superlative. There is a beauty in them that is so divine and godlike, that is greatly and evidently distinguishing of them from things merely human, or that men are the inventors and authors of; a glory that is so high and great, that when clearly seen, commands assent to their divinity and reality. When there is an actual and lively discovery of this beauty and excellency, it will not allow of any such thought as that it is a human work, or the fruit of men's invention. This evidence that they that are spiritually enlightened have of the truth of the things of religion, is a kind of intuitive and immediate evidence. They believe the doctrines of God's word to be divine, because they see divinity in them; i.e., they see a divine, and transcendent, and most evidently distinguishing glory in them; such a glory as, if clearly seen, does not leave room to doubt of their being of God, and not of men.

Such a conviction of the truth of religion as this, arising, these ways, from a sense of the divine excellency of them, is that true spiritual conviction that there is in saving faith. And this original of it, is that by which it is most essentially distinguished from that common assent, which unregenerate men are capable of.

II. I proceed now to the second thing proposed, viz., to show how this light is immediately given by God, and not obtained by natural means. And here,

1. It is not intended that the natural faculties are not made use of in it. The natural faculties are the subject of this light: and they are the subject in such a manner, that they are not merely passive, but active in it; the acts and exercises of man's understanding are concerned and made use of in it. God, in letting in this light into the soul, deals with man according to his nature, or as a rational creature; and makes use of his human faculties. But yet this light is not the less immediately from God for that; though the faculties are made use of, it is as the subject and not as the cause; and that acting of the faculties in it, is not the cause, but is either implied in the thing itself (in the light that is imparted) or is the consequence of it. As the use that we make of our eyes in beholding various objects, when the sun arises, is not the cause of the light that discovers those objects to us.

2. It is not intended that outward means have no concern in this affair. As I have observed already, it is not in this affair, as it is in inspiration, where new truths are suggested: for here is by this light only given a due apprehension of the same truths that are revealed in the word of God; and therefore it is not given without the word. The gospel is made use of in this affair: this light is the "light of the glorious gospel of Christ", 2 Cor. 4:4. The gospel is as a glass by which this light is conveyed to us, 1 Cor. 13:12. "Now we see through a glass." -- But,

3. When it is said that this light is given immediately by God, and not obtained by natural means, hereby is intended, that it is given by God without making use of any means that operate by their own power, or a natural force God makes use of means; but it is not as mediate causes to produce this effect. There are not truly any second causes of it; but it is produced by God immediately. The word of God is no proper cause of this effect: it does not operate by any natural force in it. The word of God is only made use of to convey to the mind the subject matter of this saving instruction: and this indeed it doth convey to us by natural force or influence. It conveys to our minds these and those doctrines; it is the cause of the notion of them in our heads, but not of the sense of the divine excellency of them in our hearts. Indeed a person cannot have spiritual light without the word. But that does not argue, that the word properly causes that light. The mind cannot see the excellency of any doctrine, unless that doctrine be first in the mind; but the seeing of the excellency of the doctrine may be immediately from the Spirit of God; though the conveying of the doctrine or proposition itself may be by the word. So that the notions that are the subject matter of this light, are conveyed to the mind by the word of God; but that due sense of the heart, wherein this light formally consists, is immediately by the Spirit of God. As for instance, that notion that there is a Christ, and that Christ is holy and gracious, is conveyed to the mind by the word of God: but the sense of the excellency of Christ by reason of that holiness and grace, is nevertheless immediately the work of the Holy Spirit. -- I come now,

III. To show the truth of the doctrine; that is, to show that there is such a thing as that spiritual light that has been described, thus immediately let into the mind by God. And here I would show briefly, that this doctrine is both scriptural and rational.

First, It is scriptural. My text is not only full to the purpose, but it is a doctrine that the Scripture abounds in. We are there abundantly taught, that the saints differ from the ungodly in this, that they have the knowledge of God, and a sight of God, and of Jesus Christ. I shall mention but few texts of many. 1 John 3:6, "Whosoever sinneth, has not seen him, nor known him." 3 John 11, "He that doth good, is of God: but he that doth evil, hath not seen God." John 14:19, "The world seeth me no more; but ye see me." John 17:3, "And this is eternal life, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." This knowledge, or sight of God and Christ, cannot be a mere speculative knowledge; because it is spoken of as a seeing and knowing, wherein they differ from the ungodly. And by these Scriptures it must not only be a different knowledge in degree and circumstances, and different in its effects; but it must be entirely different in nature and kind.

And this light and knowledge is always spoken of as immediately given of God, Matt. 11:25-27: "At that time Jesus answered and said, I thank thee O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight. All things are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son but the Father: neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him." Here this effect is ascribed alone to the arbitrary operation, and gift of God, bestowing this knowledge on whom he will, and distinguishing those with it, that have the least natural advantage or means for knowledge, even babes, when it is denied to the wise and prudent. And the imparting of the knowledge of God is here appropriated to the Son of God, as his sole prerogative. And again, 2 Cor. 4:6, "For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ." This plainly shows, that there is such a thing as a discovery of the divine superlative glory and excellency of God and Christ, and that peculiar to the saints: and also, that it is as immediately from God, as light from the sun: and that it is the immediate effect of his power and will; for it is compared to God's creating the light by his powerful word in the beginning of the creation; and is said to be by the Spirit of the Lord, in the 18th verse of the preceding chapter. God is spoken of as giving the knowledge of Christ in conversion, as of what before was hidden and unseen in that. Gal. 1:15,16, "But when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace, to reveal his Son in me." The Scripture also speaks plainly of such a knowledge of the word of God, as has been described, as the immediate gift of God, Psalm 119:18: "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law." What could the Psalmist mean when he begged of God to open his eyes? Was he ever blind? Might he not have resort to the law and see every word and sentence in it when he pleased? and what could he mean by those wondrous things? Was it the wonderful stories of the creation, and deluge, and Israel's passing through the Red Sea, and the like? Were not his eyes open to read these strange things when he would? Doubtless by wondrous things in God's law, he had respect to those distinguishing and wonderful excellencies, and marvellous manifestations of the divine perfections, and glory, that there was in the commands and doctrines of the word, and those works and counsels of God that were there revealed. So the Scripture speaks of a knowledge of God's dispensation, and covenant of mercy, and way of grace towards his people, as peculiar to the saints, and given only by God, Psalm 25:14: "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him; and he will show them his covenant."

And that a true and saving belief of the truth of religion is that which arises from such a discovery, is also what the Scripture teaches. As John 6:40, "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life;" where it is plain that a true faith is what arises from a spiritual sight of Christ. and John 17:6,7,8, "I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world. Now they have known that all things whatsoever thou hast given me, are of thee. For I have given unto them the words which thou gavest me; and they have received them, and have known surely that I came out from thee, and they have believed that thou didst send me;" where Christ's manifesting God's name to the disciples, or giving them the knowledge of God, was that whereby they knew that Christ's doctrine was of God, and that Christ himself was of him, proceeded from him, and was sent by him. Again, John 12:44,45,46, "Jesus cried and said, He that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that sent me. And he that seeth me, seeth him that sent me. I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me, should not abide in darkness." Their believing in Christ, and spiritually seeing him, are spoken of as running parallel.

Christ condemns the Jews that they did not know that he was the Messiah, and that his doctrine was true, from an inward distinguishing taste and relish of what was divine, in Luke 12:56,57. He having there blamed the Jews, that though they could discern the face of the sky and of the earth, and signs of the weather, that yet they could not discern those times; or as it is expressed in Matthew, the signs of those times; he adds, yea, and why even of your own selves, judge ye not what is right? i.e., without extrinsic signs. Why have ye not that sense of true excellency, whereby ye may distinguish that which is holy and divine? Why have ye not that savor of the things of God, by which you may see the distinguishing glory, and evident divinity of me and my doctrine?

The Apostle Peter mentions it as what gave them (the apostles) good and well grounded assurance of the truth of the gospel, that they had seen the divine glory of Christ. 2 Pet. 1:16, "For we have not followed cunningly devised fables when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eyewitnesses of his majesty." The apostle has respect to that visible glory of Christ which they saw in his transfiguration: that glory was so divine, having such an ineffable appearance and semblance of divine holiness, majesty and grace, that it evidently denoted him to be a divine person. But if a sight of Christ's outward glory might give a rational assurance of his divinity, why may not an apprehension of his spiritual glory do so too? Doubtless Christ's spiritual glory is in itself as distinguishing, and as plainly showing his divinity, as his outward glory, and a great deal more: for his spiritual glory is that wherein his divinity consists; and the outward glory of his transfiguration showed him to be divine, only as it was a remarkable image or representation of that spiritual glory. Doubtless, therefore, he that has had a clear sight of the spiritual glory of Christ, may say, I have not followed cunningly devised fables, but have been an eyewitness of his majesty, upon as good grounds as the apostle, when he had respect to the outward glory of Christ that he had seen. -- But this brings me to what was proposed next, viz., to show that,

1. It is rational to suppose, that there is really such an excellency in divine things, that is so transcendent and exceedingly different from what is in other things, that, if it were seen, would most evidently distinguish them. We cannot rationally doubt but that things that are divine, that appertain to the Supreme Being, are vastly different from things that are human; that there is that godlike, high and glorious excellency in them, that does most remarkably difference them from the things that are of men; insomuch that if the difference were but seen, it would have a convincing, satisfying influence upon any one, that they are what they are, viz., divine. What reason can be offered against it? Unless we would argue, that God is not remarkably distinguished in glory from men.

If Christ should now appear to any one as he did on the mount at his transfiguration; or if he should appear to the world in the glory that he now appears in, as he will do at the day of judgment; without doubt, the glory and majesty that he would appear in, would be such as would satisfy everyone that he was a divine person, and that religion was true: and it would be a most reasonable, and well grounded conviction too. And why may there not be that stamp of divinity, or divine glory on the word of God, on the scheme and doctrine of the gospel, that may be in like manner distinguishing and as rationally convincing, provided it be but seen? It is rational to suppose, that when God speaks to the world, there should be something in his word or speech vastly different from man's word. Supposing that God never had spoken to the world, but we had noticed that he was about to do it; that he was about to reveal himself from heaven, and speak to us immediately himself, in divine speeches or discourses, as it were from his own mouth, or that he should give us a book of his own inditing; after what manner should we expect that he would speak? Would it not be rational to suppose, that his speech would be exceeding different from man's speech, that he should speak like a God; that is, that there should be such an excellency and sublimity in his speech or word, such a stamp of wisdom, holiness, majesty and other divine perfections, that the word of man, yea of the wisest of men, should appear mean and base in comparison of it? Doubtless it would be thought rational to expect this, and unreasonable to think otherwise. When a wise man speaks in the exercise of his wisdom, there is something in everything he says, that is very distinguishable from the talk of a little child. So, without doubt, and much more, is the speech of God (if there be any such thing as the speech of God) to be distinguished from that of the wisest of men; agreeably to Jer. 23:28,29. God having there been reprovng the false prophets that prophesied in his name, and pretended that what they spake was his word, when indeed it was their own word, says, "The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream; and he that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully: what is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord. Is not my word like as a fire? saith the Lord; and like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces?"

2. If there be such a distinguishing excellency in divine things; it is rational to suppose that there may be such a thing as seeing it. What should hinder but that it may be seen? It is no argument, that there is no such thing as such a distinguishing excellency, or that, if there be, that it cannot be seen, that some do not see it, though they may be discerning men in temporal matters. It is not rational to suppose, if there be any such excellency in divine things, that wicked men should see it. It is not rational to suppose, that those whose minds are full of spiritual pollution, and under the power of filthy lusts, should have any relish or sense of divine beauty or excellency; or that their minds should be susceptible of that light that is in its own nature so pure and heavenly. It need not seem at all strange, that sin should so blind the mind, seeing that men's particular natural tempers and dispositions will so much blind them in secular matters; as when men's natural temper is melancholy, jealous, fearful, proud, or the like.

3. It is rational to suppose, that this knowledge should be given immediately by God, and not be obtained by natural means. Upon what account should it seem unreasonable, that there should be any immediate communication between God and the creature? It is strange that men should make any matter of difficulty of it. Why should not he that made all things, still have something immediately to do with the things that he has made? Where lies the great difficulty, if we own the being of a God, and that he created all things out of nothing, of allowing some immediate influence of God on the creation still? And if it be reasonable to suppose it with respect to any part of the creation, it is especially so with respect to reasonable, intelligent creatures; who are next to God in the gradation of the different orders of beings, and whose business is most immediately with God; who were made on purpose for those exercises that do respect God and wherein they have nextly to do with God: for reason teaches, that man was made to serve and glorify his Creator. And if it be rational to suppose that God immediately communicates himself to man in any affair, it is in this. It is rational to suppose that God would reserve that knowledge and wisdom, that is of such a divine and excellent nature, to be bestowed immediately by himself, and that it should not be left in the power of second causes. Spiritual wisdom and grace is that highest and most excellent gift that ever God bestows on any creature: in this the highest excellency and perfection of a rational creature consists. It is also immensely the most important of all divine gifts: it is that wherein man's happiness consists, and on which his everlasting welfare depends. How rational is it to suppose that God, however he has left meaner goods and lower gifts to second causes, and in some sort in their power, yet should reserve this most excellent, divine, and important of all divine communications, in his own hands, to be bestowed immediately by himself, as a thing too great for second causes to be concerned in!

It is rational to suppose, that this blessing should be immediately from God; for there is no gift or benefit that is in itself so nearly related to the divine nature, there is nothing the creature receives that is so much of God, of his nature, so much a participation of the deity: it is a kind of emanation of God's beauty, and is related to God as the light is to the sun. It is therefore congruous and fit, that when it is given of God, it should be nextly from himself, and by himself, according to his own sovereign will.

It is rational to suppose, that it should be beyond a man's power to obtain this knowledge and light by the mere strength of natural reason; for it is not a thing that belongs to reason, to see the beauty and loveliness of spiritual things; it is not a speculative thing, but depends on the sense of the heart. Reason indeed is necessary in order to it, as it is by reason only that we are become the subjects of the means of it; which means I have already shown to be necessary in order to it, though they have no proper causal in the affair. It is by reason that we become possessed of a notion of those doctrines that are the subject matter of this divine light; and reason may many ways be indirectly and remotely an advantage to it. And reason has also to do in the acts that are immediately consequent on this discovery: a seeing the truth of religion from hence, is by reason; though it be but by one step, and the inference be immediate. So reason has to do in that accepting of, and trusting in Christ, that is consequent on it. But if we take reason strictly -- not for the faculty of mental perception in general, but for ratiocination, or a power of inferring by arguments -- the perceiving of spiritual beauty and excellency no more belongs to reason, than it belongs to the sense of feeling to perceive colours, or to the power of seeing to perceive the sweetness of food. It is out of reason's province to perceive the beauty or loveliness of any thing: such a perception does not belong to that faculty. Reason's work is to perceive truth and not excellency. It is not ratiocination that gives men the perception of the beauty and amiableness of a countenance, though it may be many ways indirectly an advantage to it; yet it is no more reason that immediately perceives it, than it is reason that perceives the sweetness of honey: it depends on the sense of the heart. -- Reason may determine that a countenance is beautiful to others, it may determine that honey is sweet to others; but it will never give me a perception of its sweetness.

I will conclude with a very brief improvement of what has been said.

First, This doctrine may lead us to reflect on the goodness of God, that has so ordered it, that a saving evidence of the truth of the gospel is such, as is attainable by persons of mean capacities and advantages, as well as those that are of the greatest parts and learning. If the evidence of the gospel depended only on history, and such reasonings as learned men only are capable of, it would be above the reach of far the greatest part of mankind. But persons with but an ordinary degree of knowledge, are capable, without a long and subtle train of reasoning, to see the divine excellency of the things of religion: they are capable of being taught by the Spirit of God, as well as learned men. The evidence that is this way obtained, is vastly better and more satisfying, than all that can be obtained by the arguings of those that are most learned, and greatest masters of reason. And babes are as capable of knowing these things, as the wise and prudent; and they are often hid from these things, as the wise and prudent; and they are often hid from these when they are revealed to those. 1 Cor. 1:26,27, "For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men, after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called. But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world --."

Secondly, This doctrine may well put us upon examining ourselves, whether we have ever had this divine light, that has been described, let into our souls. If there be such a thing indeed, and it be not only a notion or whimsy of persons of weak and distempered brains, then doubtless it is a thing of great importance, whether we have thus been taught by the Spirit of God; whether the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, hath shined unto us, giving us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ; whether we have seen the Son, and believed on him, or have that faith of gospel-doctrines which arises from a spiritual sight of Christ.

Thirdly, All may hence be exhorted earnestly to seek this spiritual light. To influence and move to it, the following things may be considered.

[All these points are very important to understand; contemplate them!!!]

1. This is the most excellent and divine wisdom that any creature is capable of. It is more excellent than any human learning; it is far more excellent than all the knowledge of the greatest philosophers or statesmen. Yea, the least glimpse of the glory of God in the face of Christ doth more exalt and ennoble the soul, than all the knowledge of those that have the greatest speculative understanding in divinity without grace. This knowledge has the most noble object that is or can be, viz., the divine glory or excellency of God and Christ. The knowledge of these objects is that wherein consists the most excellent knowledge of the angels, yea, of God himself.

2. This knowledge is that which is above all others sweet and joyful. Men have a great deal of pleasure in human knowledge, in studies of natural things; but this is nothing to that joy which arises from this divine light shining into the soul. This light gives a view of those things that are immensely the most exquisitely beautiful, and capable of delighting the eye of the understanding. This spiritual light is the dawning of the light of glory in the heart. [or the beginning of that glory in which we partake in heaven, seeing Christ as he is] There is nothing so powerful as this to support persons in affliction, and to give the mind peace and brightness in this stormy and dark world.

3. This light is such as effectually influences the inclination, and changes the nature of the soul. It assimilates the nature to the divine nature, and changes the soul into an image of the same glory that is beheld. 2 Cor. 3:18, "But we all with open face, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." This knowledge will wean from the world, and raise the inclination to heavenly things. It will turn the heart to God as the fountain of good, and to choose him for the only portion. This light, and this only, will bring the soul to a saving close with Christ. It conforms the heart to the gospel, mortifies its enmity and opposition against the scheme of salvation therein revealed: it causes the heart to embrace the joyful tidings, and entirely to adhere to, and acquiesce in the revelation of Christ as our Saviour: it causes the whole soul to accord and symphonize with it, admitting it with entire credit and respect cleaving to it with full inclination and affection; and it effectually disposes the soul to give up itself entirely to Christ.

4. This light, and this only, has its fruit in a universal holiness of life. No merely notional or speculative understanding of the doctrines of religion will ever bring to this. But this light, as it reaches the bottom of the heart, and changes the nature, so it will effectually dispose to a universal obedience. It shows God's worthiness to be obeyed and served. It draws forth the heart in a sincere love to God, which is the only principle of a true, gracious, and universal obedience; and it convinces of the reality of those glorious rewards that God has promised to them that obey him.

John Flavel, pg 250 Vol. 4 England's Duty

In the last place, I shall show you the transcendent excellency of this life of communion with God; it is the life of our life, the joy of our hearts; a heaven upon earth, as will appear by these twenty excellencies thereof following,

- I. Excellency. It is the assimilating instrument whereby the soul is molded and fashioned after the image of God. This is the excellency of communion with God, to make the soul like him. There is a two-fold assimilation or conformity of the soul to God, the one perfect and complete, the other inchoate and in part. Perfect assimilation is the privilege of the perfect state, resulting from the immediate vision and perfect communion the soul hath with God in glory, 1John 3:2, "When he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." Perfect vision produceth perfect assimilation; but the soul's assimilation or imperfect conformity to God in this world, is wrought and gradually carried on, by daily communion with him. And as our communion with God here, grows up more and more into spirituality and power, so in an answerable degree doth our conformity to him advance. Cor. 3:18, "But we all, with open face, beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord." All sorts of communion among men have an assimilating efficacy; he that walks in vain company is made vainer than he was before; and he that walks in spiritual, heavenly company, will be ordinarily more serious than he was before. But nothing so transforms the spirit of a man as communion with God doth. Those are most like unto God that converse most frequently with him. The beauty of the Lord is upon those souls; it figures the spirit of a man after the divine pattern. That is the first excellency of communion with God, it assimilates them to God.

This is an excellent summary of things that have to do with the believers' union with Christ, being engrafted into Christ, the communication of holiness, the restoring of the image of God upon the soul, and the spiritual advantages of new covenant believers over those under the law as Adam was in the Garden.

Union with Christ

From The Method of Grace

by John Flavel, Vol. 2 pg 141-144 - excerpts

SERMON VIII.

Setting forth the Believer's Fellowship with Christ, the next End of his Application to them.

Psalm xlv. 7.

Therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows.

THE method of grace in uniting souls with Jesus Christ, hath been opened in the former discourses; thus doth the Spirit, (whose office it is) make application of Christ to God's elect; The result and next fruit whereof is communion with Christ in his graces and benefits. Our mystical union is the very ground-work and foundation of our sweet, soul-enriching communion and participation of spiritual privileges; we are first ingrafted into Christ, and then suck the sap and fatness of the root: first married to the person of Christ, then endowed and instated in the privileges and benefits of Christ. This is my proper work to open at this time, and from this scripture.

The words read, are a part of that excellent song of love, that heavenly Epithalamium, wherein the spiritual espousals of Christ and the church are figuratively and very elegantly celebrated and shadowed. The subject matter of this psalm is the very same with the whole book of the Canticles; and in this psalm, under the figure of king Solomon, and the daughter of Egypt, whom he espoused, the spiritual espousals of Christ and the church are set forth and represented to us. Among many rapturous and elegant expressions in praise of this glorious bridegroom, Christ, this is one, which you have before you: "God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows:" i.e., enriched and filled thee, in a singular and peculiar manner, with the fulness of the Spirit, whereby thou art consecrated to thy office; and by reason whereof thou out-shinest and excellest all the saints, who are thy fellows or copartners in these graces. So that in these words you have two parts; viz.

First, The saints' dignity, and Secondly, Christ's pre-eminency:

First, The saints' dignity, which consists in this, that they are Christ's fellows. The Hebrew word is very full and copious, and is translated "consorts, companions, copartners, partakers: or, as ours read it, fellows, i.e., such as are partakers with him in the anointing of the Spirit, who do, in their measure, receive the same Spirit, every Christian being anointed, modo sibi proportionate, with the same grace, and dignified with the same titles, 1 John ii. 27, Rev. i. 6. Christ and the saints are in common one with another: Doth the spirit of holiness dwell in him? so it doth in them too. Is Christ King and Priest? Why, so are they too by the grace of union with him. He hath made us kings and priests to God, and his Father. This is the saints' dignity to be Christ's fellows, consorts, or copartners; so that look, whatever spiritual grace or excellency is in Christ, it is not appropriated to himself, but they do share with him: for indeed he was filled with the fulness of the Spirit, for their sakes and use; as the sun is filled with light, not to shine to itself, but to others; so is Christ with grace. And therefore, some translate the text, not prae consortibus, above thy fellows; but propter consortes, for thy fellows¹. [¹ Oil itself is pure and clear, which supplies and feeds the flame with fuel; hence the metaphor of anointing with oil used in scripture, frequently signifies the internal illumination of the mind by the Holy Spirit, and the communication of the true knowledge of God, and suitable affections of soul to it. Moller. on the place.] Making Christ the first receptacle of grace, who first and immediately is filled from the fountain, the Godhead: but it is for his people, who receive and derive from him, according to their proportion.

This is a great truth, and the dignity of the saints lies chiefly in their partnership with Christ, though our translation, above thy fellows, suits best, both with the importance of the word, and scope of the place.

Secondly, But then, whatever dignity is ascribed herein to the saints, there is, and still must be, a pre-eminency acknowledged, and ascribed to Christ: if they are anointed with the Spirit of grace, much more abundantly is Christ: "God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows."

By the oil of gladness understand the Spirit of holiness, compared here with oil, of which there was a double use under the law, viz. a civil and a sacred use. It had a sacred and a solemn use, in the inauguration and consecration of the Jewish kings and high-priests; it had also a civil, and common use, for the anointing their bodies, to make their limbs more agile, expedite, and nimble; to make the face shine, for it gave a lustre, freshness, and liveliness to the countenance. It was also used in lamps, to feed and maintain the fire, and give them light. These were the principal uses of oil. Now, upon all these accounts, it excellently expresseth, and figuratively, represents to us the Spirit of grace poured forth upon Christ and his people. For,

First, By the Spirit poured out upon him, he was prepared for, and consecrated to his offices, he was anointed with the Holy Ghost and with power, Acts x. 38. Secondly, As this precious oil runs down from Christ, the head, to the borders of his garments, I mean, as it is shed upon believers, so it exceedingly beautifies their faces, and makes them shine with glory.

Thirdly, It renders them apt, expedite, and ready to every good work : Non tardat uncta rota.

Fourthly, It kindles and maintains the flame of divine love in their souls, and, like a lamp, enlightens their minds in the knowledge of spiritual things; the anointing teaches them. And this oil is here called the oil of gladness, because it is the cause of all joy and gladness to them that are anointed with it: Oil was used (as you heard before) at the installment of sovereign princes, which was the day of the gladness of their hearts; and, among the common people, it was liberally used at all their festivals, but never upon their days of mourning. Whence it becomes excellently expressive of the nature and use of the Spirit of grace, who is the cause and author of all joy in believers, John xvii. 13.

And with this oil of gladness is Christ said to be anointed above his fellows, i.e., to have a far greater share of the Spirit of grace than they: "For to every one of the saints is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ," Eph. iv. 7. But to him the Spirit is not given by measure, John iii. 34. "It hath pleased the Father, that in him should ail fulness dwell," 1 Col. i. 19- and "of his fulness we all receive grace for grace," John i. 16. The saints partake with him, and through him in the same Spirit of grace, for which reason they are his fellows; but all the grace poured out upon believers comes exceeding short of that which God hath poured out upon Jesus Christ. The words being thus opened, give us this note

Doctrine: That all true believers have a real communion or fellowship with the Lord Jesus Christ.

From the saints union with Christ, there doth naturally and immediately result a most sweet and blessed communion and fellowship with him in graces and spiritual privileges, Eph. i. 3. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places (or things) in Christ"; in giving us his Son, he "freely gives us all things," Rom. viii. 32. So in 1 Cor. i. 30. "Of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption." And once more, 1Cor. iii. 22, 23. "All are yours, and ye are Christ's." What Christ is and hath is theirs by communication to them, or improvement for them; and this is very evidently implied in all those excellent scripture metaphors, by which our union with Christ is figured and shadowed out to us ; as the marriage-union betwixt a man and his wife, Eph. v: 31, 32. You know that this conjugal union gives the wife interest in the estate and honours of the husband, be she never so meanly descended in herself. The natural union betwixt the head and members of the body, by which also the mystical union of Christ and believers is set forth, 1 Cor. xii. 12. excellently illustrates this fellowship or communion betwixt them, for from Christ "the whole body fitly joined together, and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body," as the apostle speaks, Eph. iv. 16. The union betwixt the graft and the stock, which is another emblem of our union with Christ, John xv. 1. imports, in like manner, this communion or partnership betwixt Christ and the saints; for no sooner doth the graft take hold of the stock, but the vital sap of the stock is communicated to the graft, and both live by one and the same juice.

Thirdly, Believers have communion with Christ in his holiness or sanctification, for of God he is made unto them, not only righteousness, but sanctification also; and as in the former privilege, they have a stock of merit in the blood of Christ to justify them; so here, they have the Spirit of Christ to sanctify them, 1 Cor. i. 30. and therefore we are said of his fulness to receive "grace for grace," John i. 16. i.e., say some, grace upon grace, manifold graces, or abundance of grace ; or grace for grace, that is, grace answerable to grace: as in the seal and wax, there is line for line, and cut for cut, exactly answerable to each other; or grace for grace, that is, say others, the free grace of God in Christ, for the sanctification or filling of our souls with grace: be it in which sense it will, it shows the communion believers have with Jesus Christ in grace and holiness. Now, holiness is the most precious thing in the world, it is the image of God, and chief excellency of man: it is our evidence for glory, yea, and the first fruits of glory. In Christ dwells the fulness of grace, and from him, our head, it is derived and communicated to us; thus he that sanctifieth, and they that are sanctified, are all of one, Heb. ii. 11. You would think it no small privilege to have bags of gold to go to, and enrich yourselves with, and yet that were but a very trifle in comparison to have Christ's righteousness and holiness to go to for your justification and sanctification. More particularly,

Fourthly, Believers have communion with Christ in his death; they die with him, Gal. ii. 20. "I am crucified with Christ," i.e., the death of Christ hath a real killing and mortifying influence upon the lusts and corruptions of my heart and nature: true it is, he died for sin one way, and we die to sin another way: he died to expiate it, we die to it, when we mortify it: the death of Christ is the death of sin in believers; and this is a very glorious privilege; for the death of sin is the life of your souls; if sin do not die in you by mortification, you must die for sin by eternal damnation. If Christ had not died, the Spirit of God, by which you now mortify the deeds of the body, could not have been given unto you: then you must have lived vassals to your sins, and died at last in your sins; but the fruit, efficacy, and benefit of Christ's death is yours for the killing those sins in you, which else had been your ruin.

Fifthly, Believers have communion with Christ in his life and resurrection from the dead; as he rose from the dead, so do they; and that by the power and influence of his vivification and resurrection. It is the Spirit of life which is in Christ Jesus that makes us free from the law of sin and death, Rom. viii. 2. Our spiritual life is from Christ, Eph. ii. 1. "And you hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins:" and hence Christ is said to live in the believer, Gal. ii. 20. "Now I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me:" and it is no small privilege to partake of the very life of Christ, which is the most excellent life that ever any creature can live; yet such is the happiness of all the saints, the life of Christ is manifest in them, and such a life as shall never see death.

Sixthly, To conclude, believers have fellowship with Jesus Christ in his glory, which they shall enjoy in heaven with him: they "shall be ever with the Lord," 1 Thes. iv. 17. and that is not all, (though, as one saith, it were a kind of heaven but to look through the key-hole, and have but a glimpse of Christ's blessed face) but they shall partake of the glory which the Father hath given him; for so he speaks, John xvii. 22, 24. and more particularly, they shall sit with him in his throne, Rev. iii. 21. and when he comes to judge the world, he will come to be glorified in the saints, 2 Thes. i. 10. So that you may see what glorious and inestimable things are, and will be in common betwixt Christ and the saints. His titles, his righteousness, his holiness, his death, his life, his glory. I do not say that Christ will make any saint equal with him in glory; that is impossible, he will be known from all the saints in heaven, as the sun is distinguished from the stars; but they shall partake of his glory, and be filled with his joy there and thus you see what those things are that the saints have fellowship with Christ in.

Secondly, Next I would open the way and means by which we come to have fellowship with Jesus Christ in these excellent privileges ; and this I shall do briefly in the following positions.

Position 1.

First, No man hath fellowship with Christ in any special saving privilege by nature, howsoever it be cultivated or improved; but only by faith uniting him to the Lord Jesus Christ; It is not the privilege of our first, but second birth.

This is plain from John i. 12, 13. "But to as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even as many as believe on his name, who are born not of flesh, nor of blood, nor of the will of man, but of God." We are by nature children of wrath, Eph. ii. 3, we have fellowship with Satan in sin and misery: the wild branch hath no communication of the sweetness and fatness of a more noble and excellent root until it be ingrafted upon it, and have immediate union and coalition with it, John xv. 1, 2.

Position 2.

Believers themselves have not an equal share one with another, in all the benefits and privileges of their union with Christ, but in some there is an equality, and in others an inequality ; according to the measure and gift of Christ, to everyone.

In justification they are all equal: the weak and the strong believer are alike justified, because it is one and the same perfect righteousness of Christ, which is applied to the one and to the other, so that there are no different degrees of justification, but all that believe are justified from all things, Acts xiii. 39 and "there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus," Rom. viii. 1 be they never so weak in faith, or defective in degrees of grace. But there is apparent difference in the measures of their sanctification, some are strong men, and others are babes in Christ, 1 Cor. iii. 1. The faith of some flourishes and grows exceedingly, 2 Thes. i. 3. the things that are in others are ready to die, Rev. iii. 2. It is a plain case, that there is great variety found in the degrees of grace, and comfort among them that are jointly interested in Christ, and equally justified by him.

The saints have not fellowship and communion with Christ, in the forementioned benefits and privileges by one and the same medium, but by various mediums and ways, according to the nature of the benefits, in which they participate.

For instance, they have partnership and communion with Christ, as hath been said, in his righteousness, holiness, and glory, but they receive these distinct blessings by divers mediums of communion: we have communion with Christ in his righteousness, by the way of imputation; we partake of his holiness, by the way of infusion; and of his glory in heaven, by the beatifical vision. Our justification is a relative change, our sanctification a real change, our glorification a perfect change, by redemption from all the remains both of sin and misery. Thus hath the Lord appointed several blessings for believers in Christ, and several channels of conveying them from him to us; by imputed righteousness, we are freed from the guilt of sin: by imparted holiness, we are freed from the dominion of sin, and by our glorification with Christ, we are freed from all the relics and remains both of sin and misery let in by sin upon our natures.

That Jesus Christ imparts to all believers, all the spiritual blessings that he is filled with, and withholds none from any that have union, with him, be these blessings never so great, or they that receive them never so weak, mean, and contemptible in outward respects, Gal. iii. 27. "Ye are the children of God by faith in Jesus Christ."

The salvation that comes by Jesus Christ is styled the common salvation Jude 3. and heaven the inheritance of the saints in light, Col. i. 12. "There is neither Greek nor Jew, (saith the apostle, "circumcision, nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, but Christ is all, and in all," 1 Col. iii. 11. He means, there is no privilege in the one to commend them to God, and no want of anything in the other to debar them from God; let men have or want outward excellencies, as beauty, honour, riches, nobility, gifts of the mind, sweetness of nature, and all such like ornaments. What is that to God ? He looks not at these things, but respects them, and communicates his favour to them as they are in Christ: He is all, and in all. The gifts and blessings of the Spirit are given to men as they are in Christ, and without respect to any external differences made in this world among men : hence we find excellent treasures of grace in mean and contemptible persons in the world ; poor in the world and rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom ; and as all believers, without difference, receive from Christ, so they are not debarred from any blessing that is in Christ: "All is yours, for ye are Christ's, 1 Cor. iii. ult. With Christ God "freely gives us all things," Rom. viii. 32.

Position 5.

The communion believers have with Christ, in spiritual benefits is a very great mystery, far above the understandings of natural men.

There are no footsteps of this thing in all the works of creation; therefore the apostle calls it "The unsearchable riches of Christ," Eph. iii. 8. anriyjigov xfoxv em Xetsx: The word signifies, that which hath no footsteps to trace it by : yea, it is so deep a mystery, that the angels themselves stoop down to look into it, 1 Pet. i. 12. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him: but God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit," 1 Cor. ii. 9, 10.

Inference 5. How securely is the saints inheritance settled upon them, seeing they are in common with Jesus Christ for Christ and his saints are joint-heirs, and the inheritance cannot be alienated but by his consent; he must lose his interest, if you lose yours. Indeed Adam's inheritance was by a single title, and moreover, it was in his own hand, and so he might, (as indeed he soon did) divest himself and his posterity of it; but it is not so betwixt Christ and believers; we are secured in our inheritance by Christ our co-heir, who will never alienate it: and therefore it was truly observed by the father, Faelicior Job in sterquilinio, quam Adamus in paradiso : Job was happier upon the dunghill, than Adam was in paradise. The covenant of grace is certainly the best tenure; as it hath the best mercies, so it gives the fullest security to enjoy them.

pg 414, Sermon 30 - an excellent summary

Secondly, The nature of Christ-mystical requires this conformity, and renders it indispensably necessary. Otherwise, the body of Christ must be heterogeneous; of a nature different from the head, and how monstrous and uncomely would this be? This would represent Christ to the world in an image, or idea, much like that, Dan. 2:32, 33. "The head of fine gold, the breasts and arms of silver, the thighs of brass, the legs of iron, the feet part of iron and part of clay." Christ, the head, is pure and holy, and therefore very unsuitable to sensual and earthly members. And therefore the apostle in his description of Christ-mystical, describes the members of Christ (as they ought to be) of the same nature and quality with the head, 2 Cor. 15:48, 49. "As is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly; and as we have borne the image of the earthy, so we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." That image or resemblance of Christ, which shall be complete and perfect after the resurrection, must be begun in its first draught here by the work of regeneration.

Thirdly, This resemblance and conformity to Christ appears necessary from the communion which all believers have with Christ in the same spirit of grace and holiness. Believers are called Christ's fellows, or co-partners, Psal. 14:7, from their participation with him of the same spirit; as it is 1 Thes. 4:8. God giveth the same Spirit unto us, which he more plentifully poured out upon Christ. Now where the same Spirit and principle is, there the same fruits and operations must be produced, according to the proportions and measures of the Spirit of grace communicated; and this reason is farther enforced by the very design and end of God, in the infusion of the Spirit of grace. For it is plain, from Ezek. 36:27, that practical holiness and obedience is the scope and design of that infusion of the Spirit. [Hence saving faith and repentance are inseparable, James 2:18-] The very innate property of the Spirit of God in men, is to elevate their minds, and set their affections upon heavenly things, to purge their hearts from earthly dross, and fit them for a life of holiness and obedience. Its nature also is assimilating, and changeth them in whom it is, into the same image with Jesus Christ their heavenly head, 2 Cor. 3:18.

SERMON XXI

Method of Grace (vol. 2 p295)

by John Flavel

Rom. vii. 9

For I was alive without the law once : But when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died.

Doctrine 2. THAT there is a mighty efficacy in the word or law of God, to kill vain confidence, and quench carnal mirth in the hearts of men, when God sets it home upon their consciences. "The weapons of the word are not carnal, but mighty through God ; to the pulling down of strong holds, casting down imaginations, and every thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ," 2 Cor. x. 4, 5.

In the opening of this point I shall,

1. Demonstrate the efficacy of the word or law of God.
2. Shew wherein the efficacy thereof lies.
3. From whence it hath all this mighty power and efficacy.

First, I shall give you some demonstrations of the mighty power and efficacy that there are in the word or law of God ; which will appear with the fullest evidence, First, From the various subjects upon whom it works: The hearts and consciences of men of all orders and qualities, have been reached and wounded to the quick by the two-edged sword of God's law. Some, among the great and honourable of the earth, (though indeed the fewest of that rank) have been made to stoop and tremble under the word, Acts xxiv. 16. Mark vi. 20. 1 Sam. xv. 24. The wise and learned of the world have felt its power, and been brought over to embrace the humbling and self-denying ways of Christ, Acts xvii. 34. Thus Origen, Hierom, Tertullian, Uradwardine, and many more, came into Canaan laden with the Egyptian gold, as one speaks, i. e. they came into the church of God abundantly enriched and furnished with the learned arts and sciences, devoting them all to the service of Christ. Yea, and which is as strange, the most simple, weak, and illiterate have been wonderfully changed, and wrought upon by the power of the word, "The testimonies of the Lord make wise the simple:" Men of weak understandings, in all other matters, have been made wise to salvation by the power of the word, Matt. xi. 25. 1 Cor. i. 27. Nay the most malicious and obstinate enemies of Christ have been wounded and converted by the word, 1 Tim. i. 13. Acts xvi. 25. Those that have been under the prejudice of the worst and most idolatrous education, have been the subjects of its mighty power, Acts xix. 26. To conclude, men of the most profligate and debauched lives have been wonderfully changed and altered by the power of the word, 1 Cor. vi. 10, 11.

Secondly, The mighty efficacy of the law of God appears in the manner of its operation; it works suddenly; strikes like a dart through the hearts and consciences of men, Acts ii. 37. A wonderful change is made in a short time. And, as it works quickly and suddenly, so it works irresistibly, with an uncontrolled power upon the spirits of men, 1 Thes. i. 5. Rom. i. 16. Let the soul be armed against conviction with the thickest ignorance, strongest prejudice, or most obstinate resolution, the word of God will wound the breast even of such a man, when God sends it forth in his authority and power. [2Chron. 20:6, ...none is able to withstand you.]

Romans 1:6, "For I am not ashamed of the gospel, for it is the power of God for salvation to everyone who believes,"

1Thes. 1:4-5, "For we know, brothers^[b] loved by God, that he has chosen you,⁵ because our gospel came to you not only in word, but also in power and in the Holy Spirit and with full conviction."

[All in God's display of his mighty power; for what is the purpose of his mighty power and that sovereign, if it not be seen in its wise and powerful exercise in converting unwilling souls into willing souls!! Therefore, this power is irresistible, 2Chron. 20:6]

Thirdly, The wonderful power of the law or word of God is evidently seen in the strange effects which are produced by it in the hearts and lives of men. For,

First, It changes and alters the frame and temper of the mind; It moulds [as receiving his image upon the soul, as mentioned before in other excerpts, regarding the enstamping of the image of God upon their souls] a man into a quite contrary temper, Gal. i. 23. "He which persecuted us in times past, now preacheth the faith, which once he destroyed:" Thus a tiger is transformed into a lamb, by the power of the word of God.

Secondly, It makes the soul, upon which it works, to forego and quit the dearest interests it hath in this world for Jesus Christ, Phil. iii. 7, 8, 9. Riches, honours, self-righteousness, dearest relations, are denied and forsaken. Reproach, poverty, and death itself, are willingly embraced for Christ's sake, when once the efficacy of the word hath been upon the hearts of men, 1 Thes. i. 6. Those that were their companions in sin, are declined, renounced, and cast off with abhorrence, 1 Pet. iv. 3, 4. In such things as these the mighty power of the word discovers itself.

Secondly, Next, let us see wherein the efficacy of the word upon the souls of men principally consisteth; and we find in scripture it exerteth its power in five distinct acts upon the soul, by all which it strikes at the life, and kills the very heart of vain hopes. For,

First, It hath an awakening efficacy upon secure and sleepy sinners: It rouses the conscience, and brings a man to a sense and feeling apprehension, Eph. v. 13, 14. The first effectual touch of the word startles the drowsy conscience. A poor sinner lies in his sins, as Peter did in his chains, fast asleep, though a warrant was signed for his execution the next day: but the Spirit in the word awakens him as the angel did Peter: And this awakening power of the word is in order, both of time and nature, antecedent to all its operations and effects.

Secondly, The law of God hath an enlightening efficacy upon the minds of men : It is eye-salve to the blinded eye, Rev. iii. 18. A light shining in a dark place, 2 Pet. i. 19. A light shining into the very heart of man, 2 Cor. iv. 6. When the word comes in power, all things appear with another face. The sins that were hid from our eyes, and the danger which was concealed by the policy of Satan from our souls, now lie clear and open before us, Eph. v. 8.

Thirdly, The word of God hath a convincing efficacy : It sets sin in order before the soul, Ps. 1. 21. As an army is drawn up in an exact order, so are the sins of nature and practice, the sins of youth and age, even a great and terrible army is drawn up before the eye of the conscience; the convictions of the word are clear and full, 1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25. The very secrets of a sinner's heart are made manifest ; his mouth is stopped ; his pleas are silenced; his conscience yields to the charge of guilt, and to the equity of the sentence of the law, so that the soul stands mute, and self condemned at the bar of conscience : It hath got nothing to say why the wrath of God should not come upon it to the uttermost, Rom. iii. 19.

Fourthly, The law of God hath a soul-wounding, an heart-cutting efficacy : It pierces into the very soul and spirit of man, Acts ii. 37. "When they heard this, they were pricked at their hearts, and said unto Peter, and to the rest of the apostles; men and brethren, what shall we do ?" A dreadful sound is in the sinner's ears; his soul, is in deep distress ; he knows not which way to turn for ease ; no plaister but the blood of Christ can heal these wounds which the word makes : No outward trouble, affliction, disgrace, or loss, ever touched the quick as the word of God doth.

Fifthly, The word hath a heart-turning, a soul converting efficacy in it. It is a regenerating, as well as a convincing word, 1 Pet. i. 23. 1 Thes. i. 9. The law wounds, the gospel cures; the law discovers the evil that is in sin, and the misery that follows it; and the Spirit of God, working in fellowship with the word, effectually turns the heart from sin. And thus we see in what glorious acts the efficacy of the word discovers itself upon the hearts of men ; and all these acts lie in order to each other : For, until the soul be awakened, it cannot be enlightened, Eph. v. 14. Till it be enlightened, it cannot be convinced, Eph. v. 13. Conviction being nothing else but the application of the light that shines in the mind to the conscience of a sinner. Till it be convinced, it cannot be wounded for sin, Acts ii. 37. And until it be wounded for sin, it will never be converted from sin, and brought effectually to Jesus Christ. And thus you see what the power of the word is.

Thirdly, In the last place, it will concern us to enquire whence the word of God hath all this power? And it is most certain, that it is not a power inherent in itself, nor derived from the instrument by which it is managed, but from the Spirit of the Lord, who communicates to it all that power and efficacy which it hath upon our souls.

1. Its power is not in, or from itself: It works not in a, physical way, as natural agents do ; for then the effect would always follow, except it were miraculously hindered : But this spiritual efficacy is in the word, as the healing virtue was in the waters of Bethesda, John v. 4. "An angel went down at a certain season into the pool, and troubled the water. Whosoever then first, after the troubling of the water, stept in, was made whole of whatsoever disease he had." It is not a power naturally inherent in it at all times, but communicated to it at some special seasons. How often is the word preached, and no man awaked or convinced by it!

2. The power of the word is not communicated to it by the instrument that manageth it, 1 Cor. iii. 7. "Neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth." Ministers are nothing to such an effect and purpose as this is; he doth not mean that they are useless and altogether unnecessary, but insufficient of themselves to produce such mighty effects. It works not as it is the word of man, 2 Thess. ii. 13. Ministers may say of the ordinary, as Peter said of the extraordinary effects of the Spirit, Acts

iii. 12, "Ye men of Israel, why marvel ye at this? or why look ye so earnestly on us, as though by our own power or holiness we had made this man to walk?" If the effects of the word were in the power, and at the command of him that preacheth it, then the blood of all the souls that perish under our ministry must lie at our door, as was formerly noted.

3. If you say, whence then hath the word all this power? Our answer is, It derives it all from the Spirit of God¹, [¹What is commanded by the word, is given by the Spirit.] 1 Thes. ii. 13, "For this cause thank we God without ceasing, because when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of man, but (as it is in truth) the word of God, which effectually worketh also in you that believe." It is a successful instrument only when it is in the hand of the Spirit, without whose influence it never did, nor can convince, convert, or save any soul. Now, the Spirit of God hath a sovereignty over three things in order to the conversion of sinners.

1. Over the word which works.
2. Over the soul wrought upon.
3. Over the time and season of working.

First, The Spirit hath a glorious sovereignty over the word itself whose instrument it is to make it successful or not, as it pleaseth him, Isa. lv. 10, 11. "For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, &c. so shall my word be that goeth out of my mouth;" as the clouds, so the word is carried and directed by divine pleasure. It is the Lord that makes them both give down their blessings, or to pass away fruitless and empty : yea, it is from the Spirit that this part of the word works, and not another. Those things upon which ministers bestow greatest labour in their preparation, and from which accordingly they have the greatest expectation ; these do nothing, when, mean time, something that dropped occasionally from them, like a chosen shaft, strikes the mark and doth the work.

Secondly, The Spirit of the Lord hath a glorious sovereignty over the souls wrought upon; it is his peculiar work "to take away the stony heart out of our flesh, and to give us an heart of flesh," Ezek. xxxvi. 26. We may reason, exhort, and reprove, but nothing will abide till the Lord set it home. The Lord opened the heart of Lydia under Paul's ministry; he opens every heart that is effectually opened to receive Christ in the word; if the word can get no entrance, if your hearts remain dead under it still, we may say concerning such souls, as Martha did concerning her brother Lazarus, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." So, Lord, if thou hadst been in this sermon, in this prayer, or in that counsel, these souls had not remained dead under them.

Thirdly, The Spirit hath dominion over the times and seasons of conviction and conversion. Therefore the day in which souls are wrought upon is called "the day of his power," Ps. 110:3. That shall work at one time, which had no efficacy at all at another time ; because this, and not that, was the time appointed. And thus you see whence the word derives that mighty power it hath.

Now this word of God, when it is set home by the Spirit, is mighty to convince, humble, and break the hearts of sinners, John xvi. 9. " The Spirit when it cometh shall convince the world of sin." The word signifies conviction by such clear demonstration as compelleth assent; it not only convinces men in general that they are sinners, but it convinceth men particularly of their own sins, and the aggravations of them. So in the text, Sin revived, that is, the Lord revived his sins, the very circumstances and aggravations with which they were committed and so it will be with us when the commandment comes; sins that we had forgotten, committed so far back as our youth or childhood; sins that lay slighted in our consciences, shall now be roused up as so many sleepy lions to affright and terrify us; for now the soul hears the voice of God in the word, as Adam heard it in the cool of the day and was afraid, and hides itself; but all will not do, for the Lord is come in the word; sin is held up before the eyes of the conscience in its dreadful aggravations and fearful consequences, as committed against the holy law, clear light, warnings of conscience, manifold mercies, God's long-suffering, Christ's precious blood, many warnings of judgment, the wages and demerit whereof, by the verdict of a man's own conscience, is death, eternal death, Rom. vi. 23. Rom. i. 32. Rom. ii. 9. Thus the commandment comes, sin revives, and vain hope gives up the ghost.

This next excerpt is from Sermon 10, Fountain of Life - showing that God sweetly overcomes the will, I think, best seen in Ezek. 11:19 and 36:26 where the Spirit takes out the stony heart, the natural resistance, that enmity against God, that people have in an unregenerate condition. In this way does God make the will willing, and that gladly, in the day of his power! (Ps. 110:3) It was this power that the Pharisees had not experienced, and so argued against it and in its place put the act of their own will in coming to God, by their own strength or will (aka will worship) recommending their own righteousness to God, which is basically what the sinner's prayer is, as are the many other similar approaches by man such as the many sacraments or ordinances in Roman Catholicism.

"To the spiritual illumination of a soul, it suffices not that the object be revealed, nor yet that man, the subject of that knowledge have a due use of his own reason; but it is further necessary that the grace and special assistance of the holy Spirit be superadded, to open and mollify the heart, and so give it a due taste and relish of the sweetness of spiritual truth." By opening the gospel, he reveals truth to us, and, by opening the heart, in us. Now, though this cannot be without that, yet it is much more excellent to have truth revealed in us, than to us. This divines call praecipuum illud "apogelesma" muneris prophetici; "the principal perfective effect of the prophetic office," the special blessing promised in the new covenant, Heb. 8: 10. "I will put my laws in their mind, and write them in their hearts."

Lastly, Christ's opening the understanding imports his divine power, whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself. Who but God knows the heart? Who but God can unlock and open it at pleasure? No mere creature, no not the angels themselves, who for their large understandings are called intelligences, can command or open the heart. We may stand and knock at men's hearts, till our own ake; but no opening till Christ come. He can fit a key to all the cross wards of the will, and with sweet efficacy open it, and that without any force or violence to it. These things are carried in this part of his office, consisting in opening the heart: which was the first thing propounded for explication.

Secondly, In the next place, let us see by what acts Jesus Christ performs this work of his, and what way and method he takes to open the hearts of sinners.

And there are two principal ways, by which Christ opens the understandings and hearts of men, viz. by his Word and Spirit.

1. By his word; to this end was Paul commissioned and sent to preach the gospel, Acts 26: 18. "To open their eyes, and turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God." The Lord can, if he pleases, accomplish this immediately; but though he can do it, he will not do it ordinarily without means, because he will honour his own institutions. Therefore you may observe, that when Lydia's heart was to be opened, "there appeared unto Paul a man of Macedonia, who prayed him, saying, come over into Macedonia, and help us," Acts 19: 9. God will keep up his ordinances among men; and though he has not tied himself, yet he has tied us, to them. Cornelius must send for Peter; God can make the earth produce corn, as it did at first, without cultivation and labour; but he that shall now expect it in the neglect of means, may perish for want of bread.

2. But the ordinances in themselves cannot do it, as I noted before; and therefore Jesus Christ has sent forth the Spirit, who is his Prorex, his vicegerent, to carry on this work upon the hearts of his elect. And when the Spirit comes down upon the souls in the administration of the ordinances, he effectually opens the heart to receive the Lord Jesus, by the healing of faith. He breaks in upon the understanding and conscience by powerful convictions and compunctions, so much that word, John 16: 8. imports, "He shall convince the world of sin;" convince by clear demonstration, such as enforces assent, so that the soul cannot but yield it to be so; and yet the door of the heart is not opened, till he has also put forth his power upon the will, and, by a sweet and secret efficacy, overcome all its reductions, and the soul be made willing in the day of his power. When this is done, the heart is opened: saving light now shines in it; and this light set up, the Spirit in the soul is,

1. A new light in which all things appear far otherwise than they did before. The names Christ and sin, the words heaven and hell have another sound in that man's ears, than formerly they had. When he comes to read the same scriptures, which possibly he had read a hundred times before, he wonders he should be so blind as he was, to overlook such great, weighty, and concerning things as he now beholds in them; and saith, Where were mine eyes, that I could never see these things before?

2. It is a very affecting light; a light that has heat and powerful influences with it, which makes deep impressions on the heart. Hence they whose eyes the great Prophet opens, are said to be "brought out of darkness into his marvellous light," 1 Pet. 2: 9. The soul is greatly affected with what it sees. The beams of light are contracted and twisted together in the mind; and being reflected on the heart and affections, soon cause them to smoke and burn. "Did not our hearts burn within us, whilst he talked with us, and opened to us the scriptures?"

3. And it is a growing light, like the light of the morning which "shines more and more unto the perfect day," Prov. 4: 18. When the Spirit first opens the understanding, he does not give it at once a full sight of all truths, or a full sense of the power, sweetness and goodness of any truth; but the soul in the use of means grows up to a greater clearness day by day; its knowledge grows extensively in measure, and intensively in power and efficacy. And thus the Lord Jesus by his Spirit opens the understanding.

¹ Flavel regarding the faculty of the will in conversion: View its will, and you shall find it like a queen upon the throne of the soul, swaying the sceptre of liberty in her hand, (as one expresses it) with all the affections waiting and attending upon her. No tyrant can force it, no torment can wrest the golden sceptre of liberty out of its hand; the keys of all the chambers of the soul hang at its girdle, these it delivers to Christ in the day of his power; victorious grace sweetly determines it by gaining its consent, but commits no violence upon it. see T Shepard's comments on this at [code11] God accepts its offering; though full of imperfections; but no service is accepted without it, how excellent so ever be the matter of it. (pg 254 The Soul of Man)

Flavel's comments on the liberty of the will, respect to God's Sovereignty over it, and Pelagius' error

excerpt from The Soul of Man, p28

God has endued the soul of man not only with an understanding to discern, and direct, but also a will to govern, moderate, and over-rule the actions of life. The will is a faculty of the rational soul, whereby a man either chuseth or refuseth the things which the understanding discerns and knows. This is a very high and noble power of the soul. The understanding seems to bear the same relation to the will, as a grave counselor does to a great prince. It glories in two excellencies, namely, 1. Liberty. 2. Dominion.

It has a freedom and liberty; it cannot be compelled and forced; Coaction is repugnant to its very nature. In this it differs from the understanding, that the understanding is wrought upon necessarily, but the will acts spontaneously. This liberty of the will respects the choice, or refusal of the means for attaining those ends it prosecutes, according as it finds them more or less conducive thereunto. The liberty of the will must be understood to be in things natural, which are within its own proper sphere, not in things supernatural. It can move, or not move the body, as it pleases, but it cannot move towards Christ, in the way of faith, as it pleaseth; it can open or shut the hand or eye at its pleasure, but not the heart. True, indeed, it is not compelled, or forced to turn to God by supernatural grace, but in a way suitable to its nature, it is determined and drawn to Christ, Psal. 110:3. It is drawn by a mighty power, and yet runs freely; Cant. 1: 4. "Draw me, and I will run after thee."

Efficacious grace, and victorious delight, is a thing very different from compulsive force. "Pelagius (as a late author speaks) at first gave all to nature, acknowledged no necessity of divine grace; but when this proud doctrine found little countenance, he called nature by the name of grace; and when that deceit was discovered, he acknowledged no other grace but outward instruction, or the benefit of external revelation, to discourse, and put men in mind of their duty. Being yet driven farther, he acknowledged the grace of pardon; and before a man could do anything acceptably, there was a necessity of the remission of sin, and then he might obey God perfectly. But that not sufficing, he acknowledged another grace, viz. the example of Christ, which does both secure our rule and encourage our practice. And last of all, his followers owned some kind of internal grace, but they made that to consist in some illumination of the understanding, or moral persuasion, by probable arguments, to excite the will, and this not absolutely necessary, but only for facilitation, as a horse to a journey, which otherwise a man might go on foot. Others grant the secret influences of God's grace, but make the will of man a co-ordinate cause with God, namely, that God doth propound the object, hold forth inducing considerations; give some remote power and assistance; but still there is an indifferency in the will of man, to accept or refuse, as liketh him best." Thus have they been forced to quit and change their ground; but still the pride of nature will not let men see the necessity of divine efficacious influences upon the will, and the consistency thereof with natural liberty.

True Spiritual Sense Revealed by the Spirit

What is taught here by Flavel is crucial to understand. He is saying that when God converts the soul, God communicated knowledge to the mind, enlightening the mind to the real or spiritual sense of the meaning of the word or the law, the mind and will of God. In this way is it as described in Heb. 11:1, where faith is said to be the substance of things hoped for; that substance who is Christ, his word, is made real to the soul so that we really know the true spiritual sense of what the word says. Many have a notion that sin is bad, but they really do not know the infinite badness of it, the real sense of its evil. They may know Jesus notionally, but they do not see his beauty or comeliness and so are still cold towards him, having no relish in his doctrine or person. Faith makes the true sense of the meaning of spiritual things real to the soul, so as to taste them, so as to see them, whereas before they had no earthly idea of them; once I was blind; now I see. And this is the difference between a believer and an unbeliever. This is a huge difference; the difference of being in darkness vs. light! Owen describes this effect of the substance made real to the soul by this instrument of faith (on page 101) - that faith is the substance of things hoped for; and hence you now see the meaning of sanctifying impressions; those impressions made on a soft heart, a believing heart, as opposed to a heart of stone which cannot receive these impressions, that ultimately serve in animating the soul and thus the whole body in all its thoughts and actions, making them pleasing to God in a due manner of worship, which answers to Hebrews 11:6, without faith (saving faith) you cannot please Him.

(1.) [1.] For faith itself; it is by our apostle said to be ελπιζομένων ύψότασις, Hebrews 11:1, — “the substance of things hoped for.” Now the υποστασις [substance] here, “the things hoped for,” are so termed with respect unto their goodness and their futurity, in which respects they are the objects of hope. But they are proposed unto faith, and respected by it, as true and real. And as such it is the υποστασις, or “substance” of them; not absolutely and physically, but morally and in respect of use. It brings them into, makes them present with, and gives them a subsistence, as to their use, efficacy, and comfort, in the soul. This effect of faith is so far of the nature of it, that the apostle makes use of it principally in that description which he gives us of it. Now, this giving a subsistence in the mind unto the things believed, that they shall really operate and produce their immediate effects therein, of love, joy, and obedience, is that spiritual mixture and incorporation whereof we speak. And here lies the main difference between saving faith and the temporary persuasion of convinced persons. This latter gives no such subsistence unto the things believed in the minds of men, as that they should produce their proper effects therein. Those in whom it is believe the promise, yet not so as that thereby the things promised should have such an existence in their minds as to produce in them and upon them their proper effects. It may be said of them, as it is of the law in another sense, "They have the shadow of good things to come, but not the very image of the things." [this is the importance of the image of God pictured in the diagram in what it consists in, that is implanted upon our souls, conforming us into his likeness by this instrument called faith (with its necessary actings, e.g., contemplation, mixing the word with itself...), without which we cannot please God - Heb 11:6, etc. This is why, while in Adam, we were without this image and hence could not please God and therefore must be born again, having this image restored to our souls! 2Cor. 4:6] There is not a real reflection of the things they profess to believe made upon their minds. For instance, the death of Christ, or "Christ crucified," is proposed unto our faith in the gospel. The genuine proper effect hereof is to destroy, to crucify, or mortify sin in us. But where this is apprehended by a temporary faith only, this effect will not at all be produced in the soul. Sin will not be mortified, but rather secretly encouraged; for it is natural unto men of corrupt minds to conclude that they may continue in sin, because grace doth abound. On the other side, where faith gives the subsistence mentioned unto the death of Christ in the soul, it will undoubtedly be the death of sin, Romans 6:3-14. [i.e., true saving grace slays a man - Thomas Shepard, Parable of the Ten Virgins]

Now read this sermon by Flavel. You'll see more clearly what he is saying regarding this new spiritual sense that is given to the souls of the elect, that is not given to others.

SERMON XXII.

The Teachings of God opened, in their Nature and Necessity.

<https://thepuritans.files.wordpress.com/2009/12/flavel-vol-2.pdf>

John vi. 45.

It is written in the prophets, And they shall be all taught of God-Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me.

How necessary to our union with Jesus Christ, the application of the law, or coming home of the commandment to the heart of a sinner is, we have heard in the last discourse ; and how impossible it is, either for the commandment to come to us, or for us to come to Christ without illumination and instruction from above, you shall hear in this. This scripture hath much of the mind of God in it; and he that is to open it, had need himself to be taught of God. In the foregoing verses, Christ offers himself as the bread of life unto the souls of men; against this doctrine they oppose their carnal reason, ver. 41, 42. Christ strikes at the root of all their cavils and objections in his reply, ver. 43, 44. "Murmur not among yourselves; "no man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him;" q. d. you slight me because you do not know me; you do not know me because you are not taught of God ; of these divine teachings, the prophets of old have spoken, and what they foretold is at this day fulfilled in our sight ; so many as are taught of God, and no more, come unto me in the way of faith : it is impossible to come without the teachings of God, ver. 44. It is as impossible not to come, or to miscarry in their coming unto me, under the influence of these divine teachings, ver. 45.

The words read, consist of two parts, viz.

1. An allegation out of the prophets.
2. The application thereof made by Christ.

First, An allegation out of the prophets : " It is written in the prophets, And they shall be all taught of God." The places in the prophets to which Christ seems here to refer, are, Isa. 54:13. "And all thy children shall he taught of the Lord ;" and, Jer. xxxi, 34 "And they shall teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord; for they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord." These promises contain the great blessings of the new covenant, viz. Divine instruction and heavenly illumination, without which no man can obtain an interest in the new covenant.

Secondly, We have here the application of these testimonies out of the prophets, made by Christ himself; " Every man therefore "that hath heard, and learned of the Father, come unto me." In which words we have both the necessity and the efficacy of these divine teachings ; without them no man can come, and under them no man can miscarry. The words being fitly rendered, and the sense obvious, The notes are,

Doctrine 1. That the teachings of God are absolutely necessary to every man that cometh unto Christ, in the way of faith.

Doctrine 2. No man can miss of Christ, or miscarry in the way of faith, that is under the special instructions and teachings of the Father.

Doctrine 1. That the teachings of God are absolutely necessary to every man that cometh unto Christ, in the way of faith. Of the necessity of divine teaching, in order to believing, the apostle speaks, in Eph. iv. 20, 21. " But ye have not so learned Christ; if so be that you have heard him, and been taught by him, as the truth is in Jesus;" i.e., Your faith must needs be effectual, both to the reformation of your lives, and your perseverance in the ways of holiness, if it be such a faith as is begotten and introduced into your hearts by divine teachings¹. [¹They who believe, by means of the preacher speaking to them outwardly, hear and learn inwardly of the Father ; they who believe not, hear outwardly, but not inwardly. Augustine on Predest. chap. 8.]

Now, in the explication of this point, I shall speak distinctly to the following enquiries.

1. How doth God teach men, or what is imported in our being taught of God ?
2. What those special lessons are, which all believers do hear, and are taught of God ?
3. In what manner doth God teach these things to men in the day of their conversion to Christ ?
4. What influence God's teaching hath upon our believing?
5. Why it is impossible for any man to believe, or come to Christ without the Father's teachings.

First, How doth God teach men, or what is imported in our being taught of God ? To this I will speak both negatively and positively, for your clearer apprehension of the sense and meaning of the Spirit of God in this phrase.

First, The teaching of God, and our hearing and learning of him, is not to be understood of any extraordinary visional appearances, or oraculous and immediate voice of God to men. God indeed hath so appeared unto some, Num. xii. 8. Such voices have been heard from heaven, but now these extraordinary ways are ceased, Heb. i. 1, 2, and we are no more to expect them; we may sooner meet with satanical delusions than divine illuminations in this way*. I remember, the learned Gerson tells us that the devil once appeared to an holy man in prayer, personating Christ, and saying, I am come in person to visit thee, for thou art worthy. But he with both hands shut his eyes, saying, Nolo hie Christum videre, satis est ipsum in gloria videre; i.e., I will not see Christ here ; it is enough for me to see him in glory. We are now to attend only to the voice of the Spirit in the scriptures : this is a more sure word than any voice from heaven, 2 Pet. i. 19.

[*pg 403 Vol. 1 Flavel comments again on this: pg 403 Vol. 1 - Mr. Fenner, in his excellent discourse upon this point, tells us, that as this was an extraordinary time, Christ being now to be installed in his kingdom, and crowned with glory and honour; so extraordinary things were now done ; as when kings are crowned, the streets are richly hanged, the conduits run with wine, great malefactors are then pardoned, for then they show their munificence and bounty ; it is the day of the gladness of their hearts. But let a man come at another time to the conduits, he shall find no wine, but ordinary water there. Let a man be in the jail at another time, and he may be hanged ; yea, and have no reason but to expect and prepare for it. What Christ did now for this man, was at an extraordinary time.

Reason 3. Thirdly, such a conversion as this may not ordinarily be expected ; for as such a time will never come again, so there will never be the like reason for such a conversion any more. Christ converted him upon the cross, to give an instance of his divine power at that time, when it was almost wholly clouded. Look, as in that day the divinity of Christ brake forth in several miracles, as the preternatural eclipse of the sun, the great earthquake, the rending of the rocks and veil of the temple ; so in the conversion of this man in such an extraordinary way, and all, to give evidence of the divinity of Christ, and prove him to be the Son of God whom they crucified ; but that is now sufficiently confirmed, and there will be no more occasion for miracles to evidence it.]

Secondly, The teachings of God are not to be understood as opposite unto, or exclusive of the teachings of men. Divine teachings do not render ministerial teachings in vain or useless. Paul was taught of God, Gal. i. 12. and his conversion had something extraordinary in it, yet the ministry of Ananias was used and honoured in that work, Acts ix. 4, 17. compared. Divine teachings do indeed excel, but not exclude human teachings. I know that scripture, Jer. xxxi. 24. to which Christ here refers, is objected against the necessity of a standing ministry in the church, "They shall teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother," &c. But if those words should be understood absolutely, they would not only overthrow all public ordinances of God's own institution, 1 Cor. xii. 28. and deprive us of a principal fruit of Christ's ascension, Eph. iv. 11. 12. but, for the same reason, would destroy all private instructions and fraternal admonitions also. Such a sense would make the prophet to contradict the apostle, and spoil the consent and harmony of the scriptures : the sense thereof cannot be negative, but comparative ; it shews the excellency of divine, but doth not destroy the usefulness of human teachings; Subordinata non pugnant. The teachings of men are made effectual by the teachings of the Spirit; and the Spirit in his teachings Avill use and honour the ministry of man.

Thirdly, But to speak positively, the teachings of God are nothing else but that spiritual and heavenly light, by which the Spirit of God shineth into the hearts of men, to give them "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ," as the apostle speaks, 2 Cor. iv. 6. And though this be the proper work of the Spirit, yet it is called the teachings of the Father, because the Spirit who enlightens us is commissioned and sent by the Father so to do, John xiv. 26. Now these teachings of the Spirit of God, consist in two things, viz. in his,

1. Sanctifying impressions.
2. Gracious assistances.

First, In his sanctifying impressions or regenerating work upon the soul, by virtue whereof it receives marvellous light and insight into spiritual things ; and that not only as illumination is the first act of the Spirit in our conversion, Col. iii. 10. but as his whole work of sanctification is illuminative and instructive to the converted soul, 1 John ii. 27. "The anointing which you have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you, but as the same anointing teacheth you." The meaning is that sanctification gives the soul experience of those mysterious things which are contained in the scriptures, and that experience is the most excellent key to unlock and open those deep scripture mysteries; no knowledge is so distinct, so clear, so sweet, as that which the heart communicates to the head, John vii. 17. "If any man do his will, he shall know of the doctrine." A man that never read the nature of love in books of philosophy, nor the transports and extasies thereof in history, may yet truly describe and express it by the sensible motions of that passion in his own soul; yea, he that hath felt, much better understands, than he that hath only read or heard. O what a light doth spiritual sense and experience cast upon a great part of the scriptures! for indeed sanctification is the very copy or transcript of the word of God upon the heart of man ; Jer. 31:33. "I will write my law in their hearts;" so that the scriptures and the experiences of believers, by this means answer to each other, as the lines and letters in the press answer to the impressions made upon the paper; or the figures in the wax, to the engravings in the seal. When a sanctified man reads David's psalms, or Paul's epistles, how is he surprised with wonder to find the very workings of his own heart so exactly decyphered and fully expressed there! O, saith he, this is my very case, these holy men speak what my heart hath felt.

