the name and glory of God are often equipollent expressions, is manifest by Exod. xxxiii. 18, 19. When Moses says, "I beseech thee, show me thy glory," and God grants his request, he says, "I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee." Psal. viii. 1. "O Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth! who hast set thy glory above the heavens," Psal. lxxix. 9. "Help us! O God of our salvation, for the glory of thy name; and deliver us, and purge away our sins for thy name's sake." Psal. cii. 15. "So the heathen shall fear the name of the Lord; and all the kings of the earth thy glory." Psal. cxlviii. 13. "His name alone is excellent, and his glory is above the earth and heaven." Isa. xlvi. 9. "For my name's sake will I defer mine anger, and for my praise will I refrain for thee." Ver. 11. "For mine own sake, even for mine own sake will I do it: for how should my name be polluted? And I will not give my glory unto another." Isa. lix. 19. "They shall fear the name of the Lord from the west, and his glory from the rising of the sun." Jer. xiii. 11. "That they might be unto me for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory." As glory often implies the manifestation, publication, and knowledge of excellency, and the honour that any one has in the world; so does name. Gen. xi. 4. "Let us make us a name." Deut. xxvi. 19. "And to make thee high above all nations, in praise, in name, and in honour." 222

So it is evident, that by name is sometimes meant much the same thing as praise, by several places which have been just mentioned, (as Isa. xlvi. 9. Jer. xiii. 11. Deut. xxvi. 19.) And also by Jer. xxxiii. 9. "And it shall be unto me for a name, a praise, and an honour, before all the nations of the earth, which shall hear of all the good I do unto them." Zeph. iii. 20. "I will make you a name and a praise among all people of the earth."

And it seems that the expression or exhibition of God's goodness is especially called his name, in Exod. xxxiii. 19. "I will make all my goodness pass before thee, and I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee." And chap. 5, 6, 7. "And the Lord descended in the cloud, and stood with him there, and proclaimed the name of the Lord. And the Lord passed by before him, and proclaimed, The Lord, the Lord God, gracious and merciful, long-suffering and abundant in goodness and truth; keeping mercy for thousands," &c.

And the same illustrious brightness and effulgence in the pillar of cloud that appeared in the wilderness, and dwelt above the mercy-seat in the tabernacle and temple, (or rather the spiritual, divine brightness and effulgence represented by it,) so often called the glory of the Lord, is also often called the name of the Lord. Because God's glory was to dwell in the tabernacle, therefore he promises, Exod. xxix. 43. "There will I meet with the children of Israel, and the tabernacle shall be sanctified by my glory." And the temple was called the house of God's glory, Isa. lx. 7. In like manner, the name of God is said to dwell in the sanctuary. Thus we often read of the place that God chose, to put his name there: or, as it is in the Hebrew, to cause his NAME to inhabit there. So it is sometimes rendered by our translators. As Deut. xii. 11. "Then there shall be a place which the Lord your God shall choose to cause his name to dwell there." And the temple is often spoken of as built for God's name. And in Psal. lxxiv. 7. the temple is called the dwelling-place of God's name. The mercy-seat in the temple was called the throne of God's 119 name or glory, Jer. xiv. 21. "Do not abhor us, for thy name's sake do not disgrace the throne of thy glory." Here God's name and his glory seem to be spoken of as the same.

<http://www.ccel.org/ccel/edwards/works1.iv.iv.vii.html>

Showing that the ultimate end of the creation of the world is but one, and what that one end is.

From what has been observed in the last section, it appears, if the whole of what is said relating to this affair be duly weighed, and one part compared with another, we shall have reason to think, that the design of the Spirit of God is not to represent God's ultimate end as manifold, but as ONE. For though it be signified by various names yet they appear not to be names of different things, but various names involving each other in their meaning either different names of the same thing, or names of several parts of one whole; or of the same whole viewed in various lights or in its different respects and relations. For it appears, that all that is ever spoken of in the Scripture as a ultimate end of God's works, is included in that one phrase, the glory of God; which is the name by which the ultimate end of God's works is most commonly called in Scripture; and seems most aptly to signify the thing.

The thing signified by that name, the glory of God, when spoken of as the supreme and ultimate end of all God's works, is the emanation and true external expression of God's internal glory and fulness; meaning by his fulness what has already been explained; or, in other words, God's internal glory, in a true and just exhibition, or external existence of it. It is confessed, that there is a degree of obscurity in these definitions; but perhaps an obscurity which is unavoidable, through the imperfection of language to express things of so sublime a nature. And therefore the thing may possibly be better understood, by using a variety of expressions, by a particular consideration of it, as it were, by parts, than by any short definition.

It includes the exercise of God's perfections to produce a proper effect, [as opposed to incomplete or imperfect effects as all false teaching tends to] in opposition to their lying eternally dormant and ineffectual: as his power being eternally without any act or fruit of that power; his wisdom eternally ineffectual in any wise production, or prudent disposal of anything, etc., The manifestation of his internal glory to created understandings¹. The communication of the infinite fulness of God to the creature. The creature's high esteem of God, love to him, and complacency and joy in him; and the proper exercises and expressions of these. Continued on page 1234

skipping to page 120: <http://www.ccel.org/ccel/edwards/works1.iv.iv.vii.html>

And God had regard to it in this manner, as he had a supreme regard to himself, and value for his own infinite, internal glory. It was this value for himself that caused him to value and seek that his internal glory should flow forth from himself. It was from his value for his glorious perfections of wisdom, righteousness, &c. that he valued the proper exercise and effect of these perfections, in wise and righteous acts and effects. It was from his infinite value for his internal glory and fulness, that he valued the thing itself communicated, which is something of the same, extant in the creature. Thus, because he infinitely values his own glory, consisting in the knowledge of himself, love to himself, and complacency and joy in himself; he therefore valued the image, communication, or participation of these in the creature. And it is because he values himself, that he delights in the knowledge, and love, and joy of the creature; as being himself the object of this knowledge, love, and complacency. For it is the necessary consequence of true esteem and love, that we value others' esteem of the same object, and dislike the contrary. For the same reason, God approves of others' esteem and love of himself. [see also, Rm 6:4, "that just as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life."]

Thus it is easy to conceive, how God should seek the good of the creature, consisting in the creature's knowledge and holiness, and even his happiness, from a supreme regard to himself; as his happiness arises from that which is an image and participation of God's own beauty; and consists in the creature's exercising a supreme regard to God, and complacence in him; in beholding God's glory, in esteeming and loving it, and rejoicing in it, and in his exercising and testifying love and supreme respect to God: which is the same thing with the creature's exalting God as his chief good, and making him his supreme end.

And though the emanation of God's fulness, intended in the creation, is to the creature as its object; and though the creature is the subject of the fulness communicated, which is the creature's good; yet it does not necessarily follow, that even in so doing, God did not make himself his end. It comes to the same thing. God's respect to the creature's good, and his respect to himself, is not a divided respect; but both are united in one, as the happiness of the creature aimed at is happiness in union with himself. The creature is no farther happy with this happiness which God makes his ultimate end, than he becomes one with God. The more happiness the greater union: when the happiness is perfect, the union is perfect. And as the happiness will be increasing to eternity, the union will become more and more strict and perfect; nearer and more like to that between God the Father and the Son; who are so united, that their interest is perfectly one. If the happiness of the creature be considered in the whole of the creature's eternal duration, with all the infinity of its progress, and infinite increase of nearness and union to God; in this view, the creature must be looked upon as united to God in an infinite strictness.

It is no solid objection against God aiming at an infinitely perfect union of the creature with himself, that the particular time will never come when it can be said, the union is now infinitely perfect. God aims at satisfying justice in the eternal damnation of sinners; which will be satisfied by their damnation, considered no otherwise than with regard to its eternal duration. But yet there never will come that particular moment, when it can be said, that now justice is satisfied. But if this does not satisfy our modern free-thinkers who do not like the talk about satisfying justice with an infinite punishment; I suppose it will not be denied by any, that God, in glorifying the saints in heaven with eternal felicity, aims to satisfy his infinite grace or benevolence, by the bestowment of a good infinitely valuable, because eternal: and yet there never will come the moment, when it can be said, that now this infinitely valuable good has been actually bestowed. 224

Excerpts from footnote 224:

2. By the creation and disposal of the physical part of the universe, the glory of God's natural perfections, as of sovereign wisdom, power, and goodness, is chiefly displayed. But by the creation and government of the moral part, the glory of the moral perfections of Deity, that is, of infinite moral rectitude, or equity, and of sovereign benevolence and mercy, is made to appear.

18. The ultimate and chief end of God in the creation and government of the moral part of the universe, is the glory of his moral perfections; which are virtually included in strict rectitude and sovereign benevolence.

19. If strict rectitude be exercised towards the degenerate part of the system, the restoration of those who are the objects of it is not possible; that is, to suppose it is possible involves a contradiction. Therefore,

20. If any degenerate moral agent be restored, it must be necessarily be by the exercise of that sovereign benevolence which we call mercy.

21. "Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God! on them who fell, severity; but toward thee goodness, if thou continue in his goodness; otherwise thou also shalt be cut off.” Goodness and severity are but other words for sovereign benevolence and strict equity, the glory of which is abundantly conspicuous in the various divine dispensations towards the children of men, even in this life; but will appear still more transcendent in the day when God shall judge the world in righteousness, and in the day of eternity.—W.

¹ God, as a rational being, marked by infinite knowledge, created us also as rational beings and capable of knowing. In this way, the imago Dei extends to the existence of the faculty in us¹. Confessing the Impassible God, Steve Garrick w/Ronald S. Baines, Pg 102

¹ [This is similar to Edwards’ comments - God’s internal glory is partly in his understanding, and partly in his will. And this internal glory, as seated in the will of God, implies both his holiness and his happiness: both are evidently God’s glory, according to the use of the phrase. So that as God’s external glory is only the emanation of his internal, this variety necessarily follows. And again, it hence appears that here is no other variety or distinction, but what necessarily arises from the distinct faculties of the creature, to which the communication is made, as created in the image of God: even as having these two faculties of understanding and will. God communicates himself to the understanding of the creature, in giving him the knowledge of his glory; and to the will of the creature, in giving him holiness, consisting primarily in the love of God: and in giving the creature happiness, chiefly consisting in joy in God. (see pg 1235)] link to Edwards’ quote: <https://www.ccel.org/ccel/edwards/works1.iv.iv.vii.html>

Also, Philip Schaff describes this similarly: Religion is not a single, separate sphere of human life, but the divine principle by which the entire man is to be pervaded, refined and made complete, It takes hold of him in his undivided totality, in the center of his personal being: to carry light into his understanding, holiness into his will, and heaven into this heart; and to shed thus the sacred consecration of the new birth, and the glorious liberty of the children of God, over his whole inward and outward life. No form of existence can withstand the renovating power of God’s Spirit. There is no rational element that may not be sanctified; no sphere of natural life that may not be glorified. What is the Glory of God

And the Communication of It

Study this to understand more fully what the glory of God is so that when God communicates his glory to the elect you will more clearly see in what it consists and hence place a more due valuation upon it, from which should spring a due praise to God which he is owed. Knowledge of this is key. God's fullness described too.

Application: God communicates his glory (John 17:22) to his elect, forming an image upon their souls (re-enstamping the image of God, his moral image) consisting in the knowledge of God, holiness or love to God and happiness consisting in joy in God - and all this is designed so that we return this glory to him in praise and worship - that this glory redounds back to God by our obedience to him and praise to him, us being moral and rational creatures, all to the glory of God. Now scripture is fulfilled - "For of him and through him and to him are all things, to whom be glory forever. Amen." Romans 11:36 To think that man can savingly come to God without first receiving this glory implanted upon their soul turns the wisdom and works of God and the Gospel on its head; because man who is brought into this world with a natural image, the likeness of Adam, who hates God, hates all spiritual things, is blind, naked, spiritually dead, a slave to sin and Satan cannot and will not come to God, therefore it is a gross presumption and a great provocation to God to think that a person can have holy thoughts and desires when the truth is that he doesn't, but that the foundation of his so called coming to God by some kind of prayer recommending himself to God is nothing but the consequent of self-love and not a love for God for who he is. It is man saying, I want my independence (my sin), I want what God has and I want God to bless or accommodate me in it, which he will not do. Psalm 50:16, Heb. 11:6

"This is certain: when the soul will not subject itself to God, he goes about to subject God to him, nay, to his lusts. Is 43:24 "Thou hast made me to serve with thy sins." (KJV) For one of them must stoop, and a man would have the Lord be merciful, patient and pitiful to him, when he is in league with his lusts: now this the Lord will not do."

- Thomas Shepard

[This is why I am going into such in depth in the examination of these subjects; it is the only way to see it. If God communicated his glory to everyone that was ever born, then all would infallibly be saved; but he doesn't. "I will have mercy on whomever I will have mercy," Romans 9:15.]

The Communication of God's Glory in the Gospel to the Understanding and Then to the Will (Saving Faith)

By Thomas Shepard, Sound Believer, pg 284

Because as the gospel first reveals Christ to the mind, and then offers him to the will [see code11a— Edwards, code34b]; so faith, which runs parallel with the gospel, first sees Christ, (there the mind, one part of the soul goes out) then receives Christ gladly, (there the other part, the will goes out) and so the whole soul comes to Christ. The gospel comes to all the elect, First, in Great clearness and evidence of the truth of it, 1Thes. 1:5, to which the understanding assents, and is persuaded of; Secondly, In great grace and goodness, surpassing beauty and sweetness, Lam. 3:24, with which the will is drawn, and so the whole soul comes unto Christ. For the gospel is not only true, but glad tidings to all the elect, especially when humbled at God's feet, 1Tim1:15, In whom, says the apostle, Eph. 1:12, 13, you believed, after that ye heard the word of truth, (there is the object of the understanding) the gospel of your salvation, (there is the goodness of it, the object of the will) so that the whole soul is drawn to Christ in the work of faith. He that understands how liberum arbitrium may be in two faculties must not wonder, if one grace be seated in both faculties of the understanding and will; no grace can be completely seated in diverse faculties, but gradually and imperfectly it may; the work of faith is not complete, when the understanding is opened, only to see and wonder at the mysteries of the mercy in the gospel, but when the will adheres and clasps about that infinite and surpassing good it sees, then it is perfected, and not before, John 6:40. And this is the reason why saving faith (as it is called) does not look only to the bare testimony and assent unto it, as human faith does, because in the gospel, not only divine truth is propounded to the mind to assent unto, but an infinite and eternal good is offered to the heart, and will of man to embrace. And thence it is, that it is not sufficient for a Christian to believe God, or to believe Christ, but he must also believe in him, or else he cannot be saved; the object of believing of him being verum, or truth; the object of the second, bonum, or good. Take heed, therefore, a poor, lost sinner, undone in its own eyes forever; not knowing what to do, unless it be to lie down, and lie still at God's feet, as worthy of nothing but hell. What does the Lord now do? The Lord Christ, by his gospel, first lets in a new light [to the understanding], and it sees the Lord Jesus there bleeding before its eyes, and held forth as a propitiation to all that believe, to all that come to him; the mind sees this mystery, this exceeding rich grace and free mercy, and thinks, Happy are they that share in this mercy! [there the communication to the will, that it is good] But will the Lord look upon such a nothing as I? Can such infinite treasures be my portion? The Lord, therefore, calls, and bids him come away and enter into the possession of it.

Hereupon the heart and will come, and rest, and roll themselves upon these bowels, and there rest; thus the whole soul comes, and this, I say again, is faith. Just as it is with the loadstone drawing the iron; who would think that iron should be drawn by it? but there is a secret virtue coming from the stone which draws it, and so it comes and is united to it; so who would think that ever such an iron, heavy, earthy heart should be drawn unto Christ? yet the Lord lets out a secret virtue of truth and sweetness from himself, which draws the soul to Christ, and so it comes. [willingly & gladly, Ps 110:3. Jonathan Edwards describes this communication similarly...communicates the knowledge of God to the faculty of understanding and holiness, love of God to the faculty of the will. John Flavel describes this secret efficacy in converting the soul in similarly as well,]

Philip Schaff says likewise: Religion is not a single, separate sphere of human life, but the divine principle by which the entire man is to be pervaded, refined and made complete, It takes hold of him in his undivided totality, in the center of his personal being: to carry light into his understanding, holiness into his will, and heaven into this heart; and to shed thus the sacred consecration of the new birth, and the glorious liberty of the children of God, over his whole inward and outward life. No form of existence can withstand the renovating power of God's Spirit. There is no rational element that may not be sanctified; no sphere of natural life that may not be glorified. The Glory of Christ

excerpt from Ch 12

A short summary of the glory of Christ in relation to what has been spoken to in a point of application.

To sum up briefly what has been spoken: There are three things to be considered concerning the glory of Christ, three degrees in its manifestation, — the shadow, the perfect image, and the substance itself. Those under the Law had only the shadow of it, and of the things that belong unto it; — they had not the perfect image of them, Heb. x. 1. Under the Gospel we have the perfect image, which they had not; or a clear, complete revelation and declaration of it, presenting it unto us as in a glass: but the enjoyment of these things in their substance is reserved for heaven; we must be “where he is, that we may behold his glory.” Now, there is a greater difference and distance between the real substance of anything and the most perfect image of it, than there is between the most perfect image and the lowest shadow of the same thing. If, then, they longed to be freed from their state of types and shadows, to enjoy the representation of the glory of Christ in that image of it which is given us in the Gospel; much more ought we to breathe and pant after our deliverance from beholding it in the image of it, that we may enjoy the substance itself. For, whatever can be manifest of Christ on this side heaven, it is granted unto us for this end, that we may the more fervently desire to be present with him.

And as it was their wisdom and their grace to rejoice in the light they had, and in those typical administrations of divine worship which shadowed out the glory of Christ unto them, yet did always pant after that more excellent light and full discovery of it which was to be made by the Gospel; so it will be ours also thankfully to use and improve the revelations which we enjoy of it, and those institutions of worship wherein our faith is assisted in the view thereof, — yet so as continually to breathe after that perfect, that glorifying sight of it which is reserved for heaven above.

And may we not a little examine ourselves by these things? Do we esteem this pressing towards the perfect view of the glory of Christ to be our duty? and do we abide in the performance of it? If it be otherwise with any of us, it is a signal evidence that our profession is hypocritical. If Christ be in us, he is the hope of glory in us; and where that hope is, it will be active in desires of the things hoped for. Many love the world too well, and have their minds too much filled with the things of it, to entertain desires of speeding through it unto a state wherein they may behold the glory of Christ. They are at home, and are unwilling to be absent from the body, though to be present with the Lord. They hope, it may be, that such a season will come at one time or another, and then it will be the best they can look for when they can be here no more. But they have but a little sight of the glory of Christ in this world by faith, if any at all, who so little, so faintly desire to have the immediate sight of it above. I cannot understand how any man can walk with God as he ought, or has that love for Jesus Christ which true faith will produce, or does place his refreshments and joy in spiritual things, in things above, that does not on all just occasions so meditate on the glory of Christ in heaven as to long for an admittance into the immediate sight of it.

Our Lord Jesus Christ alone perfectly understood wherein the eternal blessedness of them that believe in him does consist. And this is the sum of what he prays for with respect unto that end, — namely, that we may be where he is, to behold his glory. And is it not our duty to live in a continual desire of that which he prayed so earnestly that we might attain? If in ourselves we as yet apprehend but little of the glory, the excellency, the blessedness of it, yet ought we to repose that confidence in the wisdom and love of Christ, that it is our best, — infinitely better than any thing we can enjoy here below.

Unto those who are inured unto these contemplations, they are the salt of their lives, whereby everything is condited and made savoury unto them, as we shall show afterward. And the want of spiritual diligence herein is that which has brought forth a negligent, careless, worldly profession of religion, which, countenancing itself with some outward duties, has lost out of it the power of faith and love in their principal operations. Hereby many deceive their own souls. Goods, lands, possessions, relations, trades, with secular interests in them, are the things whose image is drawn on their minds, and whose characters are written on their foreheads, as the titles whereby they may be known. As believers, beholding the glory of Christ in the blessed glass of the Gospel, are changed into the same image and likeness by the Spirit of the Lord; so these persons, beholding the beauty of the world and the things that are in it in the cursed glass of self-love, are in their minds changed into the same image. Hence perplexing fears, vain hopes, empty embraces of perishing things, fruitless desires, earthly, carnal designs, cursed, self-pleasing imaginations, feeding on, and being fed by, the love of the world and self, do abide and prevail in them. But we have not so learned Christ Jesus.

[God has given all believers a desire for holiness, a delight in holiness and a hunger and thirst for holiness. With all the corruption in this world and that remaining in our souls we ought to hunger after Christ and his coming. These desires ought to shape our behavior and our thoughts to be spiritually minded, to mourn that we be delivered from this body of death to behold and see him as he is and be changed completely into his likeness.]

The Nature of True Virtue

by Jonathan Edwards

<http://www.ccel.org/ccel/edwards/works1.v.i.html>

This describes true virtue, that which is given to the elect that enables them to love God.

Chap. I

Excerpts from pg 122 -

But virtue is the beauty of those qualities and acts of the mind, that are of a moral nature, i.e. such as are attended with desert or worthiness of praise or blame. Things of this sort, it is generally agreed, so far as I know, do not belong merely to speculation; but to the disposition and will, or (to use a general word, I suppose commonly well understood) to the heart. Therefore, I suppose, I shall not depart from the common opinion, when I say, that virtue is the beauty of the qualities and exercises of the heart, or those actions which proceed from them. So that when it is inquired, what is the nature of true virtue? this is the same as to inquire, what that is, which renders any habit, disposition, or exercise of the heart truly beautiful?

True virtue most essentially consists in benevolence to being in general [And this refers to the most worthy of beings, who is God]. Or perhaps, to speak more accurately, it is that consent, propensity, and union of heart to being in general, which is immediately exercised in a general good will. [That is, true virtue has respect to God and is based on a love for God.]

The things before observed respecting the nature of true virtue, naturally lead us to such a notion of it. If it has its seat in the heart, and is the general goodness and beauty of the disposition and its exercise, in the most comprehensive view, considered with regard to its universal tendency, and as related to everything with which it stands connected; what can it consist in, but a consent and good will to being in general? Beauty does not consist in discord and dissent, but in consent and agreement. And if every intelligent being is some way related to being in general, and is a part of the universal system of existence; and so stands in connexion with the whole; what can its general and true beauty be, but its union and consent with the great whole?

From hence also it is evident, that the divine virtue, or the virtue of the divine mind, must consist primarily in love to himself [God], or in the mutual love and friendship which subsists eternally and necessarily between the several persons in the Godhead, or that infinitely strong propensity there is in these divine persons one to another. There is no need of multiplying words, to prove that it must be thus, on a supposition that virtue, in its most essential nature, consists in benevolent affection or propensity of heart towards being in general; and so flowing out to particular beings, in a greater or lesser degree, according to the measure of existence and beauty which they are possessed of. It will also follow, from the foregoing things, that God's goodness and love to created beings, is derived from and subordinate to his love to himself. 230

With respect to the manner in which a virtuous love in created beings, one to another, is dependent on, and derived from love to God, this will appear by a proper consideration of what has been said; that it is sufficient to render love to any created being, virtuous, if it arise from the temper of mind wherein consists a disposition to love God supremely. Because it appears from what has been already observed, all that love to particular beings, which is the fruit of a benevolent propensity of heart to being in general, is virtuous love. But, as has been remarked, a benevolent propensity of heart to being in general, and a temper or disposition to love God supremely, are in effect the same thing. Therefore, if love to a created being comes from that temper, or propensity of the heart, it is virtuous. However, every particular exercise of love to a creature may not sensibly arise from any exercise of love to God, or an explicit consideration of any similitude, conformity, union, or relation to God, in the creature beloved.

The most proper evidence of love to a created being, arising from that temper of mind wherein consists a supreme propensity of heart to God, seems to be the agreeableness of the kind and degree of our love to God's end in our creation, and in the creation of all things, and the coincidence of the exercise of our love, in their manner, order, and measure, with the manner in which God himself exercises love to the creature in the creation and government of the world, and the way in which God, as the first cause and supreme disposer of all things, has respect to the creature's happiness, in subordination to himself as his own supreme end. For the true virtue of created beings is doubtless their highest excellency, and their true goodness, and that by which they are especially agreeable to the mind of their Creator. But the true goodness of a thing, must be its agreeableness to its end, or its fitness to answer the design for which it was made. Therefore, they are good moral agents, whose temper of mind, or propensity of heart, is agreeable to the end for which God made moral agents. But, as has been shown, the last end for which God has made moral agents, must be the last end for which God has made all things: it being evident, that the moral world is the end of the rest of the world; the inanimate and unintelligent world being made for the rational and moral world, as much as a house is prepared for the inhabitants.

By these things, it appears, that truly virtuous mind, being as it were under the sovereign dominion of love to God, above all things, seeks the glory of God, and makes this his supreme, governing, and ultimate end. This consists in the expression of God's perfections in their proper effects,—the manifestation of God's glory to created understandings¹,—the communications of the infinite fulness of God to the creature,—the creature's highest esteem of God, love to, and joy in him,—and in the proper exercises and expressions of these. And so far as a virtuous mind exercises true virtue in benevolence to created beings, it chiefly seeks the good of the creature; consisting in its knowledge or view of God's glory and beauty, its union with God, conformity and love to him, and joy in him. And that disposition of heart, that consent, union, or propensity of mind to being in general, which appears chiefly in such exercises, is virtue, truly so called; or in other words, true grace and real holiness. And no other disposition or affection but this is of the nature of true virtue.

Corollary. Hence it appears, that those schemes of religion or moral philosophy, which—however well in some respects they may treat of benevolence to mankind, and other virtues depending on it, yet—have not a supreme regard to God, and love to him, laid as the foundation, and all other virtues handled in a connexion with this, and in subordination to it, are not true schemes of philosophy, but are fundamentally and essentially defective. And whatever other benevolence or generosity towards mankind, and other virtues, or moral qualifications which go by that name, any are possessed of, that are not attended with a love to God, which is altogether above them, and to which they are subordinate, and on which they are dependent, there is nothing of the nature of true virtue or religion in them. And it may be asserted in general, that nothing is of the nature of true virtue, in which God is not the first and the last; or which, with regard to their exercises in general, have not their first foundation and source in apprehensions of God's supreme dignity and glory, and in answerable esteem and love of him, and have not respect to God as the supreme end.

For God is the King of all the earth;
Sing praises with understanding. Ps 47:7

Without us being given an understanding by divine revelation, the effulgence or shining forth of the light of the knowledge of God's glory into our hearts, this communicated to the elect (2Cor. 4:4-6), we are unable to have an object worthy to be praised. So unregenerate men devise other gods out of their own fancy to worship. Their so called faith creates its own object [which is essentially what the sinner's prayer does]. Hence without the gift of faith which is a gift of God, as is understanding, you cannot please God! Remember what Peter answered to Jesus' question, Who do you say that I am? And Peter said you are the Christ, the Son of the living God. Then Jesus said to him, "Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jonah, for flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but My Father in heaven." Matt 16:17

This virtue or holiness is that which is communicated to the elect at their conversion; it is the efficient cause of their conversion or them being born again. This is by design, where the Holy Spirit applies the goods things purchased by Christ (faith, grace, eternal life and glory hereafter), our great high priest, to his elect creatures that are scattered abroad all over the world. Those who are in hell were never acted on as such; God never spoke to them.

¹ [This is similar to Edwards' comments - God's internal glory is partly in his understanding, and partly in his will. And this internal glory, as seated in the will of God, implies both his holiness and his happiness: both are evidently God's glory, according to the use of the phrase. So that as God's external glory is only the emanation of his internal, this variety necessarily follows. And again, it hence appears that here is no other variety or distinction, but what necessarily arises from the distinct faculties of the creature, to which the communication is made, as created in the image of God: even as having these two faculties of understanding and will. God communicates himself to the understanding of the creature, in giving him the knowledge of his glory; and to the will of the creature, in giving him holiness, consisting primarily in the love of God: and in giving the creature happiness, chiefly consisting in joy in God. (see code34b)] link to Edwards' quote: <https://www.ccel.org/ccel/edwards/works1.iv.iv.vii.html>

Philip Schaff comments similarly: Religion is not a single, separate sphere of human life, but the divine principle by which the entire man is to be pervaded, refined and made complete, It takes hold of him in his undivided totality, in the center of his personal being: to carry light into his understanding, holiness into his will, and heaven into this heart; and to shed thus the sacred consecration of the new birth, and the glorious liberty of the children of God, over his whole inward and outward life. No form of existence can withstand the renovating power of God's Spirit. There is no rational element that may not be sanctified; no sphere of natural life that may not be glorified. The Promise in Genesis 3:15

by John Owen, Commentary on Hebrews, Vol. 17 p 170

23. The first intimation that God gave of this work of his grace in redeeming mankind from sin and misery, is contained in the promise subjoined unto the curse denounced against our first parents, and their posterity in them: Genesis 3:15 "The seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent, and the serpent shall bruise his heel." Two things there are contained in these words; — a promise of relief from the misery brought on mankind by the temptation of Satan; and an intimation of the means or way whereby it should be brought about. That the first is included in these words is evident; for, —

First, If there be not a promise of deliverance expressed in these words, whence is it that the execution of the sentence of death against sin is suspended? Unless we will allow an intervention satisfactory to the righteousness and truth of God to be expressed in these words, there would have been a truth in the suggestion of the serpent, namely, that whatever God had said, yet indeed they were not to die. The Jews, in the Midrash Tehillim, — as Kimchi informs us on Psalm 92, whose title is, "A Psalm for the Sabbath-day," which they generally assign unto Adam, — say that Adam was cast out of the garden of Eden on the evening of the 238 sixth day, after which God came to execute the sentence of death upon him; but the Sabbath being come on, the punishment was deferred, whereon Adam made that psalm for the Sabbath-day. Without an interposition of some external cause and reason, they acknowledge that death ought immediately to have been inflicted; and other besides what is mentioned in these words there was none.

Secondly, The whole evil of sin, and curse, that mankind then did, or was to, suffer under, proceeded from the friendship contracted between the woman and the serpent, and her fixing faith in him. God here declares that he will break that league, and put enmity between them. Being now both of them under the same condition of sin and curse, this could not be without a change of condition in one of them. Satan is not divided from himself, nor is at enmity with them that are left wholly in his estate. A change of condition, therefore, on the part of the woman and her seed is plainly promised; that is, by a deliverance from the state of sin and misery wherein they were. Without this the enmity mentioned could not have ensued.

Thirdly, In pursuit of this enmity, the Seed of the woman was to bruise the head of the serpent.

The head is the seat of his power and craft. Without the destruction of the evil and pernicious effects which by his counsel he had brought about, his head cannot be bruised. By his head he had contrived the ruin of mankind; and without the destruction of his works and a recovery from that ruin, he is not conquered nor his head bruised. And as these things, though they may now seem somewhat obscurely expressed in these words, are yet made plain unto us in the gospel, so the importance of them was evident unto our first parents of old, being expounded by all the circumstances wherewith the matter of fact was attended. Again, there is an intimation of the manner how this work shall be performed. This, first, God takes upon himself: ‘I will do it; “I will put enmity.”’ It is an issue of his sovereign wisdom and grace. But, secondly, he will do it in and by the nature of man, “the Seed of the woman.” And two things must concur to the effecting of it; — first, That this Seed of the woman must conquer Satan, bruise his head, destroy his works, and procure deliverance for mankind thereby; secondly, That he must suffer from, and by the means of, Satan in his so doing, — the serpent must “bruise his heel.” This is the remedy and relief that God hath provided for mankind. And this is the MESSIAH, or God joining with the nature of man to deliver mankind from sin and eternal misery.

24. This promise of relief by the Seed of the woman is, as the first, so the only intimation that God gave unto our first parents of a way of deliverance from that condition whereinto they, and the whole creation, were brought by the entrance of evil or sin. It was likewise the first discovery that there was in him— benignity, grace, kindness, or mercy, compassion, pardon. Hereby he declared himself to be [Hebrew phrase], Nehemiah 9:17, — “a God of pardons, gracious, and tenderly merciful;” as also, Psalm 86:5, “good and pardoning, and much in mercy.” And if this be not acknowledged, it must be confessed that all the world, at least unto the flood, if not unto the days of Abraham, — in which space of time we have testimony concerning some that they walked with God, and pleased him, — were left without any certain ground of faith, or hope of acceptance with him; for without some knowledge of this mercy, and the provision of a way for its exercise, they could have no such persuasion. This, then, we have obtained, that God, presently upon the entrance of sin into the world, and the breach of its public peace thereby, promised a reparation of that evil, in the whole extent of it, to be wrought in and by the Seed of the woman, — that is, the Messiah.

by John Owen, Commentary on Hebrews, Vol. 17 p 176 (244 online)

27. Against this seducer it is denounced that “his head should be bruised.” The head of Satan is his craft and power. From these issued all that evil whereinto mankind was fallen. In the bruising, therefore, of his head, the defeat of his counsel, the destruction of his work, and the deliverance of mankind, are contained, as our apostle most excellently declares, Hebrews 2. Death must be removed, and righteousness brought in, and acceptance with God procured, or the head of Satan is not bruised. This, therefore, is openly and plainly a promise of the deliverance inquired after. Moreover, there is a declaration made how this victory shall be obtained and this deliverance wrought; and that is by the “seed of the woman.” This seed is twice repeated in the words: once expressly, “and her seed;” and, secondly, it is included in the pronoun [Hebrew], “it.” And as by “seed,” in the first place, the posterity of the woman, some to be born of her race, partakers of human nature, may be intended, as the subjects of the enmity mentioned; so in the latter some single person some one of her posterity or seed, that should obtain the victory, is expressly denoted: for as all her seed in common do never go about this work, the greatest part of them continuing in a willing subjection unto Satan, so if all of them should combine to attempt it, they would never be able to accomplish it, as we have before proved at large. Someone, therefore, to come of her, with whom God would be present in an especial and extraordinary manner, is here expressly promised; and this is the Messiah.

28. God having, in infinite wisdom and grace, provided this way of relief, and given this intimation of it, that revelation became the foundation and center of all the religion that ensued in the world: for as those who received it by faith, and adhered unto it, continued in the worship of the true God, expressing their faith in the sacrifices that he had appointed typically to represent and exemplify before their eyes the work itself, which by the promised Seed was to be accomplished; so also all that false worship which the generality of mankind apostatized unto was laid in a general persuasion that there was a way for the recovery of the favor of God, but what that was they knew not, and therefore wandered in woeful uncertainties.

THE NECESSITY OF SELF-EXAMINATION.

PSALM cxxxix. 23, 24.

Jonathan Edwards

*Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts; and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.

SECT. I.

All men should be much concerned to know whether they do not live in some way of sin.

David was much concerned to know this concerning himself: he searched himself, he examined his own heart and ways; but he did not trust to that; he was still afraid lest there might be some wicked way in him, which had escaped his notice: therefore he cries to God to search him. And his earnestness appears in the frequent repetition of the same request in different words: “Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts. 174” He was very earnest to know whether there were not some evil way or other in him, in which he went on, and did not take notice of.

1. We ought to be much concerned to know whether we do not live in a state of sin. All unregenerate men live in sin. We are born under the power and dominion of sin, are sold under sin; every unconverted sinner is a devoted servant to sin and Satan. We should look upon it as of the greatest importance to us, to know in what state we are, whether we ever had any change made in our hearts from sin to holiness, or whether we be not still in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity; whether ever sin were truly mortified in us; whether we do not live in the sin of unbelief, and in the rejection of the Saviour. This is what the apostle insists upon with the Corinthians, 2 Cor. xiii. 5. "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves; know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?" Those who entertain the opinion and hope of themselves, that they are godly, should take great care to see that their foundation be right. Those that are in doubt should not give themselves rest till the matter be resolved.

Every unconverted person lives in a sinful way. He not only lives in a particular evil practice, but the whole course of his life is sinful. The imagination of the thoughts of his heart is only evil continually. He not only doth evil, but he doth no good, Psal. xiv. 3. "They are altogether become filthy: there is none that doeth good, no not one." Sin is an unconverted man's trade; it is the work and business of his life; for he is the servant of sin. And ordinarily hypocrites, or those who are wicked men, and yet think themselves godly, and make a profession accordingly, are especially odious and abominable to God.

2. We ought to be much concerned to know whether we do not live in some particular way which is offensive and displeasing to God: this is what I principally intend. We ought to be much concerned to know whether we do not live in the gratification of some lust, either in practice or in our thoughts: whether we do not live in the omission of some duty, something which God expects we should do; whether we do not go into some practice or manner of behaviour, which is not warrantable. We should inquire whether we do not live in some practice which is against our light, and whether we do not allow ourselves in known sins.

We should be strict to inquire whether or no we have not hitherto allowed ourselves in some or other sinful way, through wrong principles and mistaken notions of our duty: whether we have not lived in the practice of some things offensive to God, through want of care and watchfulness, and observation of ourselves. We should be concerned to know whether we live not in some way which doth not become the profession we make; and whether our practice in some things be not unbecoming Christians, contrary to christian rules, not suitable for the disciples and followers of the holy Jesus, the Lamb of God. We ought to be concerned to know this, because,

(1.) God requires of us, that we exercise the utmost watchfulness and diligence in his service. Reason teaches, that it is our duty to exercise the utmost care, that we may know the mind and will of God, and our duty in all the branches of it, and to use our utmost diligence in every thing to do it; because the service of God is the great business of our lives, it is that work which is the end of our beings; and God is worthy, that we should serve him to the utmost of our power in all things. This is what God often expressly requires of us; Deut. iv. 9. "Take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things that thine eyes have seen, and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life." And y. 15, 16. "Take ye therefore good heed to yourselves, lest ye corrupt yourselves." And Deut. vi. 17. "You shall diligently keep the commandments of the Lord your God, and his testimonies, and his statutes which he hath commanded thee." And Prov. iv. 23. "Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life." So we are commanded by Christ to "watch and pray;" Matt. xxvi. 41. and Luke xxi. 34, 36. "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and the cares of this life." Eph. v. 15. "See that ye walk circumspectly." So that if we be found in any evil way whatsoever, it will not excuse us, that it was through inadvertence, or that we were not aware of it; as long as it is through want of that care and watchfulness in us, which we ought to have maintained.

(2.) If we live in any way of sin, we live in a way whereby God is dishonored; but the honour of God ought to be supremely regarded by all. If everyone would make it his great care in all things to obey God, to live justly and holily, to walk in everything according to Christian rules; and would maintain a strict, watchful, and scrupulous eye over himself, to see if there were no wicked way in him; would give diligence to amend whatsoever is amiss; would avoid every unholy, unchristian, and sinful way; and if the practice of all were universally as becometh Christians [which unbelieving church members are averse to!]; how greatly would this be to the glory of God, and of Jesus Christ! How greatly would it be to the credit and honour of religion! How would it tend to excite a high esteem of religion in spectators, and to recommend a holy life! How would it stop the mouths of objectors and opposers! How beautiful and amiable would religion then appear, when exemplified in the lives of Christians, not maimed and mutilated, but whole and entire, as it were in its true shape, having all its parts and its proper beauty! Religion would then appear to be an amiable thing indeed.

If those who call themselves Christians, thus walked in all the paths of virtue and holiness, it would tend more to the advancement of the kingdom of Christ in the world, the conviction of sinners, and the propagation of religion among unbelievers, than all the sermons in the world, so long as the lives of those who are called Christians continue as they are now. For want of this concern and watchfulness in the degree in which it ought to take place, many truly godly persons adorn not their profession as they ought to do, and, on the contrary, in some things dishonour it. For want of being so much concerned as they ought to be, to know whether they do not walk in some way that is unbecoming a Christian, and offensive to God; their behaviour in some things is very unlovely, and such as is an offence and stumbling-block to others, and gives occasion to the enemy to blaspheme. [This is why it is important to require people to agree and confess to a sound statement of beliefs, e.g., the 1689 London Baptist Confession of Faith or the Westminster Confession of Faith before being admitted into the church as members. Also, presumptuous ways of coming to God without being called such as the sinner's prayer greatly increases the odds of false conversions and thus mixing unregenerate people with the "sheep" with all its pernicious effects described above.]

(3.) We should be much concerned to know whether we do not live in some way of sin, as we would regard our own interest. If we live in any way of sin, it will be exceedingly to our hurt. Sin, as it is the most hateful evil, is that which is most prejudicial to our interest, and tends most to our hurt of anything in the world. If we live in any way that is displeasing to God, it may be the ruin of our souls. Though men reform all other wicked practices, yet if they live in but one sinful way, which they do not forsake, it may prove their everlasting undoing.

Discerning good from evil

By duly being exercised in the word of truth - through constant use, studying of the word and being spiritually minded. This is vital. Be knowledgeable in the scriptures which is out duty, 1Tim4:16, "Take heed to yourself and to the doctrine. Continue in them, for in doing this you will save both yourself and those who hear you." Why is it needful to be skillful in the word of righteousness? Causes of apostasy.

Commentary on Hebrews
 by John Owen
 Heb. 3:7 to 5:14
 593 Vol. 20

Heb 5, Ver. 12-14. — For whereas for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one should teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God; and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat. For every one that useth milk is unskilful in the word of righteousness; for he is a babe. But strong meat belongeth unto them that are of full age. even those who, by reason of use, have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil.

It may be spoken with a confidence which the truth will warrant, that the reasons why so many do fall from the faith of the gospel unto Popery, Quakerism, or the like, may be reduced unto these two heads: — [1.] The satisfaction of some special lust, perverse humor or inclination; and, [2.] Want of skill in the word of righteousness, as it is such: all other pretences are but shades and coverings of these two reasons of apostasy.

And so there are two sorts of persons that fall from the faith: —

[1.] Such as principally seduce themselves by their own lusts and several interests. Ανθρωποι χατεφθαρμενοι τον νουν αδοχιμοι περι την πιστιν, 2 Timothy 3:8; 1 Timothy 6:5; — men of corrupt minds, that refuse and reject the truth for the love of their lusts and sins. And, —

[2.] Such as are deceived and seduced; and they are αχαχοι, not perversely evil, Romans 16:18, but unstable, because unskilful in the word.

There are two ways whereby, or two cases wherein, we have need to secure our faith against the oppositions of men, and both of them depend on our skillfulness in the word: —

[1.] When we are to prove and confirm the truth against them. So it is said of Apollos, that "he mightily convinced the Jews, showing by the Scriptures that Jesus was Christ," Acts 18:28. But how was he able so to do? Because he himself was “mighty in the Scriptures,” verse 24; that is, he was ready and skillful in the word of righteousness, — and this whilst he was only a private disciple.

[2.] When we are to defend it against the opposition of gainsayers, and their mouths can no otherwise be stopped. If men be but skillful and ready in the Scriptures, though destitute of all advantages of learning, it is inexpressible how able they will be, and such persons have been, in confounding all the sophistry of the most subtle adversaries of the truth. When without this ability, men lie to be seized on as a prey by the next seducer. Wherefore, without the duty here enjoined, we may easily see what, on all accounts, our condition is with respect unto our faith.

2. The next end of the doctrines of the gospel, which we need this skill to manage them unto, is the guidance of us in the whole course of our duty, that we be not out of our way, nor at a loss about it. The word is our rule, our guide, our light, in all our walking before God; but if we have not an acquaintance with it, if we are not ready to use and apply it, we shall never walk steadily nor uprightly.

(1.) This is our guide in the whole course of our lives. “Thy statutes,” saith David, “are the men of my counsel,” — those with whom he advised on all occasions. Those who are skillful in the word, in the precepts, directions, and instructions of it, have their rule in a readiness for all occasions of duty, and in the whole course of their affairs. The way wherein they should walk will still be represented unto them; whilst others wander in the dark, and at best walk at “peradventure,” or hazard, with God; which we render “walking contrary” unto him, Leviticus 26:21.

(2.) In particular difficult cases, which often befall us in the course of our conversation in this world. Such as these, where men are unskillful in the word, do either entangle them and fill them with perplexities, so as that they are at their wit’s end, and know not what to do, or else they violently and presumptuously break through them, to the wounding of their consciences, and the hardening of their spirits against a sense of sin. But he who is thoroughly acquainted with the word, and is able dexterously to apply it unto all occasions of duty, will extricate himself from these straits in a due manner; for there is no case of this nature can befall us, but there are rules and directions in the Scripture that will guide us safely through it, if we are skillful in their application.

(3.) The right discharge of all duties towards others depends hereon, and without it we fail more or less in them all. Hence are we enabled to admonish, exhort, instruct, comfort, and reprove, those in whom we are concerned, and that with such authority as may have an influence upon their minds and consciences. Without this, we know neither the true nature, grounds, nor reasons, of any one duty we perform towards others, nor can make use of those things which only will make what we say or do effectual. As therefore it is so with respect unto the increase and preservation of our faith, so also with regard unto all our duties, the whole course of our obedience, — it is necessary that we should be skillful in the word of righteousness.

3. Consolation in distress depends hereon. This the Scripture is the only storehouse of. Whatever is taken from any other stores and applied unto that purpose, is but vanity and froth. Here all the springs, principles, causes, reasons, arguments, for true consolation of mind in distress, are treasured up. And on what various occasions, and how frequently, these cases occur wherein we stand in need of especial consolation, we all know by experience. And in them all, it is unavoidable that we must either be left unto darkness and sorrow, or betake ourselves unto reliefs that are worse than our troubles, if we have not in a readiness those grounds of solid consolation which the Scripture is stored withal. But whatever are our sorrows or troubles, however aggravated or heightened, whatever be their circumstances, from what cause soever they rise, of sins or sufferings, our own or others in whom we are concerned, if we are skillful in the word of righteousness, we may at all times and places, in prisons, dungeons, exiles, have in readiness wherewith to support and refresh our souls. And this I thought meet to add for the discovery of the importance of that duty, a defect whereof is here blamed in the Hebrews by our apostle.