Secondly, The Spirit of God teacheth us, as by his sanctifying impressions, so by his gracious assistances which he gives us pro renata, as our need requires, Matt. x. 19. "It shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak, John xiv. 26. "He shall bring all things to your remembrance;" he assisteth both the understanding in due apprehensions of truth, and the heart in the spiritual improvements of truth. And so much briefly of the first particular.

Secondly, In the next place we are to enquire what those special truths are which believers hear and learn of the Father, when they come to Christ.

And there are divers great and necessary truths, wherein the Spirit enlightens men in that day. I cannot say they are all taught every believer in the same degree and order; but it is certain they are taught of God such lessons as these are, which they never so understood before.

Lesson 1. First, They are taught of God that there is abundantly more evil in their sinful natures and actions, than ever they discerned or understood before: "the Spirit when he cometh shall convince the world of sin," John xvi. 8, 9. Men had a general notion of sin before; so had Paul, when a Pharisee; but how vastly different were his apprehensions of sin, from all that ever he had in his natural state, when God brought home the commandment to his very heart? There is a threefold knowledge of sin, viz. traditional, discursive, and intuitive. The first is the more rude and illiterate multitude. The second is more rational and knowing men. The third is only found in those that are enlightened and taught of God. And there is as great a difference betwixt this intuitive knowledge of sin, whereby God makes a soul to discern the nature and evil of it in a spiritual light, and the two former, as there is betwixt the sight of a painted lion upon the wall, and the sight of a living lion that meets us roaring in the way. The intuitive sight of sin is another thing than men imagine it to be : it is such a sight as wounds a man to the very heart, Acts 2:37. for God doth not only show a man this or that particular sin, but in the day of conviction, he sets all his sins in order before him, Ps. 1:21, yea, the Lord shows him the sinfulness of his nature as well as practice. Conviction digs to the root, shows and lays open that original corruption, from whence the innumerable evils of the life do spring, James 1:14, 15. and which is yet more, the Lord shows the man whom he is bringing to Christ the sinful and miserable estate which he is in by reason of both, John xvi. 9. And now all excuses, pleas and defenses of sin are gone, he shows him "how their iniquities have exceeded," Job 36:8, 9, exceeded in number, and in aggravations of sinfulness ; exceeding many, and exceeding vile ; no such sinner in the world as I; can such sins as mine be pardoned? The greatness of God greatens my sin; the holiness of God makes it beyond measure vile; the goodness of God puts unconceivable weight into my guilt. O, can there be mercy for such a wretch as I! If there be, then there will not be a greater example of the riches of free grace in all the world than I am. Thus God teacheth the evil of sin.

Arguments Against the Sinner's Prayer

"No man can come unto me, (saith Christ) except my father which hath sent me, draw him." There is a legal spirit working under evangelical pretences in many souls; they look within them to find that which is quite above them. The apostle points you to the fountain of faith, in Eph. ii. 8. "It is not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." John Flavel Vol. 4 p 139

A gift, and procuring cause in him to whom it is given, are inconsistent. John Owen

It is true, all things that pertain to life and godliness are received by faith 2Peter 1:3, yet faith itself is a saving work, which is not received by another precedent faith. Faith therefore is to be accepted not only as begotten in us, but as it is in the beginning of it in the conviction and humiliation of every sinner. Thomas Shepard, The Sound Believer, p254,5

It is not for your sake that I will act, declares the Lord God; let that be known to you. Be ashamed and confounded for your ways, O house of Israel. Ezekiel 36:32 ESV

This consent of thy heart to be Christ's, this choice of thy will in taking him for thine, is but the echo of Christ's choice of thee; and I would rather have such an evidence of my interest in him, than a voice from heaven to assure me that Christ is mine. John Flavel, Vol. 4 p 142

...he [God] cannot be touched with repentance, and his heart cannot undergo changes. John Calvin, on the impassibility of God. See Confessing the Impassible God, 2015. P 157

Here's the background to help see the problem with the sinner's prayer. You are not saved by your profession of faith or by your asking to be saved. You are saved by a sovereign act of God's mercy on your soul, in regeneration, by the operation by the Holy Spirit. To base your assurance of being saved upon a profession or a hope in hope itself is a sandy foundation, as you see in Matthew 7:21-23, and Matt. 25:11, where the foolish virgins were trying to get into heaven upon their works and declaration of faith, "Lord, Lord" and Jesus said to them depart from me workers of iniquity I never knew you.

But a sound foundation is only to be had in effectual vocation (which includes regeneration, John 6:44, 65 etc.) So one's evidence of being saved, united to Christ, is founded upon this act of God and hence a sure foundation. And this assurance of salvation grows when he sees the fruit of regeneration in one's ongoing repentance from sin and mortification of his lusts (making his call and election sure, 2Pet1:10). These are the fruits or evidences (the fruits of the spirit which is being lead by the Spirit) that will give Christians assurance that they are children of God, not from a profession of faith, i.e., talk is cheap.

This is the danger. People are told that if you want to get saved, say this prayer and Jesus is faithful to honor it. Well, the latter is not true, God is beholden to no one nor is a debtor to any, (in which case, grace is no longer grace) and the former is never recommended in scripture (e.g., John 3:1-16). But as I said before a profession faith is not a sure ground of one being converted if for no other reason than that the heart is deceitful above all things (Jer. 17:9) It is a sure way to be self-deceived. But what is much more easily discerned by the sinner is when he experiences a change of heart; that it was not of himself; that he was passive in this affair. Now that is something that stands out; that God did something and we merely receive; where God alone made him to differ from another (1Cor. 4:7), not the person by his own will, and that corrupted, in saying a prayer. The gospel squashes all human boasting! The following few hundred pages will expound upon and confirm this.

Vol. 2 pg 320

Secondly, Next let us see what influence divine teachings have upon souls, in bringing them to Christ; and we shall find a threefold influence in them.

1. They have an influence upon the external means, by which they come to Christ.
2. They have an influence upon the mind, to remove what hindered it from Christ.
3. They have an influence upon the will, to allure and draw it to Christ.

First, They have an influence upon the means by which we come to Christ; the best ordinances are but a dead letter except the Spirit, the teaching and quickening Spirit of God, work in fellowship with them, 2 Cor. 3:6. The best ministers, like the disciples, cast forth the net, but take nothing, win not one soul to God, till God teach as well as they. Paul is nothing, and Apollos nothing, but God that giveth the increase, 1 Cor. 3:7. Let the most learned, eloquent, and powerful orator be in the pulpit, yet no man's heart is persuaded till it hear the voice of God; Cathedram in ecrtis habet, qui corda docet.

Secondly, They have influence upon the mind, to remove what hindered it from Christ. Except the minds of men be first untaught those errors, by which they are prejudiced against Christ, they will never be persuaded to come unto him; and nothing but the Father's teachings can unteach those errors, and cure those evils of the mind. The natural mind of man slights the truths of God, until God teach them; and then they tremble with an awful reverence of them. Sin is but a trifle, till God shows us the face of it in the glass of the law, and then it appears exceeding sinful, Rom. vii. 15. We think God to be such a one as ourselves, Ps. 1. 21. until he discover himself unto us in his infinite greatness, awful holiness, and severe justice; and then we' cry, who can stand before this great and dreadful God! We thought it was time enough hereafter, to mind the concernments of another world, until the Lord open our eyes, to see in what danger we stand upon the very brink of eternity ; and then nothing alarms us more, than the fears that our time will be finished before the great work of salvation be finished. We thought ourselves in a converted state before, till God made us to see the necessity of another manner of conversion, upon pain of eternal damnation. We readily caught hold upon the promises before, when we had no right to them ; but the teachings of God make the presumptuous sinner let go his hold, that he may take a better and surer bold of them in Christ. We once thought that the death of Christ, in itself, had been enough to secure our salvation; but, under the teachings of God, we discern plainly the necessity of a change of heart and state; or else the blood of Christ can never profit us. Thus the teachings of God remove the errors of the mind, by which men are withheld from Christ.

Thirdly, The teachings of God powerfully attract and allure the will of a sinner to Christ, Hos. ii. 14. But of these drawings of the Father I have largely spoken before, and therefore shall say no more of them in this place, but hasten to the last thing propounded, viz.

Thirdly, Why it is impossible for any man to come to Christ without the Father's teachings; and the impossibilities hereof will appear three ways.

1. From the power of sin.
2. From the indisposition of man.
3. From the nature of faith.

By all which, the last point designed to be spoken to from this scripture, will be fully cleared, and the whole prepared for application.

First, The impossibility of coming to Christ without the teachings of the Father, will appear from the power of sin, which hath so strong an holdfast upon the hearts and affections of all unregenerate men, that no human arguments or persuasions whatsoever can divorce or separate them; for,

First, Sin is connatural with the soul, it is born and bred with a man; Ps. li. 4. Isa. xlviii. 8. It is as natural for fallen man to sin, as it is to breathe.

Secondly, The power of sin hath been strengthening itself from the beginning, by long continued custom, which gives it the force of a second nature, and makes regeneration and mortification naturally impossible, Jer. xiii. 23. "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? Then may he also do good that is accustomed to do evil."

Thirdly, Sin is the delight of a sinner: "It is sport to a fool to do mischief," Prov. x. 23. Carnal men have no other pleasure in this world, but what arises from their lusts; to cut off their corruptions by mortification, were at once to deprive them of all the pleasure of their lives.

Fourthly, Sin being connatural, customary, and delightful, doth therefore bewitch their affections and enchant their hearts, to that degree of madness and fascination, that they rather chose damnation by God, than separation from sin: "Their hearts are fully set in them to do evil," Eccles. viii. 11. they rush into sin, as the "horse rusheth into the battle," Jer. viii. 6. And now, what think you can separate a man from his beloved lust, except the powerful and effectual teachings of God? Nothing but a light from heaven can rectify and reduce the enchanted mind; no power, but that of God, can change and alter the sinful bent and inclination of the will; it is a task above all the power of the creature.

Secondly, The impossibility of coming to Christ, without the Father's teachings, evidently appears from the indisposedness of man, the subject of this change; "The natural man receives not the things which are of God," 1 Cor. ii. 14. Three things must be wrought upon man, before he can come to Christ: His blind understanding must be enlightened; his hard and rocky heart must be broken and melted; his stiff, fixed, and obstinate will must be conquered and subdued: but all these are effects of a supernatural power. The illumination of the mind is the peculiar work of God, 2 Cor. iv. 6. Rev. iii. 17. Eph. v. 8. The breaking and melting of the heart is the Lord's own work; it is he that giveth repentance, Acts v. 31. It is the Lord that "takes away the heart of stone, and giveth an heart of flesh, Ezek. xxxvi. 26. It is he that poureth out the spirit of contrition upon man, Zech. xii. 10. The changing of the natural bent and inclination of the will, is the Lord's sole prerogative, Phil. ii. 13. All these things are effectually done in the soul of man, when God teacheth it, and never till then.

Thirdly, The nature of faith, by which we come to Christ, plainly shows the impossibility of coming without the Father's teaching. Everything in faith is supernatural; the implantation of the habit of faith is so, Eph. ii. 8. It is not of ourselves, but the gift of God; it is not an habit acquired by industry, but infused by grace, Phil. 1:29. The light of faith, by which spiritual things are discerned, is supernatural, Heb. xi. 1, 27. It seeth things that are invisible. The adventures of faith are supernatural; for against hope, a man believeth in hope, giving glory to God," Rom. iv. 18. By faith a man goeth unto Christ, against all the dictates and discouragements of natural sense and reason. The self-denial of faith is supernatural; the cutting off the right-hand, and plucking out of right-eye sins, must needs be so, Matt. v. 29. The victories and conquests of faith do all speak it to be supernatural; it overcomes the strongest oppositions from without, Heb. xi. 33, 34. It subdueth and purgeth the most obstinate and deep rooted corruptions within, Acts xv. 9. It overcometh all the blandishments and charming allurements of the bewitching world, 1 John v. 4. All which considered, how evident is the conclusion, that none can come to Christ without the Father's teachings? The uses follow.

First use for information.

Inference 1. How notoriously false and absurd is that doctrine which asserteth the possibility of believing without the efficacy of supernatural grace? The desire of self-sufficiency was the ruin of Adam, and the conceit of self-sufficiency is the ruin of multitudes of his posterity. This doctrine is not only contradictory to the current stream of scripture, Phil. ii. 13, 1 John i. 13, with many other scriptures; but it is also contradictory to the common sense and experience of believers; yet the pride of nature will strive to maintain what scripture and experience plainly contradict and overthrow.

*Inf. 2. Hence we may also inform ourselves, how it cometh to pass that so many rational, wise and learned men miss Christ, whilst the simple and illiterate, even babes in natural knowledge, obtain interest in him, and salvation by him. The reason hereof is plainly given us by Christ, in Matt. xiii. 11. "To you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given." It is the dropping and dews of divine teaching upon one, and not upon another, that dryeth up the green tree, and maketh the dry tree to flourish. Many natural men have very fine brains, searching wits, solid judgments, nimble fancies, tenacious memories; they can search out the mysteries of nature, solve the phenomena, satisfy the enquiries of the most curious; they can measure the earth, discover the motions of the heavens ; but after all take up their place in hell, when, in the mean time, the statutes of the Lord (by the help of his teachings) make wise the simple, Ps. xix. 17. It is no matter how dull and incapable the scholar be, if God undertake to be the teacher. I remember, Austin speaks of one who was commonly reputed a fool, and yet he could not but judge him to be truly godly, and that by two signs of grace which appeared in him; one was, his seriousness when he heard any discourses of Christ; the other was, his indignation manifested against sin. It was truly said by those two Cardinals, (who, riding to the council of Constance, overheard a poor shepherd in the fields with tears bewailing his sins) Surgent indoeti ct rapiunt caelum, The unlearned will rise and take heaven, whilst we with all our learning* shall descend into hell.

Inf. 3. This also informs Us of the true reason of the strange and various successes of the gospel upon the souls of men. Here we see why the ministry of one man becomes fruitful, and another's barren; yea why the labours of the same poor man prosper exceedingly at one time, and not at another ; these things are according as the teachings of God do accompany our teachings. We often see a weaker and plainer discourse blessed with success, whilst that which is more artificial, neat and labored, comes to nothing. St. Austin hath a pretty similitude to illustrate this. Suppose, saith he, two conduits, the one very plain, the other curiously carved and adorned with images of lions, eagles, &c. the water doth not refresh and nourish as it cometh from such a curious conduit, but as it is water. Where we find most of man, we frequently find least of God. I speak not this to encourage carelessness and laziness, but to provoke the dispensers of the gospel to more earnestness and frequent prayer for the assistance and blessing of the Spirit upon their labours, and to make men less fond of their own gifts and abilities; blear-eyed Leah may bear children, when beautiful Rachel proves barren.

Inf. 4. Learn hence the transcendent excellency of saving, spiritual knowledge, above that which is merely literal and natural. One drop of knowledge taught by God, is more excellent than the whole ocean of human knowledge and acquired gifts, Phil. 3:8. John 17:3. 1 Cor. 2:2. Let no man therefore be dejected at the want of those gifts with which unsanctified men are adorned. If God have taught thee the evil of sin, the worth of Christ, the necessity of regeneration, the mystery of faith, the way of communion with God in duties; trouble not thyself because of thine ignorance in natural or moral things; thou hast that, reader, which will bring thee to heaven; and he is a truly wise man that knows the way of salvation, though he be ignorant and unskilful in other things; thou knowest those things which all the learned doctors and libraries in the world could never teach thee, but God hath revealed them to thee ; others have more science, thou hast that, reader, which will bring thee to heaven; and he is a truly wise man that knows the way of salvation, though he be ignorant and unskilful in other things; thou knowest those things which all the learned doctors and libraries in the world could never teach thee, but God hath revealed them to thee; others have more science, thou hast more savour and sweetness; bless God, and be not discouraged.

Inference 1. If Christ be the mercy of mercies, the medium of conveying all other mercies from God to men; then in vain do men expect and hope for mercy of God out of Jesus Christ. I know many poor sinners comfort themselves with this, when they come upon a bed of sickness; I am sinful, but God is merciful; and it is very true God is merciful; plenteous in mercy; his mercy is great above the heavens; mercy pleaseth him; and all this they that are in Christ shall find experimentally, to their comfort and salvation. But what is all this to thee, if thou art Christless? There is not one drop of saving mercy that comes in any other channel than Christ to the soul of any man.

But must I then expect no mercy out of Christ? This is a hard case, very uncomfortable doctrine. Yes, thou mayest be a Christless, and covenantless soul, and yet have variety of temporal mercies, as Ishmael had, Gen. xvii. 20, 21. God "may give thee the fatness of the earth, riches, honours, pleasures, a numerous and prosperous posterity; will that content thee? Yes, yes, if I may have heaven too; No, neither heaven, nor pardon, nor any other spiritual or eternal mercy may be expected out of Christ, Jude, ver. 21. O deceive not yourselves in this point; there are two bars betwixt you and all spiritual mercies, viz. the guilt of sin, and the filth of sin; and nothing but your own union with Christ can remove these, and so open the passage for, spiritual mercies to your souls.

Why, but I will repent of sin, strive to obey the commands of God, make restitution for the wrongs I have done, cry to God for mercy, bind my soul with vows and strong resolutions against sin for time to come; will not all this lay a ground-work for hope of mercy to my soul? No, this will not, this cannot do. First, All your sorrows, tears and mournings for sin cannot obtain mercy; could you shed as many tears for any sin that ever you committed, as all the children of Adam have shed upon any account whatsoever, since the creation of the world; they will not purchase the pardon of that one sin; for the law accepts no short payment; it requires plenary satisfaction, and will not discharge any soul without it; nor can it acknowledge or own your souls to be such. The repentance of a soul finds, through Christ, acceptance with God, but out of him it is nothing. [A person who is asking to be saved is praying while "outside of Christ", i.e., he has not been united to Him. So it is impossible for his prayer to be heard nor is it accepted by God, but is a wicked presumption.]

Secondly, All your strivings to obey the commands of God, and live more strictly for time to come, will not obtain mercy. Matt, v. 20. "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven."

Thirdly, Your restitution, and reparation of wrongs you have done, cannot obtain mercy. Judas restored, and yet was damned. Man is repaired, but God is not. Remission is the act of God, it is he must loose your consciences from the bond of guilt, or they can never be loosed. [Christ must be the one to set you free from the strong man]

Fourthly, All your cries to God for mercy will not prevail for mercy, if you be out of Christ, Matt. vii. 22. Job xxvii. 9. A righteous judge will not reverse the just sentence of the law, though the prisoner at the bar fall upon his knees, and cry, Mercy, mercy.

Fifthly, Your vows and engagements to God for time to come cannot obtain mercy ; for they being made in your own strength, it is impossible you should keep them; and if you could, yet it is impossible they should obtain remission and mercy; should you never sin more for time to come, yet how shall God be satisfied for sins past? Justice must have satisfaction, or you can never have remission, Rom. iii. 25, 26. and no work wrought by man can satisfy divine justice; nor is the satisfaction of Christ made over to any for their discharge, but to such only as are in him; therefore never expect mercy out of Christ.

Thirdly, God's readiness to grant, as well as their liberty to ask, speaks them the special favourites of God, The heart of God is so propense, and ready to grant the desires of believers, that it is but ask and have, Matth. 7:7. The door of grace is opened by the key of prayer. That is a favourite indeed, to whom the king gives a blank to insert what request he will: "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you," John 15:7. O blessed liberty of the sons of God! David did but say, " Lord, turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness," and it was done as soon as asked, 2 Sam. xv. 31. Joshua did but say, "Thou sun stand still in Gibeon," and a miraculous stop was presently put to its swift motion in the heavens; nay, which is wonderful to consider, a prayer, yet unborn, I mean conceived in the heart, and not yet uttered by the lips of believers, is often anticipated by the propensiveness of free grace, Isa. 65:24. "And it shall come to pass, that before they call I will answer, and whilst they are yet "speaking I will hear." The prayers of others are rejected as an abomination, Prov. xv. 8. God casts them back into their faces, Mai. ii. 3. But free grace signs the petitions of the saints more.

p 104 Vol. 2: We cannot act spiritually till we begin to live spiritually. Therefore the spirit of life must first join himself to us, in his quickening work, (as was shown you in the last sermon), which being done, we begin to act spiritually, by taking hold upon, or receiving Jesus Christ, which is the thing designed to be opened in this sermon. [to say the sinner's prayer is a spiritual act done by someone who is not yet spiritual! making the effect come before the cause! And hence the sinner's prayer is presumption and speaks against many scriptures, Romans 8:7-8 for one, turning the Gospel on its head.]

If civility without the new creature could save thee, why are not the moral Heathens saved also? If strictness of life without the new creature could save thee, why did it not save the Scribes and Pharisees also? If a high profession of religion without the new creature can save thee, why did it not save Judas, Hymenaeus and Philetus also? Nothing is more evident than this, that no repentance, obedience, self-denial, prayers, tears, reformations or ordinances, without the new creation, avail anything to the salvation of thy soul: The very blood of Christ himself, without the new creature, never did, and never will save any man. Oh how necessary a work is the new creation! "Circumcision avails nothing, and uncircumcision nothing; but a new creature." p353 [Hence the Sinner's Prayer is a gross presumption, putting himself into the room of God who He alone can call into existence the things that do not exist! Rom. 4:17]

Inference 1. How miserable and deplorable an estate all unrenewed souls are in, who can lay no claim to Christ during that state, and therefore are under an impossibility of salvation. p359

pg 419 Vol. 2 Sermon 30

Secondly, It is an argument of the excellency of the Christian religion, and that even wicked men themselves covet the name and profession of it, though they only cloak and cover their evils under it. I confess it is a great abuse of such an excellent thing as religion is; but yet, if it had not an awful reverence paid it by the consciences of all men, it would never be abused to this purpose, by hypocrites, as it is.

Thirdly, According to this reasoning, there can be no religion in the world; for name me that religion which is not scandalized by the practices of some that profess it. So that this practice [the world's badmouthing of Christianity due to its many hypocrites] has a natural tendency to Atheism; and is, no doubt, encouraged by the devil for that end. [Point being, the sinner's prayer leads to many false professors who's lives and conversations strongly argue hypocrisy! and thus quell any enthusiasm for the true religion, quiets their consciences (peace when there is no peace), providing justification, excuses and false pretences for their ungodly and often profligate lives. The sinner's prayer is the fertile ground from which this evil springs and flourishes that becomes a cancer in churches; they deceive themselves and others!]

The Jews said that they were bondage to no one; but Jesus and told him they were in bondage to sin and Satan to do his will. So the Jews were basically saying the same thing as the free-willers are saying now; that their will is free; that they're in bondage to no one. But they do ere in not knowing their own hearts. But where the spirit of the Lord is there is liberty; liberty to believe on Christ, worship God, etc.; and then are you truly free from bondage to sin and Satan.

Flesh Can Only Give Birth to Flesh

John Flavel, A Treatise of the Soul of Man pg 34

Code429

[Regarding the sinner's prayer from an unregenerate person assumes that something noble and spiritual as a new creation is, can proceed from nature. But this cannot be in that the effect cannot be greater than the cause. John 3:6]

But to me it is clear that the soul receives not its beginning by traduction or generation; for that which is generable, is also corruptible; but the spiritual, immortal soul (as it has been proved to be) is not subject to corruption. Nor is it imaginable how a soul should be produced out of matter, which is not endued with reason: or, how a bodily substance can impart that to another, which it has not in itself. If it be said, the soul of the child proceeds from the souls of the parents, that cannot be; for spiritual substances are impartible, and nothing can be descended from them. "And it is absurd to think the soul of Adam should spring from one original, and the souls of his offspring from another, while both his and theirs are of one and the same nature and species." To all which let me add, that as the assertion of their creation is most reasonable, so it is most scriptural. It is reasonable to think and say, "That no active power can act beyond, or above the proper sphere of its activity and ability". But if the soul be elicited out of the power of matter, here would be an effect produced abundantly more noble and excellent than its cause. And as it is most reasonable, so it is most scriptural. [And so in conversion, it is the Spirit that quickens, not the will of man, for "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." See also, John 1:13 and Romans 9:16; hence the fruitlessness of the sinner's prayer or any like prayer or petition of an unregenerate man. This is one reason why Thomas Shepard called the sinner's prayer a wicked presumption.]

This answers a big objection that Arminians and most other people have against God requiring something of men that they are unable to do.

The Works Mentality of Fallen Men

Excerpt from

by Pascal Denault pg 28-29

The Covenant of Works had a simple way of functioning: if Adam had obeyed, he and his posterity after him would have retained life and would have been sealed in justice; but his disobedience marked the entrance of death into the world. The fall placed Adam and all of his posterity under condemnation. The Covenant of Works was conditional and provided no way to expiate the offence in case of disobedience. In reformed theology, the Covenant of Works is seen as the foundation for the “retributive” justice of God, whereby obedience begets blessing and disobedience brings malediction. It is the Covenant of Works that founded the principle “the wages of sin is death” (Rom 6:23; Heb 10:28). Under the Covenant of Works, eternal life cannot be given freely^A, it must be earned.⁴ But now, because of sin, the Covenant of Works is ineffective in giving life; it can only bring death (Gal 3:21; Rom 8:3).

Reformed theologians considered that the Covenant of Works remained in effect after the fall,⁵ but that the feature inside this covenant after the entry of sin into the world. Before the fall, man benefited from the relationship with his Creator wherein, by virtue of the Covenant of Works, God was his God. While remaining under the obligation of obeying God because of this covenant, fallen man lost his covenantal privileges which ensured him of god’s favor and found himself, from then on, under God’s wrath. While God remained God for all men even after the fall, sin made it so that He was no longer their God in a favorable covenantal connection.

^A*Freely*, meaning that nothing outside of God (e.g., no prayer or sacrament, or any other duty by man, etc.) motivates him or causes him to grant someone eternal life. A “works mentality” is how we are before we are converted as Buckley notes above; we are of the mindset, What must I do to be saved? We are works oriented, trying to earn God’s favor, trying to appease God in some way, hence, by “works.” But after one is truly converted, we see the fruitlessness and folly of that mindset; we see that we had nothing to do with our being saved/converted/born again, etc. Nothing! – very similar to our role in our natural birth; we had nothing to do with that either! But after we are converted, we do good works out of gratitude and love for God. - My insert ⁵Arminius rejected the idea that the Covenant of Works remained in effect after the fall, because, according to him, God cannot require of man something that he is unable to do. To demand perfect obedience from a fallen creature would have been unjust. The Calvinists did not consider it unjust to require such obedience from a creature incapable of obedience, since this requirement was given while man was still able to comply. Man changed, but the divine standards of justice remain the same. The Covenant of Works allowed the Calvinists to say that God could have unilaterally condemned all men while remaining just, even if none of them could have obeyed.

What it is to Come to Christ

More insight to show the error of the Sinner's Prayer
p171-3 v2, John Flavel, Method of Grace

Doctrine 2. That sin-burdened souls are solemnly invited to come to Christ.

This point sounds sweetly in the ear of a distressed sinner; it is the most joyful voice that ever the soul heard; the voice of blessing from mount Gerizim, the ravishing voice from mount Sion, "Ye are come to Jesus the Mediator." In opening of it I will show,

1. What it is to come to Christ.
2. How Christ invites men to come to him.
3. Why his invitation is directed to burdened souls.

First We will enquire what it is to come to Christ, and how many things are included in it. In general, to come to Christ, is a phrase equipollent, or of the same amount with believing in Christ. It is an expression that carries the nature and necessity of faith in it, and is reciprocated with believing. John vi. 35. "He that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth in me shall never thirst."

Coming to Christ, is believing in Christ; and believing in Christ, is coming to Christ; they are synonyms, and import the self same thing. Only in this notion of faith, there are many rich and excellent things hinted to us, which no other word can so aptly convey to our minds. As,

First, It hints this to us, That the souls of convinced and burdened sinners do not only discern the reality of Christ, or that he is, but also the necessity of applying Christ, and that their eternal life is in their union with him; for this is most certain, that the object of faith must be determinate and fixed ; the soul must believe that Christ is, or else there can be no emotions of the soul after him; all coming pre-supposes a fixed term to which we come, Heb. xi. 6. "He that cometh to God, must believe that God is." Take away this, and all motions after Christ presently stop. No wonder then that souls, in their first motions to Christ, find themselves clogged with so many atheistical temptations, shaking their assent to the truth of the gospel at the very root and foundation of it; but they that come to Christ, do see that he is, and that their life and happiness lie in their union with him, else they would never come to him upon such terms as they do.

Secondly, Coming to Christ implies the soul's despair of salvation any other way. The way of faith is a supernatural way, and souls will not attempt it until they have tried all natural ways to help and save themselves, and find it all in vain ; therefore the text describes these comers to Christ as weary persons, that have been labouring and striving all other ways for rest, but can find none; and so are forced to relinquish all their fond expectations of salvation in any other way, and come to Christ as their last and only remedy.

Thirdly, Coming to Christ notes a supernatural and almighty power, acting the soul quite above its own natural abilities in this motion. John vi. 44. "No man can come unto me, except my Father which hath sent me draw him." It is as possible for the ponderous mountains to start from their bases and centers, mount themselves aloft into the air, and there fly like wandering atoms hither and thither, as it is for any man, of himself, i.e., by a pure natural power of his own, to come to Christ. It was not a stranger thing for Peter to come to Christ, walking upon the waves of the sea, than for his, or any mans soul, to come to Christ in the way of faith. See Martin Luther's comment on pg 1779.

Fourthly, Coming to Christ notes the voluntariness of the soul in its motion to Christ. It is true, there is no coming without the Father's drawing; but that drawing hath nothing of coaction in it; it doth not destroy, but powerfully, and with an overcoming sweetness, persuade the will.¹ It is not forced or driven, but it comes; being made "willing in the day of God's power," Ps. 110:3. Ask a poor distressed sinner in that season, Are you willing to come to Christ? O rather than live! life is not so necessary as Christ is! O ! with all my heart, ten thousand worlds for Jesus Christ, if he could be purchased, were nothing answerable to his value in mine eyes! The soul's motion to Christ is free and voluntary, it is coming.

Fifthly, It implies this in it, That no duties, or ordinances, (which are but the ways and means by which we come to Christ), are, or ought to be central and terminative to the soul; i.e., the soul of a believer is not to sit down, and rest in them, but to come by them or through them to Jesus Christ, and take up his rest in him only. No duties, no reformations, no ordinances of God, how excellent soever these things are in themselves, and how necessary soever they are in their proper place and use, can give rest to the weary and heavy laden soul; it cannot centre in any of them, and you may see it cannot, because it still gravitates and inclines to another thing, even Christ, and cannot terminate its motion till it be come to him. Christ is the term to which a believer moves; and therefore he cannot sit down by the way, or be as well satisfied as if he were at his journey's end. Ordinances and duties have the nature and use of means to bring us to Christ, but not to be to any man instead of Christ.

Sixthly, Coming to Christ, implies an hope or expectation from Christ in the coming soul. If he hath no hope, why doth it move forward? As good sit still, and resolve to perish where it is, as to come to Christ, if there is no ground to expect salvation by him. Hope is the spring of motion and industry; if you cut off hope, you hinder faith : it cannot move to Christ, except it be satisfied, at least, of the possibility of mercy and salvation by him. Hence it is, that when comers to Christ are struggling with the doubts and fears of the issue, the Lord is pleased to enliven their faint hopes, by setting home such scriptures as these, John vi. 37. "He that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out." And Heb. vii. 25. "He is able to save to the uttermost, all that come unto God by him" This puts life into hope, and hope puts life into industry and motion.

Seventhly, Coming to Christ for rest implies, that believers have, and lawfully may have an eye to their own happiness, in closing with the Lord Jesus Christ. The poor soul comes for rest; it comes for salvation; its eye and aim are upon it; and this aim of the soul at its own good, is legitimated, and allowed by that expression of Christ, John v. 40, "Ye will not come unto me, that ye may have life." If Christ blame them for not coming to him, that they might have life, sure he would not blame them, had they come to him for life.

Eighthly, but Lastly, and which is the principal thing in this expression, Coming to Christ, notes the all-sufficiency of Christ, to answer all the needs and wants of distressed souls, and their betaking themselves accordingly to him only for relief, being content to come to Christ for whatever they need, and live upon that fulness that is in him. If there were not an all-sufficiency in Christ, no soul would come to him ; for this is the very ground upon which men come. Heb. vii. 25. "He is able to save to the uttermost, all that come to God by him;" Εἰς τὸ ὠαντελεετο, the uttermost. In the greatest plunges, difficulties, and dangers. He hath a fulness of saving power in him, and this encourages souls to come unto him. One beggar uses not to wait at the door of another, but all at the doors of them they conceive able to relieve them. And as this notes the fulness of Christ as our Saviour, so it must needs note the emptiness and humility of the soul as a comer to him. This is called submission, in Rom. x. 3. Proud nature must be deeply distressed, humbled, and moulded into another temper, [that holiness must have been communicated to the soul to effect this new temper] before it will be persuaded to live upon those terms, to come to Christ for everything it wants, to live upon Christ's fulness in the way of grace and favour, and have no stock of its own to live upon. O! this is hard, but it is the way of faith. [see footnote on pg 1173]

Arguments...cont.

In this excerpt, you'll see what is entailed in this new creation, who is the cause of it and in what it consists; all of which you will have to conclude that man plays no role in it whatsoever for he would be the creator of it if he did which is preposterous; but that is what Arminianism promotes - that man can ask to be saved; and that from natural principles (self-love), and those corrupted! This is why Thomas Shepard calls the sinner's prayer a wicked presumption. As Flavel notes, " (1.) If your persons were accepted through Christ, your prayers should be accepted too, Gen. 4:4. But you are in a state of nature, destitute of the Spirit, John 15:7. And so your voice is to God not the voice of a child, but a stranger. p358 Vol. 5 Flavel Doctrine. That Gods creating of a new supernatural work of grace in the soul of any mart, is that man's sure, and infallible evidence of a saving interest in Jesus Christ.

Suitable hereunto are those words of the apostle, Eph. 4:20, 21, 22, 23, 24. "But ye have not so learned Christ; if so be that ye have heard him, and have been taught by him, as the truth is in Jesus: That ye put off, concerning the former conversation, the old man, which is corrupt, according to the deceitful lusts: and be renewed in the Spirit of your mind: and that ye put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness." Where we have, in other words of the same importance, the very self- same description of the man that is in Christ, which the apostle gives us in this text. Now, for the opening and stating of this point, it will be necessary that I show you,

1. Why the regenerating work of the Spirit is called a new creation.
2. In what respect every soul that is in Christ is renewed, or made a new creature.
3. What are the remarkable properties and qualities of this new creature.
4. The necessity of this new creation to all that are in Christ.
5. How this new creation evidences our interest in Christ.
6. And then apply the whole in the proper uses of it.

First, Why the regenerating work of the Spirit is called a new creation. This must be our first enquiry. And, doubtless, the reason of this appellation is the analogy, proportion, and similitude which is found betwixt the work of regeneration, and God's work in the first creation. And their agreement and proportion will be found in the following particulars.

*First, The same almighty Author who created the world, created also this work of grace in the soul of man, 2 Cor. 4:6. "God, who commanded the light to thine out of darkness, has shined into our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." The same powerful word which created the natural, created also the spiritual light. It is equally absurd for any man to say, I make myself to repent, or to believe, as it is to say, I made myself to exist, and be.

Secondly, The first thing that God created in the natural world, was light, Gen. 1:3. and the first thing which God createth in the new creation, is the light of spiritual knowledge, Col. 3: 10. "And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him."

Thirdly. Creation is out of nothing; it requires no pre- existent matter; it does not bring one thing out of another, but something out of nothing; it gives a being to that which before had no being. So it is also in the new creation, 1 Pet. 2:9, 10. "Who has called you out of darkness into his marvellous light; which in time past were not a people, but are now the people of God; which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy." The work of grace is not educed out of the power and principles of nature, but it is a pure work of creation. The Heathen philosophers could neither understand, nor acknowledge the creation of the world, because that notion was repugnant to this maxim of reason, en nihilo nihil fit, out of nothing, nothing can be made. Thus did they insanire cum ratione, befool themselves with their own reasonings; and after the same manner some great pretenders to reason among us, voting it an absurdity to affirm, that the work of grace is not virtually and potentially contained in nature, the new creation in the old.

Fourthly, It was the virtue and efficacy of the Spirit of God, which gave the natural world its being by creation; Gen. 1:2, the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters; it hovered over the chaos, as the wings of a bird do over her eggs, as the same word is rendered, Deut. 32:11. cherishing, as it were by incubation, that rude mass by a secret quickening influence, by which it drew all creatures into their several forms, and particular natures. So it is in the new creation; a quickening influence must come from the Spirit of God, or else the new creation can never be formed in us; John 3:8. "So is every one that is born of the Spirit." And ver. 6. "That which is born of the Spirit, is spirit."

Fifthly, The word of God was the instrument of the first creation; Psal. 33:6, 9. "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth. For he spake, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast." The word of God is also the instrument of the new creation, or work of grace in man; 1 Pet. 1:23. "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible; by the word of God, which liveth, and abideth forever." So James 1:18. "Of his own will begat he us, with the word of truth." Of his own will; that was the impulsive cause; with the word of truth; that was the instrumental cause. [Great respect and honour, love, and delight, is due to the word upon this account, that it is the instrument of our regeneration, or new creation. \[Hence the gospel squashes all human boasting.\]](#)

Sixthly, The same power which created the world, still underprops and supports it in its being: the world owes its conservation, as well as its existence, to the power of God, without which it could not subsist one moment. Just so it is with the new creation, which entirely depends upon the preserving power, which first formed it; Jude ver. 1. "Preserved in Christ Jesus," and 1 Pet. 1:5. "Who are kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation." As in a natural way "we live, move, and have our being in God," Acts 17:28, so in a spiritual way, we continue believing, repenting, loving, and delighting in God; without whose continued influence upon our souls, we could do neither.

Lesson 4. Fourthly, The Lord teaches the soul that is coming to Christ, that though it be their duty to strive to the uttermost for salvation; yet all strivings, in their own strength, are insufficient to obtain it. This work is quite above the power of nature: "It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy." The soul is brought to a full conviction of this, by the discovery of the heinous nature of sin, and of the rigour and severity of the law of God. No repentance nor reformation can possibly amount unto a just satisfaction, nor are they within the compass and power of our will. It was a saying that Dr. Hill often used to his friends, speaking about the power of man's will; he would lay his hand upon his breast, and say, "Every man has something here to confute the Arminian doctrine." This fully takes off the soul from all expectations of deliverance that way; it cannot but strive, that is its duty; but to expect deliverance, as the purchase of its own strivings, that would be its sin. [related verse, Isa. 44:20, "He feeds on ashes; a deluded heart has led him astray, and he cannot deliver himself or say, "Is there not a lie in my right hand?"]

Thirdly, But to speak positively, the teachings of God are nothing else but that spiritual and heavenly light, by which the Spirit of God shineth into the hearts of men, to give them "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ," as the apostle speaks, 2 Cor. 4:6. And though this be the proper work of the Spirit, yet it is called the teachings of the Father, because the Spirit who enlightens us is commissioned and sent by the Father so to do, John 14: 26. Now these teachings of the Spirit of God, consist in two things, viz. in his,

1. Sanctifying impressions.
2. Gracious assistances.

First, In his sanctifying impressions or regenerating work upon the soul, by virtue whereof it receives marvellous light and insight into spiritual things; and that not only as illumination is the first act of the Spirit in our conversion, Col. 3:10, but as his whole work of sanctification is illuminative and instructive to the converted soul, 1 John 2:27. "The anointing which you have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you, but as the same anointing teacheth you." The meaning is that sanctification gives the soul experience of those mysterious things which are contained in the scriptures, and that experience is the most excellent key to unlock and open those deep scripture mysteries; no knowledge is so distinct, so clear, so sweet, as that which the heart communicates to the head, John 7:17. "If any man do his will, he shall know of the doctrine." A man that never read the nature of love in books of philosophy, nor the transports and ecstasies thereof in history, may yet truly describe and express it by the sensible motions of that passion in his own soul; yea, he that has felt, much better understands, than he that has only read or heard. O what a light does spiritual sense and experience cast upon a great part of the scriptures! for indeed sanctification is the very copy or transcript of the word of God upon the heart of man; Jer. 31:83. "I will write my law in their hearts:" so that the scriptures and the experiences of believers, by this means answer to each other, as the lines and letters in the press answer to the impressions made upon the paper; or the figures in the wax, to the engravings in the seal. When a sanctified man reads David's psalms, or Paul's epistles, how is he surprised with wonder to find the very workings of his own heart so exactly deciphered and fully expressed there! O, saith he, this is my very case, these holy men speak what my heart has felt. [Experience teaches us, therefore, that we had nothing to do with our conversion, just as we had nothing to do with our natural birth. We didn't ask to come out of our mother's womb to have life! And so it is here in our new birth.]

p293 Vain hopes, fatal security next to impossible to overcome

Fourthly, This life of security and vain hope frustrates all the means of recovery and salvation, in the only season wherein they can be useful and beneficial to us. By reason of these things the word has no power to convince men's consciences, nothing can bring them to a sight and sense of their condition. Therefore Christ told the self-confident and blind Jews, Matt. 21:31. "That the publicans and harlots go into the kingdom of God before them." And the reason is, because their hearts lie more open and fair to the strokes of conviction and compunction for sin than those do, who are blinded by vain hopes and confidences. [This is the danger of those who say they got saved by saying the Sinner's Prayer, a fatal or stupid security. Seen in Jesus' words to the Pharisees, "If you were blind, you would have no sin; but now you say, 'We see.' Therefore your sin remains." John 9:41. For in the sinner's prayer, the sinner says he sees, when in fact he really doesn't see! He is still blind, dead in sin, etc.; he is just like the Pharisees who said they see. There sin remains! Oh what a most miserable state of affairs, a fatal one, to think you are saved when you are not. Now it's impossible to reach him by an preaching or by any convictions, for he imagines that any gospel threatenings have nothing to do with him! Flavel explains further: there is a twofold opening of men's eyes to see their danger, namely, 1. Graciously to prevent danger. 2. Judicially to aggravate misery. They whose eyes are not opened graciously in this world, to see their disease and remedy in Christ, shall have their eyes opened judicially in the world to come, to see their disease without any remedy. If God open them now, it is by way of prevention; if they be not opened till then, it will produce desperation.

Fourthly, The horrible nature of this judgement farther appears from the exceeding difficulty of curing it, especially in men of excellent natural endowments and accomplishments, John 9:40, 41. "And some of the Pharisees which were with him, heard these words, and said unto him, Are we blind also? Jesus said unto them, If ye were blind, ye should have no sin: but now ye say, We see: therefore your sin remaineth," q. d. the pride and conceitedness of your heart and obstinacy and incurableness to your blindness; these are "the blind people that have eyes;" Isa. 63:8. In seeing they see not. The conviction of such men is next to an impossibility. pg 466 vol. 2, Method of Grace. Note pride, conceitedness; this is the state of those who say this sinner's prayer since they are not regenerated yet! They are in effect, praying to get regenerated which, as I have noted before, is a strong contradiction, aka presumption and wicked at that because of this sin of pride, self love/righteousness, etc. That's why it's wicked; they are offering their righteousness which is vile and they want what God has but they don't want God for who he really is.]

Inference 1. Is this the life that the unregenerate world lives? Then it is not to be wondered at that the preaching of the gospel has so little success: "Who has believed our report? (saith the prophet) and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" Isa. 53: 1. Ministers study for truths apt to awaken and convince the consciences of them that hear them, but their words return again to them: They turn to God, and mourn over the matter; we have laboured in vain, and spent our strength for nought. And this security is the cause of all, vain hopes bar fast the doors of men's hearts against all the convictions and persuasions of the word. The greater cause have they to admire the grace of God, who have found, or shall find the convictions of the word sharper than any two edged sword, piercing to the dividing asunder of the soul and spirit; to whose hearts God brings home the commandment by an effectual application.

Inf. 2. If this be the life of the unregenerate world, what deadly enemies are they that nourish and strengthen the groundless confidences and vain hopes of salvation in men. This the scripture calls the healing of the hurt of souls slightly, by crying, "Peace, peace, when there is no peace," Jer. 6:14. The sewing of pillows under their arm-holes, Ezek. 13:18. That they may lie soft and easy under the ministry; and this is the doctrine which the people love because it greatly appeals to their carnal apprehension of things, of God, etc. They think God is altogether like them! [Ps 50]; but oh, what wilt the end of these things be! And what an account have those men to give to God for the blood of those souls by them betrayed to the everlasting burnings! Such flattery is the greatest cruelty. Those whom you bless upon earth, will curse you in hell, and the day in which they trusted their souls to your conduct. [Many people say that because you said this sinner's prayer that you are saved because Jesus is faithful, etc., even thought you may not experience a thing or feel anything upon your soul. How stupifying that is to the soul...*peace, peace...*and flattery combined.]

Inf. 3. How great a mercy is it to be awakened out of that general sleep and security which is fallen upon the world! You cannot estimate the value of that mercy, for it is a peculiar mercy. O that ever the Spirit of the Lord should touch thy soul under the ministry of the word, startle and rouse thy conscience, whilst others are left in the dead sleep of security round about thee! When the Lord dealt with thy soul much after the same manner he did with Paul in the way to Damascus, who not only saw a light shining from heaven, which those that travelled with him saw as well as he, but heard that voice from heaven which did the work upon his heart, though his companions heard it not. Besides, it is not only a peculiar mercy, but it is a leading introductive mercy, to all other spiritual mercies that follow it to all eternity. If God had not done this for thee, thou hadst never been brought to faith, to Christ, or heaven. From this act of the Spirit all other saving acts take their rise; so that you have cause for ever to admire the goodness of God in such a favour as this is.

p360 This is rich with truth on this subject of man's vain attempts to think that he can recommend himself to God by his own prayer!, i.e., his own strength of his will, from his own industry.

Inf. 3. Learn from hence, that the work of grace is wholly supernatural; it is a creation, and a creation-work is above the power of the creature. No power but that which gave being to the world, can give a being to the new creature. Almighty Power goes forth to give being to the new creature. This creature is not born of flesh, or of blood, nor of the will of man, but of God, John 1: 13. The nature of this new creature speaks its original to be above the power of nature; the very notion of a new creation spoils the proud boasts of the great asserters of the power and ability of the will of man. When God, therefore, puts the question, who maketh thee to differ? And what hast thou that thou hast not received? Let thy soul, reader, answer it with all humility and thankfulness. It is thou, Lord, thou only, that madest me to differ from another; and what I have received, I have received from thy free grace.

Of the State of Spiritual Death, And The Misery Thereof

code194

By John Flavel

Eph. 5:14.

Wherefore he saith, Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light.

<http://www.ccel.org/ccel/flavel/grace.xxxiv.html>

This scripture represents unto us the miserable and lamentable state of the unregenerate, as being under the power of spiritual death, which is the cause and inlet of all other miseries. From hence, therefore, I shall make the first discovery of the woeful and wretched state of them that apply not Jesus Christ to their own souls.

The scope of the apostle in this context, is to press believers to a circumspect and holy life; to "walk as children of light." This exhortation is laid down in ver. 8. and pressed by divers arguments in the following verses.

First, From the tendency of holy principles, unto holy fruits and practice, ver. 9, 10.

Secondly, From the convincing efficacy of practical godliness, upon the consciences of the wicked, ver. 11, 12, 13. It awes and convinces their consciences.

Thirdly, From the co-incidence of such a conversation with the great design and drift of the scriptures, which is to awaken men by regeneration, out of that spiritual sleep, or rather death, which sin has cast them into; and this is the argument of the text, Wherefore he saith, Awake thou that sleepest, &c. There is some difficulty in the reference of these words. Some think it is to Isa 26:19. "Awake and sing ye that dwell in the dust." Others to Isa. 60:1: "Arise, shine, for thy light is come," &c. But most probably, the words neither refer to this or that particularly, but to the drift and scope of the whole scriptures, which were inspired and written upon this great design, [a key point when interpreting scripture...the drift of the Holy Spirit throughout the bible] to awaken and quicken souls out of the state of spiritual death. And in them we are to consider these three things more distinctly and particularly.

1. The miserable state of the unregenerate; they are asleep and dead.
2. Their duty; which is to "awake, and stand up from the dead.
3. The power enabling them thereunto; "Christ shall give thee light".

First, The miserable state of the unregenerate, represented under the motions of sleep and death: both expressions intending one and the same thing, though with some variety of notion. The Christless and unregenerate world is in a deep sleep; a spirit of slumber, senselessness and security is fallen upon them, though they lie exposed immediately to eternal wrath and misery, ready to drop into hell every moment. Just as a man that is fast asleep in a house on fire, and whilst the consuming flames are round about him, his fancy is sporting itself in some pleasant dream; this is a very lively resemblance of the unregenerate soul. But yet he that sleeps has the principle of life entire in him, though his senses be bound, and the actions of life suspended by sleep. Lest therefore we should think it is only so with the unregenerate, the expression is designedly varied, and those that were said to be asleep, are positively affirmed to be dead; on purpose to inform us that it is not a simple suspension of the acts and exercise, but a total privation of the principle of spiritual life, which is the misery of the unregenerate.

Secondly, We have here the duty of the unregenerate, which is to "awake out of sleep, and arise from the dead." This is their great concernment; no duty in the world is of greater necessity and importance to them. "Strive (saith Christ) to enter in at the strait gate," Luke 13:24. And the order of these duties is very natural. First awake, then arise. Startling and rousing convictions make way for spiritual life; till God awake us by convictions of our misery, we will never be persuaded to arise and move towards Christ for remedy and safety.

Thirdly, But you will say, if unregenerate men be dead men, to what purpose is it to persuade them to arise and stand up: The very exhortation supposes some powers or ability in the unregenerate; else in vain are they commanded to arise. [a key argument that Arminians use to support man's supposed ability (internal virtue) to chose Christ prior to actually being converted!] This difficulty is solved in this very text, though the duty is ours, yet the power is God's. God commands that in his word, which only his grace can perform. God says to make you a clear heart, or as in Deut. 10:16, "Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your heart, and be no longer stubborn." But only God can do it as he notes later in scripture in Deut. 30:6, "And the LORD your God will circumcise your heart and the heart of your offspring, so that you will love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul, that you may live." So, God says, I will do it; I will take out the heart of stone, or circumcise the heart, etc., [Ezek 36:26, "And I will give you a new heart, and a new spirit I will put within you." And as David intimates in Ps 51:10, Create in me a clean heart, O God...] "Christ shall give thee light." Popish commentators would build the tower of free will upon this scripture, by a very weak argument, drawn from the order wherein these things are here expressed; which is but a very weak foundation to build upon, for it is very usual in scripture to put the effect before, and the cause after, as it is here, so in Isa. 26:19. "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust." But I will not here entangle my discourse with that controversy; that which I aim at is plain in the words, namely,

Doctrine. That all Christless souls are under the power of spiritual death; they are in the state of the dead.

Multitudes of testimonies are given in scripture to this truth; Eph. 2:1, 5. "You has he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins." Col. 2:13. "And you being dead in your sins, and the uncircumcision of your flesh, has he quickened together with him;" with many other places of the same importance. But the method in which I shall discourse this point will be this;

First, I will show you in what sense Christless and unregenerated men are said to be dead.

Secondly, What the state of spiritual death is.

Thirdly, How it appears that all unregenerate men are in this sad state. And then apply it.

First, In what sense are Christless and unregenerate men said to be dead men.

To open this, we must know there is a three-fold death, viz.

1. Natural.
2. Spiritual.
3. Eternal.

Natural death is nothing else but the privation of the principle of natural life, or the separation of the soul from the body, James 2:26. "The body without the spirit is dead." Spiritual death is the privation of the principle of spiritual life, or the want and absence of the quickening Spirit of God in the soul; the soul is the life of the body, and Christ is the life of the soul, the absence of the soul is death to the body, and the absence or want of Christ is death to the soul. Eternal death is the separation both of body and soul from God, which is the misery of the damned. Now Christless and unregenerate men are not dead in the first sense; they are naturally alive though they are dead while they live, nor are they yet dead in the last sense, eternally separated from God by an irrevocable sentence as the damned are; but they are dead in the second sense; they are spiritually dead, whilst they are naturally alive; and this spiritual death is the fore-runner of eternal death. Now spiritual death is put in scripture in opposition to a two-fold spiritual life, viz.

1. The life of justification.
2. The life of sanctification.

Spiritual death in opposition to the life of justification, is nothing else but the guilt of sin bringing us under the sentence of death. Spiritual death, in opposition to the life of sanctification, is the pollution or dominion of sin. In both these senses, unregenerate men are dead men; but it is the last which I am properly concerned to speak to in this place, and therefore,

Secondly, Let us briefly consider what this spiritual death is, which, as before was hinted, is the absence of the quickening Spirit of Christ from the soul of any man. That soul is a dead soul, into which the Spirit of Christ is not infused in the work of regeneration; and all its works are dead works, as they are called, Heb. 9:14. So the Sinner's Prayer is a dead work; nor does God hear (harken to) his prayer, [John 9:31, because it springs forth from natural principles, and those corrupted, not from the new principle of life, i.e., faith; and without faith they cannot please Him, Heb. 11:6; so that they, in this natural condition, cannot perform any spiritual act acceptable to God. Romans 8:7-8, 1Cor2:14, etc.] For, look how it is with the damned, they live, they have sense and motion, and an immortality in all these; yet because they are eternally separated from God, the life which they live, deserves not the name of life, but it is everywhere in scripture styled death: so the unregenerate, they are naturally alive; they eat and drink, they buy and sell, they talk and laugh, they rejoice in the creatures; and many of them spend their days in pleasures, and then go down to the grave. This is the life they live, but yet the scripture rather calls it death than life; because though they live, yet it is without God in the world, Eph. 2:12. though they live, yet it is a life alienated from the life of God, Eph. 4:18. And therefore while they remain naturally alive, they are in scripture said "to remain in death, 1 John 3:14. and to be "dead while they live," 1 Tim. 5:6. And there is great reason why a Christless, an unregenerate state, should be represented in scripture, under the notion of death; for there is nothing in nature which more aptly represents that miserable state of the soul, than natural death does. The dead see and discern nothing, and the natural man perceiveth not the things that are of God. The dead have no beauty or desirableness in them; "Bury my dead (saith Abraham) out of my sight;" neither is there any spiritual loveliness in the unregenerate. True it is, some of them have sweet natural qualities and moral excellencies, which are engaging things, but these are so many flowers, decking and adorning a dead corpse. The dead are objects of pity and great lamentation: men used to mourn for the dead, Eccl. 12:5. "Man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets." But unregenerate, and Christless souls, are much more the objects of pity and lamentation. How are all the people of God (especially those that are naturally related to them) concerned to mourn over them and for them, as Abraham did for Ishmael, Gen. 17:18. "O that Ishmael might live before thee." Upon these, and many other accounts, the state of unregeneracy is represented to us in the notion of death.

Thirdly, And that this is the state of all Christless and unsanctified persons, will, undeniably, appear two ways.

1. The causes of spiritual life have not wrought upon them.
2. The effects and signs of spiritual life do not appear in them, and therefore they are in the state, and under the power of spiritual death.

First, The causes of spiritual life have not wrought upon them. There are two causes of spiritual life,

1. Principal, and internal.
2. Subordinate and external.

The principal internal cause of spiritual life is the regenerating Spirit of Christ, Rom. 8: 2. "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has made me free from the law of sin and death." It is the Spirit, as a regenerating Spirit, that unites us with Christ, in whom all spiritual life originally is, John 5:25, 26. "Verily I say unto you, that the hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live: For as the Father has life in himself, so has he given to the Son to have life in himself." As all the members of the natural body receive animation, sense, and motion, by their union with their natural head; so all believers, the members of Christ, receive spiritual life and animation by their union with their natural head; so all believers, the members of Christ, receive spiritual life and animation by their union with Christ their mystical head, Eph. 4:15, 16. Except we come to him, and be united with him in the way of faith, we can have no life in us, John 5:40. "Ye will not come unto me that ye may have life." Now the Spirit of God has yet exerted no regenerating, quickening influences, nor begotten any special saving faith in natural, unsanctified men; whatever he has done for them in the way of natural, or spiritual common gifts, yet he has not quickened them with the life of Christ. [This is why the Sinner's Prayer is a wicked presumption, for to say that someone has truly spiritual and holy desires for Christ, is to have the effect come before the cause! Job 14:4, "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? No one!" As Owen said, the only way of salvation is by effectual vocation. You must be called; you cannot elect yourself so to speak. So by this means of the Sinner's Prayer, they deceive themselves and others. People may look and sound sincere when they do it, but it is all outward appearance, a fair profession only, founded on self-love or self-preservation; it is but a flower that will fade at last. They want what God has but do not want God; that's why this prayer is wicked; the prayer is founded upon natural principles, love for self, etc., and not from a love for God nor from a spiritual sight of Christ, therefore it is highly provoking to God.] And as for the subordinate external means of life, viz. the preaching of the gospel, which is the instrument of the Spirit in this glorious work, and is therefore called, The word of life, Phil 2:16. This word has not yet been made a regenerating, quickening word to their souls. Possibly it has enlightened them, and convinced them: it has wrought upon their minds in the way of common illumination, and upon their consciences in the way of conviction, but not upon their hearts and wills, by way of effectual conversion. To this day the Lord has not given them an heart opening itself, in the way of faith, to receive Jesus Christ.

Secondly, The effects and signs of spiritual life do not appear in them: For,

First, They have no feeling, or sense of misery and danger [which saving faith makes real to the soul]. I mean no such sense as thoroughly awakens them to apply Christ their remedy. That spiritual judgment lies upon them, Isa. 6:9, 10. "And he said, Go and tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed but perceive not; make the heart of this people fat, and their ears heavy, and shut their eyes."

Secondly, They have no spiritual motions towards Christ, or after things that are spiritual; all the arguments in the world cannot persuade their wills to move one step towards Christ in the way of faith, John 5:30. Ye will not come unto me. Were there a principle of spiritual life in their souls, they would move Christ-ward and heaven-ward, John 4:14. It would be in them a well of water springing up into eternal life. The natural tendency of the spiritual life is upward. [But the sinner's prayer speaks against what Jesus spoke; that man will come by his own industry, which is essentially what this prayer signifies. In other words Jesus was telling them that without the Spirit's work, you will not come to me to have life. The Spirit gives life; the flesh profits nothing. John 6:63; That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. John 3:6.]

Thirdly, The unregenerate have no appetite unto spiritual food; they savour not things that are spiritual; they can go from week to week, and from year to year, all their life-time, without any communion betwixt God and their souls, and feel no need of it, nor any hungerings or thirstings after it; which could never be, if a principle of spiritual life were in them; for then they would "esteem the words of Gods mouth more than their necessary food," Job 30:12.

Fourthly, They have no heat or spiritual warmth in their affections to God, and things above; their hearts are as cold as a stone to spiritual objects. They are heated, indeed, by their lusts and affections to the world, and the things of the world: but O how cold and dead are they towards Jesus Christ, and spiritual excellencies.

Fifthly, They breathe not spiritually, therefore they live not spiritually; were there a spiritual principle of life in them, their souls would breathe after God in spiritual prayer, Acts 9:11. "Behold he prayeth." The lips of the unregenerate may move in prayer, but their hearts and desires do not breathe and pant after God. [but it looks like they do when they do this prayer, but remember, those affections are not based on a new principle of life but upon natural principles, self-love, and those corrupted. This is where their sincerity is fraudulent; they deceive themselves and others, too.]

Sixthly, They have no cares or fears for self-preservation, which is always the effect of life; the poorest fly, or silliest worm will shun danger. The wrath of God hangs over them in the threatenings, but they tremble not at it: hell is but a little before them; they are upon the very precipice of eternal ruin, yet will use no means to avoid it. How plain, therefore, is this sad case which I have undertaken here to demonstrate, viz. that Christless and unregenerate souls are dead souls? The uses follow.

Inf. 1. If all Christless and unregenerate souls be dead souls, then how little pleasure can Christians take in the society of the unregenerate?

Certainly, it is, no pleasure for the living to converse among the dead. It was a cruel torment invented by Mezentius the tyrant, to tie a dead and living man together. The pleasure of society arises from the harmony of spirits, and the hopes of mutual enjoyment in the world to come; neither of which can sweeten the society of the godly with the wicked in this world. It is true, there is a necessary civil converse which we must have with the ungodly here; or else (as the apostle speaks) we must go out of the world. There are also duties of relation which must be faithfully and tenderly paid, even to the unregenerate: but certainly, where we have our free election, we shall be much wanting both to our duty and comfort, if we make not the people of God our chosen companions. Excellently to this purpose speaks a modern author, "Art thou a godly master? When thou takest a servant into thine house, chose for God as well as thyself. A godly servant is a greater blessing than we think on; he can work, and set God on work also for his master's good, Gen. 24:12. O Lord God of my master Abraham, I pray thee send me good speed this day, and show kindness unto my master. And surely he did his master as much service by his prayer, as by his prudence in that journey. Holy David observed, while he was at Saul's court, the mischief of having wicked and ungodly servants, (for with such was that unhappy king so compassed, that David compares his court to the profane and barbarous Heathens, among whom there was scarce more wickedness to be found, Psal. 120:6. "Wo is me, that I sojourn in eshech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar; i.e., among those who were as prodigiously wicked as any there); and no doubt, but this made this gracious man, in his banishment, before he came to the crown, (having seen the evil of a disordered house) to resolve what he would do when God should make him the head of such a royal family, Psal. 101 : 7. "He that worketh deceit, shall not dwell within my house; he that telleth lies shall not tarry in my sight.

Art thou godly? show thyself so in the choice of husband or wife. I am sure, if some, (and those godly ones) could bring no other testimonials for their godliness than the care they have taken in this particular, it might justly be called into question both by themselves and others. There is no one thing that gracious persons, (even those recorded in scripture as well as others, have seen their weakness, yea, given offence and scandal more in, than in this particular, The sons of God saw that the daughters of men were fair, Gen. 6:2. One would have thought that the sons of God should have looked for grace in the heart, rather than beauty in the face; but we see, even they sometimes turn in at the fairest sign, without much enquiring what grace is to be found dwelling within." Look to the rule, O Christian, if thou wilt keep the power of holiness, that is clear as the sun-beam written in the scripture, "Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers," 2 Cor. 6:14.

Inf. 2. How great and wholly supernatural, marvellous, and wonderful is that change which regeneration makes upon the soul of men! It is a change from death to life, Luke 15:24. "This my son was dead and is alive again." Regeneration is life from the dead; the most excellent life from the most terrible death: it is the life of God re-inspired into a soul alienated from it by the power of sin, Eph. 4:11. There are two stupendous changes made upon the souls of men, which justly challenge the highest admiration, viz.

1. That from sin to grace.
2. From grace to glory.

The change from grace to glory is acknowledged by all, and that justly, to be a wonderful change for God to take a poor creature out of the society of sinful men; yea, from under the burden of many sinful infirmities, which made him groan from day to day in this world; and in a moment to make him a complete and perfect soul, shining in the beauties of holiness, and filling him as a vessel of glory, with the unspeakable and inconceivable joys of his presence; to turn his groanings into triumphs, his fightings into songs of praise; this, I say, is marvellous, and yet the former change from sin to grace is no way inferior to it, nay, in some respect, beyond it; for the change which glory makes upon the regenerate is but a gradual change, but the change which regeneration makes upon the ungodly is a specific change. Great and admirable is this work of God; and let it forever be marvellous in our eyes.

Inf. 3. If unregenerate souls be dead souls, what a fatal stroke does death give to the bodies of all unregenerate men? A soul dead in sin, and a body dead by virtue of the curse for sin, and both soul and body remaining for ever under the power of eternal death, is so full and perfect a misery, as that nothing can be added to make it more miserable: It is the comfort of a Christian that he can say when death comes, Non omnis moriar, I shall not wholly die; there is a life I live which death cannot touch, Rom. 8:18. "The body is dead, because of sin; but the spirit is life because of righteousness." Blessed and holy is he that has part in the first resurrection: on such the second death has no power. As death takes the believer from amidst many sorrows and troubles, and brings him to the vision of God, to the general assembly of all the perfected saints, to a state of complete freedom and full satisfaction; so it drags the unregenerate from all his sensitive delights, and comforts, to the place of torment; it buries the dead soul out of the presence of God for ever; it is the king of terrors, a serpent with a deadly sting to every man that is out of Christ.

Inf. 4. If every unregenerate soul be a dead soul, how sad is the case of hypocrites and temporary believers, who are twice dead? These are those cursed trees, of which the apostle Jude speaks, Jude ver: 12. "Trees whose fruit withereth, without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots." The apostle alludes unto dying trees, trees that are dying the first time in the spring, then they fade, decay, and cast off their leaves, when other trees are fragrant and flourishing: but from this first death they are sometimes recovered, by pruning, dressing, or watering the roots; but if in autumn, they decay again, which is the critical and climacterical times of trees, to discover whether their disease be mortal or not; if then they wither and decay the second time, the fault is ab intra, the root is rotten, there is no hope of it; the husbandmen bestows no more labour about it, except it be to root it up for fuel to the fire.

Just thus stands the case with false and hypocritical professors, who though they were still under the power of spiritual death, yet in the beginning of their profession, they seemed to be alive; they showed the world the fragrant leaves of a fair profession, many hopeful buddings of affection towards spiritual things were seen in them, but wanting a root of regeneration, they quickly began to wither and cast their untimely fruit. However, by the help of ordinances, or some rousing and awakening providences, they seem to recover themselves again; but all will not do, the fault is ab intra, from the want of a good root, and therefore, at last, they who were always once dead, for want of a principle of regeneration, are now become twice dead, by the withering and decay of their vain profession. Such trees are prepared for the severest flames in hell, Matt. 24:51, their portion is the saddest portion allotted for any of the sons of death. Therefore the apostle Peter tells us, 2 Pet. 2:20, 21. "For if, after they have escaped the pollutions of the world, through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ [a notional knowledge as opposed to saving, they ascent to it], they are again entangled therein, and overcome; the latter end is worse with them than the beginning. For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them." Double measures of wrath seem to be prepared for them that die this double death.

Inf. 5. If this be so, then unregenerate persons deserve the greatest lamentations. And were this truth heartily believed, we could not but mourn over them, with the most tender compassion and hearty sorrow. If our husbands, wives, or children are dying a natural death, how are our hearts rent in pieces with pity and sorrow for them? What cries, tears, and wringing of hands, discover the deep sense we have of their misery! O Christians, is all the love you have for your relations spent upon their bodies? Are their souls of no value in your eyes? Is spiritual death no misery? Does it not deserve a tear? The Lord open your eyes, and duly affect your hearts with spiritual death and soul miseries.

Consider, my friends, and let it move your bowels, (if there be bowels of affection in you,) whilst they remain spiritually dead, they are useless and wholly unserviceable unto God in the world, as to any special and acceptable service unto him, 2 Tim. 2:21. they are incapable of all spiritual comforts from God; they cannot taste the least sweetness in Christ, in duties, or in promises, Rom. 8:6. they have no beauty in their souls, how comely soever their bodies are; it is grace, and nothing but grace that beautifies the inner man, Ezek. 16:6, 7. The dead have neither comfort nor beauty in them; they have no hope to be with God in glory; for the life of glory is begun in grace, Phil. 1:6. their graves must be shortly made, to be buried out of the sight of God for ever in the lowest hell, the pit digged by justice for all that are spiritually dead; the dead must be buried. Can such considerations as these draw no pity from your souls, nor excite your endeavours for their regeneration? Then it is to be feared your souls are dead as well as theirs. O pity them, pity them, and pray for them; in this case only, prayers for the dead are our duty; who knows but at the last, God may hear your cries, and you may say with comfort, as he did, "This my son was dead, but is alive; was lost, but is found; and they began to be merry," Luke 15: 24.

Statements on Arminianism

by Jonathan Edwards

from his discourse Concerning Efficacious Grace

[my comments in blue]

The sum is this; Arminians and most people think that we have it in our own power to endeavour after holiness, and thus to determine the matter of believing the Gospel, believing on Christ, to really see Christ as our only hope and to see us as vile creatures, meriting nothing but damnation, and us as nothing in comparison to Christ, all to be done in a saving manner and that the only thing that God does to help us in this way is only by moral suasion, presenting ideas to our understanding, and that nothing on God's part by his Spirit is infallibly effectual or decisive; the decision for salvation is left up to their idea of man's own "self-directed" or "autonomous free-will" of deciding the matter. Hence, the first cause is within us, this deciding originates within us, and not from without. (which makes us god's, by the way) - G Clark

I would highly recommend studying John Owen's book, A Display of Arminianism!

Also, when looking at the diagram of the Glory of God, in what it consists and the communication of it to the elect by the Holy Spirit, this exposition should increase your understanding and make plain the vanity of the Arminian doctrine of man's self-sufficiency to the exclusion of the power of God that works in us (Phil2:13), and the truth of the doctrine of Original Sin which ascribes nothing to man but total depravity (1Cor2:14, Rms 8:7-8).

The following excerpts are from Concerning Efficacious Grace by Jonathan Edwards. This should help paint the picture more clearly. I underlined and emboldened in red many of the important points.

CHAP. IV.

CONCERNING EFFICACIOUS GRACE - by Jonathan Edwards

<http://www.ccel.org/ccel/edwards/works2.xi.iv.html>

§ 1. it is manifest that the Scripture supposes, that if ever men are turned from sin, God must undertake it, and he must be the doer of it; that it is his doing that must determine the matter; that all that others can do, will avail nothing, without his agency. [i.e., without Me you can do nothing - Jn 15] This is manifest by such texts as these: Jer. xxxi. 18, 19. "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned; Thou art the Lord my God. Surely after that I was turned, I repented; and after that I was instructed, I smote upon my thigh," &c. Lam. v. 21. "Turn thou us unto thee, O Lord, and we shall be turned."

[The following is typical of Arminian dogma that Edwards points out: for if the confess that the Spirit of God actually does something to effect an end which the scriptures say in a multitude of place (they just ignore many scriptures), their positions all fall to the ground.]

§2. According to Dr. Whitby's notion of the assistance of the Spirit, the Spirit of God does nothing in the hearts or minds of men beyond the power of the devil; nothing but what the devil can do; and nothing showing any greater power in any respect, than the devil shows and exercises in his temptations. For he supposes that all that the Spirit of God does, is to bring moral motives and inducements to mind, and set them before the understanding, &c. It is possible that God may infuse grace, in some instances, into the minds of such persons as are striving to obtain it in the other way, though they may not observe it, and may not know that it is not obtained by gradual acquisition. But if a man has indeed sought it only in that way, and with as much dependence on himself, and with as much neglect of God in his endeavours and prayers, as such a doctrine naturally leads to, it is not very likely that he should obtain saving grace by the efficacious, mighty power of God. It is most likely that God should bestow this gift in a way of earnest attention to divine truth, and the use of the means of grace, with reflection on one's own sinfulness, and in a way of being more and more convinced of sinfulness, and total corruption and need of the divine power to restore the heart, to infuse goodness, and of becoming more and more sensible of one's own impotence, and helplessness and inability to obtain goodness by his own strength. And if a man has obtained no other virtue, than what seems to have been wholly in that gradual and insensible way that might be expected from use and custom, in the exercise of his own strength, he has reason to think, however bright his attainments may seem to be, that he has no saving virtue.

§ 3. Great part of the gospel is denied by those who deny pure efficacious grace. They deny that wherein actual salvation and the application of redemption mainly consists; and how unlikely are such to be successful in their endeavours after actual salvation!

Turnbull's explanation of Philip. ii. 12, 13. "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his own good pleasure," is this, (Christian Philosophy, p. 96, 97.) "Give all diligence to work out your salvation; for it is God, the Creator of all things, who, by giving you, of his good pleasure, the power of willing and doing, with a sense of right and wrong, and reason to guide and direct you, hath visibly made it your end so to do. Your frame shows, that to prepare yourselves for great moral happiness, arising from a well cultivated and improved mind, suitably placed, is your end appointed to you by your Creator. Consider, therefore, that by neglecting this your duty, this your interest, you contemn and oppose the good will of God towards you, and his design in creating you." [This is a good example of misapplication of those two scriptures by Arminians that Edwards points out.]

[The following excerpt: Is salvation obtained by gradual habits, etc., or by a decisive effectual power of the Holy Spirit in infusing true virtue or holiness in the heart, thus changing the heart?]

§ 4. If we look through all the examples we have of conversion in Scripture, the conversion of the apostle Paul, and of the Corinthians, ("Such were some of you, but ye are washed, 1 Cor. vi. 11." &c.) and all others that the apostles write to, how far were they from this gradual way of conversion, by contracted habits, and by such culture as Turn-bull speaks of! Turnbull, in his Christian Philosophy, p. 470. seems to think, that the sudden conversions that were in the apostles' days, were instances of their miraculous power, as in these words, "They appealed to the works they wrought, to the samples they gave of their power to foretell future events; their power to cure instantaneously all diseases of the body; their power to cure, in the same extraordinary manner, all diseases of the mind, or to convert bad into good dispositions; their power to bestow gifts and blessings of all sorts, bodily and spiritual." See again to the like purpose, p. 472.

Now I would inquire, whether those who thus had the diseases of their minds cured, and theirs had converted into good dispositions, had any virtue; or whether those good dispositions of theirs were virtues, or anything praiseworthy; and whether, when they were thus converted, they became good men and the heirs of salvation? As Turnbull himself allows, all that are not good men, were called the children of the devil in Scripture; and he asserts that nothing is virtue, but what is obtained by our own culture; that no habit is virtuous, but a contracted one, one that is owing to ourselves, our own diligence, &c.; and also holds, that none are good men but the virtuous; none others are the heirs of future happiness.

§ 5. What God wrought for the apostle Paul and other primitive Christians, was intended for a pattern to all future ages, for their instruction and excitement; Eph. ii. 7. 1 Tim. i. 16. It is natural to expect, that the first fruits of the church specially recorded in history, and in that book which is the steady rule of the church in all things pertaining to salvation, should be a pattern to after-ages in those things, those privileges, which equally concern all. Or if it be said, that as soon as men take up a strong resolution, they are accepted and looked upon by God as penitents and converts; it may be inquired, is there a good man without good habits, or principles of virtue and goodness in his heart?

Herod's example - see also [code278a]

§ 8. Acts xii. 23. God was so angry with Herod for not giving him the glory of his eloquence, that the angel of the Lord smote him immediately, and he died a miserable death; he was eaten of worms, and gave up the ghost. But if it be very sinful for a man to take to himself the glory of such a qualification as eloquence, how much more a man's taking to himself the glory of divine grace, God's own image see [diagram!!], and that which is infinitely God's most excellent, precious, and glorious gift [which are all those virtues listed on the diagram of God's internal glory], and man's highest honour, excellency, and happiness, whereby he is partaker of the divine nature, and becomes a God-like creature? If God was so jealous for the glory of so small a gift, how much more for so high an endowment, this being that alone, of all other things, by which man becomes like God? If man takes the glory of it to himself, he thereby will be in the greatest danger of taking the glory to himself that is due to God, and of setting up himself as standing in competition with God, as vying with the Most High, and making himself a god, and not a man. If not giving God the glory of that which is least honorable, provokes God's jealousy; much more must not giving God the glory of that which is infinitely the most honorable. [And that is why the sinner's prayer is highly provoking to God and is the height of man's rebellion of being independent from God's authority and kingship, that it is a wicked presumption see Ps 50:16] It is allowed, the apostle insists upon it, that the primitive Christians should be sensible that the glory of their gifts belonged to God, and that they made not themselves to differ. But how small a matter is this, if they make themselves to differ in that, which the apostle says is so much more excellent than all gifts! p544

[Next: All the glory of our salvation should go to God! ----]

§ 9. How much more careful has God shown himself, that men should not be proud of their virtue, than of any other gift! See Deut. ix. 4. Luke xviii. 9. and innumerable other places. And the apostle plainly teaches us to ascribe to God the glory, not only of our redemption, but of our wisdom, righteousness, and sanctification; and that no flesh should glory in themselves in these things, 1 Cor. i. 29, 30, 31. Again, the apostle plainly directs, that all that glory in their virtue, should glory in the Lord, 2 Cor. x. 17. It is glorying in virtue and virtuous deeds he is there speaking of; and it is plain, that the apostle uses the expression of glorying in the Lord, in such a sense, as to imply ascribing the glory of our virtue to God. p544

§ 10. The doctrine of men's being the determining causes of their own virtue, teaches them, not to do so much, as even the proud Pharisee did, who thanked God for making him to differ from other men in virtue, Luke xviii.

See Gen. xli. 15, 16. Job xi. 12. Dan. ii. 25., &c. 2 Cor. iii. 5, 6., 2 Cor. iv. 7. 2 Cor. x. 17.

Prov. xx. 12. "The hearing ear, and the seeing eye, the Lord hath made, even both of them;" compared with many parallel places that speak about God's giving eyes to see, and ears to hear, and hearts to understand, &c.

Next: Characteristics of Arminian doctrine:

§ 11. The Arminian doctrine, and the doctrine of our new philosophers, concerning habits of virtue being only by custom, discipline, and gradual culture, joined with the other doctrine, that the obtaining of these habits in those that have time for it, is in every man's power, according to their doctrine of the freedom of will, tends exceedingly to cherish presumption in sinners, while in health and vigour, and tends to their utter despair, in sensible approaches of death by sickness or old age.

Next: On the Spirit of God.... efficacious or not? Common virtue vs true virtue infused...

§.12. Observe that the question with some is, whether the Spirit of God does anything at all in these days, since the Scriptures have been completed. With those that allow that he does anything, the question cannot be, whether his influence be immediate; for, if he does anything at all, his influence must be immediate. Nor can the question be, whether his influence, with regard to what he intends to do, be efficacious.

The questions relating to efficacious grace, controverted between us and the Arminians, are two:

1. Whether the grace of God, in giving us saving virtue, be determining and decisive.

2. Whether saving virtue be decisively given by a supernatural and sovereign operation of the Spirit of God; or, whether it be only by such a divine influence or assistance, as is imparted in the course of common providence, either according to established laws of nature, or established laws of God's universal providence towards mankind; i.e. either,

1. Assistance which is given in all natural actions, wherein men do merely exercise and improve the principles of nature and laws of nature, and come to such attainments as are connected with such exercises by the mere laws of nature. For there is an assistance in all such natural actions; because it is by a divine influence that the laws of nature are upheld; and a constant occurrence of divine power is necessary in order to our living, moving, or having a being. [Hence, for in him we live and move and have our being. Acts 17:28] This we may call a natural assistance. Or, 2. That assistance, which though it be something besides the upholding of the laws of nature, (which take place in all affairs of life,) is yet, by a divine, universal constitution in this particular affair of religion, so connected with those voluntary exercises which result from this mere natural assistance, that by this constitution it indiscriminately extends to all mankind, and is certainly connected with such exercises and improvements, as those just mentioned, by a certain, established, known rule, as much as any of the laws of nature. This kind of assistance, though many Arminians call it a supernatural assistance, differs little or nothing from that natural assistance that is established by a law of nature. The law so established, is only a particular law of nature; as some of the laws of nature are more general, others more particular: but this establishment, which they suppose to be by divine promise, differs nothing at all from many other particular laws of nature, except only in this circumstance, of the established constitutions being revealed in the word of God, while others are left to be discovered only by experience.

The Calvinists suppose otherwise; they suppose that divine influence and operation, by which saving virtue is obtained, is entirely from, and above common assistance, or that which is given in a course of ordinary providence, according to universally established laws of nature. They suppose a principle of saving virtue is immediately imparted and implanted by that operation, which is sovereign and efficacious in this respect, that its effect proceeds not from any established laws of nature. I mention this as an entirely different question from the other, viz. Whether the grace of God, by which we obtain saving virtue, is determining or decisive. For that it may be, if it be given wholly in a course of nature, or by such an operation as is limited and regulated perfectly according to established, invariable laws. For none will dispute that many things are brought to pass by God in this manner, that are decisively ordered by him, and are brought to pass by his determining providence. The controversy, as it relates to efficacious grace, in this sense, includes in it these four questions.

1. Whether saving virtue differs from common virtue, or such virtue as those have that are not in a state of salvation, in nature and kind, or only in degree and circumstances?

2. Whether a holy disposition of heart, as an internal governing principle of life and practice, be immediately implanted or infused in the soul, [see diagram - it show this!] or only be contracted by repeated acts, and obtained by human culture and improvement?

3. Whether conversion, or the change of a person from being a vicious or wicked man, to a truly virtuous character, be instantaneous or gradual!

4. Whether the divine assistance or influence, by which men may obtain true and saving virtue, be sovereign and arbitrary, or, whether God, in giving this assistance and its effects, limits himself to certain exact and stated rules, revealed in his word, and established by his promises?

§ 13. Eph. i. 19, 20. “What is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward, according to the working of his mighty power,” or the effectual working, as the word signifies These words, according to the effectual working of his power, we shall find applied to conversion, to growth in grace, and to raising us up at last. You have them applied to conversion, Eph. iii. 7. “Whereof I was made a minister, according to the gift of the grace of God, given to me, by the effectual working of his power.” So likewise to grow in grace, Eph. iv. 10. “The whole body increaseth with the increase of God, by the effectual working in the measure of every part.” And to the resurrection to glory at the last day, Philip. iii. 21. “He will change our vile bodies, according to the effectual working of his mighty power, whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself.”

And that the power of God in conversion, or in giving faith and the spiritual blessings that attend it, is here meant, may be argued from the apostle’s change of phrase, that whereas in the foregoing verse, he spoke of the riches of the glory of Christ’s inheritance in the saints, he does not go on to say, “and what is the exceeding greatness of his power towards them,” (i. e. the saints,) which surely would have been most natural, if he still had respect only to the power of God in bestowing the inheritance of future glory. But, instead of that, we see he changes the phrase; “and what is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe;” plainly intimating some kind of change of the subject, or a respect to the subject of salvation with regard to something diverse; that whereas before he spoke of saints in their future state only, now he speaks of something that the saints, we that dwell in this world that believe, are the subjects of. And as the apostle includes himself, so it is the more likely he should have the mighty power of God in conversion in his thought; his conversion having been so visible and remarkable an instance of God's marvellous power.

Next: The new way or another way that man has invented....

§ 14. It is a doctrine mightily in vogue, that God has promised his saving grace to men's sincere endeavours in praying for it, and using proper means to obtain it; and so that it is not God's mere will that determines the matter, whether we shall have saving grace or not; but that the matter is left with us, to be determined by the sincerity of our endeavours.

But there is vast confusion in all talk of this kind, for want of its being well explained [so typical - further examination of arguments typifies the "MO" of cults and false teaching] what is meant by sincerity of endeavour, and through men's deceiving themselves by using words without a meaning. I think the Scripture knows of but one sort of sincerity in religion, and that is a truly pious or holy sincerity. The Bible suggests no notion of any other sort of sincere obedience, or any other sincerity of endeavours, or any doings whatsoever in religion, than doing from love to God and true love to our duty. As to those that endeavour and take pains, (let them do ever so much,) that yet do nothing freely, or from any true love to or delight in God, or free inclination to virtue, but wholly for by-ends, and from sinister and mercenary views, as being driven and forced against their inclination, or induced by regard to things foreign; I say, respecting such as these, I find nothing in Scripture that should lead us to call them honest and sincere in their endeavours. I doubt not but that the Scripture promises supernatural, truly divine, and saving blessings, to such a sincerity of endeavour as arises from true love to our duty. But then, as I apprehend, this is only to promise more saving grace to him that seeks it in the exercise of saving grace, agreeably to that repeated saying of our Saviour, "to him that hath shall be given, and he shall have more abundance." Matthew 13:12. [that was a good example of a misapplied scripture] Persons, in seeking grace with this sincerity, ask in faith; they seek these blessings in the exercise of a saving faith, the great condition of the covenant of grace. And I suppose, promises are made to no sincerity, but what implies this. And whoever supposes that divine promises are made to any other sincerity than this, I imagine he never will be able to make out his scheme, and that for two reasons: p545-6

1. On such a supposition, the promises must be supposed to be to an undetermined condition. And,
2. Even on the supposition that the promises are made to some other sincerity than a truly pious sincerity, the sovereign grace and will of God must determine the existence of the condition of the promises; and so the whole must still depend on God's determining grace.

Arminians: the will determines itself to endeavor after holiness! Not God.

And if it be said, that there is no need of supposing any such thing as any previous, habitual sincerity, or any such sincerity going before, as shall be an established principle, but that it is sufficient that the free will does sincerely determine itself to endeavour after holiness [the key Arminian position] I answer, whether we suppose the sincerity that first entitles to the promises, to be a settled habit or established principle, or not, it does not in the least remove the difficulty, as long as it is something, in which some men are distinguished from others, that precedes the distinguishing endeavour which entitles to the promises, and is the source and spring of those endeavours. This first distinguishing sincerity, which is the spring of the whole affair, must have existence by some means or other; and it must proceed either from some previous sincere endeavour of the man's own, which is a contradiction; or from God, which is the point required; or it must be the effect of chance, in other words, of nothing. p 547 an example of twisting scripture:

§ 15. Ephesians ii. 8. "By grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." Mr. Beach observes, "this text does not mean that their faith is so God's gift, as not to be of themselves, as is most evident to any who reads the original." This is certainly a great mistake. What I suppose he means, is, that the relative that, being of the neuter gender, and the word Greek of the feminine, they do not agree together. But if he would translate the Greek relative that thing, viz. the thing last spoken of, all the difficulty vanishes. Vid. Bezn, in loc. Such Scriptures as these, 1 Cor. xv. 10. "Not I, but the grace of God that was with me;" Gal. ii. 20. "Not I, but Christ liveth in me;" proves efficacious grace. The virtuous actions of men that are rewardable, are not left to men's indifference, without divine ordering and efficacy, so as to be possible to fail. They are often in the Scripture the matter of God's promises. How often does God promise reformations! How often does God promise that great revival of religion in the latter days! Dr. Whitby seems to deny any physical influence at all of the Spirit of God, on the will; and allows an influence by moral suasion and moral causes only, p. 344. This is to deny that the Spirit of God does anything at all, except inspiring the prophets, and giving the means of grace, with God's ordination of this in his providence. If God do anything physically, what he does must be efficacious and irresistible. p547 [2Chron. 20:6, ...none is able to withstand you.]

But if it be said, that though God has promised assistance, yet he has not promised the exact degree, as, notwithstanding his promise, he has left himself at liberty to assist some, much more than others, in consequence of the very same endeavour. I answer, that this will prove a giving up of their whole scheme, and will infallibly bring in the Calvinistical notion of sovereign and arbitrary grace; whereby some, with the very same sincerity of endeavour, with the same degree of endeavour, and the same use of means, nay, although all things are exactly equal in both cases, both as to their persons and behaviour; yet one has that success by sovereign grace and God's arbitrary pleasure, that is denied another. If God has left himself no liberty of sovereign grace in giving success to man's endeavours, but his consequent assistance be always tied to such endeavours precisely, then man's success is just as much in his own power, and is in the same way the fruit of his own doings, as the effect and fulfillment of his endeavours to commit adultery or murder; and indeed much more. For his success in those endeavours is not tied to such endeavours, but may be providentially disappointed. Although particular motions follow such and such acts of will, in such a state of body, exactly according to certain laws of nature; yet a man's success in such wickedness is not at all tied to his endeavours by any divine establishment, as the Arminians suppose success is to man's endeavours after conversion.

For the Spirit of God, by assisting in the alleged manner, becomes not the efficient cause of those things, as the Scriptures do certainly represent him. If God be not the proper bestower, author, and efficient cause of virtue, then the greatest benefits flow not from him; are not owing to his goodness; nor have we him to thank for them. p548

§ 20. Arminians argue that God has obliged himself to bestow a holy and saving disposition, on certain conditions, and that what is given in regeneration, is given either for natural men's asking [natural, meaning unsaved], or for the diligent improvement of common grace; because, otherwise, it would not be our fault that we are without it [a common objection of unconditional election by Arminians], nor our virtue that we have it. But if this reasoning is just, the holy qualities obtained by the regenerate, are only the fruits of virtue, not virtues themselves. All the virtue lies in asking, and in the diligent improvement of common grace. [Hence the popularity of saying the sinner's prayer, etc.] p548

“Now take the words of Christ in John 6: “No one comes to me unless my Father draws him.” What does this leave to free choice? He says that everyone needs to hear and learn from the Father himself, and that all must be taught by God. He plainly teaches here, not only that the works and efforts of free choice are fruitless, but that even the message of the gospel itself (which is what this passage is about) is heard in vain unless the Father himself speaks, teaches, and draws inwardly. “No one can come,” he says, “no one”; and thus that power by which a man is able to make some endeavor toward Christ, or in other words, toward the things that pertain to salvation, is asserted to be no power at all.”

Speaking of common grace (God rains on the just and the unjust) vs. special or saving grace (faith) reserved only for the elect.

Yet we must not— for the sake of the kinship and connection between them— overlook the essential difference. This is the special grace that was unknown to the pagans. All pagan religions are self-willed and legalistic. They are all the aftereffects and adulterations of the covenant of works. Human beings here consistently try to bring about their own salvation by purifications, asceticism, penance, sacrifice, law observance, ceremony, and so on. cont.

This is a very strong argument in favor of God's sovereign disposal of his gifts. This is key! Edwards excellently uncovers the absurdity of the Arminian doctrine of free will, liberty etc., confirming the sinful presumptuousness of the sinner's prayer as not the way of salvation.]

Edwards:

Moses speaks of the great moral means [this is the same as moral suasion or reasonings that Arminians say that God uses to try to convince men to decide for Christ and leaving the deciding in the hands of man's so called free will to decide the matter] that God had used with the children of Israel to enlighten them, and convince and persuade them; but of their being yet un-persuaded and unconverted, and gives this as a reason, that God had not given them a heart to perceive, as Deut. xxix. 4. "Yet the Lord hath not given you a heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, unto this day." The Scripture plainly makes a distinction between exhibiting light, or means of instruction and persuasion, and giving eyes to see, circumcising the heart, &c.

§ 51. Why should Christ teach us to pray in the Lord's prayer, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven, Matt. vi. 10." if it is not God's work to bring that effect to pass, and it is left to man's free will, and cannot be otherwise, because otherwise it is no virtue, and none of their obedience, or doing of God's will; and God does what he can oftentimes consistently with man's liberty, and those that enjoy the means he uses, do generally neglect and refuse to do his will? He does so much, that he can well say, what could I have done more? And yet almost all are at the greatest distance from doing his will. See Colos. i. 9, 10.

§ 52. If it be as the Arminians suppose, that all men's virtue is of the determination of their own free will, independent on any prior determining, deciding, and disposing of the event [that is by God's influence]; that it is no part of the ordering of God, whether there be many virtuous or few in the world, whether there shall be much virtue or little, or where it shall be, in what nation, country, or when, or in what generation or age; or whether there shall be any at all: then none of these things belong to God's disposal, and therefore, surely it does not belong to him to promise them. For it does not belong to him to promise in an affair, concerning which he/has not the disposal.

And how can God promise, as he oftentimes does in his word, glorious times, when righteousness shall generally prevail, and his will shall generally be done; and yet that it is not an effect which belongs to him to determine; it is not left to his determination, but to the sovereign, arbitrary determination of others, independently on any determination of him; and therefore surely they ought to be the promisers? For him to promise, who has it not in his hand to dispose and determine, is a great absurdity; and yet God oftentimes in promising, speaks of himself as the sovereign disposer of the matter, using such expressions as abundantly imply it. Isa. lx. 22. "I the Lord do hasten it in its time." Surely this is the language of a promiser, and not merely a predictor. God promises Abraham, that "all the families of the earth shall be blessed in him." God swears Rom. xiv. 11. "every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess." And it is said to be given to Christ, that every nation, &c. should serve and obey him, Dan. vii. After what manner they shall serve and obey him, is abundantly declared in other prophecies, as in Isa. xi. and innumerable others. These are spoken of in the next chapter, as excellent things that God does.

Next, this is superb reasoning!!

§ 53. If God is not the disposing author of virtue [this is that virtue or holiness shone on the diagram that means mainly, love for God], then he is not the giver of it. The very notion of a giver implies a disposing cause of the possession of the benefit. 1 John iv. 4. "Ye are of God, little children, and have overcome them, (i. e. have overcome your spiritual enemies,) because greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world;" that is, plainly, he is stronger, and his strength overcomes. But how can this be a reason, if God does not put forth an overcoming, effectual strength in the case, but leaves it to free will to get the victory, to determine the point in the conflict? pg 554

A Practical Discourse on God's Sovereignty

I like the way Elisha Coles says things; this is on the pernicious consequents of the weak foundation of the sinner's prayer and upon the ignorance of God's sovereignty in election and the limited atonement. How vital Christian knowledge is!

Argument 7. The doctrine of special and peculiar redemption is further confirmed by those perilous consequents which attend the doctrine of general redemption, as it is commonly held forth; for, 1. It seems to reflect on the wisdom of God; as imputing to him such a contrivance for men's salvation, as might be possibly frustrated; which is far from convincing the world that Christ crucified is the wisdom of God. 2. It also seems to tax God with injustice, as not discharging those whose transgressions are answered for by their Surety; or else, that the sufferings of Christ were not sufficient to make a discharge due to them. Or, 3. It insinuates a deficiency of power, or want of good will, to prosecute his design to perfection. 4. It makes men boasters; suspending the virtue and success of all that Christ has done for them, on something to be done by themselves, which he is not the doer of; and consequently, that men are principals in procuring their own salvation; and so Christ shall have but his thousands, in truth his nothing, while freedom of will shall have its ten thousands to cry up the praises of men. This is not "that the Lord alone should be exalted." It would also follow, that those who are saved and gone to heaven, have nothing more of Christ's to glory in, and praise him for, than those who are perished and gone to hell. For, according to the principles of general redemption, he did and doeth for all alike; and no more for one than for another. 6. It makes men presumptuous, and carnally secure. How many have soothed up themselves in their impenitency and hardness of heart, and fenced themselves against the word, on this very supposition, that Christ died for all; and why then should not they look to be saved as well as any other? And so they lean, pretendedly, on the Lord, and transgress; not considering, that those for whom Christ died, he purchased for them a freedom from sin, and not a liberty of sinning; nor impunity, but on terms of faith and repentance. And that the tempter disturbs them not in their rest on such a foundation, may be one reason why men so stiffly adhere to it; and that those of the general principle are so seldom troubled with terrors of conscience.

By a Sweet and Secret Efficacy of God's Power

More on God's Sovereignty in the conversion of Sinner's, man's will, subject to God's will, etc.

The following excerpts from Flavel and Owen show convincingly that God is not in the least dependent upon the creature, but the creature wholly dependent upon God; that God in his infinite power and wisdom, converts the soul from an obstinate unbelieving sinner to a willing servant of Christ without doing any violence to his will - that the sinner's prayer is a fraud of the highest order, pretty much no different than all the other man-invented ways of trying to escape his spiritual prison cell and appease his guilty conscience, all of which leads to a false peace and fatal security. After all that God has done in eternity in his plan of redemption as Owen explains, to think that it all hinges upon man's decision is not only ludicrous but also directly contradicts scripture, and is against all due application of reason.

Vol. 18, Commentary on Hebrews, by John Owen
Federal Transaction Between the Father and the Son

Regarding a valid covenant - Vol. 18 p 82

7. An absolutely complete covenant is a voluntary convention, pact, or agreement, between distinct persons, about the ordering and disposal of things in their power, unto their mutual concern and advantage: —

(1.) Distinct persons are required unto a covenant, for it is a mutual compact. As “a mediator is not of one,” — that is, there must be several parties, and those at variance, or there is no room for the interposition of a mediator, Galatians 3:20, — so a covenant, properly so called, is not of one. In the large sense wherein [Hebrew word] is taken, a man's resolution in himself with respect unto any especial end or purpose may be called his covenant, as Job 31:1, “I made a covenant with mine eyes.” And so God calleth his purpose or decree concerning the orderly course of nature in the instance before given. But a covenant, properly so called, is the convention or agreement of two persons or more.

(2.) This agreement must be voluntary and of choice upon the election of the terms convented about. Hence [Hebrew word] is by some derived from [Hebrew word]; which signifies “to choose” or “elect;” for such choice is the foundation of all solemn covenants. What is properly so is founded on a free election of the terms of it, upon due consideration and a right judgment made of them. Hence, when one people is broken in war or subdued by another, who prescribe terms unto them, which they are forced as it were to accept for the present necessity, it is but an imperfect covenant, and, as things are in the world, not like to be firm or stable. So some legates answered in the senate of Rome when their people were subdued, “Pacem habebitis qualem dederitis; si bonam, firmam et stabilem, sin haud diuturnam.” [Those who are unconverted are at enmity with God and cannot obey or please God, Rom 8:7-8, "for it [the mind] does not subject itself to the law of God, for it is not even able to do so, ⁸ and those who are in the flesh cannot please God." The soul must be willing for it to be a valid covenant! Unconverted people are not willing!! Only if God converts the soul first by the secret efficacy of his power, will they be genuinely willing, and hence the covenant be firm and stable; hence Ps 110:3, "Your people shall be volunteers [or willing] in the day of Your power." So this person doing this prayer is still apart from God, in no such covenant, though he thinks he is. And this is the great danger, a stupid or fatal security ensues which, all things being equal, is next to impossible to overcome as Flavel states. Think about this; how is someone going to react when he thinks he's saved and you tell him he may not be? All the warnings and exhortation to believe or repent will rollover him like water off a duck's back; he'll think they have nothing to do with him, but only for other people. He will not want to examine himself, for that would destroy his peace.]

(3.) The matter of every righteous and complete covenant must be of things in the power of them who convent and agree about them; [this, no unconverted person is able or willing to do] otherwise any, yea the most solemn compact, is vain and ineffectual. [exactly my point] A son or daughter in their father's house, and under his care, making a vow or covenant for the disposal of themselves, can give no force unto it, because they are not in their own power. Hence, when God invites and takes men into the covenant of grace, whereunto belongs a restipulation of faith and obedience, which are not absolutely in their own power, that the covenant may be firm and stable he takes upon himself to enable them thereunto; and the efficacy of his grace unto that purpose is of the nature of the covenant. Hence, when men enter into any compact wherein one party takes on itself the performance of that which the other thinks to be, but is not, really in its power, there is dolus malus [fraud] in it, which enervates and disannuls the covenant itself. And many such compacts were rescinded by the senate and people of Rome, which were made by their generals without their consent; as those with the Gauls who besieged the Capitol, and with the Samnites, at the Furcae Caudinae.

Federal Transaction Between the Father and the Son (or The Covenant of Redemption that entered into in eternity)

10. Again; the transactions before insisted on and declared are proposed to have been by the way of "counsel," for the accomplishment of the end designed in a covenant: Zechariah 6:13, [Hebrew words]. The counsel about peace-making between God and man was "between them both;" that is, the two persons spoken of, — namely, the Lord Jehovah, and he who was to be [Hebrew word], "The Branch." And this was not spoken of him absolutely as he was a man, or was to be a man, for so there was not properly [Hebrew word], or "counsel," between God and him; "for who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor?" Romans 11:34. And, besides, the Son in his human nature was merely the servant of the Father to do his will, Isaiah 42:1. But God takes this counsel with him as he was his eternal Wisdom, only with respect unto his future incarnation; for therein he was to be both the "Branch of the LORD and "the fruit of the earth," Isaiah 4:2. Hereunto regard also is had in his name: Isaiah 9:6, "He shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor;" for these titles, with those that follow, do not absolutely denote properties of the divine nature, though they are such divine titles and attributes as cannot be ascribed unto any but to him who is God; but there is in them a respect unto the work which he had to do as he was to be a "child born" and "a son given" unto us. And on the same account is he called "The everlasting Father," a name not proper unto the person of the Son with mere respect unto his personality. There is, therefore, a regard in it unto the work he had to do, which was to be a father unto all the elect of God. And therein also was he "The Prince of Peace," — he who is the procurer and establisher of peace between God and mankind. On the same account God speaking of him, says that he is ytiymi rbef, yiro, — "My shepherd, and the man my fellow," Zechariah 13:7; such an one as with whom he had sweetened and rejoiced in secret counsel, as Psalm 55:14, according unto what was before declared on Proverbs 8:30, 31.

11. Particularly, the will of the Father and Son concurred in this matter; which was necessary, that the covenant might be voluntary and of choice. And the original of the whole is referred to the will of the Father constantly. Hence our Lord Jesus Christ on all occasions declares solemnly that he came to do the will of the Father: "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God," Psalm 40:6-8; Hebrews 10:5-10; for in this agreement the part of the enjoiner, prescriber, and promiser, whose will in all things is to be attended unto, is on the Father. And his will was naturally at a perfect liberty from engaging in that way of salvation which he accomplished by Christ. He was at liberty to have left all mankind under sin and the curse, as he did all the angels that fell; he was at liberty utterly to have destroyed the race of mankind that sprang from Adam in his fallen estate, either in the root of them, or in the branches when multiplied, as he almost did in the flood, and have created another stock or race of them unto his glory. And hence the acting of his will herein is expressed by grace, — which is free, or it is not grace, [so if you have to ask for it which is the purpose of the sinner's prayer, then grace is no longer grace! and God then is a debtor and not the free giver of it. "Free" meaning that nothing outside Himself moves him to do anything; it is totally of the counsel of his own will, not the result of the will of another! John 1:13, Rom 9:15-16 As Martin Luther said, "No one can give himself faith; it is a gift of God.]— and is said to proceed from love acting by choice; all arguing the highest liberty in the will of the Father, John 3:16; Ephesians 1:6. And the same is further evidenced by the exercise of his authority, both in the commission and commands that he gave unto the Son, as incarnate, for the discharge of the work that he had undertaken; for none puts forth his authority but voluntarily, or by and according unto his own will. Now, he both sent the Son, and sealed him, and gave him commands; which are all acts of choice and liberty, proceeding from sovereignty. Let none, then, once imagine that this work of entering into covenant about the salvation of mankind was any way necessary unto God, or that it was required by virtue of any of the essential properties of his nature, so that he must have done against them in doing otherwise. God was herein absolutely free, as he was also in his making of all things out of nothing. He could have left it undone without the least disadvantage unto his essential glory or contrariety unto his holy nature. Whatever, therefore, we may afterwards assert concerning the necessity of satisfaction to be given unto his justice, upon the supposition of this covenant, yet the entering into this covenant, and consequently all that ensued thereon, is absolutely resolved into the mere will and grace of God.

14. Moreover, a covenant must be about the disposal of things in the power of them that enter into it, otherwise it is null or fraudulent. And thus things may be two ways; — first, Absolutely; secondly, By virtue of some condition or something in the nature of the covenant itself.

marriage, where 108 the several persons engaging are sui juris, — they have an absolute power in themselves to dispose of their own persons with respect unto the ends of marriage. So it is in all covenants. [But in the Sinner's prayer, the sinner is deceived: that he thinks he is willing, loves God, sees his own vileness, when in truth he is still at enmity with God. There are many motives for this prayer all resolved into self-love and not a love for God. Why? Because he hasn't been given a love for God yet!!! This is why this prayer is a huge contradiction, the cart before the horse. Yet it looks and sounds so good; the person seems contrite, humble, emotional, sincere; but it's all a fraud as we see these similar reactions in the parable of the sower, where they receive the word with joy, etc. Fallen man still has an attraction to religion because it's good and tends to quiet conscience, etc., but that does not mean these signs are truly gracious signs. All he wants is what God has, not God or Christ. Calvin writes, he [God] cannot be toughed with repentance, and his heart cannot undergo changes. Confessing the Impassible God, pg 157. Study this subject of impassibility!]

When the things to be disposed of according to the limitations of the covenant are lawful and good antecedently unto any agreement made about them, and because they are in the power of the covenanters, they may be disposed of according to the terms of the compact. So was it in this covenant. To do good unto mankind, to bring them unto the enjoyment of himself, was absolutely in the power of the Father. And it was in the power of the Son to assume human nature, which becoming thereby peculiarly his own, he might dispose of it unto what end he pleased, saving the union which ensued on its assumption, for this was indissoluble. (2.) Again, some things are made lawful or good, or suited unto the glory, honor, or satisfaction and complacency, of them that make the covenant, by virtue of somewhat arising in or from the covenant itself. And of this sort are most of the things that are disposed in the covenant between the Father and the Son under consideration. They become good and desirable, and suited unto their glory and honor, not as considered absolutely and in themselves, but with respect unto that order, dependence, and mutual relation, that they are cast into by and in the covenant.

The "sovereignty of God" is a huge objection by Arminians (and unregenerate people for that matter) over their supposed liberty of their will; that God is not fair in doing what he does as the Potter...

The right, therefore, which God hath to act his righteousness, or to act righteously towards others, is supreme and sovereign, arising naturally and necessarily from the relation of all things unto himself; for hereby, — namely, by their relation unto him as his creatures, — they are all placed in an universal, indispensable, and absolutely unchangeable dependence on him, according to their natures and capacities. The right of God unto rule over us is wholly of another kind and nature than anything is or can be among the sons of men, that which is paternal having the nearest resemblance of it, but it is not of the same kind; for it doth not arise from the benefits we receive from him, nor hath any respect unto our consent, for he rules over the most against their wills, but depends merely on our relation unto him as his creatures, with the nature, order, and condition of our existence, wherein we are placed by his sovereignty. This in him is unavoidably accompanied with a right to act towards us according to the counsel of his will and the rectitude of his nature. The state and condition, I say, of our being and end, with the relation which we have unto him and to his other works, or the order wherein we are set and placed in the universe, being the product or effect of his power, wisdom, will, and goodness, he hath an unchangeable, sovereign right to deal with us and act towards us according to the infinite, eternal rectitude of his nature. And as he hath a right so to do, so he cannot do otherwise. Supposing the state and condition wherein we are made and placed, with the nature of our relation unto and dependence on God, and God can act no otherwise towards us but according to what the essential rectitude of his nature doth direct and require; which is the foundation of what we plead in the case before us concerning the necessity of the priesthood of Christ.

Christ's Kingly Office in Conversion

Now, some comments from John Flavel, in his book,

The Fountain of Life p 133-138,

Christ's kingly office

So, the question arises, if man can't chose Christ savingly while unregenerate via the Sinner's Prayer, how then does one come to Christ, to believe in him? Does God force the issue by doing violence to the will, making him a robot, as Arminians argue? Flavel explains how God does it. This will put to rest this straw-man argument against God's sovereignty and man's responsibility; that they are consistent with one another.

Sermon 16

Of the Kingly Office of Christ, as it is executed spiritually upon the Souls of the Redeemed.

2 Cor. 10: 5.

Casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ.

We now come to the Regal office, by which our glorious Mediator executes and dischargeth the undertaken design of our redemption. Had he not, as our Prophet, opened the way of life and salvation to the children of men, they could never have known it; and if they had clearly known it, except, as their Priest, he had offered up himself, to impetrate and obtain redemption for them, they could not have been redeemed virtually by his blood; and if they had been so redeemed, yet had he not lived in the capacity of a King, to apply this purchase of his blood to them, they would have had no actual, personal benefit by his death; for what he revealed as a Prophet, he purchased as a Priest; and what he so revealed and purchased as a Prophet and Priest, he applies as a King: [\[note this is active; we are passive in our conversion\]](#) first subduing the souls of his elect to his spiritual government; then ruling them as his subjects, and ordering all things in the kingdom of Providence for their good. So that Christ has a twofold kingdom, the one spiritual and internal, by which he subdues and rules the hearts of his people; the other providential and external, whereby he guides, rules, and orders all things in the world, in a blessed subordination to their eternal salvation. I am to speak from this text of his spiritual and internal kingdom.

These words are considered two ways, either relatively or absolutely. Considered relatively, they are a vindication of the apostle from the unjust censures of the Corinthians, who very unworthily, interpreted his gentleness, condescension, and winning affability, to be no better than a fawning upon them for self-ends; and the authority he exercised, no better than pride and imperiousness. But hereby he lets them know, that as Christ needs not, so he never used such carnal artifices: The weapons of our warfare (saith he) are not carnal, but mighty, through God, &c.

Absolutely considered, they hold forth the efficacy of the gospel, in the plainness and simplicity of it, for the subduing of rebellious sinners to Christ: and in them we have these three things to consider,

1. The oppositions made by sinners against the assaults of the gospel, viz. imaginations, or reasonings, as the word "logismous" may be fitly rendered. He means the subtleties, slights, excuses, subterfuges, and arguing of fleshly-minded men; in which they fortify and entrench themselves against the convictions of the word: yea, and there are not only such carnal seasonings, but many proud, high conceits with which poor creatures swell, and scorn to submit to the abasing, humble, self denying way of the gospel. These are the fortifications erected against Christ by the carnal mind.
2. We have here the conquest which the gospel obtains over sinners, thus fortified against it; it casts down and overthrows, and takes in these strong holds. Thus Christ spoils Satan of his armour in which he trusted, by showing the sinner that all this can be no defense to his soul against the wrath of God. But that is not all: in the next place,
3. You have here the improvement of the victory. Christ does not only lead away these enemies spoiled, but brings them into obedience to himself, i.e. makes them, after conversion, subjects of his own kingdom, obedient, useful, and serviceable to himself; and so is more than a conqueror. They do not only lay down their arms, and fight no more against Christ with them; but repair to his camp, and fight for Christ, with those reasons of theirs that were before employed against him: as it is said of Jerome, Origin, and Tertullian, that they came into Canaan, laden with Egyptian gold; i.e. they came into the church full of excellent learning and abilities, with which they eminently served Jesus Christ. "O blessed victory, where the conqueror, and conquered, both triumph together!" And thus enemies and rebels are subdued, and made subjects of the spiritual kingdom of Christ. [and I re-state Edwards' comment on God's power vs. ours:

§ 53. If God is not the disposing author of virtue [this is that virtue or holiness shone on the diagram that means mainly, love for God], then he is not the giver of it. The very notion of a giver implies a disposing cause of the possession of the benefit. 1 John iv. 4. "Ye are of God, little children, and have overcome them, (i. e. have overcome your spiritual enemies,) because greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world;" that is, plainly, he is stronger, and his strength overcomes. But how can this be a reason, if God does not put forth an overcoming, effectual strength in the case, but leaves it to free will to get the victory, to determine the point in the conflict? pg 554

Hence the doctrinal note is,

Doctrine. That Jesus Christ exercises a Kingly power over the souls of all whom the gospel subdues to his obedience.

No sooner were the Colossians delivered out of the power of darkness, but they were immediately translated into the kingdom of Christ, the dear Son, Col. 1: 13.

This kingdom of Christ, which is our present subject, is the internal spiritual kingdom, which is said to be within the saints, Luke 17: 20, 21. "The kingdom of God is within you." Christ sits as an enthroned king in the hearts, consciences, and affections of his willing people, Psal. 110: 3. And his kingdom consists in "righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost," Rom. 14: 17, and it is properly monarchical, as appears in the margin.

In the prosecution of this point, I will speak doctrinally to these three heads.

First, How Christ obtains the throne in the hearts of men.

Secondly, How he rules in it, and by what acts he exercises his kingly authority.

Thirdly, What are the privileges of those souls over whom Christ reigns. And then apply it.

First, We will open the war and manner in which Christ obtains a throne in the hearts of men, and that is by conquest: for though the souls of the elect are his by donation, and right of redemption; the Father gave them to him, and he died for them; yet Satan has the first possession: and so it fares with Christ, as it did with Abraham, to whom God gave the land of Canaan by promise and covenant, but the Canaanites, Perizites, and sons of Anak, had the actual possession of it, and Abraham's posterity must fight for it, and win it by inches, before they enjoy it. The house is conveyed to Christ by him that built it, but the strong man armed keeps the possession of it, till a stronger than he comes and ejects him, Luke 11: 20, 21, 22. Christ must fight his way into the soul, though he have a right to enter, as into his dearly purchased possession. And so he does; for when the time of recovering them is come, he sends forth his armies to subdue them; as it is Ps. 110: 3. "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power." The Hebrew may as fitly be rendered, and so is by some, "in the day of thine armies;" when the Lord Jesus sent forth his armies of prophets, apostles, evangelists, pastors, teachers, under the conduct of his Spirit, armed with that two edged sword, the word of God, which is sharp and powerful, Heb. 4: 12. But that is not all: he causes armies of convictions, and spiritual troubles, to begird and straiten them on every side, so that they know not what to do. These convictions, like a shower of arrows, strike, point blank, into their consciences; Acts 2: 37. "When they heard this, they were pricked to the heart, and said, Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Christ's arrows are sharp in the hearts of his enemies, whereby the people fall under him, Psal. 45: 5, 6. By these convictions he batters down all their loose vain hopes, and levels them with the earth.

Now all their weak pleas and defenses, from the general mercy of God, the example of others, &c. prove but as paper walls to them. i.e., [the covenant that they think they are partakers of by way of the sinner's prayer is not firm and stable] These shake their hearts, even to the very foundation, and overturn every high thought there, that exalts itself against the Lord. This day, in which Christ sits down before the soul, and summons it by such messengers as these, is a day of distress within: yea, such a day of trouble, that none is like it. But though it be so, yet Satan has so deeply entrenched himself in the mind and will, that the soul yields not at the first summons, till its provisions within are spent, and all its towers of pride, and walls of vain confidence, be undermined by the gospel, and shaken down about its ears: and then the soul desires a parley with Christ. O now it would be glad of terms, any terms, if it may but save its life: let all go as a prey to the conqueror.

Now it sends many such messengers as these to Christ, who is come now to the very gates of the soul; mercy, Lord, mercy, O were I but assured thou wouldest receive, spare, and pardon me, I would open to thee the next moment! Thus the soul is shut up to the faith of a Christ, as it is, Gal. 3: 23. and reduced now to the greatest strait and loss imaginable; and now the merciful King, whose only design is to conquer the heart, hangs forth the white flag of mercy before the soul, giving it hopes it shall be spared, pitied, and pardoned, though so long in rebellion against him, if yet it will yield itself to Christ. Many staggering, hesitations, irresolutions, doubts, fears, scruples, half-resolves, reasonings for and against, there are at the council table of man's own heart, at this time. Sometimes there is no hope; Christ will slay me, if I go forth to him, and then it trembles. But then, who ever found him so that tried him? Other souls have yielded, and found mercy beyond all their expectations. O but I have been a desperate enemy against him. Admit it, yet thou hast the word of a King for it; "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him turn to the Lord, and he will have mercy on him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon him", Isa. 55: 7.

But the time of mercy is past, I have stood out too long: yet if it were so, how is it that Christ has not made short work, and cut me off? set fire, hell fire to my soul, and withdrawn the siege? Still he waiteth that he may be gracious, and is exalted that he may have compassion. A thousand such debates there are, till, at last, the soul considering, if it abide in rebellion, it must needs perish; if it go forth to Christ, it can but perish: and being somewhat encouraged by the messages of grace sent into the soul, at this time, such as in Heb. 8: 25. "Wherefore he is able to save to the uttermost, all that come unto God by him;" and, John 6: 37. "He that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out;" and in Matt. 11: 28. "Come unto me all ye that labour, and are heavy laden and I will give you rest." It is, at last, resolved to open to Christ; and saith, "Stand open ye everlasting gates, and be ye opened ye everlasting doors, and the King of glory shall come in." Now, the will spontaneously opens to Christ: that royal fort submits and yields; all the affections open to him. The will brings Christ the keys of all the rooms in the soul. Concerning the triumphant entrance of Christ into the soul, we may say, as the Psalmist rhetorically speaks concerning the triumphant entrance of Israel into Canaan, Psal. 114: 5, 6. "The mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs; what aileth thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? Thou Jordan, that thou wast driven back?" So here, in a like rhetorical triumph, we may say, the mountains and hills skipped like rams, and the fixed and obstinate will, starts from its own basis and centre; the rocky heart rends in twain. A poor soul comes into the world, full of ignorance, pride, self-love, desperate hardness, and fixed resolutions to go on in its way: and, by an hour's discourse, the tide turns, Jordan is driven back. What aileth thee, thou stout will, that thou surrenderest to Christ! thou hard heart, that thou relents, and the waters gush out? And thus the soul is won to Christ; he writes down his terms, and the soul willingly subscribes them. Thus it comes in to Christ by free and hearty submission, desiring nothing more than to come under the government of Christ, for the time to come.

Secondly, Let us see how Christ rules in the souls of such as submit to him. And there are six things in which he exerts his kingly authority over them.

1. He imposes a new law upon them, and enjoins them to be severe and punctual in their obedience to it. The soul was a Belialite before, and could endure no restraint; its lusts gave it laws. "We ourselves were sometimes foolish, disobedient, serving diverse lusts and pleasures," Tit. 3: 3. Whatever the flesh craved, and the sensual appetite whined after, it must have, cost what it would; if damnation were the price of it, it would have it, provided it should not be present pay. Now, it must not be any longer "anomos Theoi, all' ennomos toi Christoi", without law to God; but under law to Christ. Those are the articles of peace which the seal willingly subscribes in the day of its admission to mercy, Mat. 11: 29. "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me." This "Law of the spirit of life which is in Christ Jesus makes them free from the law of sin and death," Rom. 8: 2. Here is much strictness, but no bondage; for the law is not only written in Christ's statute-book, the bible, but copied out by his spirit upon the hearts of his subjects, in correspondent principles; which makes obedience a pleasure, and self-denial easy. [Hence, NOT MADE INTO A ROBOT!] Christ's yoke is lined with love, so that it never galls the necks of his people: 1 John 5: 3. "His commandments are not grievous." The soul that comes under Christ's government, must receive law from Christ; and under law every thought of the heart must come.

2. He rebukes and chastises souls for the violations and transgressions of his law. That is another act of Christ's regal authority: "whom he loves he rebukes and chastens," Heb. 12: 6, 7. These chastisements of Christ are either by the rod of providence upon their bodies, and outward comforts, or upon their spirits and inward comforts. Sometimes his rebukes are smart upon the outward man, 1 Cor. 11: 30. "for this cause, many among you are weakly and sick, and many sleep." They had not that due regard to his body that became them, and he will make their bodies to smart for it. And he had rather their flesh should smart, than their souls should perish. Sometimes he spares their outward, and afflicts their inner man, which is a much smarter rod. He withdraws peace, and takes away joy from the spirits of his people. The hidings of his face are sore rebukes. however, all is for emendation, not for destruction. And it is not the least privilege of Christ's subjects to have a seasonable and sanctified rod to reduce them from the ways of sin: Ps. 23: 3. "Thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me." Others are suffered to go on stubbornly in the way of their own hearts; Christ will not spend a rod upon them for their good, will not call them to account for any of their transgressions, but will reckon with them for all together in hell.

3. Another regal act of Christ, is the restraining and keeping back his servants from iniquity, and withholding them from those courses which their own hearts would incline, and lead them to; for, even in them, there is a spirit bent to backsliding, but the Lord in tenderness over them, keeps back their souls from iniquity, and that when they are upon the very brink of sin: "My feet were almost gone, my steps were well nigh slipt," Psal. 73: 2. Then does the Lord prevent sin, by removing the occasion providentially, or by helping them to resist the temptation, graciously assisting their spirits in the trial, so that no temptation shall befall them, but a way of escape shall be opened, that they may be able to bear it, 1 Cor. 10: 13. And thus his people have frequent occasions to bless his name for his preventing goodness, when they are almost in the midst of all evil. And this I take to be the meaning of Gal. 5: 16. "This, I say then, walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfill the lusts of the flesh;" tempted by them, you may be, but fulfill them ye shall not; my spirit shall cause the temptation to die, and wither away in the womb, in the embryo of it, so that it shall not come to a full birth.

4. He protects them in his ways, and suffers them not to relapse from him into a state of sin, and bondage to Satan and more. Indeed, Satan is restless in his endeavours to reduce them again to his obedience; he never leaves tempting and soliciting for their return; and where he finds a false professor he prevails; but Christ keeps his, that they depart not again. John 17: 12. "All that thou hast given me I have kept, and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition." They are "kept by the mighty power of God, through faith unto salvation," 1 Pet. 1: 5. Kept, as in a garrison, according to the importance of that word. None more solicited, none more safe than the people of God. They are "preserved in Christ Jesus," Jude 1. It is not their own grace that secures them, but Christ's care, and continual watchfulness. "Our own graces left to themselves would quickly prove but weights, sinking us to our own ruin," as one speaks. This is his covenant with them, Jer. 32: 4. "I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me." Thus, as a king he preserves them.

5. As a king he Regards their obedience, and encourages their sincere service. Though all they do for Christ be duty, yet he has united their comfort with their duty; "this I had, because I kept thy precepts," Psal. 119: 56. They are engaged to take this encouragement with them to every duty, that he whom they seek "is a bountiful rewarder of inch as diligently seek him", Heb. 11: 6. O what a good master do the saints serve! Hear how a king expostulates with his subjects, Jer. 2: 31. "Have I been a barren wilderness, or a land of darkness to you?" q. d. Have I been such a hard master to you? Have you any reason to complain of my service? To whomsoever I have been strait-handed, surely I have not been so to you. You have not found the ways or wages of sin like mine.

6. He pacifies all inward troubles, and commands peace when their spirits are tumultuous. This "peace of God rules in their hearts" Col. 3: 15, it does "brabeuein" act the part of an umpire, in appeasing strife within. When the tumultuous affections are up, and in a hurry; when anger, hatred, and revenge begin to rise in the soul, this hushes and stills all. "I will hearken (saith the church) what God the Lord will speak, for he will speak peace to his people, and to his saints," Psal. 75: 8. He that saith to the raging sea, be still, and it obeys him; he can only pacify the disquieted spirit. They say of frogs, that if they be croaking never so much in the night, bring but a light among them, and they are all quiet: such a light is the peace of God among our disordered affections. These are Christ's regal acts. And he puts them forth upon the souls of his people, powerfully, sweetly, suitably. see T Shepard's comments on this at [code11]

(1.) Powerfully: whether he restrains from sin, or impels to duty, he does it with a soul determining efficacy: for "his kingdom is not in word, but in power," 1 Cor. 4: 20. [not in word, that is, not dependent upon what the sinner says or prays to effect his conversion, e.g., his profession, but in power, God's Almighty power that works in those who believe.] And those whom his Spirit leads, go bound in the spirit, to the fulfilling and discharge of their duties, Acts 20:22. And yet,

(2.) He rules not by compulsion, but most sweetly. His law is a law of love, written upon their hearts. The church is the Lamb's wife, Rev. 19: 7. "a bruised reed he shall not break, and smoking flax he shall not quench," Isa. 42: 2, 3. "I beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ," saith the apostle, 2 Cor. 10: 1. For he delighteth in free, not in forced obedience. He rules Children, not slaves; and so his kingly power is mixed with fatherly love. His yoke is not made of iron, but gold. Again, we are not made into robots. See T Shepard's comments on this at [code11]

(3.) He rules them suitably to their natures in a rational way; Hos. 11: 4. "I drew them with the cords of man, with bands of love;" i.e. in a way proper to convince their reason, and work upon their ingenuity. And thus his eternal kingdom is administered by his Spirit, who is his prorex, or vicegerent in our hearts.

A Good Summary of this whole affair:

- Flavel, Fountain of Life p 79:

Yea, and such as you are, the Lord delights to choose, that his grace may be the more conspicuous in your weakness, 1 Cor. 1: 26, 27. You will have nothing of your own to glory in; you will not say, as a proud wretch once said, Ego et Deus meus; "I and my God did this." Jesus Christ affects not social glory, he will not divide the praise with any.

God commands all to repent which is our duty; "though the duty is ours, yet the power is God's"

Jesus has three offices: Priest, Prophet and King. This is part of what he does as king over his church. examine this one. One of the biggest complaints that people have against God's sovereignty in election is that people think he forces Himself upon them, doing violence to the will, turning them into robots. This is a mistaken understanding, a straw-man argument to denigrate or unfairly criticize a most beautiful comforting doctrine. When the heart is changed by the Spirit, it becomes a willing heart.

[all pointing to the fruit of regeneration being a willing heart] Christ's yoke is lined with love, so that it never galls the necks of his people [which is did before he was converted, hence unwilling to come to Christ] 1 John v. 3. "His commandments are not grievous." The soul that comes under Christ's government, must receive law from Christ; and under law every thought of the heart must come.

¹It acts the part of an umpire or judge among the other affections, for this is the meaning of the word βραβεύειν: when therefore, these tumultuous passions, anger, hatred and revenge rise in our hearts, this peace of God ought to do its office, i.e., put an end to these tumults like the judge in ancient games. Daven. in Col.

Flavel regarding the faculty of the will in conversion: View its will, and you shall find it like a queen upon the throne of the soul, swaying the sceptre of liberty in her hand, (as one expresses it) with all the affections waiting and attending upon her. No tyrant can force it, no torment can wrest the golden sceptre of liberty out of its hand; the keys of all the chambers of the soul hang at its girdle, these it delivers to Christ in the day of his power; victorious grace sweetly determines it by gaining its consent, but commits no violence upon it. God accepts its offering; though full of imperfections; but no service is accepted without it, how excellent so ever be the matter of it. (pg 254 The Soul of Man)

Some excerpts from Flavel, Shepard, & Norton on the Holy Spirit who sweetly and irresistibly converts the will.

A people in covenant with God are a willing people; though they cannot serve God perfectly, they serve him willingly. They do not grudge God a little time spent in his worship; they do not hesitate or murmur at sufferings; they will go through a sea and a wilderness, if God call. “Thy people shall be a willing people: Ps 110:3: ‘a people of willingness.’ Heb. This spontaneity and willingness is from the attractive power of God's Spirit: the Spirit does not impellere, force, but trahere [draws], sweetly draws the will²; see Shepard's comments at [code11] and this willingness in religion makes all our services accepted. God does sometimes accept of willingness without the work, but never the work without willingness.

No tyrant can force it, no torment can wrest the golden sceptre of liberty out of its hand; the keys of all the chambers of the soul hang at its girdle, these it delivers to Christ in the day of his power; victorious grace sweetly determines it by gaining its consent, but commits no violence upon it. see T Shepard's comments on this at [code11] God accepts its offering; though full of imperfections; but no service is accepted without it, how excellent so ever be the matter of it. (pg 254 The Soul of Man)

6. He pacifies all inward troubles, and commands peace when their spirits are tumultuous. This “peace of God rules in their hearts” Col. 3: 15. it does “brabeuein” act the part of an umpire, in appeasing strife within. When the tumultuous affections are up, and in a hurry; when anger, hatred, and revenge begin to rise in the soul, this hushes and stills all. “I will hearken (saith the church) what God the Lord will speak, for he will speak peace to his people, and to his saints,” Psal. 75: 8. He that saith to the raging sea, be still, and it obeys him; he can only pacify the disquieted spirit. “They say of frogs, that if they be croaking never so much in the night, bring but a light among them, and they are all quiet: such a light is the peace of God among our disordered affections. These are Christ's regal acts. And he puts them forth upon the souls of his people, powerfully, sweetly, suitably." And, "whether he restrains from sin, or impels to duty, he does it with a soul determining efficacy: for "his kingdom is not in word, but in power," 1 Cor. 4: 20. And, "He rules not by compulsion, but most sweetly. His law is a law of love, written upon their hearts. The church is the Lamb's wife, Rev. 19: 7. "a bruised reed he shall not break, and smoking flax he shall not quench," Isa. 42: 2, 3. "I beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ," saith the apostle, 2 Cor. 10: 1. For he delighteth in free, not in forced obedience." And again, "Conversion denotes the great change itself, which the Spirit causes upon the soul, turning it by a sweet irresistible efficacy from the power of sin and Satan, to God in Christ." Flavel

Very good summary here:

John Flavel: Fourthly, Coming to Christ notes the voluntariness of the soul in its motion to Christ. It is true, there is no coming without the Father's drawing; but that drawing hath nothing of coercion in it; it doth not destroy, but powerfully, and with an overcoming sweetness, persuades the will. It is not forced or driven, but it comes; being made "willing in the day of God's power," Ps. 110:3. [see code443a]

Three things require explication in this point before us.

First, What the drawing of the Father imports.

Secondly, In what manner he draws men to Christ,

Thirdly, How it appears that none can come till they be so drawn.

First, What the drawing of the Father imports. To open this, let it be considered, that drawing is usually distinguished into physical and moral. The former is either by co-action, force, and compulsion; or, by a sweet congruous efficacy upon the will. As to violence and compulsion, it is none of God's way and method, it being both against the nature of the will of man, which cannot be forced, and against the will of Jesus Christ, who loves to reign over a free and willing people, Ps.110:3, "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power." Or, as that word may be rendered, they shall be voluntarinesses, as willing as willingness itself. It is not then by a forcible co-action, but in a moral way of persuasion, that God the Father draws men to Jesus Christ. He draws with the bands of a man, as they are called, Hos. 11:14, i.e., in a way of rational conviction of the mind and conscience, and effectual persuasion of the will. But yet by moral persuasion, we must not understand a simple and bare proposal or tender of Christ and grace, leaving it still at the sinner's choice, whether he will comply with it or no. For though God does not force the will contrary to its nature, yet there is a real internal efficacy implied in this drawing, or an immediate operation of the Spirit upon the heart and will, which, in a way congruous and suitable to its nature, takes away the rebellion and reluctance of it, and of unwilling, makes it willing to come to Christ. And, in this respect, we own a physical, as well as a moral influence of the Spirit in this work; and so scripture expresses it, Eph. i. 19, 20. "That we may know what is the exceeding greatness of his power towards us who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead." Here is much more than a naked proposal made to the will; there is a power as well as a tender; greatness of power; and yet more, the exceeding greatness of his power; and this power hath an actual efficacy ascribed to it, he works upon our hearts and wills according to the working of his mighty power which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead. Thus he fulfils in us all the good pleasure of his will, and the work of faith with power, 2 Thess.1:11. Flavel, pg 69 vol. 2 Ser. 4

And this is that which the schools call gratia efficax, effectual grace; and others victrix delectatio, an overcoming, conquering delight; thus the work is carried on with a most efficacious sweetness. So that the liberty of the will is not infringed, whilst the obstinacy of the will is effectually subdued and over-ruled. For want of this, there are so many almost Christians in the world [brought on much by the presumptuous sinner's prayer, coming to God without being called]; hence are all those vanishing and imperfect works which come to nothing, called in scripture, a morning cloud, an early dew. [That's because they were never called; as Thomas Shepard says, God never spoke one word to them! see John 5:37] Had this mighty power gone forth with the word, they had never vanished or perished like embryos as they do. So then, God draws not only in a moral way, by proposing a suitable object to the will, but also in a physical way, or by immediate powerful influence upon the will; not infringing the liberty of it, but yet infallibly and effectually persuading it to come to Christ. – John Flavel

James Dolezal's work:

Agency, Concurrence and Evil, A Study in Divine Providence

It is a common objection from those of Pelagian and semi-Pelagian conviction that God's universal causal primacy, as has been maintained in the Augustinian tradition, necessarily obliterates the reality of free will and with it all moral culpability. The traditional Augustinian response to this charge is that, far from destroying free will, it is God's primary agency that causes free will to be and move freely. There is no such thing as absolutely independent creaturely agency or operation, any more than there is such a thing as absolutely independent creaturely existence (which in any case is necessary for a creature's operation to commence or continue). And God's moving of the creature's will can no more be a coercive act against its volition than God's making the creature to be is a coercive act against its being. [excellent reasoning!] There just would be no volitional movement in the creature without God concurrently and primarily acting to make it so – no moved mover without an absolute unmoved mover. This is essential to maintaining the order between God as first cause and all second causes. John Norton makes this point clearly, arguing that God's determination of the creature's will offers no violence to it:

Either the will is determined by God in its operation, or else it would follow, either that there were not an essential subordination of the second cause unto the first, that is, of man to God, which were repugnant to the nature of the second cause (it being imperfect and dependent); or that the first Cause were subordinate to the second, which were repugnant to the nature of the first Cause, being perfect and universal.

The will cannot be compelled: to say that which is done willingly is done constrainedly is to affirm a contradiction namely, that which is willing is unwilling. God can determine the will and not prejudice the nature of the will because he is an infinite Cause. God determineth the will suitably and agreeably to its own nature, that is, freely. He so determineth the will as the will determineth itself. God so determineth the will as the first free agent, as that the will determineth itself as a second free agent. The efficacy of God offereth no violence, nor changeth the nature of things, but goverenth them according to their own natures; it reacheth from one end to the other mightily, and sweetly ordereth all things. The external, transient, efficacious motion of God upon the will determineth the will with a real determination: the will so moved, moveth itself with a real and formal determination.

The Communication of God's Glory in the Gospel to the Understanding and Then to the Will (Saving Faith)

By Thomas Shepard, Sound Believer, pg 284

Because as the gospel first reveals Christ to the mind, and then offers him to the will; so faith, which runs parallel with the gospel, first sees Christ, (there the mind, one part of the soul goes out) then receives Christ gladly, (there the other part, the will goes out) and so the whole soul comes to Christ. The gospel comes to all the elect, First, in Great clearness and evidence of the truth of it, 1Thes. 1:5, to which the understanding assents, and is persuaded of; Secondly, In great grace and goodness, surpassing beauty and sweetness, Lam. 3:24, with which the will is drawn, and so the whole soul comes unto Christ. For the gospel is not only true, but glad tidings to all the elect, especially when humbled at God's feet, 1Tim1:15, In whom, says the apostle, Eph. 1:12, 13, you believed, after that ye heard the word of truth, (there is the object of the understanding) the gospel of your salvation, (there is the goodness of it, the object of the will) so that the whole soul is drawn to Christ in the work of faith. He that understands how liberum arbitrium may be in two faculties must not wonder, if one grace be seated in both faculties of the understanding and will; no grace can be completely seated in diverse faculties, but gradually and imperfectly it may; the work of faith is not complete, when the understanding is opened, only to see and wonder at the mysteries of the mercy in the gospel, but when the will adheres and clasps about that infinite and surpassing good it sees, then it is perfected, and not before, John 6:40. And this is the reason why saving faith (as it is called) does not look only to the bare testimony and assent unto it, as human faith does, because in the gospel, not only divine truth is propounded to the mind to assent unto, but an infinite and eternal good is offered to the heart, and will of man to embrace. And thence it is, that it is not sufficient for a Christian to believe God, or to believe Christ, but he must also believe in him, or else he cannot be saved; the object of believing of him being verum, or truth; the object of the second, bonum, or good. Take heed, therefore, a poor, lost sinner, undone in its own eyes forever; not knowing what to do, unless it be to lie down, and lie still at God's feet, as worthy of nothing but hell. What does the Lord now do? The Lord Christ, by his gospel, first lets in a new light [to the understanding], and it sees the Lord Jesus there bleeding before its eyes, and held forth as a propitiation to all that believe, to all that come to him; the mind sees this mystery, this exceeding rich grace and free mercy, and thinks, Happy are they that share in this mercy! [there the communication to the will, that it is good] But will the Lord look upon such a nothing as I? Can such infinite treasures be my portion? The Lord, therefore, calls, and bids him come away and enter into the possession of it.

Hereupon the heart and will come, and rest, and roll themselves upon these bowels, and there rest; thus the whole soul comes, and this, I say again, is faith. Just as it is with the loadstone drawing the iron; who would think that iron should be drawn by it? but there is a secret virtue coming from the stone which draws it, and so it comes and is united to it; so who would think that ever such an iron, heavy, earthy heart should be drawn unto Christ? yet the Lord lets out a secret virtue of truth and sweetness from himself, which draws the soul to Christ, and so it comes. [willingly & gladly, Ps 110:3. Jonathan Edwards describes this communication similarly...communicates the knowledge of God to the faculty of understanding and holiness, love of God to the faculty of the will. John Flavel describes this secret efficacy in converting the soul in similarly as well,]

Philip Schaff says likewise: Religion is not a single, separate sphere of human life, but the divine principle by which the entire man is to be pervaded, refined and made complete, It takes hold of him in his undivided totality, in the center of his personal being: to carry light into his understanding, holiness into his will, and heaven into this heart; and to shed thus the sacred consecration of the new birth, and the glorious liberty of the children of God, over his whole inward and outward life. No form of existence can withstand the renovating power of God's Spirit. There is no rational element that may not be sanctified; no sphere of natural life that may not be glorified. The Effect Before the Cause in Scripture Misunderstood

Sermon 31, Method of Grace,
John Flavel -

First, The miserable state of the unregenerate, represented under the motions of sleep and death: both expressions intending one and the same thing, though with some variety of notion. The Christless and unregenerate world is in a deep sleep; a spirit of slumber, senselessness and security is fallen upon them, though they lie exposed immediately to eternal wrath and misery, ready to drop into hell every moment. Just as a man that is fast asleep in a house on fire, and whilst the consuming flames are round about him, his fancy is sporting itself in some pleasant dream; this is a very lively resemblance of the unregenerate soul. But yet he that sleeps has the principle of life entire in him, though his senses be bound, and the actions of life suspended by sleep. Lest therefore we should think it is only so with the unregenerate, the expression is designedly varied, and those that were said to be asleep, are positively affirmed to be dead, on purpose to inform us that it is not a simple suspension of the acts and exercise, but a total privation of the principle of spiritual life, which is the misery of the unregenerate.