Again; the word signifies "want of experience," and so it respects the things of the gospel. With respect unto them it is said, 'They have not experience of the word of righteousness;' that is, of the things contained in it, and their power. [And this is the danger of false conversions; they have not any experience with the converting power of God but only have the appearance of godliness and so will inevitably they will mislead people as to the real sense of the scriptures, clouds without rain - the blind leading the blind.] And in this sense also it deserves our consideration; for the want of this experience, where we have had time and means for it, is both our great fault and our great disadvantage. Now, by this experience I intend a spiritual sense, taste, or relish, of the goodness, sweetness, useful excellency, of the truths of the gospel, endearing our hearts to God, and causing us to adhere unto him with delight and constancy. And this experience, which is of so great use and advantage, consists in three things: —

1. A thorough mixture of the promises with faith. This I shall not enlarge upon, because I have spoken unto it expressly in the second verse of the fourth chapter. In brief, it is that lively acting of faith which the Scripture expresseth by "tasting," "eating," "drinking;" which gives a real incorporation of the things we are made partakers of. When faith is assiduously acted upon the promises of God, so as that the mind or soul is filled with the matters of them, and virtue goes forth from them in all its actings, as they will be influenced by every object that it is filled withal, then the foundation is laid of their experience. This the apostle intends, Ephesians 3:17, "That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith." Faith, by its frequent lively actings on Christ, brings him, as it were, to make a constant residence in the heart, where he always puts forth his power, and the efficacy of his grace. [read Owen's book, The Grace and Duty of Being Spiritually Minded. Contemplation of spiritual truths, the promises, Christ, etc., is an act of saving faith that works itself by love. You tend to contemplate those things you love and since you now love God, you contemplate Him, his nature, his works, his word!]

2. In a spiritual sense of the excellency of the things believed, wherewith the affections are touched and filled. This is our taste, how that the Lord is gracious. And hence are we said to be "filled with joy in believing," as also to have the "love of God shed abroad in our hearts;" which, with sundry things of the same nature belong unto this experience. And no tonic can express that satisfaction which the soul receives in the gracious communication of a sense of divine goodness, grace, and love unto it in Christ, whence it "rejoiceth with joy unspeakable and full of glory." And this is different from the evanid [faint or weak, transitory] joys of hypocrites. They are all from without, occasional, depending merely on something peculiar in the dispensation of the word, and on some circumstances of their own condition which they are commensurate unto; not engaging the heart unto greater love and more firm adherence unto God, but issuing absolutely in the present satisfaction of the affections. But that love, delight, and joy, which are a part or effect of spiritual experience, have their root within, — namely, in those actings of faith we before described. They are the fruits and flowers of it, which may be excited by external occasions, but proceed not from them; and therefore are they abiding, though liable to depressions and interruptions. But to be sure, they always increase our love of, and strengthen our adherence unto God.

3. In experiments of the power of the word, on all occasions, especially as it is a word of righteousness. Sundry useful instances might here be insisted on; I shall mention two only:—

(1.) There is in it a sense of the power of the word in giving peace with God. This is the difficultest thing in the world to be impressed on the mind of a man really and seriously convinced of the guilt of sin. Many ways such an one cannot but try, to find some rest and satisfaction; but all, after some vain promises, do issue in disappointments. But when the soul doth really close with that way which it is directed unto by the gospel, — that is, when it mixeth it with faith as a word of righteousness, — the authority of the word in the conscience doth secure it that its peace is firm and stable. This it is to have an experiment of the word, when we find our souls satisfied and fortified by the authority of it, against all oppositions, that through Christ we are accepted of God, and are at peace with him.

(2.) In satisfying the heart to choose and prefer spiritual, invisible, and eternal things, before those that are present, and offer us the security of their immediate enjoyment. When we are satisfied that it is good for us, that it is best for us, to forego present earthly things, which we see and handle, and know full well the comfort, benefit, and advantage of, for those things which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor can they by any reasonings of our own take place in the conceptions of our hearts, merely on the authority of the word, testifying to the excellency and certainty of these invisible things, then have we an experiment of the power of the word. Now, as the experience intended consists in these things, so it is easy to discern of how great importance it is, and how much it is our duty to endeavor it.

Ver. 14- But strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age, even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil.

In the 14th verse, which completes the antithesis proposed, and wherein the apostle issues his discourse on this matter, four things are expressed : 1. The subject concerning whom he speaks, in opposition unto them whom he called νηπιοι, or “babes; and these are οι τελιοι, “those that are of full age.” 2. The food that is proper for them, in opposition to the milk of babes; and that is στερεα τροφη, — “strong meat,” or sound, solid nourishment. 3. A description of them, giving an account of what is said concerning the meetness of strong meat unto them; and that is, because they are such as have αισθητηρια γεγυμνασμενα, — “their senses exercised to discern good and evil:” which belongs unto the description of the subject of the proposition, “those of full age.” 4. The means whereby they came into this condition; it was δια την εξιν “by reason of habit,” “use,” or “practice,” that had got.

And these things must be explained.

1. Τελιοι as opposed to νηπιοι naturally, are persons adult, grown up, come to “full age.” So our apostle makes the opposition, Ephesians 4:13, 14. He would have us come by the knowledge of God εις ανδρα τελιον, — “to a perfect man;” that we should be no more νηπιοι, “children, tossed up and down: which things in both places are morally to be understood. As νηπιοι, therefore, are persons weak, ignorant, and unstable in spiritual things, so τελειοι are those who have their understandings enlarged, and their minds settled in the knowledge of Christ, or the mysteries of the gospel.

Τελειος, also, without respect to νηπιος, taken absolutely, is “perfect and complete,” such a one as to whom nothing is wanting. μῦμιT; “integer,” “rectus;” “upright,” “sincere, perfect.” In that sense were they said to be “perfect” under the old testament, who were upright and sincere in their obedience. But this in general is not the perfection here intended; for it only respects an especial qualification of the mind with regard unto the truths of the gospel. This our apostle mentions, 1 Corinthians 2:6, Σοφίαν λαλοῦμεν ἐν τελείοις, — “We speak wisdom” (that is, declare the mysteries of the gospel) “among them that are perfect;” that is, such whose minds, being freed from corrupt prejudices, are enlightened by the Spirit of God, and themselves thereby initiated into the mysteries of Christ. And these he afterwards calls “spiritual men,” or such as have received the Spirit of Christ, whereby we know the things that are freely given us of God, verses 12, 15.

And there are also degrees in this perfection, seeing it is not absolute. For that which is so the apostle denies to have been in himself, Philippians 3:12. Much less is it in any of us, or attainable by us. But to “every one of us grace is given, according to the measure of the gift of Christ.” An equal measure is not designed unto all, Ephesians 4:13. Everyone hath his distinct size, stature, or age, which he is to arrive unto. So everyone may grow up to be a “perfect man,” though one be taller and stronger than another. And to bring every man to perfection, according to his measure, is the design of the ministry, Colossians 1:28. So when any grace is raised to a constant sincere exercise, it is said to be “perfect,” 1 John 4:18. Wherefore the τελειοι here, “the perfect,” or “those of full age,” are such as being instructed in the doctrine of the gospel, and using diligence in attending thereunto, have made a good progress, according to their means and capacities, in the knowledge of Christ and his will.

2. Unto this sort of hearers “strong meat” doth belong; that is, it is to be provided for them and proposed unto them. [the duty of pastors!] This is useful for their state and condition. What is intended by this strong meat, food, or nourishment, hath been declared already.

3. The reason is subjoined whence it is that strong meat belongs unto these persons; or rather, a further description is added, whence it will appear that it doth so. They have “their senses exercised to discern good and evil.” And we must inquire, — (1.) What are the senses intended. (2.) How they are exercised. (3.) What it is to discern both good and evil.

(1.) For the first, the allusion is still continued between infants and those that are adult. Infants have all their senses. For αἰθητηρια are properly “sensuum organs,” the organs of the external senses. These infants have, even eyes, ears, and the like. And they have their internal sense in its principle. But they know not how to use them, unto any advantage. They cannot by their taste distinguish between food which is good and wholesome, and that which is noxious or pernicious. And the senses intended are the faculties of understanding and judging spiritual things; the abilities of the mind to discern, judge, and determine concerning them. And these, in several degrees, are really in all sorts of hearers, babes and those of full age. But, —

(2.) In those of full age these senses are λελμυνασμενα, “exercised.” This makes the distinction. They are not so in babes. Hence they are not ready and expedite in their acts about their proper objects. They can neither make a right judgment about spiritual truths, nor duly apprehend the mysteries of the gospel when proposed unto them; and that because the intellectual faculties of their minds are not exercised spiritually about them. And the word doth not denote an actual exercise, but that readiness, ability, and fitness for anything, which is attained by an assiduous exercise; as a soldier who is trained is ready for his duty, or a wrestler for prizes (whence the allusion is taken) unto his strivings. Wherefore, to have our senses exercised in the way intended, is to have our understandings and minds, through constant, sedulous study, meditation, prayer, hearing of the word, and the like means of the increase of grace and knowledge, to become ready, fit, and able to receive spiritual truths, and to turn them into nourishment for our souls. For so it follows, they are thus exercised, —

(3.) Προς διακρισιν χαλου τε και χαχου, “to the discerning of good and evil.” Διακρισις, is an exact judgment, putting a difference between things proposed to us; a determination upon a right discerning of the different natures of things. And that which this judging and determining faculty is here said to be exercised about, is good and evil. But whereas they are doctrines and propositions of truth that the apostle treats concerning, it might be expected that he should have said, ‘to the discerning, or dijudication, of what is true and false.’ But, [1.] The allusion to food, which he still carries on, requires that it should be thus expressed. Of that which is or may be proposed as food unto us, some is wholesome and nourishing, some hurtful and noxious; the first is good, the latter evil. [2.] Though the first consideration of doctrines be, whether they be true or false, yet on that supposition the principal consideration of them concerns their subject-matter, whether it be good or evil unto our souls, whether it tend unto our edification or destruction. But whereas it is the oracles of God that are the food proposed, and no evil can be supposed to be in them, what need of this faculty of discerning in this case between good and evil? [1.] The similitude required a respect to both, because food of both sorts may be proposed or set before us. [2.] Though nothing but what is good be prepared for us in the Scripture, in the oracles of God, yet this ability of judging or discerning between good and evil is necessary unto us in the dispensation of them. For, 1st, That may, by some, be proposed unto us as taken from the Scripture, which indeed is not so, which is not wholesome food, but mere poison to the souls of men. Such are those hurtful and noisome opinions which men of corrupt minds do vent, pretending that they are derived from the Scripture, wherein indeed they are condemned. Or, 2dly, Without this spiritual ability we may ourselves misapprehend or misapply that which is true in its proposal, whereby it may become evil and noxious unto us. To avoid these dangers, it is necessary that we have our senses exercised unto the discerning both of good and evil.

Wherefore these persons of full age, are such as are meet to have the mysteries of the gospel, and those especially about the priesthood and sacrifice of Christ, preached unto them, seeing their minds and understandings are so exercised about things evangelical, as that they are able to judge aright about the things proposed unto them, discerning their goodness and suitableness unto the nourishment of their souls, as also to discover what is evil, and to reject it.

4. This ability is attained δια την εζω “by reason of use” it is a “habit;” and a habit is a firm, rooted disposition, giving readiness unto and facility in acts about its proper object. Now the apostle intends such a habit as is acquired by use and exercise; whence we render it “use.” The first principle or spring of spiritual light is infused by the Holy Ghost. The improvement hereof into a fixed habit is by constant and continual exercise. Now this habit or use respects all the ways and means that are appointed for our increase in the knowledge of the mysteries of the gospel. For hereby the mind, being accustomed unto the senses of the word of God, is enabled to make a right judgment of what is proposed unto it. And the observations further clearing the sense of the words, wherewith we shall close our exposition of this chapter, are these that ensue: —

1. No judgment is so to be feared and deprecated as a deprivation of the dispensation of the word. No judgment is like famine: “They that are slain with the sword are better than they that be slain with hunger; for these pine away, stricken through for want of the fruits of the field,” Lamentations 4:9. And no famine like that of the word, which God threateneth as the sorest of his judgments, Amos 8:11. This is as much to be dreaded above the other as the soul is to be preferred before the body, and spiritual life above natural. To be deprived of the food of our souls is of all distresses the most dreadful. And we may do well to consider, that when Egypt was in the midst of its plenty, — which no doubt was sufficiently abused, — it was then that their consuming famine was at the door. [This is the reason why the Prosperity Gospel is so insidious and a judgment upon them that sit under its preaching; it gives the hearers what they want or lust after, tickling their ears, and not what they need. see the next point, 2. immediately following]

2. No temporal mercy is so liable unto abuse as fullness of bread. This, joined with pride and idleness, which usually accompany it in the world, produced the sins of Sodom, Ezekiel 16:49. So is it with the fullness of this spiritual food, — spiritual pride and spiritual sloth are apt to grow up with it, to corrupt and abuse it. It requires much wisdom and heedfulness to manage ourselves aright under the plentiful dispensation of the word, such as at this time we enjoy. Some apparently are proud and delicate, waxing wanton under their enjoyment, so that wholesome food is despised by them, — nothing will serve them but some poisonous dainties of fond and foolish imaginations. And some are slothful, thinking all pains and charge too much that they take or are at about the word. The curiosity and sloth of these days bode no good. I am almost persuaded that the generality of the Egyptians derided Joseph, when they saw him make such diligent and vast preparations in the years of plenty, when for so long a time together “the earth brought forth by handfuls.” If they did not think his labor altogether needless, why did they not do in like manner, why did they make no provision for themselves? — which afterwards they so smarted for. Learn, therefore, of him as well as you are able, to lay in provision of this spiritual food in a time of plenty, that you may have some stores for your use in an evil day that may be approaching.

3. Those who by any means endeavor to obstruct the dispensation of the word, they do their endeavor to famish the souls of men. They keep their food from them, without which they cannot live. Whether this be done by negligence, ignorance, or disability in those who take upon themselves to be God’s stewards, but have none of his provision under their disposal, or whether it be done out of a real hatred to the word, the cruelty is dreadful, and the crime will be avenged. The people will curse him who hoardeth corn in a time of dearth; and God will curse them who, at any time, detain from others the bread of life.

4. The word is to be esteemed, valued, and sought after, as our daily food. Negligence and carelessness about the food of our souls is too great an evidence that there is no principle of life in us. Think not too much of your pains.

Obs. 2. Whereas the word is food, it is evident that it will not profit our souls until it be eaten and digested.

It is called here τροφή, “nourishment;” which food is not as it is prepared, but as it is received. When manna was gathered and laid up, and not eaten, it “stank and bred worms.” We see that some take great pains to come and hear the word. This is but the gathering of manna, What do you do with it afterwards? If it lie by you, it will be of no use. But what is required unto this eating and digestion, was, as I remember, before declared.

Obs. 3. It is an evidence of a thriving and healthy state of soul, to have an appetite unto the deepest mysteries of the gospel, or most solid doctrines of truth, and to be able profitably to digest them.

This is the substance of the character which the apostle here gives of such persons; and he blames these Hebrews that such they were not: and therefore such we ought all to be, who live under circumstances and advantages like to theirs. This is the property of a thriving soul, of a good proficient in the school of Christ. He is naturally inclined to desire the declaration of the most weighty and substantial truths of the gospel; in them is he particularly delighted, and by them is he profited: whereas if you take others beyond milk, or first principles, ordinarily they are at a loss, and very little benefited by any provision you can make for them. But yet sometimes it falls out in these things spiritual as it doth in things natural. Some persons under sickness and distempers, having their appetite corrupted, and their taste vitiated, do greatly desire, and impetuously long after strong food; which is no way meet for them, and which, when they have eaten it, does but increase their indisposition and heighten their distemper. So some, altogether unmeet for the right understanding and due improvement of the deep mysteries of the gospel, yet, out of pride and curiosity, do neglect and despise the things which are suited unto their edification, and desire nothing, delight in nothing but what is above them, and indeed beyond their reach. That we may not be deceived, nor deceive ourselves herein, I shall give some differences between this property of sound, thriving, and healthy souls, desiring, delighting in, and profiting by the strong meat of gospel mysteries, and the inordinate longing of spiritually sick and distempered minds after those things which are not meet for them:

1. The desires and appetite of the former are kept always within the bounds of what is written and plainly revealed in the word; for we have showed that the deepest mysteries have the plainest revelations. Offer them anything that is not plainly attested by the word, and they turn from it as poison. They have learned in all things to “think soberly,” according to the analogy of faith, Romans 12:3. They would be wise, but unto sobriety, and not above what is written. But for the other sort, if anything be new, curious, seemingly mystical, removed from the common sense and apprehensions of Christians, without any due consideration whether it be a truth of God or no, that is it which they run greedily after, and catch at the empty cloud of. Their principal business is to “intrude themselves into the things which they have not seen, being vainly puffed up by their fleshly minds,” Colossians 2:18.

2. The former sort, upon the declaration and discovery of any deep, important mysteries of the gospel, are greatly taken up with a holy admiration and reverence of God, whose these things are. So our apostle, having in the 9th, 10th, and 11th chapters of his Epistle to the Romans, treated of the deep mysteries of electing grace, and the effects of it, he shuts up his whole discourse in an admiration of God, and an ascription of glory unto him, Romans 11:8-36. So is it with all holy and humble souls, upon their instruction in and view they have of the mysteries of the gospel, in that marvellous light whereinto they are translated. The other sort satisfy themselves in their own speculation, without being much affected with the greatness or glory of God, in the things they imagine themselves to know.

3. The former sort do find real food and nourishment in this strong meat, so that their faith is strengthened, their love increased, and holiness promoted in their souls by them. They find by experience that such things do not only sound in their ears or float in their minds in the notion of them, but that really and truly their faith feeds upon them; and their whole souls being affected with them, they are encouraged and directed by them in the course of their obedience. Others, whose desires proceed from the distempers of pride and curiosity, find none of those things; and so their itching ears are suited, and their inquisitive minds satisfied, they regard them not. Hence it is hard to see one of these notional persons either fruitful or useful; neither can they bear those parts of the yoke of Christ which would make necessary the constant exercise of faith and love.

4. The former sort are always more and more humbled, the latter more and more puffed up, by what they attain unto. But I must not further enlarge on these things. There yet remain two observations more, with the naming whereof we shall shut up our discourses on this chapter.

Obs. 4. The assiduous exercise of our minds about spiritual things, in a spiritual manner, is the only means to make us to profit in hearing of the word. [And that is we must be spiritually minded and not earthly minded, contemplating those truths continually, meditating on his law day and night...and then we will good success...against the enemies of your soul.]

When our spiritual senses are exercised by reason of constant use, they are in a readiness to receive, embrace, and improve, what is tendered unto them. Without this we shall be dull and slow in hearing, — the vice here so severely reprov'd.

Obs. 5. The spiritual sense of believers, well exercised in the word, is the best and most undeceiving help in judging of what is good or evil, what is true or false, that is proposed unto them.

Common Grace vs. Special/Saving Grace Described

Self-examination - what to look for to judge of yourself if you have saving grace, what the Spirit does in the Soul. Christ's blood purchases common graces. The foundation for the contempt of grace. The importance of the mind and understanding. Light and affections together is vital. The value of Christian knowledge; to grow in it. Grace and knowledge are inseparable. The Parable of the Ten Virgins by Thomas Shepard (Vol. II)

Part I, SECT. V. p332

V. Sanctification, in the room of Self-seeking.

This work of the Spirit hath had many scratches, and passed under divers censures, that if that question should be asked of it, which once Christ made concerning himself, "Whom say men that I am?" We shall find five several apprehensions of it.

1. Some have made it common, and that this treasure may be digged out of dung-hills, that the Lord casts these pearls to swine, that a carnal heart may have all these gifts and graces which the righteous have, and Adam had, and perish at last. And hence no evidence from it at all.

2. Some have not made it thus common, but proper to the elect, and that none are justified but they are sanctified, and e contra. But it hath been, and, they think it is so disguised with the mixture of sin and temptation, and cannot be known or very hardly. If so, that though the Lord Jesus "come unto his own," and dwell not only in their houses, but in their hearts, yet they know him not.

3. Some say it may be known, but not as dwelling in our hearts, but as inherent in Christ, making the inherent grace of Christ in Christ himself to be our sanctification, which the apostle makes to be our righteousness. And so as the Papists abolish Christ's righteousness for justification, by making it to consist only in infusion of grace in us; these abolish Christ to be our sanctification, by making all our sanctification to consist in inhesion [the action or state of inhering in something- inherent] in Christ out of us.

4. Some say there is a sanctification in us; but wherein doth it consist? Not in any habitual holiness, or graces in us, but in the immediate actings of Christ in us, and so the Lord makes his music without any strings, and reveals things to us without eyes, and makes us live without any power of life: and so after justification they put a Christian in such an estate of sanctification as that he is a mere patient, in next disposition to move, if he be moved; like a weather-cock, which hath no power at all to move, but as the wind blows it, good or bad.

5. Some grant that there is a sanctification proper to the faithful, and in the faithful an habitual holiness, and consisting in a most blessed, inward, total change. But when they come to application of this to themselves, they think that if they have some reformation with some inward affection, they think every overly change is sanctification, and this must be a good evidence to them. And so like some herbalists that treat of the sovereign excellencies of several herbs, but when they come to gather them in the garden, they rake their counterfeits in the room of them. The causes of which variety of apprehensions is the rareness of it (and therefore it is unknown), and the corrupt experience of men.

I shall therefore lay level these things, by shewing you what that measure of sanctification is which is in us, and which is peculiar to the elect, and which also may be known by them which have it: and therefore shall not speak of sanctification at large, which is the change of the whole man by the death of Christ, whereby he is separated from sin, and sin mortified in him; and by the life of Christ, whereby he is dedicated unto Christ, and lives his life. But I still treat of it now, so far forth especially as this change may be known by it; and therefore I oppose it to self-seeking.

Question. But why do you oppose sanctification to self-seeking'?

Answer 1. Because this sanctification, I now speak of it so far forth as it may be seen; now it is seen here chiefly, because it may be said, here it is. But hypocrites have a change. Wherein may it be known to be different from theirs? Why, the change of the heart chiefly appears in the change of the utmost end.

2. Because as the pollution of the whole man, and all his actions, civil, moral and religious, consist chiefly, and appear in this self-seeking, or making ourselves our utmost end. This makes the most glorious actions vile, and stains them all. So the sanctification of a man consists chiefly, and appears in making the Lord our utmost end in all we do: So that though the actions be never so mean and poor, yet this puts a glory and lustre on them, and is the crown of them, even of the "giving of a cup of cold water," Matt. vi. 22. "If thy eye be single." Look therefore, as before the Lord justifies the soul, every man living seeks himself as his last end and good; and out of this captivity no power can redeem them, Dan. iv. 30, Gen. xi. 4. So after it, the Lord sanctifies the soul with such a measure of his grace, as makes the Lord his utmost end: And this no other have.

Let me, therefore, shew you what this sanctification is more fully, and that with all the chief ingredients in it, that so it may be the better known.

It is the renovation of the whole man, appearing in the change of a man's utmost end. But more particularly,

It is that work of the Spirit in the soul, whereby the soul beholding the glory of Christ, and feeling his love, hereupon closeth with the whole will of Christ, and seeketh to please him, as his happiness and utmost end.

For look, as in self-seeking there are four things:

1. A man beholds himself, and some good in himself.

2. Loves himself abundantly.
3. Pleaseth his own will.
4. Doth this as his utmost and last end. So here in its description of sanctification, which I oppose chiefly to self-corruption, are four things.