Secondly, We have here the duty of the unregenerate, which is to "awake out of sleep, and arise from the dead." This is their great concernment; no duty in the world is of greater necessity and importance to them. "Strive (saith Christ) to enter in at the strait gate," Luke 13:24. And the order of these duties is very natural. First awake, then arise. Startling and rousing convictions make way for spiritual life; till God awake us by convictions of our misery, we will never be persuaded to arise and move towards Christ for remedy and safety.

Thirdly, But you will say, if unregenerate men be dead men, to what purpose is it to persuade them to arise and stand up. The very exhortation supposes some powers or ability in the unregenerate; else in vain are they commanded to arise. This difficulty is solved in this very text, though the duty is ours, yet the power is God's. God commands that in his word, which only his grace can perform. "Christ shall give thee light." Popish commentators would build the tower of free will upon this scripture, by a very weak argument, drawn from the order wherein these things are here expressed; which is but a very weak foundation to build upon, for it is very usual in scripture to put the effect before, and the cause after, as it is here, so in Isa. 26:19. "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust." But I will not here entangle my discourse with that controversy; that which I aim at is plain in the words, viz.

For example:

God states our duty: "And now, Israel, what does the LORD your God require of you, but to fear the LORD your God, to walk in all his ways, to love him, to serve the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul,¹³ and to keep the commandments and statutes of the LORD, which I am commanding you today for your good?¹⁴ Behold, to the LORD your God belong heaven and the heaven of heavens, the earth with all that is in it.¹⁵ Yet the LORD set his heart in love on your fathers and chose their offspring after them, you above all peoples, as you are this day.¹⁶ Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your heart, and be no longer stubborn.¹⁷ For the LORD your God is God of gods and Lord of lords, the great, the mighty, and the awesome God, who is not partial and takes no bribe." Deut 10:12-17

Then in Deut. 30:6, God says he will do it! "And the LORD your God will circumcise your heart and the heart of your offspring, so that you will love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul, that you may live. see also, Ezek 11:19, Ezek. 36:26 -

Ezek. 11:19, "Then I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within ^[e]them, and take the stony heart out of their flesh,"

Ezek. 36:26, "I will give you a new heart and put a new spirit within you; I will take the heart of stone out of your flesh and give you a heart of flesh."

Also, I might add that in Deut. 10:17, it is stated that God is not partial and takes no bribes. That is, no man can come to God unless he be called; he cannot bribe him with a prayer, e.g., the sinner's prayer, or any other sacrament or way (the arm of the flesh). Nor do any of our efforts incline Him to choose us over someone else, hence he is not partial in that sense, we cannot make him partial to us due our works or prayer in this matter of conversion. It is solely by the will of God, by the counsel of his own will, not by the will of man, John 1:13, etc. This answers to 1Cor. 4:7, "For who makes you differ from another? And what do you have that you did not receive? Now if you did indeed receive it, why do you boast as if you had not received it?"

This commentary by John Piper is an excellent example of the unreasonableness of Arminian theology or the theology of most people - they just don't think things through, and/or are untaught, and end up being very inconsistent with themselves!

IRRESISTIBLE CALL

Anselm clearly believed that God effectually calls all whom He elects to salvation. This summons causes them to believe on Christ. In commenting on John 6:44, Anselm declared that the Father irresistibly moves the sinner to come to faith in Christ. He writes: "As the Father is said to draw by imparting an inclination, so there is nothing improper in asserting that he moves man. For as the Son says of the Father: 'No man cometh to Me except the Father draw him,' he might as well have said, except he move him." Anselm rightly understood that God initiates conversion. Unregenerate men cannot come to Christ until they are drawn by the Father.

In this divine initiative, God gives man a new will to believe. Anselm writes: "Since a man is drawn or moved, by his will, to that which he invariably chooses, it is not improper to say, that God draws or moves him, when he gives him this will. And in this drawing or impelling it is not to be understood that there is any constraint, but a free and grateful clinging to the holy will which has been given." Here Anselm taught that when God calls a sinner to Himself, there is no constraint, meaning undue coercion; when the Holy Spirit works in the heart, the sinner then believes because he wants to do so. No one believes against his will. Rather, God changes the will so that the sinner freely believes.

Likewise, Anselm asserted that God graciously gives grace and faith to man in order to bring about salvation. Without grace, he argued, one can achieve nothing toward salvation. Anselm boldly asserts: "It must all be attributed to grace, because 'it is not of the one who wills, nor of the one who runs, but of God who shows mercy' (Rom. 9:16). For to all, except God alone, it is said: 'What do you have that you have not received? And if you have received it all, why do you boast as though you had not received it?' (1 Cor. 4:7)." Convinced by Scripture, Anselm was clear in his belief that man's salvation is exclusively the result of God's sovereign, saving grace.

The Sovereignty of God and Prayer

by John Piper

<https://www.desiringgod.org/articles/the-sovereignty-of-god-and-prayer>

I am often asked, "If you believe God works all things according to the counsel of his will (Ephesians 1:11), and that his knowledge of all things past, present, and future is infallible, then what is the point of praying that anything happen?” Usually this question is asked in relation to human decisions: “If God has predestined some to be his sons and chosen them before the foundation of the world (Ephesians 1:4–5), then what’s the point in praying for anyone’s conversion?”

The implicit argument here is that if prayer is to be possible at all, people must have the power of self-determination. That is, a person’s decisions must ultimately belong to himself, not God. For otherwise, he is determined by God, and all his decisions are really fixed in God’s eternal counsel. Let’s examine the reasonableness of this argument by reflecting on the example cited above.

God Decides Who Will Be Saved

“Why pray for anyone’s conversion if God has chosen before the foundation of the world who will be his sons?”

A person in need of conversion is “dead in trespasses and sins” (Ephesians 2:1); he is “a slave to sin” (John 8:34; Romans 6:17); the god of this world has blinded his mind that he might not see “the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ” (2 Corinthians 4:4); his heart is hardened against God (Ephesians 4:18) so that he is hostile to God and in rebellion against God’s will (Romans 8:7). “I do not ask God to sit back and wait for my neighbor to decide to change.”

Now, I would like to turn the question back to my questioner: If you insist that this man must have the power of ultimate self-determination, what is the point of praying for him? What do you want God to do for him? You can’t ask that God overcome the man’s rebellion, for rebellion is precisely what the man is now choosing, so that would mean God overcame his choice and took away his power of self-determination. But how can God save this man unless he act so as to change the man’s heart from hard hostility to tender trust?

Will you pray that God enlighten his mind so that he truly see the beauty of Christ and believe? If you pray this, you are in effect asking God no longer to leave the determination of the man’s will in his own power. You are asking God to do something within the man’s mind (or heart) so that he will surely see and believe. That is, you are conceding that the ultimate determination of the man’s decision to trust Christ is God’s, not merely his.

God’s Sovereignty Enables Prayer

It is not the doctrine of God’s sovereignty that thwarts prayer for the conversion of sinners. On the contrary, it is the unbiblical notion of self-determination which would consistently put an end to all prayers for the lost. Prayer is a request that God do something. But the only thing God can do to save a lost sinner is to overcome his resistance to God. If you insist that he retain his self-determination, then you are insisting that he remain without Christ. For “no one can come to [Christ] unless it is granted him by the Father” (John 6:65, 44).

Only the person who rejects human self-determination can consistently pray for God to save the lost. My prayer for unbelievers is that God will do for them what he did for Lydia: He opened her heart so that she gave heed to what Paul said (Acts 16:14). I will pray that God, who once said, “Let there be light!” will by that same creative power shine in their hearts to give “the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ” (2 Corinthians 4:6). I will pray that he will “take out their heart of stone and give them a heart of flesh” (Ezekiel 36:26). I will pray that they be born not of the will of the flesh nor of the will of man but of God (John 1:13). And with all my praying I will try to “be kind to everyone, able to teach, correcting [my] opponents with gentleness,” for “God may perhaps grant them repentance leading to a knowledge of the truth” (2 Timothy 2:24–25).

In short, I do not ask God to sit back and wait for my neighbor to decide to change. I do not suggest to God that he keep his distance lest his beauty become irresistible and violate my neighbor’s power of self-determination. No! I pray that he ravish my unbelieving neighbor with his beauty, that he unshackle the enslaved will, that he make the dead alive and that he suffer no resistance to stop him lest my neighbor perish.

The Relationship Between Prayer and Evangelism

If someone now says, “Okay, granted that a person’s conversion is ultimately determined by God, I still don’t see the point of your prayer. If God chose before the foundation of the world who would be converted, what function does your prayer have?” My answer is that it has a function like that of preaching: How shall the lost believe in whom they have not heard, and how shall they hear without a preacher, and how shall they preach unless they are sent (Romans 10:14–15)? Belief in Christ is a gift of God (John 6:65; 2 Timothy 2:25; Ephesians 2:8), but God has ordained that the means by which men believe on Jesus is through the preaching of men.

It is simply naive to say that if no one spread the gospel, all those predestined to be sons of God would be converted anyway. The reason this is naive is because it overlooks the fact that the preaching of the gospel is just as predestined as is the believing of the gospel: Paul was set apart for his preaching ministry before he was born (Galatians 1:15), as was Jeremiah (Jeremiah 1:5). Therefore, to ask, “If we don’t evangelize, will the elect be saved?” is like asking, “If there is no predestination, will the predestined be saved?”

God knows those who are his, and he will raise up messengers to win them. If someone refuses to be a part of that plan because he dislikes the idea of being tampered with before he was born, then he will be the loser, not God and not the elect. As C.S. Lewis writes, “You will certainly carry out God’s purpose, however you act, but it makes a difference to you whether you serve like Judas or like John” (The Problem of Pain, 111).

God Uses Means

Prayer is like preaching in that it is a human act also. It is a human act that God has ordained and which he delights in because it reflects the dependence of his creatures upon him. He has promised to respond to prayer, and his response is just as contingent upon our prayer as our prayer is in accordance with his will. “And this is the confidence that we have toward him, that if we ask anything according to his will he hears us” (1 John 5:14). When we don’t know how to pray according to God’s will but desire it earnestly, “the Spirit intercedes for the saints according to the will of God” (Romans 8:27).

“Prayer is a human act that God has ordained and which he delights in because it reflects the dependence of his creatures upon him.”

In other words, just as God will see to it that his word is proclaimed as a means to saving the elect, so he will see to it that all those prayers are prayed which he has promised to respond to. I think Paul’s words in Romans 15:18 would apply equally well to his preaching and his praying ministry: “I will not venture to speak of anything except what Christ has accomplished through me to bring the Gentiles to obedience.” Even our prayers are a gift from the one who “[works] in us that which is pleasing in his sight” (Hebrews 13:21). Oh, how grateful we should be that he has chosen us to be employed in this high service! How eager we should be to spend much time in prayer!

“Now take the words of Christ in John 6: “No one comes to me unless my Father draws him.” What does this leave to free choice? He says that everyone needs to hear and learn from the Father himself, and that all must be taught by God. He plainly teaches here, not only that the works and efforts of free choice are fruitless, but that even the message of the gospel itself (which is what this passage is about) is heard in vain unless the Father himself speaks, teaches, and draws inwardly. “No one can come,” he says, “no one”; and thus that power by which a man is able to make some endeavor toward Christ, or in other words, toward the things that pertain to salvation, is asserted to be no power at all.”

The Opening of Lydia's Heart

This is a commentary by John Gill on Acts 16:14, regarding the opening of Lydia's heart, her conversion, and all that attended it. This sheds more light from a different theologian so you can more clearly see God's sovereignty over the wills of men in salvation.

¹⁴ And a certain woman named Lydia, a seller of purple, of the city of Thyatira, which worshipped God, heard us: whose heart the Lord opened, that she attended unto the things which were spoken of Paul.

KJV

¹⁴ One who heard us was a woman named Lydia, from the city of Thyatira, a seller of purple goods, who was a worshiper of God. The Lord opened her heart to pay attention to what was said by Paul. ESV which worshipped God;

the true God, the God of Israel, and not the gods of the Gentiles, among whom she was; which shows, that she was either a Jewish woman, who had knowledge of the one true and living God, or at least a proselytess of the Jewish religion:

heard us;

not alone, but with other women; and at first only externally, and not so as to understand and receive what she heard, until the efficacious grace of God was exerted upon her, signified in the following clause:

whose heart the Lord opened;

which was before shut and barred, with the bars of ignorance, hardness, and unbelief. The heart of a sinner before conversion, is like a house shut up, and wholly in darkness; whatever degree of natural or moral light is in it, there is none in spiritual things; it is empty of the grace of God, of the fear of him, and love to him; it is without proper inhabitants, without God, Christ, and the Spirit; and is the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, who delight in dark and desolate places; it is bolted and barred with unbelief, and walled up, and even petrified and hardened with sin, and is guarded and garrisoned by Satan, and its goods are kept in peace by him: and this had been the case of Lydia; but now the Lord opened her understanding, and put light into it, which was before darkness itself; as to spiritual things; by which she saw her wretched, sinful, and miserable state by nature, the insufficiency of all ways and means, and works, to justify and save her, and the necessity, suitableness, and fulness of grace and salvation by Christ; which was done by the same divine power, that at first created light in darkness: moreover, the Lord wrought upon her affections, and engaged them to divine and spiritual things; creating love in her soul to Christ, to his people, truths and ordinances; which was done by his almighty hand, taking away the stony heart, and giving an heart of flesh: he also removed the bar of unbelief, entered in himself, dispossessed Satan, and worked faith in her, to look to him, lay hold on him, and receive him, as her Saviour and Redeemer; making her willing in the day of his power, to be saved by him, and to serve him: it is a petition the Jews frequently make ^{F24}, in their prayers to God, (yabl xtptd), "that thou wouldst open my heart", in thy law; or as sometimes, open our hearts in the doctrine of thy law: not Lydia herself, nor the Apostle Paul, but the Lord opened her heart; Jehovah the Father, who commanded light out of darkness; Jehovah the Son, who has the key of the house of David; Jehovah the Spirit, who convinces of sin, righteousness, and judgment:

that she attended unto the things which were spoken of Paul; concerning the person and offices of Christ, concerning his truths and ordinances, concerning free justification by his righteousness, pardon by his blood, and everlasting salvation by him; these things she hearkened unto in another manner than she had done; before she heard, but did not attend to what she heard; but faith coming by hearing, now she hears with the hearing of faith, and understands what she hears, and cordially receives and embraces it, and put into practice what she heard, submitting to the ordinance of Christ, as follows.

Defaulting Wills

Steven J Lawson
Foundations of Grace p 322

7. Deficient Intellects. The unconverted person has a total inability to comprehend the spiritual truth of God. This spiritual ignorance renders him completely unable to grasp the divine standard of righteousness:

It is written: "None is righteous, no, not one; no one understands." (Rom. 3:10–11a)

The mind of the unregenerate man is completely helpless to deal with the truth. Plagued by this mental inability, he fails to grasp the most basic truths of God. He is utterly oblivious to the person and work of Christ, and to his own need for salvation. William Hendriksen writes, "The picture he draws is dismal: no one is righteous; in fact, no one understands his deplorable condition. And no one is even trying to understand, is even searching for God, the Source of all wisdom and knowledge. But are there no exceptions? Paul answers, 'There is no one.'" Boice adds, "We need to view this as a lack of spiritual perception and not merely a lack of human knowledge. If we think on the human level, comparing the 'understanding' of one person with that of another, we will observe rightly that some people obviously understand a great deal about our world. And since we are impressed by that, we will be misled. We need to see that in spiritual matters the important thing is that no one truly understands God or seeks to know Him." Radical depravity renders man mentally incompetent in spiritual things. . (Also, a moral inability paralyzes him. He is utterly unable to see, to hear, or choose the truth. When the truth of the gospel is presented, it is sheer foolishness to him. P 353)

8. Defaulting Wills. The unsaved refuse to seek for God. Instead, they follow their natural tendency to run after their own interests:

No one seeks for God. All have turned aside; together they have become worthless; no one does good, not even one. (Rom. 3:11b–12)

Quoting Psalms 14:2–3 and 53:2–3, Paul states that no unregenerate person ever pursues God. This is because sinful man's natural inclination is to run from Him. All of the unregenerate have "turned aside," a term picturing a soldier who has deserted his post. In like manner, all unconverted men are bent on deserting God. MacArthur writes, "Men are naturally wayward.... The person who is naturally evil, naturally ignorant of God's truth, and naturally rebellious against God will inevitably naturally live apart from God's will." Radical depravity leaves man completely rebellious.

"As a result, fallen man is incapable of contributing any spiritual good to his salvation. He cannot please God. He will not seek God. And he refuses to believe upon Christ." pg 317

excerpts from Flavel & Edwards
(see also code457 on moral inability)

Secondly, It is an argument of the excellency of the Christian religion, and that even wicked men themselves covet the name and profession of it, though they only cloak and cover their evils under it. I confess it is a great abuse of such an excellent thing as religion is; but yet, if it had not an awful reverence paid it by the consciences of all men, it would never be abused to this purpose, by hypocrites, as it is. Flavel, Sermon 30 p 416

On this foundation, that unregenerate man being attracted by different motives, tries to come to God by his own industry, by his own will, in recommending himself to God, attempting to make himself respectable to God when the scripture says explicitly that God is no respecter of persons on their own account (for who makes you to differ from another? 1Cor4:7) nor is there any partiality with God, but only upon God's account or upon his will only, by the counsel of his own will, him being the potter, etc., "that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works but of Him who calls" Romans 9:11, so that the only way of salvation is by effectual vocation. That is, God will not respect our counsel from us, to him, to save us. We do not make us to differ from another, God does.

The implicit understanding of God's command to repent and believe is that man, of himself, cannot repent unless the Spirit works it! For if man has it already in himself to repent and believe, the command to do so is to know purpose in that Man would do it without commands since it would be in his nature to do it on his own, as Edwards points out here in his discourse on Freedom of the Will:

<http://www.ccel.org/ccel/edwards/works1.iii.iv.iv.html> pg 50

III. Though the opposition of the Will itself, or the very want of Will to a thing commanded, implies a moral Inability to that thing; yet, if it be, as has been already shown, that the being of a good state or act of Will, is a thing most properly required by Command; then, in some cases, such a state or act of Will may properly be required, which at present is not, and which may also be wanting after it is commanded. And therefore those things may properly be commanded, for which men have a moral Inability.

Such a state or act of the Will, may be required by Command, as does not already exist. For if that volition only may be commanded to be, which already is, there could be no use of precept: Commands in all cases would be perfectly vain and impertinent. And not only may such a Will be required, as is wanting before the Command is given, but also such as may possibly be wanting afterwards; such as the exhibition of the Command may not be effectual to produce or excite. Otherwise, no such thing as disobedience to a proper and rightful Command is possible in any case; and there is no case possible, wherein there can be a faulty disobedience. Which Arminians cannot affirm, consistently with their principle: for this makes obedience to just and proper Commands always necessary, and disobedience impossible. And so the Arminian would overthrow himself, yielding the very point we are upon, which he so strenuously denies, namely, that Law and Command are consistent with necessity.

If merely that inability will excuse disobedience, which is implied in the opposition or defect of inclination, remaining after the Command is exhibited, then wickedness always carries that in it which excuses it. By how much the more wickedness there is in a man's heart, by so much is his inclination to evil the stronger, and by so much the more, therefore, has he of moral Inability to the good required. His moral Inability consisting in the strength of his evil inclination, is the very thing wherein his wickedness consists; and yet, according to Arminian principles, it must be a thing inconsistent with wickedness; and by how much the more he has of it, by so much is he the further from wickedness.

Therefore, on the whole, it is manifest, that moral Inability alone (which consists in disinclination) never renders anything improperly the subject matter of Precept or Command, and never can excuse any person in disobedience, or want of conformity to a command.

Notes on the Federal Transaction of God

in reference to Fallen Man's Presumption

When God saves someone or converts him, it is properly a federal transaction; that is, it is God acting as federal head making a covenant with men, translating you from the kingdom of darkness out from under the curse, out from under Adam as your federal head, into the kingdom of light, of his dear Son, united to Christ, so that Christ is now your federal head, and you part of his body. You have nothing to do with this initial act of God in the disposal of his saving grace; you are entirely passive in it; God is active. First, you are bound by sin, dead in sin, blind, captive of Satan, etc.; you also have no theological principle upon which to please God, though from natural principles, self-love, etc., and not from a love for God or a spiritual sight of Christ, you may try by praying a prayer which is wholly presumption, and most wicked at that. Subsequent to conversion, however, Christians are active, seeking God, praying to God, etc., because they are endowed with faith, infused with a new living principle of life, the new man or the new creation. You see, it is this God who creates something out of nothing to magnify his glory to the uttermost; he calls things that aren't a thought they were; as it is written, "I have made you the father of many nations"—in the presence of the God in whom he believed, who gives life to the dead and calls into existence the things that do not exist. Rom. 4:17¹. In the case of a sinner, there is nothing in him that can recommend him to God in this sense; so God creates in him a new heart and so it is called a new creation. Can a sinner create this from which his prayer must flow? That would be preposterous and rob God of all this glory of his grace. Though God commands, Make you a new heart or circumcise your heart, it is God who actually does it; the power is of God (compare Deut 10:16 with ver. 30:6). For a unregenerate sinner to try to come to God by any means other than that is sinning with very high hand toward God, highly provoking to Him, not to mention the many pernicious consequents, though it may seem sincere outwardly.

(As it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations,) before him whom he believed, even God, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were.. Romans 4:17 calleth those things which be not, as though they were;

so he called Abraham the father of many nations, when he was not in fact, as if he really was; and the Gentiles his seed and offspring, before they were; and when he comes effectually to call them by his grace, they are represented as "things which are not", whom he called, "to bring to nought things that are", (1 Corinthians 1:28) ; they were not his people, nor his children, and he called them so, and by his grace made them so, and made them appear to be so; for as in creation so in regeneration, God calls and brings that into being which before was not: and the phrase seems to be an allusion to the creation of all things out of nothing; and it is a Rabbinical one, for so the Jews speaking of the creation say ^{F19}

“(Nya la arwq) , "he calls to that which is not", and it is excluded; (i.e. all things are excluded out of it, as a chicken out of an egg;) and to that which is, and it is established, and to the world, and it is stretched out."

Adam's Presumption of Eating of the Fruit of the Tree of Life

code206

Similar to Man's Presumption of the Sinner's Prayer
G. Clark

Adam was told not to eat of the fruit of the tree of life, an added precept to the law of his creation. He was under the law of works, that upon his perfect obedience to this law, he would be granted or rewarded with eternal life. But he disobeyed and ate of it, a gross presumption, before it was lawfully granted to him, which it would have been had he kept the law perfectly. Now, man in his fallen state, makes a similar move by trying to attain eternal life in the same presumptive manner (apart from Gods' prescribed way (by faith, the condition of the new covenant) by coming to God, attaining righteousness some other way e.g., the sinners prayer, whereby presumptuously, he imagines by some fancy in his mind, taking that fruit from the tree of life, i.e., Christ, before he is lawfully called! or before God has truly bestowed the real perfect obedience in the new testament sense, the imputed righteousness of Christ. In the new covenant, it is only attained by effectual vocation, by the communication (imputation) of Christ's righteousness, that perfect righteousness attained by Christ's perfect obedience to the law in our place, by which man is made righteous in the sight of God, and then and only then does he have a claim to an interest in Christ, to eat of the fruit of the tree of life, so to speak. So man in his fallen condition, trying to acquire an interest in Christ by some other way, whether it be works or some prayer, or sacrament, attempts to do the same thing Adam did in eating of the fruit before he was duly made righteous according to the covenant God made with him, which was his sin, sin of presumption, act of rebellion, call it what you will.

And as I read Coxe's discourse on Adam and the Covenant that God made with him, which Adam broke by eating of the fruit of the Tree of Life, fallen man, Adam's cursed posterity, is trying by his own industry, to recover his forfeited happiness in a similar fashion, as Coxe states, "He", [fallen man] "*entertained an opinion (that vain man is on any pretence ready to nourish in himself) of his yet being capable of recovering his forfeited happiness this way, or by any other works of his own. The words teach us what was the use and end for which this tree was first designed, as well as that Adam was not ignorant of these. Yet now he was to be taught the utter impossibility of obtaining life by a broken covenant through the guarding and prohibiting of all access to that tree by the cherubim's flaming sword that turned every way to keep the way of the tree of life." p 46 *Covenant Theology

As it was a wicked presumption on Adam's part, so it is here on the part of the unregenerate. As Owen has said, the only way of salvation is by effectual vocation.

For more insight into this conclusion regarding unregenerate man's presumptuous attempt to come to God, we go to Nehemiah Coxe's comments on covenants, page 34 of his book, Covenant Theology.

God's Covenant Proposed to Men and their Response

2. Seeing that those transactions of God with men which we will meet in this inquiry are of a federal nature, it will be required first that something be said about covenant relationships to God in general.

The original words by which the making, striking, or entering into covenant are signified, with their various uses and applications to particular cases and occasions, have been fully explained by man. Therefore passing by that, it will be enough for our present purpose to remind you that a covenant is to be considered either simply as proposed by God or as man enters into it by restipulation⁴ (⁴The Oxford English Dictionary indicates this rare word carries the sense "to promise or engage in return, a counter-engagement" ...) [in other words, both parties must be willing for the covenant to be valid.]

1. Whatever is transacted in a federal way between God and men, God has the first hand in it. As Christ said to his disciples in another cases, they had not chosen him but he had chosen them. So we may say that man has not at any time entered into covenant with God but God has entered into covenant with man. It only belongs to his sovereign majesty and is the fruit of his infinite goodness to propose, as well as his wisdom to choose and order, the terms of a covenant relationship between himself and his creatures. Therefore, the covenant that has made with men is frequently in Scripture said to be the Lord's covenant, as in Psalm 25:14, Isaiah 56:4,6 and other places.

2. Nevertheless, a covenant relationship to God and interest in him does not immediately result from the proposal of a covenant and terms of a covenant relationship to man. But it is by restipulation that man actually enters into covenant with God and becomes an interested party in the covenant. It is a mutual consent of the parties in covenant that states and completes a covenant relationship. And this is called an avouching of the Lord to be their God by consent to the terms of a covenant proposed to them (Deut. 26:6-18); a subscribing with the hand to the Lord (Isa. 44:5); and taking hold of his covenant (Isa. 56:4,6). The formal notion of a covenant entered or made includes mutual engagement.

3. Yet there can be no covenant of mutual benefits between God and men as there may be between one man and another. For all creatures necessarily depend on and have both their being and well-being from the bounty of their Creator. There is nothing that they have not received from him and therefore the most perfect of them can render nothing to him but what is due by the law of their creation. None can be profitable to God (Job 35:7,8; Rom 11:35,36) though he that is righteous may be so both to himself and his neighbor. And therefore none can oblige God or make him their debtor unless he condescends to oblige himself by covenant or promise.

The General Notion of a Covenant and Its Inferences

3. The general notion of any covenant of God with men, considered on the part of God or as proposed by him, may be conceived of as "A declaration of his sovereign pleasure concerning the benefits he will bestow on them, the communion they will have with him, and the way and means by which this will be enjoyed by them." [the presumptuous nature of the sinner's prayer argues the opposite position, that man acting as a sovereign being (the role of a potter) which he is not, makes a covenant with God and God must respond by saving him, making God dependent upon the creature!]

For the better understanding of what I intend by this general description, I will briefly propose some particulars that are either included in it or are the immediate and necessary consequences of it.

1. It implies a free and sovereign act of the divine will exerted in condescending love and goodness. It is not from any necessity of nature that God enters into covenant with men but of his own good pleasure. [i.e., not from a common affection of love, but by an act of his will - John Owen] such a privilege and nearness to God as is included in covenant interest cannot immediately result from the relationship which they have to God as reasonable creatures, though upright and in a perfect state. For the Lord does not owe to man the good promised in any covenant he makes with him previously; but his first right in it is freely given to him by the promise of the covenant.

1. Once people have fallen under the guilt of breaching the covenant, they are by their own failure utterly disabled from yielding any acceptable obedience to God on the terms of that covenant which they have violated. Their interest in that covenant relationship is forfeited and lost by them. They remain under the penal sanction of the covenant but are utterly deprived of strength to answer the ends of that covenant, and have wholly lost their right in its reward.

2. If they are without strength with respect to the condition and end of that covenant which they once had an interest in and principles suited to, then are they so much more without strength, while they remain in their lapsed state, with respect to the terms of another covenant more excellent and mysterious, and wholly supernatural in its doctrine and terms.

3. Therefore, spiritual strength and ability to please God cannot in any way be restored to them except by a new covenant interest and that new creation which is its adjunct.

God's Covenant Always Transacted with a Representative Head

5. This is also worthy to be noted by us: that when God has made covenants, in which either mankind in general or some select number of men in particular have been involved, it has pleased him first to transact with some public person, head, or representative for all others that should be involved in them. So it was in the covenant of creation which God made with Adam in his upright state and with all mankind in him. And the same is to be observed in the Noahic covenant as also in the covenants with Abraham considered either as the father of believers or of the Israelite nation. In the interest of a spiritual relationship to him, believers claim the blessings of the covenant of grace that was made with him. And in the interest of a natural relationship to him, his offspring according to the flesh claimed the rights and privileges of that covenant of peculiarity which was first made with him as the head of that separate people. But more eminently, the covenant of grace is established in Christ as its head. All its promises were first given to him and in him they are all yes and amen. It is by union to him that believers obtain a new covenant interest and from him they derive a new life, grace, and strength to answer the ends of the new covenant.

General Directions to Rightly Understand Covenant Transactions

6. Now it is evident from what has already been said, that all federal transactions of God with men flow only from his good pleasure and the counsel of his will. [not from the will of man! John 1:13, etc.] So that ground it is certainly to be concluded that our knowledge and understanding of them must wholly depend on divine revelation. No one can pretend acquaintance with the secret of God except as he has been please to reveal it in his work. This light must guide all our inquiries after it. Our sentiments in things of this nature must be strictly governed by this rule, seeing the nature of them is such as transcends the common principles of reason or natural light. This is so since they owe their origin to the free acts of the divine will and wisdom, which are unaccountable until revealed by God himself. Therefore it becomes us to captivate all our thoughts of them to the obedience of faith, knowing that learning and strength of parts (though of excellent use in their place) not guided by Scripture light in these inquiries can only form an ingenious error and lose a man in the labyrinth of his own imagination and uncertain guesses. The simple advantage of those aids (in this case trusted to and stretched beyond their limit) can reach no further than to enable him cum ratione errare (to ere with reason) and so to wander from truth in a path seemingly more smooth but no less dangerous than others light upon.

In these things lies the spring of most mistakes and corruptions of doctrine and practice in matters of religion. Men easily find out and agree in the true dictates of the law of nature but in things pertaining to the covenants of God, how varied are their sentiments! Yes, many great, learned, and good men have been divided in their judgments about some things of great importance to the faith and edification of the church thought no absolutely necessary to her being. One error admitted about the nature of God's federal transactions with men strangely perplexes the whole system of body of divinity and entangles our interpretation of innumerable texts of Scripture. By this means jars and contentions have been perpetuated in the church to the great grief and hindrance of all, the offence of the weak, and the greater scandal of the blind world. All this has often occurred through the lack of due and humble attention to that revelation of truth which God has given us in the holy Scriptures, and endeavoring to collect the mind of God from there without a preconceived judgment, and a careful avoiding of the undue mixture or confusion of things natural with those that are purely of a federal nature.

The covenant of God is his secret and only he can make us know it. And yet our faith, practice, comfort, and holiness are closely concerned in a good acquaintance with it; so we need no other motive to a diligent and humble search of the Scriptures of the right informing of our judgment about it. Nor do we need any other caution against attributing too much to our own wisdom or abilities. Rather we must manage all our inquiries with earnest prayer to God for that Holy Spirit of light and truth, who only can lead us into all this truth and bring us to a clear acquaintance of the mind of God concerning it.

pg 53 regarding man's sinful condition, moral inability to come to God (to believe, etc.)

In this condition man was altogether helpless and without strength, being utterly disabled to stand before God on terms of a covenant of works, [of which fallen man is in still, while praying the sinner's prayer, still under the curse, etc., under law...] and incapable to bring himself on other terms. For he was not able to move one step toward a reconciliation with God or the ransoming of himself out of these miseries. The door of repentance was not opened to him by the covenant of creation, or if it had, there was now in him neither power nor will to enter in there [Rom 8:7-8]. He was utterly disabled from obeying God acceptable on any terms until made a new creature. [until faith bestowed, Heb 11:6, "But without faith it is impossible to please Him,"

pg 69-70 Sermon IV
John Flavel, Method of Grace

Doctrine. That it is utterly impossible for any man to come to Jesus Christ, unless he be drawn unto him by the special and mighty power of God.

No man is compelled to come to Christ against his will, he that cometh, comes willingly, but even that will and desire to come is the effect of grace, Phil. ii. 13. "It is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do of his own good pleasure." If we desire the help and assistance of grace, (saith Fulgentius) even the desire is of grace; grace must first be shed forth upon us, before we can begin to desire it." "By grace are ye saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God," Eph. ii. 8. Suppose the utmost degree of natural ability; let a man be as much disposed and prepared as nature can dispose or prepare him, and to all this, add the proposal of the greatest arguments and motives to induce him to come; let all these have the advantage of the fittest season to work upon his heart; yet no man can come till God draw him; we move as we are moved; as Christ's coming to us, so our coming to him are the pure effects of grace.

Three things require explication in this point before us.

First, What the drawing of the Father imports.

Secondly, In what manner he draws men to Christ,

Thirdly, How it appears that none can come till they be so drawn.

First, What the drawing of the Father imports. To open this, let it be considered, that drawing is usually distinguished into physical and moral. The former is either by co-action, force, and compulsion ; or, by a sweet congruous efficacy upon the will. As to violence and compulsion, it is none of God's way and method, it being both against the nature of the will of man, which cannot be forced, and against the will of Jesus Christ, who loves to reign over a free and willing people, Ps.110:3, "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power." Or, as that word may be rendered, they shall be voluntarinesses, as willing as willingness itself. It is not then by a forcible co-action, but in a moral way of persuasion, that God the Father draws men to Jesus Christ. He draws with the bands of a man, as they are called, Hos. 11:14, i.e., in a way of rational conviction of the mind and conscience, and effectual persuasion of the will. But yet by moral persuasion, we must not understand a simple and bare proposal or tender of Christ and grace, leaving it still at the sinner's choice, whether he will comply with it or no. For though God does not force the will contrary to its nature, yet there is a real internal efficacy implied in this drawing, or an immediate operation of the Spirit upon the heart and will, which, in a way congruous and suitable to its nature, takes away the rebellion and reluctance of it, and of unwilling, makes it willing to come to Christ. And, in this respect, we own a physical, as well as a moral influence of the Spirit in this work ; and so scripture expresses it, Eph. i. 19, 20. "That we may know what is the exceeding greatness of his power towards us who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead." Here is much more than a naked proposal made to the will; there is a power as well as a tender; greatness of power ; and yet more, the exceeding greatness of his power; and this power hath an actual efficacy ascribed to it, he works upon our hearts and wills according to the working of his mighty power which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead. Thus he fulfils in us all the good pleasure of his will, and the work of faith with power, 2 Thess.1:11. Flavel, pg 69 vol. 2 Ser. 4

And this is that which the schools call gratia efficax, effectual grace; and others victrix delectatio, an overcoming, conquering delight; thus the work is carried on with a most efficacious sweetness. So that the liberty of the will is not infringed, whilst the obstinacy of the will is effectually subdued and over-ruled. For want of this, there are so many almost Christians in the world [brought on much by the presumptuous sinner's prayer, coming to God without being called]; hence are all those vanishing and imperfect works which come to nothing, called in scripture, a morning cloud, an early dew. [That's because they were never called; as Thomas Shepard says, God never spoke one word to them! see John 5:37] Had this mighty power gone forth with the word, they had never vanished or perished like embryos as they do. So then, God draws not only in a moral way, by proposing a suitable object to the will, but also in a physical way, or by immediate powerful influence upon the will; not infringing the liberty of it, but yet infallibly and effectually persuading it to come to Christ.

The Secret Almighty Power of the Holy Spirit in Converting the Soul

Prop. 6. The application of Christ, by the work of regeneration is that which yields unto men all the sensible sweetness and refreshing comforts that they have in Christ, and in all that he hath done, suffered, or purchased for sinners.

An unsanctified person may relish the natural sweetness of the creature, as well as he that is sanctified; he may also seem to relish and taste some sweetness in the delicious promise and discoveries of the gospel, by a misapplication of them to himself. But this is like the joy of a beggar, dreaming he is a king; but he awakes and finds himself a beggar still; but for the rational, solid, and genuine delights and comforts of religion, no man tastes them, till this work of the Spirit hath first passed upon his soul; it is an enclosed pleasure, a stranger intermeddles not with it. "The white stone, and the new name," (denoting the pleasant results and fruits of justification and adoption) "no man knows but he that receives it," Rev. ii. 7. There are all those things wanting in the unsanctified (though elect) soul, that should capacitate and enable it to relish the sweetness of Christ and religion, namely, propriety, evidence, and suitableness of spirit. Propriety is the sweetest part of any excellency; therefore Luther was wont to say, that the sweetness of the gospel lay mostly in pronouns, as me, my, thy, &c. who loved [me] and gave himself for me, Gal 2:20. Christ Jesus [my] Lord, Phil. 3:18. So Matt, 9:2. Son, be of good cheer, [thy] sins are forgiven. Take away propriety, and you deflower the very gospel of its beauty and deliciousness; and as propriety, so evidence is requisite to joy and comfort; yea, so necessary, that even interest and propriety afford no sensible sweetness without it. For as to comfort, it is all one not to appear, and not to be. If I am registered in the book of life, and know it not, what comfort can my name there afford me? Besides, to capacitate a soul for the sweetness and comfort of Christ there is also an agreeable temper of spirit required; for how can Christ be sweet to that man's soul, whose thoughts reluctate, decline, or nauseate so holy and pure an object? Now, all these requisites being the proper effects and fruits of the Spirit's sanctifying operations upon us, it is beyond controversy, that the consolations of Christ cannot be tasted, until the application of Christ be first made. John Flavel, Sermon 1, Method of Grace

Proposition 1. The application of Christ to us, is not only comprehensive of our justification, but of all those works of the Spirit which are known to us in scripture by the names of regeneration, vocation, sanctification, and conversion. [blake]

Though all these terms have some small respective differences among themselves, yet they are all included in this general, the applying and putting on of Christ, Rom. xiii. 14. "Put ye on the "Lord Jesus Christ." Regeneration expresses those supernatural, divine, new qualities, infused by the Spirit into the soul, which are the principles of all holy actions. Vocation expresses the terms from which, and to which, the soul moves, when the Spirit works savingly upon it, under the gospel call. Sanctification notes an holy dedication of heart and life to God. Our becoming the temples of the living God, separate from all profane sinful practices, to the Lord's only use and service.

Conversion denotes the great change itself, which the Spirit causeth upon the soul, turning it by a sweet irresistible efficacy from the power of sin and Satan, to God in Christ. Now all these are imported in, and done by the application of Christ to our souls; for when once the efficacy of Christ's death, and the virtue of his resurrection, come to take place upon the heart of any man, he cannot but turn from sin to God, and become a new creature, living and acting by new principles and rules. So the apostle observes, 1 Thess. 1:5, 6. speaking of the effect of this work of the Spirit upon that people, "Our gospel (saith he) came "not to you in word only, but in power; and in the Holy Ghost;" There was the effectual application of Christ to them. "And you became followers of us, and of the Lord," ver. 6. there was their effectual call. "And ye turned from dumb idols to serve the living and true God," ver. 9. there was their conversion. "So that ye were ensamples to all that believe," ver. 9. there was their life of sanctification or dedication to God. So that all these are comprehended in effectual application. John Flavel, vol. Method of Grace, p 19

of the Holy Spirit in Converting the Soul*

John vi. 44. "No man can come to me, except the Father, which hath sent me to draw him."

[No Man], not one, let his natural qualifications be what they will, let his external advantages, in respect of means and helps, be never so great; it is not in the power of any man; all persons, in all ages, need the same power of God, one as well as another; every man is alike dead, impotent, and averse to faith in his natural capacity. No man, or—not one, among all the sons of men [Can], or is able; he speaks of impotency to special and saving actions, such as believing in Christ is; no act that is saving can be done without the concurrence of special grace. Other acts that have a remote tendency to it, are performed by a more general concourse and common assistance; so men may come to the word, and attend to what is spoken, remember and consider what the word tells them; but as to believing or coming to Christ, that no man can do of himself, or by a general and common assistance. No man can. [Come unto me], i.e., believe in me unto salvation. Coming to Christ, and believing in him, are terms equipollent, and are indifferently used to express the nature of saving faith, as is plain, ver. 35. "He that cometh to me shall never hunger," and he that believeth on me shall never thirst;" it notes the terms from which and to which the soul moves, and the voluntariness of the motion, notwithstanding that divine power by which the will is drawn to Christ. [Except my Father] not excluding the other two Persons; for every work of God relating to the creatures is common to all the three Persons; nor only to note that the Father is the first in order of working; but the reason is hinted in the next words, [who hath sent me,]. God hath entered into covenant with the Son, and sent him, stands obliged thereby, to bring the promised seed to him, and that he does by drawing them to Christ by faith; so the next words tell us the Father does, [Draw him] That is, powerfully and effectually incline his will to come to Christ: "Not by a violent co-action, but by a benevolent bending of the will which was averse;" and as it is not in the way of force and compulsion, so neither is it by a simple moral suasion, by the bare proposal of an object to the will, and so leaving the sinner to his own election; but it is such a persuasion, as hath a mighty overcoming efficacy accompanying it; of which more anon. The words thus opened, the observation will be this: Doctrine: That it is utterly impossible for any man to come to Jesus Christ, unless he be drawn unto him by the special and mighty power of God. John Flavel, vol. 2 pg 68

p 77 Vol. 2, Method of Grace Sermon IV - ref. our corrupt nature

Secondly, Let us take the act of faith into consideration also, as it is here described by the soul's coming to Jesus Christ; and you will find a necessity of the Father's drawings ; for this evidently implies, that which is against the stream and current of corrupt nature, and that which is above the sphere and capacity of the most refined and accomplished nature.

First, It is against the stream and current of our corrupt nature to come to Christ. For let us but consider the term from which the soul departs, when it comes to Christ. In that day it leaves all its lusts, and ways of sin, how pleasant, sweet, and profitable soever they have been unto it, Isa. lv. 7. "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord." Way and thoughts, i.e., both the practice of, and delight he had in sin, must be forsaken, and the outward and inward man must be cleansed from it. Now there are in the bosoms of unregenerate men such darling lusts, that have given them so much practical and speculative pleasure, which have brought so much profit to them, which have been born and bred up with them; and which, upon all these accounts, are endeared to their souls to that degree, that it is easier for them to die, than to forsake them; yea, nothing is more common among such men, than to venture eternal damnation, rather than suffer a separation from their sins. And which is yet more difficult in coming to Christ, the soul forsakes not only its sinful self, but its righteous self, i.e., not only its worst sins, but its best performances, accomplishments, and excellencies. Now this is one of the greatest straits that nature can be put to. Righteousness by works was the first liquor that ever was put into the vessel, and it still retains the tang and savour of it, and will to the end of the world, Rom. x. 3. " For they, being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God." ax, weraymv, they have not submitted. To come naked and empty to Christ, and receive all from him as a free gift, is, to proud corrupt nature, the greatest abasement and submission in the world.

The quickening power of the Spirit
Sermon V, Method of Grace, pg 86-88

This his quickening work is therefore the first in order of nature to our union with Christ, and fundamental to all other acts of grace done and performed by us, from our first closing with Christ throughout the whole course of our obedience; and this quickening act is said, ver. 5. to be together with Christ. Either noting (as some expound it) that it is the effect of the same power by which Christ was raised from the dead, according to Eph. 1. 19, or rather, to be quickened together with Christ, notes that new spiritual life which is infused into our dead souls in the time of our union with Christ; "For it is Christ to whom we are conjoined and united in our regeneration, out of whom, as a fountain, all spiritual benefits flow to us, among which this vivification or quickening is one, and a most sweet and precious one." Zanchy Bodius, and many others, will have this quickening to comprise both our justification and regeneration, and to stand opposed both to eternal and spiritual death, and it may well be allowed; but it most properly imports our regeneration, wherein the Spirit, in an ineffable and mysterious way, makes the soul to live to God, yea, to live the life of God, which soul was before dead in trespasses and sins.

The deadness of man in sin; spiritual life only from God's Spirit

Secondly, In the next place, the total indisposedness of the subjects by nature. For, as it is well noted by a learned man, "the apostle doth not say of these Ephesians that they were half dead, or sick, and infirm, but dead wholly ; altogether dead, destitute of any faculty or ability, so much as to think one good thought, or perform one good act." You were dead in respect of condemnation, being under the damning sentence of the law, and you are dead in respect of the privation of spiritual life; dead in opposition to justification, and dead in opposition to regeneration and sanctification : And the fatal instrument by which their souls died is here showed them; you were dead in, or by trespasses and sins, this was the sword that killed your souls, and cut them off from God. Some do curiously distinguish betwixt trespasses and sins, as if one pointed at original, the other at actual sins; but I suppose they are promiscuously used here, and serve to express the cause of their ruin, or means of their spiritual death and destruction; this was their case when Christ came to quicken them, dead in sin; and being so, they could not move themselves towards union with Christ, but as they were moved by the quickening Spirit of God. Hence the observation will be this,

Doct. That those souls which have union with Christ, are quickened with a supernatural principle of life by the Spirit of God in order thereunto.

The Spirit of God is not only a living Spirit, formally considered; but he is also the Spirit of life, effectively or casually considered; And without his breathing, or infusing life into our souls, our union with Christ is impossible.

It is the observation of learned Camero, "that there must be an union before there can be an union with Christ. Union is to be conceived efficiently as the work of God's Spirit, joining the believer to Christ, and union is to be conceived formally, the joining itself of the persons together." We close with Christ by faith, but that faith being a vital act, pre-supposes a principle of life communicated to us by the Spirit; therefore it is said, John xi. 26. "Whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die;" The vital act and operation of faith springs from this quickening Spirit. So in Rom. viii. 1,2. The apostle, having in the first verse opened the blessed estate of them that are in Christ, shows us in the second verse how we come to be in him: "The Spirit of life (saith he) which is in Christ Jesus, hath made me free from the law of sin and death."

There is indeed a quickening work of the Spirit, which is subsequent to regeneration, consisting in his exciting, recovering, and actuating of his own graces in us; and from hence is the liveliness of a Christian; and there is a quickening act of the Spirit in our regeneration, and from hence is the spiritual life of a Christian; of this I am here to speak, and that I may speak profitably to this point, I will in the doctrinal part labour to open these five particulars.

First, What this spiritual life is in its nature and properties.

Secondly, In what manner it is wrought or inspired into the soul.

Thirdly, For what end, or with what design, this life is so inspired.

Fourthly, I shall show this work to be wholly supernatural.

And then, Fifthly, Why this quickening must be antecedent to our actual closing with Christ by faith.

A Secret Virtue

Thomas Shepard, Sound Believer, p286

"Hereupon the heart and will come, and rest and roll themselves upon these bowels, and there rest; thus the whole soul comes and this, I say again, is faith. Just as it is with the load-stone drawing the iron; who would think that iron should be drawn by it? But there is a secret virtue coming from the stone, which draws it and so it comes and is untied to it; so who would think, that ever such an iron, heavy, earthly heart, should be drawn to Christ? Yet, the Lord lets out a secret virtue of faith and sweetness from himself, which draws the soul to Christ, and so it comes."

Sermon VII, pg 122

Method of Grace - True Freedom

Besides, it is no easy thing to persuade men to receive Christ as their Lord in all things, and submit their necks to his strict and holy precepts, though it be a great truth that "Christ's yoke doth not gail, but grace and adorn the neck that bears it;" that the truest and sweetest liberty is in our freedom from our lusts, not in our fulfilling them; yet who can persuade the carnal heart to believe this? And much less will men ever be prevailed withal, to forsake father, mother, wife, children, inheritance, and life itself, to follow Christ; and all this upon the account of spiritual and invisible things; and yet this must be done by all that receive the Lord Jesus Christ upon gospel terms; yea, and before the soul hath any encouraging experience of its own, to balance the manifold discouragements of sense, and carnal reason, improved by the utmost craft of Satan to dismay it: for experience is the fruit and consequent of believing. So that it may well be placed among the great mysteries of godliness, that Christ is believed on in the world, 1 Tim. iii. 16.

pg 133 Sermon VII

Things accompanying Faith

These are the concomitant frames that accompany faith.

3. Lastly, Examine the consequents and effects of faith, if you would be satisfied of the truth and sincerity of it. And such are,

First, Evangelical meltings, and ingenuous thawings of the heart under the apprehensions of grace and mercy: Zech. xii. 10. "They shall look upon me whom they have pierced, and shall mourn.

Secondly, Love to Christ, his ways and people, Gal. v. 6. Faith worketh by love, i. e. represents the love of God, and then makes use of the sweetness of it by way of argument, to constrain the soul to all acts of obedience, where it may testify the reality of its love to God and Christ.

Thirdly, Heart-purity, Acts xv. 9. "Purifying the hearts by faith;" It doth not only cleanse the hands but the heart. No principle in man, besides faith, can do this;

Morality may hide corruption, but faith only purifies the heart from it.

Fourthly, Obedience to the commands of Christ, Rom. xvi. 26. The very name of faith is called upon obedience; for it accepts Christ as Lord, and urges upon the soul the most powerful arguments in the world to draw it to obedience.

pg 533 Vol. 6

The Power of God is irresistible...

Once more, Rom. v. 20, "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound." So that whatever thy sins have been, they do not, they cannot exceed the ability and power of the grace of God, the all-sufficient, impulsive cause of remission. That infinite abyss, or sea of mercy, can swallow up, and cover such mountains of guilt, as yours have been. 2. Nor do your sins exceed the ability and power of the meritorious cause of remission, namely, the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ; for that blood is the blood of God, Acts 20:28. He is the Lamb of God, whose blood is sufficient to take away the sins of the world, John 1:29. There is but one sin in the world exempt from remission by this blood, and if your heart be now wounded with the sense of sin, (as I here suppose it to be) that is none of your sin, how heinous so ever your other sins be.

Nor do your sins exceed the ability and power of the applying cause of pardon, namely, the Spirit of God. For though I should suppose thy mind to be clouded, and overshadowed with grossest ignorance, thy heart to be as hard as adamant, or nether-millstone, your will stiff and obstinate, your affections enchanted and bewitched with the pleasures of sin; yet this Spirit of God, in a moment, can make a convincing beam of light to dart into thy dark mind, make thy hard heart relent, thy stubborn will to bow, and all the affections of your soul to comply, and open obediently to Christ, John 16:9, 10, "The Spirit when he cometh, he shall convince the world of sin," etc.

Thus you see, whatever your guilt be, it does not exceed the abilities of the causes of remission. O what an encouragement is this? [Only convinced sinners are convinced of the infinite hatred that God has for sin and are so convinced, by faith, that they sincerely repent and continue to do so the rest of their lives [James 2:14-]. The world here must mean the world of believers, not the whole world, since they remain unconvinced and hence die in their sin.]

code211

Excerpt from

Reformed Dogmatics

By Hermon Bavinck

Vol. 2 pg 608-615

This discourse by Hermon Bavinck answers a popular objection to God's sovereignty over the wills of men that most people have against predestination and election. By nature, fallen man asserts his presumed autonomy and self-reliance with great vigilance, that nothing outside himself is warranted to influence his decisions especially in the area of religion, faith in Christ, etc., since he sees it as God doing violence to his the liberty of his free will. The objection he falsely describes is that God has to turn people into robots to infallibly effect what He has decreed in eternity to accomplish. Of course this is a false narrative due to ignorance or blindness in this mystery of the doctrine of Concurrence (or Compatibilism), where God's sovereignty [in election for example] is consistence with man's liberty or freedom, that God does not coerce people to believe in him but as John Flavel puts it, works by a secret and sweet efficacy of his mighty power, moves the will, changes it. Hermon Bavinck does an excellent job in describing this amazing act of God, hence the words that are so true, "amazing grace that saved a wretch like me." Read this very carefully; it is deep but really good! There are a multitude of good examples of this: The Assyrians in Isa. 10, Titus in 2Cor8:16, ¹⁶ "But thanks be to God, who put into the heart of Titus the same earnest care I have for you. ¹⁷ For he not only accepted our appeal, but being himself very earnest he is going^[d] to you of his own accord." and the conversion of every lost sinner that believes!

In another place in his works, on a similar sublime subject, the incomprehensibility of God, upon which that Bavinck commented, the same comment can be applied to this doctrine of concurrence in describing the work of efficacious grace upon the soul of man in conversion (while simultaneously not doing violence to man's liberty), is a "adorable mystery" and then what he concluded then, can be said here as well, "But mystery and self-contradiction are not synonymous terms." Bavinck sums this up: "This knowledge [the knowledge of God] that is shrouded in mystery... leads to adoration and worship." pg 27, Vol. 2

Here is my summary of this doctrine and an important application: God's sovereignty, his decrees, etc., are consistent with man's liberty or free will. When you see this more clearly it will excite you to your duty to prayer with more vigor and confidence. God is immanent in that he is in all beings (near to everyone) sustaining all according to their nature, saved or unsaved; this is deep. Though he is close to all; he is not savingly close to all; i.e., most people's hearts are far from him even though God is close to them (immanence), in that by his power they live and move... (Acts 17:28), including in all manner of evil/sin, etc., yet God is not culpable in their sin. This whole thing is seen in Phil. 2:13, for it is God who works in you, both to will and to work for his good pleasure. Both to will – meaning, for example, that he moves on those he intends to save by sweetly changing their will by a secret efficacy of his power, from stubborn unbelief to believing! And they come willingly - not by compulsion; God is not dragging people into the kingdom kicking and screaming. But this moving of the will is not just for converting the soul; it is for all that you do – and hence speaks to the fact, as Jonathan Edwards notes, that we receive our all from God, implying the most perfect, absolute, and universal derivation and dependence, a great motivation and encouragement that we pray!

CONCURRENCE: SECONDARY CAUSES

With that we have now indicated the manner in which God exercises his providential rule in the world—which in former times was expressed by the doctrine of concurrence. This is as richly diversified as the diversity with which God distinguished his creatures at the time of creation. The variety exhibited in God’s manner of government is just as great as that exhibited in his creation.[J. Alsted, Theol., 315] By creation God called into being a world that simultaneously deserves to be called a “cosmos” (kosmos) and an “age” (aiōn), and which in both space and time is “a most brilliant mirror of the divine glory.”[J. Alsted] Now, providence serves to take the world from its beginning and to lead it to its final goal; it goes into effect immediately after the creation and brings to development all that was given in that creation. Creation, conversely, was aimed at providence; creation conferred on creatures the kind of existence that can be brought to development in and by providence. For the world was not created in a state of pure potency, as chaos or a nebulous cloud, but as an ordered cosmos, and human beings were placed in it not as helpless toddlers but as an adult man and an adult woman. Development could only proceed from such a ready-made world, and that is how creation presented it to providence. In addition, that world was a harmonious whole in which unity was coupled to the most marvelous diversity. Every creature received a nature of its own, and with that nature an existence, a life, and a law of its own. Just as the moral law was increased in the heart of Adam as the rule for his life, so all creatures carried in their own nature the principles and laws for their own development. All things are created by the word.

All things are based on thought. The whole creation is a system grounded in the ordinances of God (Gen. 1:26, 28; 8:22; Ps. 104:5, 9; 119:90–91; Eccles. 1:10; Job 38:10ff.; Jer. 5:24; 31:25ff.; 33:20, 25). On all creatures God conferred an order, a law that they do not violate (Ps. 148:6).[64] In all of its parts it is rooted in the counsel of God, a design that emerges in things great and small. This all comes from the Lord of hosts; he is wonderful in counsel and excellent in wisdom (Isa. 28:23, 29). This is how Scripture teaches us to understand the world, and this is also how Christian theology has understood it. Augustine said that “hidden seeds” (semina occulta), “original principles” (originales regulae), and “seminal reasons” (seminariae rationes) were implanted in creatures, are concealed in the secret womb of nature, and thus are the principles of all development. “Whatever things, by being born, become visible to our eyes receive the principles of their development from hidden seeds, and take the increases in size appropriate to them, as well as the distinctiveness of their forms as though from these original causes.”[Augustine]

The world, accordingly, is pregnant with the causes of beings. “For as mothers are pregnant with unborn offspring, so the world itself is pregnant with the causes of unborn beings, which are not created in it except from that highest essence, where nothing is either born or dies, begins to be, or ceases to be.” [Augustine] The world is a tree of things (arbor rerum), bringing forth branch and blossom and fruit. [Augustine] God so preserves things and so works in them that they themselves work along with him as secondary causes. This is not to say that we must stop there. On the contrary, we must always ascend to the cause of all being and movement, and that is the will of God alone. “The ‘nature’ of any particular created thing is precisely what the supreme Creator of the thing willed it to be.”[Augustine] To that extent providence is not only a positive but also an immediate act of God. His will, his power, his being is immediately present in every creature and every event. All things exist and live together in him (Acts 17:28; Col. 1:17; Heb. 1:3). Just as he created the world by himself, so he also preserves and governs it by himself. Although God works through secondary causes, this is not to be interpreted, in the manner of Deism, to mean that they come in between God and the effects with their consequences and separate these from him. “God’s immediate provision over everything extends to the exemplar of the order.”[Aquinas]

For that reason a miracle is not a violation of natural law nor an intervention in the natural order. From God’s side it is an act that does not more immediately and directly have God as its cause than any ordinary event, and in the counsel of God and the plan of the world it occupies as much an equally well-ordered and harmonious place as any natural phenomenon. In miracles God only puts into effect a special force that, like any other force, operates in accordance with its own nature and therefore also has an outcome of its own.[Bavinck, Vol. 1 p188] But at the creation God built his laws into things, fashioning an order by which the things themselves are interconnected. God is not dependent on causes, but things do depend on one another. That interconnectedness is of many kinds. Although in general it can be called “causal,” the word “causal” in this sense must by no means be equated with “mechanical,” as materialism would have us do. A mechanical connection is only one mode in which a number of things in the world relate to each other. Just as creatures received a nature of their own in the creation and differ among themselves, so there is also difference in the laws in conformity with which they function and in the relation in which they stand to each other.

These laws and relations differ in every sphere: the physical and the psychological, the intellectual and the ethical, the family and society, science and art, the kingdoms of earth and the kingdom of heaven. It is the providence of God that, interlocking with creation, maintains and brings to full development all these distinct natures, forces, and ordinances. In providence God respects and develops—and does not nullify—the things he called into being in creation. “It does not pertain to divine providence to corrupt the nature of things but to preserve [that nature].”[Aquinas] Thus, therefore, God preserves and governs all creatures according to their nature, the angels in one way, humans in another, and the latter again in a way that differs from animals and plants. But insofar as God in his providence maintains things in their mutual relatedness and makes creatures subserve each other’s existence and life, that providence can be called mediate. “God immediately provides for all things as it pertains to the exemplar of the order, but as it pertains to the execution of the order he, to be sure, provides through other means.”[Aquinas] Thus he created all the angels simultaneously but lets humans spring from one blood; thus he preserves some creatures individually and others as species and families. In each case, then, he employs all sorts of creatures as means in his hand to fulfill his counsel and to reach his goal.

Christian theology did not deny these things. On the contrary, following the example of Scripture, it has always emphatically upheld the natural order and the causal nexus of the phenomena. It is not true that Christianity with its supernaturalism was hostile to the natural order and made science impossible, as Draper, for example, and others have sought to demonstrate with such relish. Much more in line with the facts is the judgment of DuBois-Reymond when he wrote: “Modern natural science, however paradoxical this may sound, owes its origin to Christianity.” In any case, Christianity made science—specifically natural science—possible and prepared the ground for it. For the more the natural phenomena are deified—as in polytheism—and viewed as the visible images and bearers of deity, the more scientific inquiry is made impossible since it becomes automatically a form of desecration that disturbs the mystery of Deity. But Christianity distinguished God and the world, and by its confession of God as the Creator of all things, separated God from the nexus of nature and lifted him far above it. The study of nature, therefore, is no longer a violation of Deity. At the same time and by this very fact it has made human beings free and given them independent status vis-à-vis nature, as is clearly demonstrated by the splendid view of nature we find in the psalmists and prophets, in Jesus and the apostles. For the believer, nature is no longer an object of worship and dread. [The Hebrews faced the world and nature with sovereign self-awareness – being without fear of the world – but also with a sense of the utmost responsibility. As God’s representative, humanity exercises dominion over the world but only as such. Human beings may not follow their arbitrary impulses but only the reveal will of God. Paganism, in contrast, alternates between presumptuous misuse of the world and childish dread before its powers. R. Smend] Whereas before God he bows down in deep humility and is utterly dependent on him, in relation to the earth he has the calling to exercise dominion over it and to subject all things to himself (Gen. 1:26). Dependence on God is something very different from living conformably to nature and adapting oneself to circumstances. Many writers argue either in such a way that they attribute all things and events to the will of God and consider resistance impermissible, or they limit God’s providence and place many things in the hands of humans.

Scripture, however, warns us against both this antinomianism and this Pelagianism; it cuts off at the root all false fatalistic resignation on the one hand, and all presumptuous self-confidence on the other. Bowing before the powers of nature is something very different from childlike submission to God, and exercising dominion over the earth is a matter of serving God. The sea captain who went to his cabin to pray and read the Bible during a storm did submit to the power of the elements, but not to God. [S. Harris, God the Creator and Lord of All] There is much more real piety in Cromwell’s dictum: “Trust God and keep your powder dry.” It is, moreover, the confession of God as the Creator of heaven and earth that immediately brings with it the one absolute and never self-contradictory truth, the harmony and beauty of the counsel of God, and hence the unity of the cosmic plan and the order of all of nature. “If in a free and wonderful way, on the basis of the full scope of nature, one attributes to the one God also a unified manner of working, then the connectedness of things in terms of cause and effect not only becomes conceivable but even a necessary consequence of the assumption.”[F.A. Lange] Scripture itself models to us this recognition of such a natural order, of a wide range of ordinances and laws for created things. And miracle is so far from making an inroad on that natural order that it rather presupposes and confirms it. At all times the Christian church and theology have generously acknowledged such an order of things. Augustine repeatedly appealed to the saying in Wisdom 11:20: “You have arranged all things by measure and number and weight.” At least in the early period they energetically opposed the appalling superstition that crested in the third and fourth centuries, and especially fought against astrology. [Augustine, F. Turretin, Aquinas, Calvin, etc.] The controversy that often erupted was not a conflict between Christianity and natural science; the alignments were very different; it was usually a struggle between an earlier and later worldview, with believing Christians on both sides.[80]

This fundamentally correct view of nature, which Christian theology advocated, is nowhere more clearly in evidence than in its doctrine of “concurrency” and “secondary causes.” In neither pantheism nor Deism can this doctrine come into its own. In the former there are no longer any causes, and in the latter no secondary causes. In pantheism the secondary causes, that is, the immediate causes of things within the circle of created things, are identified with the primary cause, which is God. Between the two there is no distinction of substance and effect. Both materially and formally, God is the subject of all that happens, and hence also of sin. At best the so-called secondary causes are opportunities and passive instruments for the workings of God. Whereas this theory only sporadically surfaced in earlier times, in the more modern philosophy of Descartes it came to dominance and so led to the idealism of Berkeley and Malebranche, and to the pantheism of Spinoza, Hegel, Schleiermacher, Strauss, and others. So Malebranche, for example, posits that “there is only one true cause because there is only one true God; that the nature or power of each thing is nothing but the will of God; that all natural causes are not true causes but only occasional causes.” The true cause can only be God because he alone can create and he cannot communicate that power to a creature. If creatures could be the true cause of motions and phenomena, they themselves would be gods. But “all these insignificant pagan divinities and all these particular causes of the philosophers are merely chimeras that the wicked mind tries to establish to undermine worship of the true God.” [N. Malebranche, The Search After Truth] Accordingly, there are only phenomena, representations, and the only reality, power, and substance behind these phenomena is that of God himself. [J. Kleutgen]

Conversely, in Deism the secondary causes are separated from the primary cause and made independent. The primary cause is totally restricted to the creation, the communication of the possibility (posse), and totally excluded in the case of the “willing” (velle) and the doing (facere), as in the original Pelagianism. Or the two causes are conceived as associated causes that work with and alongside each other, like two draft horses pulling a wagon, even though one is perhaps stronger than the other, as in semi-Pelagianism and synergism. In this view the creature becomes the creator of his or her own deeds. Scripture, however, tells us both that God works all things so that the creature is only an instrument in his hand (Isa. 44:24; Ps. 29:3; 65:10; 147:15ff.; Matt. 5:45; Acts 17:25; etc.) and that providence is distinct from creation and presupposes the existence and self-activity of creatures (Gen. 1:11, 20, 22, 24, 28; etc.). In keeping with this witness, Christian theology teaches that the secondary causes are strictly subordinated to God as the primary cause and in that subordination nevertheless remain true causes. The odd theologian, to be sure, diverged from this position, such as the nominalist Biel in the Middle Ages and Zwingli in the time of the Reformation, who believed that secondary causes were mistakenly so-called and preferred to call them instruments. [U. Zwingli, On the Providence and Other Essays]

The constant teaching of the Christian church, nevertheless, has been that the two causes, though they are totally dependent on the primary cause, are at the same time also true and essential causes. With his almighty power God makes possible every secondary cause and is present in it with his being at its beginning, progression, and end. It is he who posits it and makes it move into action (praecursus) and who further accompanies it in its working and leads it to its effect (concursum). He is “at work” [in us] “both to will and to do for his good pleasure” (Phil. 2:13). But this energizing activity of the primary cause in the secondary causes is so divinely great that precisely by that activity he stirs those secondary causes into an activity of their own. “The providence of God does not cancel out but posits secondary causation.” [J Wollebius] Concurrence is precisely the reason for the self-activity of the secondary causes, and these causes, sustained from beginning to end by God’s power, work with a strength that is appropriate and natural to them. So little does the activity of God nullify the activity of the creature that the latter is all the more vigorous to the degree that the former reveals itself the more richly and fully. Hence, the primary cause and the secondary cause remain distinct. The former does not destroy the latter but on the contrary confers reality on it, and the second exists solely as a result of the first. Neither are the secondary causes merely instruments, organs, inanimate automata [i.e., robots], but they are genuine causes with a nature, vitality, spontaneity, manner of working, and law of their own. “Satan and evildoers are not so effectively the instruments of God that they do not also act in their own behalf. For we must not suppose that God works in an iniquitous man as if he were a stone or a piece of wood, but He uses him as a thinking creature, according to the quality of his nature, which He has given him. Thus, when we say that God works in evildoers, that does not prevent them from working also in their own behalf.” [J. Calvin, Treaties Against the Anabaptists and Libertines]

In relation to God the secondary causes can be compared to instruments (Isa. 10:15; 13:5; Jer. 50:25; Acts 9:15; Rom. 9:20–23); in relation to their effects and products they are causes in the true sense. And precisely because the primary and the secondary cause do not stand and function dualistically on separate tracks, but the primary works through the secondary, the effect that proceeds from the two is one and the product is one. There is no division of labor between God and his creature, but the same effect is totally the effect of the primary cause as well as totally the effect of the proximate cause. The product is also in the same sense totally the product of the primary as well as totally the product of the secondary cause. But because the primary cause and the secondary cause are not identical and differ essentially, the effect and product are in reality totally the effect and product of the two causes, to be sure, but formally they are only the effect and product of the secondary cause. Wood burns and it is God alone who makes it burn, yet the burning process may not be formally attributed to God but must be attributed to the wood as subject. Human persons speak, act, and believe, and it is God alone who supplies to a sinner all the vitality and strength he or she needs for the commission of a sin. Nevertheless the subject and author of the sin is not God but the human being. In this manner Scripture draws the lines within which the reconciliation of God’s sovereignty and human freedom has to be sought.

Here is a good explanation of God's preservation of things, and the carrying out of his eternal decree in his sovereignty over the wills of men, the doctrine of Concurrence. This is important to see because it is the Arminians and most people object to God's sovereignty in general, especially when considering God's sovereignty over men's wills and how this rubs sore against man's innate determination to protect his supposed autonomy of his will to the death.

Chapter 7 – Providence (skip to item 3)

3. What is the basis for the doctrine of God's preservation of the universe?

a) On the continual representation of Scripture that the creature, although possessing a real existence, nevertheless at no moment and in no respect can be independent of God. If it existed of itself, then so far as its being is concerned it would be like God. [God is a se, of himself; this distinguishes him from all creatures, who are not a se, but derive all that has to do with their being, from God.]

b) On the doctrine of divine immanence, according to which God with His eternal power and divine nature can be excluded from nothing in creation. Therefore it will not do to exclude Him from the ongoing existence of the substance of creation.

c) On the explicit declarations of Holy Scripture (see Neh 9:6; Col 1:17; Heb 1:3).

4. Is providence, as far as preservation is concerned, a purely negative work, consisting in the fact that God does not destroy the created universe?

No, it is a positive work, for only of God can it be true that He remains where He always is. God alone is absolute being. That the universe exists is not in itself sufficient grounds for its continuing to exist. For this, a new work of God is necessary, which we call preservation. Failure to appreciate that necessity is based on a deistic concept of God and on a deistic worldview. The biblical, Reformed doctrine navigates between the two extremes of pantheism and deism.

5. How does it come about that we are so inclined to fall into this deistic error, as if given with the existence of a thing is its continuing existence, unless a positive act of destruction intervenes between the two?

Because we have made for ourselves a god in our image and our likeness. Our relation to things outside of us is more or less deistic. When we have made something, then the sufficient grounds for its continuing to exist seem to us to lie in the fact that it exists. We do not then preserve it further, but it remains because it is. That way of thinking we then transfer to God. Of course this involves a huge petitio principii. For that something continues to exist when it is made by us does not depend on the fact that it exists, but exclusively on the preserving power of God.

6. What is the opposite extreme with respect to the doctrine of preservation?

That in a pantheistic fashion the continuity of the substance of the universe is abolished, and the universe is seen as being created every moment by God out of nothing. Preservation thus becomes a continuous creation. Supporters of this view are:

a) Many old dogmaticians, who desired to lay the emphasis on the creaturely and dependent existence of the universe. Therefore they call conservatio [conservation] a creatio continua [continuous creation]. For example, Ursinus, Heidegger, Alsted, Rijssen do this. This was not wrongly intended, but is, however, less happily formulated.

b) Many who under this formulation conceal a pantheistic worldview. One can already find the principles of this view in Descartes, which is then given a pantheistic coloring later in Malebranche and in Spinoza became a full-blown pantheism. Jonathan Edwards, who brought the sovereignty of God dangerously close to the borders of pantheism, defended this opinion in his book on original sin.

7. What objections must be brought against this identification of creation and preservation?

a) It abolishes all continuity in the existence of things. The element of what is abiding, of permanence, thereby disappears from the concept of substance. The universe comes into existence anew every moment; its existing at moment A is in no regard the basis for its existing at moment B, etc. So then, for B it is also completely indifferent whether an A instead of a P or a Q preceded. The real connection between moments of existing falls away.

b) The opposition between this opinion and the biblical view lies completely on the line of the opposition between pantheism and theism. According to this theory everything flows constantly out of God, everything must be created anew every moment. Since time is divisible into infinity, no one can determine a limit for how short the moments of creation are and so finally they will become so short that there no longer remains any room for existence, that is, the universe is constantly being created, but it never actually is. This comes dangerously close to the illusionism that asserts that finite things are an illusion.

c) This theory can also lead to Idealism. Fundamentally, here all Vermittelung [mediating] of things by each other is abolished, just at the point where it is most obvious, namely in the continuing existence of identical objects. If A in moment A is not the basis for the existence of A in moment B, how then will A ever be able to be the basis of B? In other words, how will we be able to maintain causality as real?

d) This theory becomes its most dangerous if its consequences are drawn for the life of man. It breaks up that life into a number of unconnected parts and thereby takes away the basis for moral life, for continuity of character, and for the responsibility of man.

8. How then ought we to think about the preservation of God?

As the act by which He, by a positive expression of His will, causes a thing, as it already exists or in connection with that existence, to remain itself. This does not mean that what exists in moment A does half the work necessary to perpetuate itself, and God does the other half. It is not a divided work. see [Edwards' comment code225a] Rather God works so that He makes use of the existence of A in moment A in order to cause this identical A to continue to exist in moment B. Beyond this, the way in which this occurs must remain incomprehensible for us. We may not, however, abandon the continuity of things. As we shall see, this same co-working of God with what already exists returns in connection with other acts of providence.

9. What then ought to be considered as belonging to preservation?

a) First of all, maintaining the substance of things, both spiritual and material, and of both in their specific identity. The continuity of spirits is other than that of matter, and God preserves both of them according to their nature. [that is, by not doing violence to their creaturely liberty. That's the wonderful mystery!]

b) Besides matter and spiritual substance, there is, however, still more reality. There is form, attribute, power, and still more. The question arises, therefore, as to whether maintaining these belongs to preservation. The answer, in brief, must be the following: Insofar as these things are not active powers or actions, their maintenance must be subsumed under the category of preservation. On the other hand, insofar as they are nothing other than active powers, they belong to the act of concursus, if one will continue to make a logical and clear distinction between preserving and co-working. Gravity, for example, is, as far as we know, always at work; it is identical with its action. There is as well, however, a latent or dormant gravity, not active as such, that would thus fall under preservation. It appears, then, that with regard to powers God need cause their action to continue only by concursus. It is, however, extremely difficult to indicate the boundary between latent and constantly active powers. Scripture does not distinguish between such things, and we may therefore be satisfied with pointing out this distinction in general.

c) Many also reckon the maintenance of type for organic genera and kinds to preservation. One should bear in mind, however, that here creation (creationism) in part and co-working and governing in part intersect, and that further the identity of kinds and genera cannot be called an identity in the strict sense, but only a similarity, unless one explains the propagation of individuals in a realistic fashion.

10. What is the second work of providence?

Co-working, which has reference not to the substance of things but to their action. If substance and activity differ, then with respect to the latter a specific immanence of God must exist, an immanence that at least modaliter [as to its mode] differs from that with respect to the former. The same arguments that are valid for preservation can be made for co-working. God may no more be excluded from the activity of things than from their substance. When Charles Hodge maintains that the theory of concursus seeks to make comprehensible what is incomprehensible, that is not the case, at least it does not have to be the case. Nothing more is present in the postulate of concursus than in that of preservation. We see that both must be accepted, but how that is so we comprehend as little for the one as the other.

11. What grounds, besides what has been mentioned, do we have for assuming a co-working of God?

a) Scripture says that we are not only in God but also live and move in Him.

b) God works in all of nature down to the smallest and most insignificant matters, or what are such for us (Psa 104:21; Matt 5:45; 10:29; Acts 14:17). If we were to accept that God in a deistic fashion lets nature work of itself, then all these texts would have to be taken figuratively and the consolation of our religion and worship would be lost.

c) The entire teleology of nature and of history speaks of an immanent working of God (cf. Job 12:7–9; Dan 4:35).

d) Every individual has only to look at his life history to discern that there was a higher hand that governed it. At this point faith in God's co-working is most closely connected with our dependence upon Him. He directs even our free acts, and however far above our comprehension may be the manner in which he does that, in any case it must be a co-working, a concursus. Not matter, not fate, not chance can affect us, if our freedom is to be maintained, but only the coworking of God (Psa 104:4; Prov 16:1; 21:1).

12. How are we to think about this concursus?

Here, too, two extremes will have to be avoided, deism and pantheism. According to the first, the powers and the laws of nature certainly come from God and as such are not necessary for God but now work of themselves such that God remains excluded. That eliminates God's immanence. According to the other extreme, God alone does everything in nature, that is, there are not two causes that work together; the laws of nature and the powers of nature are just abstractions from God's modes of working. Thus, nature and God are identified. That can happen (like the theory of preservation as creatio continua) in a twofold manner:

a) In the consistent pantheistic sense, so that God is not only immediately all power and motion of the universe but is also the ground and the substance of the universe.

b) In the sense of inclining toward pantheism, so that the universe is certainly distinguished from God substantially but the power of the universe is still viewed exclusively as divine power; God = nature.

13. What must be urged against this opinion that inclines toward pantheism?

Although there are glimmers of this view in Zwingli and Calvin and other Reformed theologians, one can still not say that they were conscious of eliminating the action of second causes. In their views we have to do more with dangerous formulations than real error. Nevertheless, Reformed theology must guard against such formulations much more than against deism, because our basic principle does not drive us in the direction of the latter, but toward pantheism. We note:

- a) That this conception, as if God is the only acting cause in the universe, is based more on a philosophical concept of the absolute than on scriptural grounds.
- b) That this conception is in conflict with the experience that we acquire from our own inner actions. We know ourselves as causa secunda [second causes] and will have to assume that, after discounting the difference between the activity of spirit and the activity of matter, something similar to what we call (spiritual) causality also takes place in material substances when we act.
- c) That this conception brings us extremely close to Idealism and pantheism. It is inconsistent to posit a universe outside of God in which God nevertheless is the only acting cause. If He is thus made the doer of all doing, then one must also go a step further and make Him the being of all being.

Side note on pantheism:

Van Til's mentor, Abraham Kuyper was particularly concerned about the intrusion of pantheism into the church and the West. His principle concern was that by identifying God with ideals like progress, the boundaries between God and the world are blurred, and God becomes severely limited. See his "Pantheism's Destruction of Boundaries," in Methodist Review 75 (1893): 520-37; 762-78. – An Introduction to Systematic Theology, Van Til, pg 320 note 4

Van Til states on page 369:

In saying that God is a Spirit we do not think of some vague generic concept of spirituality of which God is one particular instance and man another. God is the absolute Spirit. He is the self-contained Spirit. He does not need materiality over against himself in order to individuate himself. He is the self-individuated Spirit. [In other words, I think was Van Til is saying here, that God is not in an act of becoming via a correlative relationship with his creation – i.e., a pantheistic view. He is entirely distinct from his creation and he already is! and that by or of himself, a se. He is not becoming more conscious of himself nor coming into his own so to speak (becoming individuated), through a correlative relationship by being one with creation in the ongoing changes characteristic of all creatures. For one thing, God is immutable.]

- d) That this conception is irreconcilable with the rational responsibility of man, insofar as that responsibility depends upon the causality of our will.

14. What must be maintained regarding concursus?

a) That it, like preservation, has to do with what is already created. In creating, God has placed powers in substances. These are realities, however uncertain we may be about the kind of reality that is to be attributed to them. There is something in the earth by which it exercises an attracting power. God has created it there and connected it in a certain way with the matter of earth. Just as He preserves the matter that makes up the earth, so He co-works together with that power that is joined to matter so that it endures. It is not God in the literal sense who attracts in the earth, but rather the earth itself that attracts by the concursus of God.

b) It is not a physical or metaphysical power but His omnipotent will by which God exercises His concursus, the same will by which He created the universe and preserves it. Making this distinction avoids the pantheistic formulations that hyper-Calvinistic theology has often fallen into. If God as causa prima [first cause] acts in the universe by physical or metaphysical power and if, as in fact is the case, this physical or metaphysical power is completely sufficient to explain what is effected, then no place remains for causae secundae [second causes], unless one divides power in two and attributes half to God and the other half to the creature. If, on the other hand, one holds that God is to be distinguished from the universe, not only with respect to substance but also with respect to its activity, then we arrive at recognition of the fact that what is at work proprio sensu [in the proper sense] in the universe is the power not of God but of the universe, and that this power, however, at every point and in every moment, is dependent on the omnipotent will of God and without that will cannot express itself. In this way both the transcendence and the immanence of God are maintained, although here too we must confess our ignorance regarding the way in which God's omnipotent will is involved in the power of the creature. [the great mystery.]

c) What we call the laws and the powers of nature is a reality, a propensity placed in things by God to act and also to act in this way and not otherwise. These wills and powers are made suitable to the matter to which they belong. There is congruence between them and the substances to which they adhere. However, we may not go so far as to think of these laws and powers as already given with these substances or as inseparably bound to them. In that case the difference between preservation and concursus would vanish. And it would be impossible for God to change natural law, to abolish it, without changing or destroying substance. By His omnipotent will God can join to the same substance new and different powers than were previously proper to it. He follows the order of nature as He Himself has established it, but He by no means does that because He cannot do otherwise. It is important to keep this in view for describing the concept of miracle. It has been observed, correctly, that in an absolute sense no miracles exist for God. For Him it is no more miraculous for iron to float on water than for it to sink. He can exercise the influence of His will on the co-working factors involved so that iron floats and just as well exercise that influence so that it sinks. When, however, by His will He exercises other such influences, that is always accompanied by a real change in the powers of things themselves, for these really exist and are not simply the power of God.

d) How we ought not to think of God's concursus follows from what has already been said. Different wrong conceptions must be rejected:

1. Concursus is not general and indifferent (conkursus generalis et indifferens), as the Jesuits, the Socinians, and the Remonstrants maintain. This general concursus is thought of as a neutral power imparted by God to all causae secundae [second causes], as the result of which they can act, while, further, the manner of their action is dependent on the kind of causae secundae. [this 'neutral power' idea is believed by Arminians is to defend their supposed autonomy of the liberty of their will, their independence from God; will-worship. They say it is not fair and prejudicial to their liberty if God influences their wills in any way. They see their will as completely self-directed. Vos notes this in the next paragraph.] The sun imparts the same heat and power to grow to all plants on earth, yet these plants do not all grow in the same way because they differ from each other in kind.

The motives for this conception lie on an ethical terrain. One wished to keep God free from co-working in sin and to leave room for the liberum arbitrium [free will]. One distinguished between materia [matter] and forma [form] in the act of sin. The former was attributed to God, who effected it by His concursum generalis et indifferens, the latter (the form) came from man. (Even Reformed theologians, like Gravemeijer, make use of this distinction). Although we ought to have all respect for the first motive mentioned above and to recognize every difficulty of the problem that emerges for us through the presence of sin in the world, nevertheless we can only see in this generalizing of concursum a failed attempt to maintain God's holiness at the expense of His absoluteness. God is kept free from evil (at least apparently), but at the same time He is kept apart from a part of the activity of the creature. God with His eternal power and capability also cannot be excluded from that doing by which His general influence becomes specific. There is in sin not only a metaphysical substrate as a real act; there is also reality in the form of sin, activity that is specifically culpable, and even of this culpable activity it is the case that it cannot be initiated or carried out against God's will and without His concursum. It is much better here to let what is inexplicable stand in its inexplicability than to make do with solutions that do not do justice to another, acknowledged truth.

2. Neither is concursum to be conceived of as partial, so that God and the creature would share the activity involved. The same act, it is to be emphasized much more, is at the same time entirely an act of God and entirely an act of the creature. It is an act of God in its entirety insofar as there is nothing in it that does not depend on His eternal will and insofar as at each moment of its occurring it is determined by this will. At the same time it is an act of the creature insofar as by the creature and from its center the will of God causes the act to occur and be manifested as a reality. As on so many other points where we deal with the relationship between the finite and the infinite, here we encounter two spheres into which one and the same object falls without the one limiting the other. Just as the infinity of space is not the infinity of God and still is borne by the infinity of God and does not limit the infinity of God, so also the activity of second causes is not the activity of God in a proper sense but is nonetheless borne by the activity of God without limiting the activity of God. God can do everything and the creature can do everything in the same instance, since the spheres of doing are different and need not exclude each other.

3. From what has been said it is now also excluded that the activity of God and that of the creature may be placed entirely on the same line. God's activity has the primacy in order. Also, it is not to be thought that God pairs His concursum with the act of the creature as the same causa occasionalis [occasional cause]. We must rather affirm the following for concursus—with respect to the working of the creature God’s activity is:

a. Concursus praeivus sive praedeterminans [prior or antecedent co-working]. In created things there is not a principle that works of itself and to which God then attaches. Rather, in every specific case the first impulse to activity and movement comes from God. God is first active before the creature can act. Every action and reaction of things that interact with each other depends in this way on God’s omnipotent will. When a spark and gunpowder come in contact with each other, then all the conditions for an explosion are supplied by the preservation of God that maintained the particular powers of both, but those powers cannot cause this new phenomenon of an explosion by reacting with each other unless God co-works per concursum praeivum [through prior concursus]. It is obvious that this prae [before] in praeivus does not mean priority in time. It is entirely a question of order. It must be noted further that this concursus praeivus does not terminate on the action of the creature, but on the creature itself.

b. Concursus simultaneus [simultaneous concursus]. Once the action has begun, the efficacious will of God must also accompany it reciprocally at every moment if it is to continue. This concursus simultaneus, in distinction from the concursus praeivus, does not concern the creature but its action. While the Jesuits among Roman Catholic theologians wanted to conceive of the concursus only as simultaneous and thus deny a concursus praeivus, some Reformed theologians have accepted the latter as applying only to good and gracious actions and for the rest remained satisfied with the demands of a conkursus simultaneus. However, one cannot make a distinction here between good acts and acts that are not good. With respect to their reality they are on the same line, and if a good action cannot take place without a conkursus praeivus, so the same must be maintained about an evil action.

c. Conkursus immediatus, that is, an immediate concursus. We often make use of means to bring about some action, and although God uses means for His governing in order to realize His purpose, this cannot be said with regard to concursus. When God destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah by letting fire rain out of heaven, that is a mediate act of governing, but at the same time it is God’s immediate concursus by which He enables fire to fall, to glow, to burn, to consume. In all the means that His governing utilizes, God’s concursus is therefore immediately active. This immediateness is further described in detail by dogmaticians as an immediateness quoad suppositum and quoad virtutem. The first means an immediacy with respect to a being, the second an immediacy with respect to power. When God exercises His concursus, no other being, no other thing, interposes itself between this concursus and its object, as, for example, the sculptor places his chisel between himself and the block of marble. Even the causa secunda [second cause], although action is rightly attributed to it, does not in this way lie between God and the result. God’s act adjoins and is involved directly in what is done. With respect to power God’s concursus is likewise “immediate.” It is not as if power issues and is separated from Him in order to be then further transferred apart from Him, to bring other power into action and thus cause a certain final action to exist. Rather, in every transposition and transmission of power, God is present at every moment with His conkursus praeivus and simultaneus. Here, too, the power that really belongs to causae secundae [second causes] does not form a link between God and the end result.

Fallen man is always attempting to declare his independence from God by defending his so called autonomy, this self-sufficiency, his idol of his absolute free will, as he sees it, that it is doing violence to it if anything from without himself attempts to control or effect his will one way or the other. This is what it is to be sovereign; so, basically, man is declaring that he is God, not the God of scripture, that he is the captain or determiner of his own destiny, not God. And so, many people are threatened by the doctrine of God's sovereignty in general, i.e., providence, or predestination and election, for they see, in their misunderstanding of it, that for God's decrees to play out infallibly, he must force men to do things against their will (compulsion), thus making robots out of man, doing violence to their liberty. Well, this view is a result of man's ignorance of God's power, and man's true nature and condition, among other prejudices, and that they think God is altogether like themselves (Ps50:21)

Chapter IV

That God by his providence governs and disposes of all things by him created is sufficiently proved; the manner how he worketh all in all, how he orders the works of his own hands, in what this governing and disposing of his creatures does chiefly consist, comes now to be considered. And here four things are principally to be observed:— First, The sustaining, preserving, and upholding of all things by his power; for “he upholdsh all things by the word of his power,” Heb. i. 3. Secondly, His working together with all things, by an influence of causality into the agents themselves; “for he also has wrought all our works in us,” Isa. xxvi. 12. Thirdly, His powerful overruling of all events, both necessary, free, and contingent, and disposing of them to certain ends for the manifestation of his glory. So Joseph tells his brethren, “As for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is at this day, to save much people alive,” Gen. i. 20. Fourthly, His determining and restraining second causes to such and such effects: “The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water: he turns it whithersoever he will,” Prov. xxi. 1.

First, His sustentation or upholding of all things is his powerful continuing of their being, natural strength, and faculties, bestowed on them at their creation: “In him we live, and move, and have our being," Acts xvii. So that he does neither work all himself in them, without any co-operation of theirs, which would not only turn all things into stocks, yea, and take from stocks their own proper nature, but also is contrary to that general blessing he spread over the face of the whole world in the beginning, "Be fruitful, and multiply," Gen. i. 22; — nor yet leave them to a self-subsistence, he in the meantime only not destroying them; 63 which would make him an idle spectator of most things in the world, not to "work hitherto," as our Savior speaks, and grant to divers things here below an absolute being, not derivative from him: the first whereof is blasphemous, the latter impossible.

Secondly, For God's working in and together with all second causes for producing of their effects, what part or portion in the work punctually to assign unto him, what to the power of the inferior causes, seems beyond the reach of mortals; neither is an exact comprehension thereof any way necessary, so that we make everything beholding to his power for its being, and to his assistance for its operation.

Thirdly, His supreme dominion exercises itself in disposing of all things to certain and determinate ends for his own glory, and is chiefly discerned advancing itself over those things which are most contingent, and making them in some sort necessary, inasmuch as they are certainly disposed of to some proposed ends. Between the birth and death of a man, how many things merely contingent do occur! how many chances! how many diseases! in their own nature all evitable, and, in regard of the event, not one of them but to some proves mortal; yet, certain it is that a man's "days are determined, the number of his months are with the Lord, he hath appointed his bounds that he cannot pass," Job xiv. 5. And oftentimes by things purely contingent and accidental he executes his purposes, — bestows rewards, inflicts punishments, and accomplishes his judgments; as when he delivers a man to be slain by the head of an axe, flying from the helve in the hand of a man cutting a tree by the way. But in nothing is this more evident than in the ancient casting of lots, a thing as casual and accidental as can be imagined, huddled in the cap at a venture. Yet God overrules them to the declaring of his purpose, freeing truth from doubts, and manifestation of his power: Prov. xvi. 33, "The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord;" — as you may see in the examples of Achan, Josh. vii. 16–18; Saul, 1 Sam. x. 20, 21; Jonathan, chap. xiv. 41, 42; Jonah, chap. i. 7; Matthias, Acts i. 26. And yet this overruling act of God's providence (as no other decree or act of his) does not rob things contingent of their proper nature; for cannot he who effectually causes that they shall come to pass, cause also that they shall come to pass contingently? [This is one area where people don't think things through; cannot God who is infinite in wisdom and power figure out a way to save anyone without violating their liberty and turning them into robots?! Are not people limiting the Most High!!]

Fourthly, God's predetermination of second causes (which I name not last as though it were the last act of God's providence about his creatures, for indeed it is the first that concerns their operation) is that effectual working of his, according to his eternal purpose, whereby, though some agents, as the wills of men, are causes most free and indefinite [i.e., God does not operate by coercion, yet God rules over their wills in a miraculous way, Ps 100:3, Pr. 16:1, 9, 21:1, etc], or unlimited lords of their own actions, in respect of their internal principle of operation (that is, their own nature), [they] are yet all, in respect of his decree, and by his powerful working, determined to this or that effect in particular; not that they are compelled to do this, or hindered from doing that, but are inclined and disposed to do this or that, according to their proper manner of working, that is, most freely: [i.e., God doesn't do violence to their liberty.] for truly such testimonies are everywhere obvious in Scripture, of the stirring up of men's wills and minds, of bending and inclining them to divers things, of the governing of the secret thoughts and motions of the heart, as cannot by any means be referred to a naked permission, with a government of external actions, or to a general influence, whereby they should have power to do this or that, or anything else; wherein, as some suppose, his whole providence consists. [That's the key; most people don't consider this point in their thinking, that God's omniscience, his predestination of all things, are consistent with man's liberty; that's the miracle that prompted the title of that great song, Amazing Grace; that's why it is amazing!]

Let us now jointly apply these several acts to free agents, working according to choice, or relation, such as are the wills of men, and that will open the way to take a view of Arminian heterodoxies, concerning this article of Christian belief. And here two things must be premised:— First, That they be not deprived of their own radical or original internal liberty; secondly, That they be not exempt from the moving influence and gubernation of God's providence; — the first whereof would leave no just room for rewards and punishments; the other, as I said before, is injurious to the majesty and power of God. St Augustine⁶⁴ judged Cicero worthy of special blame, even among the heathens, for so attempting to make men free that he made them sacrilegious, by denying them to be subject to an overruling providence: which gross error was directly maintained by Damascen,⁶⁵ a learned Christian, teaching, "Things whereof we have any power, not to depend on providence, but on our own free will;" an opinion fitter for a hog of the Epicurus herd than for a scholar in the school of Christ. And yet this proud, prodigious error is now, though in other terms, stiffly maintained: for what do they else who ascribe such an absolute independent liberty to the will of man, that it should have in its own power every circumstance, every condition whatsoever, that belongs to operation, so that all things required on the part of God, or otherwise, to the performance of an action being accomplished, it remains solely in the power of a man's own will whether he will do it or no? which supreme and plainly divine liberty, joined with such an absolute uncontrollable power and dominion over all his actions, would exempt and free the will of man, not only from all fore-determining to the production of such and such effects, but also from any effectual working or influence of the providence of God into the will itself, that should sustain, help, or cooperate with it in doing or willing anything; and, therefore, the authors of this imaginary liberty have wisely framed an imaginary concurrence of God's providence, answerable unto it, — namely, a general and indifferent influence, always waiting and expecting the will of man to determine itself to this or that effect, good or bad; God being, as it were, always ready at hand to do that small part which he has in our actions, when so ever we please to use him, or, if we please to let him alone, he no way moves us to the performance of anything. Now, God forbid that we should give our consent to the choice of such a captain, under whose conduct we might go down again unto Paganism, — to the erecting of such an idol into the throne of the Almighty. No, doubtless, let us be most indulgent to our wills, and assign them all the liberty that is competent unto a created nature, to do all things freely according to election and foregoing counsel, being free from all natural necessity and outward compulsion; but for all this, let us not presume to deny God's effectual assistance, his particular powerful influence into the wills and actions of his creatures, directing of them to a voluntary performance of what he has determined: which the Arminians opposing in the behalf of their darling free-will, do work in the hearts of men an overweening of their own power, and an absolute independence of the providence of God; for, —

First, they deny that God (in whom we live, and move, and have our being) does anything by his providence, ⁶⁶"whereby the creature should be stirred up, or helped in any of his actions." That is, God wholly leaves a man in the hand of his own counsel, to the disposal of his own absolute independent power, without any respect to his providence at all; whence, as they do, they may well conclude, ⁶⁷"that those things which God would have to be done of us freely" (such as are all human actions), “he cannot himself will or work more powerfully and effectually than by the way of wishing or desiring,” as Vorstius speaks; which is no more than one man can do concerning another, perhaps far less than an angel. I can wish or desire that another man would do what I have a mind he should; but, truly, to describe the providence of God by such expressions seems to me intolerable blasphemy. But thus it must be; without such helps as these, Dagon cannot keep on his head, nor the idol of uncontrollable free will enjoy his dominion.

Hence Corvinus will grant⁶⁸ that the killing of a man by the slipping of an axe’s head from the helve, although contingent, may be said to happen according to God’s counsel and determinate will; but on no terms will he yield that this may be applied to actions wherein the counsel and freedom of man’s will do take place, as though that they also should have dependence on any such overruling power; — whereby he absolutely excludes the providence of God from having any sovereignty within the territory of human actions, which is plainly to shake off the yoke of his dominion, and to make men lords paramount within themselves: so that they may well ascribe unto God (as they do⁶⁹) only a deceivable expectation of those contingent things that are yet for to come, there being no act of his own in the producing of such effects on which he can ground any certainty; only, he may take a conjecture, according to his guess at men’s inclinations. And, indeed, this is the Helen for whose enjoyment, these thrice ten years, they have maintained warfare with the hosts of the living God; their whole endeavor being to prove, that, notwithstanding the performance of all things, on the part of God, required for the production of any action, ⁷⁰yet the will of man remains absolutely free, yea, in respect of the event, as well as its manner of operation, to do it or not to do it. That is, notwithstanding God’s decree that such an action shall be performed, and his foreknowledge that it will so come to pass; notwithstanding his cooperating with the will of man (as far as they will allow him) for the doing of it, and though he hath determined by that act of man to execute some of his own judgments; ⁷¹yet there is no kind of necessity but that he may as well omit as do it: which is all one as if they should say, “Our tongues are our own; we ought to speak: who is lord over us? We will vindicate ourselves into a liberty of doing what and how we will, though for it we cast God out of his throne.” And, indeed, if we mark it, we shall find them undermining and pulling down the actual providence of God, at the root and several branches thereof; for, —

First, For his conservation or sustaining of all things, they affirm⁷² it to be very likely that this is nothing but a negative act of his will, whereby he willeth or determineth not to destroy the things by him created; and when we produce places of Scripture which affirm that it is an act of his power, they say they are foolishly cited. So that, truly, let the Scripture say what it will, (in their conceit,) God does no more sustain and uphold all his creatures than I do a house when I do not set it on fire, or a worm when I do not tread upon it. [i.e., Arminian beliefs are irrational]

Secondly, For God’s concurring with inferior causes in all their acts and working, they affirm it to be only ⁷³ a general influence, alike upon all and every one, which they may use or not use at their pleasure, and in the use determine it to this or that effect, be it good or bad (so Corvinus), as it seems best unto them. In a word, to the will of man ⁷⁴it is nothing but what suffers it to play its own part freely, according to its inclination; as they jointly speak in their Confession. Observe, also, that they account this influence of his providence not to be into the agent, the will of man, whereby that should be helped or enabled to do anything (no, that would seem to grant a self-sufficiency), ⁷⁵but only into the act itself for its production: as if I should help a man to lift a log, it becomes perhaps unto him so much the lighter, but he is not made one jot the stronger; which takes off the proper work of providence, consisting in an internal assistance.

Thirdly, For God's determining or circumscribing the will of man to do this or that in particular, they absolutely explode it, as a thing destructive to their adored liberty. 76 "It is no way consistent with it," say they, in their Apology. So also Arminius: 77 "The providence of God doth not determine the will of man to one part of the contradiction." That is, "God hath not determined that you shall, nor does by any means overrule your wills, to do this thing rather than that, to do this or to omit that." So that the sum of their endeavor is, to prove that the will of man is so absolutely free, independent, and uncontrollable, that God doth not, nay, with all his power cannot, determine it certainly and infallibly to the performance of this or that particular action, thereby to accomplish his own purposes, to attain his own ends. Truly, it seems to me the most unfortunate attempt that ever Christians lighted on; which, if it should get success answerable to the greatness of the undertaking, the providence of God, in men's esteem, would be almost thrust quite out of the world. "Tantæ molis erat." The new goddess contingency could not be erected until the God of heaven was utterly despoiled of his dominion over the sons of men, and in the room thereof a home-bred idol of self-sufficiency set up, and the world persuaded to worship it. But that the building climb no higher, let all men observe how the word of God overthrows this Babylonian tower.

First, then, In innumerable places it is punctual that his providence does not only bear rule in the counsels of men and their most secret resolutions, (whence the prophet declares that he knows that "the way of man is not in himself," — that "it is not in man that walks to direct his steps," Jer. x. 23; and Solomon, that "a man's heart, devises his way, but the Lord directs his steps," Prov. xvi. 9; David, also, having laid this ground, that "the Lord brings the counsel of the heathen to naught," and "makes the devices of the people of none effect," but "his own counsel stands for ever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations," Ps. xxxiii. 10, 11, proceeds accordingly, in his own distress, to pray that the Lord would infatuate and make 78 "foolish the counsel of Ahithophel," 2 Sam. xv. 31, — which also the Lord did, by working in the heart of Absalom to hearken to the cross counsel of Hushai); but also, secondly, That the working of his providence is effectual even in the hearts and wills of men to turn them which way he will, and to determine them to this or that in particular, according as he pleaseth: "The preparations of the heart in man, and the answer of the tongue, is from the Lord," saith Solomon, Prov. xvi. 1; — which Jacob trusted and relied on when he prayed that the Lord would grant his sons to find favor and mercy before that man whom then he supposed to be some atheistical Egyptian, Gen. xliii. 14; whence we must grant, either that the good old man believed that it was in the hand of God to incline and unalterably turn and settle the heart of Joseph to favor his brethren, or else his prayer must have had such a senseless sense as this: "Grant, O Lord, such a general influence of thy providence, that the heart of that man may be turned to good towards my sons, or else that it may not, being left to its own freedom." A strange request! yet how it may be bettered by one believing the Arminian doctrine I cannot conceive. Thus Solomon affirms that "the king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, like the rivers of water: he turns it whithersoever he will," Prov. xxi. 1. If the heart of a king, who hath an inward natural liberty equal with others, and an outward liberty belonging to his state and condition above them, be yet so in the hand of the Lord as that he always turns it to what he pleases in particular, then certainly other men are not excepted from the rule of the same providence; which is the plain sense of these words, and the direct thesis which we maintain in opposition to the Arminian idol of absolute independent free-will¹. So Daniel, also, reproving the Babylonian tyrant, affirms that he "glorified not the God in whose hand was his breath, and whose were all his ways," chap. v. 23. Not only his breath and life, but also all his ways, his actions, thoughts, and words, were in the hand of God.

Yea, thirdly, sometimes the saints of God, as I touched before, do pray that God would be pleased thus to determine their hearts, and bend their wills, and wholly incline them to some one certain thing, and that without any prejudice to their true and proper liberty: so David, Ps. cxix. 36, “Incline my heart unto thy testimonies, and not to covetousness.” This prayer being his may also be ours, and we may ask it in faith, relying on the power and promise of God in Christ that he will perform our petitions, John xiv. 14. Now, I desire any Christian to resolve, whether, by these and the like requests, he intends to desire at the hand of God nothing but such an indifferent motion to any good as may leave him to his own choice whether he will do it or no, which is all the Arminians will grant him; or rather, that he would powerfully bend his heart and soul unto his testimonies, and work in him an actual embracing of all the ways of God, not desiring more liberty, but only enough to do it willingly. Nay, surely the prayers of God’s servants, requesting, with Solomon, that the Lord would be with them, and “incline their heart unto him, to keep his statutes and walk in his commandments,” 1 Kings viii. 57, 58; and with David, to “create in them a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within them,” Ps. li. 10; when, according to God’s promises, they entreat him “to put his fear into their hearts,” Jer. xxxii. 40, “to unite their hearts to fear his name,” Ps. lxxxvi. 11, to work in them both the will and the deed, an actual obedience unto his law; — cannot possibly aim at nothing but a general influence, enabling them alike either to do or not to do what they so earnestly long after.

Fourthly, The certainty of divers promises and threatenings of Almighty God depends upon his powerful determining and turning the wills and hearts of men which way he pleaseth; thus, to them that fear him he promises that they shall find favor in the sight of men, Prov. iii. 4. Now, if, notwithstanding all God’s powerful operation in their hearts, it remaineth absolutely in the hands of men whether they will favor them that fear him or no, it is wholly in their power whether God shall be true in his promises or no. Surely when Jacob wrestled with God on the strength of such promise, Gen. xxxii. 12, he little thought of any question whether it were in the power of God to perform it. Yea, and the event showed that there ought to be no such question, chap. xxxiii.; for the Lord turned the heart of his brother Esau, as he does of others when he makes them pity his servants when at any time they have carried them away captives, Ps. cvi. 46. See, also, the same powerful operation required to the execution of his judgments, Job xii. 17, xx. 21, etc. In brief, there is no prophecy nor prediction in the whole Scripture, no promise to the church or faithful, to whose accomplishment the free actions and concurrence of men are required, but evidently declares that God disposes of the hearts of men, rules their wills, inclines their affections, and determines them freely to choose and do what he in his good pleasure hath decreed shall be performed; — such as were the prophecies of deliverance from the Babylonish captivity by Cyrus, Isa. xlv.; of the conversion of the Gentiles; of the stability of the church, Matt. xvi.; of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, chap. xxiv.; with innumerable others. I will add only some few reasons for the close of this long discourse.

This opinion, that God has nothing but a general influence into the actions of men, not effectually moving their wills to this or that in particular, —

First, Grants a goodness of entity, or being, unto divers things, whereof God is not the author, as those special actions which men perform without his special concurrence; which is blasphemous. The apostle affirms that “of him are all things.”

Secondly, It denies God to be the author of all moral goodness, for an action is good inasmuch as it is such an action in particular; 79 which that any is so, according to this opinion, is to be attributed merely to the will of man. The general influence of God moves him no more to prayer than to evil communications tending to the corruption of good manners.

Thirdly, It makes all the decrees of God, whose execution dependeth on human actions, to be altogether uncertain, and his foreknowledge of such things to be fallible and easily to be deceived; so that there is no reconciliation possible to be hoped for betwixt these following and the like assertions:—

43 S. S.	Lib. Arbit.
“In him we live, and move, and have our being,” Acts xvii. 28.	“God’s sustaining of all things is not an affirmative act of his power, but a negative act of his will.”
“He upholdeth all things by the word of his power,” Heb. i. 3.	— “Whereby he will not destroy them,” Rem. Apol.
“Thou hast wrought all our works in us,” Isa. xxvi. 12. “My Father worketh hitherto,” John v. 17.	“God by his influence bestows nothing on the creature whereby it may be incited or helped in its actions,” Corvinus.
“The preparations of the heart in man, and the answer of the tongue, is from the Lord,” Prov. xvi. 1. “The king’s heart is in the hand of the Lord, like the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will,” Prov. xxi. 1.	“Those things God would have us freely do ourselves; he can no more effectually work or will than by the way of wishing,” Vorstius.
“Incline my heart unto thy testimonies, and not to covetousness,” Ps. cxix. 36. “Unite my heart to fear thy name,” Ps. lxxxvi. 11. “The God in whose hand try breath is, and whose are all try ways, thou hast not glorified,” Dan. v. 23.	“The providence of God doth not determine the free-will of man to this or that particular, or to one part of the contradiction,” Arminius.

43	S. S.	Lib. Arbit.
	See Matt. xxvii. 1 , compared with Acts ii. 23 , and iv. 27 , 28 ; Luke xxiv. 27 ; John xix. 31–36 . For the necessity of other events, see Exod. xxi. 17 ; Job xiv. 5 ; Matt. xix. 7 , etc.	“The will of man ought to be free from all kind of internal and external necessity in its actions,” Rem. That is, God cannot lay such a necessity upon any thing as that it shall infallibly come to pass as he intendeth. See the contrary in the places cited.

¹ Yet here observe, that we do not absolutely oppose free-will, as if it were “nomen inane,” a mere figment, when there is no such thing in the world, but only in that sense the Pelagians and Arminians do assert it. About words we will not contend. We grant man, in the substance of all his actions, as much power, liberty, and freedom as a mere created nature is capable of [called "ceaturely freedom" in theological circles]. We grant him to be free in his choice from all outward coaction or inward natural necessity, to work according to election and deliberation, spontaneously embracing what seemeth good unto him. Now, call this power free-will, or what you please, so you make it not supreme, independent, and boundless [that's the key! Arminians will not yield this point.], we are not at all troubled. The imposition of names depends upon the discretion of their inventers. Again; even in spiritual things, we deny that our wills are at all debarred, or deprived of their proper liberty: but here we say, indeed, that we are not properly free until the Son makes us free [Amen!]; — no great use of freedom in that wherein we can do nothing at all. We do not claim such a liberty as should make us despise the grace of God, whereby we may attain true liberty indeed; which addeth to, but taketh nothing from, our original freedom. But of this after I have showed what an idol the Arminians make of free-will. Only take notice in the entrance that we speak of it now, not as it was at first by God created, but as it is now by sin corrupted; yet, being considered in that estate also, they ascribe more unto it than it was ever capable of.

Notes on Conversion Being Irresistible
 (Yet Without Coercion! Hence, The Doctrine of Concurrence) from Concerning Efficacious Grace
 by Jonathan Edwards

§ 50. God is said to give true virtue and piety of heart to man; to work it in him, to create it, to form it, and with regard to it we are said to be his workmanship. Yea, that there may be no room to understand it in some improper sense, it is often declared as the peculiar character of God, that he assumes it as his character to be the author and giver of true virtue, in his being called the Sanctifier; he that sanctifieth us. "I am he that sanctifieth you." This is spoken of as the great prerogative of God, Lev. xx. 8, and other parallel places. He declares expressly that this effect shall be connected with his act, or with what he shall do in order to it. "I will sprinkle clean water, and you shall be clean. [497] " What God does is often spoken of as thoroughly effectual; the effect is infallibly consequent. "Turn us, and we shall be turned." [498] Jesus Christ has the great character of a Saviour on this account, that "he saves his people from their sins." [499] See Rom. xi. 26, 27. "And so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, there shall come out of Zion a deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins." God says, "I will put my law into their heart; I will write my law in their inward parts, and they shall not depart away from me; I will take away the heart of stone, and give them a heart of flesh; I will give them a heart to know me; I will circumcise their hearts to love me; oh, that there were such a heart in them!" And it is spoken of as his work, to give, to cause, to create such a heart, to put it in them. God is said to incline their hearts, not only to give statutes, but to incline their hearts to his statutes.

Concurrence - w/o coercion...

§ 45. Who ever supposed that the term irresistible was properly used with respect to that power by which an infant is brought into being; meaning, irresistible by the infant? Or who ever speaks of a man's waking out of a sound sleep irresistibly, meaning, that he cannot resist awaking? Or who says, that Adam was formed out of the dust of the earth irresistibly? See what I have said of the use of such terms as irresistible, unfrustrable, &c. in my Inquiry about Liberty. \[Christians are a new creation, 2Cor. 5:17; God works this in you. How can you resist that? Could Adam have resisted his natural creation; could you resist your natural birth? So, being born again is irresistible; once you were blind and now you can see. It is impossible to frustrate this work by your stubbornness or supposed unwillingness for that is the very thing that God removes in his act of regeneration by his mighty power \(Ps. 110:3, Ezek. 26:26, he removes the stony heart.\) and you come out willing! To be made willing by force or coercion is impossible; it is a contradiction. All of this is marvelous mystery. Left to ourselves we would never believe.

Romans 9:19

¹⁹ You will say to me then, "Why does he still find fault? For who can resist his will?"

Phil. 2:13

¹³ for it is God who works in you, both to will and to work for his good pleasure.

2Cor. 5:17

¹⁷ Therefore, if anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation.

Thomas Shepard states regarding this irresistible grace:

Because all divine light of glory is ever powerful through Christ to change the heart. Hence if hypocrites had it, their hearts would be sincere, which is not so, and hence they ever want [lack] it, whatever light else they have; and hence those that have it must be sincere, John 8:32, "You shall know the truth, and it shall make you free," i.e., from your bondage of fears and sins; hence David prays for light, Psalm 119:33, 34, and then he shall be set at liberty. As iron is drawn to the load-stone by a secret hidden virtue, so there is a secret virtue of divine light that draws the most iron heart; nay, changes it, John 17:17, "Sanctify them through thy truth," etc. For this is the difference between God and man's teaching; and hence when the gospel comes in power, it comes in demonstration; whereby the heart is mightily overpowered, that it cannot but fall down before God, whose voice and truth it hears. And hence the young man saw some worth in Christ, but not enough, and hence he forsook Christ. Truth is not stones, but bread to them that see it indeed. Thomas Shepard, The Parable of the Ten Virgins, pg 231

Notes on Concurrency & Compatibilism

Concurrency is subcategory of Compatibilism; in other words, Concurrency evidences the Truth of Compatibilism, that God's eternal decree or determinate will is consistent with man's liberty or creaturely freedom and responsibility without doing violence to either God or man. Concurrency means that God and man (with all different manner of intent) are both acting and working simultaneously, or concurrently to bring about God's eternal decree.

God's Sovereignty over the wills of men

By G Clark

This thing I was talking about is the doctrine of concurrence, where the will of God, his eternal decree or his will of decree, is consistent with man's liberty; so even though God predestines everything to happen, this does not turn people into puppets or blocks of wood. As rational creatures with the faculties of a will, of knowledge/reason and the affections, it is an inconsistency to have these occur in their due exercise by coercion....and God has designed it as such, e.g., for God loves a cheerful giver. God does not work by compulsion in rational beings like us, and thus does no violence to man's creaturely freedom or liberty. This is heavy, a great mystery. For if God is sovereign over his creation, that his will, his eternal decree, will be done, many presume that he must force men to do things they object to, thus doing violence to their creaturely liberty/freedom. And many argue this way in objection to God's sovereignty (or freedom) over the wills of men, that God turns men into puppets or blocks of wood. But this is a straw-man argument, for this is not the case!

If God made everything out of nothing (ex nihilo), that argues a most perfect, absolute, and universal derivation and dependence. [Edwards] In other words we are not autonomous creatures, with God off in the distance somewhere, watching his creation, his creatures, live and move and have their being all by themselves! (Deism) So with this biblical view, the experience Titus in 2Cor, 16-17 (below), Joseph and his brothers in Genesis, the Assyrians as instruments in God's hands to punish Israel in Isa. 10, the act of conversion by the Holy Spirit, and many other like acts illustrate this amazing (humbling) doctrine. This is where many people including Christians (unwittingly so) find the doctrine of predestination objectionable. Why? Because it crushes man's corrupt notion that he is an autonomous, independent being; that his freedom is the same as God (or even more preeminent!), making man gods, the captain of his own soul, and that it is unfair to put man in a corner (doing violence to his freedom) by forcing him to do things or think things or, e.g., believe in Christ, against his will. For man's declaration of independence insists that there is nothing, including God's influences, that is allowed to sway him one way or the other; man's deciding must originate from his own will, his supposed self-directed will. (But was this not the sin of Adam and Eve!!! declaring their independence from God's law!) But as I said above, this is straw-man argument! God does not force people to do or think anything, but he does direct them - their wills and acts etc., without forcing them; and that's the mystery. I don't know of anyone who was forced to believe in Jesus! That is a contradiction! And yet Jesus says in John 6:37, all that the Father gives me will come to me. The Assyrians were not forced as instruments in God's hand; they loved to rape and pillage! In other words, they didn't say to God, O God, don't have us do this unspeakable thing. They loved doing it on their own accord. And there's more! Afterwards, God says that he will punish the Assyrian Captain for the haughtiness of his heart! God decrees Israel's destruction, has the Assyrians do it, and then punishes the Assyrians for their pride. That's the mystery; I understand it but don't comprehend it. Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high; I cannot attain it, as the Psalmist says in Ps 139:6. You gotta read this in Isaiah 10:12-16 ---my comments in [blue]

¹² When the Lord has finished all his work on Mount Zion and on Jerusalem, he will punish the speech of the arrogant heart of the king of Assyria and the boastful look in his eyes. ¹³ For he says:

"By the strength of my hand I have done it, [there's man's declaration of self-reliance, independence etc., typical of our fallen sinful nature] and by my wisdom, for I have understanding;

I remove the boundaries of peoples,

and plunder their treasures;

like a bull I bring down those who sit on thrones. [See?! They love to pillage, etc.]

¹⁴ My hand has found like a nest

the wealth of the peoples;
 and as one gathers eggs that have been forsaken,
 so I have gathered all the earth;
 and there was none that moved a wing
 or opened the mouth or chirped.”

¹⁵ Shall the axe boast over him who hews with it, [Here's God sovereignty over man described] or the saw magnify itself against him who wields it?

 As if a rod should wield him who lifts it,
 or as if a staff should lift him who is not wood!

 will send wasting sickness among his stout warriors, [God's judgment, like we're seeing now in our country due to national sins] and under his glory a burning will be kindled,
 like the burning of fire.

Here are some of the innumerable passages that speak to this. My comments in [blue], red for emphasis Prov. 16:9 A man's heart plans his way, But the LORD directs his steps.

Jer. 10:23:24 O LORD, I know the way of man is not in himself; It is not in man who walks to direct his own steps. ²⁴ O LORD, correct me, but with justice; Not in Your anger, lest You bring me to nothing.

Prov. 21:1 The king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, Like the [Ⓜ]rivers of water; He turns it wherever He wishes. [like he did with Nebuchadnezzar.... and Pharaoh, Titus, and all that ever get born again or saved.]

And if this is true, and it is, then your heart is also in his hands! then how can we not have a reverential fear of God!, and have a desire to seek him out all the more; this is seen in Phil. 2 here:

Phil 2:12-13 ...but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; ¹³ for it is God who works in you both to will and to do for His good pleasure. [God's good pleasure is the same thing as his will of decree or his secret will that is always accomplished without fail. Dan. 4:35, Ps. 115, "He does all he pleases." His prescriptive will or will of command is different, e.g., you shall not murder; but people do murder, ...or steal, or lie, etc.]

This one is a key passage on concurrence:

2Cor. 8:16 ¹⁶ But thanks be to God who [Ⓜ]puts the same earnest care for you into the heart of Titus. ¹⁷ [there's God sovereignty over the souls/wills of men] For he not only accepted the exhortation, but being more diligent, he went to you of his own accord. [There's Titus acting of his own accord not out of coercion.]

Here is an excerpt from Jonathan Edwards on this:

§ 52. If it be as the Arminians suppose, that all men's virtue is of the determination of their own free will, independent on any prior determining, deciding, and disposing of the event; that it is no part of the ordering of God, whether there be many virtuous or few in the world, whether there shall be much virtue or little, or where it shall be, in what nation, country, or when, or in what generation or age; or whether there shall be any at all: then none of these things belong to God's disposal, and therefore, surely it does not belong to him to promise them. For it does not belong to him to promise in an affair, concerning which he has not the disposal.

And how can God promise, as he oftentimes does in his word, glorious times, when righteousness shall generally prevail, and his will shall generally be done; and yet that it is not an effect which belongs to him to determine; it is not left to his determination, but to the sovereign, arbitrary determination of others, independently on any determination of him; and therefore surely they ought to be the promisers? For him to promise, who has it not in his hand to dispose and determine, is a great absurdity; and yet God oftentimes in promising, speaks of himself as the sovereign disposer of the matter, using such expressions as abundantly imply it. Isa. Lx. 22. "I the Lord do hasten it in its time." [Also Isa 46:9-11] Surely this is the language of promiser, and not merely a predictor. God promises Abraham, that "all the families of the earth shall be blessed in him." God swears Rom. Xiv. 11. "every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess." And it is said to be given to Christ, that every nation, &c. should serve and obey him, Dan. Vii. After what manner they shall serve and obey him, is abundantly declared in other prophecies, as in Isa. Xi. and innumerable others. These are spoken of in the next chapter, as excellent things that God does.

And this next excerpt by Edwards is about the doctrine of concurrence that I briefly outlined above:

§ 64. In efficacious grace we are not merely passive, nor yet does God do some, and we do the rest. But God does all, and we do all. God produces all, and we act all. For that is what he produces, viz. our own acts. God is the only proper author and fountain; we only are the proper actors. We are, in different respects, wholly passive and wholly active.

In the Scriptures the same things are represented as from God and from us. God is said to convert, and men are said to convert and turn. God makes a new heart, and we are commanded to make us a new heart. God circumcises the heart, and we are commanded to circumcise our own hearts; not merely because we must use the means in order to the effect, but the effect itself is our act and our duty. These things are agreeable to that text, "God worketh in you both to will and to do." Phil. 2:13

A note from G Vos on concurrence and the mystical union with Christ:

28. What can we establish further concerning this union with Christ?

a) It is not a unity that resides in the ordinary concursus of God. God is present in every creature by His co-action. And insofar as Christ as Logos sustains all things, He also has a certain immanent association with all created spirits. This, however, is a union of the Logos-God with the creature as creature. The mystical union is a union of the person of the Mediator with the regenerate person as such.

Side note on current day happenings:

So what is happening in this country (2022), why it's going south beyond our wildest dreams, is due to God's judgment because of national sins e.g., abortion, sexual perversion of all kinds, man's general apostasy. This country is rebelling against God with a high hand; brazenly. So, God is giving many, including our leaders, over to a depraved mind. Read Romans 1:24-32. This is why so many people are without reason and morals, etc. God has given them over. AND God has given us children as leaders as part of this judgment. Read Isa. 3:4 -

"I will give children to be their princes,
And babes shall rule over them.

⁵The people will be oppressed,

Every one by another and every one by his neighbor; [How? God withdraws his common graces that restrain sin. Hence people sin more and you get drama...cancel culture, Marxism, self-destruction follows.]

The child will be insolent toward the elder,
And the base toward the honorable."

Here's more of this passage

For Jerusalem stumbled,
And Judah is fallen,
Because their tongue and their doings
Are against the LORD,

To provoke the eyes of His glory.

⁹The look on their countenance witnesses against them,
And they declare their sin as Sodom;

They do not hide it.

Woe to their soul!

For they have brought evil upon themselves.

Meditate on these things.

3. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE DIVINE CONCURRENCE (excerpts by Louis Berkhof) see code446a

1. THE IDEA OF DIVINE CONCURRENCE AND SCRIPTURAL PROOF FOR IT.

a. Definition and explanation. Concurrence may be defined as the co-operation of the divine power with all subordinate powers, according to the pre-established laws of their operation, causing them to act and to act precisely as they do. Some are inclined to limit its operation, as far as man is concerned.

to human actions that are morally good and therefore commendable; others, more logically, extend it to actions of every kind. It should be noted at the outset that this doctrine implies two things: (1) That the powers of nature do not work by themselves, that is, simply by their own inherent power, but that God is immediately operative in every act of the creature. This must be maintained in opposition to the deistic position. (2) That second causes are real, and not to be regarded simply as the operative power of God. It is only on condition that second causes are real, that we can properly speak of a concurrence or co-operation of the First Cause with secondary causes.

He worketh all things in all, I Cor. 12:6, and worketh all things, also in this respect, according to the counsel of His will, Eph. 1:11. He gave Israel power to get wealth, Deut. 8:18, and worketh in believers both to will and to do according to His good pleasure, Phil. 2:13. Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians of all kinds are generally willing to admit that the creature cannot act apart from an influx of divine power, but maintain that this is not so specific that it determines the character of the action in any way.

b. It is also a simultaneous concurrence. After the activity of the creature is begun, the efficacious will of God must accompany it at every moment, if it is to continue. There is not a single moment that the creature works independently of the will and the power of God. It is in Him that we live and move and have our being, Acts 17:28. This divine activity accompanies the action of man at every point, but without robbing man in any way of his freedom. The action remains the free act of man, an act for which he is held responsible.

2. ERRORS THAT SHOULD BE AVOIDED. There are several errors against which we should guard in connection with this doctrine.

a. That it consists merely in a general communication of power, without determining the specific action in any way. Jesuits, Socinians, and Arminians maintain that the divine concurrence is only a general and indifferent co-operation, so that it is the second cause that directs the action to its particular end. It is common alike to all causes, quickening them into action, but in a way that is entirely indeterminate. While it stimulates the second cause, it leaves this to determine its own particular kind and mode of action. But if this were the situation, it would be in the power of man to frustrate the plan of God, and the First Cause would become subservient to the second. Man would be in control, and there would be no divine providence.

b. That it is of such a nature that man does part of the work and God a part. The co-operation of God and man is sometimes represented as if it were something like the joint efforts of a team of horses pulling together, each one doing his part. This is a mistaken view of the distribution of the work. As a matter of fact each deed is in its entirety both a deed of God and a deed of the creature. It is a deed of God in so far as there is nothing that is independent of the divine will, and in so far as it is determined from moment to moment by the will of God. And it is a deed of man in so far as God realizes it through the self-activity of the creature. There is interpenetration here, but no mutual limitation.

c. That the work of God and that of the creature in concurrence are co-ordinate. This is already excluded by what was said in the preceding. The work of God always has the priority, for man is dependent on God in all that he does. The statement of Scripture, "Without me ye can do nothing," applies in every field of endeavor. The exact relation of the two is best indicated in the following characteristics of the divine concurrence.

3. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE DIVINE CONCURRENCE.

a. It is previous and pre-determining, not in a temporal but in a logical sense. There is no absolute principle of self-activity in the creature, to which God simply joins His activity. In every instance the impulse to action and movement proceeds from God. There must be an influence of divine energy before the creature can work. It should be noted particularly that this influence does not terminate on the activity of the creature, but on the creature itself. God causes everything in nature to work and to move in the direction of a pre-determined end. So God also enables and prompts His rational creatures, as second causes, to function, and that not merely by endowing them with energy in a general way, but by energizing them to certain specific acts. He worketh all things in all, I Cor. 12:6, and worketh all things, also in this respect, according to the counsel of His will, Eph. 1:11. He gave Israel power to get wealth, Deut. 8:18, and worketh in believers both to will and to do according to His good pleasure, Phil. 2:13. Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians of all kinds are generally willing to admit that the creature cannot act apart from an influx of divine power, but maintain that this is not so specific that it determines the character of the action in any way.

b. It is also a simultaneous concurrence. After the activity of the creature is begun, the efficacious will of God must accompany it at every moment, if it is to continue. There is not a single moment that the creature works independently of the will and the power of God. It is in Him that we live and move and have our being, Acts 17:28. This divine activity accompanies the action of man at every point, but without robbing man in any way of his freedom. The action remains the free act of man, an act for which he is held responsible. This simultaneous concurrence does not result in an identification of the causa prima and the causa secunda. In a very real sense the operation is the product of both causes. Man is and remains the real subject of the action.

This is a good summary of conversion, its effects on the soul by grace; on the will, mind, and the affections, Very good for self-examination!

Saving Grace and the Effects On the Soul

John Flavel, Vol. 6 pgs 30-36

Code443

Chap. IV

Wherein the nature of this work of grace, in which our habitual fitness for suffering lies, is briefly opened, and an account given of the great advantage the gracious person hath for any, even the hardest work thereby.

Having in the former chapter plainly evinced the necessity of saving grace to fit a man for suffering; it will be expected now that some account be given you of the nature of the work, and how it advantages a man for the discharge of the hardest services in religion. Both which I shall open in this chapter by a distinct explication of the parts of this description of it.

What Saving Grace Is

This work of grace, of which I am here to speak, consists in the real change of the whole man by the Spirit of God, whereby he is prepared for every good work: In which brief description I shall open these four things to you,

1. That it is a change; that is palpably evident, both from scripture and experience, 2Cor. 5:17, "Old things are past away, behold all things are become new;" and it is so sensible a change, that it is called a turning from darkness to light, Acts 26:18 and a new creature formed and brought forth. But to be a little more distinct and particular, there are several other changes that pass upon men, which must not be mistaken for this; and therefore, (1.) It is not a mere change of the judgment from error to truth, from Paganism to Christianity. Such a change Simon Magus had, yet still remained in the gall of bitterness, and fast bound in the bonds of iniquity, Acts 8:23 (2.) Nor only of a man's practice, from profaneness to civility. This is common among such as live under the light of the gospel, which breaking into men's consciences, thwarts their lusts, and over-awes them with the fears of hell; which is no more than what the Gentiles had, Rom. 2:15. (3.) Nor is it a change from mere morality to mere formality in religion. Thus hypocrites are changed by the common gifts of the Spirit, illuminating their minds, and slightly touching their affections, Heb. 6:4-5. (4.) Nor is it such a change as justification makes, which is relative, and only alters the state and condition, Rom. 5:1-2. (5.) Lastly, it is not a change of the essence of a man; he remains essentially the same person still. But this change consists in the infusion of a new habits of grace into the old faculties; which immediately depose sin from its dominion over the soul, and deliver up the soul into the hands and government of Christ, so that it lives no more to itself, but to Christ. This is that change whereof we speak. And this change (2.) I assert to be real, no fancy, no delusion; not a groundless conceit, but it is really existent, extra mentum, whether you conceit it or not. Indeed the blind world would persuade us it is suppositious and fantastic; and that there is no such real difference betwixt one man and another as we affirm grace makes. And hence it is, that whosoever professeth it, is presently branded for a fanatic; and that scripture, Isa. 56:5, Stand for thyself, I am holier than thou, etc., clapt in their teeth in their absurd and perverse sense of it.

But I shall briefly offer these seven things to your consideration, which will abundantly evince the reality of it, and at once both stop the slanderous mouths of ignorant men, and silence those atheistical surmises, which t any time Satan my inject into the hearts of God's own people touching this matter. And first, let it be considered, that the Spirit of God hath represented to us this work of grace under such names and notions in scripture, as if they had been chosen purposely to obviate this calumny [bad mouthing]. It is called a creature, Gal. 6:15, a man, 1Pet. 3:4, a new birth, John 3:8, Christ formed in us, Gal. 4:12. All of which express its reality, and that it is not a conceited thing. (2.) It appears to be real by the marvelous effects it hath upon a man, turning him both in judgment, will, affections, and practice, quite counter to what he was before. This is evident in that famous instance of Paul, Gal. 1:23, which is abundantly attested and sealed by the constant experience of all gracious souls that are witnesses of the truth hereof. (3.) A divine and Almighty power goes forth to produce and work it; and hence faith is said to be of the operation of God, Col. 2:12. Yea, that the same power which raised Jesus Christ from the dead, goes to the production of it, Eph. 1:19-20. And if so, how much less than blasphemy is it to call it a conceit or fancy? Doth God set on work his infinite power to beget a fancy, or raise an imagination? (4.) Conceits and whimsies abound most in men of weak reason. Children, and such as are crackt in their understandings, have most of them. Strength of reason banishes them, as the sun doth mists and vapors. But now the more rational any gracious person is, by so much the more hi is fixed, settled, and satisfied in the grounds of religion. Yea, there is the highest and purest reason in religion; and when this change is wrought upon men, it is carried on in a rational way, Isa. 1:18. The Spirit over powers the understanding with clear demonstrations, and silences all objections, please, and pretences to the contrary. (5.) It is a real thing, and gracious souls know it to be so; else so many thousands of the saints would never have suffered so many cruel torments and miseries, rather than forsake a fancy, and so save all. They have been so well satisfied of the reality of that which the world calls a fancy, that they have chosen rather to embrace the stake than to deny it. The constancy of Christians in cleaving to religion was common to a proverb among the heathen: who when they would express the greatest difficulty, would say, 'You may as soon turn a Christian from Christ as do it.' Surely no wise man would sacrifice his liberty, estate, life, and all that is dear, for a conceit. (6.) Its reality appears in its uniformity in all those in whom it is wrought. They have all obtained like precious faith, 2Pet. 1:1. They are all changed into the same image, 2Cor. 3:18. Three thousand persons affected in one and the same manner at one sermon, Acts 2:37. Could one and the same conceit possess them altogether? Take two Christians that live a thousand miles distant from each other, that never heard of one another, let these persons be examined, and their reports compared, and see if they do not substantially agree, and whether as face answers face in the water, so their experience do not answer one to the other? Which could never be, if it were a groundless conceit. (7.) And lastly, it is manifest it is a reality, and puts a real difference betwixt one and another, because God carries himself so differently towards them after their conversion; now he smiles, before he frowned; now they are under the promises, before they were under the threats and curses and what a vast difference will he put betwixt the one and the other in that great day? See Matt. 25. Surely if these nominal Christians did but differ in conceit, not really from others, the righteous Judge of all the earth would not pass such a different judgment and doom upon them.

By all this you evidently see, that grace is a real change, and not a conceited one.

3. We say that this real change passes upon the whole man; he is changed in soul, body, and practice; all things are become new. (1.) This change appears in his soul. For by it, (1.) His understanding is strangely altered, and receive things in another way than formerly. It did look at Christ and things eternal as uncertain and light matters; the things that are seen and present do mostly affect, and appeared great and excellent. It admired riches and honor, whilst Christ and glory were overlooked and despised. But now all these temporals are esteemed dung, dross, vanity, Phil. 3:8, 11, Rom. 8:18. And Jesus Christ is not esteemed the wisdom and the power of God, 1Cor.1:23, 24. It did look on the saints as despicable persons, but now as the excellent of the earth, Ps. 16:3. Strictness and duty was once esteemed a needless thing, but now the only thing desirable, Ps. 119:14, "Oh, saith the renewed soul, where were mine eyes, that I could see no more excellency in Christ, his ways and people?" (2.) It stopped not there (as it doth in hypocrites) but passes on further, and reduces the will; that strong hold is taken, and delivered up to Christ. it did rebel against God, and could not be subject, but now it submits, Acts 9:6, Lord, what wilt thou have me do? In the day of Christ's power he presents himself in all his drawing glory and loveliness before the will, and cries to that stubborn faculty, Open to me, open to me; with which word there goes forth an opening and subduing power, which the will no sooner feels, but it spontaneously moves towards him, and saith, Stand open ye everlasting gates, that the King of glory may come in. (Ps 24:9) Henceforth it votes for God, subscribes and submits to his will as its only rule and law; and indeed it becomes the principal seat where grace makes its residence; and where, for the most part, it is more visible than in any other faculty. For after a man hath searched for it in all other faculties, and cannot discern it, yet here he ordinarily finds it; to will is present, Romans 7:18. (3.) The will being thus gained to Christ, love comes in of course; it, feeling the power of grace also, presently changeth its object: It seizeth not so greedily on earthly object as before, but is strangely cooled and deadened to them; and often (especially at first) it is so weaned from all things on earth, that the temptation seems to lie on the other extreme, even in too great neglect of our lawful employments and comforts. Now Jesus Christ, Cant. 1:3, his ordinances, Ps. 119:97, and his saints, 1John 3:14, are the only delights and sweetest companions; he could sit from morning till night, to hear discourses of Christ his beloved, and could live and die in the company of his people, whose company is now most delightful and sweet, Ps 119:63. (4.) The desires are altered, they pant no more after the dust of the earth, Ps. 4:6, but pant for God, as the hart after the water-brooks, Ps. 42:1. Yea, so big is the soul with them, that it is sometimes ready to faint, yea, to break with the longing it hath after him, Ps. 119:20. (5.) The thoughts are changed, Ps 119:113, and the thoughts of God are now most precious, Ps. 139:47, musing when along of him; and in its solitudes the soul entertains itself with a delightful feast, which its thoughts of God bring in to refresh it, Ps. 63:5,6. (6.) The designs and projects of the soul are changed; all are now swallowed up in one grand design, even to approve himself to God, and be accepted of him, 2Cor. 5:9, and if he fail not there, it will not much trouble him, if all his other designs should be dashed. It were easy to instance in the rest of the affections, and shew how grace spreads and diffuses itself into them all, as light in the air, or leaven in the lump; but this may suffice, to shew how it passes upon the whole soul, and enters the several faculties and affections thereof.

And the soul being thus possessed for God, the body with all its members is consequently resigned p to him also. For the will hath the empire of the members of the body, as well as of the passions and affections of the soul. These are not anymore delivered up to execute the lusts of Satan, but are yielded up to God for his ends and uses. Rom. 6:19. And thus you have the third thing in the description made out also, that it is a universal, as well as a real change. Then,

4. Lastly, you must know that by this change God prepares a man for choice and excellent services; and this indeed is the main thing designed in this chapter, and is the result and issue of all that hath hitherto been said about this work of grace.