1. The soul beholds the Lord in all his glory, seeing of him present with him, in all his glory, and set before him. Psal. xvi. 8. For this is one necessary ingredient to his sanctification and seeking the Lord as his utmost end. For why doth a man seek himself?. He fees some glory and good in himself, non in the Lord. And hence we say of some men, whose pride spoils their parts, they know themselves too well, and hence saints, when they see their own vileness, and fee the Lord, they are so far from seeking, as that they loathe themselves. Therefore when the Lord reveals himself to the soul in his glory, this makes them seek him and not themselves, I Cor. i. 30. "Christ is made wisdom, righteousness," &c. "that all might glory in him." For this is the glory of Christ, and the first principle of seeking the Lord, the soul fees his good laid up in the Lord more than in himself; nay, wholly in the Lord, not at all in himself [As Shepard says in another place, "Faith springs from the destruction of our own excellency and the ruins of it." See pg 100]. His wisdom is in him; he cannot but wilder till utterly lost without him. His righteousness is in him, he could never have one sin pardoned by angels' holiness without him. His sanctification is in him, he could not have the least thought nor desire, but the Lord must work it in him. His redemption is in him, there could not be freedom one hour from unknown evils but by him. Hence seeing him such an one, he seeks him. As why do men seek men, especially if great? Why do men desire to stand before princes, and please them, so that they will not gladly offer them the least distaste? Because they see them before them, beholding of them, apt to be angry, if displeased; and their greatness awes them. So here. Why is not the Lord Jesus pleased? He is not seen in his glory, nor made really present; and hence, Rev. v. 12,13. When they saw him "on his throne, they cast down their crowns, and gave him glory."

2. The soul also feels his love, and so abundantly loves him again. For how come men to seek themselves in everything, and they cannot but do it? It is because they love themselves, and that abundantly, necessarily, as fire burns; so, though they burn so hot in this love, that at last they consume themselves. So how do any, can any seek the Lord? We know the apostle saith, 1 Cor. xiii. 5, "Love seeks not her own." When the Sun hath put out this fire of our self-love, when the sense of the Lord's love hath kindled that love to the Lord again, as that it abundantly loves Christ, now it will seek the things of Christ, and not its own things. And as there is abundance of self-love, that men are eaten up with it; so there must be much love, which must be abundantly shed in the heart, so as to eat up that, arising from the sense of the Lord's love, and that abundantly. For many a man comes to have some good will and affection and love to the Lord, but yet never comes to seek the Lord as his last end, and live to him. Why? Because he hath not tasted abundantly of the Lord's mercy, grace, and love, Psal. lxxxvi. 12, 13. And hence the incomparable spirit of Paul, "I seek not yours, but you:" Wherein? In being "willing to spend." But, save yourself Paul. Nay, "and to be spent;" With much ado? Nay, "most gladly." Though you love me not, because I love you. So here, though Christ should not love, yet he is worthy, he hath done enough, and now the soul will not only do, but rejoice, nay, in sufferings; because his love is not dropped, but shed in our hearts. And hence it is a never-failing rule, little love or assurance of it, little seeking the Lord; much assurance, much seeking him.

3. Hereupon the soul closeth with the whole will of Christ, and pleaseth it, because it pleaseth him. It is with every man, as it was with Sampson, he would needs have a wife of the Philistines. Why so? Judges xiv. 3. Because "she pleaseth me." So, why will men seek themselves, lave themselves, love themselves, and please their own wills? Because it pleaseth them. Look therefore as the soul when he loved himself, did seek to please only his own will in everything, and it is good because it pleaseth me; so the soul, whose heart is now endeared to Christ, though he cannot perfectly do it (that is in heaven) yet he seeks to give the whole will of Christ content, because it pleaseth Christ. And this is that God hath sworn his people shall have, Luke i. 74, 75. "And that Christ hath delivered us from all our enemies," (for the great reason why men cleave not to the Lord, and please, which we account friends, which are the Lord's enemies, Satan and world) "to serve him without fear," i; e. in love, and "in holiness and righteousness," i.e., his whole will, "all our days." And hence, Eph. v. 8, 9, "They were darkness, but now are light," by faith, now there is sanctity; "walk as children of light." Wherein consists that? "Proving what is acceptable to God." Hence, Eph. vi. 6, They should "please Christ, doing the will of God from the heart." And this is so necessary, that, Gal. i. 10, the apostle saith, "If I please men," i. e., their wills, "I am not Christ's." And this is "walking worthy" of the Lord, pleasing him in all things," and this is fruit, the end of the tree and leaves also, and differencing a tree from all other, that be beautiful, but barren, Col. i. 10.

Quest. But why do you make this to consist in pleasing the whole will of Christ, and not of God the Creator?

Answer 1. Because our sanctification now cannot please God as a Creator, though it may please him that is the Creator in Christ, because only perfect holiness can please him.

2. Because Christ hath pleased the Father by the holiness of himself: now this being done, and therefore God having put all things into his hands, having done that for us, we are to give content to him. And herein our sanctification is differing from the image Adam had, who in closing with the will of God, looked upon him as a Creator; ours respects a Redeemer, who hath bought us to himself, and hence we are to respect him in our actions now.

CHAP. XV. SECT. I.

Shewing that there is a vast difference betwixt a sincere Christian, and the closest hypocrite.

Doct. 3. That there is a vast and great internal difference between those that are sincere indeed, and the closest hypocrites. Or, there are certain qualifications within, and operations of God upon the souls of the faithful, which make a very great difference between them, and the closest hypocrites.

For the Lord Jesus here sees the difference, and shows the difference, though but generally, I confess, in this verse: "Some were wise, others were foolish." Wisdom and folly are different qualities, and though these keep their residence chiefly in the mind, yet the Lord never did infuse any true wisdom into the mind, but there was a great change of the heart, nor never was any man left unto his own folly, but it did not only argue an-evil heart, but did ever arise from thence, Eph. iv. 18. So that Christ not only sees, but discovers to the churches a vast difference for them to take notice of. I confess the difference was not only in regard of open profaneness, or common conversation in living like men of the world, yet a difference here there is. For the opening of this point, I shall open these particulars.

1. That the Lord does make this inward difference.
2. That it is so great that the faithful do see it.
3. That it is so great that others cannot receive it when it is offered.
- 4- That it is so great that they cannot understand it.
5. The reasons why the Lord makes this internal difference.

1. That the Lord does make it. Only some scriptures now, Eph. v. 8, "You were darkness, now are light;" Eph. ii. 1. "You were dead, now are alive." It is true, there is a life hypocrites have which puts much difference between them and others; but if that does, what does the life of Christ in a man arising from the death of every sin? Acts xxvi.18. The Lord turns not only from "darkness to light, but from the power of Satan to God," together with which arises remission of sins. What is this, then, but a greater change than from hell to heaven? Is it not worse than hell to be under his, not only temptations, but power? And is it not better to be with God, and be in heaven?

2. It is so great that the faithful do see it. I confess at first work it is like a confused chaos; they know not what to make of it, but afterwards they can and do, 1 John v. 18, 19. We know we are "born of God, free from the dominion of sin," of which he speaks, and that the whole world lies in wickedness. Before a man is born again, he sees no difference between him and other men, but now he doth; and hence it is frequent in scripture for saints to express their experience of their double estate, Tit. iii. 2, 3 [² to speak evil of no one, to be peaceable, gentle, showing all humility to all men. ³ For we ourselves were also once foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving various lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another.] and they are commanded to try themselves, and may not only see Christ out of them, but Christ in them, except they be reprobates, 2 Cor. xiii. 5, and hence commanded to give thanks for this, Col. i. 12, which commands being evangelical, have a power to all the elect.

3. It is so great that others cannot receive it when it is offered, they are so far from having it in them, or counterfeiting, or making this inward work, that they cannot receive it, no not when the Spirit itself comes to work it, John xiv. .17, "The Spirit of truth, which the world cannot receive." It doth receive prophetic gifts, and common graces; but there is a higher and more divine work which they cannot receive, Rom. viii. 7, "It is not subject, nor can be subject to the law of God," where the holiness of God appears.

4. It is so great that they cannot understand it [grace]; what it is spiritually, only in fancy, 1 Cor. ii. 14. "neither can he know them;" and hence men lie groping all their life for grace, and ask and have not, because they know not the thing they would have, John iv. 10, "If thou knewest, thou would ask, and he would give." [So, regarding the sinner's prayer, the praying sinner has no idea what he is asking for since he is still unsaved, blind, and spiritually dead; i.e., if he did know, "he would give", but since he doesn't, he (Jesus) won't. Hence this is another proof of the sin of presumption of the sinners prayer¹.] A beast cannot conceive what a life a man leads.

¹ Another point by John Flavel, Treatise of the Soul of Man, pg 45: But to me it is clear that the soul receives not its beginning by traduction or generation; for that which is generable, is also corruptible; but the spiritual, immortal soul (as it has been proved to be) is not subject to corruption. Nor is it imaginable how a soul should be produced out of matter, which is not endued with reason: or, how a bodily substance can impart that to another, which it has not in itself. If it be said, the soul of the child proceeds from the souls of the parents, that cannot be; for spiritual substances are impartible, and nothing can be descended from them. "And it is absurd to think the soul of Adam should spring from one original, and the souls of his offspring from another, while both his and theirs are of one and the same nature and species." To all which let me add, that as the assertion of their creation is most reasonable, so it is most scriptural. It is reasonable to think and say, "That no active power can act beyond, or above the proper sphere of its activity and ability". But if the soul be elicited out of the power of matter, here would be an effect produced abundantly more noble and excellent than its cause. And as it is most reasonable, so it is most scriptural. [And so in conversion, it is the Spirit that quickens, not the will of man, for "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." See also, John 1:13 and Romans 9:16; hence the fruitlessness of the sinner's prayer or any like prayer or petition of an unregenerate man. This is one reason why Thomas Shepard called the sinner's prayer a wicked presumption.]

5. Now follow the reasons why the Lord doth make this internal difference, or showing that there is this difference.

SECT. II

Reason 1. In regard of the infinite love of the Father, which he bears to the meanest believer above the more glorious hypocrite that ever lived. It is an everlasting love, and it is like that love he bears towards his own Son, John xvii. 16. Now if the Lord's love be not common to both, neither is the work or fruits of his love common in both, but a great difference there must be; for as it is with men, so it is with the Lord. There are three expressions of love. 1. Their looks. 2. Their promises of love. 3. Their works of love; so the Lord doth, ---

1. Create in his people glorious apprehensions of his blessed face appearing in the glass of the gospel, Rev. xxii. 4. ["They shall see His face, and His name shall be on their foreheads."]

2. The Lord makes many promises of love unto his people, which go to the very heart to cheer them, Hos. ii. 14. ["Therefore, behold, I will allure her, Will bring her into the wilderness, And speak comfort to her."]

3. The Lord confines not his love to looks and words, though it is wonderful to have the least of them; but you may read his love in his works of love. Now, those works peculiar to them, are first and chiefly the donation of Christ, for a man in redemption to a man in vocation; and then the peculiar fruits of this love expressed in peculiar operations upon the soul, and in the soul, which God's truth in the new covenant promises, and God's faithfulness executeth, Jer. xxxi. 33. and xxxii. 40, to take away the "stony heart," to write "laws in the heart," to "put fear into the heart." These are the peculiar effects of this new covenant, and they are operations in a man, which only the elect feel and wonder at grace for; Ephes. ii. 4, 5. "According to his great love hath he quickened us together with him." There is a kind of resurrection of a man's soul when it is brought home to Christ. Look as the bodies of the saints shall be different at the last day, so when God raiseth their souls from the dead here, there is a difference now.

Reason 2. In regard of the death and blood of the Lord Jesus, which was shed not only that he might be a God unto them, but that they might be a "peculiar people" unto him, Tit. ii. 14, "He gave himself for his people," not only to justify his people, but also to cleanse his church, Eph. v. 26, 27. For this has been God's great plot, first to perfect his people in their head; and then, lest there should be a golden head, and feet and hands of iron and clay, and because the church is not found lovely, therefore the Lord makes it lovely by little and little here, until it "appear without spot or wrinkle" at the last day. Do you think, brethren, that Christ's blood was shed to work no more in his people than in hypocrites? Was it only shed to take away guilt of sin from God's sight, and then to let a man wallow in the sins of his own heart? It is true, there is a work of sanctification which hypocrites have, which Christ's blood purchases, for I believe all common mercy and patience comes by Christ's blood, and so all common gifts and graces; but yet, beloved, there is a vast difference, their wills were never changed, though their minds were much enlightened; hence they sinned willfully. The Lord never was dear to them, hence secret despite grew up, that at last they committed the unpardonable sin, Heb. x. 26, 29.

Reason 3. Because those graces or qualifications, together with the operations of them which are in the faithful, are the same with Christ's, the same in kind and nature, John i. 16. "From his fulness we have received grace for grace." hence we are said to "bear his image", and because it is but little at first, hence "from glory to glory," 2 Cor. iii. 18. Now the Lord Jesus had not only the Spirit which he had without measure, but also he had many divine qualities, habits, or graces, which it is blasphemy to think that they were hypocritical or common, which the faithful receive from his fulness, and wherein they are made in their measure like unto him. So the saints have not only the Spirit, but also those peculiar operations of it wrought in them by the Spirit, whereby they come to be made like unto the Lord Jesus. Hence, as there was an infinite distance between the Lord Jesus and the best hypocrite, so the likeness that they have of the Lord Jesus, makes a difference now. And look, as there is a difference between a plant and a beast, a beast and a man, so there is a glorious life which saints have begun here in this life, which none have but themselves, 1 Pet. v. 10. They have the "first fruits," that which is meat and drink, which no man knows of that lies in hypocrisy and sins.

Reason 4. If there should be no difference, then these evils would follow: 1. This lays a foundation of contempt of grace, and of the beauty of holiness in the hearts and lives of God's people: for look as it is in the work of the Son in redemption, if Christ should have died as much for Judas as for Peter, and suspended the act of faith to apply this on the free will of either, then Judas had as much cause to thank Christ for his kindness as Peter and Peter had no more cause of blessing Christ for his love in redeeming him than Judas; and what cold praises will he then give him! So if the Spirit of Christ should sanctify or call a saint no more than an hypocrite, then the one has no more cause to be thankful for the work of the Spirit than the other: and when a man comes to look upon the work of the Spirit, and the graces of it, there is cold water cast upon those; this is no more than what a hypocrite has. Christ has not only redeemed by price, but also by power, from the power of Satan, sin, darkness, delusion, and not to be thankful for this, is not to be thankful for the redemption of Christ. Thou shalt never have it then that dost despise the Spirit of grace, whereby thou art but commonly sanctified.

2. Because this abolishes the use of all conditional promises made in the word; for you know they are made to some qualification or work of the Spirit in a man, some to mourning, poverty, faith, hunger, lostness, &c. now, if there should be no difference between seeming works in hypocrites and these, then, 1. The truth of the promises is destroyed; for the Lord saith, "They that hunger shall be satisfied." I will answer, hypocrites may hunger, and yet not be satisfied. 2. The use of these promises should be lost; for why should a man then cast his soul upon God's faithfulness in the promise, when it is but common love to him and hypocrites? If it be replied, the one has Christ, the other not. I answer, it is very true; but then I ask, Who is he a Christ to? It must needs be to a particular people described in the word by their peculiar qualities, flowing from their forms and subjects by which they are known? and now consider, Rev. xxii. 19. "Is God a God of the dead, and not of the living only?"

3. Because this makes the most holy men that ever lived deceivers of themselves and others; only look upon John, Christ's beloved disciple, and bosom-companion, he had received the anointing to know him that is true, "and he knew him, that is: true," 1 John ii. 3. But how did he know that? He might be deceived (as it is strange to see what a melancholy fancy will do, and the effects of it; as honest men are reputed to have weak brains, and never saw the depths of the secrets of God.) What is his last proof? "Because we know his commandments," i. e., we have them writ in our hearts, and keep, them, though we cannot fulfill them, it makes us every way more holy: Christ doth not keep them only, but we, through his grace, keep them: thus he proves it by a work in him. Now, thus I reply: if all works in the souls of saints be common to hypocrites, then John went upon false grounds, deceived himself, and all that heard him, and all the churches that ever were to this day.

CHAP. XVI. SECT. I.

Shewing that the hypocrisy of the heart proceeds from a want of saving illumination in the understanding.

The spring or the great cause and original of evangelical truth and hypocrisy is the mind of man.

For here there was an apparent difference between virgins in their practice and in their wills, as has been shewn; yet the Lord expresses it in general thus, that some of them were wise, (which is one part of the perfection of the understanding) and some of them were foolish (which is the great defect of light in the mind or understanding) because the truth of the one and the falsehood of the other, manifested that their hearts were, in their heads and minds; and the truth in the one, and hypocrisy in the other did arise and was maintained by wisdom in some of their minds, and by folly in the mind of some others. Folly or want of divine light made the one unready for Christ, wisdom or having of divine light, made the other prepared for him: not that it doth exclude the evil or change of the will and affections, but because they manifest themselves, and are maintained in the mind. Hence I say, one great reason or original of both lies in the mind. Matt. vi. 22, 23. "If thy eye be single, thy whole body is light," &c. The eye or mind of a man fits like a coach-man, and guides the head-strong affections; if now this be blind, there will be falls and deviations in crooked ways, John iii. 19, 20. "Light is come." Now what is the condemnation? Men love darkness," i.e., will be blind, and having sore minds and hearts, will not look up to the sun. They see not, nor receive not the truth in love, and hence condemned, and e contra. Hence, Deut. xxix. 1, 2, 3, 4. Moses sets down the causes of all their evils: "The Lord has not given you eyes to see to this day." They did see and hear by natural and acquired knowledge, but not by a divine, created, infused knowledge, all that God had wrought and done for them. Hence when the Lord intends to seal down the Jews under unbelief, Isaiah vi. 10, the Lord then said, "Shut their eyes lest they see, and so be converted." The heart makes the eyes blind, and the mind makes the heart fat. A man that is at enmity with God, the Lord sets him against himself. Hence men are left of God to their own lusts, Luke xix. 42, 44. "O that thou hadst known! and they knew not the day of visitation." Hence, Deut. xxxii. 29. "O that this people had been wise to consider their latter end!" You know it is, in the Proverbs of Solomon the frequent title of those that are sincere and false-hearted, the one is called wise, and the other foolish; insomuch, that some divines have made a necessity of a change and turning about of the will, when there is fulness and clearness of light in the mind. Else they say a man might be sapiens and yet impious too, which cannot be. But I dispute not about that; there be many brute creatures that imitate the knowledge of man, yet there is no mind of man or reasonable soul in them [see pg 703, 405, 712, 712, 97]; so hypocrites may have excellent abilities of reason, and yet fall short of that new mind, the eye and director of the whole man, that the saints have. It is ever dark night with them, the sun of glory never did yet arise upon them.

Section II

Because all divine light of glory is ever powerful through Christ to change the heart. Hence if hypocrites had it, their hearts would be sincere, which is not so, and hence they ever want [lack] it, whatever light else they have; and hence those that have it must be sincere, John viii. 32. "You shall know the truth, and it shall make you free," i.e., from your bondage of fears and sins; hence David prays for light, Psalm cxix. 33, 34, and then he shall be set at liberty. As iron is drawn to the load-stone by a secret hidden virtue, so there is a secret virtue of divine light that draws the most iron heart; nay, changes it, John xvii. 17. "Sanctify them through thy truth," &c. For this is the difference between God and man's teaching: and hence when the gospel comes in power, it comes in demonstration; whereby the heart is mightily overpowered, that it cannot but fall down before God, whose voice and truth it hears. And hence the young man saw some worth in Christ, but not enough, and hence he forsook Christ. Truth is not stones, but bread to them that see it indeed.

2. Because the mind is the first inlet of all sin and grace and hence all hypocrisy springs from thence. Hence when Satan laid his train to blow up all the world by sin, he first enters into dispute and parley with Eve, and as the apostle speaks, deceived her, Tim. ii. 14. "The woman was first deceived." And hence when Satan came with his last and strongest temptation, to draw away the heart of Christ to him, he attempted it by a sudden presenting to his mind the glory of all the world, hoping hereby to get in. Nay in the unpardonable sin there issumma excitas, to call evil good; and good evil. And hence the Pharisees that did commit it, were called blind; and when sin is entered, it strengthens itself by the mind, Heb. iii. 13. "Lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin." As it is with cities, they might easily be taken, but for the forts that are built about them, and the soldiers that are in them: so men set up their hearts and minds above, and against the Lord Jesus. The power of sin lies in the power of darkness, as the power of a weak state in the wisdom of its counsel. And hence when the Spirit comes, all the work of it is expressed by conviction of sin, righteousness and judgment, because convince one effectually, and you convert him. And hence when the Lord comes with his life, he comes in by light, Ephesians v. 14. "Christ shall give thee light." And hence when the gospel comes to take away all darkness and sin, it is said, Satan's chief policy lies in this, to blind men's eyes, 2 Cor. iv. 4. either by obscuring the light, or by kindling a false light in their minds, that they shall think they see, when their darkness remains; not but that there is filth enough in the will, but Satan knows that Christ shines into the heart by the mind; and hence he blinds men, and then he knows he shall damn men. Beloved, if men had the Spirit, it would lead them into all truth, now this the world cannot receive, because, John xiv. 17. "It knows him not." This is that which opens and shuts to all life and sin; not that bare light can change the will, but the Lord doth it by the power of his truth and light: and as it is with water coming through some mines, there is a healing virtue in it, so light coming from everlasting love, it heals men of their evils.

SECT. III.

Use 1. Hence see the danger of two sorts of men especially.

1. Of those that fly from the light, which is done sundry ways. I will mention only one that is used by a false heart. A man is troubled in mind concerning his estate, fears death and hell, and so few shall be saved, how can I be one, &c. How comes he to fear? The Lord has by his Spirit in the word discovered and found out his sin, the thief is taken and apprehended, and condemned, he hears still, but yet can find no peace. Why? Because he lives in those sins that he is convinced of. Hence the word raiseth damps and heart-qualms, that he has no peace, but is ever pulled from his own bottom and hypocrisy, and the word discovers more sins, and hence has no peace. The word will not give nor offer Christ and a base lust together, nor will not suffer any to have them both in peace. Hereupon the soul, finding no rest nor peace (which the false heart seeks for chiefly) flies from the light, especially if it has found out a shorter cut to its peace, by any device or golden delusions of men. And now they will hear there no more, and now the publishers of God's truth are tyrannical tormenters of the consciences of them that be weak, false prophets, that lead them out of the way of peace. And because of this, they think they were led out of the way of truth, because out of the way of peace. Or if they do come, they can sit with disdain and contempt of men (alas! they speak according to their light) and of all the truths of God, which shall one day be preached over again in flames of fire to their eternal horror. Revelation vi. 2. It is said, "Christ rides on a white horse, conquering and to conquer." Men have unruly hearts and strong hearts, and they will not die, nor yield presently. And hence when one sin is cast away, another steps into the room of it, and when that is gone, another supplies the place of it, and commonly the strongest sin and temptation is the last. Now, hence Christ goes on, rides on in the chariot of the word, conquering and to conquer still. Those that do yield, he saves; those that will not, he slays. Now these poor creatures have had Christ's arrows in them, and are wounded for some sin, but the Lord discovers more still; hence at last they fly away with the arrows in their hearts for ease. O poor creatures, know it, the Lord Jesus will find you out! You will not be conquered by him, you shall never be saved by him. You have light, you shall have delusions, endless unknown hypocrisy and darkness to be your portion. There is never a plain heart but he accounts that wound and trouble greatest mercy, and blesseth the Lord, that he will not give him his sins and peace with them too.

2. Those that fly not from the light of the truth, but give it the hearing, but yet let it slip; either not minding it, then, or not pondering it afterwards; that before they come, thirst not for more light, look not up for it, nor are mourning when the Lord hides it from their eyes. Some there be that be such all-sufficient men, so good they need be no better, so wise that they need no more; some insufficient indeed to know, and hence ever learning, hearing, but never coming to the knowledge of the truth. If light breaks not in, they can lie in darkness still, and not mourn; and think no more of it than a tale that is told, or news that is brought. O look to your standing: for you are in the high road to hypocrisy, and it is impossible you should be kept from it that lie so; John xii. 35. "Walk while you have the light, lest darkness come upon you." Satan knew, if light came in, Christ would come in: And therefore know it, all that time thou hast heard and heard, but not with divine light, hast got only somewhat to prate on now, to be of another opinion now from what thou wast: O, now, Satan has been let loose, by the dreadful vengeance of almighty God, to blind the, that so thou mightst die in thy hypocrisy and sin. O poor captives! mourn under this, and behold your danger for time to come.

Use 2. Hence see the reason why many that have had mighty strong affections at first conversion, afterwards become dry, and wither, and consume, and pine, and die away, and now their hypocrisy is manifest, if not to all the world by open profaneness, yet to the discerning eye of living Christians, by a formal, barren, unsavoury, unfruitful heart and course, because they never had light to conviction as yet. You shall have some ignorant creatures awakened by some thundering ministry, weep and mourn for sin, and after vanish into smoke, being never convinced of sin. Land floods of sorrow, without a spring of light, are dried up, and make the heart more fruitful in sin afterward. Many go under fears of wrath, and never get peace because never convinced of wrath. Many are affected with Christ, and with joy of the gospel, as the stony ground, but they wanting depth of earth, of conviction, die away again; and hence all the world can never stop a Christian in his shining profession, no more than they can the sun in his course, as Paul, 2 Cor. v. 11. "We knowing the terror of the Lord, persuade men." And hence Moses, Heb. xi. 27, feared no frowns of Pharaoh, cared for no honours from Pharaoh; he saw the God that was invisible; and hence Christ prays for his disciples, to be kept from evil. "The world has not known me, but these have known me," John xvii. When men are condemned to die, they take on, because now they see death, but here in time of health they see it not. If men wrong a child, their heart smites them, and grieves; but the Lord is abased, dishonoured, and men are not affected, because they want [lack] light, and see it not. If men be to match with a prince, or stand before him, it is counted blessedness; but before Christ, it is a burden, because men know it not. It is strange to see some people carried with mighty affection against sin and hell, and after Christ. And what is hell you fear? A dreadful place. What is Christ? They scarce know so much as devils do, but that is all. O, trust them not! Many have, and these will all, away to some lust, or opinion, or pride, or world; and the reason is, they never had light enough, John v. 35, "John was a burning and shining light, and they did joy in him for a season," yet as glorious as it was, they saw not Christ by it, especially not with divine light. It is rare to see Christians full both of light and affection. And, therefore, consider of this, many a man has been well brought up, and is of a sweet, loving nature, mild, and gentle, and harmless, likes and loves the best things, and his meaning, and mind, and heart is good, and has more in heart than in show, and so hopes all shall go well with him. I say, there may lie greatest hypocrisy under greatest affections; especially if they want light. You shall be hardened in your hypocrisy by them. I never liked violent affections and pangs, but only such as were dropped in by light; because those come from an external principle, and last not, but these do. Men are not affrighted by the light of the sun, though clearer than the lightning.

Use 3. Hence take heed of contenting yourselves with every kind of knowledge. Do not worship every image in your own heads, especially you that fall short of truth or the knowledge of it; for when you have some, there may be yet that wanting which may make you sincere. There are many men of great knowledge, able to teach themselves and others too, and yet their hearts are unsound. How comes this to pass? Is it because they have so much light? No, but because they want much; and therefore content not yourselves with every knowledge. There is some knowledge which men have by the light of nature, (which leaves them without excuse) from the book of creation, some by power of education, some, by the light of the law, whereby men may know their sin and evils, some by the letter of the gospel, and so men may know much, and speak well, and so "in seeing see not;" some, by the Spirit may see much, so as to prophesy in Christ's name, and yet be bid depart, Mat. vii. Now there is a light of glory, whereby the elect see things in another manner; to tell you how, they cannot, it is the beginning of light in heaven, and the same Spirit that fills Christ, filling their minds, that they know, by this anointing, all things, which if ever you have, you must become babes and fools in your own eyes. God will never write his law in your minds, till all the scribblings of it are blotted out. Account all your knowledge loss for the gaining of this. It is sad to see many a man pleasing himself in his own dreaming delusions, yet the poor creature in seeing sees not, which is God's heavy curse upon men under greatest means, and which lays all waste and desolate, Isaiah vi. "How long? Until all be waste," ver. 11.

Use 4. Hence see the right way of living a life of truth, of "being an Israelite in whom is no guile." Keep light in your minds, and you will keep truth alive in your hearts and lives. Many a sincere heart may have hypocrisy and much unsoundness in him, though he be no hypocrite. But how comes it so to be? And whence so little truth? and whence so many fears and doubts about their estates continually? O, men lose that glorious light that sometimes they have. For when you have it in an ordinance, O how sweet is the Lord and all his ways to you! Afterward you have lost your hearts, truly it is because you have lost your light.

Two ways hypocrisy vents itself, which God's people oppose.

1. In secret withdrawing of the heart to sin. O, now get light; for sin never draws away, but by appearance of some good at least, pro hic et nunc. James i. 14. Now put off the covering, keep the mind from being deceived, you will keep the heart from being hardened, deadened and withdrawn from God.

2. In performing duties, but not for Christ, as their utmost end; now the heart is bent this way, yet it fails, because light is gone, to see and behold the glory and blessedness of this. Men that have honour or gain in their eye, are carried violently after it. Men that are bound for a voyage, will go through, their eye leads them. Stephen speaks till the stones were about his ears, "I see Jesus," (saith he) at the right hand of God." 2 Cor. xv. 58. "Be abundant in the Lord's work, knowing that your labour is not in vain." Hence David, Psalm cxix. begs for knowledge of this and that, and then he will do it. O therefore keep it in your minds as precious, Prov. ii. 10. "If knowledge be pleasant," etc. And pray to God to keep it for you. Light is in the sun, and not ceased to this day: so if the Lord would put in this light, and be the perpetual fountain thereof to you, it would abide, etc. "Thy word have I hid in mine heart," &c. Psalm cxix. 11.

Section IV

Hence, learn the cure of hypocrisy, viz. remove the cause, which is folly, and if you would be sincere, O prize, and beg for more light, and love it, and you shall then after you have digged for it, find it. Would it not be sad to be led blind-fold like them till they were in the midst of Samaria, so till in the midst of hell? Would it not be sad to be like Sodomites, groping for the door, especially you that are come over to this country for more of the knowledge of Christ. O then beloved, take heed you bury not your minds in the earth, lose not your thoughts in the dung. And you must stand one day before God, when the book of the secrets of your hearts shall be opened, when if found too light, then would it not be a doleful parting to lose the Lord Jesus after such light and affections, for want of a little more light? O look to yourselves now!

*Means 1. Stick close to the guidance of the scriptures, and love them. Moses saith, "Then other nations shall say, what people so wise?" Deut. iv. 6. And these make "the men of God (a Tim. iii. 15.) full of God's Spirit, wise unto salvation;" and for neglect of this, the Lord gave, and does give men up to strong delusions, that they believe lies, viz. "because they loved not the truth." Never a truth but is unsealed by blood, and revealed to be the infinite wisdom of the Father, and love to poor lost men, where God opens all his heart; if men will despise these, it is a pity but they should be blinded. Do not scoff at those that know the Lord here; they are scripture-learned men; if not, never Spirit learned. Take this for your counsellor, in all your doubts and fears it will teach you. A man gets an opinion, or falls in love with a sinful corruption, both deceive him. Why so? Is there no word against against it? O, yes, but they will not hear it, but make God and scripture bow down to them, they will not be led by it. O, entreat the Lord to keep thee from that.

*Means 2. Be abundant in meditation daily, Psalm cxix. 99. It is a hundred to one else if not miserably deluded. And as the Spirit convinceth first of sin, righteousness and judgment, so let your thoughts be. This makes a man see far, and see much.

*Means 3. Practice what you know, and taste the sweetness of it there, Psalm cxix. 100. And then the heart will grow savingly full of divine light. Nothing makes men foolish but this. "O taste and see!" O, if men knew the sweet of this way of truth, they would ever walk in it, and bring others to submit to it! "Shall I hide from Abraham, that will teach his family?" Gen. xviii. 17. 19.

Means 4. Cast up your eyes to Christ glorified, being full of the Spirit for thee, and beg of him, as if he were with thee to send it down. As Solomon asked this. See John vii. 39.

Use 6. O learn to be exceeding thankful for any saving light the Lord has kindled in you, if ever it has been powerful to discover and remove the hidden hypocrisy of thy heart, that now the Lord has made thee plain and serious for him, that it is death not to live, heaven for to live unto him. O, then bless the Lord for that means that did it for thee, thou mightst have perished in thy own delusions and dreams. Time was, when thou wast deceived; now the Lord has made thy eyes brighter than the sun, to see such things as are hid from great ones in the world. O though it be but a little, yet if real and saving light, bless him. A man that has been in midst of sands, and without a pilot, afterwards looks back, and saith. There I might have split. O, this is wonderful to him! O, Christ did thus !" I thank thee thou hast hid," &c. Mat. xi. 25. The Lord has hid them from heads and hearts of many wise and prudent, and ever they shall be hid, and e contra, reveal -ed them to thee, a babe, a weak one, a poor ignorant one, Mat. xvi. 17. "Flesh and blood has not revealed it," so as to build here on this righteousness, to bring all light and life from Christ, and cleave alone to him.

O, remember you are called "out of darkness into "marvellous light, to show forth his virtues!" What canst thou desire more than eternal life? And this is it, 1 John v. 20. John xvii. 30.

Self-examination, Evaluating Experience

code14

The value of one's true spiritual experience for our consolation, a work of grace in us. One good reason why we partake of the divine nature, to discern our hearts. Judging between common and saving grace. How to know if you are really saved.

SECTION V.

O, therefore, content not yourselves with any hopes your estate is right, until you find this difference; for the Lord speaks peace only to his people, and his people are differenced from all others. Hence how can you say peace is yours, till this be cleared up unto you?

I shall speak to two sorts of people.

1. Those that content themselves with anything that may stop and quiet conscience, any slight work, any poor desires, any hedge faith, any moral performances, any groundless conjectures will serve their turn. And, being full, they can hear all sermons, no wind will shake them, no searching, threatening truths concern them; they are all so good, that they think the Lord means not them. Well, I say no more to you but this: Know it, that the time is coming that the Lord Jesus will try you, and examine you to the very bran; and will descry all thy paint, and open all thy lusts and thoughts; and thy nakedness, and shame, and confusion shall be seen of all the world.

2. Those that content themselves with the revelation of the Lord's love, without the sight of any work, or not looking to it. I desire the Lord to reveal himself abundantly more and more, to all that have the Lord savingly revealed unto them. For this is the misery, Christ is a hidden thing, and so is his love. Yet consider,—

1. God reveals not his love to any hypocrite, but to his people that have a work far beyond them.

2. That the testimony of the Spirit does not make a man a Christian, but only evidenceth it. As it is the nature of a witness, not to make a thing to be true, but to clear and evidence it. And, therefore, whether the Spirit in the first or second place clears God's love, I dispute not, because it is doubtful; yet be sure you find out the difference, viz., some work in you, that no hypocrite under heaven has. Else what peace can you have?

1. Hereby you come to prevent the strongest delusion that Satan has to keep men in bondage to himself, viz., to give men great peace, and sometimes great ravishment, while they are in their sins, that so he may harden them there still. Luke xi. 21. Now, by taking this course, and going to Christ to untie the knots of Satan, you do now undermine the main plot of Satan, you break his head, having recourse to Christ to do this. His policy is, let your heart alone, let Christ alone with that. But now you may be sure all your consolation is of the right make.

2. Otherwise you quench the Spirit, and resist the testimony of the Spirit, at least one great part of it. For the Spirit when it does come to witness God's love, it answers all the doubts and objections of the soul that it had before. Now, the great doubt of God's people is not only,

Am I elected, am I justified and accepted? but, Am I called, am I sanctified, are not my desires, my faith, my love counterfeit, which I may have, and yet go to hell?

Now, the Spirit, when it comes, clears all doubts, not fully, but gradually; for it is the most clearing witness, and, therefore, (John xiv. 18,20), "At that day you shall know that I am in you, and you in me, and I in the Father." The Spirit does not only say, Christ is out of you in heaven, preparing and interceding; but in you, sanctifying, preparing thee for glory, that art a vessel of glory; "and you in me," by faith, by love, desire, etc. Now, when a man shall say, I look to no work, but only for the Spirit to reveal the Lord's love; in seeming to desire the Spirit, he doth resist the Spirit of God.

3. Otherwise you shall be deprived of all that abundant consolation which the word holds out before you. For suppose you say, I look not to the work of God in me, to receive any consolation from that, or any promise made to that; I look only to the revelation of the Spirit.

Ans. 1. There is never a promise but the Comforter is in it, and they are given for that end, to give strong consolation; now, if you look to no work, nor no conditional promise, nor to find the condition in you, (which yet Christ must and doth work,) Lord, what abundance of sweet peace do you lose! Rev. vii. 17, The Lamb leads them to the "living fountain of waters, and God wipes away all tears." And, for aught I know, you shall die for thirst that refuse to do it. "O, slow of heart to believe all that the Scriptures have writ"—all that God has spoken. Ought you not thus to be comforted?

But, 2. If you look to a Spirit without a work, whilst you do seek consolation from the Spirit, you cannot avoid the condemnation of the word. You say, the Spirit has spoken peace to you. But do you love Christ? I look not to that, but to the Spirit. Why, the word saith, "He that loves not him, let him be anathema." So, is the league between your sins and your souls broken? Ans. I look not to that. Why, John saith, " He that committeth sin is of the devil." 1 John iii. 8, 9. Are you new creatures? I look not to that. Why, the word saith, " Unless you be born again, you cannot enter into the kingdom of God." And the Lord knows, but on your death beds, thus Satan may assault you, and then will the Lord say, Nay, look to yourself. The word shall be Belshazzar's terror. Consider Ps. xxxii. 1, 2.

4. Look to it, else you shall be deprived of further manifestation and communion with the Lord Jesus. The Lord reveals not all of himself at once; the day dawns before the sun riseth, and there is a further manifestation of the Lord in this life to his people, not for, but when they, indeed, maintain such works before him ; (John xiv. 21,) "I will manifest myself unto him" How? O, saith Christ, "I'll come and sup with him." Never! think the Lord will dishonor himself so far as to come into a filthy heart. Sin does and will grieve God's Spirit, that he will only accuse, not speak peace to you, till all is mended.

5. Else you may fall everlastingly away, as those, (Heb. x. 29,) They had " received the knowledge of the truth and were sanctified," but their wills and hearts never changed.

O, take heed there be left "only a fearful looking for of vengeance." You stand on the brim of destruction every moment that do it not. For it is plain hypocrisy not to bring works to the light; it is not ceasing to go on in a covenant of work. John iii. 20. And if the Lord does love you, and you will not take the counsel of the word, the fire of the Lord shall try you. And when that comes, and conscience shall ask, Wherefore comes all this great evil upon me? when your miseries shall be great, O, it shall be said, This was because I loved not the Lord, I forsook the Lord, etc. O, therefore, look to the Lord now to cleanse you! Zech. xiii. 9.

Object. It is true there is a difference but is it possible to know it seeing that a false heart may go so far especially to know it in itself?

Ans. It is true, it is difficult for men ministers or angels to reveal it yet it is easy for the Lord Jesus to reveal it and this he does do. This light discovers hidden things as they are; his "Spirit leads unto all truth." And this is a peculiar privilege and honor as for God to know; so they, partaking of the divine nature, for them to know their own hearts, Jer xvii 9. And although it be an easy thing for hypocrites that never knew what grace meant, to be mistaken, yet after the Lord has made it known to the elect, it is no easy matter to deceive them. As it is with apothecaries that know when they meet with counterfeit drugs or jewelers that know the difference between Bristol stones and pearls. As the blind man saith, "Whereas I was blind, now I see;" so I was dead, now behold I live. "Old things are passed away, all things are become new." 1 Pet ii 9. They are "called out of darkness into marvelous light." If they could not know a difference, why would the Lord command them to add one grace to another and "grow in grace"? May they not well reply, Alas! Lord, I know not trash from treasure? I know nothing thou hast commanded me to do, but hypocrites may have and do. I say, therefore, the work may be seen in itself, and that by a threefold light.

I. The light of the Word, which is a divine revelation of or concerning God and man, and of man, not only as fallen in Adam, (which discovers all his sins, their nature, their end, etc.,) but as risen again and recovered in Christ; the birth, being, breeding of the new creature. It discovers all hypocrisy of the heart, so that they shall be forced to say, The Lord has found me out; and saints shall say, The Lord has done me good. As if the question be, Whom doth the Lord Jesus love? You need not go to heaven for it; "the word is nigh thee." Those that love Christ: who are those?" Those that keep his commandment*," etc. So that the word is a light to discover truth from falsehood, the work of grace from the work of hypocrisy; and by this light saints may and do know what the work is. And it argues dreadful unbelief and hypocrisy not to do thus. John iii. 19-21. And this all the saints are commanded to do. 2 Pet. i. 19. "We (sealed with the Spirit) have a sure word of prophecy," etc. "Which is a light in a dark place," both to reveal God's heart and our hearts unto us; hence "it makes us wise to salvation."

II. The light of the Spirit going with the word reveals the work, without which the work cannot be seen no more than a book written in the fairest hand or print can be seen without light to see it by. And hence God's people cannot presently read what the Lord has written, etc. 1 John iii. 24. That look as it is with Scripture, Papists say they are obscure, and how do we know them? We answer, there are divine characters of majesty and glory stamped upon them, whereby we, by the same Spirit that writ them, see them, and are persuaded of them; so here. Or as it is in the work of creation: how can any see God in it? We say, in the very workmanship appears his power and eternity, wisdom, goodness, etc. Now, although atheists cannot see these, yet others do and can. So in the workmanship of the elect it is so. It is the glass of God's peculiar mercy and love. Now, they that never had it know it not, but the saints do, by the Spirit especially. Thus far we grant the Spirit's testimony, that it must reveal it.

III. The light of experience and sense. For saints have an experimental knowledge of the work of grace, by virtue of which they come to know it as certainly — as we dispute against the Papists — as by feeling heat, we know fire is hot; by tasting honey, we know it is sweet. Now, this is diversely apparent to experience.

1. By meditation of the work, in comparing it with the rule; for no dead creature can perform one spiritual living act of life [another argument against the sinner's prayer]; no, not a good thought, though they may think of good things. Now, the Lord has given to his people a most exact rule of life; hence, by meditation, they may see how far it agrees or disagrees with the rule, and judge of a living act by it; and so of the God and Lord of life to be there. Hence, "try yourselves; know you not that Christ is in you?" etc. And hence I never knew yet a thinking Christian deceived, and hence I fear all that make not this their trade, will be to seek, and so to begin again. O, the Lord teacheth his people hidden mysteries by this.

2. By the operation and working of it; for grace may be in the heart, and yet lying asleep, and raked up under the ashes, not seen, not felt; but in the operation of it, it may, which is peculiar as the form is. For how do we know we love or delight in any creature? By the operation of love and delight. [remember, delight in God is a grace.]

How did Christ manifest to the Pharisees that they were "of their Father the devil"? Why, "his lusts they would do." So how can any tell he knows the Lord, or loves the Lord, or believes in the Lord? The operation discovers it. James ii. 22. And hence, (Gal. v. 6,) "faith which works by love." [that is, if you've been given a love for God, you will contemplate the things of God habitually, and take great delight in it!] And though hypocrites act like them, yet there is a peculiar virtue in the one that is not in the other.

3. By their temptations and trials. Deut. viii. 2, "The Lord has led thee forty years to prove thee, and show thee what was in thy heart." Rom. v. 4,5, "Tribulation breeds experience, and that hope," or expectation of that which shall never make us ashamed. I will name no more. But look as we said to them that cried out against prayer without a book, we answer, Has a man dwelt in his own heart so many years, and not known his wants, to make him pray? nor the Lord's work of mercy to make him bless; so here.

Object. 2. But if a man looks to his work, this will interrupt and break his peace.

Ans. 1. It may and doth break and interrupt a false peace; as many say, yet they trust in the Lord's mercy, O, it is a presumptuous peace.

2. Neglect of this yields most unpeaceableness, even in them that are sincere. You have peace, and then break out into pride and passion again; then question all. The Spirit will sigh, not sing in that bosom. Ps. xxxi. 1-3; Judg. xvi. 20. Neither can you avoid the condemnation of the word, though you maintain consolation from the Spirit, nor suspicion of hypocrisy.

3. This is the way to peace. 2 Pet. i. 7-9; Matt. xi. 29, 30.

"But also for this very reason, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue, to virtue knowledge, ⁶to knowledge self-control, to self-control perseverance, to perseverance godliness, ⁷to godliness brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness love. ⁸For if these things are yours and abound, you will be neither barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. ⁹For he who lacks these things is shortsighted, even to blindness, and has forgotten that he was cleansed from his old sins." 2Pet1:5-9

"Take My yoke upon you and learn from Me, for I am gentle and lowly in heart, and you will find rest for your souls. ³⁰For My yoke is easy and My burden is light." Matt. 11:29-30

Christ's "yoke is easy," and yields peace in life and after life, too. Rev. xiv. 13, " Their works follow them." So that hereby comes double peace and rest.

1. From horror.

2. From sin, which is wonderful great.

Object. 3. But I look to Christ, I look to no work. If I have him I have all.

Ans. True. First look to have him, to be comprehended by him, that so you may comprehend him. But because you look for all in him, will you look for nothing from him? Will you have Christ sit in heaven, and not look that he subdue your lusts by the work of his grace, and so sway in your hearts? You despise his kingdom then. Do you seek for pardon in the blood of Christ, and never look for the virtue and end of that blood to wash you and make you without spot? etc. You despise his priesthood and blood then. Do you look for Christ to do work for you, and you not to do Christ's work and bring forth fruit to him? You despise his honor then. John xv. 8. If I were to discover a hypocrite or a false heart, I would say, It is he that shall set up Christ, but loathe his work. To have Christ is sweet, as Capernaum; to follow Christ is heavy. John xiv. 21,23.

Object. 4. But if I have the witness of the Spirit, what need I have any other difference?

Ans. The witness of the Spirit makes not the first difference. For, first, a man is a believer and in Christ, and justified, called, sanctified, before the Spirit does witness it, else the Spirit should witness to an untruth and a lie. For unbelievers are under wrath.

2. If the Spirit does not witness this peculiar work to be in you, and clear it to you, tell me how you can escape the anguish of conscience and the terrors of hell in your hearts, unless conscience be seared and blinded. When the Lord shall set conscience to ask and say, I choose none but whom I call, I call none but whom I justify, I justify none but whom I sanctify, and that not with a common, but a peculiar work. Is it so with you? If it be dark or doubtful, can you but think all your joys have been dreams and your witness delusions? Therefore look unto this.