Beloved, can you imagine that God could employ his infinite and glorious power to produce this new creature in such an excellent nature, it being the master-piece of all his works of wonder wrought upon man, and not aim at come singular use and excellent end? Every wise agent designs some end; and what God aims at he hath told us, Isa. 43:21, Eph. 2:20. And accordingly he expects singular things from such person, Matt. 5:47. If God had not aimed at some new service, he need not have made a new creature; the old creature was fit enough for the old use and service it was employed in. But God hat some choice service to be done wherein he will be glorified. He will have his name glorified, even in this world, by the active and passive obedience of his people. But this being far above all the power of nature [man in an unconverted condition], God therefore brings them forth in a new and heavenly nature, endowed with rare, supernatural, and divine qualities, by which it is fitted and excellently prepared for any service of God, by doing or by suffering, which before he had no fitness or ability for. The very make and constitution of this new creature speaks its use and end. As now, if a man look upon a sword or knife, (supposing he had never seen either before) yet, I say, by viewing the shape and properties of it, he will say, this was made to cut. Even so here, this new creature was formed for some glorious and singular service for God, to which it is exceedingly advantaged, whether God put you upon doing or suffering. If you ask wherein this advantage of the new creature to honor God either way lies; I answer, it principally consists in its heavenly inclination, or natural tendency to God. This is its great advantage; for by virtue of this,

1. If God call a man to any duty, there is a principle within, closing with the command without, and moving the soul freely [code443a without coercion; good example is Titus in 2Cor. 8:16-17, "But thanks be to God who puts the same earnest care for you into the heart of Titus. ¹⁷ For he not only accepted the exhortation, but being more diligent, he went to you of his own accord." This is the doctrine of concurrence; see code211, etc.] and spontaneously to duty, Ps. 27:8. If God say, Seek my face, such a heart echoes to the call, Thy face, Lord, will I seek. And this is it which is called, The writing of God's law in the heart, Jer. 31:33 [³³ But this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, says the LORD: I will put My law in their minds, and write it on their hearts; and I will be their God, and they shall be My people.], and must needs be a mighty advantage; for now its work is its delight and wages, Ps 19:11. The command to such a soul is not grievous, 1John5:3, and by this it is kept from tiring in duty, and being weary of its work. As you see what pains children can take at play, how they will run and sweat, and endure knocks and falls, and take no notice of it; put them upon any manual labor, and they cannot endure half so much. When our work is our delight, we never faint nor tire at it. This inclination to God is to the soul as wings to a bird, or sails to a ship. This carries the soul easily through every duty. O there is a vast difference betwixt a man that works for wages, and one whose work is wages to him. And here you may say at once see wherein the principal difference betwixt the hypocrite and real Christian lies in the performance of duty; and also have a rue account of the reason why one perseveres in his work to the end, when the other flags. Why, here is the true account of both; the one is moved to duty from a natural inclination to it, the other is forced upon it by some external motives. [this is key!! The new man has new motives, i.e. a love for God; hence, this love for God is now natural to him.] For the hypocrite takes not delight in the spiritual and inward part of duty, but is secretly weary of it, Mal. 1:13, only his ambition and self-ends put him upon it as a task. [Other motives are self-love and self-preservation, especially in the motive behind the sinner's prayer or any other work to seek God's saving favor before actual conversion.] But now the upright heart goes to God as his joy, Ps 63:4, "Thus I will bless You while I live; I will lift up my hands in Your name." And saith, "It is good for me to draw nigh to God," Ps 73 ult.. When the Sabbath comes, (that golden spot of the week) oh how he longs to see the beauty of the Lord in this ordinances! Ps. 27:4. And when engaged in the worship of God, he cannot satisfy himself in bodily service, or to serve God in the oldness of the letter. He knoweth that this persuasion comes not of him that called him, Gal. 5:7-8, "You ran well. Who hindered you from obeying the truth? ⁸ This persuasion does not come from Him who calls you." He labors to engage his heart to approach to God, Jer. 30:21. And hence those mountings of heart and violent sallies of the desires heavenward. And thus you see one rare advantage to glorify God actively, flowing from the inclination of this new creature.

2. But then, secondly, hence in like manner hath the soul as great an advantage for sufferings; for this new creature having such a natural tendency to God, will enable the soul in which it is, to break its way to God through all the interposing obstacles and discouragements. What are persecutions, what are reproaches, what are the fears and frowns of enemies, but so many blocks thrown into the soul's way to keep it from God and duty? And indeed where this principle of grace is wanting, they prove inaccessible mountains. Graceless hearts are stalled, and quite discouraged by them; but now this tendency of the soul to God enables the Christian to break his way through all. You may say of him in such a case as the historian doth of Hannibal, (who force a way over the Alps with fire and vinegar) either he will find a way, or make a way; "Shall sword or famine, or any other creature separate me from Christ?" saith an upright soul. No, it will make its way through all to him, and that from this tendency of his new nature. You see in nature, everything hath a tendency to its center; fire will up, do what you can to suppress it; water will to the sea; if it meet with dunes, yea, mountains in its way, if it cannot bear them down, it will creep about some other way, and wind and turn to find a passage to the sea. God is the center of all gracious spirits, and grace will carry the soul through all to him. This is grace, and this is your advantage by it in the most difficult part of your work. It will carry you through all; make the hardest work easy and pleasant, 2Cor. 2:10. And if great sufferings or temptations interpose betwixt you and your God, it will break through all, and enable you to withstand all; as it did Paul in the text, who forced his way not only through the fury of enemies, but also through the intreaties and tears of friends.

Fifth Practical Observation

And we may see that the exaltation of the human nature of Christ into the office of this glorious ministry depended solely on the sovereign wisdom, grace and love of God. When the human nature of Christ was united to the divine, it became, in the person of the Son of God, fit and capable to make satisfaction for the sins of the church, and to procure righteousness and life eternal for all that believe. But it did not merit that union, nor could do so. For as it was utterly impossible that any created nature, by any act of its own, should merit the hypostatical union³, so it was granted to the human nature of Christ antecedently to any act of its own in way of obedience to God; for it was united to the person of the Son by virtue of that union. To that end, antecedently to it, it could merit nothing. Therefore its whole exaltation and the ministry that was discharged in that respect depended solely on the sovereign wisdom and pleasure of God. And in this election and designation of the human nature of Christ to grace and glory, we may see the pattern and example of our own. For if it was not on the consideration or foresight of the obedience of the human nature of Christ that it was predestinated and chosen to the grace of the hypostatical union, with the ministry and glory which depended for that reason, but of the mere sovereign grace of God; how much less could a foresight of anything in us be the cause why God should choose us in him before the foundation of the world to grace and glory! [this is one of the main views that Arminians hold, that God looks down through the corridors of time to see who will believe in Him and from that, he elects those upon this foresight. This not election at all, but man electing himself and God responding to man.]

[2.] That there was need of a mediator, that this covenant might be effectual to its proper ends, of the glory of God and the obedience of mankind, with their reward. This was not necessary from the nature of a covenant in general; for a covenant may be made and entered into between different parties without any mediator, merely on the equity of the terms of it. Nor was it so from the nature of a covenant between God and man, as man was at first created of God; for the first covenant between them was immediate, without the interposition of a mediator. But it became necessary from the state and condition of them with whom this covenant was made, and the especial nature of this covenant. This the apostle declares, Rom. 8:3, "For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh." The law was the moral instrument or rule of the covenant that was made immediately between God and man: but it could not continue to be so after the entrance of sin; that is, so as that God might be glorified by that means, in the obedience and reward of men. [The sinner's prayer is a "legal" act done under law (therefore unacceptable and highly provoking to God) since that is what state that person making the prayer is under, and so he acts accordingly, by necessity! And so he responds like those in Acts 2, "what must we do", etc. It's the only thing he is capable of, i.e., "do this and live". He has no other principle other than natural principles, from which to act upon, i.e., he does not have the new principle of life, the life of faith.] To that end he "sent his Son in the likeness of sinful flesh;" that is, provided a mediator for a new covenant. The persons with whom this covenant was to be made being all of them sinners, and apostatized from God, it became not the holiness or righteousness of God to treat immediately with them anymore. Nor would it have answered his holy ends so to have done. For if when they were in a condition of uprightness and integrity, they kept not the terms of that covenant which was made immediately with them, without a mediator, although they were holy, just, good, and equal; how much less could any such thing be expected from them in their depraved condition of apostasy from God and enmity against him! It therefore became not the wisdom of God to enter anew into covenant with mankind, without security that the terms of the covenant should be accepted, and the grace of it made effectual. This we could not give; yea, we gave all evidences possible to the contrary, in that "GOD saw that every imagination of the thoughts of man's heart was only evil continually," Gen. 6:5. To that end it was necessary there should be a mediator, to be the surety of this covenant. Again, the covenant itself was so prepared, in the counsel, wisdom, and grace of God, as that the principal, yea, indeed, all the benefits of it, were to depend on what was to be done by a mediator, and could not otherwise be accomplished. Such were satisfaction for sin, and the bringing in of everlasting righteousness; which are the foundation of this covenant.

2dly. That first covenant made with Adam, had, as to any benefit to be expected from it, with respect to acceptance with God, life, and salvation, ceased long before, even at the entrance of sin. It was not abolished or abrogated by any act of God, as a law, but only was made weak and insufficient to its first end, as a covenant. God had provided a way for the salvation of sinners, declared in the first promise. When this is actually embraced, that first covenant ceases towards them, as to its curse, in all its concerns as a covenant, and obligation to sinless obedience as the condition of life; because both of them are answered by the mediator of the new covenant. But as to all those who receive not the grace tendered in the promise, it does remain in full force and efficacy, not as a covenant, but as a law; and that because neither the obedience it requires nor the curse which it threatens is answered. Therefore, if any man believes not, "the wrath of God abides on him." For its commands and curse depending on the necessary relation between God and man, with the righteousness of God as the supreme governor of mankind, they must be answered and fulfilled. To that end it was never abrogated formally. But as all unbelievers are still obliged by it, and to it must stand or fall, so it is perfectly fulfilled in all believers, not in their own persons, but in the person of their surety. “God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us,” Rom. 8:3, 4. But as a covenant, obliging to personal, perfect, sinless obedience, as the condition of life, to be performed by them, so it ceased to be, long before the introduction of the new covenant which the apostle speaks of, that was promised “in the latter days.” But the other covenant here spoken of was not removed or taken away, until this new covenant was actually established.

Arminianism Overthrows the New Covenant

Excerpts from Covenant Theology by Nehemiah Coxe and John Owen

This section is by John Owen in his exposition of Hebrews 8:6-10, pg 175-181
Arminianism overthrows the whole New Covenant by robbing God of the glory of his free grace.

Who can express or limit the sovereignty of God over his creatures? All the disputes about it are fond. We have no measures of what is infinite. May he not do with his own what he pleases? Are we not in his hands, as clay in the hands of the potter? And whether he make or mar a vessel, who will say to him, What are you doing? He gives no account of his matters. But on supposition that he will condescend to enter into covenant with his creatures, and to come to agreement with them according to the terms of it, it becomes his greatness and goodness to give them promises as the foundation of it, in which he proposes to them the things in which their blessedness and reward do consist. For, 1st. In this he proposes himself to them as the eternal spring and fountain of all power and goodness. Had he treated with us merely by a law, he had in that respect only revealed his sovereign authority and holiness; the one in giving of the law, the other in the nature of it. But in promises he reveals himself as the eternal spring of goodness and power; for the matter of all promises is somewhat that is good; and the communication of it depends on sovereign power. That God should so declare himself in his covenant was absolutely necessary to direct and encourage the obedience of the covenanters; and he did so accordingly, Gen. 15:1, 17:1, 2. 2dly. By this means he reserves the glory of the whole to himself. For although the terms of agreement which he proposes between himself and us be in their own nature “holy, just, and good,” which sets forth his praise and glory, yet if there were not something on his part which has no antecedent respect to any goodness, obedience, or merit in us, we should have in which to glory in ourselves; which is inconsistent with the glory of God. But the matter of those promises in which the covenant is founded is free, undeserved, and without respect to any thing in us in accordance with which it may in any sense be procured [e.g., the sinner's prayer]. And so in the first covenant, which was given in a form of law, attended with a penal sanction, yet the foundation of it was in a promise of a free and undeserved reward, even of the eternal enjoyment of God; which no goodness or obedience in the creature could possibly merit the attainment of. So that if a man should by virtue of any covenant be justified by works, though he might have of which to glory before men, yet could he not glory before God, as the apostle declares, Rom. 4:2; and that because the reward proposed in the promise does infinitely exceed the obedience performed.

[3.] It is necessary from the nature of a covenant. For every covenant that is proposed to men, and accepted by them, requires somewhat to be performed on their part, otherwise it is no covenant; but where anything is required of them that accept of the covenant, or to whom it is proposed, it does suppose that somewhat be promised on the behalf of them by whom the covenant is proposed, as the foundation of its acceptance, and the reason of the duties required in it. All this appears most evidently in the covenant of grace, which is here said to be “established on promises”; and that on two accounts. For,

[4.] At the same time that much is required of us in the way of duty and obedience, we are told in the Scripture, and find it by experience, that of ourselves we can do nothing. To that end, unless the precept of the covenant is founded in a promise of giving grace and spiritual strength to us, in accordance with which we may be enabled to perform those duties, the covenant can be of no benefit or advantage to us. And the lack of this one consideration, that every covenant is founded in promises, and that the promises give life to the precepts of it, has perverted the minds of many to suppose ability in ourselves of yielding obedience to those precepts, without grace antecedently received to enable us to that; which overthrows the nature of the new covenant.

[5.] As was observed, we are all actually guilty of sin before this covenant was made with us. To that end unless there be a promise given of the pardon of sin, it is to no purpose to propose any new covenant terms to us. For “the wages of sin is death”; and we having sinned must die, whatever we do afterwards, unless our sins be pardoned. This, therefore, must be proposed to us as the foundation of the covenant, or it will be of no effect. And in this lies the great difference between the promises of the covenant of works and those of the covenant of grace. The first were only concerning things future; eternal life and blessedness on the accomplishment of perfect obedience. Promises of present mercy and pardon it stood in need of none, it was not capable of. Nor had it any promises of giving more grace or supplies of it; but man was wholly left to what he had at first received. Therefore the covenant was broken. But in the covenant of grace all things are founded in promises of present mercy, and continual supplies of grace, as well as of future blessedness. Therefore it comes to be “ordered in all things, and sure”. And this is the first thing that was to be declared, namely, that every divine covenant is established on promises.

Ninth Practical Observation

The promises of the covenant of grace are better than those of any other covenant, as for many other reasons, so especially because the grace of them prevents any condition or qualification on our part. I do not say the covenant of grace is absolutely without conditions, if by conditions we intend the duties of obedience which God requires of us in and by virtue of that covenant; but this I say, the principal promises of it are not in the first place remunerative of our obedience in the covenant, but efficaciously assumptive of us into covenant, and establishing or confirming in the covenant. [i.e., faith being bestowed freely by the sovereign pleasure will of God.] The covenant of works had its promises, but they were all remunerative, respecting an antecedent obedience in us; (so were all those which were peculiar to the covenant of Sinai). They were, indeed, also of grace, in that the reward did infinitely exceed the merit of our obedience; but yet they all supposed it, and the subject of them was formally reward only. In the covenant of grace it is not so; for several of the promises of it are the means of our being taken into covenant [e.g., the free gift of faith], of our entering into covenant with God. The first covenant absolutely was established on promises, in that when men were actually taken into it, they were encouraged to obedience by the promises of a future reward. But those promises, namely, of the pardon of sin and writing of the law in our hearts, on which the apostle expressly insists as the peculiar promises of this covenant, do take place and are effectual antecedently to our covenant obedience. For although faith be required in order of nature antecedently to our actual receiving of the pardon of sin, yet is that faith itself produced in us by the grace of the promise, and so its precedence to pardon respects only the order that God had appointed in the communication of the benefits of the covenant, and intends not that the pardon of sin is the reward of our faith.

A Dispute Concerning Two Covenants

First, therefore, the apostle does evidently in this place dispute concerning two covenants, or two testaments, comparing the one with the other, and declaring the disannulling of the one by the introduction and establishment of the other. What are these two covenants in general we have declared, namely, that made with the church of Israel at Mount Sinai, and that made with us in the gospel; not as absolutely the covenant of grace, but as actually established in the death of Christ, with all the worship that belongs to it.

Here then arises a difference of no small importance, namely, whether these are indeed two distinct covenants, as to the essence and substance of them, or only different ways of the dispensation and administration of the same covenant. And the reason of the difficulty lies in this: We must grant one of these three things:

1. That either the covenant of grace was in force under the old testament; or,
2. That the church was saved without it, or any benefit by Jesus Christ, who is the mediator of it alone; or,
3. That they all perished everlastingly. And neither of the two latter can be admitted.

Some, indeed, in these latter days, have revived the old Pelagian imagination, that before the law men were saved by the conduct of natural light and reason; [this is the spring or foundation of the sinner's prayer] and under the law by the directive doctrines, precepts, and sacrifices of it, without any respect to the Lord Christ or his mediation in another covenant. [the sinner's prayer is without respect to Christ because they are alienated from Him while in an unregenerate state as they make this prayer! Hence the whole prayer is a fancy in their minds from a principle of self-love/preservation] But I will not here contend with them, as having elsewhere sufficiently refuted these imaginations. To that end I will take it here for granted, that no man was ever saved but by virtue of the new covenant, and the mediation of Christ in that respect.

Suppose, then, that this new covenant of grace was extant and effectual under the old testament, so as the church was saved by virtue of it, and the mediation of Christ in that respect, how could it be that there should at the same time be another covenant between God and them, of a different nature from this, accompanied with other promises, and other effects?

But on the other hand, there is such express mention made, not only in this, but in various other places of the Scripture also, of two distinct covenants, or testaments, and such different natures, properties, and effects, ascribed to them, as seem to constitute two distinct covenants. This, therefore, we must inquire into; and will first declare what is agreed to by those who are sober in this matter, though they differ in their judgments about this question, whether two distinct covenants, or only a twofold administration of the same covenant, be intended. And indeed there is so much agreed on, as that what remains seems rather to be a difference about the expression of the same truth, than any real contradiction about the things themselves. For,

Four Agreements about the Two Administrations

1. It is agreed that the way of reconciliation with God, of justification and salvation, was always one and the same; and that from the giving of the first promise none was ever justified or saved but by the new covenant, and Jesus Christ, the mediator of it. The foolish imagination before mentioned, that men were saved before the giving of the law by following the guidance of the light of nature, and after the giving of the law by obedience to the directions of it, is rejected by all that are sober, as destructive of the Old Testament and the New.

2. That the writings of the Old Testament, namely, the Law, Psalms, and Prophets, do contain and declare the doctrine of justification and salvation by Christ. The church of old believed this, and walked with God in the faith of it. This is undeniably proved, in that the doctrine mentioned is frequently confirmed in the New Testament by testimonies taken out of the Old.

3. That by the covenant of Sinai, as properly so called, separated from its figurative relation to the covenant of grace, none was ever eternally saved.

4. That the use of all the institutions in accordance with which the old covenant was administered, was to represent and direct to Jesus Christ, and his mediation. These things being granted, the only way of life and salvation by Jesus Christ, under the old testament and the new, is secured; which is the substance of the truth in which we are now concerned. On these grounds we may proceed with our inquiry.

Legal vs. Evangelical

"No man can come unto me, (saith Christ) except my father which hath sent me, draw him." There is a legal spirit working under evangelical pretences in many souls; they look within them to find that which is quite above them. The apostle points you to the fountain of faith, in Eph. ii. 8. "It is not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." John Flavel Vol. 4 p 139

Speaking of common grace (God rains on the just and the unjust) vs. special or saving grace (faith) reserved only for the elect.

Yet we must not— for the sake of the kinship and connection between them— overlook the essential difference. This is the special grace that was unknown to the pagans. All pagan religions are self-willed and legalistic. They are all the aftereffects and adulterations of the covenant of works. Human beings here consistently try to bring about their own salvation by purifications, ascesis, penance, sacrifice, law observance, ceremony, and so on. Hermon Bavinck, Reformed Dogmatics, vol. 3, pg 220

"A man's free will cannot cure him even of the toothache, or a sore finger; and yet he madly thinks it is in its power to cure his soul" – Toplady, 1740-1778

Augustus Montague Toplady was an Anglican cleric and hymn writer. He was a major Calvinist opponent of John Wesley. He is best remembered as the author of the hymn "Rock of Ages".

When an unconverted person says the sinner's prayer, he is only acting according to nature, that is, from natural principles, evidencing the covenant he is under, hence the covenant of works. That is all he is capable of because he is void of faith and any new spiritual principle of life, he being apart from Christ, etc. This is essentially what the Jews did at Sinai (a legal act vs. evangelical), agreeing to "the covenant", saying that they would submit to God and obey him. But due to their unconverted, blind, obstinate hearts of which Moses laments in Deut 5:29 and was confirmed in Deut. 29:4, they would not submit to him or obey him and so immediately departed from the Lord as soon as Moses left them to go up the mountain. This is why the Sinner's Prayer is a fraud and is nothing more than the covenant of works being put into practice (legalism), which never was able to save nor was it ever intended that it should save; that those are truly converted being entirely passive in their conversion "were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." John 1:13

Related scriptures in Galatians:

Gal. 2:11-21

¹¹ Now when ^[d]Peter had come to Antioch, I ^[e]withstood him to his face, because he was to be blamed; ¹² for before certain men came from James, he would eat with the Gentiles; but when they came, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing ^[f]those who were of the circumcision. ¹³ And the rest of the Jews also played the hypocrite with him, so that even Barnabas was carried away with their hypocrisy.

¹⁴ But when I saw that they were not straightforward about the truth of the gospel, I said to Peter before them all, "If you, being a Jew, live in the manner of Gentiles and not as the Jews, ^[g]why do you compel Gentiles to live as ^[h]Jews? ¹⁵ We who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles, ¹⁶ knowing that a man is not ^[i]justified by the works of the law but by faith in Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Christ Jesus, that we might be justified by faith in Christ and not by the works of the law; for by the works of the law no flesh shall be justified. ¹⁷ "But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners, is Christ therefore a minister of sin? Certainly not! ¹⁸ For if I build again those things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor. ¹⁹ For I through the law died to the law that I might live to God. ²⁰ I have been crucified with Christ; it is no longer I who live, but Christ lives in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself for me. ²¹ I do not set aside the grace of God; for if righteousness comes through the law, then Christ died in vain."

Gal. 5:4-

Stand^[a] fast therefore in the liberty by which Christ has made us free, and do not be entangled again with a yoke of bondage. ² Indeed I, Paul, say to you that if you become circumcised, Christ will profit you nothing. ³ And I testify again to every man who becomes circumcised that he is ^[b]a debtor to keep the whole law. ⁴ You have become estranged from Christ, you who attempt to be justified by law; you have fallen from grace. ⁵ For we through the Spirit eagerly wait for the hope of righteousness by faith. ⁶ For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor uncircumcision avails anything, but faith working through love. [those who do not have the Spirit are not free to come to Christ. For where the Spirit is there is liberty; where the Spirit is not, there is no liberty, but bondage to sin and Satan; one cannot set himself free spiritually by his own strength or any other legal performance, prayer, sacrament, etc. Salvation is gratuitous, a gift; if you have to ask for it, it is no longer a gift but a debt; and if a debt, it is no long grace (free grace) and God is no debtor to anyone. As Martin Luther said, "No one can give himself faith; it is a gift of God." 2Cor3:17, "Now the Lord is the Spirit; and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.]

See Owen's comments here from Communion with God, p 194 my comments in [blue].

[2.] A way whereby to approach unto God with our desires. This, also, we have by him provided for us, John xiv. 5, 6, "Thomas saith unto Jesus, Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way? Jesus saith unto him, I am the way; no man cometh unto the Father, but by me." That way which we had of going unto God at our creation is quite shut up by sin. [In other words, we cannot come to him by the law or the works thereof which many attempt or will seek to enter and will not be able, Luke 13:24; that covenant was broken (do this and you will live, Luke 10:28), and now we are under the curse of it; we must come by faith in the Son, etc. hence, evangelically vs. legally; but this is by the will of God, John 1:13, who were born, not of blood nor of the will of the flesh nor of the will of man, but of God. We can only please him by saving faith which he gives only to his elect.] The sword of the law, which has fire put into it by sin, turns every way, to stop all passages unto communion with God. Jesus Christ hath "consecrated a new and living way" (for the saints) "through the veil, that is to say, his flesh," Heb. x. 20. He hath consecrated and set it apart for believers, and for them alone. Others pretend to go to God with their prayers [legal], but they come not nigh him. How can they possibly come to the end who go not in the way? Christ only is the way to the throne of grace [faith in him, hence evangelical]; none comes to God but by him. “By him we have an access in one Spirit unto the Father,” Eph. ii. 18. These two things, then, the saints have for the opening of their hearts at the throne of grace, — assistance and a way. The assistance of the Spirit, without which they are nothing; and the way of Christ’s mediation, without which God is not to be approached unto.

John Owen from Covenant Theology

by Nehemiah Coxe & John Owen

[the following excerpts help explain my comment above]

But inasmuch as he would do so no more, but would make another covenant of another nature with them, it is evident that there was some defect in the covenant itself, it was not able to communicate those good things with which God designed to bless the church.

3. These two things being the only reason that God gives why he will make this new covenant, namely, the sins of the people, and the insufficiency of the first covenant to bring the church into that blessed estate which he designed them; it is manifest that all his dealings with them for their spiritual and eternal good are of mere sovereign grace, and such as he has no motive to but in and from himself alone. [i.e., God does not save someone by virtue of his praying for salvation. Nothing outside Himself moves Him to do anything; He is sovereign, not man. Not to mention He does not hear (hearken to) the prayer of sinners, Jn 9:31.] On page 234 Owen writes, “[1.] The freedom of this covenant, without respect to any merit, worth, or condignity in them with whom it is made. What God does, he does freely, “ex mera gratia et voluntate.” (out of his grace and will alone) There was no cause outside himself for which he should make this covenant, or which should move him so to do. And this we are eminently taught in this place, where he expresses no other occasion of his making this covenant but the sins of the people in breaking that which he formerly made with them. And it is expressed on purpose to declare the free and sovereign grace, the goodness, love, and mercy, which alone were the absolute springs of this covenant.

1. God made this covenant with the people on Sinai, in the authoritative proposition of it to them; and for that reason the people solemnly accepted of it, and took it on themselves to observe, do, and fulfill the terms and conditions of it, Exod. 19:8, especially chap. 24:3, 7, “The people answered with one voice, and said, All the words which the LORD has said, will we do.” And, “All that the LORD has said, will we do, and be obedient.” So Deut. 5:27. [The sinner's prayer includes this too, I will obey, I will submit to you and so on; but to no avail because that person is still under law, is blind, bound by Satan, etc., hates God ,hates faith, and cannot nor will not submit to God's gospel law, Rom 8:7-8. But you may object: They sound and look so sincere in this, their prayer. Ans.: So what. Many can be greatly moved by religious acts and prayers just like one can be moved by a scene in a movie. Many rejoiced for a season as the stony ground hearers did, yet fell away at last. The Spirit of God enlightened their mind, as in Heb. 6:4, and Matt. 13:20-21, but never went deep enough to change their heart. They had no root in them, and so withered away.] On this the covenant was ratified and confirmed between God and them, and for that reason the blood of the covenant was sprinkled on them, Exod. 24:8. This gave that covenant its solemn ratification.

2. Having thus accepted of God's covenant, and the terms of it, Moses ascending again into the Mount, the people made the golden calf. And this fell out so suddenly after the making of the covenant, that the apostle expresses it by, "They continued not in it," 'they made haste to break it.' He expresses the sense of the words of God on this, Exod. 32:7, 8, "Go, get down; for your people, which you brought out of the land of Egypt, have corrupted themselves; they have turned aside quickly out of the way which I commanded them; they have made them a molten calf, and have worshipped it, and have sacrificed to that, and said, These be your gods, O Israel, which have brought you up out of the land of Egypt." For there they broke the covenant in which God had in a peculiar manner assumed the glory of that deliverance to himself.

Seventh Practical Observation p255

No covenant between God and man ever was, or ever could be stable and effectual, as to the ends of it, that was not made and confirmed in Christ. God first made a covenant with us in Adam. There was nothing in that respect but the mere defectibility of our natures as we were creatures that could render it ineffectual. [and it remains so if the person is unconverted] And from there did it proceed. In him we all sinned, by breach of covenant. The Son of God had not then interposed himself, nor undertaken on our behalf. The apostle tells us that "in him all things consist;" without him they have no consistency, no stability, no duration. So this first covenant was immediately broken. It was not confirmed by the blood of Christ. And those who suppose that the efficacy and stability of the present covenant do depend solely on our own will and diligence, had need not only to assert our nature free from that depravation which it was under when this covenant was broken, but also from that defectibility that was in it before we fell in Adam. And such as, neglecting the interposition of Christ, do commit themselves to imaginations of this kind, surely know little of themselves, and less of God.

Eighth Practical Observation

No external administration of a covenant of God's own making, no obligation of mercy on the minds of men, can enable them to steadfastness in covenant obedience, without an effectual influence of grace from and by Jesus Christ. For we will see in the next verses that this is the only provision which is made in the wisdom of God to render us steadfast in obedience and his covenant effectual to us. [unconverted people who say the sinner's prayer are led into a fatal or stupid security, have really no intention of living holy lives, will lead carnal lives, and hence will contaminate the sheep of the church.]

Ninth Practical Observation

God, in making a covenant with any, in proposing the terms of it, retains his right and authority to deal with persons according to their behavior in and towards that covenant: "They broke my covenant, and I regarded them not."

Tenth Practical Observation

God's casting men out of his especial care, on the breach of his covenant, is the highest judgment that in this world can fall on any persons. And we are concerned in all these things. For although the covenant of grace be stable and effectual to all who are really partakers of it, yet as to its external administration, and our entering into it by a visible profession, it may be broken, to the temporal and eternal ruin of persons and whole churches. Take heed of the golden calf.

John Flavel, Method of Grace (vol. 2) pg 295

First, It hath an awakening efficacy upon secure and sleepy sinners. It rouses the conscience, and brings a man to a sense and feeling apprehension, Eph. v. 13, 14. The first effectual touch of the word startles the drowsy conscience. A poor sinner lies in his sins, as Peter did in his chains, fast asleep, though a warrant was signed for his execution the next day; but the Spirit in the word awakens him as the angel did Peter. And this awakening power of the word is in order, both of time and nature, antecedent to all its operations and effects.

Fifthly, The word hath a heart-turning, a soul converting efficacy in it. It is a regenerating, as well as a convincing word, 1 Pet. i. 23, 1 Thes. i. 9. The law wounds, the gospel cures; the law discovers the evil that is in sin, and the misery that follows it; and the Spirit of God, working in fellowship with the word, effectually turns the heart from sin. And thus we see in what glorious acts the efficacy of the word discovers itself upon the hearts of men; and all these acts lie in order to each other. For, until the soul be awakened, it cannot be enlightened, Eph. v. 14. Till it be enlightened, it cannot be convinced, Eph. v. 13. Conviction being nothing else but the application of the light that shines in the mind to the conscience of a sinner. Till it be convinced, it cannot be wounded for sin, Acts ii. 37. And until it be wounded for sin, it will never be converted from sin, and brought effectually to Jesus Christ. And thus you see what the power of the word is. John Flavel, Method of Grace (vol. 2) pg 295

by John Owen

excerpts from Covenant Theology (pg 257)

by Nehemiah Coxe & John Owen

For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, says the Lord; I will give my laws into their mind, and write them on their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they will be to me a people. And they will not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all will know me, from the least to the greatest. For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more. Heb. 8:10-12

The design of the apostle, or what is the general argument which he is in pursuit of, must still be borne in mind throughout the consideration of the testimonies he produces in the confirmation of it. And this is, to prove that the Lord Christ is the mediator and surety of a better covenant than that in which the service of God was managed by the high priests according to the law. For therefore it follows that his priesthood is greater and far more excellent than theirs. To this end he does not only prove that God promised to make such a covenant, but also declares the nature and properties of it, in the words of the prophet. And so, by comparing it with the former covenant, he manifests its excellence above it. In particular, in this testimony the imperfection of that covenant is demonstrated from its result. For it did not effectually continue peace and mutual love between God and the people; but being broken by them, they were for that reason rejected of God. This rendered all the other benefits and advantages of it useless. To that end the apostle insists from the prophet on those properties of this other covenant which infallibly prevent the like result, securing the people's obedience for ever, and so the love and relation of God to them as their God.

To that end these three verses give us a description of that covenant of which the Lord Christ is the mediator and surety, not absolutely and entirely, but as to those properties and effects of it in which it differs from the former, so as infallibly to secure the covenant relation between God and the people. That covenant was broken, but this will never be so, because provision is made in the covenant itself against any such event.

And we may consider in the words, 1. The particle of introduction, oti, answering the Hebrew ylo. 2. The subject spoken of, which is diaqhkh; with the way of making it, hpn diaqhosomai, "which I will make." 3. The author of it, the Lord Jehovah; "I will... says the Lord." 4. Those with whom it was to be made, "the house of Israel." 5. The time of making it, "after those days." 6. The properties, privileges, and benefits of this covenant, which are of two sorts: (1.) Of sanctifying, inherent grace; described by a double consequent:

[1.] Of God's relation to them, and theirs to him; "I will be to them a God, and they will be to me a people," verse 10. [2.] Of their advantage by that means, without the use of such other aids as formerly they stood in need of, verse 11. (2.) Of relative grace, in the pardon of their sins, verse 12. And various things of great weight will fall into consideration under these several heads.

Exposition of Verse 10

"For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, says the Lord; I will give my laws into their mind, and write them on their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they will be to me a people."

Introduction of the Declaration of the New Covenant

The introduction of the declaration of the new covenant is by the particle oti. The Hebrew [word] which is rendered by it, is variously used, and is sometimes redundant. In the prophet, some translate it by an exceptive, "sed;" some by an illative, "quoniam." And in this place o[ti] is rendered by some "quamborem," "to that end;" and by others "nam," or "enim," as we do it by "for." And it does intimate a reason of what was spoken before, namely, that the covenant which God would now make should not be according to that, like to it, which was before made and broken.

The Subject Spoken Of: The Making of a Covenant

The thing promised is a "covenant:" in the prophet [Hebrew word], here διαθηκη. And the way of making it, in the prophet [Hebrews word]; which is the usual word in accordance with which the making of a covenant is expressed. For signifying to "cut," to "strike," to "divide," respect is had in it to the sacrifices by which covenants were confirmed. From there also were "foedus percutere," and "foedus ferire."² See Gen. 15:9, 10, 18. [Hebrew word], [another Hebrew word] or [another Hebrew word], that is, "cum," which is joined in construction with it, Gen. 15:18; Deut. 5:2. The apostle renders it by διαθησομαι, and that with a dative case without a preposition, τω οικω, "I will make" or "confirm to." He had used before συντελεσω to the same purpose.

We render the words [Hebrew word] and διαθηκη in this place by a "covenant," though afterward the same word is translated by a "testament." A covenant properly is a compact or agreement on certain terms mutually stipulated by two or more parties. As promises are the foundation and rise of it, as it is between God and man, so it comprises also precepts, or laws of obedience, which are prescribed to man on his part to be observed. But in the description of the covenant here annexed, there is no mention of any condition on the part of man, of any terms of obedience prescribed to him, but the whole consists in free, gratuitous promises, as we will see in the explication of it. Some therefore conclude that it is only one part of the covenant that is here described. Others observe from this place that the whole covenant of grace as a covenant is absolute, without any conditions on our part; which sense Estius³ on this place contends for. But these things must be further inquired into:

(1.) The word [Hebrew word], used by the prophet, does not only signify a “covenant” or compact properly so called, but a free, gratuitous promise also. Yea, sometimes it is used for such a free purpose of God with respect to other things, which in their own nature are incapable of being obliged by any moral condition. Such is God’s covenant with day and night, Jer. 33:20, 25. And so he says that he “made his covenant,” not to destroy the world by water anymore, “with every living creature,” Gen. 9:10, 11. Nothing, therefore, can be argued for the necessity of conditions to belong to this covenant from the name or term in accordance with which it is expressed in the prophet. A covenant properly is διαθηκη, but there is no word in the whole Hebrew language of that precise signification.

(2.) The making of this covenant is declared by [Hebrew word]. But yet neither does this require a mutual stipulation, on terms and conditions prescribed, to an entrance into covenant. For it refers to the sacrifices by which covenants were confirmed; and it is applied to a mere gratuitous promise, Gen. 15:18, “In that day did the LORD make a covenant with Abram, saying, To your seed will I give this land.”

As to the word διαθηκη, it signifies a “covenant” improperly; properly it is a “testamentary disposition.” And this may be without any conditions on the part of them to whom anything is bequeathed.

(3.) The whole of the covenant intended is expressed in the ensuing description of it. For if it were otherwise, it could not be proved from there that this covenant was more excellent than the former, especially as to security that the covenant relation between God and the people should not be broken or disannulled. For this is the principal thing which the apostle designs to prove in this place; and the lack of an observation of that has led many out of the way in their exposition of it. If, therefore, this be not an entire description of the covenant, there might yet be something reserved essentially belonging to that which might frustrate this end. For some such conditions might yet be required in it as we are not able to observe, or could have no security that we should abide in the observation of them: and for that reason this covenant might be frustrated of its end, as well as the former; which is directly contrary to God’s declaration of his design in it.

(4.) It is evident that there can be no condition previously required, to our entering into or participation of the benefits of this covenant, antecedent to the making of it with us. For none think there are any such with respect to its original constitution; nor can there be so in respect of its making with us, or our entering into it. For,

[1.] This would render the covenant inferior in a way of grace to that which God made with the people at Horeb. For he declares that there was not anything in them that moved him either to make that covenant, or to take them into it with himself. Everywhere he asserts this to be an act of his mere grace and favor. Yea, he frequently declares, that he took them into covenant, not only without respect to any thing of good in them, but although they were evil and stubborn. See Deut. 7:7, 8; 9:4, 5.

[2.] It is contrary to the nature, ends, and express properties of this covenant. For there is nothing that can be thought or supposed to be such a condition, but it is comprehended in the promise of the covenant itself; for all that God requires in us is proposed as that which himself will effect by virtue of this covenant.

(5.) It is certain, that in the outward dispensation of the covenant, in which the grace, mercy, and terms of it are proposed to us, many things are required of us in order to a participation of the benefits of it; for God has ordained, that all the mercy and grace that is prepared in it will be communicated to us ordinarily in the use of outward means, by which a compliance is required of us in a way of duty. To this end he has appointed all the ordinances of the gospel, the word and sacraments, with all those duties, public and private, which are needful to render them effectual to us. For he will take us ordinarily into this covenant in and by the rational faculties of our natures, that he may be glorified in them and by them. To that end these things are required of us in order to the participation of the benefits of this covenant. And if, therefore, any one will call our attendance to such duties of the condition of the covenant, it is not to be contended about, though properly it is not so. For,

[1.] God does work the grace of the covenant, and communicate the mercy of it, antecedently to all ability for the performance of any such duty; as it is with elect infants.

[2.] Among those who are equally diligent in the performance of the duties intended he makes a discrimination, preferring one before another. "Many are called, but few are chosen;" and what has any one that he has not received?

[3.] He actually takes some into the grace of the covenant while they are engaged in an opposition to the outward dispensation of it. An example of this grace he gave in Paul.

(6.) It is evident that the first grace of the covenant, or God's putting his law in our hearts, can depend on no condition on our part. For whatever is antecedent to that, being only a work or act of corrupted nature, can be no condition on what the dispensation of spiritual grace is superadded. [Amen! That is the whole point behind the reason why the sinner's prayer is complete presumption.] And this is the great ground of them who absolutely deny the covenant of grace to be conditional; namely, that the first grace is absolutely promised, on what and its exercise the whole of it does depend.

(7.) To a full and complete interest in all the promises of the covenant, faith on our part, from which evangelical repentance is inseparable, is required. But although these also are produced in us by virtue of that promise and grace of the covenant which are absolute, it is a mere strife about words to contend whether they may be called conditions or no. Let it be granted on the one hand, that we cannot have an actual participation of the relative grace of this covenant in adoption and justification, without faith or believing; and on the other, that this faith is produced in us, given to us, bestowed on us, by that grace of the covenant which depends on no condition in us as to its discriminating administration, [i.e., that God's purpose in that election might stand, Rom. 9:11] and I will not concern myself what men will call it.

(8.) Though there are no conditions properly so called of the whole grace of the covenant, yet there are conditions in the covenant, taking that term, in a large sense, for that which by the order of divine constitution precedes some other things, and has an influence into their existence; for God requires many things of them whom he actually takes into covenant, and makes partakers of the promises and benefits of it. Of this nature is that whole obedience which is prescribed to us in the gospel, in our walking before God in uprightness; and there being an order in the things that belong to this, some acts, duties, and parts of our gracious obedience, being appointed to be means of the further additional supplies of the grace and mercies of the covenant, [answers to Matt. 13:12, For whoever has, to him more will be given] they may be called conditions required of us in the covenant, as well as duties prescribed to us.

Fifth Practical Observation

God himself, in and by his own sovereign wisdom, grace, goodness, all-sufficiency, and power, is to be considered as the only cause and author of the new covenant; or, the abolishing of the old covenant, with the introduction and establishment of the new, is an act of the mere sovereign wisdom, grace, and authority of God. It is his gracious disposal of us, and of his own grace; that of which we had no contrivance, nor indeed the least desire.

2Cor3:5

⁵ Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think of anything as being from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God, ⁶ who also made us sufficient as ministers of the new covenant, not of the letter but of the ^[a]Spirit; for the letter kills, but the Spirit gives life.

The Blessed Properties and Effects of the New Covenant

SECONDLY, These things being premised, as it was necessary they should be, to the right understanding of the mind of the Holy Spirit, I will proceed to the particular parts of the covenant as here expressed, namely, in the blessed properties and effects of it, in accordance with which it is distinguished from the former.

First General Blessing– Restoration of the Image of God in Us

The first two expressions are of the same nature and tendency, “I will put my laws in their mind, and write them in their hearts.” In general it is the reparation of our nature by the restoration of the image of God in us, that is, our sanctification, which is promised in these words [God is the promiser, and hence the rightful disposer of his grace, not merely the predictor of one's conversion see pg 193, 1781, “For him to promise, who has it not in his hand to dispose and determine, is a great absurdity” - J. Edwards]. And there are two things in the words both doubly expressed: 1. The subject acted on; which is the “mind” and the “heart.” 2. The manner of producing the effect mentioned in them; and that is by “putting” and “writing.” And, 3. The things by these means so communicated; which are the “laws” of God.

The Subject Acted On

The subject spoken of is the mind and heart. When the apostle treats of the depravation and corruption of our nature, he places them εν τη διανοια and εν τη καρδια, Eph. 4:18; that is, “the mind and the heart.” These are, in the Scripture, the seat of natural corruption, the residence of the principle of alienation from the life of God which is in us. To that end the renovation of our natures consists in the rectifying and curing of them, in the furnishing them with contrary principles of faith, love, and adherence to God. And we may observe, that,

Sixth Practical Observation

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ in the new covenant, in its being and existence, in its healing, repairing efficacy, is as large and extensive as sin is in its residence and power to deprave our natures. This is the difference about the extent of the new covenant, and the grace of it: Some would have it to extend to all persons, in its tender and conditional proposition; but not to all things, as to its efficacy in the reparation of our natures. Others assert it to extend to all the effects of sin, in the removal of them, and the cure of our natures by that means; but as to persons, it is really extended to none but those in whom these effects are produced, whatever be its outward administration, which was also always limited: to whom I do subscribe.

On Their Minds

The first thing mentioned is the "mind." [Hebrew word], the apostle renders by $\delta\iota\alpha\nu\omicron\iota\alpha$, "the inward part." The mind is the most secret, inward part or power of the soul. And the prophet expresses it by the "inward part," because it is the only safe and useful repository of the laws of God. When they are there laid up, we will not lose them; neither men nor devils can take them from us. And he also declares in which the excellence of covenant obedience does consist. It is not in the conformity of our outward actions to the law, although that be required in that respect also; but it principally lies in the inward parts, where God searches for and regards truth in sincerity, Ps. 51:6. To that end $\delta\iota\alpha\nu\omicron\iota\alpha$ is the "mind and understanding," whose natural depravation is the spring and principle of all disobedience; the cure of which is here promised in the first place. In the outward administration of the means of grace, the affections, or, if I may so speak, the more outward part of the soul, are usually first impressed and acted on: but the first real effect of the internal promised grace of the covenant is on the mind, the most spiritual and inward part of the soul. This in the New Testament is expressed by the renovation of the mind, Rom. 12:2, Eph. 4:23; and the opening of the eyes of our understandings, Eph. 1:17, 18; God shining into our hearts, to give us the knowledge of his glory in the face of Jesus Christ, 2 Cor. 4:6. By this means the enmity against God, the vanity, darkness, and alienation from the life of God, with which the mind naturally is possessed and filled, are taken away and removed, of the nature of which work I have treated at large elsewhere; for the law of God in the mind, is the saving knowledge of the mind and will of God, of which the law is the revelation, communicated to it and implanted in it. [Hence as Flavel states that the Spirit, in changing the heart, does no violence to the will as many suppose who oppose this doctrine, but sweetly, with a secret efficacy, overcomes the will, so that one comes willingly to Christ, not forced. Most remarkable! This answers to Ps 110:3, Your people shall be volunteers [or willing] In the day of Your power; It is this power that the Pharisees were ignorant of when Jesus said to them, "You are in error because you do not know the Scriptures or the power of God."]

The Manner of Producing the Effect

The way in accordance with which God in the covenant of grace thus works on the mind is expressed by $\delta\iota\delta\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$: so the apostle renders [Hebrew word], "I will give." $\Delta\iota\delta\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$, "giving," may by a substitution be put for δωδω, "I will give." So is it expressed in the next clause, επιγραψω in the future tense, "I will write." The word in the prophet is, "I will give;" we render it, "I will put." But there are two things intimated in the word:

(1.) The freedom of the grace promised; it is a mere grant, gift, or donation of grace. [i.e., never the result of human prayer or any other sacrament that man may dream up.]

(2.) The efficacy of it. That which is given of God to any is received by them, otherwise it is no gift. And this latter is well expressed by the word used by us, "I will put;" which expresses an actual communication, and not a fruitless tender. This the apostle renders emphatically, διδους; that is, εμε, 'This is that which I do, am doing in this covenant; namely, freely giving that grace in accordance with which my laws will be implanted on the minds of men.'

The Things Communicated: My Laws

To show in general, before we proceed to the nature of this work, so far as is necessary to the exposition of the words, we may here consider what was observed in the third place, namely, what it is that is thus promised to be communicated, and so carry it on with us to the other clause of this promise. That which is to be put into this spiritual receptacle is, in these words, τους νομους μου, "My laws;" in the plural number. Expositors inquire what laws are here intended, whether the moral law only, or others also. But there is no need of such inquiry. There is a metonymy of the subject and effect in the words. It is that knowledge of the mind and will of God which is revealed in the law, and taught by it, which is promised. The "laws of God," therefore, are here taken largely, for the whole revelation of the mind and will of God. So does [Hebrew word] originally signify "doctrine" or "instruction." By whatsoever way or revelation God makes known himself and his will to us, requiring our obedience in that respect, it is all comprised in that expression of "his laws".

The Nature of the Grace in the First Promise

From these things we may easily discern the nature of that grace which is contained in this first branch of the first promise of the covenant. And this is, the effectual operation of his Spirit in the renovation and saving illumination of our minds, in accordance with which they are habitually made conformable to the whole law of God, that is, the rule and the law of our obedience in the new covenant, and enabled to all acts and duties that are required of us. And this is the first grace promised and communicated to us by virtue of this covenant, as it was necessary that so it should be. For, 1. The mind is the principal seat of all spiritual obedience. 2. The proper and peculiar actions of the mind, in discerning, knowing, judging, must go before the actions of the will and affections, much more all outward practices. 3. The depravation of the mind is such, by blindness, darkness, vanity, and enmity, that nothing can inflame our souls, or make an entrance towards the reparation of our natures, but an internal, spiritual, saving operation of grace on the mind. 4. Faith itself is principally ingenerated by an infusion of saving light into the mind, 2 Cor. 4:4, 6. So,

Seventh Practical Observation

All the beginnings and entrances into the saving knowledge of God, and for that reason of obedience to him, are effects of the grace of the covenant. [In other words, the sinner's prayer is not flowing from this new principle but from wholly corrupted natural principles! And that is why any prayer is unbiblical, is highly presumptuous and provoking to God. This whole point is KEY to understand.]

On Their Hearts

The second part of this first promise of the covenant is expressed in these words, “And will write them on their hearts;” which is that which renders the former part actually effectual. Expositors generally observe, that respect is had in this to the giving of the law on Mount Sinai, that is, in the first covenant; for then the law (that is, “the ten words”) was written in tables of stone. And although the original tables were broken by Moses, when the people had broken the covenant, yet would not God alter that dispensation, nor write his laws any other way, but commanded new tables of stone to be made, and wrote them in that place. And this was done, not so much to secure the outward letter of them, as to represent the hardness of the hearts of the people to whom they were given. God did not, God would not by virtue of that covenant otherwise dispose of his law. And the event that followed this was that they broke these laws, and abode not in obedience. This event God promises to anticipate and prevent under the new covenant, and that by writing these laws now in our hearts, which he wrote before only in tables of stone; that is, he will effectually work that obedience in us which the law does require, for he “works in us both to will and to do of his own good pleasure.” [this is KEY!! to understanding the new covenant as distinguished from the Old; and to see more clearly the error, or rather the presumption of the sinner's prayer. How can a unregenerate person sincerely pray a holy prayer without this holy law written on his heart? That is why this prayer is presumption; his heart is still at enmity with God, is blind, ignorant of Christ, without faith, etc. This prayer proceeds only from natural principles of self-love and self preservation and other self seeking ends. The only reasonable conclusion on this matter is that this prayer is a contradiction of the highest sort, the cart before the horse. It is on this account why Thomas Shepard labeled it a wicked presumption. Calvin writes, he [God] cannot be toughed with repentance, and his heart cannot undergo changes. Confessing the Impassible God, pg 157. Study this subject of impassibility! The heart, as distinguished from the mind, comprises the will and the affections; and they are compared to the tables in which the letter of the law was engraved. For as by that writing and engraving, the tables received the impression of the letters and words in which the law was contained, which they did firmly retain and represent, so as that although they were stones still in their nature, yet were they nothing but the law in their use; so by the grace of the new covenant there is a durable impression of the law of God on the wills and affections of men, in accordance with which they fulfill it, represent it, comply with it, and have a living principle of it abiding in them. To that end, as this work must necessarily consist of two parts, namely, the removal out of the heart of whatever is contrary to the law of God, and the implanting of principles of obedience in that respect; so it comes under a double description or denomination in the Scripture. For sometimes it is called a “taking away of the heart of stone,” or “circumcising of the heart;” and sometimes the “giving of an heart of flesh,” the “writing of the law in our hearts;” which is the renovation of our natures into the image of God in righteousness and the holiness of truth. To that end in this promise the whole of our sanctification, in its beginning and progress, in its work on our whole souls and all their faculties, is comprised. And we may observe,

Eighth Practical Observation

The work of grace in the new covenant happens on the whole soul, in all its faculties, powers, and affections, to their change and renovation. The whole was corrupted, and the whole must be renewed. The image of God was originally in and on the whole, and on the loss of it the whole was deprived. See 1 Thes. 5:23.

Ninth Practical Observation

To take away the necessity and efficacy of renewing, changing, sanctifying grace, consisting in an internal, efficacious operation of the principles, habits, and acts of internal grace and obedience, is plainly to overthrow and reject the new covenant. [This is why the sinner's prayer turns the gospel on its head. It presumes the sinner has these promises before he actually has them! For a covenant to be steadfast and sure, both parties must be in mutual agreement to the terms of the covenant. But in fact, the praying sinner is not; he is deceiving himself; his heart still is at enmity with God and cannot please him at all in his condition. This is the danger of this prayer; he now thinks he is converted when he is not. Hence see the following comments by Owen; see red.]

Tenth Practical Observation

We bring nothing to the new covenant but our hearts, as tables to be written in, with the sense of the insufficiency of the precepts and promises of the law, with respect to our own ability to comply with them.

“I will be to them a God, and they will be to me a people.”

The last thing in the words is the relation that follows on this between God and his people: “I will be to them a God, and they will be to me a people.” This is indeed a distinct promise by itself, summarily comprising all the blessings and privileges of the covenant. And it is placed in the center of the account given of the whole, as that from which source all the grace of it does spring, in which all the blessings of it do consist, and in accordance with which they are secured. Although in this place it is peculiarly mentioned, as that which has its foundation in the foregoing promise. For this relation, which implies mutual acquiescence in each other, could not be, nor ever had been, if the minds and hearts of them who are to be taken into it were not changed and renewed. For neither could God approve of and rest in his love towards them, while they were enemies to him in the depravation of their natures; nor could they find rest or satisfaction in God, whom they neither knew, nor liked, nor loved.

This is the general expression of any covenant relation between God and men, “He will be to them a God, and they will be to him a people.” And it is frequently made use of with respect to the first covenant, which yet was disannulled. God owned the people in that respect for his peculiar portion, and they avouched him to be their God alone.

Nor can this be spoken of God and any people, but on the ground of an especial covenant. It is true, God is the God of all the world and all people are his; yea, he is a God to them all. For as he made them, so he sustains, rules, and governs them in all things, by his power and providence. But with respect to this God does not freely promise that he will be a God to any, nor can so do; for his power over all, and his rule of all things, is essential and natural to him, so as it cannot otherwise be. To that end, as thus declared, it is a peculiar expression of an especial covenant relation. And the nature of it is to be expounded by the nature and properties of that covenant which it does respect.

The Nature of this Relation

Two things we must therefore consider, to discover the nature of this relation: 1. The foundation of it. 2. The mutual actions in it by virtue of this relation.

The Foundation

To the manifestation of the foundation of it, some things must be premised:

(1.) On the entrance of sin there continued no such covenant relation between God and man, as that by virtue of it he should be their God, and they should be his people. God continued still in the full enjoyment of his sovereignty over men; which no sin, or rebellion, or apostasy of man could in the least impeach. And man continued under an obligation to dependence on God and subjection to his will in all things. For these cannot be separated from his nature and being until final judgment be executed; after which God rules over them only by power, without any respect to their wills or obedience. But that especial relation of mutual interest by virtue of the first covenant ceased between them.

(2.) God would not enter into any other covenant with sinful, fallen man, to be “a God to them,” and to take them to be a “peculiar people” to him, immediately in their own persons. Nor was it consistent with his wisdom and goodness so to do; for if man was not steadfast in God’s covenant, but broke and disannulled it when he was sinless and upright, only created with a possibility of defection, what expectations could there be that now he was fallen, and his nature wholly depraved, any new covenant should be of use to the glory of God or advantage of man? To enter into a new covenant that must necessarily be broken, to the aggravation of the misery of man, became not the wisdom and goodness of God. If it be said, ‘God might have so made a new covenant immediately with men as to secure their future obedience, and to have made it firm and stable,’ I answer, it would not have become the divine wisdom and goodness to have dealt better with men after their rebellion and apostasy than before, namely, on their own account. He did in our first creation communicate to our nature all that grace and all those privileges with which in his wisdom he thought meet to endow it, and all that was necessary to make them who were partakers of it everlastingly blessed. To suppose that he, on his own account alone, would immediately collate more grace on it, is to suppose him singularly well pleased with our sin and rebellion. This, then, God would not do. To that end,

(3.) God provided in the first place that there should be a mediator, a sponsor, an undertaker, with whom alone he would treat about a new covenant, and so establish it. For in the contrivance of his grace and wisdom concerning it, there were many things necessary to it that could no otherwise be enacted and accomplished. Nay, there was not any one thing in all the good which he designed to mankind in this covenant, in a way of love, grace, and mercy, that could be communicated to them, so as that his honor and glory might be advanced by that means, without the consideration of this mediator, and what he undertook to do. Nor could mankind have yielded any of that obedience to God which he would require of them, without the interposition of this mediator on their behalf. It was therefore with him that God firstly made this covenant.

The Mediator Must Be Christ

How it was needful that this mediator should be God and man in one person; how he became so to undertake for us, and in our stead; what was the especial covenant between God and him as to the work which he undertook personally to perform; have, according to our poor weak measure and dark apprehension of these heavenly things, been declared at large in our Exercitations on this epistle, and yet more fully in our discourse of the mystery and glory of the person of Christ.⁷ To that end, as to this new covenant, it was firstly made with Jesus Christ, the surety of it and undertaker in it. For,

(1.) God neither would nor, "salvâ justitiâ, sapientiâ, et honore," [saving justice, wisdom and honor] could, treat immediately with sinful, rebellious men on terms of grace for the future, until satisfaction was undertaken to be made for sins past, or such as should afterwards fall out. This was done by Christ alone, who was therefore the πρωτον δεκτικον of this covenant and all the grace of it. See 2 Cor. 5:19, 20; Gal. 3:13, 14; Rom. 3:25.

(2.) No restipulation [to stipulate again - to agree again] of obedience to God could be made by man, which might be a ground of entering into a covenant intended to be firm and stable. [another sound argument against the propriety of the sinner's prayer] For seeing we had broken our first covenant engagement with God in our best condition, we were not likely of ourselves to make good a new engagement of a higher nature than the former. Who will take the word or the security of a bankrupt for thousands, who is known not to be worth one farthing; especially if he had wasted a former estate in luxury and riot, continuing an open slave to the same lusts? To that end it was absolutely necessary that in this covenant there should be a surety, to undertake for our answering and firm standing to the terms of it. Without this, the event of this new covenant, which God would make as a singular effect of his wisdom and grace, would neither have been glory to him [since the sinner in the sinner's prayer robs God of the glory of his free grace] nor advantage to us [as I mentioned before, this leads to a fatal security; as Jesus said to the Pharisees, "If you were blind, you would have no sin; but now you say, 'We see.' [as the unregenerate presumes when they say the sinner's prayer] Therefore your sin remains."].

(3.) That grace which was to be the spring of all the blessings of this covenant, to the glory of God and salvation of the church, was to be deposited in some safe hand, for the accomplishment of these ends. In the first covenant, God at once committed to man that whole stock of grace [concreated upon Adam's creation¹ see Continual Supplies of Grace on pgs 2154, 210, 286, 295 & Adam Defectible on pgs 1595, 2156] which was necessary to enable him to the obedience of it. And the grace of reward which he was to receive on the performance of it, God reserved absolutely in his own hand; yea, so as that perhaps man did not fully understand what it was. But all was lost at once that was committed to our keeping, so as that nothing at all was left to give us the least relief as to any new endeavors. To that end God will now secure all the good things of this covenant, both as to grace and glory, in a third hand, in the hand of a mediator. On this the promises are made to him, and the fullness of grace is laid up in him, John 1:14; Col. 1:19; 2:3; Eph. 3:8; 2 Cor. 1:20.

(4.) As he was the mediator of this covenant, God became his God, and he became the servant of God in a peculiar manner. For he stood before God in this covenant as a public representative of all the elect. See our comment on chap. 1:5, 8, 9; 2:13. God is a God to him in all the promises he received on the behalf of his spiritual body; and he was his servant in the accomplishment of them, as the pleasure of the Lord was to prosper in his hand.

(5.) God being in this covenant a God and Father to Christ, he came by virtue of it to be our God and Father, John 20:17; Heb. 2:12, 13. And we became “heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ;” and his people, to yield him all sincere obedience.

And these things may suffice briefly to declare the foundation of that covenant relation which is here expressed.

¹ “the law indeed is not a rule of that by which we are to obey, namely, of our faith, yet it is the only rule of what we are to obey; we are not to perform acts of obedience now as Adam was to do, namely, by the sole power of inherent grace, but we are to live by faith, and act by faith, (for without Me you can do nothing, Jn15:5). We are not united to Christ our life by obedience, as Adam was to God by it, but by faith. And therefore as all action in living things come from union, so all our acts of obedience are to come by faith, from the Spirit on Christ’s part, and from faith on our part, which make our union.” Thomas Shepard, The Sound Believer, p 381

The Things Promised in the New Covenant: a saving knowledge of God. This saving knowledge is pretended by those who do the sinner's prayer in order to get favor with God so as to get saved or converted. But this is, as I have stated before, presumption of the highest order.

None of them shall teach his neighbor, and none his brother, saying, ‘Know the LORD,’ for all shall know Me, from the least of them to the greatest of them. Heb. 8:11

excerpt from Covenant Theology - Coxe & Owen: this excerpt by Owen, p 299

What is its Subject-Matter

The thing promised, is the knowledge of God: “They will all know me.” No duty is more frequently commanded than this is, nor any grace more frequently promised. See Deut. 29:6; Jer. 24:7; Ezek. 11:10; 36:23, 26, 27. For it is the foundation of all other duties of obedience, and of all communion with God in them. All graces as to their exercise, as faith, love, and hope, are founded in that respect. And the woeful lack of it which is visible in the world is evidence how little there is of true evangelical obedience among the generality of them that are called Christians. And two things may be considered in this promise: (1.) The object, or what is to be known. (2.) The knowledge itself, of what kind and nature it is:

(1.) The first is God himself: "They will all know me, says the LORD." And it is so not absolutely, but as to some especial revelation of himself. For there is a knowledge of God, as God, by the light of nature. This is not here intended, nor is it the subject of any gracious promise, but is common to all men. There was, moreover, a knowledge of God by revelation under the old covenant, but attended with great obscurity in various things of the highest importance. To that end there is something further intended, as is evident from the antithesis between the two states in this declared. In brief, it is the knowledge of him as revealed in Jesus Christ under the new testament. To show what is contained in this doctrinally would be to go over the principal articles of our faith, as declared in the gospel. The sum is, To "know the Lord," is to know God as he is in Christ personally, as he will be to us in Christ graciously, and what he requires of us and accepts in us through the Beloved. In all these things, notwithstanding all their teaching and diligence in that respect, the church was greatly in the dark under the old testament; but they are all of them more clearly revealed in the gospel.

(2.) The knowledge of these things is that which is promised. For notwithstanding the clear revelation of them, we abide in ourselves unable to discern them and receive them [Rom. 8:7-8]. For such a spiritual knowledge is intended as in accordance with which the mind is renewed, being accompanied with faith and love in the heart. This is that knowledge which is promised in the new covenant, and which will be brought about in all them who are interested in that respect.

Twenty-fifth Practical Observation

The full and clear declaration of God, as he is to be known of us in this life, is a privilege reserved for and belonging to the days of the new testament. Before, it was not made; and more than is now made is not to be expected in this world. And the reason of this is, because it was made by Christ. See the exposition on chap. 1:1, 2.

Twenty-Sixth Practical Observation

To know God as he is revealed in Christ, is the highest privilege of which in this life we can be made partakers; for this is life eternal, that we may know the Father, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he has sent, John 17:3. Twenty-Seventh Practical Observation Persons destitute of this saving knowledge are utter strangers to the covenant of grace; for this is a principal promise and effect of it, wherever it does take place.

Twenty-Eighth Practical Observation

Free and sovereign, undeserved grace in the pardon of sin is the original spring and foundation of all covenant mercies and blessings. By this means, and by this means alone, are the glory of God and the safety of the church provided for. And those who like not God's covenant on these terms (as none do by nature) will eternally fall short of the grace of it. By this means all glorying and all boasting in ourselves is excluded; which was that which God aimed at in the contrivance and establishment of this covenant, Rom. 3:27; 1 Cor. 1:29-31 [and Eph. 2:8-9]. For this could not be if the fundamental grace of it did depend on any condition or qualification in ourselves. If we let go the free pardon of sin, without respect to any thing in those that receive it, we renounce the gospel. Pardon of sin is not merited by antecedent duties [e.g., a prayer], but is the strongest obligation to future duties. He that will not receive pardon unless he can one way or other deserve it, or make himself meet for it; or pretends to have received it, and finds not himself obliged to universal obedience by it, neither is nor will be partaker of it.

The Promise Considered

In the promise itself we may consider, 1. To whom it is made. And, 2. What it is that is promised.

To Whom it is Made

The first is expressed in the pronoun αυτων, "their," three times repeated. All those absolutely, and only those with whom God makes this covenant, are intended. Those whose sins are not pardoned do in no sense partake of this covenant; it is not made with them. For this is the covenant that God makes with them, that he will be merciful to their sins; that is, to them in the pardon of them. Some speak of a universal conditional covenant, made with all mankind. If there be any such thing, it is not that here intended; for they are all actually pardoned with whom this covenant is made. And the indefinite declaration of the nature and terms of the covenant is not the making of a covenant with any. And what should be the condition of this grace here promised of the pardon of sin? "It is," say they, "that men repent, and believe, and turn to God, and yield obedience to the gospel." If so, then men must do all these things before they receive the remission of sins? "Yes." Then must they do them while they are under the law, and the curse of it, for so are all men whose sins are not pardoned. This is to make obedience to the law, and that to be performed by men while under the curse of it, to be the condition of gospel-mercy; which is to overthrow both the law and the gospel.

Objection and Answer

(also add to ordo salutis)

"But then, on the other hand it will follow," they say, "that men are pardoned before they do believe; which is expressly contrary to the Scripture."

Answer: (1.) The communication and donation of faith to us is an effect of the same grace in accordance with which our sins are pardoned; and they are both bestowed on us by virtue of the same covenant. (2.) The application of pardoning mercy to our souls is in order of nature consequent to believing, but in time they go together. (3.) Faith is not required to the procuring of the pardon of our sins, but to the receiving of it: "Whosoever believes in him will receive remission of sins," Acts 10:43.

The new covenant is made with them alone who effectually and eventually are made partakers of the grace of it. "This is the covenant that I will make with them... I will be merciful to their unrighteousness," etc. Those with whom the old covenant was made were all of them actual partakers of the benefits of it; and if they are not so with whom the new is made, it comes short of the old in efficacy, and may be utterly frustrated. Neither does the indefinite proposal of the terms of the covenant prove that the covenant is made with them, or any of them, who enjoy not the benefits of it. Indeed this is the excellence of this covenant, and so it is here declared, that it does effectually communicate all the grace and mercy contained in it to all and every one with whom it is made; with whomsoever it is made, his sins are pardoned.

Groundlessness of the Sinner's Prayer

Another discussion from which you will gain a deeper understanding of the groundlessness and hence, false security and presumptuous nature of the Sinner's Prayer. This is especially seen in the first paragraph where Flavel describes the unregenerated sinner: wholly under Satan's control, bound by sin, spiritually blind, an enemy to God in his heart, wholly self-centered, etc. A prayer of any kind by a person in this condition is complete presumption and highly provoking to God.

Speaking of common grace (God rains on the just and the unjust) vs. special or saving grace (faith) reserved only for the elect.

Yet we must not— for the sake of the kinship and connection between them— overlook the essential difference. This is the special grace that was unknown to the pagans. All pagan religions are self-willed and legalistic. They are all the aftereffects and adulterations of the covenant of works. Human beings here consistently try to bring about their own salvation by purifications, asceticism, penance, sacrifice, law observance, ceremony, and so on. Hermon Bavinck, Reformed Dogmatics, vol. 3, pg 220

"A man's free will cannot cure him even of the toothache, or a sore finger; and yet he madly thinks it is in its power to cure his soul" – Toplady, 1740-1778

Augustus Montague Toplady was an Anglican cleric and hymn writer. He was a major Calvinist opponent of John Wesley. He is best remembered as the author of the hymn "Rock of Ages".

Two things remain to be considered, before we finish this last proposition : viz.

1. Who the people of God are ?
2. Why this privilege is peculiar to them ?

1. Who are the people of God? the scripture describes them two ways; negatively and positively. Negatively, in opposition to those who are not the people of God, but are, (1.) The servants of sin, obeying it in the lusts of it, which the people of God neither are, nor dare to do, Rom. vi. 11, 12, etc. (2.) The men of this world have their portion in this life, savoring and minding the things of the world only, whereas the people of God are called out of the world, John xvii. 16, and principally study and labour after the higher concernments of the world to come, Rom. viii. 5. (3.) The vassals of Satan, do his lusts, and are in subjection to his power. Acts 26:18, Eph. ii. 2, from which bondage the people of God are made free. (4.) Nor yet are they their own, living wholly to themselves, and seeking only their own ends, as others do, 1 Cor. vi. 19, 20. These, all these are not the people of God, God will not own them for such; they but deceive themselves in thinking and calling themselves so. But then positively, they are (1.) A people regenerated, and born again, John 1:13. Their regeneration gives them both the essence and denomination of the people of God; It is as impossible to be the children of God without regeneration, as it is to be the children of men without generation. (2.) They are a people in covenant with God, Ezek. xvi. 8. "I entered into a covenant with thee, and thou becamest mine." For in this covenant they give themselves to the Lord, 2 Cor. 8:5. They avouch the Lord to be their God, and make over themselves to him to be his people, Jer. 31:33, devoting unto God all that they are, their souls and bodies, with every faculty and member inclusively, Rom. 12:1. Luke 10:27. All that they have, Rom. 11:36, all is dedicated and devoted to the Lord's use and service, and these only are the people of God.

2. The last thing to be cleared is, Why the people of God, and none beside them, have this peculiar privilege of an hiding place in the day of trouble, and the grounds of it are, 1. Because they only have special interest in God, and propriety is the ground on which they claim and expect protection: I am thine, save me, Ps. 119:94. [Only those who are converted, born again, can say this or that which is similar, Help my unbelief or increase my faith, etc. But before one is born again, he can't even see the kingdom of God let alone pray for any spiritual benefit. Flavel also quotes on pg 408, Ps. 86:2, "Preserve my soul, for I am holy; O thou, my God, save thy servant that trusteth in thee." And then Flavel says, "I speak not here of the first act of faith which flows not from an interest, but gives the soul an interest in God."] Upon this very ground it was that David encouraged himself in one of his greatest plunges and distresses of his whole life, 1 Sam. 30:6. "But David encouraged himself in the Lord his God." 2. The people of God only are at peace with God; and where there is no peace there can be no protection. [unconverted men are still at war with God; their prayer is not genuine; it can't be. They have not the love of God in them yet, they have not faith yet, etc. What they are really praying for is what God has and not prayer for God, for communion with Him for who He really is. The prayer is all raised corrupt affections and carnal needs. See parable of the Sower.] The harbours and garrisons of one kingdom never receive into their protection the subjects of another kingdom that are in open hostility against them. Now there is open war betwixt God and the wicked, Ps. vii. 11, Zech, xi. 8. Till they have peace with God they can claim no protection from God.

3. The promises of protection are made only to God's people; and where there is no promise, there can be no warrantable claim to protection, 2 Cor. i. 20. 2 Pet. i. 4. Common providences may shelter them for a time, but the saints only have the keys of the promises, which open the chambers or attributes of God to them. [Unconverted men cannot make any claim from God since they are not in covenant with him at the time of the prayer! Again, this prayer is the cart before the horse.]

4. None but the people of God walk in the ways of God, and none but those that walk in his way can, groundedly, expect his protection ; for so runs the promise, 2 Chron. xv. 2. "I am with you whilst you are with me," i.e., I am with you, by way of protection, direction, support, and salvation, whilst you are with me in the duties of obedience, and exercises of your graces; see that you love, fear, and obey me, and then, depend upon it, I will look after and take care of you. [Those who are told they are saved because they made this prayer are self-deceived.]

5. To conclude. The people of God only flee to God for sanctuary, and cast themselves upon him for protection, Ps. 56:3. "At what time I am afraid, I will trust in thee." Ps. 18:2, "The Lord is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer; my God, my strength, in whom I will trust, my buckler, and the horn of my salvation, and my high tower." This their confidence in God, and reliance upon him, engage him to protect them in their dangers, Isa. 26:3. All others put themselves out of God's protection by making flesh their arm [which the sinner's prayer is; it's a legal act vs. a truly evangelical act, an act of saving faith which he has not since he is unconverted while making this prayer], and so giving the honour of God to the creature, Jer. 17:5. [The sinner's prayer does exactly that; it robs God of his glory of his free grace and makes God a debtor to the creature.] And thus much for clearing this last proposition also. All that remains will be dispatched in a brief and close application of the point thus opened and confirmed.

CHAP. XII.

Containing the first use of the point in several informing consecrations and deductions of truth from it.

Consect. I. From the whole of this discourse we may be informed what a miserable and shiftless people all those will be in times of trouble who have no special interest in God, or the promises. Sad and lamentable was the case of Saul, as it is by himself expressed, 1 Sam. 28:15. "I am sore distressed, for the Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me, and answereth me no more." It is a wonderful and unaccountable thing, how carnal men and women subsist and bear up, when their earthly props and hopes sink under and fail them; so long as any creature-comfort is left, thither they will retreat for relief and succor; but if all fail, as quickly they may, whither will they turn for comfort, having not a God nor a promise to flee to? which the people of God can do when all things else fail them, Heb. iii. 17. Their different conditions in the day of trouble is clearly expressed in Zeph. ii. 3, 4. "Seek ye the Lord all ye meek of the earth which have wrought his judgment, seek righteousness, seek meekness, it may be ye shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger." There is God's may-be, which is better security than man's shall-be for their temporal deliverance. But what shall become of others that have no refuge but in the creature? Why, the misery and shiftlessness of their condition follows in the next words: "Gaza shall be forsaken, and Ashkelon a desolation; they shall drive out Ashdod at noon-day, and Ekron shall be rooted up;" i.e., all their earthly securities shall fail them; their strong-holds shall not secure them; they shall find no shelter in the scorching heat of the day of trouble. Moab, Ashdod, and Ekron have no more benefit by the promises made to Zion, than the inhabitants of Rome can claim by the charter of London. If a wicked or hypocritical person cry to God in his distress, he will not hear him, Prov. 1:25, 26, Job 27: 9, but will bid him go to his earthly refuges which he hath chosen. If he go to the promises, knock at those doors of hope, they cannot relieve him, being all made in Christ to believers; if to the name and attributes of God all the doors are shut against them, Ps. 34:16. [The person making any kind of prayer to God has not covenantal right to any promise including eternal life because at the time of the prayer he is not in any covenant with God yet, but still under the curse and the covenant of works; it is precisely this prayer that exposes this fact, for he is doing the only thing nature can produce which is to do something to recommend himself to God...what must I do which is what the law says; do this and live. The truly penitent person knows he had nothing to do with his conversion as Paul insinuates in 1Cor4:7¹, "For who ^lmakes you differ from another? And what do you have that you did not receive? Now if you did indeed receive it, why do you boast as if you had not received it? i.e., if you had to ask for it, that is do something to get it which would lay grounds for boasting. But faith is a gift, not of yourselves...lest anyone boast, Eph 2:8-9!! Man is completely passive in his conversion or in his being born again, just as in our natural birth. See also, 2Cor3:5 As Martin Luther said, "No one can give himself faith; it is a gift of God."]

There are seven dreadful aggravations of a wicked man's troubles.

(1.) When troubles come upon him, the curse of God follows him into his carnal refuges; Jer. xvii. 5. "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord." Trouble is the arrow, and this curse the venom of the arrow, which makes the wound incurable.

(2.) When troubles fall upon him from without, a guilty conscience will terrify him from within; so that the mind can give no relief to the body, but both sink under their own weights. It is not so with the people of God, they have inward relief under outward pressures, 2 Cor. iv. 16.

(3.) The gusts and storms of wicked men's troubles may blow them into hell, and hurry them into eternal destruction; if death march towards them upon the pale horse, hell always follows him, Rev. vi. 8.

(4.) If troubles and distresses overwhelm their hearts, they can give them no vent or ease by prayer, faith, and resignation to God, as his people use to do, 1 Sam. i. 18.

(5.) When their troubles and distresses come, then come the hour and power of their temptations; and, to shun sorrow, they will fall into sin, having no promise to be kept in the hour of temptation, as the saints have, Rev. iii. 10.

(6.) When their troubles come, they will be left alone in the midst of them; these are their burdens, and they alone must bear them. God's gracious, comfortable, supporting presence is only with his own people.

(7.) If trouble or death come upon them as a storm, they have no anchor of hope to drop in the storm; the wicked is driven away in his wickedness; but the righteous hath hope in his deaths, Prov. 14:32. By all which it appears, that a Christless person is a most helpless and shiftless creature in the day of trouble.

¹ Now if you did indeed receive it, why do you boast as if you had not received it?

1Cor. 4:7b John Gill Commentary

To glory in any mercy, favour, or blessing received from God, as if it was not received from him, but as owing to human power, care, and industry, betrays wretched vanity, stupid and more than brutish ignorance, horrid ingratitude, abominable pride and wickedness; and is contrary to the grace of God, which teaches men humility and thankfulness. To God alone should all the blessings of nature, providence, and grace be ascribed; he ought to have all the glory of them; and to him, and him only, praise is due for them. That proud Arminian, Grevinchovius ^{F20}, in answer to this text, said,

“I make myself to differ; since I could resist God, and divine predetermination, but have not resisted, why may not I glory in it as of my own?”

My comments reference on Isa. 53:2-6

For he grew up before him like a young plant, and like a root out of dry ground; he had no form or majesty that we should look at him, and no beauty that we should desire him. He was despised and rejected by men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; and as one from whom men hide their faces he was despised, and we esteemed him not. Surely he has borne our griefs and carried our sorrows; yet we esteemed him stricken, smitten by God, and afflicted. But he was pierced for our transgressions; he was crushed for our iniquities; upon him was the chastisement that brought us peace, and with his wounds we are healed. All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned—every one—to his own way; and the Lord has laid on him the iniquity of us all. Isaiah 53:2-6 ESV

This is the condition of unregenerate man highlighted in red above. See also Romans 3. This is why saying some kind of prayer in order to curry God's favor is a wicked presumption, an act of man flowing from not a principle of spirit life (i.e., faith and holiness) but from a principle of self-love or self-preservation. It is a contradiction to say that an unregenerate man's prayer is genuine or truly sincere (though it may sound sincere) coming from a heart full of love for God, when in truth he despises and rejects him, seeing no beauty that he should desire him!

This is regarding the Antinomian's idea of what constitutes justification, "which teaches that men are justified actually and completely, before they have a being," ... "that justification by faith is no more but a manifestation to us of what was really done before we had a being." which ultimately consists in a "personal persuasion or manifestation of God's love to them" all of which has direct relation to the foundational reason for the error of the Sinner's Prayer. This will shed much light on the false foundation and presumption of the Sinner's prayer. This will also teach you to exercise your reason.

But, notwithstanding this double antidote and security, we find, by daily experience, such doctrines too much obtaining in the professing world. For my own part, he that searches my heart and reins, is witness, I would rather choose to have my right hand wither, and my tongue rot within my mouth, than to speak one word, or write one line to cloud and diminish the free grace of God. Let it arise and shine in its meridian glory. None owes more to it, or expects more from it than I do ; and what I shall write in this controversy, is to vindicate it from those doctrines and opinions, which, under pretence of exalting it, do really militate against it. To begin therefore with the first and leading error.

Error I. That the justification of sinners is an immanent and eternal act of God, not only preceding all acts of sin, but the very existence of the sinner himself, and so perfectly abolishing sin in our persons, that we are as clean from sin as Christ himself; αναμασθητοι, [sinners] as some of them have spoken. To stop the progress of this error I shall,

1. Lay down the sentence of the orthodox about it.
2. Offer some reasons for the refutation of it.

(1) That which I take to be the truth agreed upon, and asserted by sound and reformed divines, touching gospel-justification, is by them made clear to the world, in these following scriptural distinctions of it.

Justification may be considered under a twofold respect or habitude.

1. According to God's eternal decree; or,
2. According to the execution thereof in time.

1. According to God's eternal decree and purpose; and in this respect grace is said to be "given us in Christ before the world began," 2 Tim. i. 19, and we are said to be "predestinated to the adoption of children by Jesus Christ," Eph. i. 5.

2. According to the execution thereof in time, so they again distinguish it by considering it two ways:

1. In its impetration by Christ.
2. In its application to us.

That very mercy or privilege of justification, which God from all eternity, purely out of his benevolent love, purposed and decreed for his elect, was also in time purchased for them by the death of Christ, Rom. 5:9, 10. where we are said to be "justified by his blood;" and he is said to have "made peace through the blood of his cross, to reconcile all things to himself," Col. 1:20. to be "delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification," Rom. iv. 25. Once more, "That God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses," 2 Cor. 5:19. God the Father had in the death of Christ, a foundation of reconciliation, whereby he became propitious to his elect, that he might absolve and justify them. Again,

2. It must be considered in its application to us, which application is made in this life at the time of our effectual calling. When an elect sinner is united to Christ by faith, and so passeth from death to life, from a state of condemnation into a state of absolution and favour; this is our actual justification, Rom. v. 1, Acts xiii. 39, John V. 24, which actual justification is again considered two ways:

1. Universally and in general, as to the state of the person.
2. Specifically and particularly, as to the acts of sin.

As soon as we are received into communion with Christ, and his righteousness is imputed by God, and received by faith, immediately we pass from a state of death and condemnation to a state of life and justification, and all sins already committed, are remitted without exception or revocation; and not only so, but a remedy is given us in the righteousness of Christ against sins to come; and though these special and particular sins we afterward fall into, do need particular pardons ; yet, by the renewed acts of faith and repentance, the believer applies to himself the righteousness of Christ, and they are pardoned.

Again, they carefully distinguish betwixt,

1. Its application by God to our persons. And,
2. Its declaration, or manifestation in us, and to us.

Which manifestation, or declaration, is either,

1. Private, in the conscience of a believer, or,
2. Public, at the bar of judgment.

And thus justification is many ways distinguished. And, notwithstanding all this, it is still actus indivisus; an undivided act, not on our part, for it is iterated in many acts; but on God's part [the Father], who at once decreed it; and on Christ's part [the Son], who by one offering purchased it, and, at the time of our vocation [by the Holy Spirit], universally applied it, as to the state of the person justified; and that so effectually, as no future sin shall bring that person any more under condemnation. [And here you see the specific acts of the three persons of the Godhead!]

In this sentence or judgment the generality of reformed, orthodox divines are agreed ; and the want of distinguishing (as they, according to scripture, have distinguished) hath led the Antinomians into this first error about justification, and that error hath led them into the most of the other errors. That this doctrine of theirs (which teaches that men are justified actually and completely, before they have a being) is an error, and hath no solid foundation to support it, may be evidenced by these three reasons.

1. Because it is irrational.
2. Because it is unscriptural.
3. Because it is injurious to Christ and the souls of men.

Reason 1. It is irrational to imagine, that men are actually justified before they have a being, by an immanent act [existing within, as all decrees are from God's own counsel] or degree of God. Many things have been urged upon this account, to confute and destroy this fancy, and much more may be rationally urged against it; let the following particulars be weighed in the balance of reason.

1. Can we rationally suppose, that pardon and acceptance can be affirmed or predicated of that which is not? Reason tells us, Non entis nulla sunt accidentia; that which is not, can neither be condemned nor justified; but before the creation, or before a man's particular conception, he was not, and therefore could not in his own person be a subject of justification. Where there is no law, there is no sin; where there is no sin, there is no punishment; where there is neither sin nor punishment, there can be no guilt; (for guilt is an obligation to punishment) and where there is neither law nor sin, nor obligation to punishment, there can be no justification. He that is not capable of a charge, is not capable of a discharge. What remains then, but that either the elect must exist from eternity, or be justified in time? It is true, future beings may be considered as in the purpose and decree of God from all eternity, or as in the intention of Christ, who died intentionally for the sins of the elect, and rose again for their justification; but neither the decree of God, nor the death of Christ takes place upon any man for his actual justification, until he personally exist; for the object of justification, is a sinner actually ungodly, Rom. iv. 5. but so no man is, or can be so from eternity. In election, men are considered without respect to good or evil done by them, Rom. ix. 11. not so in actual justification.

2. In justification there is a change made upon the state of the person, Rom. v. 8, 9. 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10, 11. By justification men pass from a state of death to a state of life, John v. 24, but the decree or purpose of God, in itself, makes no such actual change upon the state of any person : it hath indeed the nature of an universal cause; but an universal cause produceth nothing without particulars. If our state be changed, it is not by an immanent [existing within] act of God; hence no such thing doth transpire. A mere velle non pimore, or intention to justify us in due time and order, makes no change on our state till that come, and the particular causes have wrought. A prince may have a purpose or intention to pardon a law-condemned traitor, and free him from that condemnation in due time; but whilst the law that condemned him, stands in its full force and power against him, he is not justified or acquitted, notwithstanding that gracious intention, but stand still condemned. So it is with us, till by faith we are implanted into Christ. It is true Christ is a surety for all his, and hath satisfied the debt; he is a common head to all his, as Adam was to all his children, Rom. v. 19. but as the sin of Adam condemns none but those that are in him; so the righteousness of Christ actually justifies none but those that are in him; and none are actually in him but believers; therefore, till we believe, no actual change passeth, or can pass upon our states. So that this hypothesis is contrary to reason.

Reason 2. As this opinion is irrational, so it is unscriptural. For

1. The scripture frequently speaks of remission or justification as a future act, and therefore not from eternity, Rom. iv. 23, 24. "Now it was not written for his sake alone, that it was imputed to him; but for ours also, to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe on him," etc. And, Gal. iii. 8. "The scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the Heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham." The gospel was preached many years before the Gentiles were justified; but if they were justified from eternity, how was the gospel preached before their justification?

2. The scripture leaves all unbelievers, without distinction, under condemnation and wrath. The curse of the law lies upon them all till they believe, John iii. 18, "He that believeth in him is not condemned; but he that believeth not, is condemned already." And, Eph. ii. 3, 12, 13. The very elect themselves were by nature the children of wrath even as others. They were at that time, or during that state of nature, (which takes in all that whole space betwixt their conception and conversion) without Christ, without hope, without God in the world. But if this opinion be true, that the elect were justified from eternity, or from the time of Christ's death, then it cannot be true, that the elect by nature are children of wrath, without Christ, without hope, without God in the world; except these two may consist together, (which is absolutely impossible) that the children of wrath, without God, Christ, or hope, are actually discharged from their sins and dangers, by a free and gracious act of justification.

Objection. But doth not scripture say, Rom. viii. 33. " Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" If none can charge the elect, then God hath discharged them.

Solution. God hath not actually discharged them, as they are elect, but as they are justified elect; for so runs the text, and clears itself in the very next words. It is God that justifieth. When God hath actually justified an elect person, none can charge him.

(3.) It is cross to the scripture order of justification, which places it not only after Christ's death in the place last cited, Rom. viii. 33, but also after our actual vocation; as is plain, ver. 30. "Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified." It is absurd to place vocation before predestination, or glorification before justification? Sure then it must be absurd also to place justification before vocation ; the one as well as the other confounds and breaks the scripture order. You may as well say, men shall be glorified that were never justified, as say they may be justified before they believed, or existed. So that you see the notion of justification from eternity, or before our actual existence, and effectual vocation, is a notion as repugnant to sacred scripture, as it is to sound reason.

Reason 3. And as it is found repugnant to reason and scripture, so it is highly injurious to Jesus Christ and the souls of men.

(1.) It greatly injures the Lord Jesus Christ, and robs him of the glory of being our Saviour; for if the elect be justified from eternity, Christ cannot be the Saviour of the elect, as most assuredly he is; for if Christ save them, he must save them as persons subject to perishing, either de facto or de jure. But if the elect were justified from eternity, they could, in neither respect, be subject to perishing. For he that was eternally justified, was never condemned, nor capable of condemnation; and he that never was, nor could be condemned, could never be subject to perishing; and he that never was, nor could be subject to perishing, can never truly and properly be said to be saved.

If it be said the elect were not justified till the death of Christ, I demand then what became of all them that died before the death of Christ? If they were not justified, they could not be glorified; for this is sure, from Rom. viii. 30. that the whole number of the glorified in heaven is made up of such as were justified on earth. Let men take heed, therefore, lest, under pretence of exalting Christ, they bereave him of the glory of being the Saviour of his elect.

(2.) It bereaves him of another glorious royalty. The scripture everywhere makes our justification the result and fruit of the meritorious death of Christ, Rom. iii. 24, 25. Rom. viii. 3, 4 2 Cor. V. 19, 20. Gal. iii. 13, 14. Eph. i. 17. but if men were justified from eternity, how is their justification the fruit and result of the blood of the cross? as it plainly appears from these scriptures to be. Nay,

(3.) This opinion leaves no place for the satisfaction of justice by the cross of Christ for our sins. He did not die according to this opinion to pay our debts. And here Antinomianism and Socinianism meet, and congratulate each other. For if there were no debts owing to the justice of God from eternity, Christ could not die to pay them; and it is manifest there where no debts due to God's justice from eternity, on the account of his elect, if the elect were from eternity justified; unless you will say, a person may be justified, and yet his debts not paid: For all justification dissolves the obligation to punishment.

If there were any debt for Christ to pay by his blood, they must either be his own debts, or the elect's. To say they were his own is a blasphemous reproach to him ; and, according to this opinion, we cannot say they were the elect's; for if they were justified from eternity their debts were discharged, and their bonds cancelled from eternity. So that this opinion leaves nothing to the blood of Christ to discharge, or make satisfaction for.

(4.) And as it hath been proved to be highly injurious to the Lord Jesus, so it is greatly injurious to the souls of men, as it naturally leads them into all those wild and licentious opinions, which naturally flow from it, as from the radical, prolific error, whence most of the rest derive themselves, as will immediately appear in Error II. That justification by faith is no more but the manifestation to us of what was really and actually done before; or a being persuaded more or less of Christ's love to us; and that when persons do believe that which was hid before doth then only appear to them.

Refutation. As the former error dangerously corrupts the doctrine of justification, so this corrupts the doctrine of faith; and therefore deserves to be exploded by all Christians.

That there is a manifestation and discovery of the special love of God and our own saving concernment in the death of Christ to some Christians at some times cannot be denied. St. Paul could say. Gal. ii. 20, 21. Christ loved him, and gave himself for him ; but to say that this is the justifying act of faith, whereby a sinner passes from condemnation and death into the state of righteousness and life; this I must look upon as a great error ; and that for the following reasons:

Reason 1. Because there be multitudes of believing and justified persons in the world, who have no such manifestation, evidence, or assurance, that God laid their iniquities upon Christ, and that he died to put away their sins; but daily conflict with strong fears and doubts, whether it be so or no. There are but few among believers that attain such a persuasion and manifestation, as Antinomians make to be all that is meant in scripture by justification through faith. Many thousand new-born Christians live as the new-born babe, which neither knows its own estate, or the inheritance to which it is born.

Vivct, et vitoo nescius ipse suae.

" Not conscious of life, it lives."

A soul may be in Christ, and a justified state, without any such persuasion or manifestation, as they here speak of, Isa. 1:10, and if any shall assert the contrary, he will condemn the greatest part of the generation of God's children. Now that cannot be the saving and justifying act of faith, which is not to be found in multitudes of believing and justified persons.

But manifestation, or a personal persuasion of the love of God to a man's soul, or that Christ died for him, and all his iniquities are thereby forgiven him, is not to be found in multitudes of believing and justified souls.

Therefore such a persuasion or manifestation is not that saving justifying faith which the scripture speaks of That faith which only justifies the person of a sinner before God must necessarily be found in all justified believers, or else a man may be justified without the least degree of justifying faith, and consequently it is not faith alone by which a man is justified before God.

Reason 2. That cannot be a justifying act of faith which is not constant and abiding with the justified person, but comes and goes, is frequently lost and recovered, the state of the person still remaining the same. And such contingent things are these persuasions and manifestations ; they come and go, are won and lost, the state of the person still remaining the same. Job was as much a justified believer when he complained that God was his enemy, as when he could say, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." The same may be said of David, Heman, Asaph, and the greatest number of justified believers recorded in the scripture. There be two things belonging to a justified state, (1.) That which is essential and inseparable, to wit, faith uniting the soul to Christ. (2.) That which is contingent and separable, to wit, evidence and persuasion of our interest in him. Those believers that walk in darkness and have no light have yet a real, special interest in God as their God, Isa. 1:10. Here then you find believers without persuasion or manifestation of God's love to them; which could never be, if justifying faith consisted in a personal persuasion, manifestation, or evidence of the love of God, and pardon of sin to a man's soul. That cannot be the justifying faith spoken of in scripture, without which a justified person may live in Christ and be as much in a state of pardon, and acceptation with God, when he wants it, as when he hath it. But such is persuasion, evidence, or manifestation of a man's particular interest in the love of God, or the pardon of his sins. Therefore this is not the justifying faith the scripture speaks of.

Reason 3. That only is justifying, saving faith, which gives the soul right and title to Christ, and the saving benefits which come by Christ upon all the children of God. Now, it is not persuasion that Christ is ours, but acceptation of him that gives us interest in Christ, and the saving benefits and privileges of the children of God. John i. 12, "But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God; even to them that believe on his name." So that unless the Antinomians can prove, that receiving of Christ, and personal persuasion of pardon be one and the same thing, and consequently, that all believers in the world are persuaded, or assured, that their sins are pardoned and reject from the number of believers all tempted, deserted, dark and doubting Christians; this persuasion they speak of is not, nor can it be the act of faith, which justifies the person of a sinner before God. That which I think led our Antinomians into this error, was an unsound and unwary definition of faith, which, in their youth, they had imbibed from their catechisms, and other systems, passing without contradiction or scruple in those days; which, though it were a mistake, and hath abundantly been proved to be so in latter days, yet our Antinomians will not part with a notion so serviceable to the support of the darling opinion of eternal justification.

Reason 4. A man may be strongly persuaded of the love of God to his soul, and of the pardon of his sins, and yet have no interest in Christ, nor be in a pardoned state. This was the case of the Pharisees and others, Luke xviii. 9. Rev. iii. 17. therefore this persuasion cannot be justifying faith. If a persuasion be that which justifies the persuaded person, then the Pharisees and Laodiceans were justified. Oh ! how common and easy is it for the worst of men to be strongly persuaded of their good condition, whilst humble, serious Christians doubt and stagger? I know not what such doctrine as this is useful for, but to beget and strengthen that sin of presumption, which sends down multitudes to hell out of the professing world. For what is more common amongst the most carnal and unsanctified part of the world, not only such as are merely moral, but even the most flagitious and profane, than to support themselves by false persuasions of their good estate? When they are asked, in order to their conviction, what hopes of salvation they have, and how they are founded ? their common answer is, Christ died for sinners, and that they are persuaded, that whatever he hath done for any other, he hath done it for them as well as others; but such a persuasion cometh not of him that called them, and is of dangerous consequence.

Reason 5. This doctrine is certainly unsound, because it confounds the distinction betwixt dogmatical and saving faith; and makes it all one, to believe an axiom or proposition, and to believe savingly in Christ to eternal life. What is it to believe that God laid our iniquities upon Christ, more than the mere assent of the understanding to a scripture axiom, or proposition, without any consent of the will, to receive Jesus Christ as the gospel offers him? And this is no more than what any unregenerate person may do; yea, the very devils themselves assent to the truth of scripture axioms or propositions as well as men, James ii. 19. "Thou believest there is one God, thou dost well; the devils also believe and tremble." What is more than a scripture axiom or proposition? "God laid the iniquities of us all upon Christ," Isa. 53:6. And yet (saith Dr. Crisp, p. 296.) God cannot charge one sin upon that man that believes this truth, That God laid his iniquities upon Christ. The assent of the understanding may be often given to a scripture-proposition, whilst the heart and will remain carnal, and utterly adverse to Jesus Christ. I may believe dogmatically, that the iniquities of men were laid upon Christ, and persuade myself presumptively, that mine, as well as other men's were laid upon him; and yet remain a perfect stranger to all saving union and communion with him.

Reason 6. This opinion cannot be true, because it takes away the only support that bears up the soul of a believer in times of temptation and desertion.

For how will you comfort such a distressed soul that saith, and saith truly, I have no persuasion that Christ is mine, or that my sins are pardoned; but I am heartily willing to cast my poor sin burdened soul upon him, that he may be mine; I do not certainly know that he died intentionally for me, but I lie at his feet to cleave to him, wait at the door of hope; I stay and trust upon him, though I walk in darkness and have no light. Now let such doctrines as this be preached to a soul in this condition (and we may be sure it is the condition of many thousands belonging to Christ) I say, bring this doctrine to them, and tell them, that unless they be persuaded of the love of God, and that God laid their iniquities on Christ, except they have some manifestation that their persons were justified from eternity, their accepting of Christ, consent of their wills, waiting at his feet, etc., signifies nothing; if they believe not that their particular sins were laid upon Christ, and are pardoned to them by him, they are still unbelievers, and have no part or portion in him. Whatever pretences of spiritual comfort and relief the Antinomian doctrine makes, you see by this it really deprives a very great, if not the greatest number of God's people of their best and sweetest relief in days of darkness and spiritual distress. So that this doctrine which makes manifestation and assurance the very essence of justifying faith, appears hereby to be both a false and very dangerous doctrine. And yet there is as much or more danger to the souls of men in their -

Error 3. That men ought not to doubt of their faith or question, whether they believe or no. Nay, that they ought no more to question their faith than to question Christ.

Refutation. What an easy way to heaven is the Antinomian way? Were it but as true and safe to the soul, as it is easy and pleasing to the flesh, who would not embrace it? What a charm of the devil is prepared in those two propositions? Be but persuaded more or less of Christ's love to thy soul (saith Mr. Saltmarsh) and that is justifying faith. Here is a snare of the devil laid for the souls of men. And then (2.) To make it fast and sure upon the soul, and effectually to prevent the discovery of their error, tell them they need no more to doubt or question their faith than to question Christ, and the work is done to all intents.

Now that this is an error, and a very dangerous one, will appear by the following reasons.

Reason 1. The questioning and examining of our faith is a commanded scripture-duty, 2 Cor. 13:5. "Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves," etc. And 2 Pet. 1:10. "Give diligence to make your calling and election sure." " Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall." 1 Cor. 10:12. The second epistle of John, ver. 8. "Look to yourselves that we lose not the things which we have wrought:" With a multitude of other scriptures, recommending holy jealousy, serious self-trial and examination of our faith, as the unquestionable duties of the people of God. But if we ought to question our faith no more than we ought to question Christ, away then with all self-examination, and diligence to make our calling and election sure; for where there is no doubt nor danger, there is no place or room for examination, or further endeavours to make it surer than it is. How do you like this doctrine, Christians ? How many be there among you, that find no more cause to question your own faith or interest in Christ, than you do to question, whether there be a Christ, or whether he shed his blood for the remission of any man's sins ?

Reason 2. This is a very dangerous error, and it is the more dangerous because it leaves no way to recover a presumptuous sinner out of his dangerous mistakes ; but confirms and fixes him in them to the great hazard of his eternal ruin. It cuts off all means of conviction or better information, and nails them fast to the carnal state in which they are. According to this doctrine, it is impossible for a man to think himself something, when he is nothing; or to be guilty of such a paralogism [an invalid argument] and cheat put by himself upon his own soul, James 2:22. this, in effect, bids a man keep on right or wrong; he is sure enough of heaven if he be but strongly persuaded that Christ died for him, and he shall come thither at last. Certainly this was not the counsel Christ gave to the self-deceived Laodiceans, Rev. iii. 17, 18. but instead of dissuading them from self-jealousy and suspicion of their condition, whether their faith and state were safe or not, he rather counsels them to buy eye-salve, that is, to labour after better information of the true state and condition they were in, and not cast away their souls by false persuasions and vain confidences. [a stupid or fatal security]

Reason 3. This doctrine cannot be true, because it supposes every persuasion, or strong conceit of a man's own heart, to be as infallibly sure and certain, as the very fundamental doctrines of Christianity. No truth in the world can be surer than this, that

Jesus Christ died for sinners. "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance," 1Tim. 1:15. This is a foundation-stone, a tried, precious corner-stone, a sure foundation laid by God himself, Isa. 28:16. and shall the strong conceits and confidences of men's hearts vie and compare in point of certainty with it. As well may probable, and merely conjectural propositions, compare with axioms that are self-evident, or demonstrative arguments that leave no doubts behind them. Know we not, that the heart is deceitful above all things, the most notorious cheat and imposter in the world, Jer. xvii. 9. Does it not deceive all the formal hypocrites in the world, in this very point? And shall every strong conceit and presumptuous confidence, begotten of Satan by a deceitful heart, and nursed up by self-love, pass without any examination or suspicion for as infallible and assured a truth, as that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners? The Lord sweep that doctrine out of the world by reformation, which is like to sweep so many thousand souls into hell by a remediless self-deception. [a fatal security]

Excerpt from Vol. 3, The Causes and Cure From Mental Errors
by John Flavel, pg 458

Cause 5. Another inward cause, disposing men to receive erroneous impressions, is an unreasonable eagerness to snatch at any doctrine or opinion that promiseth ease to an anxious conscience.

Men that are under the frights and terrors of conscience are willing to listen to any thing that offers present relief of all the troubles in the world those of the mind and conscience are most intolerable; and those that are in pain are glad of ease, and readily catch at anything that seems to offer it.

This seems to be the thing which led those poor distressed wretches, intimated Micah vi. 6. into their gross mistakes and errors about the method of the remission of their sins. "Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God? Shall I come before him with burnt-offerings, with calves of a year old? Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousand of rivers of oil? Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?"

They were ready to purchase inward peace, and buy out their pardon at any rate. Nothing but the twinges of conscience could have extorted these things from them. Great is the efficacy and torment of a guilty conscience.

Satan, who feels more of this in himself than any other creature in the world, and knows how ready poor ignorant, but distressed sinners are to catch at anything that looks like ease or comfort, and being jealous what these troubles of conscience may issue into, prepares for them such erroneous doctrines and opinions, under the names of anodines and quieting recipes, by swallowing of which they feel some present ease; but their disease is thereby made so much the more incurable. [i.e., a fatal security]

It is upon this account he hath found such vent in the world for his penances, pilgrimages, and indulgences among the Papists. [and the Sinner's Prayer!] But seeing this ware will not go off among the reformed and more enlightened professors of Christianity, he changeth his hand, and fits other doses under other names to quiet sick and distressed souls, before ever their frights of conscience come to settle into true repentance and faith in the blood of Christ, by dressing up, and presenting to them such opinions as these, namely -

That they may boldly apply to themselves all the promises of pardon and peace, without any respect at all to repentance or faith in themselves; that it is not at all needful, nay, that it is illegal and sinful to have any respect to these things, for as much as their sins were pardoned, and they justified from eternity; and that the covenant of grace is in all respects absolute, and is made to sinners as sinners, without any regard to their faith or repentance; and whatever sins there be in them, God sees them not. [Antinomianism]

To such a charm of troubles as this, how earnestly doth the ear of a distressed conscience listen? how greedily doth it suck in such pleasing words? Are all sins that are pardoned, pardoned before they are committed? and, Does the covenant of grace require neither repentance nor faith antecedently to the application of the promises? How groundless then are all my fears and troubles? This, like a dose of opium, quiets, or rather stupifies the raging conscience; for, even an error in judgment, till it be detected and discovered to be so, quiets and comforts the heart as well as principles of truth; but whenever the fallacy shall be detected, whether here or hereafter, the anguish of conscience must be increased, or (which is worse) left desperate.

To prevent and cure this mistake and error in the soul, by which it is fitted and prepared to catch any erroneous principle (which is but plausible) for its present relief and ease, I shall desire my reader seriously to ponder and consider the following queries upon this case.

Query 1. Whether by the vote of the whole rational world, a good trouble be not better than a false peace? Present ease is desirable, but eternal safety is much more so; and if these two cannot consist under the present circumstances of the soul. Whether it be not better to endure for a time those painful pangs, than feel more acute and eternal ones, by quieting conscience with false remedies before the time?

It is bad to lie tossing a few days under a laborious fever; but far worse to have that fever turned into a lethargy, or fatal apoplexy. Erroneous principles may rid the soul of its present pain and eternal hopes and safety together. Acute pains are better than a senseless stupidity. Though the present rage of conscience be not a right and kindly conviction, yet it may lead to it, and terminate in faith and union with Christ at last, if Satan do not this way practice upon it, and quench it before its time.

Query 2. Bethink yourselves seriously, whether troubles so quieted and laid asleep, will not revive and turn again upon thee with a double force as soon as the virtue of the drug (I mean the erroneous principle) hath spent itself?

The efficacy of truth is eternal, and will maintain the peace it gives for ever; but all delusions must vanish, and the troubles which they dammed up for a time, break out with a greater force. Satan employs two sorts of witches, some to torment the bodies of men with grievous pain and anguish; but then he hath his white witches at hand to relieve and ease them. And have these poor wretches any great cause, think you, to boast of the cure, who are eased of their pains at the price of their souls?

Much like unto this, are the cures of inward troubles by erroneous principles. I lament the case of blinded Papists, who by pilgrimages and offerings to the shrines of titular saints, attempt the cure of a lesser sin by committing a greater¹; is it because there is not a God in Israel, who is able in due season to pacify conscience with proper and durable gospel-remedies, that we suffer our troubles thus to precipitate us into the snares of Satan, for the sake of present ease? [¹the sinner's prayer is presumption and highly provoking to God.]

Query 3. Read the scriptures, and enquire, Whether God's people, who have lain long under sharp inward terrors, have not at last found settlement and inward peace, by those very methods which the principles that quiet you do utterly exclude!

If you will fetch your peace from a groundless notion, that your sins were pardoned, and your persons justified from all eternity, and therefore you may apply boldly and confidently to yourselves the choicest promises and privileges in the gospel, without any regard to faith or repentance wrought by the Spirit in your souls. I am sure holy David took another course for the settlement of his conscience, Ps. 51:6, 7, 8, 9, 10. And it hath been the constant practice of the saints in all ages, to clear their title to the righteousness of Christ wrought without them, by the works of his Spirit wrought within them.

Secondly, Their other common artifice is, to insinuate their false doctrines among many acknowledged and precious truths, which only serve for a convenient vehicle to them; and besides that, to make their errors as palatable and gustful as they can to the vitiated appetite of corrupt nature. The fore-mentioned worthy hath judicially observed how artificially Satan hath blended his baneful doses, to please the palate of carnal reason, spiritual pride, and the desire of fleshly liberty.

Carnal reason is that great idol which the more intelligent part of the carnal world worships. And are not the Socinian heresies as pleasant to it, as a well mixed julep to a feverish stomach.

Spiritual pride is another Diana, which obtains greatly in the world; and no doctrine like the Pelagian, and Semipelagian errors to gratify it. A doctrine that sets fallen nature upon its legs again, and persuades it, it can go alone to Christ; at least, with a little external help of moral suasion, without any preventing or creating work in the soul. That goes down glib and gratefully.

[It is true, that our ability to stand is not from our own inherent grace; "For by his strength shall no man prevail," 1 Sam. 2:9. And yet it is as true, that without grace, both inherent in us, and excited and prepared for a storm, we cannot expect to stand; for these two, grace inherent in us, and grace exciting and assisting without are not opposed, but coordinated. Grace in us, is the weapon by which our enemy falls; but then that weapon must be managed by the hand of the Spirit. Well then, look upon this as a choice mercy, which tends so much to your stability. Flavel, p23 Vol.6]

Although God commands obedience - make you a clean heart, circumcise your hearts, believe the gospel, etc., yet this in no way proves that we have the ability to do so. It is the Spirit that must work it. See Deut. 10:16 compared with Deut 30:6. Augustine also explains in his own words:

CHAPTER 10.

FREE WILL AND GOD'S GRACE ARE SIMULTANEOUSLY COMMENDED

Augustine code264

When God says, “Turn to me, and I will turn to you,” Zech. 1:3 one of these clauses—that which invites our return to God—evidently belongs to our will; while the other, which promises His return to us, belongs to His grace. Here, possibly, the Pelagians think they have a justification for their opinion which they so prominently advance: that God’s grace is given according to our merits. In the East indeed, that is to say, in the province of Palestine in which the city of Jerusalem lies, Pelagius, when examined in person by the bishop, did not venture to affirm this. For it happened that among the objections which were brought up against him, this in particular was objected: he maintained that the grace of God was given according to our merits—an opinion which was so different from catholic doctrine, and so hostile to the grace of Christ, that unless he had anathematized it, as laid to his charge, he himself must have been anathematized on its account. He pronounced, indeed, the required anathema upon the dogma, but how insincerely his later books plainly show; for in them he maintains absolutely no other opinion than that the grace of God is given according to our merits. They collect such passages out of the Scriptures—like the one which I just now quoted, “Turn to me, and I will turn to you,”—as if it were owing to the merit of our turning to God, that His grace were given us — in which He Himself even turns to us. Now the persons who hold this opinion fail to observe that, unless our turning to God were itself God’s gift [that’s the key! my insert, see Phil. 2:13, 1:29, Jn 6:29], it would not be said to Him in prayer, “Turn us again, O God of hosts;” Ps. 80:3 and, “You, O God, will turn and quicken us;” Ps. 80:7 and again, “Turn us, O God of our salvation,” Ps. 85:4—with other passages of similar import, too numerous to mention here. For with respect to our coming to Christ, what else does it mean than our being turned to Him by believing? And yet He says: “No man can come to me, unless it was given to him by my Father.” John 6:65

G. Vos states in his Reformed Dogmatics, pg 635

e) Concerning the essence of this union (with Christ] in a positive sense, we can say that it is: skip to point 4.

4. A reciprocal unity. Establishing this unity is of course a work of Christ. Man does not take the initiative here by taking hold of Christ and drawing Him to himself or bringing himself to Him. The impossibility and inconceivability of that follows from what has already been said. How by any act from his side would man ever be able to make himself master of the Holy Spirit? It is entirely the reverse: Christ sends His Spirit, who, in the first grace that befalls man in the grace of regeneration, establishes the mystical bond. After this has happened and has also penetrated into the consciousness, one can certainly say that faith reaches out reciprocally to Christ, and the activity of faith and the nurturing of the spiritual life resident in union with Christ keep pace. But faith in itself, as subjective habit or subjective act, is not able to effect unity with Christ. It is one of the manifestations of the life of the Savior in us rather than the source of this life itself. When Scripture speaks of a union with Christ by faith, then this always applies to unity in the consciousness or the consciousness of unity: “so that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith” (Eph 3:17), where, however, precedes, “so that He might grant you though the riches of His glory to be strengthened with power by His Spirit in the inner man.” The Spirit’s activity, therefore, is antecedent, and only as a result of it does Christ dwell in the heart by faith. It is the drawing power of Christ Himself that in our faith draws us to His life. In this sense, then, Scripture clearly teaches that a reception of life from Christ by faith is possible for us— indeed, is necessary (John 6:47, 51). There is not merely a life of Christ in us but also a life of ours for God in union with Christ. According to Romans 7:4, the believer knows himself to be as closely united to the Mediator as husband to wife, and according to 2 Corinthians 11:2, the church is viewed as a bride presenting herself to her bridegroom, Christ. “The Spirit and the bride say, ‘Come!’ ” (Rev 22:17).

God's Immutability Proves Election

excerpts from John Flavel on God's Immutability

p 375 Vol. 3

Our God is the rock of ages; and yet one step higher, in Zech. vi. 1, his decrees and purposes are called mountains of brass, that is, most firm, durable, and unchangeable purposes. Thus the immutability of God is shadowed forth to us in scripture emblems.

2. The same also you will find in plain, positive scripture assertions; such as these that follow, Mai. iii. 6, "I am the Lord, I change not, therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed." And Job xxiii. 13. "He is in one mind, and who can turn him?" Men are in one mind today, and another to-morrow; the winds are not more variable than the minds of men; but God is in one mind, the purposes of his heart never change. Thou art the same or as some translate. Thou art thyself forever, Ps. 102:27. Thus when Moses desired to know his name, that he might tell Pharaoh from whom he came; the answer is, I AM hath sent me, Exod. iii. 14, not I was, or I will be, but I AM THAT I AM, noting the absolute unchangeableness of his nature.

3. Their hope of eternal life depends upon the unchangeableness of God that hath promised, Tit. 1:2 "In hope of eternal life, which God that cannot lie promised before the world began." Take away the immutability of God, and you at once darken and eclipse his glory, and overturn the perseverance, consolations, and hopes of all his people; but blessed be God, these things are built upon firm foundations.

1. His nature is unchangeable, "Thou art the same forever." Ps. 102:27. The heavens, though they be the purest, and therefore the most durable and unchangeable part of the creation, yet they shall perish and wax old, and be changed as a vesture; but our God is the same forever.

2. His power is unchangeable ; Isa. lix. 1. " The Lord's hand is not shortened." Time will enfeeble the strongest creature, and cut short the power of the hands of the mighty, they cannot do in their decrepit age as they were wont to do in their youthful and vigorous age ; but the Lord's hand never is, nor can be shortened.

3. The counsels and purposes of his heart are unchangeable, Ps. 33:11. "The counsel of the Lord standeth forever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations."

4. The goodness, truth, and mercy of God are unchangeable, Ps. 100:5. "The Lord is good, his mercy is everlasting, and his truth endureth to all generations."

5. The word of God is unchangeable. Though all flesh be as grass, and the goodness thereof as the flower of the field, yet the word of our God shall stand for ever ; all the promises contained therein are sure and stedfast. Not yea and nay, but yea and Amen forever, 2 Cor. 1:20.

6. The love of God is an unchangeable love, Jer. 31:3. "Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love."

7. In a word, all the gracious pardons of God are unchangeable; as they are full without exceptions, so they are final pardons without any revocation. "I will be merciful to their unrighteousness"

Thy God, and his love to his people, are the same forever. - Flavel

Subsequent conclusion regarding election God's Unchangeableness Proves Election

My comments: Now, since God is unchangeable and as He is eternal, so are all his attributes; then, regarding the church, his elect, he has always loved them with a special or electing love otherwise he would never had saved them. There was never a time when he did not love them nor was there ever a time when he was neutral towards them or hated them, for if he did and then decided to love them with a special, transcendent love, the John 3:15 so love, then that would argue mutability within the Godhead which is contrary to his nature (see red highlighted in 2nd paragraph, not I was, etc.) Therefore, election is the inevitable consequent of God's nature, his unchangeableness or immutability. His decree to choose the church flowed from His eternal love to them. And, God's electing love infallibly leads to actual election or choosing and is not dependent upon anything in the creature (Romans 9). He was not waiting to see what the creature would do; whether he would believe in Christ or not and then God would chose them if they did believe, for that would mean that God is dependent upon the creature, and that prior to this he was in a non-electing or neutral stance waiting for them to decide. Then upon their decision He would love them and elect them, predestine them, etc. But that whole scheme clearly infers mutability in God from neutrality or non-electing to an electing love and that God is not sovereign, that he is dependent upon the creature, which God being sovereign, is not dependent upon what the creature does. And God's eternal love for them and his unchangeableness obviates that scheme completely not to mention the creature cannot, nor will not elect himself due to his spiritual bondage. God has always loved them with this electing love, since God is eternal, and hence chose them and effected their conversion (in time), they being wholly passive¹ (see John 1:13, etc.). To say that election is not true is to deny God, his eternal being and nature, his immutability or unchangeableness, and ascribe man to be a god thus robbing him of the glory of his sovereignty and free grace. And one reason why people hold to the erroneous view is because they do not examine things further to see its absurd consequents.

¹In the first sense, as to the real communicating of the Spirit of grace unto the soul, so raising it from death unto life, the saints have no kind of communion with Christ therein but only what consists in a passive reception of that life-giving, quickening Spirit and power. They are but as the dead bones in the prophet; the wind blows on them, and they live; — as Lazarus in the grave; Christ calls, and they come forth, the call being accompanied with life and power — John Owen, Communion w/God p 311

Objection & Answer: But God's desires to save everyone (a misinterpretation of 2Pet3:9) so he hasn't purposed it in his heart to save them until the creature accepts or believes. Upon their believing, God then purposes to actually save them. Ans.: But this directly infers a change of purpose in the Godhead from a neutral or "wishing to save" disposition to a purpose and intention to actually save them as well as making God dependent upon the creature which He is not. This change in purpose cannot be in God who is unchangeable and eternal in all his purposes and will. Therefore because the purposes of God are eternal and unchangeable and because it is not up to the creature to effect his conversion due to his bondage to sin, etc., it is all up to God, hence God must elect if they are ever to be saved.

So, one minute he has no intention to actually save them because all is hinged upon the decision of the creature and then he purposes it, upon the creatures' believing. But he either has an eternal purpose to actually save or he does not, since God is immutable and eternal. He cannot have no desire to actually save them, just wishing for them to be saved, and then have a purpose to actually save them, all this depending upon the creature's decision that moves God to save or not save; yet, all this argues a change in God's purpose or will, contrary to Job 23:13, "He is in one mind, and who can turn him?" ("The counsels and purposes of his heart are unchangeable" - Flavel, point 3 above.) Ps. 33:11, "The counsel of the Lord standeth forever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations." And, again, from point 2 above by Flavel, "the answer is, I AM hath sent me, Exod. iii. 14, not I was, or I will be, but I AM THAT I AM, noting the absolute unchangeableness of his nature."

Objection: God commands all to believe or all to circumcise their heart which must mean that man has it in himself the ability to do so.

Answer. No, he does not have this ability from within himself to do so. For though God commands all to believe, does not necessarily mean that man has this virtue or ability to obey God from his own recourses or strength (see Romans 8:7-8, John 6:44, 65, Heb. 11:6). By the analogy of faith, looking to many other related passages, this issue is cleared; man is dead in sin and cannot obey this command to believe unless he is enabled so by God's grace; and it is God's manner of speaking in scripture to command man to do something of this nature and then later say that He will do it. (Deut 10:16 compared with Deut. 30:6, Ezek. 36:24-27, Jer. 32:40, 31:18, restore me, and I will return)

Therefore, God's eternal purposes, being that they are eternal, have never changed or been modified. So that those who have been saved, were always going to be saved by the eternal will of God; God was never dependent upon the creature, the creature's will, him being dead and his will wholly corrupted, but the creature is wholly dependent upon God's will, his good pleasure.

If God loved someone enough to save them, a special or transcendent love to show them favor over others (compared to a creaturely or common affection of love), then he always loved them in that manner and always will, with this special love or saving love, because he is, first, sovereign, second, unchangeable, and third, eternal, hence the eternal purpose of God in election. Election flows from or is the fruit of this eternal love that God has for his church, the elect; the others he passes over due to his eternal dereliction of them.

Eph 1:3-12

Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has blessed us with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places in Christ, ⁴ just as He chose us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love, ⁵ having predestined us to adoption as sons by Jesus Christ to Himself, according to the good pleasure of His will, ⁶ to the praise of the glory of His grace, by which He ^[a]made us accepted in the Beloved. ⁷ In Him we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace ⁸ which He made to abound toward us in all wisdom and ^[b]prudence, ⁹ having made known to us the mystery of His will, according to His good pleasure which He purposed in Himself, ¹⁰ that in the dispensation of the fullness of the times He might gather together in one all things in Christ, ^[c]both which are in heaven and which are on earth—in Him. ¹¹ In Him also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestined according to the purpose of Him who works all things according to the counsel of His will, ¹² that we who first trusted in Christ should be to the praise of His glory.

Romans 8:29

took infinite delight and pleasure in them; and this is the foundation of their predestination and election, of their conformity to Christ, of their calling, justification, and glorification."

Ezek. 36:24-27

Jer. 32:40

⁴⁰And I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from doing them good; but I will put My fear in their hearts so that they will not depart from Me.

more notes on God's love and eternal purpose

p 393-4 Flavel vol 3

1. And first, you will find it an ancient love whose spring is in eternity itself Believer, God is thine ancient friend, who foresaw and loved thee before thou wast, yea, before this world was in being; the fruits and effects thereof thou gatherest in time, but the root that produces them was before all time, Prov. 8:22, 23. "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old. I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was." Thus was the love of God contriving, and providing the best of mercies in Christ for us; while, as yet, there were no such creatures in the world, nor a world prepared to receive us.

2. The love of God to his people is a free, and altogether undeserved love. It must needs be so, seeing it preceded our very being; which had it not done, yet no motives had been found in us to allure it to us more than others, Deut. 7:7. "The Lord did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people (for ye were the fewest of all people) but because the Lord loved you." So that we cannot find one stone of our merit in the foundation of this love; for those whom it embraces in its arms are immerentes, & male meientes, ill-deserving, as well as undeserving. We were loved of God before we were lovely in ourselves; it was freely pitched upon us, not purchased by us, Isa. 43:24. [that is, we did not ask for it nor could we; nothing outside himself moved him love us, hence free from all outside influences.]

4. The love of God to believers is a distinguishing love; not the portion of all, no, nor yet of many besides thee, 1Cor. i. 26. The generality of the world dwell in the room of common providence, not in the chamber of special love, into which God hath admitted thee; this consideration should make thee break out in admiration, as it is, John xix. 22, "Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself to me, and not to the world?"

5. The love of God to believers is a love transcendent to all creature-love; it moves in an higher sphere than the love of any creature doth, Rom. v. 6, 7, 8. We read of Jacob's love to Rachel, which is so celebrated in the sacred story for the fervor of it; and yet all that it enabled him to suffer was but the summer's heat and the winter's cold; a trifle to what the love of Christ engaged, and enabled him to suffer for thy sake. We read also of the love of David to Absalom, which made him wish. Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son! This love was only manifested in a wish, which, haply might have been retracted too, had there been an exchange to be made indeed; but the life of Christ, worth millions of his life, was actually and willingly staked down for thy soul. We read of the love of one disciple manifested to another disciple in a cup of cold water; but Christ hath manifested his love to thee in pouring out his warmest heart-blood for thy redemption. O what a transcendent love is the Divine love!

6. To conclude, (though alas, little is said of the love of God) it is an everlasting and unchangeable love. Hills and mountains shall sooner start from their basis, than his loving-kindness depart from his people, Isa. 54:10. Though he afflict us, still he loves us, Ps. 89:32, 83. Nay, though we grieve him, yet still he loves us, Mark 16:7, Tell the disciples, and tell Peter. Peter had grieved Christ, denied Christ, yet will he not renounce nor cast off Peter. end of Flavel quote

Summary of the reasonableness of this doctrine; my comments:

I think that most will concede that whatever happens on this earth is because God willed it, from the eternal counsel of his will..."according to the purpose of Him who works all things according to the counsel of His will," Eph. 1:11

Nothing happens on this earth unless it is God's will; not the creature's will, which would make God dependent upon the creature, which makes no sense. God is sovereign; nothing outside himself moves him to do anything. So if someone gets saved it was by the will of God, John 1:13. And if it was by the will of God they got saved and that God is unchangeable, then it has always been God's will that that person should get saved. There never was a time in eternity that God did not will him to get saved. The only logical conclusion is that election flows from God's unchangeableness. It is the logical consequence.

If God loves you with a transcendent, special, saving love, which is the ground of him saving you from your sin¹, then he has always loved you; there was never a time when he did not love you in this way. For if there was, then he would have had a change of heart, which argues mutability. But God is immutable! He is unchangeable in his nature and hence his eternal purpose (Eph. 3:11 & Job 23:13 above, Isa. 46:10, etc.) and all his decrees are thus unalterable and are not dependent upon the creature at all. Therefore, if he loved you with this everlasting love, even before the foundation of the world (because he is eternal), then the consequent is clear; it follows that he would elect you and predestine you to eternal life and effect it as time unfolds.

If God saved you, then he had the intention and purpose to save you; and that from eternity because God is eternal and unchangeable; the council of the Lord stands forever, (Ps. 33:11) Hence, He has always wanted to save you (this is beyond our understanding to conceive), because he has loved us with an everlasting love Jn3:16, So loved (also 1Jn3:1); His love for us and hence his purpose and design to save us, had its origin in eternity past before you existed (Eph. 1) before you had done anything good or bad (Rms 9), hence election has to be. There is no other reasonable explanation; we can't elect ourselves, although many try. It is the fruit of God's sovereignty and unchangeable nature.

The LORD has appeared [a]of old to me, saying:
 "Yes, I have loved you with an everlasting love;
 Therefore with lovingkindness I have drawn you. Jer. 31:3

When did God get the intention to save you? Was he waiting for you to ask him? For that would infer mutability in the Godhead if his intention to save you depended upon what you do or pray. One minute he's neutral; the next minute he has intention to save you. Because he is immutable and all his purposes unchangeable, he has always wanted and intended to save you, the elect, before you had a being (Rom. 9) and that at an appointed time and not at a time of your choosing! Therefore, the nature of God necessitates election; it can't be otherwise.

Notes on immutability vs Arminianism, etc., by Hermon Bavinck

This immutability of God, however, was frequently combated from the side of both Deism and pantheism. In the opinion of Epicurus the gods totally resemble excellent human beings, who make changes with respect to location, activity, and thought (etc.); and according to Heraclitus and later the Stoics, the deity as the immanent cause of the world was also caught up in its perpetual flux.[25] Opposition to God's immutability in Christian theology was of the same nature. On the one hand, there is the Pelagianism, Socinianism, Remonstrantism, and rationalism, which especially opposes the immutability of God's knowing and willing and makes the will of God dependent on—and hence change in accordance with—the conduct of humans. Especially Vorstius, in his work On God and His Attributes, criticized the immutability of God. He made a distinction between God's essence, which is simple and unchangeable, and God's will, which being free does not will everything eternally and does not always will the same thing.[26] Bavinck, God & Creation, Vol. 2 pg 155

Speaking of common grace (God rains on the just and the unjust) vs. special or saving grace (faith) reserved only for the elect.

Yet we must not— for the sake of the kinship and connection between them— overlook the essential difference. This is the special grace that was unknown to the pagans. All pagan religions are self-willed and legalistic. They are all the aftereffects and adulterations of the covenant of works. Human beings here consistently try to bring about their own salvation by purifications, asceticism, penance, sacrifice, law observance, ceremony, and so on. COUNSEL II

Touch not with idolatry and superstition; under what name or notion soever it he presented to you.

1John 5:21, "Little children, keep yourselves from idols." Here you had need be exceeding cautious, and circumspect¹ [¹When a man watches against being deceived, he does it with human infirmities, when he even actually watches and apprehends he hath done it to purpose, yet such an one is often ensnared.]

(1.) Because it is a creeping thing which works in itself by plausible pretences and insinuations, 2 Pet. ii. 1. Eph. iv. 14. Col. ii. 23. In which respect [mystery] is written in the whore's forehead. Rev. 17:5. For as Dr. Usher well observes, 'The Roman apostasy' stole into the church disguised, and by degrees.' It is a mystery of iniquity (saith the apostle) and a working mystery, 2Thes. ii. 7. Iniquitas, sed mystica, pietatis, et fidelitatis nomine palliata; i.e., iniquity, but a mystical iniquity, because palliated and cloaked under the name and pretence of piety and fidelity. Idolatrous practices have a show of wisdom, Col. ii. 23, (i.e., saith Davenant on the place) 'They are more modest than to pretend an immediate revelation of the Spirit;' Yet lest their placets and inventions should want [lack] a pretext of Divine wisdom, they are wont to say, that their doctrines and traditions are not indeed consigned to writing by the apostles, but delivered by lively voice, according to that. We speak wisdom among them that are perfect. And by the name of this wisdom, everyone calls his own fictions. Saith Irenaeus, lib. 3. cap. 3. 'Thus sometimes under the pretext of wisdom, order, decency, apostolical traditions, antiquity, the power of the church,' etc., it steals upon men insensibly¹ [¹It gradually began to be had in esteem by long use, and the tacit approbation of the learned, increasing in esteem insensibly.], especially being so advantaged by the proneness of corrupt nature to it.' To this purpose it is observable, that Babylon, the mother of harlots, is said, Rev xvii. 4, to give the wine of her fornication in a golden cup. Wine in itself is temptingly pleasant, but more so when presented in a golden cup; the brims whereof are sugared and sweetened to make it the more grateful. Therefore, little children, I mean you simple, plain, credulous souls, apt to be taken with fine glittering things, look to yourselves; [And so the sinner's prayer sounds sooo good, doesn't it! But, Oh! what a wicked presumption; another deceiving ordinance that carnal minds have concocted to suit their carnal and fleshly ends of self-love and preservation. Search the scriptures yourself and see if anyone recommended this way to Christ. Why didn't Jesus inform Nicodemus this way? Or the Pharisees when Jesus spoke to them? Or how about the crowds that swarmed about Jesus; how come he didn't tell them? But His response was seen in John 3:8, John 1:13, John 6:44 & 65, etc.]

(2.) Because nothing more provokes and inflames the fiery wrath of the Lord, who is a jealous God, than this does ; it makes his anger come up in his face, as that expression is, Ezek. 38:18, and kindles consuming wrath, Ezek. 43:7, 8, 9. Upon this account the blessed God complains, after the manner of men, as if his heart were broken, Ezek. vi. 9, "I am [broken] with their whorish heart, and with their [eyes] which go a whoring after their idols." If it be but an unchaste glance upon an idol, it goes to the very heart of God. When he seeth his people yielding to the temptations of it, he shrieks, as it were, and cries out. Oh! do not this abominable thing' that I hate. Oh! if there be in you the hearts of children, do not that which does, as it were, break the heart of your father.

Question. But what mean you by idolatry and superstition? We hope there are no such things practiced among us; Pagans and Papists may be guilty of it?

Sol. Give me leave here to open these things unto you, and then, perhaps, you may see them nearer to you than you are aware of; and that this caution is a word in season.

Idolatry then, according to the true and generally received definition of it, is a religious worship, given either to that which is not the true God, or to the true God himself, but otherwise than he hath prescribed in his word. From hence we plainly see that worship may be idolatrous two ways; (1.) In respect of the object; if it have anything besides the true God for its object, it is gross idolatry; such as the first commandment condemns. Pagan idolatry, which the light of the gospel hath long since profligated and expelled out of these parts of the world. Or, (2.) In respect of the manner, when we worship the true God, but in a way and manner which he hath not prescribed in his word, but is invented and devised by ourselves; and this is condemned as idolatry in the second commandment ; Thou shalt not [make to thyself,] i.e., out of thine own brain, or of thine own head, any [graven image;] under which title all human inventions, corrupting the pure and simple worship of God, are prohibited as idolatrous; for images are here, by a synecdoche², put for all false ways of worshipping God, as the best expositors tell us. This inventing or making to ourselves, is that which makes it idolatry, Amos 5:26. Num. 15:39 Hence the molten calf became an idol to the Israelites, not because it was the object of their worship ; for it is plain, it was Jehovah, the true God, they intended to worship by it; appears from Exod. xxxii. 4, 5. "Tomorrow is a feast to the Lord." And, as Dr. Willet observes, it had been impossible, that so good a man as Aaron, would have yielded to them, if they had intended to worship it as a god. But yet it being a way or manner of worshipping the true God, which was of their own devising, it became idolatry. And this worship of God, in ways of our own invention becomes idolatrous upon a double ground: (1.) As it is will worship; i.e., such worship as hath no other ground or warrant but the will of man,¹

¹(It is true) that God loves indeed a willing worshipper, that is, one who cheerfully and willingly does whatever God has commanded him to do; but it is as true on the other hand, that he hates will-worship, that is, those services that are performed to him for immediate worship, when as they were not prescribed and commanded by him for that end; because this, as it is expressed Ps. 106:39, "is to go a whoring with their own inventions." Davenant on the place.

²*Side note on synecdoche: For I determined not to know anything among you except Jesus Christ and Him crucified.* 1 Corinthians 2:2. Paul's words to know anything among you except Jesus Christ crucified is a synecdoche, a part substituted for the whole; in other words, Paul views everything through gospel-colored glasses; all our thoughts and acts should find their proper meaning as they relate to God's ultimate end in the earth, his self-glorification. Otherwise, everything is relative, subject to our opinion, emotions, traditions, etc.

Col. ii. 23, and so dethrones God, by setting up the will of the creature above his, and bestowing the peculiar honour, and incommunicable sovereignty and glory of the blessed God upon the creatures; for the absolute sovereignty of God, which is his glory, 1 Tim. vi. 15, is manifested in two things especially; in his decrees, Rom. ix. 20, and in his laws, Isa. 33:22, James iv. 12. The Lord is our King, and Lawgiver; and there is one Lawgiver. Now, by prescribing anything by our own authority in the worship of God, the commands of God are made void, Mat. xv. 6, his royal law is slighted, the throne of God invaded by the creatures, who will be a lawgiver too, which can no more be borne, than the heavens can bear two suns; and God is hereby forgotten, as Hos. viii. 14. "Israel hath forgotten his Maker, and builded temples;" i.e., by building [temples] when God had appointed but one temple. This is, as Melanthon [1500s - Luther's compatriot] observes, Cum Deo certare, aliud instituendo: To strive with God, by instituting something of our own. And Chrysostom notes, Hom. ii. in Rom - That it is a greater sin, in God's worship, to do what we should not, than to omit what we should. For (saith he) by the one we show the difficulty of the law; but by the other, we charge the law and lawgiver with folly; make ourselves wiser than God; in the one we show our weakness, in not doing the will of God; but in the other our impudence to control of the wisdom of God. And it is, as Lactantius phrases it, lib. 3. cap. 13, Summam arrogantiam, sibi vindicare quod humana condito non recipit. The highest arrogance, to challenge that to ourselves, which the condition of a creature is not capable of. [for the sinner's prayer is founded upon natural principles of which the devils are capable; an unregenerate person is in no way capable of any things spiritual or pleasing to God, Rom 8:7-8. What is highly provoking to God is that the creature in this condition only wants what God has; not God! Flavel explains this here.] And upon this account it is, that the indignation and wrath of God smoke so dreadfully against such usurpers, as in the sad story of Nadab and Abihu, you see, because God is a jealous God; and jealousy is the rage of a man. Zelotes est, nolens habere consortium in amando, can endure no rival. This God looks upon as the greatest and most daring wickedness that a creature can lightly commit, Hos. ix. 15. All their wickedness is in Gilgal; i.e., the height of their wickedness is there, because there they worshipped him according to their own devices which was such an affront to the wisdom and sovereignty of God, that he could by no means bear it. This is called, a setting our threshold besides the Lord's threshold, Ezek. 43:8. and the nearer this comes to him, the more it provokes him. Therefore it is said in the same text, "There was a wall betwixt me and them;" i.e., either it caused a wall of separation betwixt me and them, as it is generally expounded; or else it notes, how God is provoked, by bringing their own inventions so near him. For in the Hebrew it is, "There was but a wall betwixt me and them." And hence it is evident that doctrinal, symbolical ceremonies, I mean such rites and ceremonies as are brought into the worship of God, with a spiritual signification, merely upon the authority of man, are idolatrous mixtures and additions, and such by which the Lord is dreadfully provoked. It is true, men pretend order and decency, and the power of the church in such cases : but, as learned Amesius well notes, "Those things which pertain to order and decency, are not so left to the will of man, that they may, under that name, obtrude what they please upon the churches." All the liberty that scripture, 1 Cor. xv. 46, gives us, is but this, to observe and perform those things which God hath instituted, in an orderly and comely manner; and not to innovate new things, what, and as many as we please. And then, (2.) It becomes idolatrous upon this ground also, because this daring impudence of men, in worshipping God in their own way, argues gross and carnal notions and conceptions of God. When we devise a carnal, pompous way of worship for him, it is an argument we have set up an idol god first in our imaginations, one like ourselves [See Ps. 50:21, you thought I was altogether like you], and utterly unlike the true God ; who is a most simple, pure, spiritual Being; and, as such, will be worshipped, John iv. 24. But by devising such a fleshly way of worship, I say it is manifest, we have fancied to ourselves another god, altogether different from that God revealed to us in the word. Hence it was that Joshua told the people, Josh. xxiv. 19. "Ye cannot serve the Lord, for he is a jealous God, and will not forgive your sins." that is, you cannot serve the true God, till you have gotten right apprehensions of him. You fancy to yourselves a God made up of all mercy, as if he had no justice nor righteousness to call you to an account for your sins; and so do but worship an idol, formed in your own imagination, instead of the true God. And if the thing he duly weighed, it will appear as well idolatry to submit to, and acknowledge the sovereign authority of a creature, in appointing laws for worship, or falling down before an imaginary god, or idol, formed in our own fantasy, as to bow to, and worship a graven image, or the stock of a tree.

Now, hence you may come to see at once, both the nature of this second sort of idolatry, and also the rise and original of it; which is nothing else but the proud and carnal heart of man, which not willing to contain itself within the limits of the word, wherein a plain, simple, and spiritual way of worship is ruled out, invents to itself new rites, ceremonies, and ways of worshipping God, more suitable and pleasing to the flesh. And hence it is, that idolatry is in scripture reckoned a work of the flesh. Gal. v. 20, because man naturally having a proud heart, and a working imagination, which depending upon sense, and not elevated and rectified by faith, first forms to itself carnal conceptions and notions of God; and then deviseth a way of worship suitable to those notions of him. So that as one well observes, "This is the fountain and principle of all error, that men think that those which please them, must needs please God; and what displeases them must also displease him." So that this brat, idolatry, is begotten betwixt a proud, carnal heart and the devil; who, since he cannot draw men to the former sort of idolatry, endeavours all he can to entangle and defile them with this, and that partly out of malice to God, knowing what a dear thing his worship is to him, and partly out of a design of ruining such as he can entice to it. For he knows their sorrows shall be multiplied Ps. xvi. 4, and God seldom lets it escape without some remarkable stroke.

Upon the whole then, you plainly see, worship may be right as to its object, and yet idolatrous in respect of the manner [self-love and will-worship]; because the assuming of a despotal power in this case, is not only a slighting of that royal law, but as high a piece of treason against Jesus Christ, as can lightly be committed by a creature. [in that the sinner only wants what God has, as I said earlier, and does not want God nor desire holiness because he is still in an unregenerate condition!] I will shut up this with two worthy and full testimonies to the truth of the point in hand. The first is Melancthon in loc Com. de ceremon humanis. His words are these, and they are grave and weighty. Accedit et hoc, quod ejnscopti arrogant sihi potestatem condendi traditiones, quam tamen non concedit els evangelium, etc., non est leve crimen tentare Deum est enim non infirmitate labi, sed contemptu Dei, proposito ipsius verbo, quasi cum eo certare, aliud in stituendo, oculi, et illius sapiential nostram antefirre. 'The bishops arrogate to themselves a power of making traditions, which the gospel hath not given them. It is no small crime to tempt God, for this is not to slide by infirmity, but by contempt of God, his word being set before them, as it were to contend with it, by instituting another thing, and overcome it. This is to prefer our wisdom to his.' And a little after (having given some instances of it,) he proceeds thus: Tales fuerunt et sunt fontes cultus idolorum, Hec sunt arcana mala, quae politica sapientia non potest iudicare, sed nos in ecclesia, ea considerare debemus; ut moniti, subjiciamus nos verbo Dei, ne nostris opinionibus regi velimus. 'Such have been, and are the fountain of the worship of idols. These are secret evils, which political wisdom cannot judge. But we in the church ought to consider these things, that being warned, we may submit ourselves to the word of God, and not be willing to be ruled by our own opinions,' etc.