Object. 5. But if I should do this, I should look to find some cleanness in myself, whereas I am to see nothing but ungodliness. Goats are clean creatures.

Ans. 1. When you stand before Christ's judgment seat to receive pardon, you are here to look upon all as unclean and yourselves ungodly.

2. When you come to look upon your sanctification, you are to see it as it is, mixed with sin and corruption, and so cause of being abased as low as hell for what is done; yet that cleanness and truth there is you must see too. Rom. vii. He felt "a law warring against the law of his mind;" yet he felt another law, too, which he made an evidence of his being in Christ. Rom. viii. 1.

"There is therefore now no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus,^[a] who do not walk according to the flesh, but according to the Spirit." Romans 8:1

Giving all the glory of it to Christ, "Not I, but Christ." And yet Paul was no goat. It is one thing to see grace in myself, another thing to look upon it as mine, to clear me withal. You are to see the Lord's work, and not appropriate it to yourself. And this, let me say, if there be no more than ungodliness in thee, and thou seest no more, thou shalt never see God in heaven. Heb. xii. 14. Nor didst never see him yet. 1 John iii. 6, 8. O, therefore, look to a work!

1. If you do not, you have no peace. For the Lord's sake do it before fire try you, or you stand scorching before the tribunal of God.

2. The sweet of it will be great; as there is nothing more bitter than Christ's departing with his holy presence, so nothing so sweet as Christ's cleaving to thee in his holy presence. And truly sin was never bitter to that soul to which the work of the Lord Jesus was not sweet, though it is accounted by some almost Popery to speak so. To this all promises are made; (1 Tim. iv. 8,) "Godliness hath them." It is true, they are made to Christ; i. e., to Christ mystical. 1 Cor. xii. 12. Yet to the head as the foundation and conveyer of all to the elect. Eph. i. 23; 2 Pet. i. 3, 4. If you despise work, you despise promises, and so despise Christ; and the Lord knows what use you may have of them before you die.

Distinguishing Gold from Dross

Troubles for Sin and Trials for Grace

Signs of Sin in Dominion

By John Flavel,

Vol. V, pg. 538-

Good for Self-examination

Fourthly, the behavior and carriage of the soul with respect to subjection to the commands of sin, shows what our estate and condition is. This will separate dross from gold. All unregenerate men are the servants of sin, they subject themselves to its commands. This the scripture sometimes calls a “conversation in the lusts of the flesh,” Eph. 2:3. Sometimes the “selling themselves to sin,” 1Kings 21:20. Now, as a judicious divine observes, though the children of God complain with Paul, Rom. 7:14,15, that they are “sold under sin,” yet there is a vast difference between these two. The saints are sold to it by Adam, but others by their own continued consent. But to show you the difference in this matter, I conceive it necessary to show wherein the reigning power of sin does not consist, and then wherein it does; that you may plainly discern who are in subjection to the reigning power of their corruptions, and who are not. Now there be divers things common both to the regenerate and unregenerate; and we cannot say the dominion of sin lies in any or in all of them, namely, abstractly and simply considered.

1. First, Both one and the other having original corruption dwelling in them, may also find this fountain breaking forth into gross and scandalous sins. But we cannot say that because original corruption thus breaks forth into gross and scandalous sins in both, therefore it must needs reign in the son as well as in the other; a righteous man may “fall before the wicked,” as it is, Ps. 25:26. He may fall into the dirt of grosser iniquities, and furnish them with matter of reproach. So did David, Peter, Abraham, and many more of the Lord’s upright-hearted ones, whose souls nevertheless sin did not reign over by a voluntary subjection to its commands, nor must this embolden any to sin with more liberty.

2. Secondly, Though an upright soul fall once and again into sin, though he reiterate the same act of sin which he has repented of before; yet it cannot merely from thence be concluded, that therefore sin reigns over him as it does over a wicked man that makes it his daily trade. I confess every reiteration of sin puts a further aggravation upon it. And it is sad we should repent and sin, and sin and repent; but yet you read, Prov. 24:16, “A just man falleth seven times, and riseth up again.” Job’s friends were good men, yet he tells them, “Theses ten times have ye reproached me,” Job 19:3. This indeed shows a heart that greatly needs purging; for it is with relapses into spiritual as it is with relapse into natural diseases. A recidivation or return of the disease shows that the morbid matter was not duly purged; but though it shows the foulness, it does not always prove the falseness of the heart.

3. Thirdly, Though the one may be impatient of the reproof of his sin, as well as the other; yet that alone will not conclude sin to be in full dominion over the one as it is over the other.

It is pity any good man should storm at a just rebuke of sin; that such a precious oil as is proper to heal, should be conceited to break his head; but yet flesh will be tender and touchy, even in good men. Asa was a good man, and yet he was wroth with the prophet who reprovved him, as you find, 2Chron. 16:10, yet I doubt not but their consciences smite them for it, when pride suffers not another to do it; a reproof may be well-timed and ill managed by another, and so may provoke, but they will hear the voice of conscience in another manner.

4. Fourthly, though in both some one particular sin may have more power than another, yet neither does this alone conclude, that therefore that sin must reign in one, as it does in another. Indeed the beloved lust of every wicked man is king over his soul; but yet a godly man’s constitution, calling, etc., may incline him more to one sin than another; and yet neither that nor any other may be said to be in dominion; for though David speaks of his iniquity, i.e., his special sin, Ps. 18:19, yet you see in one place he begs God to keep him from it, and in the other, he tells us he kept himself from it, and both show he was not the servant of it.

5. Fifthly, though both may sin against knowledge, yet it will not follow from thence, that therefore sins against knowledge must needs be sins in dominion in the one, as they are in the other; here was too much light abused, and violence offered in David's deliberated sin, as he confesses, Ps. 51:6, and the sad story itself too plainly shows; and yet, in the main, David was an upright man still; though this consideration of the fact shrewdly wounded his integrity, and stand upon record for a caution to all others.

Section VII

We have seen what does not infer the dominion of in in the former particulars, being simply considered; I shall next show you what does, and how the sincere and false hearts are distinguished in this trial. And,

1. First, Assent and consent upon deliberation notes the soul to be under the dominion of sin; when the mind approves sin, and the will gives its plenary consent to it, this sets p sin in its throne, and puts the soul into subjection to it; for the dominion of sin consists in its authority over us, and our voluntary subjection to it. This you find to be the character of a wicked graceless person, Ps. 36:4, "He diviseth mischief upon his bed; he sitteth himself in a way that is not good; he abhorreth not evil."

The best men may fall into sin through mistake, or precipitated into sin through the violence of temptation; but to devise mischief, and set himself in an evil way, this notes full assent of the mind; and then, not to abhor evil, notes full consent of the will; and these two being given to sin, not only antecedently to the action of it, but also consequently to it, to like it afterwards as well as before; this pouts the soul fully under the power of sin? What can it give more?

This (as Mr. Caryl says) in direct opposition to the apostle, Rom. 12:1, is to present their bodies a dead sacrifice, unholy, and abominable to God; acceptable to the devil, which is their unreasonable service; all men by nature are given to sin, but these men give themselves to it.

2. Secondly, the customary practice of ins subjects the soul to the dominion of sin; and so “he that is born of God does not commit sin, 1 John 3:9. Fall into sin, yea, the same sin he may, and that often; but then it is not without reluctance, repentance, and a protest entered by the soul in heaven against it; so that sin has not a quiet possession of the soul; he is not the servant of sin, nor does he willingly walk after its commandments; but so do its own servants; it is their daily practice, Jer. 9:3, “They proceed from evil to evil.”

3. Thirdly, Delight in sin proves the dominion of sin. So the servants of sin are described, Isa. 66:3, “They have chosen their own ways, and their soul delighteth in their abominations.”

Look, as our delight in God is the measure of our holiness, so our delight in sin is the measure of our sinfulness. Delight in sin is the uppermost round of the ladder, and much higher the soul of a sinner cannot go, till it be turned off into hell; “It is a sport to a fool to do mischief,” Prov. 10:23. Never merrier than when he has the devil for his playfellow, says one (Mr. Trap) upon that place.

4. Fourthly, impatience of Christ’s yoke and government, argues the soul to be the subject of sin. This is clear from the apostle’s reasoning in Rom. 6:17,18, “But God be thanked that ye were the servants of sin, but ye have obeyed from the heart the form of doctrine which was delivered to you. Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness.” Where you see plainly, that no man can have his manumission or freedom from sin, that comes not into Christ’s service, and yields himself up to his obedience.

So then, to fret at Christ’s laws, that tie us up from our lusts, to be weary of all spiritual employments as a burden intolerable, never to be in our element and centre till we are off from God, and plunging in the world and our lusts; this is a sad note of a soul in subjection to sin.

Oject. But may not an upright soul find some weariness in spiritual things?

Sol. Doubtless he may, for he has flesh as well as spirit; and though the spirit be willing, the flesh is weak; he is sanctified by in part, and his delight in the law of God is by according to or after the inner man, Rom. 7:22. \[the inner man is the image of God re-stamped upon the soul at conversion, a new creation, “the new man who is renewed in knowledge according to the image of Him who created him,” Col. 3:10. This is a restoring of the image of God, the chief part of it anyway (holiness; knowledge, etc.) that Adam lost at the fall.] But he sees another law in his members, i.e., contrary inclinations. However, if he be weary sometimes in the duties of godliness, to be sure he is more weary out of them, and is not centered and at rest till he be with his God again; but the carnal heart is where it would be, when it is in the service of sin; and as a fish upon dry land, when engaged in spiritual duties; especially such as are secret, and have no external allurements of reputation to engage him to them.

But what surprisals or captivities to sin soever may befall an upright soul, yet it appears by these eight following particulars, that he is not the servant of sin, nor in full subjection to it. For,

1. though he may be drawn to sin, yet he cannot reflect upon his sin without shame and sorrow; which plainly show it to be an involuntary surprise. So Peter wept bitterly, Matt. 26. And David mourned for his sin heartily. Others can fetch new pleasures out of their old sins, by reflecting on them; and some can glory in their shame, Phil. 3:9, some are stupid and senseless after sin; and the sorrow of a carnal heart for it, is but a morning dew; but it is far otherwise with God's people.

2. Secondly, though a saint may be drawn to sin, yet it is not with a deliberate and full consent of his will; their delight is in the law of God, Rom. 7:22, "They do that which they would not," ver. 16, i.e., there are inward dislikes from the new nature; and as for that case of David, which seems to have so much of counsel and deliberation in it, yet it was but in a single act; it was not in the general course of his life; he was upright in all things, i.e., in the general course and tenor of his life, 1 Kings 15:5.

3. Thirdly, though an upright soul may fall into sin, yet he is restless and unquiet in that condition, like a bone out of joint; and that speaks him to be none of sin's servants; as on the contrary, if a man be engaged in the external duties of religion, and be restless, and unquiet there, his heart is not in it, he is not at rest till he be again in his earthly business; this man cannot be reckoned Christ's servant; a gracious heart is much after that rate employed in the work of sin, that a carnal heart is employed in the work of religion. That is a good rule, Ea tantum dicuntur inesse, quae insunt per modum quietis: that is a man's true temper, wherein he is at rest. Poor David fell into sin, but he had no rest in his bones, because of it, Ps. 51:10-12. If his heart be off from God and duty for a little while, yet he recollects himself, and say, as Ps.96:7, "Return to thy rest, O my soul."

4. Fourthly, though a sincere Christian fall into sin and commit evil; yet he proceeds not from evil to evil as the ungodly do, Jer. 9:3, but makes his fall into one sin a caution to prevent another sin. Peter, by his fall, got establishment for the time to come. If God will speak peace to them, they are careful to return no more to folly; Ps 85:8, "In that ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what carefulness it wrought? Yea, what fear?" 2Cor. 7:11. It is not so with the servants of sin, one sin leaves them much more disposed to another sin.

5. Fifthly, a sincere Christian may be drawn to sin, but yet he would be glad with all his heart to rid of sin; it would be more to him than thousands of gold and silver, that he might grieve and offend God no more; and that shows sin is not in dominion over him; he that is under the dominion of sin, is loath to leave his lusts. Sin's servants are not willing to part with it, they hold it fast, and refuse to let it go, as that text expresses it, Jer. 8:5. But the great complaint of the upright is expressed by the apostle according to the true sense of their hearts, in Rom. 7:24, "Who shall deliver me from the body of death?"

6. Sixthly, It appears they yield not themselves willingly to obey sin, inasmuch as it is the matter of their joy when God orders nay providence to prevent sin in them; "Blessed be the Lord, (said David to Abigail) and blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou that hast kept me this day from shedding blood." 1 Sam16:32-33.

Here is blessing upon blessing from a sin-preventing providence. The author is blessed, the instrument blessed, the means blessed. O it is a blessed thing in the eyes of a sincere man to be kept from sin! He reckons it a great deliverance, a very happy escape, if he be kept from sin.

7. Seventhly, this shows that some who may be drawn to commit sin, yet are none of the servants of sin, that they do heartily beg the assistance of grace to keep them from in: "Keep back thy servant from presumptuous sin, (saith the Psalmist, Ps. 19:13), let them Not have dominion over me;" that is, Lord, I find propensions to sin in my nature, yea, and strong ones too; if thou leave me to myself, I am carried into sin as easily as a feather down the torrent. "O Lord, keep back thy servant." And there is no petition that upright ones pour out their hearts to God in, either more frequently or more ardently than in this, to be kept back from sin.

8. Eighthly, and Lastly, this shows the soul not to be under the dominion of sin, that it does not only cry to God to be kept back from sin, but uses the means of prevention himself.; he resists it, as well as prays against it; Ps 18:23, I was also upright before him, and kept myself from mine iniquity.” So Job 31:1, “I have made a covenant with mine eyes.” And yet more fully in Isa. 33:15, “He shaketh his hands from holding bribes, and stoppeth his ears from hearing blood, and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil.” See with what care the portals are shut at which sin uses to enter. All these things are very relieving considerations to poor souls questioning their integrity under the frequent surprisals of sin. And the next trial no less.

Sect. VIII

(5.) Fifthly, our opposition to, and conflicts with sin discover what we are, gold or dross.

There are conflicts with sin in both the regenerate and in the unregenerate; but there is a vast difference betwixt them, as will appear in the following account.

1. First, there is a universal, and there is a particular opposition to sin: the former is found in regenerate, the latter is unregenerate souls: a gracious heart hates every false way, Ps. 119:104, and must needs do so, because he hates and opposes sin as sin; so that he can have no peccatum in deliciis, no excepted or reserved lust, but fights against the whole body, and every limb and member of the body of sin.

But it is not so with the hypocrite or carnal professor; he has overcome some reserved sin, that he cannot part with.

2. Secondly, there is an opposition between the new nature and sin, and there is an opposition between a natural conscience and sin; the former is the case of an upright soul, the latter may be a self-deceiver.

A regenerate person opposes sin because there is an irreconcilable antipathy between it and the new nature in him, as is clear from Gal. 5:17, “The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary to the one to the other.” By flesh, understand corrupt nature; by spirit, not only the spirit of man but the Spirit of God, or principle of regeneration in man. [that new principle of life that is communicated to the soul, consisting of, as Owen puts it, grace, truth, faith.] By the lusting of these two against each other, understand the desire and endeavors of each other’s destruction and ruin; and the ground of all this is the contrariety of all these two natures.

These are contrary one to the other; there is a twofold opposition between them, one formal, their very natures are opposite, as it is between fire and water.

But the opposition found in unrenewed souls against sin, is not from their natures, for sin is suitable enough to that; but from the light that is in their minds and consciences, which scares and terrifies them. Such was that in Darius, Dan. 6:14, "He was sore displeased with himself, and set his heart on Daniel to deliver him; and labored till the going down of the sun to deliver him." Here the contest was between sense of honor upon one side, and conviction of conscience on the other side.

Sometimes a generous and noble disposition opposes sordid and base actions: Major sum, et ad majora natus; qua mut corporis mei sim mancipium. I am greater, and born to greater things, than that I should be a slave to my body, said a brave heathen.

3. Thirdly, there is a permanent, and there is a transient opposition to sin; the former is the case of God's people, the latter of temporary and unsound professors.

The saint when he draws the sword in this warfare against sin, throws away the scabbard; no end of this combat with sin till life end; their life and their troubles are finished together; 2 Tim. 4:7, "I have fought the good fight, and have finished my course."

But in other men it is but a transient quarrel; out with sin one day, and in another; and the reason is plain by what was noted before; it is not the opposition of two natures; it is like the opposition of the wind and tide, these may be contrary and make a stormy sea today, but the wind may come about, and go as the tide goes tomorrow; but in a Christian it is the opposition of the river and the dam; one must give way to the other; there is not reconciling them; but the other "like the dog, returns to his vomit," 2Pet 2 ult.

4. Fourthly, there is an opposition to the root of sin, and an opposition to the fruits of sin. A gracious soul opposes root and fruit, but others the latter only. The great design of an upright soul is not only to loop off this or that branch, but to kill the toot of sin, which is in his nature; Rom. 7:24, "Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" But the great care and endeavors of others is to suppress outward acts of sin and escape the mischievous consequences of it. Yea, their study is, as Lactantius phrases it, Potius abscondere, quam abscindere vitia: To hide, rather than to kill their lusts.

5. Fifthly, There is an opposition to sin in the strength of god, and an opposition to sin in our own strength; the former is proper to real Christians, the latter is found frequently with unsanctified persons; when a Christian goes forth against any sin, it is in the strength of God; so you read their rule directs them, Eph. 6:10, “Be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might; take unto you the whole armor of god;” And suitably, you shall find them frequently upon their knees begging strength from heaven against their lusts – 2Cor12:8, “For this cause I besought the Lord thrice,” saith Paul, i.e., often and earnestly, that the temptation might depart from him.

But others go forth against sin only in the strength of their own resolutions; so did Pendleton in our story; these resolutions, or vows, which they have put themselves under, are as frequently frustrated as made.

6. Sixthly, there is a successful opposition to sin, and an opposition that comes to nothing. The former is that of true Christians, the latter is fond among unregenerate men.

The work of mortification in the saints is progressive and increasing. Hence Rom. 6:6, “Our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed.” Sin dies in believers much as crucified persons use to die, namely, a slow, lingering, gradual, but sure death; its vigor and life expires by degrees, or as a consumptive person dies; for to that also he alludes here. There is a disease, which is called consumption totius, a consumption of the whole; and those that die of that disease, languish more and more, till at last they drop sensim sine sensu, by imperceptible degrees and steps into the grave.

But in the unregenerate, whatever conflicts they have with sin, no corruption falls before it. It may be said of them, as the church in another case complains of herself, Isa. 26:18, “We have been in pain, we have, as it were, brought forth wind. We have not wrought any deliverance in the earth, neither have the inhabitants of the world fallen.” [here is the ESV, “...we were pregnant, we writhed, but we have given birth to wind. We have accomplished no deliverance in the earth, and the inhabitants of the world have not fallen.” So it fares with these professors; they pray, they hear, they vow, they resolve, but when all is done, their lusts are as strong and vigorous as ever. No degree of mortification appears after all.

And thus much of the trial of our sincerity by our carriage towards sin.

The Promise

Subjects: The Promise. What is meant by to draw nigh unto God. The Priests, the Aaronical priesthood and the law of institution. The better hope. Oblation and intercession. Guilt and its removal necessary and consequently, what follows: boldness, faith, liberty, confidence, assurance. The distance between God and Man, mutual enmity. The wrath of God abides on them. The flaming sword of the law. A summary of Adam, the fall, sin, recovery of gospel grace, etc. The offices of Christ, king, priest and prophet. The importance of knowing the wisdom of this way, his priesthood, etc. as an object of our faith and how unbelief in this or ignorance of it leads to trusting in other things, fancies or ourselves. What does come to God mean?

Ver. 18, 19. — For there is verily a disannulling of the commandment going before, for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof. For the law made nothing perfect; but the bringing in of a better hope, by which we draw nigh unto God.

Obs. VIII. Believers of old, who lived under the law, did not live upon the law, but upon the hope of Christ, or Christ hoped for. — Christ is “the same” (that is, unto the church) “yesterday, to-day, and for ever.” If justification, if salvation could be had any other way, or by any other means, then was his coming needless, and his death in vain. It was the promise of him, and not of the law which he had broken, which was the relief and salvation of Adam. This being the first thing that was proposed unto fallen man [Gen 3:15], as the only means of his restoration, justification, and salvation, if anything were afterwards added unto the same purpose, it would declare this to be insufficient; which would be an impeachment of divine wisdom and grace. On the same promise of Christ, which virtually contained and exhibited unto believers all the benefits of his mediation, as it was frequently renewed and variously explained, did all the saints live under the old testament. And the obscurity of the revelations of him in comparison of that by the gospel, respected only the degrees, but not the essence of their faith.

Obs. IX. The Lord Christ, by his priesthood and sacrifice, makes perfect the church, and all things belonging thereunto, Colossians 2:10.

FIFTHLY, In the last place, the apostle illustrates the work wrought through the introduction of “the better hope,” by the effect of it in them that do believe: Δι ης εγγιζομεν τω Θεω, — “By which we draw nigh unto God.” Δι ης, “by which,” may refer either to the remote antecedent, επεισαγωγή “the introduction” or “bringing in;” or unto the next, which is ελπιδος, “the hope;” being both of the same gender. “By the introduction of the better hope we draw nigh to God;” or, “By which hope we draw nigh to God.” Both come to the same, for the substance of the sense; but the application is more natural to the next antecedent, “By which hope we draw nigh unto God.” It remaineth only that we inquire what it is thus to draw nigh to God.

Εγγιζω is a word belonging unto the sacerdotal office, denoting the approach of the priests unto God in his worship. So the LXX for the most part render bræq;, the general term for all access unto God with sacrifices and offerings. And this doth the apostle intend. Under the Levitical priesthood, the priests in their sacrifices did draw nigh unto God. The same now is done by all believers, under the sacerdotal ministration of Jesus Christ. They now, all of them, draw nigh unto God. And in all their worship, especially in their prayers and supplications, they have by him an access unto God, Ephesians 2:18.

There is a similitude in these things, and an allusion in the one unto the other; yet so as that the one doth far excel the other, as to grace and privilege. For, 1. Under the law it was the priests alone who had this privilege of drawing nigh unto God, in the solemn worship of the temple and tabernacle. The people were kept at a distance, and might never come near the sacred services of the holy place. But all believers being made a royal priesthood, every one of them hath an equal right and privilege, by Christ, of drawing nigh unto God. 2. The priests themselves did draw nigh only unto outward pledges, tokens, and symbols of God's presence. Their highest attainment was in the entrance of the high priest once a-year into the most holy place. Yet was the presence of God there only in things made with hands, only instituted to represent his glory. But believers do draw nigh to God himself, unto the throne of his grace, as the apostle declares, Hebrews 10:19-22.

It may therefore be granted that there is this intention in the words. For as, by the law of old, the priests in the solemn worship of the church did draw nigh to God in those visible pledges of his presence which he had appointed; and this they did by virtue of the Aaronical priesthood and the law of its institution, which was the utmost that could be attained in their imperfect state; so now, upon the introduction of "the better hope," and by virtue thereof, believers in all their solemn worship do draw nigh unto God himself and find acceptance with him.

And there are two reasons for the admission of this interpretation. For, 1. One part of the apostle's design is to manifest the glory and preeminence of gospel-worship above that of the law. And the excellency hereof consists, not in outward forms and pompous ceremonies, but in this, that all believers do therein draw nigh unto God himself with boldness. 2. Whereas it is peculiarly the priesthood of Christ, and his discharge of that office in his oblation and intercession, which he intends by "the better hope," as he fully declares himself towards the end of the chapter, they are those which we have a peculiar respect unto, in all our approaches unto God in our holy worship. Our entrance unto the throne of grace is through the veil of his flesh as offered. Our admission is only by virtue of his oblation, and our acceptance depends on his intercession. Herein, therefore, in a peculiar manner, by this "better hope, we draw nigh unto God."

But yet there is a more extensive signification of this expression in the Scripture, which must not be here excluded. By nature all men are gone far off from God. The first general apostasy carried mankind to a most inconceivable distance from him. Though our distance from him by nature, as we are creatures, be infinite, yet this hinders not but that, in his infinite goodness and condescension, we may have intercourse with him, and find acceptance before him. But the distance which came between us by sin cuts off all communion of that kind. Wherefore our moral distance from God, as our nature is corrupted, is greater, with respect unto our relation unto him, than our essential distance from him, as our nature is created. Hence, being “far off” is the expression of this state of nature: Ephesians 2:13, “Ye were sometimes far off” And whatever accompanieth that state, in wrath and curse upon men; in fear, bondage, and power of sin, and enmity against God within them; in obnoxiousness unto misery in this world, and to eternal destruction hereafter, is comprised in that expression. It is to be far from the love and favor of God, from the knowledge of him, and obedience unto him. Wherefore, our drawing nigh unto God denotes our delivery and recovery from this estate. So it is expressed in the place above named: “But now in Christ Jesus, ye who sometimes were far off, are made nigh by the blood of Christ.” To represent this, all the acts of solemn worship, which respected the sacrifice of Christ, were called “approximations.”

And hereunto, unto this drawing nigh to God, or that we may so do, two things are required: 1. A removal of whatever kept us at a distance from God. And the things of this nature were of two sorts: (1.) What was upon us from God, for our Sin and apostasy. This was his wrath and curse; and these were declared in the publishing of the law on mount Sinai, with the terrible appearances and dreadful voices that accompanied it. This made the people “stand afar off,” Exodus 20:21; as an emblem of their condition with respect unto the law. (2.) Guilt within, with its consequences of fear, shame, and alienation from the life of God. Unless these things, of the one sort and the other, those upon us and those within us, be taken away and removed, we can never draw nigh unto God. And to secure our distance, they were enrolled in a hand-writing, as a record against us, that we should never, on our own account, so much as endeavor any access unto him, Ephesians 2:14, Colossians 2:14. How they were removed by “the bringing in of the better hope,” that is, by the priesthood of Christ, the apostle declares in this epistle, as we shall see, God willing, in our progress, This neither was nor could be done by the law or its ordinances; neither the moral preceptive part of it nor the ceremonial, in all its rites and sacrifices, could of itself expiate sins, make atonement for our apostasy, turn away the wrath of God, or take away guilt, fear, bondage, and alienation, out of the minds of men.

2. There is moreover required hereunto, that, upon the justification and acceptation of our persons, we have faith, liberty, boldness, confidence and assurance, given unto us, in our coming unto God. And this cannot be without the renovation of our natures into his image, the quickening of our souls with a new principle of spiritual life, and ability unto all duties of acceptable obedience. All these things are required unto our drawing nigh unto God, or unto a state of reconciliation, peace, and communion with him. And we may observe, —

Obs. X. Out of Christ, or without him, all mankind are at an inconceivable distance from God. — And a distance it is of the worst kind; even that which is an effect of mutual enmity. The cause of it was on our part voluntary; and the effect of it, the height of misery. And however any may flatter and deceive themselves, it is the present condition of all who have not an interest in Christ by faith. They are far off from God, as he is the fountain of all goodness and blessedness, “inhabiting,” as the prophet speaks, “the parched places of the wilderness, and shall not see when good cometh,” Jeremiah 17:6; far from the dews and showers of grace or mercy; far from divine love and favor, — cast out of the bounds of them, as Adam out of paradise, without any hope or power in themselves to return. The flaming sword of the law turns every way, to keep them from the tree of life. Yet are they not so far from God but that they are under his wrath and curse, and whatever of misery is contained in them. Let them flee whither they please; wish for mountains and rocks to fall on them, as they will do hereafter; hide themselves in the darkness and shades of their own ignorance, like Adam among the trees of the garden; or immerse themselves in the pleasures of sin for a season; — all is one, “the wrath of God abideth on them.” And they are far from God in their own minds also; being alienated from him, enemies against him, and in all things made up with Satan, the head of the apostasy. Thus is it, and inconceivably worse, with all that embrace not this “better hope,” to bring them nigh unto God.

Obs. XI. It is an effect of infinite condescension and grace, that God would appoint a way of recovery for those who had willfully cast themselves unto this woeful distance from him. — Why should God look after such fugitives anymore? He had no need of us or our 588 services in our best condition, much less in that useless, depraved state whereinto we had brought ourselves. And although we had transgressed the rule of our moral dependence on him in the way of obedience, and thereby done what we could to stain and eclipse his glory, yet he knew how to repair it unto advantage, by reducing us under the order of punishment. By our sins we ourselves “come short of the glory of God;” but he could lose none by us, whilst it was absolutely secured by the penalty annexed unto the law. When, upon the entrance of sin, he came and found Adam in the bushes, wherein he thought foolishly to hide himself, who could expect (Adam did not) but that his only design was to apprehend the poor rebellious fugitive, and give him up to condign punishment? But quite otherwise, above all thoughts that could ever have entered into the hearts of angels or men. After he had declared the nature of the apostasy, and his own indignation against it, he proposeth and promiseth a way of deliverance and recovery! This is that which the Scripture so magnifies, under the names of “grace,” and “love of God,” which are beyond expression or conception, John 3:16. And it hath also this lustre frequently put upon it, that he dealt not so with the angels that sinned; which manifests what condition he might have left us in also, and how infinitely free and sovereign that grace was from whence it was otherwise. Thence it was that he had a “desire again unto the works of his hands,” to bring poor mankind near unto him. And whereas he might have recalled us unto himself, yet, so as to leave some mark of his displeasure upon us, kept us at a greater distance from him than that we stood at before, — as David brought back his wicked Absalom to Jerusalem, but would not suffer him to come into his presence, — he chose to act like himself, in infinite wisdom and grace, to bring us yet nearer unto him than ever we could have approached by the law of our creation. And as the foundation, means, and pledge hereof, he contrived and brought forth that most glorious and unparalleled effect of divine wisdom, in taking our nature into that inconceivable nearness unto himself, in the union of it unto the person of his Son. For as all things, in this bringing of us nigh to God who were afar off, are expressive effects of wisdom and grace; so that of taking our nature into union with himself is glorious unto astonishment. And as we are thereby made inconceivably more nigh to God in our nature than we were upon our first creation, or than angels shall ever be; so by virtue thereof are we in our persons brought in many things much nearer to God than ever we could have been brought by the law of creation. “O LORD, our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth! who hast set thy glory above the heavens!” Psalm 8:1. It is in the admiration of this unspeakable grace that the psalmist is so ravished in the contemplation of God, as hath been declared in our exposition on the second chapter of this epistle.

Obs. XII. All our approximation unto God in any kind, all our approaches unto him in holy worship, is by Him alone who was the blessed hope of the saints under the old testament, and is the life of them under the new. — These things must be afterwards spoken unto.

Why do the Promises of God take so Long to Fulfill?

the sovereignty of God

470-477 (575-583 online) John Owen

Heb. 7 Ver. 19. — “For the law made nothing perfect; but the bringing in of a better hope, whereby we draw nigh unto God.”

FOURTHLY, The disannulling or abolition of the law was laid down in the precedent verse, as a necessary consequent of its being “weak and unprofitable.” For when a law hath been tried, and it is found liable unto this charge, it is equal, and even necessary, that it should be disannulled; if the end aimed at be necessary to be attained, and there be any thing else to be substituted in its room whereby it may so be. This therefore the apostle declares in this verse, giving the reasons in particular of what he had before asserted in general. So the causal connection, ga>r, “for,” doth intimate. And, 1. He gives an especial instance, wherein it was evident that the law was “weak and unprofitable.” 2. He declares what was to be introduced in the room thereof, which would attain and effect the end which the law could not reach unto, by reason of its weakness. 3. He expresseth what that end was.

The first he doth in these words, Ουδεν γαρ ο νομος ετελειωσε, — “For the law made nothing perfect.” The subject spoken of is ο νομος, “the law;” that is, the whole system of Mosaical ordinances, as it was the covenant which God made with the people in Horeb. For the apostle takes “the commandment” and “the law” for the same in this chapter; and “the covenant,” in the next, for the same with them both. And he treats of them principally in the instance of the Levitical priesthood; partly because the whole administration of the law depended thereon; and partly because it was the introduction of another priesthood, whereby the whole was disannulled.

Of this law, commandment, or covenant, it is said that ουδεν ετελειωσε, “it made nothing perfect.” ουδεν, “nothing,” for ουδενα, “no man,” say expositors generally; “it made no man perfect.” So the neuter is put for the masculine. So it is in those words of our Savior, John 6:37, Παν ο διδωσι μοι ο Πατηρ προς εμε ηζει, — “All that the Father giveth me cometh unto me;” that is, “every one.” So is ουδεν, as here, put for ουjde>na, verse 63: Η σαρξ ουχ ωφελει ουδεν, — “The flesh profiteth nothing;” that is, say some, “no man.” But I am not satisfied with this exposition, but rather judge that the apostle did properly express his intention. It made “nothing,” that is, none of the things which we treat about, “perfect.” It did not make the church-state perfect, it did not make the worship of God perfect, it did not perfect the promises given unto Abraham, in their accomplishment, it did not make a perfect covenant between God and man; it had a shadow, an obscure representation of all these things, but it “made nothing perfect.”

What the apostle intends by τελειωσις, and so consequently by ετελειωσειν in this place, we have discoursed at large before on verse 11; so that we shall not here again insist upon it. But it may be inquired why, if “the law made nothing perfect,” it was instituted or given by God himself. He had designed a state of perfection unto the church, and seeing the law could not effect it, nay, seeing it could not be introduced whilst the law was in force, unto what end served the giving of this law?

Ans. This doubt was in part solved before, when we showed the ends for which the law was given, although it was weak and unprofitable as unto some other. But yet there are some other reasons to be pleaded, to represent the beauty and order of this dispensation. For, —

1. In all these things the sovereignty of God is to be submitted unto; and, unto humble souls, there is beauty in divine sovereignty. When the Lord Jesus rejoiced in spirit, and thanked his heavenly Father that he had revealed the mysteries of the gospel unto babes, and hid them from the wise and prudent, he assigns no other reason but his sovereignty and pleasure, wherein he rejoiced: “Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight,” Luke 10:21. And if we cannot see an excellency in the dispensations of God, because they are his, who gives no account of his matters, we shall never delight in his ways. So our apostle gives no other reason of this legal dispensation, but that “God had provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect,” Hebrews 11:40. Therefore did he give them this law for a season, which made nothing perfect; even so it seemed good in his sight. It is the glory of God to be “gracious to whom he will be gracious,” and that at what time he will, and unto what degree and measure he pleaseth. And in this glory of his are we to acquiesce.

2. Mankind having woefully prevaricated and apostatized from God, it was just and equal that they should not be at once re-instated, in their reparation. The suddenness of it might have taken off from its greatness. Wherefore, as God left the generality of the world without the knowledge of what he intended, so he saw good to keep the church in a state of expectancy as to the perfection of liberty and deliverance intended. He could have created the world in an hour, or a moment; but he chose to do it in the space of six days, that the glory of his work might be distinctly represented unto angels and men And he could immediately after the fall have introduced the promised Seed, in whose advent the church must of necessity enjoy all the perfection whereof it is capable in this world; but to teach the church the greatness of their sin and misery, and to work in them an acknowledgment of his unspeakable grace and mercy, he proceeded gradually in the very revelation of him, as we have showed on Hebrews 1:1, and caused them to wait, under earnest desires, longings, and expectations, many ages for his coming. And during this season it was of necessity that they should be kept under a law that made nothing perfect. For, as our apostle speaketh, “if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void,” Romans 4:14; and “if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain,” Galatians 2:21; and “if there had been a law given which could have’ given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law,” Galatians 3:21. Wherefore, until the actual exhibition of the promised Seed, it was absolutely necessary that the church should be kept under a law that made nothing perfect.

3. That people unto whom the law was peculiarly to be given, and by whom God would accomplish his further design, were a stubborn, earthy, hard hearted people, that stood in need of a yoke to burden and subdue them unto the will of God. So obstinate they were in what they had once received, and so proud of any privilege they enjoyed, that whereas their privileges were very many and very great, they would never have had any thought of looking out after another state, but have foregone the promise, had they not been pinched, and burdened, and disappointed in their expectation of perfection by this law, and the yoke of it.

4. God had designed that the Lord Christ should in all things have the preeminence. This was due unto him, on the account of the glory of his person and the greatness of his work. But if the law could have made any thing perfect, it is evident that this could not have been.

Secondly, Perfection being thus denied unto the law, it is added, Επεισαγωγή δε χρεϊπτονος ελπιδος. The words are elliptical, and without a supplement give no certain sense. And this may be made two ways: First, by the verb substantive ην, and so the whole of what is asserted is an effect of the law. “It made nothing perfect,” but “it was the bringing in of a better hope,” or “an introduction unto a better hope,” as some render the words. It served as God’s way and method unto the bringing in of our Lord Jesus Christ; unto this end it was variously serviceable in the church. For as its institutions, promises, instructions, and types, did represent him unto the faith of believers; so it prepared their minds unto an expectation of him, and longing after him. And the conjunction δε, which is adversative, seems to intimate an opposition in what the law did, unto what it is said before that it did not. It “did not make any thing perfect,” but it “did bring in a better hope;” and we know in how many things it was a preparatory introduction of the gospel. Wherefore this sense is true, though not, as I judge, directly intended in these words.

Beza first observed that δε was put for αλλα [but] in this place, as it is unquestionably in sundry others. If so, not an assignation of a contrary effect unto the law unto what was before denied is intended, but the designation and expression of another cause of the effecting of that which the law could not effect. And the defective speech is to be supplied by ετελειωσε, “made perfect;” as we do it by “did,” — that is, “did make all things perfect.” To the same purpose the apostle expresseth himself in other words, Romans 8:3. “For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh.” For the words are so to be supplied, ‘What the law could not do, that God did;’ which what it was, and how God did it, the following words declare. Thus, God had designed to bring the church into a better state, a state of comparative perfection in this world. This the law was not a means or instrument suited unto: wherefore another way is fixed on to that end; which being completely effective of it, the law was laid aside and disannulled, as unprofitable.

This the word επεισαγωγή doth lead unto: for it is as much as “postintroductio,” or “superintroductio,” the introduction of one thing after or upon another. This was the priesthood and sacrifice of Christ, which were brought in after the law, upon it, in the room of it, to effect that which the law could not do. This our apostle further argues and confirms, Hebrews 10:1-10.

This, therefore, is the sense of the words, ‘The introduction of the better hope, after and upon the law, when a sufficient discovery had been made of its weakness and insufficiency as unto this end, did make all things perfect, or bring the church unto that state of consummation which was designed unto it.’

Thirdly, It remaineth only, therefore, that we show what this “better hope” is, whereunto this effect is ascribed. Whatever it be, it is called “better” with respect unto the law, with all things that the law contained or could effect, — somewhat of more power and efficacy to perfect the church-state. This neither was nor could be anything but Christ himself and his priesthood. For “we are complete in him,” Colossians 2:10; and “by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified,” Hebrews 10:14; the heavenly things themselves being purified thereby.

“Hope,” therefore, is used here metonymically, to design the thing hoped for. From the giving of the first promise, and throughout under the dispensation of the law, Christ and his coming into the world were the hope of all believers, the great thing which they desired, longed and hoped for. Hence was he called “the Desire of all nations,” Haggai 2:7; — that which the secret desires of the whole race of mankind worked towards. And in the church, which enjoyed the promises, they rejoiced in the foresight of it, as did Abraham; and desired to see his day, as did the prophets, diligently inquiring into the time and season of the accomplishment of those revelations which they had received concerning him, 1 Peter 1:11, 12. It is not, therefore, the doctrine of the gospel, with its precepts and promises, as some suppose, which is here intended, any otherwise but as it is a declaration of the coming of Christ, and the discharge of his office; for without a respect hereunto, without virtue and efficacy thence alone derived, the outward precepts and promises of the gospel would no more perfect the church-state than the law could do.

Obs. VII. When God hath designed any gracious end towards the church, it shall not fail, nor his work cease for want of effectual means to accomplish it. — All means, indeed, have their efficacy from his 581 designation of them unto their end. His wisdom makes them meet, and his power makes them effectual. Whatever, therefore, seems to be a means in the hand of God unto any end, and doth not effect it, was never designed thereunto; for he fails in none of his ends, nor do his means come short of what he aims at by them. Wherefore, although God designed a perfect state of the church, and after that gave the law, yet he never designed the law to accomplish that end. It had other ends, as we have already declared. But men were very apt to take up with the law, and to say of it, “Surely the LORD’S anointed is before us.” Wherefore God by many ways and means discovered the weakness of the law, as unto this end. Then were men ready to conclude that the promise itself, concerning this perfect church-state, would be of none effect. The mistake lay only herein, that indeed God had not as yet used that only means for it which his infinite wisdom had suited for, and his infinite power would make effectual unto, its attainment. And this he did in such a way, as that those who would not make use of his means, but would as it were impose that upon him which he never intended to make use of in that kind, perished in their unbelief. Thus was it with the generality of the Jews, who would have perfection by the law, or none at all.

Wherefore the promises of God concerning the church, and to it, must be the rule and measure of our faith. Three things do deeply exercise the church, as unto their accomplishment: 1. Difficulties rendering it wholly improbable. 2. Long and unexpected procrastinations. 3. Disappointment of appearing means of it. But in this instance, of the introduction of a perfect church-state in and by the person of Jesus Christ, God hath provided a security for our faith against all objections which these considerations might suggest. For —

1. What greater difficulties can possibly lie in the way of the accomplishment of any of the promises of God which yet are upon the sacred record unaccomplished, — as suppose, the calling of the Jews, the destruction of antichrist, the peace of the church, and prosperity of it in the plentiful effusion of the Spirit, — but that as great, and greater, lay in 582 the way of the fulfilling of this promise? All the national provocations, sins, and idolatries, that fell out in the posterity of Abraham; all the calamities and desolating judgments that overtook them; the cutting down of the house of David, until there was only a root of it left in the earth; the unbelief of the whole body of the people; the enmity of the world, acted by all the craft and power of Satan; were as mountains in the way of the accomplishment of this promise: but yet they all of them became at length a plain before the Spirit of God. And if we should compare the difficulties and oppositions that at this day lie against the fulfilling of some divine promises, with those that rose up against this one of perfecting the church-state in Christ, it would, it may be, abate our forwardness in condemning the Jews for incredulity, unless we found ourselves more established in the faith of what is to come than for the most part we are.

2. Long and unexpected procrastinations are trials of faith also. Now this promise was given at the beginning of the world, nor was there any time allotted for its accomplishment. Hence it is generally supposed, from the words there used in the imposition of the name of Cain on her first-born, that Eve apprehended that the promise was actually fulfilled. The like expectations had the saints of all ages; and they were continually looking out after the rising of this bright morning Star. Many a time did God renew the promise, and sometimes confirmed it with his oath, as unto Abraham and David; and yet still were their expectations frustrated, so far as confined unto their own generations. And though God accepted them in their cries, and prayers, and hopes, and longing desires, yet nearly four thousand years were expired before the promise received its accomplishment. And if we do believe that the faith and grace of the new testament do exceed what was administered under the old, and that we do enjoy that pledge of God's veracity in the accomplishment of his promises which they attained not unto, shall we think it much if we are exercised some part of that season (as yet but a small time) in looking after the accomplishment of other promises?

3. Disappointment of appearing means is of the same nature. Long after the promise was given and renewed, the law is in a solemn and glorious manner delivered unto the church, as the rule of their worship and the means of their acceptance with God. Hence the generality of the people did always suppose that this was it which would make all things perfect. Something, indeed, they thought might be added unto its glory, in the personal coming of the Messiah; but the law was still to be that which was to make all things perfect. And we may easily apprehend what a surprisal it was unto them, when it was made manifest that the law was so far from effecting this promised state, that there was a necessity for taking it out of the way, as a thing "weak and unprofitable," that "the better hope," perfecting the state of the church, might be introduced. Such appearances are sometimes presented unto us of means highly probable for the delivery of the church, which after a while do utterly disappear, and things are rolled into a posture quite contrary unto the expectations of many. When there is an appearance of what God hath promised, of what believers have prayed for, it is no wonder if some do earnestly embrace it.. But when God hath laid aside any means, and sufficiently declared that it is not his holy pleasure to use it in such a way, or unto such a length as we would desire, for the fulfilling of his promises, it is not duty, but obstinacy and selfishness, to adhere unto it with any such expectation.

Apostasy - It's Nature and Causes

(see also, pgs 1101, 1109)

This explains many things, one of which is that men can have good doctrinal knowledge and yet still be unconverted. They may know a lot but are not completely persuaded in their minds (by the instrument of faith, the gift of faith) due to the fact that they never experienced a true conversion and the power thereof. And so they are like waves being "tossed to a fro and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the trickery of men, in the cunning and craftiness of deceitful plotting," (Eph4:14) professing one thing for awhile, then saying or acceding to another. They are not completely persuaded of the true doctrine which is what a saving faith does; a temporary faith does not. Owen describes this below. Take notice of the term glory. It's meaning is partially illustrated in my diagram. It is what is given to anyone who is converted. It is the image of God's glory which consists in understanding (knowledge of God) and his will (holiness or love to God), and happiness (joy in God) - that is what is implanted in the soul consisting in a re-enstamping of the image of God (the spiritual image or moral image, i.e., the image of his holiness, which was lost at the fall, as opposed to the natural image - his infinite power, wisdom, majesty, etc.) See other comments on this in this report.

CHAPTER 5

DARKNESS AND IGNORANCE ANOTHER CAUSE OF APOSTASY

http://www.prayermeetings.org/files/John_Owen/Owen_V07_Nature_And_Cause_Of_Apostasy_From_The_Gospel.pdf

II. THE second spring or cause of defection from the gospel in any kind, is that spiritual darkness and ignorance which abides in the minds of men under the profession of the truth.

The gospel may fall under a double consideration:

First, Of the things themselves that are contained, revealed, and proposed therein; — these are the material objects of our faith.

Secondly, With respect unto the doctrinal way of their declaration.

With respect unto the first, there is a spiritual darkness on the minds of all men by nature, so as that they cannot discern them in their own native form and beauty. With respect unto the latter, men are said to be ignorant, namely, when they do not in a due manner understand and comprehend the doctrines of the gospel, and so perish for want of knowledge. These things being of a distinct consideration, and of different influence into this pernicious event, the first shall be first spoken unto.

1. That there is such a spiritual darkness on the minds of men by nature, and wherein their depravation by sin cloth principally consist, is fully testified in the Scripture, as I have at large elsewhere evinced. Hence all men grant, so far as I know, that there is need of spiritual illumination to enable us to discern spiritual things in a due manner, though all are not agreed in the nature and causes of that illumination. But to deny the thing itself is to deny the gospel, and to make the promises of God of none effect. Now, where illumination is needful, there darkness is to be removed; for the end of the bringing in of light is to dispel darkness. Wherefore, such a depravation of the minds of men in spiritual darkness must be acknowledged, or the gift and grace of God in illumination must be rejected; and they by whom it is done do by their own blindness give new evidence unto the truth which they do oppose, there being no more certain demonstration of the power of darkness in any than for them to affirm that they stand in no need of light to be communicated unto them by the effectual operation of the Spirit of God. As to the nature of this illumination I shall not here dispute, but take it at present for granted that it is an act of His power who of old

“commanded light to shine out of darkness, shining in our hearts, to give us the knowledge of his glory in the face of Jesus Christ,” 2 Corinthians 4:6.

There is a glory and beauty in those spiritual things which are the subjects of the truths of the gospel. There is in them the wisdom of God, “the wisdom of God in a mystery,” 1 Corinthians 2:6,7, yea, “the manifold wisdom of God,” Ephesians 3:10; the glory of the Lord, which is represented unto believers in the glass of the gospel, 2 Corinthians 3:18, or “the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ,” chapter 4:6; — things expressly beyond discovery by the use of any means whatever merely natural [i.e., by man's reasonings or by the creation itself], 1 Corinthians 2:9,10. Even the philosophers of old contended that there was a beauty in all truth, which would engage the minds and affections of men unto it, were they able to discern it; and if they saw and granted this in things natural and moral, which are earthly and exposed unto the common reason of mankind, how much more must it be granted of the truth of things heavenly, spiritual, and divine! See John 3:12. In brief, whatever there is of divine glory or excellency in the divine nature itself, in any or all of its holy properties, in the great and most glorious effect of them in the person and grace of Christ, in the renovation of our nature into the image of God, in the divine life of faith and obedience, it is proposed unto us in the truths of the gospel.

2. Whatever doctrinal proposition may be made of these things unto the minds of men, yet the things themselves cannot be comprehended nor spiritually discerned without the illumination of the Holy Ghost before mentioned. Hence it follows that men may be instructed in the doctrines of truth, yet, continuing under the power of natural darkness, not discern the things themselves in their own spiritual nature and glory, nor have any experience of their power and efficacy. [Hence the scripture that says they have a form of godliness but deny its power]. This all the prayers of holy men in the Scripture for spiritual light and instruction, all the promises of God savingly to enlighten the minds of men, and the descriptions given of that work of his grace whereby he doth effect it, do undeniably evince. One consideration will be sufficient unto our purpose. Whosoever hath a spiritual view and knowledge of these things, his mind will be, and is, certainly changed and transformed into the image of them. So the apostle tells us expressly, 2 Corinthians 3:18,

“We all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image.”

They are cast into the same mould with the doctrine whereunto they are given up, Romans 6:17. [“yet you obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine to which you were delivered.”] The mind is united unto the things so discerned, and the image of them is so brought forth therein as that there is an exact conformity between them. But we see by open and palpable experience, that notwithstanding the knowledge which many have of spiritual things, their minds continue carnal and fleshly, filled with corrupt and depraved affections, and are no way changed into the image or likeness of the things themselves. There needs no farther demonstration that men have never had a spiritual view of or insight into the glory of gospel truths, be their doctrinal knowledge of them what it will, than this, that their minds are not renewed thereby, nor transformed into the likeness of them.

Where it is thus with men, they have no stable grounds whereon to abide in the profession of the truth against temptation, opposition, or seduction; for their steadfastness must be an effect of such an assurance in their minds of the truth of the things which they do believe, as will be prevalent against all that force and artifice wherewith they may be assaulted, and such as will not suffer their own minds to be indifferent, careless, or negligent about them. But whence should this arise? Assurance from outward natural sense in spiritual things we are not capable of, nor are they evidenced unto our minds by rational demonstration. All the full persuasion or assurance we can have of them, which will be prevalent against temptations and oppositions, ariseth from such a spiritual view of them as gives an experience of their reality, power, and efficacy upon our minds: and this respects both the renovation of the mind itself in light and faith; the adhesion of the will unto the things known and believed, with a holy, heavenly, unconquerable love; and the constant approbation of the good, acceptable, and perfect will of God in all things. Hence this assurance, though it be neither that of sense nor that of reason, yet in the Scripture is compared with them and preferred above them, as that which giveth the mind a more certain satisfaction than they can do, although it be of another kind. [This is faith! Heb. 11:1 - the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen (with the natural eye and senses) Faith, the instrument God gives you at conversion, makes it real to the soul, so that these spiritual excellencies are seen by the soul through the eyes of faith, as through a glass darkly. We still do not see things as they are since faith is imperfect; in heaven faith is made perfect, in that we will live by sight there; we will see Him (and his glory) as he really is. But on earth we live by faith.] And without this it is impossible that men should attain any such evidence or full persuasion of that evangelical truth which they may profess, as to secure them in their profession in such a juncture of circumstances and occasions as they may fall into.

Here, therefore, I place another means and cause of apostasy from the truth of the gospel after it hath been received and professed. Multitudes in all ages have been instructed in the truth, some have been learned and knowing in the doctrines of it; but whereas, by reason of their darkness, as being destitute of spiritual illumination, they did not discern the things themselves which they assented unto, in their supernatural, heavenly nature and glory, and therefore had no experience of their proper power and efficacy on their own minds, affections, and lives, they could not have any such evidence of their truth as would upon trials confirm their adherence unto them or secure them from apostasy.

Had the minds of men been transformed in their renovation to “prove what is the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God,” — had they by beholding of spiritual things “been changed into the same image from glory to glory, by the Spirit of the Lord,” — they would not have abandoned the most important doctrines of the gospel, as we know them to have done, nor have embraced foolish imaginations in their stead, on every plausible courtship and address unto their fancies. How came men under the papal apostasy gradually to desert the principal truths of the gospel and all the spiritual glory of its worship? Not discerning the internal glory and beauty of things evangelical and purely divine, not having an experience of the power of them in and upon their own minds, they chose to comply with, and give admission unto, such things whose outward painted beauty they could discern, and whose effects on their natural and carnal affections they had experience of.

We have seen, in all ages, men learned and skilled in the doctrines of the truth, so as that they might have been looked on as pillars of it, yet to have been as forward as any unto apostasy from it when they have been tried; yea, such have been the leaders of others thereinto. So many of this sort fell into Arianism and Pelagianism of old, as some have done into Socinianism, and many into Popery in our days. When such fall away, usually they overthrow the faith of some, and shake the confidence of others.

But the apostle gives a double relief against this temptation: — first, The stability of God’s purpose in the preservation of the elect; and, secondly, The means of preservation in holiness of them that believe, 2 Timothy 2:19. And we may be assured concerning them all, that they never had that intuition into nor comprehension of spiritual things which alone could secure their stability. They never saw so much or that in them for which they should be preferred above all other things. No man who forsakes the truth ever saw the glory of it, or had experience of its power.

“They went out from us, but they were not of us,” saith the apostle of such persons; “for if they had been of us” (whose fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ), “they would no doubt have continued with us: but they went out, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us,” 1 John 2:19.

Thus when the apostle had described the woeful apostasy of some among the Hebrews, he adds concerning them whose preservation he believed,

“But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, and things that accompany salvation,” Hebrews 6:9.

Whatever knowledge men may have of the doctrines of the gospel, and whatever profession they may make, unless they have withal those things which are inseparable from salvation, such as is the saving illumination of the Holy Ghost, whereby the darkness of our minds is removed, there can be no assurance that they will always “quit themselves like men,” and “stand fast in the faith.” And this consideration doth not a little evidence the danger of a defection from the truth which attends the days wherein we live. [and that was in 1680!!!]

For, first, it is from hence that we have such a numerous generation of sceptics in religion among us, — a sort of men who pretend not to renounce or forsake the truth, only they will talk and dispute about it with the greatest indifferency as to what is true or false. The Scripture, the holy Trinity, the person of Christ, his offices, the nature of justification and grace, whether it be or be not, this or that church, all or any in the world, as to their profession and worship, are weighed in the defiled, tottering scales of bold, irreverent discourses. For some reasons known to themselves, this sort of persons will own the public profession of religion, perhaps be teachers in it. But on all occasions they fully manifest that they are utterly ignorant of the fundamental difference between truth and error, and so give no firm assent unto what they do profess; for this difference lieth in their glory and beauty in themselves, and in their power and efficacy towards us. Spiritual, heavenly truth, by its relation unto the being, infinite wisdom, goodness, love, and grace of God, by the characters of all these things impressed on it and represented by it, is glorious, amiable, and desirable; — all error, as an effect of darkness, and by its relation unto Satan as the head of the apostasy which drew off our minds from the original essential Truth, is distorted, deformed, and brings the mind into confusion. Truth is powerful and effectual to conform the soul unto God, and to principle it with a love of and power unto obedience; — error turns the mind aside into crooked and by paths of folly or superstition, or pride and self-advancement. Were men practically acquainted with this difference between truth and error, it would take away that indifferency in their minds unto them which this skeptical humor doth discover. Truth so known in its nature and efficacy will beget that reverence, that love, that sacred esteem of itself, in the souls of men, as they shall not dare to prostitute it to be bandied up and down with every foolish imagination. And from this sort of men, who are commonly the most bold and forward in undertaking the conduct of others, by a pretended generous contempt of their narrow principles, groundless scruples, and pusillanimous fears, nothing is to be expected but a wise and safe compliance with any ways or means of apostasy from the truth which shall be advantageously presented unto them.

And by the means of this darkness, it is easy to conceive how uncertain and unstable the minds of the generality of men, who perhaps also are somewhat ignorant (whereof we shall treat afterward), must needs be in their assent unto the truth and the profession of it. They are no way able to discover it in such a way or manner as to give them an assurance which will be infallibly victorious against temptations and oppositions; nor can they have that holy love unto it which will secure their minds and affections from being enticed and ravished from it. But, all the difference between truth and error which they can discern lying in bare different notions and apprehensions, wherein also they are dark and unskilled, it is no wonder if at any time they make an easy transcurion from the one to the other. So did the body of the people lose the truth gradually under the papal defection without any great complaint, yea, with much complacency and satisfaction; and it is to be feared that multitudes are ready at once to steer the same course if occasion be offered unto them. From this consideration we may rectify the seeming solecism [a gradual deterioration of doctrine] that is in the profession of religion, or the professors of it. Truth in every kind is the only guide of the mind in all its actings; wherein it proceeds not according unto it, it is always out of the way. Divine truth is the sole conduct of the mind in all its actings towards God; it is the only fountain, immediate cause, and rule of all our obedience. But yet, whereas in other things men generally walk in the light of those sparks of truth which they have received, we see that many by whom divine truth is owned and professed in its greatest purity and highest discovery are oftentimes no less wicked and vicious in their lives, no less enemies unto holiness, no less barren and unfruitful in those good and useful works it guides and directs unto, than those who, having the greatest aversion from it, are, under the conduct of other principles, erroneous and superstitious. Thus the lives of the common sort of Protestants are no better than those of the Papists, nor are theirs to be compared with those of some of the Mohammedans; yea, by the power of false and superstitious apprehensions imposed on their minds and consciences, some are carried out unto greater and more frequent acts of bounty and charity, of the mortification of the flesh, the denial of its sensual appetites and satisfactions, than are to be found among the most who profess themselves to be under the conduct and rule of truth. Hence no profession of religion, be it never so corrupt or foolish, is advanced amongst us, but instantly (at least for a season, and while it is new) it pretends an advantage as unto life and conversation against the truth, measured by the lives of its common professors; yea, this is made the principal motive and argument to prevail with honest and well-meaning people unto a compliance with the profession of their way, because of the effects which (as it is pretended) it produceth in their lives and conversations above those which profess the truth. And how prevalent this pretense hath been among us is known unto all. Wherefore, I say, we cannot allow that the lives of the common sort of professors should be esteemed a just and due representation of the doctrine which they do profess. It is true, that where it is not so, men will have no benefit by their profession, nor will they be steadfast in it when a trial shall befall them. Where the mind is internally and really conformed unto the truth, there the actions of the life may be allowed to represent sincerely, though not perfectly, the truths which are believed; and he is no firm Christian in any kind, he is brought into no spiritual order, whose mind doth not receive by the Spirit of Christ the transforming influence of evangelical truth, and who exerts not the power of it in a holy conversation, so as that he is not unwilling that what he believeth may be impartially judged by what he liveth, as to sincerity, though not as to perfection. But if we should allow the lives of men in general to be a rule whereby judgment might be safely passed in these things, it cannot be denied but that sometimes, and in some ages and places, error would, at least for a season, carry it in glory and reputation from the truth, yea, the light of nature from grace, tradition from the Scripture, and the Alcoran [the Koran] from the Gospel.

But we have sufficient ground of exceptions unto this interpretation and exposition of the doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that without the least apology for the ungodly lives of its professors. Among these, that now insisted on is of the first rank and evidence. Multitudes of those who profess the truth never had a view of its spiritual glory because of the darkness of their minds, and therefore have no experience of its power and efficacy, nor are their hearts and lives influenced or guided by it; for the gospel will not have its effects on the minds of men unless it first communicates unto them those internal spiritual principles which are necessary unto all the operations that it doth require. Put this new wine into old bottles and all is lost, both bottles and wine also. The doctrine of the gospel, taken notionally into the old, unrenewed, corrupt minds of men, is utterly lost as unto all the proper ends of it. And wherever there is a reformation of life, with any diligent attendance unto duties moral or religious, wrought in persons by the light and dispensation of the gospel, they are the immediate effects of those doctrines which it hath in common with the light of nature and the law in its power [which is not saving, just common grace, i.e., not the power of an endless life], and not of those which are peculiarly its own. And this they seem to understand well enough who, finding, either in their own experience, or from the observation they have made of others, how ineffectual the truth of gospel mysteries is towards the minds of carnal men [men unconverted, still in the image of Adam, a natural man as opposed to a spiritual man. see 1Cor2:14], have upon the matter, abandoned the preaching of it, and have taken up only with those principles which are suited unto the light of nature and convictions of the law. [i.e., they turn into legal preachers! Remember, one of the purposes of the law given out at Mt. Sinai was to curb sin since the Jews were stiff-necked and a rebellious people. The other purpose of the law was to show the infinite hatefulness of sin and to engender fear and bondage causing the elect to always look forward for their redeemer that would deliver them. And so the law works with the conscience to curb sin; this is a legal obedience because it is primarily founded on the law as opposed to evangelical obedience which is founded upon on faith, a love for God from the heart, and a due esteem for God for who he is according to his glory and excellencies of his nature that is seen by the eyes of faith albeit imperfectly.]

The holiness which the gospel requireth is the transforming of our whole souls into the image and likeness of God, with the actings of renewed nature in a universal approbation of his "good, and acceptable, and perfect will," Romans 12:2. But this will not be effected unless we can "behold the glory of the Lord" in it, whereby alone we may be "changed into the same image from glory to glory," 2 Corinthians 3:18. Nor can we so behold that glory unless he "who commanded the light to shine out of darkness do shine in our hearts to give us the knowledge of it," chap. 4:6. Hence is the doctrine of it ineffectual in the hearts and upon the lives of many by whom its truth is openly professed. [an excellent summary!]

It is otherwise with every false religion. The motives which they make use of, and the instruments they apply, unto the hearts of men, to effect the reformation of their lives, and to engage them unto such works and duties as they require, are all of them suited either unto their natural light, or unto their superstitions, fears, desires, pride, and other depraved affections. Those of the first sort, — namely, such as are suited unto natural light, — are common, in some degree or measure, unto all religion whatever, be it on other accounts true or false. Everything that is called religion pretends at least unto the improvement of natural light, as did the philosophers among the heathen of old. It urgeth also the law so far as it is made known unto them, though by other presumptions and prejudices some do abate and take off from its force and efficacy, making void the commandments of God through their own traditions. Whatever change is wrought or effected on the minds and lives of men by virtue of these principles, and motives taken from them, doth not belong unto any one way in religion more than another; nor is it to be accounted unto the glory or advantage of any of them. In these things Mohammedanism and all false ways in Christianity have an equal share and interest, unless where, by some corrupt opinions of their own, men deprave the light of nature and the rule of the law itself. Some finding, as they say, more of justice, temperance, veracity, righteousness in dealings, with common usefulness unto mankind, among Turks and Banians, than among the common sort of Christians, do foolishly begin to think that their religion is better than Christianity. But as this scandal will be surely required at the hands of them who give it by their flagitious lives, so it is foolishly and wickedly taken by others; for those truths and laws which produce these effects in them are common unto all religions, and are equally suited unto the light and reason of all mankind, and have more evidence and efficacy communicated unto them by the gospel than by any other kind of religion whatever. And so it is with them among ourselves who would plead an advantage unto their profession by the effects of it in their lives as to a moral conversation, when they can pretend unto no real motive thereunto, — namely, unto what is good and useful, and not mere affectation and hypocrisy, — but what is owned and pressed in the doctrine of the gospel which we adhere unto. The differences, therefore, that are in this kind are not from the doctrines men profess, but they arise from the persons themselves who embrace them, with their various lusts, inclinations, and temptations.

It is evident, therefore, that whatever there is of moral good, duty, or usefulness among men in any false way of religion, it all proceeds from those principles and is the effect of those motives which are owned and improved in that which is true; and it may be easily evinced that they are more cultivated and cleared, have more evidence, life, light, and power given them, by the truths of the gospel, than by any other means or way whatever. And where they have not an equal effect upon those who profess that truth which they have on some by whom it is deserted, it is from the power of their own cursed lusts and carnal security. The difference on the part of religion itself consists in what is superadded unto these general principles by any notions of it. Now this, in every false religion, is what is suited unto the natural principles of men's minds, their innate pride, vanity, curiosity, superstition, irregular hopes and fears. Such among the Romanists are the doctrines of merit, of outward disciplines, of satisfactions for sin, of confession, penances, of purgatory, and the like. They were all of them found out to put some awe on the minds, and to have some influence on the lives of men, who had lost all sense of the principles and motives of gospel obedience, though some considerable respect was had unto the benefit and advantage of them by whom they were invented; for why should men labor and beat their brains merely for others, without some income and revenue of advantage unto themselves? And it is no wonder if they produce in many, as they have done, great appearing acts of devotion, many outward works of bounty and charity, yea, in some, real austerities of life and renunciations of the pleasures of the world. I doubt not but that the sensual, wicked paradise of Mohammed doth effectually prevail in the minds of many of his followers unto that kind of virtuous and devout life which they suppose may bring them unto its enjoyment.

The inquiry, then, on the whole matter is, wherefore the truths of the gospel do not produce, in all by whom they are professed, effects as much more excellent than those mentioned as truth is more excellent than error, heavenly light than superstition, faith than frightful apprehensions of feigned torments, true peace and tranquility of mind than outward reputation and glory. And the principal reason hereof is, because such persons as are barren in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ do not discern those truths in their spiritual nature, nor can therefore take in the power and efficacy of them on their souls.

There is a holiness, obedience, and fruitfulness in good works, wrought, preserved, and maintained by the truth of the gospel, in them who are truly regenerated and sanctified thereby, who receive the proper efficacy of it on their minds and souls, which differ in the whole kind and nature from anything which the principles and motives before mentioned, which have their efficacy from their suitableness unto the depraved affections of men's minds, can produce; and this alone is acceptable with God. But it must be granted, that where men are ignorant of the power made unacquainted with the internal efficacy of the gospel, their lives under the profession of the truth may be as bad, and it is a great wonder they are not worse than those of the Papists, of the most erroneous persons, or even of the Mohammedans themselves: for they have many superstitious imaginations and false principles that are suited to put some outward restraint upon their lusts, and to press them unto actions praiseworthy in themselves; but these being no way influenced by such apprehensions, and being not under the power of gospel truth, it is a wonder, I say, if they exceed them not in all manner of wicked conversation. It is not merely the outward profession of the truth, but the inward power of it, that is useful either unto the world or the souls of men.

And hence it is that the preaching of any person which principally dwelleth on and argueth from the things which the light of nature can of itself reach unto, and the convictions which are by the law, is better accepted with, and appears more useful unto multitudes of common professors, than the declaration of the mysteries of the gospel is: for such things are suited unto the natural conceptions of men and the working of their own reason, which gives them a sense of what efficacy they have; but being in the dark unto the mysteries of the gospel, they neither see their excellency nor experience their power. Nevertheless, they and they only are the true spring, cause, and rule of all acceptable obedience, even "the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth." From the whole it appears how prone such persons must be unto an apostasy from the truth who have no spiritual light to discern its glory nor to let in the power of it upon their souls. WOW!!!

If, then, we would be established in the truth, if we would stand fast in the faith, if we would be preserved from the danger of that defection from the gospel which the world is prone, disposed, and inclined unto, it must be our principal endeavor to have a spiritual acquaintance with the things themselves that are declared in the doctrine of truth which we do profess, and to have an experience of their efficacy upon our own souls. Mere notions of truth, or the knowledge of the doctrines of it, enabling us to talk of them or dispute for them, will not preserve us. And although this spiritual light be the grace, promise, and gift of God, yet is it that which we are to endeavor after in a way of duty; and the directions ensuing may contribute somewhat towards the right discharge of our duty herein: —

1. Pray earnestly for the Spirit of truth go lead us into all truth. For this end is he promised by our Savior unto his disciples; and there are no teachings like his. If we learn and receive the truths of the gospel merely in the power and ability of our natural faculties, as we do other things, we shall not abide constant unto them in spiritual trials. What we learn of ourselves in spiritual things, we receive only in the outward form of it; what we are taught by the Spirit of God, we receive in its power. The apostle grants that “the spirit of man,” his mind, reason, and understanding, is able to conceive of and apprehend “the things of a man,” things merely natural, civil, or moral, which are cognate unto human nature; but saith he, “The things of God,” the mystery of his wisdom, love, and grace in Christ Jesus, “knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God,” and by him are they revealed unto them that do believe, 1 Corinthians 2:9-12. Without his especial aid, men may, by their natural sagacity and industry, attain an acquaintance with the doctrines of truth, so as to handle them (like the schoolmen) with incredible subtilty and curiosity; but they may be far enough for all that from an establishing knowledge of spiritual things. That horrible neglect which is among Christians of this one duty of earnest prayer for the teaching of the Spirit of Christ, that scorn which is cast upon it by some, and that self-confidence in opposition unto it which prevails in the most, sufficiently manifest of what nature is their knowledge of the truth, and what is like to become of it when a trial shall befall them. The least spark of saving knowledge inlaid in the minds of the poorest believers, by the gracious operation of the Holy Ghost, will be more effectual unto the r own sanctification, and more prevalent against oppositions, than the highest notions or most subtle reasonings that men have attained in leaning unto their own understanding. Wherefore the Scripture abounds in examples, instances, and directions for prayer, unto this end, that we may have the assistance of the Holy Spirit in learning of the truth of the mysteries of the gospel, without which we cannot do so in a due manner:
Ephesians 1:16-20,