To this I shall add the most worthy testimony of the right honorable Lord Brook:

'A bishop's wearing a surplice, cope, mitre, using the cross, bowing to the altar, etc., (although they may be errors) yet all, or one of these make him not a Pope, or popeling, or properly antichristian; but receiving these from the Pope's dictates, doing them, because he commands acknowledging him in commanding them, pressing them on others with such a despotical power, makes a true Pope, a real Antichrist! Nor may our bishops evade by this, which I easily see will be answered, that though Indeed they do, and command these things, yet they neither do them from the Pope's command, nor command them in the Pope's power.

Though I should grant this, which yet many wise men will not grant (for our bishop's first power came from the Pope; and of late also we have found letters, advice, commands, dictates from the Pope to some of our bishops, and that in matters of greatest consequence, both for the church and state.) But grant all this they say, yet they may be Antichristian, and so such (in re) as the Pope is; though not literally Romanists, except they do or command in the power of Rome. This I shall be bold to affirm and maintain, till I see better reason that he (whoever he be) that commands the least tittle of doctrine or discipline, merely ex imperio voluntatis, in his own power and authority, without license or warrant from scripture, or right reason, (where the scripture hath been silent) though the thing he so commandeth, should happen to be good in itself, yet he, in his so commanding, is not only tyrannical, but antichristian, properly antichristian, encroaching on the royal office of Christ; which is truly high-treason against God, and most properly antichristianism.'

By all which, you see where the idolatry of worship lies. The instituting of any, though the smallest part of worship, in and by our own authority, without scripture-warrant, makes it idolatrous, as well as if we worshipped an idol. And hence it is, that God gives his people the same call from this latter sort of Romish idolatry; See Rev. xviii. 4. as he doth from the more gross pagan idolatry, 2 Cor. vi. 17. So that if that worship you perform to God, be corrupted by a mixture of mere human, doctrinal, symbolical, rites and ceremonies, which God hath not appointed in his worship by the word; though your worship be right for the object, yet it is idolatrous in the manner. Here you had need to be advised, and careful, for you are upon a ticklish point.

And for superstition, that is nothing else, but an excess in religion, For the better understanding whereof, consider three things,

1. That all, and every part of God's instituted worship, depends entirely upon his own sovereign will and pleasure. So that no man can appoint any part of it, but God alone, forasmuch as no man knows what will be acceptable to God, but God himself; that which is highly esteemed among men [especially unregenerate men], is an abomination to God. Besides, none can give efficacy to a creature, as bread, wine, water, or raise them up to such high supernatural ends and uses, but God.

2. The will of God, which is the foundation and rule of his worship, is only revealed to us in the scriptures; whence it is manifest, that in worship all men are bound to keep close to the word; and besides the reason that is in the thing itself, the command is express, Exod. 23:13. Deut. 4:2. Gal. 4:10. [πω χανοντ τουτω} according to this canon, or rule. This is true canonical obedience. So Rom. xii. 7. [λογιχη λατσεια] is properly word-service; i.e., such as the word prescribes.

3. Hence then you may see the door at which superstition enters, even addition of new and uncommanded things. When we invent new rites and ceremonies, and bring them into the worship of God, with a spiritual signification and use, this is superstition; being (supra statutum) something above and beyond what God appoints and requires. And as all the water in the Tyber cannot wash the Papists from the filth of their idolatry and superstition, in their mass, altars, surplice, cross, etc. So neither can anything besides the blood of Jesus, cleanse us from the same, if we do like them.

Having thus opened the nature of idolatry and superstition to you. I shall reinforce that apostolical caution upon you; "Little children, keep yourselves from idols;" I beseech you, get senses exercised, Heb. v. 14. and suffer not yourselves to be abused by an easy credulity; "the simple believeth every word," Prov. 14:15. There is no idolatry or superstition in Rome so gross, but is glossed over with plausible pretences, and many subtle distinctions invented to defend it. But take not you anything upon trust in God's worship; be like those well-bred Bereans, Acts xvii. 11, examine the grounds of your practice. It was a good saying of Sir Thomas More, 'I will pin my faith (saith he) upon no man's sleeve, because I know not whether he will carry it.' See that you be provided with an answer, if God should speak to you, when you are at your divine service, as he did to Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 9, when he was hid in the cave at Horeb, "What dost thou here, Elijah?" Or as to the Jews, Isa. 1:12. "Who hath required this at your hands?" See that you be able by the word, to justify your practice. And as you love your souls, defile them not with idolatry and superstition. And the rather,

Arg. 1. Because, should you be found in a false way of worship, you betray a special trust committed to you by the Lord.

Christians, unto you hath the Lord committed his precious gospel truths and appointments, as precious treasure to defend and keep for him. Rev. iii. 10. Jude 8. Phil. i. 7, 17, and one special means of its preservation, is by witnessing against all those errors and innovations, that corrupt and endanger it. O see that none of Christ's jewels be embezzled, if you can help it. You yourselves have committed a trust to Jesus Christ, 2 Tim. i. 12, and expect he should be faithful in what you have committed to him and lie expects the same from you. O consider what precious things the pure institutions of Christ are: All the good in this world cannot compensate the loss of one of them, "Let heaven rush (said Luther) rather than one crumb of truth should perish." O what hard things have the saints in all generations suffered, to preserve and transmit it to us. And shall we now betray it? Would not the generations to come curse us, and abhor our remembrance? And then to speak nothing of any solemn bond or engagement under which you have put your souls to the contrary.

Arg. 2. Shall we not hereby oppose and cross the great design which God is carrying on in the world, by his present providences? O it will be sad to be found opposing God's design. Now what is that but, by shaking heaven and earth, to remove the things that are [made] namely, by man invented in his worship, Heb. xii. 27 To pluck up by the roots, every plant; (i.e.,) ceremony and tradition, not of his planting, Matt. xv. 13. Are not all these things appointed to perdition? Col. ii. 22, and darest thou then by thy presence, or pleading for them, go about to support and establish them, and so strive against God! O consider it seriously, Arg. 3. Is it not dangerous to be found amongst idolaters? Doth not judgment sometimes sweep away the whole community and neighborhood, of such sinners? Read 1 Sam. vi. 19, 20. 1 Chron. XV. 13. And hath not God given you timely warning of the danger before it come? Rev. xviii. 4. And is it not more than ordinary dangerous, to be found among them now, when God is preparing his troops to invade Babylon; I mean ready to pour forth the vials of his wrath upon her?

Arg. 4. And may not your example have a mischievous influence upon others? May it not harden sinners in their ways? And even compel and draw away the weak Christian? Gal. ii. 13, 14. and so draw the guilt of their sins upon thine own soul? And what a dreadful thing is that; 'actors and consenters are alike guilty and punishable;' O you have too much personal guilt of your own; add not the guilt of others sins to it. Nay, by this means thou mayest be sinning in another, when thou liest in the dust.

Lastly, consider how careful God hath always been to keep his people off at the greatest distance from idolatry. Compare these scriptures, 2 Kings xvii. 15, Ezek. xliv. 20, Numb, xxxii. 38, 1 Thess. V. 22. Heb. iv. 1. O let these arguments be impartially weighed, and let not any low fleshly interest be set up to oppose them.

G. Vos states in his Reformed Dogmatics, pg 635

e) Concerning the essence of this union (with Christ] in a positive sense, we can say that it is: skip to point 4.

4. A reciprocal unity. Establishing this unity is of course a work of Christ. Man does not take the initiative here by taking hold of Christ and drawing Him to himself or bringing himself to Him. The impossibility and inconceivability of that follows from what has already been said. How by any act from his side would man ever be able to make himself master of the Holy Spirit? It is entirely the reverse: Christ sends His Spirit, who, in the first grace that befalls man in the grace of regeneration, establishes the mystical bond. After this has happened and has also penetrated into the consciousness, one can certainly say that faith reaches out reciprocally to Christ, and the activity of faith and the nurturing of the spiritual life resident in union with Christ keep pace. But faith in itself, as subjective habit or subjective act, is not able to effect unity with Christ. It is one of the manifestations of the life of the Savior in us rather than the source of this life itself. When Scripture speaks of a union with Christ by faith, then this always applies to unity in the consciousness or the consciousness of unity: “so that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith” (Eph 3:17), where, however, precedes, “so that He might grant you though the riches of His glory to be strengthened with power by His Spirit in the inner man.” The Spirit’s activity, therefore, is antecedent, and only as a result of it does Christ dwell in the heart by faith. It is the drawing power of Christ Himself that in our faith draws us to His life. In this sense, then, Scripture clearly teaches that a reception of life from Christ by faith is possible for us— indeed, is necessary (John 6:47, 51). There is not merely a life of Christ in us but also a life of ours for God in union with Christ. According to Romans 7:4, the believer knows himself to be as closely united to the Mediator as husband to wife, and according to 2 Corinthians 11:2, the church is viewed as a bride presenting herself to her bridegroom, Christ. “The Spirit and the bride say, ‘Come!’ ” (Rev 22:17).

Notes on Conversion and the Effectual Call

Believing is the Gift of God
 God's Sovereignty over the Wills of Men
My comments in blue

The commands in the covenant of works, the Old Covenant, are the promises in the New Covenant. The command of God to man was always to love God with all your hearts, etc., and to obey the gospel...to believe in the Promise, the Messiah, Jesus Christ for the remission of sins and for everlasting life. But man in his unregenerate condition cannot and will not do this, Rom. 8:7-8, "For to be ^[b]carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. ⁷ Because the ^[c]carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, nor indeed can be. ⁸ So then, those who are in the flesh cannot please God." So, the very act of believing on Christ is promised in the New Covenant for those for whom Christ died, the elect, Phil. 1:19, "For to you it has been granted on behalf of Christ, not only to believe in Him, but also to suffer for His sake,".

Your ability and desire to believe on Christ, your receiving of him and that being irresistible, is the very thing that is given to you, through the instrument of faith, the chief of graces, that which God bestows, that infallibly leads to one believing; faith being the gift of God, "For by grace you have been saved through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God, ⁹ not of works, lest anyone should boast."

So the choice is infallibly consequent in conversion; it is not as though a person could choose Satan over Christ in this saving act of the Holy Spirit as he moves upon the soul. For that would speak contrary to many passages that say in short, that conversion includes a love for God, hatred for sin and Satan (Gen 3:15), along with compunction for sin and repentance.

Conversion is not just providing a choice to the sinner as to whether he will or will not believe on Christ on account of outward persuasions and that his choosing is from his own strength and wit, that the choice is left up to him as to whether he chooses Christ or not. It is God who determines the outcome infallibly every time; it is not left up to the person to choose Satan in a genuine conversion. He will believe, i.e., come to Christ, willingly and gladly, answering to Ps 110:3, "Your people shall be volunteers [or willing] In the day of Your power;"

God commands one to believe or obey God; but this does not mean that man has it in his power to obey, to make the choice to believe or not. Conversion must be an operation of the Spirit of God (John 3:8). Compare Deut. 10:16 with Deut. 30:6

Deut. 10:12-16, "And now, Israel, what does the LORD your God require of you, but to fear the LORD your God, to walk in all His ways and to love Him, to serve the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul, ¹³ and to keep the commandments of the LORD and His statutes which I command you today for your ^[f]good? ¹⁴ Indeed heaven and the highest heavens belong to the LORD your God, also the earth with all that is in it. ¹⁵ The LORD delighted only in your fathers, to love them; and He chose their ^[g]descendants after them, you above all peoples, as it is this day. ¹⁶ Therefore circumcise the foreskin of your heart, and be stiff-necked no longer."

- then vs. 30:6

Deut. 30:6, "And the LORD your God will circumcise your heart and the heart of your descendants, to love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul, that you may live." There is God determining the matter; they will love God! not choose Satan, sin, etc.

God commands it; God then actually makes it happen by his almighty power that works in us to will and to do...Phil 2:13, John 6:29, Heb. 2:13, etc. – Concurrence. Code225a

§ 64. In efficacious grace we are not merely passive, nor yet does God do some, and we do the rest. But God does all, and we do all. God produces all, and we act all. For that is what he produces, viz. our own acts. God is the only proper author and fountain; we only are the proper actors. We are, in different respects, wholly passive and wholly active. - Jonathan Edwards (also see pg 431,2, 1175, etc)

God's circumcising their heart is the cause; the effect is that they will believe, love God, etc., not maybe if they decide to or not. And this all happens without their will being forced. Why? Because God took out the stony (unbelieving, hard, obstinate) heart, and gave them a new spirit and a new heart, and thus caused them to love and fear him. This is why they all come willingly with delight. The former resistance, unbelief was removed by his almighty power. See Ezek. 36, Jer. 32:40, Ezek 11:19

Ezek. 36:25-27, "Then I will sprinkle clean water on you, and you shall be clean; I will cleanse you from all your filthiness and from all your idols. ²⁶ I will give you a new heart and put a new spirit within you; I will take the heart of stone out of your flesh and give you a heart of flesh. ²⁷ I will put My Spirit within you and cause you to walk in My statutes, and you will keep My judgments and do them." You see, God causes them to do exactly what he wants them to do and that is to believe, love and fear God (see also, Phil 2:13). Salvation is not just something that God makes possible or available and then it's up to the person to make the final choice, that it is up to his so called self-directed will as though man were an autonomous being. God makes promises in so many strong words, that it is He that must determine the matter, not man (John 1:13, Rom 9:16, "So then *it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy."). To say that God makes these promises that his elect will believe and yet not be the determiner in the affair is a great absurdity as Jonathan Edwards explains:

And how can God promise, as he oftentimes does in his word, glorious times, when righteousness shall generally prevail, and his will shall generally be done; and yet that it is not an effect which belongs to him to determine; it is not left to his determination, but to the sovereign, arbitrary determination of others, independently on any determination of him; and therefore surely they ought to be the promisers? For him to promise, who has it not in his hand to dispose and determine, is a great absurdity; and yet God oftentimes in promising, speaks of himself as the sovereign disposer of the matter, using such expressions as abundantly imply it. Isa. lx. 22. "I the Lord do hasten it in its time." Surely this is the language of a promiser, and not merely a predictor. God promises Abraham, that "all the families of the earth shall be blessed in him." God swears Rom. xiv. 11. "every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess." And it is said to be given to Christ, that every nation, etc., should serve and obey him, Dan. vii. After what manner they shall serve and obey him, is abundantly declared in other prophecies, as in Isa. xi. and innumerable others. These are spoken of in the next chapter, as excellent things that God does. - Jonathan Edwards

Jer. 32:40 "And I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from doing them good; but I will put My fear in their hearts so that they will not depart from Me". - Edwards

The outcome in conversion is always the same; they will always choose Christ (receive him), because God causes it to be so, yet man freely exercises his will without compulsion see [code443a]; he comes willingly, not forced because of the secret efficacious power as the Holy Spirit sweetly conforming the soul into compliance.

John Flavel: Fourthly, Coming to Christ notes the voluntariness of the soul in its motion to Christ. It is true, there is no coming without the Father's drawing; but that drawing hath nothing of coercion in it; it doth not destroy, but powerfully, and with an overcoming sweetness, persuades the will. It is not forced or driven, but it comes; being made "willing in the day of God's power," Ps. 110:3. [see code443a]

Three things require explication in this point before us.

First, What the drawing of the Father imports.

Secondly, In what manner he draws men to Christ,

Thirdly, How it appears that none can come till they be so drawn.

First, What the drawing of the Father imports. To open this, let it be considered, that drawing is usually distinguished into physical and moral. The former is either by coercion, force, and compulsion; or, by a sweet congruous efficacy upon the will. As to violence and compulsion, it is none of God's way and method, it being both against the nature of the will of man, which cannot be forced, and against the will of Jesus Christ, who loves to reign over a free and willing people, Ps.110:3, "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power." Or, as that word may be rendered, they shall be voluntarinesses, as willing as willingness itself. It is not then by a forcible co-action, but in a moral way of persuasion, that God the Father draws men to Jesus Christ. He draws with the bands of a man, as they are called, Hos. 11:14, i.e., in a way of rational conviction of the mind and conscience, and effectual persuasion of the will. But yet by moral persuasion, we must not understand a simple and bare proposal or tender of Christ and grace, leaving it still at the sinner's choice, whether he will comply with it or no. For though God does not force the will contrary to its nature, yet there is a real internal efficacy implied in this drawing, or an immediate operation of the Spirit upon the heart and will, which, in a way congruous and suitable to its nature, takes away the rebellion and reluctance of it, and of unwilling, makes it willing to come to Christ. And, in this respect, we own a physical, as well as a moral influence of the Spirit in this work; and so scripture expresses it, Eph. i. 19, 20. "That we may know what is the exceeding greatness of his power towards us who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead." Here is much more than a naked proposal made to the will; there is a power as well as a tender; greatness of power; and yet more, the exceeding greatness of his power; and this power hath an actual efficacy ascribed to it, he works upon our hearts and wills according to the working of his mighty power which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead. Thus he fulfils in us all the good pleasure of his will, and the work of faith with power, 2 Thess.1:11. Flavel, pg 69 vol. 2 Ser. 4

And this is that which the schools call gratia efficax, effectual grace; and others victrix delectatio, an overcoming, conquering delight; thus the work is carried on with a most efficacious sweetness. So that the liberty of the will is not infringed, whilst the obstinacy of the will is effectually subdued and over-ruled. For want of this, there are so many almost Christians in the world [brought on much by the presumptuous sinner's prayer, coming to God without being called]; hence are all those vanishing and imperfect works which come to nothing, called in scripture, a morning cloud, an early dew. [That's because they were never called; as Thomas Shepard says, God never spoke one word to them! see John 5:37] Had this mighty power gone forth with the word, they had never vanished or perished like embryos as they do. So then, God draws not only in a moral way, by proposing a suitable object to the will, but also in a physical way, or by immediate powerful influence upon the will; not infringing the liberty of it, but yet infallibly and effectually persuading it to come to Christ.

Conversion denotes the great change itself, which the Spirit causeth upon the soul, turning it by a sweet irresistible efficacy from the power of sin and Satan, to God in Christ. Now all these are imported in, and done by the application of Christ to our souls; for when once the efficacy of Christ's death, and the virtue of his resurrection, come to take place upon the heart of any man, he cannot but turn from sin to God, and become a new creature, living and acting by new principles and rules. So the apostle observes, 1

Thess. 1:5, 6. speaking of the effect of this work of the Spirit upon that people, "Our gospel (saith he) came "not to you in word only, but in power; and in the Holy Ghost;" There was the effectual application of Christ to them. "And you became followers of us, and of the Lord," ver. 6. there was their effectual call. "And ye turned from dumb idols to serve the living and true God," ver. 9. there was their conversion. "So that ye were ensamples to all that believe," ver. 9. there was their life of sanctification or dedication to God. So that all these are comprehended in effectual application. John Flavel, vol. Method of Grace, p 19 [2Chron. 20:6, ...none is able to withstand you.]

Conversion denotes the great change itself, which the Spirit causeth upon the soul, turning it by a sweet irresistible efficacy from the power of sin and Satan, to God in Christ. Now all these are imported in, and done by the application of Christ to our souls; for when once the efficacy of Christ's death, and the virtue of his resurrection, come to take place upon the heart of any man, he cannot but turn from sin to God, and become a new creature, living and acting by new principles and rules. So the apostle observes, 1 Thess.1:5, 6. speaking of the effect of this work of the Spirit upon that people, "Our gospel (saith he) came "not to you in word only, but in power; and in the Holy Ghost:" There was the effectual application of Christ to them. "And you became followers of us, and of the Lord," ver. 6, there was their effectual call. So that all these are comprehended in effectual application. John Flavel, vol. Method of Grace, p 19

My further comments:

Now, let's look at another passage that makes this clearer. Romans 8:28-30, The Golden Chain of Redemption

²⁸And we know that all things work together for good to those who love God, to those who are the called according to His purpose. ²⁹For whom He foreknew, He also predestined to be conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the firstborn among many brethren. ³⁰Moreover whom He predestined, these He also called; whom He called, these He also justified; and whom He justified, these He also glorified."

Those who God chose to love with a peculiar and special love (to foreknow) he predestined to be conformed to his image. There is the certainty of the outcome; all will come to him just as John 6:37 says, All that the Father gives me will come to Me. And those he predestined, these he called (by the effectual called as opposed to the general call) and those he called, those he justified and those he justified those he glorified. So, those he calls with this effectual call are infallibly going to believe; they are not going to chose sin and Satan! These acts are done by God, man is passive in this [pg 1884], hence they receive Him; and come willingly as I said before; yet, they make a choice in the sense of Phil. 1:29, that the duty, desire and willingness to believe in Christ is the very thing given to them for that very end! and hence, it's always for Christ; every time, because God works it, Phil 2:13; He is the Promiser in the New Covenant, therefore He is the determiner of the event; and that infallibly, all for His glory.

This is in stark contrast to the Arminian scheme that says, God is for you, Satan is against you and you cast the deciding vote. Arminians assume that there is some virtue in us that was not erased after the fall, that we only need outward suasion and fine sounding arguments and just enough grace to put us in a neutral position, but no efficacious grace that determines the matter; that is left up to us; the choice is up to us in the final issues. So in this scheme, it is possible that no one would be saved which Arminians concede (and no one would, due to man's total depravity). Arminians are not a big fan of the imputation of Adam's sin on all his posterity, nor are they fans of God's eternal decree of election since it they say it does violence to man's so called liberty; In this scenario they believe that man can resist the effectual call.

Let's take a view of this situation negatively, what conversion is not, and positively, what conversion is which we have already described above, but we'll paint the picture more.

G. Vos states in his Reformed Dogmatics, pg 635

e) Concerning the essence of this union (with Christ] in a positive sense, we can say that it is: skip to point 4.

4. A reciprocal unity. Establishing this unity is of course a work of Christ. Man does not take the initiative here by taking hold of Christ and drawing Him to himself or bringing himself to Him. The impossibility and inconceivability of that follows from what has already been said. How by any act from his side would man ever be able to make himself master of the Holy Spirit? It is entirely the reverse: Christ sends His Spirit, who, in the first grace that befalls man in the grace of regeneration, establishes the mystical bond. After this has happened and has also penetrated into the consciousness, one can certainly say that faith reaches out reciprocally to Christ, and the activity of faith and the nurturing of the spiritual life resident in union with Christ keep pace. But faith in itself, as subjective habit or subjective act, is not able to effect unity with Christ. It is one of the manifestations of the life of the Savior in us rather than the source of this life* itself. When Scripture speaks of a union with Christ by faith, then this always applies to unity in the consciousness or the consciousness of unity: “so that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith” (Eph 3:17), where, however, precedes, “so that He might grant you though the riches of His glory to be strengthened with power by His Spirit in the inner man.” The Spirit’s activity, therefore, is antecedent, and only as a result of it does Christ dwell in the heart by faith. It is the drawing power of Christ Himself that in our faith draws us to His life. In this sense, then, Scripture clearly teaches that a reception of life from Christ by faith is possible for us— indeed, is necessary (John 6:47, 51). There is not merely a life of Christ in us but also a life of ours for God in union with Christ. According to Romans 7:4, the believer knows himself to be as closely united to the Mediator as husband to wife, and according to 2 Corinthians 11:2, the church is viewed as a bride presenting herself to her bridegroom, Christ. “The Spirit and the bride say, ‘Come!’ ” (Rev 22:17).

The Sovereignty of God Over The Wills of Men

By G Clark

The king’s heart is in the hand of the LORD,
Like the rivers of water;
 He turns it wherever He wishes.

Pr. 21:1

Declaring the end from the beginning, And from ancient times things that are not yet done, Saying, ‘My counsel shall stand, And I will do all My pleasure,’ ¹¹Calling a bird of prey from the east, The man who executes My counsel, from a far country. Indeed I have spoken it; I will also bring it to pass. I have purposed it; I will also do it.
 Isa 46:10-11

There other similar passages like this like Jer. 10:23, "I know, O LORD, that the way of man is not in himself, that it is not in man who walks to direct his steps." and Proverbs 16:9." A man’s heart plans his way, But the LORD directs his steps." and verse 19:21, "There are many plans in a man’s heart, Nevertheless the LORD’s counsel—that will stand." and 1John 4:4, "You are of God, little children, and have overcome them, because He who is in you is greater than he who is in the world."

So, let me ask a question. Is God forcing the king's heart as He turns it wherever He wishes? Is the king being dragged by his feet to do what he does, screamin' and hollarin'? Is the king just making a free will and arbitrary choice and it just so happens that it goes exactly the way God wants it to go. Or is there some secret power, some almighty power that transcends our understanding that is directing things according to God's will? and yet if the king does evil, God is not culpable. God had decreed that the Assyrians, a very evil and wicked people, would ransack Jerusalem in Isa. 10; were they forced? No! Were they saying, Please God don't have us do this? Could they have done otherwise and said, No Lord; far be it from us to rape and pillage. No, they love raping and pillaging. So that evil nation was an instrument in God's hand to do his will in punishing Israel and then God punishes Assyria for the haughtiness of their hearts. So, this being said, can God change a heart and infallibly have that heart be changed from a Satan lover to a God lover? and have that result occur every time the Holy Spirit comes upon his elect in a saving manner without doing violence to the will? without risking the creature to resist this call, this secret will of God, for that person to believe, to love God, to delight in holiness, to hate sin thus breaking that league between him and Satan (Gen 3:15, I will place enmity between your seed and her seed...), etc.? This can only happen if God, his almighty power, changes the nature of the persons in that seed line of the promise (thru regeneration), the seed line of the elect. If the heart is changed, as Gen. 3:15 clearly implies though in obscure language, then that person is irreversibly changed; he will not choose sin and Satan but choose God every time because his heart has been changed, his affections have been renewed; he is a new creature! and have put on the new man who is renewed in knowledge according to the image of Him who created him, Col. 3:10. See 1John3:9, "No one born of God makes a practice of sinning, for God's^[a] seed abides in him; and he cannot keep on sinning, because he has been born of God." One who is born of God, (by the will of God, i.e., not by man's will or deciding, John 1:13) cannot choose Satan or sin nor go back wholeheartedly to a life of sin, the practice thereof. The whole true nature of this affair, "new man which was created according to God, in true righteousness and holiness.", wholly precludes this, but a running or rolling over to or receiving of Christ. In human terms or in a manner of speaking, this affair is all worked out before hand, fixed as it were, as well as due to God infinite sovereign power and wisdom, by the better promises of the new covenant.

What conversion is not: God only gives enough grace or outward suasion to bring the sinner to the point where he is able to make a choice from his own industry and strength to make the self-directed will's choice for Satan or Christ. It could go either way in Arminian thinking; that God does not determine the matter because that would be violating the person's so called liberty; that to be true love for God and hence true virtue, his choice must solely be from his own heart and not from any outside influence otherwise it is not a genuine love, and for God to impose himself upon man's will would constitute doing violence to the will and therefore, not fair.

Jonathan Edwards states:

"All their arguments suppose, that men's actions are no farther virtuous and rewardable, than as they are from themselves, the fruits of their own free will and self-determination. And men's own virtue, they say, is the only condition of salvation, and so must be the only thing by which salvation is obtained. And this being of themselves only, it surely follows, that their obtaining salvation is of themselves only." (p550) And as Edwards comments on a necessary consequent of this Arminian view, that it robs God of the glory of his free grace: "Would not he be, as it were, all in the cause? Would not the glory properly belong to him, on whose pleasure the determination of the matter properly depended?" (p560) That is key to this whole discussion! We are not properly active in our conversion as Arminians, Pelagians and many other isms promote, but we are properly passive [pg 1884]. This is why Paul says in 1Cor4:7, "For who ^[a]makes you differ from another? And what do you have that you did not receive? Now if you did indeed receive it, why do you boast as if you had not received it?"

And!!

§ 53. If God is not the disposing author of virtue, then he is not the giver of it. The very notion of a giver implies a disposing cause of the possession of the benefit. 1 John iv. 4. "Ye are of God, little children, and have overcome them, (i.e., have overcome your spiritual enemies,) because greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world;" that is, plainly, he is stronger, and his strength overcomes. But how can this be a reason, if God does not put forth an overcoming, effectual strength in the case, but leaves it to free will to get the victory, to determine the point in the conflict? Edwards, p554 Concerning Efficacious Grace, Vol. 2

Ans. First, this notion ignores the depraved nature of man which we inherit from Adam; man will always be unwilling to come to (or to believe) in God because of his being under the dominion of sin and the control of Satan [John 14:7, Rom. 8:7-8, etc.].

He cannot, of himself, free himself, but can only be set free by Christ, by divine intervention. Second, it denies God's sovereignty over the wills of men; man's will is not more powerful than God's will. So Jesus was correct when he told the Pharisees, "You are mistaken not knowing the scripture nor the power of God", that is, his converting power! that power noted in Eph 1:19, "the exceeding greatness of His power toward us who believe, according to the working of His mighty power ²⁰ which He worked in Christ when He raised Him from the dead..." That power! True conversion consists in a direct physical operation on the soul that effects this change of heart, that which is clearly prophesied in Ezek. 36:25, Jer. 32:40, Ezek, 11:19 and in other places, that says that God takes out the stony heart and puts in a heart of flesh that is able to receive the impression of the word, etc. Hence the outcome is always a true conversion, love for God, believing on Christ, compunction for sin, and the repentance thereof.

Valley of Dry Bones: This is a good example of God's sovereignty in election and conversion; that man is dead, blind, naked, and completely unable to come to spiritual life unless the Spirit sovereignly intervenes and breathes life into them! Spiritual life, that is! Life is not just coming to a place of awareness of the options set before them (as what the false notion of what Prevenient supposes), whether to choose or refuse Christ and that this choice is up to them; that the power is from them whether to believe or not; this life that is breathed into them goes further; it infallibly causes the soul to see and believe; to repent and love God. It is a saving life that is breathed in; it is God infallibly determining the outcome by the communication of the knowledge of himself, holiness, and joy and happiness to the creature, hence that which converts the soul; he is a new creation; the image of God is restored; it is salvation. It is the work that God will do in he will as John 6:29 says, "This is the work of God, that you believe in him whom he has sent." This is the infallible outcome in all of God's elect. John Flavel, "Yea, it is the effect of the Almighty Power of God, the exceeding greatness of his power is exerted in the work of faith, Eph. 1:19. It rises not out of nature, as common gifts do; but of this is expressly said, Eph. 2:8, It is not of yourselves, it is the gift of God. Where this work is effectually wrought, we may reason as solidly as comfortably from it, both backward, to the electing love of God, and forward, to our eternal glorification with him, Rom. 8:30." The very gift of believing is promised in the New Covenant.

So when Arminians suppose that because reformed theology says that all the elect will infallibly be converted, they assume that God must force many to believe against their own will, thus violating their liberty and autonomousness of the their wills, making them robots. But they ere in not knowing the scriptures nor the power of God. For this choice for Christ that the elect make upon their conversion is not your classic understanding of what choice is. It is not as though they could chose Satan and sin as well as Christ just like I could chose a Snickers Bar over M&Ms because I like Snickers a little better than the other, there being a chance as there is in many choices, a chance of choosing M&Ms. Conversion is way different. Yes, the decision for Christ is a choice but it's not the same "choosing" situation as Arminians make it out to be, as though an elect person could go the other way. No! The Power of God in this affair makes it totally different; God's power determines the outcome, the choice for Christ, i.e., believing in which He will not fail. The Arminian view is that this believing is not determined by God, but by man; and if that is the case, then, as they concede, man may not choose Christ, just like a person my not choose Snickers but buy M&Ms. This is the carnal thinking of Arminianism. And so they use this straw-man argument (robots...man's autonomusness, etc.) to derogate the sovereignty of God in election and God's sovereignty over the wills of men.

Now you see the value of doing a good exegesis of a particular doctrine or passage; what a clearer view do you get at the same time overcome traditions and prejudices. The whole counsel of God must be examined and weighed, comparing spiritual with spiritual, aka, according to the analogy of faith. G Clark

by Augustine (with final comment by Flavel)

Here's the bottom line on this: Man, being in a totally depraved condition prior to conversion, will not believe upon Christ for eternal life nor can he (Rom 8:6-8, "For to be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, nor indeed can be. So then, those who are in the flesh cannot please God."); he is bound by sin, blinded by Satan, a servant of Satan, etc. (1Cor2:14, "But the natural man does not receive the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him; nor can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." 2Cor4:4, "whose minds the god of this age has blinded, who do not believe,") The only way someone will come to Christ (meaning to believe in him) is if God the Spirit breathes spiritual life into him, i.e., causes him to be born again, giving him a new heart, etc. (John 3:8, "The wind blows where it wishes..." Deut 30:16, And the LORD your God will circumcise your heart and the heart of your descendants, to love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul, that you may live. Ezek. 11:19, "Then I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within them," John 6:44, "No one can come to Me unless the Father who sent Me draws him;"). This operation of the Holy Spirit is called effectual vocation or the effectual call; it is effectual all the time in converting someone because it was God's good pleasure so to do, fulfilling his eternal decree of election, John 6:37, "All that the Father gives Me will come to Me", Eph 1:4, "just as He chose us in Him before the foundation of the world,".

The person's stubbornness and prejudices are removed out of the way, the stony heart, (Ezek. 36:26, "I will take the heart of stone out of your flesh and give you a heart of flesh.") by a secret efficacious power that sweetly moves upon the soul making the soul wholeheartedly willing, hence Ps 110:3, Your people shall be volunteers [or willing] in the day of Your power; (in the day of his almighty power to convert the soul; It is not up to man to determine this event; we are passive in our conversion just like we were in our natural birth – see pg 1884) This is the power the Pharisees were ignorant of, so Jesus tells them, You are in not knowing the scriptures nor the power of god. They had not experienced this mighty power over their souls, obviously because they were still unregenerate (not saved); they were his enemies. (see footnote #2 on pg 1190)

This is extremely important in understanding the power of God in conversion and man's will in exercise; that God works it (John 1:13, John 3:8, etc.) without violating or doing violence to the will of man, yet God is the sovereign disposer of the event...that all that the Father gives Me will come to me, etc. God will bring his eternal purposes regarding election to pass, despite man's obstinacy and resistance and yet they all come willingly to the glory of God's grace!

Grace and Free Will

CHAPTER 42.

GOD DOES WHATEVER HE WILLS IN THE HEARTS EVEN OF WICKED MEN

Who can help trembling at those judgments of God by which He does whatever He wills in the hearts of even wicked men, at the same time rendering to them according to their deeds? Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, rejected the salutary counsel of the old men, not to deal harshly with the people, and preferred listening to the words of the young men of his own age, by returning a rough answer to those to whom he should have spoken gently. Now where did such conduct arise, except from his own will? Upon this, however, the ten tribes of Israel revolted from him, and chose for themselves another king, even Jeroboam, so that the will of God in His anger might be accomplished, which He had predicted would come to pass. 1Kings 12.8-14 For what does the Scripture say? “The king did not listen to the people; for the turning was from the Lord, so that He might perform His saying which the Lord spoke to Ahijah the Shilonite concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat.” 1Kng 12.15 All this indeed was done by the will of man, although the turning was from the Lord.

Read the books of the Chronicles, and you will find the following passage in the second book: “Moreover, the Lord stirred up against Jehoram the spirit of the Philistines, and of the Arabians, that were neighbours to the Ethiopians; and they came up to the land of Judah and ravaged it, and carried away all the substance which was found in the king’s house.” 2Chr 21.16-17 Here it is shown that God stirs up enemies to devastate the countries which He adjudges deserving of such chastisement. Still, did these Philistines and Arabians invade the land of Judah to waste it with no will of their own? Or were their movements so directed by their own will that the Scripture lies which tells us that “the Lord stirred up their spirit” to do all this? Both statements to be sure are true, because they both came by their own will, and yet the Lord stirred up their spirit; and this may also be stated with equal truth the other way: The Lord both stirred up their spirit, and yet they came of their own will. [similar passage in 2Cor2:8 - But thanks be to God who ^[b]puts the same earnest care for you into the heart of Titus. (there is God's sovereign disposal of his grace) ¹⁷ For he not only accepted the exhortation, but being more diligent, he went to you of his own accord. (there is man's creaturely free will in exercise answering to God's will.)] For the Almighty sets in motion, even in the innermost hearts of men, the movement of their will, so that He does through their agency whatever He wishes to perform through them—even He who does not know how to will anything in unrighteousness.

What, again, is the purport of that which the man of God said to King Amaziah: “Do not let the army of Israel go with you; for the Lord is not with Israel, not even with all the children of Ephraim: for if you think to obtain with these, the Lord shall put you to flight before your enemies: for God has power either to strengthen or to put to flight." 2Chr 25:7-8 Now, how does the power of God help some in war by giving them confidence, and put others to flight by injecting fear into them, unless He who made all things in heaven and on earth, according to His own will, also works in the hearts of men?

We read also what Joash, king of Israel, said when he sent a message to Amaziah, king of Judah, who wanted to fight with him. After certain other words, he added, "Now wait at home; why do you challenge me to your hurt, so that you should fall, even you, and Judah with you?" 2Kng 14.10 Then the Scripture has this sequel added: "But Amaziah would not hear; for it came from God, so that he might be delivered into their hands, because they sought after the gods of Edom." 2Chr 25:20 Behold, now, how God, wishing to punish the sin of idolatry, worked this in this man's heart, with whom He was indeed justly angry, not to listen to sound advice but to despise it, and go to the battle in which he with his army was routed. God says by the prophet Ezekiel, "If the prophet is deceived when he has spoken a thing, I the Lord have deceived that prophet; I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him from the midst of my people Israel." Ezek 14.9

Then there is the book of Esther, who was a woman of the people of Israel, and in the land of their captivity she became the wife of the foreign King Ahasuerus. In this book it is written, that being driven by necessity to interpose in behalf of her people, whom the king had ordered to be slain in every part of his dominions, she prayed to the Lord. Ester 4.17 So strongly was she urged by the necessity of the case, that she even ventured into the royal presence without the king's command, and contrary to her own custom. Now observe what the Scripture says:14 "He looked at her like a bull in the vehemence of his indignation; and the queen was afraid, and her colour changed as she fainted; and she bowed herself upon the head of her delicate maiden who went before her. But God turned the king, and transformed his indignation into gentleness." Ester 15.10-11 DRM The Scripture says in the Proverbs of Solomon, "Even as the rush of water, so is the heart of a king in God's hand; He will turn it in whatever way He shall choose." Pr. 21.1 Again, in the 105th Psalm, in reference to the Egyptians, one reads what God did to them: "And He turned their heart to hate His people, to deal subtly with His servants." Ps. 105.25 Observe, likewise, what is written in the letters of the Apostles. In the Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Romans, these words occur: "Therefore God gave them up to uncleanness, through the lusts of their own hearts;" Rom 1.24 and a little afterwards: “For this cause God gave them up to vile affections;” Rom 1.26 again, in the next passage: “And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient.” Rom 1.28 So also in his second Epistle to the Thessalonians, the apostle says of various persons, “because they did not receive the love of the truth so that they might be saved; for this reason also, God shall send them a strong delusion, that they should believe a lie; that they all might be judged who did not believe the truth, but took pleasure in unrighteousness.” 2Thes 2.10-12

Jesus has 3 offices: Priest, Prophet and King. This is part of what he does as king over his church. Examine this one. One of the biggest complaints that people have against God's sovereignty in election is that people think he forces Himself upon them, doing violence to the will, turning them into robots. This is a mistaken understanding, a straw-man argument to denigrate or unfairly criticize a most beautiful comforting doctrine. When the heart is changed by the Spirit, it becomes a willing heart.

CHAPTER 43.

GOD OPERATES ON MEN'S HEARTS: TO INCLINE THEIR WILLS HOWEVER HE PLEASES

From these statements of the inspired word, and from similar passages which it would take too long to quote in full, I think it is sufficiently clear that God works in the hearts of men to incline their wills however He wills, whether to good deeds according to His mercy, or to evil deeds after their own deserts—His own judgment being sometimes manifest, sometimes secret, but always righteous. This ought to be the fixed and immoveable conviction of your heart, that there is no unrighteousness with God. Therefore, whenever you read in the Scriptures of Truth, that men are led aside, or that their hearts are blunted and hardened by God, never doubt that some ill deserts of their own have first occurred, so that they justly suffer these things. Thus you will not run counter to that proverb of Solomon: “The foolishness of a man perverts his ways, yet he blames God in his heart.” Pr. 19.3 Grace, however, is not bestowed according to men’s deserts; “otherwise grace would no longer be grace.” Rom 11:6 For grace is so designated because it is given gratuitously. Now if God is able, either through the agency of angels (whether good ones or evil), or in any other way whatsoever, to operate in the hearts even of the wicked, in return for their deserts—whose wickedness was not made by God, but was either derived originally from Adam, or increased by their own will—what is there to wonder at if, through the Holy Spirit, God works good in the hearts of the elect, having worked it that their hearts become good instead of evil?

PELAGIANS ARE IGNORANT IN MAINTAINING THAT THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE LAW COMES FROM GOD, BUT THAT LOVE COMES FROM OURSELVES

It is no wonder that “light shines in darkness, and the darkness does not comprehend it.” John 1.5 In John’s Epistle, the Light declares, “Behold what manner of love the Father has bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God.” 1John 3.1 And in the Pelagian writings, the darkness says, “Love comes to us of ourselves.” Now, if they only possessed the true love, that is, Christian love, they would also know where they obtained possession of it; even as the apostle knew when he said, “But we have not received the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things that are freely given to us by God.” 1Cor 2.12 John says, “God is love.” 1John 4.16 And thus the Pelagians affirm that they actually have God Himself, not from God, but from their own selves! And although they allow that we have the knowledge of the law from God, they would yet have it that love is from our very selves. Nor do they listen to the apostle when he says, “Knowledge puffs up, but love edifies.” 1Cor 8.1 Now what can be more absurd—no—what can be more insane and more alien to the very sacredness of love itself, than to maintain that from God proceeds the knowledge which, apart from love, puffs us up; while the love which prevents the possibility of this inflation of knowledge, springs from ourselves? And again, when the apostle speaks of “the love of Christ as surpassing knowledge,” Eph 3.19 what can be more insane than to suppose that the knowledge which must be subordinated to love comes from God, while the love which surpasses knowledge comes from man? The true faith however, and sound doctrine, declare that both graces are from God. The Scripture says, “From His face comes knowledge and understanding;” Pr. 2:6 and another Scripture says, “Love is of God.” 1John 4.7 We read of “the Spirit of wisdom and understanding.” Isa 11.2 Also of “the Spirit of power, and of love, and of a sound mind.” 2Tim 1.7 But love is a greater gift than knowledge; for whenever a man has the gift of knowledge, love is necessary by the side of it, so that he is not puffed up. For “love does not envy, does not vaunt itself, is not puffed up.” 1Cor 13.4

GOD IS ABLE TO CONVERT OPPOSING WILLS, AND TO TAKE AWAY FROM THE HEART ITS HARDNESS

Now if faith is simply of free will, and it is not given by God, then why do we pray for those who will not believe, that they may believe? It would be absolutely useless to do this unless we believe, with perfect propriety, that Almighty God is able to turn to belief, those wills that are perverse and opposed to faith. Man’s free will is addressed when it is said, “Today, if you will hear His voice, do not harden your hearts.” Heb 3:15 But if God were not able to remove from the human heart even its obstinacy and hardness, then He would not say through the prophet, “I will take from them their heart of stone, and will give them a heart of flesh.” Ezek. 11:19 That all this was foretold in reference to the New Testament is shown clearly enough by the apostle when he says, “You are our epistle ...written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tablets of stone, but in fleshly tablets of the heart.” 2Cor 3:2-3 We must not, of course suppose that such a phrase as this is used as if those who ought to live spiritually might live in a fleshly way. But inasmuch as a stone has no feeling—to which man’s hard heart is compared—what was there left Him to compare man’s intelligent heart to, but the flesh, which possesses feeling? For this is what is said by the prophet Ezekiel: “I will give them another heart, and I will put a new spirit within you; and I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and I will give them a heart of flesh; that they may walk in my statutes, and keep my ordinances, and do them: and they shall be my people, and I will be their God, says the Lord.” Ezek. 11:19-20 Now can we possibly (without extreme absurdity) maintain that there previously existed in any man the good merit of a good will, to entitle him to the removal of his stony heart, when all the while this very heart of stone signifies nothing else than a will of the hardest kind, and such that it is absolutely inflexible against God? For where a good will precedes, there is of course no longer a heart of stone.

This is proof that before one is converted, he does not have a willing heart to come to Christ. He has a hard heart, confirming that man is totally depraved in that respect. Now he may seem willing and sincere as he does a sinner's prayer but that is only because his prayer is founded on natural principles (self love) excited by sweet sounding sermons and good music, which all people are capable of, apart from any saving work of the Spirit.

CHAPTER 30.

THE GRACE BY WHICH THE STONY HEART IS REMOVED IS NOT PRECEDED BY GOOD DESERTS, BUT BY EVIL ONES

In another passage also, by the same prophet [Ezekiel], God, in the clearest language, shows us that it is not owing to any good merits on the part of men, but for His own name's sake, that He does these things. This is His language: "This I do, O house of Israel, but for my holy name's sake, which you have profaned among the heathen, where you went. And I will sanctify my great name, which was profaned among the heathen, which you have profaned in the midst of them; and the heathen shall know that I am the Lord, says the Lord God, when I shall be sanctified in you before their eyes. For I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you into your own land. Then will I sprinkle you with clean water, and you shall be clean: from all your own filthiness, and I will cleanse you from all your idols. A new heart also I will give you, and a new spirit I will put within you; and the stony heart shall be taken away out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my Spirit within you, and will cause you to walk in my statutes, and you shall keep my judgments, and do them." Ezek. 36.22-27 Now who is so blind as not to see, and who is so stone-like as not to feel, that this grace is not given according to the merits of a good will, when the Lord declares and testifies "It is I, O house of Israel, who do this, but for my holy name's sake"? Now why did He say "It is I that do it, but for my holy name's sake," if it were not that they should not think that it was owing to their own good merits that these things were happening, as the Pelagians do not hesitate to say unblushingly? But there were not only no good merits of theirs, but the Lord shows that evil ones actually preceded; for He says, "But for my holy name's sake, which you have profaned among the heathen." Who can fail to observe how dreadful is the evil of profaning the Lord's own holy name? And yet, for the sake of this very name of mine, He says, which you have profaned, I, even I, will make you good, but not for your own sakes; and as He adds "I will sanctify my great name, which was profaned among the heathen, which you have profaned in the midst of them." He says that He sanctifies His name, which He had already declared to be holy. Therefore, this is just what we pray for in the Lord's Prayer— "Hallowed be Your name." We ask for the hallowing among men of that which, in itself, is undoubtedly always holy. Then it follows, "And the heathen shall know that I am the Lord, says the Lord God, when I shall be sanctified in you." Although

He Himself is always holy, He is nevertheless sanctified in those on whom He bestows His grace: by taking from them that stony heart by which they profaned the name of the Lord.

Contemplate this one. It's by Augustine, one of the great church fathers, Cir. 400AD. This will exercise your faculty of reasoning! Dig deep.

CHAPTER 31.

FREE WILL HAS ITS FUNCTION IN THE HEART'S CONVERSION; BUT GRACE TOO HAS ITS FUNCTION

Lest, however, it should be thought that men themselves in this matter do nothing by free will, it is said in the Psalm, "Do not harden not your hearts;" Ps. 95.8 and in Ezekiel himself, "Cast away from you all your transgressions which you have impiously committed against me; and make you a new heart and a new spirit; and keep all my commandments. For why will you die, O house of Israel, says the Lord? For I have no pleasure in the death of him that dies, says the Lord God: and turn and live." Ezek. 18:31-32 We should remember that it is He who says, "Turn and live," to whom it is said in prayer, "Turn us again, O God." We should remember that He says, "Cast away from you all your transgressions," when it is even He who justifies the ungodly. We should remember that He says, "Make you a new heart and a new spirit," who also promises, "I will give you a new heart, and a new spirit I will put within you." Ezek 36.26 How is it then, that He who says, "Make you," also says, "I will give you"? Why does He command, if He is to give? Why does He give if man is to make, unless it is that He gives what He commands when He helps the one whom He commands, to obey? There is, however, always within us a free will—but it is not always good; for it is either free from righteousness when it serves sin—and then it is evil—or else it is free from sin when it serves righteousness—and then it is good. But the grace of God is always good; and by it, it comes to pass that a man is of a good will, though he was before of an evil one. By it also, it comes to pass that the very good will which has now begun to be, is enlarged, and made so great that it is able to fulfill the divine commandments which it wishes, once it firmly and perfectly wishes it. This is the purport of what the Scripture says: "If you will, you shall keep the commandments;" Sir 15.15, so that the man who wills but is not able, knows that he does not yet fully will; and he prays that he may have so great a will that it may suffice to keep the commandments. And thus indeed he receives assistance to perform what he is commanded. Then the will is of use when we have ability; just as ability is also of use when we have the will. For what does it profit us if we will what we are unable to do, or else do not will what we are able to do?

CHAPTER 10.
FREE WILL AND GOD'S GRACE ARE SIMULTANEOUSLY COMMENDED
Augustine

When God says, "Turn to me, and I will turn to you," Zech. 1:3 one of these clauses—that which invites our return to God—evidently belongs to our will; while the other, which promises His return to us, belongs to His grace. Here, possibly, the Pelagians think they have a justification for their opinion which they so prominently advance: that God's grace is given according to our merits. In the East indeed, that is to say, in the province of Palestine in which the city of Jerusalem lies, Pelagius, when examined in person by the bishop, did not venture to affirm this. For it happened that among the objections which were brought up against him, this in particular was objected: he maintained that the grace of God was given according to our merits—an opinion which was so different from catholic doctrine, and so hostile to the grace of Christ, that unless he had anathematized it, as laid to his charge, he himself must have been anathematized on its account. He pronounced, indeed, the required anathema upon the dogma, but how insincerely his later books plainly show; for in them he maintains absolutely no other opinion than that the grace of God is given according to our merits. They collect such passages out of the Scriptures—like the one which I just now quoted, "Turn to me, and I will turn to you,"—as if it were owing to the merit of our turning to God, that His grace were given us — in which He Himself even turns to us. Now the persons who hold this opinion fail to observe that, unless our turning to God were itself God's gift [that's the key! my insert, see Phil. 2:13, 1:29, Jn 6:29], it would not be said to Him in prayer, "Turn us again, O God of hosts;" Ps. 80:3 and, "You, O God, will turn and quicken us;" Ps. 80:7 and again, "Turn us, O God of our salvation," Ps. 85:4—with other passages of similar import, too numerous to mention here. For with respect to our coming to Christ, what else does it mean than our being turned to Him by believing? And yet He says: "No man can come to me, unless it was given to him by my Father." John 6:65

OTHER PASSAGES OF SCRIPTURE WHICH THE PELAGIANS ABUSE

Then, again, there is the Scripture contained in the second book of the Chronicles: "The Lord is with you when you are with Him: and if you shall seek Him, you shall find Him; but if you forsake Him, He will also forsake you." 2Chr 15.2 This passage, no doubt, clearly manifests the choice of the will. But those who maintain that God's grace is given according to our merits, receive these testimonies of Scripture in such a way as to believe that our merit lies in the circumstance of our "being with God," while His grace is given according to this merit, so that He too may be with us. In like manner, that our merit lies in the fact of "our seeking God," and then His grace is given according to this merit, in order that we may find Him." Again, there is a passage in the first book of the same Chronicles which declares the choice of the will: "And you, Solomon, my son, know the God of your father, and serve Him with a perfect heart and with a willing mind, for the Lord searches all hearts, and understands all the imaginations of the thoughts; if you seek Him, He will be found by you; but if you forsake Him, He will cast you off forever." 1Chron 28.9 But these people find some room for human merit in the clause, "If you seek Him," and then grace is thought to be given according to this merit in what is said in the ensuing words, "He will be found by you." And so they labour with all their might to show that God's grace is given according to our merits—in other words, that grace is not grace. For, as the apostle most expressly says, to those who receive reward according to merit, "the recompense is not reckoned of grace but of debt." Rom 4.4

CHAPTER 12.

PAUL PROVES THAT GRACE IS NOT GIVEN ACCORDING TO MEN'S MERITS

Now there was, no doubt, a decided merit in the Apostle Paul, but it was an evil one while he persecuted the Church; and he says of it: "I am not fit to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the Church of God." 1Cor 15.9 And it was while he had this evil merit that a good one was rendered to him instead of the evil; and therefore he went on at once to say, "But by the grace of God, I am what I am." 1Cor 15.10 Then, in order to exhibit also his free will, he added in the next clause, "And His grace within me was not in vain, but I have labored more abundantly than all of them." He appeals to this free will of man in the case of others also, as when he says to them, "We beseech you that you do not receive the grace of God in vain." 2Cor 6.1 Now, how could he so enjoin them if they received God's grace in such a manner as to lose their own will? Nevertheless, lest the will itself should be deemed capable of doing any good thing without the grace of God, after saying, "His grace within me was not in vain, but I have labored more abundantly than they all,” he immediately added the qualifying clause, “Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me.” 1Cor 15.10 In other words, Not I alone, but the grace of God with me. And thus it was neither the grace of God alone, nor was it he himself alone, but it was the grace Of God with him. Despite his call from heaven, and his conversion by that great and most effectual call, God’s grace was alone; this is because his merits, though great, were yet evil. Then, to quote one passage more, he says to Timothy: “But be a co-laborer with the gospel, according to the power of God who saves us and calls us with His holy calling—not according to our works but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given to us in Christ Jesus.” 2Tim 1.8-9 Then elsewhere he enumerates his merits, and he gives us this description of their evil character: “For we ourselves also were formerly foolish, unbelieving, deceived, serving various lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another.” Tit 3.3 To be sure, nothing but punishment was due to such a course of evil desert! God, however, who returns good for evil by His grace, which is not given according to our merits, enabled the apostle to conclude his statement and say: “But when the kindness and love of our Saviour God shone upon us—not of works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us, by the layer of regeneration and renewal of the Holy Ghost, whom He shed upon us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour; that being justified by His grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life.” Tit 3.4-7

THE FAITH THAT HE KEPT WAS THE FREE GIFT OF GOD

His last clause runs thus: “I have kept the faith.” 2Tim 4.7 But he who says this is the same one who declares in another passage, “I have obtained mercy that I might be faithful.” 1Cor 7.25 He does not say, “I obtained mercy because I was faithful,” but “in order that I might be faithful,” thus showing that even faith itself cannot be had without God’s mercy, and that it is the gift of God. This he very expressly teaches us when he says, “For by grace are you saved through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God.” Eph 2.8 They might possibly say, “We received grace because we believed;” as if they would attribute the faith to themselves, and the grace to God. Therefore, the apostle having said, “You are saved through faith,” added, “and that not of yourselves, but it is the gift of God.” And again, lest they say they deserved so great a gift by their works, he immediately added, “not of works, lest any man should boast.” Eph 2.9 It is not that he denied good works, or emptied them of their value, when he says that “God renders to every man according to his works;" Rom 2.6, but it is because works proceed from faith, and not faith from works. Therefore it is from Him that we have works of righteousness, from whom also comes faith itself, concerning which it is written, "The just shall live by faith." Hab. 2.4

ETERNAL LIFE IS "GRACE FOR GRACE"

Perhaps you ask whether we ever read in the Sacred Scriptures of "grace for grace." Well you possess the Gospel according to John, which is perfectly clear in its very great light. Here John the Baptist says of Christ: "Of His fulness we have all received, even grace for grace." John 1.16 So that out of His fulness we have received, according to our humble measure, our particles of ability as it were, for leading good lives—"according as God has dealt to every man his measure of faith;" Rom 12.3 because "every man has his proper gift from God; one after this manner, and another after that." 1Cor 7.7 And this is grace. But, over and above this, we shall also receive "grace for grace" when we have eternal life awarded to us, of which the apostle said: "The grace of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" Rom 6.23 —having just said that "the wages of sin is death." He deservedly called it "wages," because everlasting death is awarded as its proper due for diabolical service. Now, when it was in his power to say, and to rightly say: "But the wages of righteousness is eternal life," he yet preferred to say: "The grace of God is eternal life." He did so in order that we may understand from this that God does not, for any merits of our own, but from His own divine compassion, prolong our existence to everlasting life—even as the Psalmist says to his soul, "Who crowns you with mercy and compassion." Ps. 103.4 Well now, is not a crown given as the reward for good deeds? However, it is only because He works good works in good men—of whom it is said, "It is God who works in you both to will and to do His good pleasure," Phil 2.13 —that the Psalm has it as just now quoted: "He crowns you with mercy and compassion," since it is through His mercy that we perform the good deeds for which the crown is awarded. However, it is not to be supposed for a moment, because he said, "It is God who works in you both to will and to do his own good pleasure," that free will is taken away. If this indeed had been his meaning, he would not have said just before, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling." Phil 2.12 For when the command is given "to work," their free will is addressed; and when it is added, "with fear and trembling," they are warned against boasting of their good deeds as if they were their own, by attributing to themselves the performance of anything good. It is pretty much as if the apostle had this question put to him: "Why did you use the phrase, 'with fear and trembling'?" And it is as if he answered the inquiry of his examiners by telling them, "For it is God who works in you." Because if you fear and tremble, then you do not boast of your good works as if they were your own, since it is God who works within you.

Comments by John Flavel on Man's Ability to Obey God's Commands

As to the first; It must be premised that the question doth not suppose the heart or will of a Christian to be at his own command and dispose in this matter; we cannot resign it, and subject it to the will of God whenever we desire so to do; the duty indeed is ours, but the power by which alone we perform it is God's; we act as we are acted by the Spirit. It is with our hearts, as with meteors hanging in the air by the influence of the sun; while that continues, they abide above; but when it fails, they fall to the earth; we can do this, and all things else, be they never so difficult, "Through Christ that strengthens us," Phil. iv. 13. But "without him we can do nothing," John xv. 5. He doth not say, without me ye can do but little, or without me ye can do nothing but with great difficulty, or without me ye can do nothing perfectly; but without me ye can do nothing at all. And every Christian hath a witness in his own breast to attest this truth. For there are cases frequently occurring in the methods of providence, in which, notwithstanding all their prayers and desires, all their reasonings and strivings, they cannot quiet their hearts fully in the dispose and will of God ; but, on the contrary, do find all their endeavours in this matter, to be but as the rolling of a returning stone against the hill. Till God say to the heart, be still, and to the will, give up, nothing can be done. pg 490 Vol. 4, The Mystery of Providence

"See to it that no one takes you captive by philosophy and empty deceit, according to human tradition, according to the elemental spirits^[a] of the world, and not according to Christ." Col. 2:8

Grace and Free Will is Consistent! John Flavel, Vol. 4 pg 92

3. Christ's knocking at the door of the heart implies the method of the Spirit in conversion to be congruous and agreeable to the nature of man's soul. Mark Christ's expression in the text; he doth not say, "Behold I come to the door," and break it open by violence; no, Christ makes no forcible entries, whether sinners will or not; he will come in by consent of the will, or not at all. I stand and knock; if any man open the door I will come in to him. There is a great difference between a friendly admission by consent, and a forcible entrance. In a forcible entrance bars of iron are brought to break open the door ; but in a friendly admission one knocks, and the other opens. Forcible actions are unsuitable to the nature of the will, whose motions are free and spontaneous; therefore it is said. Psalm 110:3, "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power." It is true, the power of God is upon the will of man in the day of his conversion, or else it would never open to Christ; but yet that power of God doth not act against the freedom of man's will, by co-action and force; no, but of unwilling he makes it willing; taking away the obstinacy and reluctancy of the will by the efficacy of his grace, [see Ezek. 36:25, "I will take the heart of stone out of your flesh and give you a heart of flesh.] which some Divines call victrix delectatio, a sweet and pleasant victory; and so the door of the will still opens freely, Hos. xi. 4, "I drew them with the cords of a man, with the bands of love." I drew them, there is Almighty Power; but how did this power draw them? with the cords of a man, i.e., with rational arguments convincing the judgment. Beasts are driven and forced, but men are drawn by reason [sanctified reason! from a renewed mind], and will not move without it, if they act like themselves. It must be confessed, that when the day of God's power is come for the bringing home of a poor sinner to Christ, he cannot resist the power of God's Spirit, that draws him effectually: "Every one that hath heard and learned of the Father cometh unto me;" [there's the communication of the knowledge of God that occurs at conversion, Col. 3:10, "renewed in knowledge...", 1Jn5:20, "...has given us an understanding, that we may know Him who is true..." that is, God in Christ.] yet still the soul comes freely by the consent of his will; for this is the method of Christ in drawing souls to him. There is in the day of a sinner's conversion a kid, an offer made for the will, both by Satan and Christ; Satan bids riches, honors, and pleasures, with ease and quietness to the flesh in the enjoyment of them. Abide where thou art, saith Satan, remain with me, and thou shalt escape all the persecutions, losses, and troubles of the world, which conscience entangles other men in; thou shalt draw thy life through peace and pleasure to thy dying day. O, saith the flesh, this is a good motion, what can be better for me? But then, saith Christ, does thou not consider that all these enjoyments will quickly be at an end, and what shall become of thee then? Behold, I offer you the free, full, and final pardon of your sins; peace and reconciliation with God; treasures in heaven; all these shall be yours with troubles, reproaches, and persecutions in this world. The understanding and conscience of a sinner being convinced of the vanity of earthly things, and the indispensable necessity of pardon and peace with God; I say, when a convinced judgment hath duly balanced these things, and laid them before the will, and the Spirit of God puts forth his power in the renovation of it; it moves towards Christ freely, and yet cannot, according to its natural order, act otherwise than it doth.

[hence, irresistible grace, 2Chron. 20:6, ...none is able to withstand you.] And, doubtless, this is the true meaning of that expression so often mistaken and abused, in Luke xiv. 23, "Compel them to come in." What! By forcing men against the light of their consciences? [As Arminians falsely accuse Calvinists, the reformed] No; to the shame of many Protestants let us hear the gloss of Stella, a Popish commentator upon the place, 'Christ (saith he) compels men to come in, by showing to their will such an excelling good as it cannot but embrace.' For voluntas naturaliter fertur in bonum, the will is naturally carried to the best good. And thus the Spirit works upon the soul harmoniously, and agreeably to its own nature.

Comments by AW Pink on God's Will, Man's Will and Acts are Consistent with God's Decrees & Divine Covenants
 Compatibilism & Concurrence

code228

From the divine side, the covenant of grace is "ordered in all things and sure." There is not the slightest possibility of anything in it failing. Christ will "see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied," and not one of those given to Him by the Father before the foundation of the world will be lost. But that does not alter the fact that while the elect are left here in this world they are bidden to "make their calling and election sure" (2 Pet. 1:10), "if they may apprehend [lay hold of] that for which also they were apprehended of Christ Jesus" (Phil. 3:12). The covenant has provided for the communication of effectual grace to secure the saints' obedience and perseverance; yet that does not alter the fact that God still enforces His righteous claims upon them and deals with them as moral agents who are required to heed His warnings, obey His precepts, and use the means He has appointed for their preservation.

Some experience difficulty in fitting together those Scriptures which present eternal life as the present and inalienable possession of the believer with other passages that place it in the future and as only being attained unto by following a course of self-denial. Such verses as John 5:24 and Romans 6:23 are quite simple to them; but Romans 6:22; 8:13; Galatians 6:8; and Jude 21 they are at a loss to know what to do with. But there is nothing inconsistent between a believer acting from a principle of grace and life already communicated to him by the Holy Spirit, and his so acting that he may live. A man must be alive before he can eat; yet he must eat in order that he may live. Were he to cease entirely from the taking of food, would there be any life for him in a month's time? Neither would the Christian enter heaven if he entirely neglected the means of grace appointed for his spiritual preservation.

Of old, Moses said unto Israel, "The Lord thy God will circumcise thine heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live" (Deut. 30:6). Was he, then, inconsistent when, at the close of the same address, he declared: "I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live: That thou mayest love the Lord thy God, and that thou mayest obey his voice, and that thou mayest cleave unto him: For he is thy life, and the length of thy days: that thou mayest dwell in the land which the Lord sware unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give them" (vv. 19, 20)? Was Moses there setting before them a "yea and nay gospel"? Emphatically, no; for he was the mouthpiece of Jehovah Himself. Nor was this appeal a "legal" one, but a strictly "evangelical" one. [compare Deut. 10:16 with verse 30:6] Alas, that so many today err, "not knowing the Scriptures." "Know therefore that the Lord thy God, He is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him and keep his commandments to a thousand generations"—not merely from Moses till Christ (Deut. 7:9)—yes, and with no others. This verse is just as much a part of the holy and inspired Word of God as is Ephesians 2:8, 9; and the one is needed by us as much as the other. It might be objected, This is bringing in a legalistic inducement and inculcating a mercenary spirit to put the believer upon using means in order to obtain his preservation, and setting before him heaven or eternal life as a reward for his faithfulness. In reply, let us quote from the renowned and evangelical Dutch theologian:

"A mercenary baseness is certainly unworthy of the high-born sons of God, but their heavenly Father does not forbid them to have any regard to their own advantage in the exercise of holiness. David himself confesseth that, the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. 'By them is Thy servant warned, and in keeping of them there is great reward' (Ps. 19:9, 11). And the faith of Moses is commended because 'he had respect unto the recompense of the reward' (Heb. 11:26). Yea, that faith is required of all who come to God, that they 'must believe that He is, and that He is a Rewarder of them that diligently seek Him'—Heb. 11:6" (from Irenicon, by H. Witsius, 1696).

To anticipate one more objection—not with any expectation of convincing the carping critic, but rather in the hope of helping some who are in a state of bewilderment from the one-sided teaching of our unhappy day—But does not all of the above inculcate the principle of human merit? No, for it is due alone to divine grace that the believer has had communicated to him a principle of obedience—a heart or nature which desires to please God. Furthermore, it is solely for Christ's sake that God so liberally rewards the sincere endeavors of His people, for apart from the Mediator and His merits, they could not be accepted by Him. Finally, there is no proportion whatever between the Christian's obedience and the reward he receives—the inheritance infinitely exceeding his poor efforts—any more than there was in God's giving Canaan to Abraham and his seed because he left Chaldea.

False Conversions: How and Why

Excerpt from vol. 4, pg 202

John Flavel

This sheds great light on the danger of the sinner's prayer and why so many people advocate it's use and why many seem so genuine in its practice!

Inference 1. If the opening of the heart to Christ be the great and direct intention and end of the gospel, How are they deceived that bless themselves in the attainment of some lesser end and intentions of the gospel, whilst the great end (the effectual persuasion of the will to Christ) not at all effected upon them? There are some collateral strokes, some by-effects as I may call them, which the gospel hath upon men. It would pity a wise considerate man to see how poor souls hug themselves with a conceited happiness in these lesser things, whilst they still stick fast in the state of unregeneracy. I would fain undeceive such mistaken wretches who bow down under the power of self-deceit, and that in so great and important a point, in which their eternal salvation is concerned. There be two things which are exceeding apt to deceive men in this matter; namely,

1. Partial convictions on the understanding.
2. Transient motions upon the affections.

In these two things multitudes deceive themselves, as if the whole design of the gospel were accomplished upon them therein. (1.) Partial convictions upon the understanding; light and knowledge breaking into the mind, producing orthodoxy of judgment; this seems to be the effectual opening of the understanding to Christ, though alas! to this day they never saw sin in its vileness, much less their own special sin; nor Christ in his suitableness and necessity. People that live under the gospel can hardly avoid the improvement of their understandings by the light that shines upon them; knowledge grows, parts thrive; these enable them to discourse and defend the points of religion excellently. Yea, it may be from the strength of these gifts, they can pray with commendable variety and largeness of expression; these things beget applause from men, and confidence in yourselves, whilst all the while no saving influences are shed down to quicken, change, and spiritualize the heart. (2.) There are transient motions and touches of the gospel upon the affections, which give some men their melting pangs and moods now and then under the word, though it never settles into a spiritual frame, an habitual heavenliness of temper; of such the apostle speaks, Heb. 6:5. And this is the more dangerous, because they now seem to have attained all that is essential to religion, or necessary to salvation. For when unto the light of their understandings there shall be added melting affections, a man now seems to be complete in all that the gospel requires to the being and constitution of a Christian, as a great divine speaks; for thus poor souls are apt to reason, If I had only light in my mind, and never found any meltings of my affections, I might suspect myself justly to be an hypocrite; but there are times when my affections as well as my understanding, seem to feel the power of the gospel. And yet these things may be where the heart never effectually opens to Christ; all this may be but a morning dew, an early cloud, that vanishes away ; as is plain in John's hearers, John v. 35. and in Paul's hearers. Gal. 1:14, 15. For except the convictions upon the understanding be particular and effectual, and the motions upon the affections settled to a heavenly habit and temper, the man is but where he was before as to the real state and condition of his soul. Were your understanding so convinced of the evil nature and dreadful consequences of sin, and thy affections and will thereupon so effectually determined to choose and embrace the Lord Jesus, upon a considerate and thorough examination of his own terms and articles propounded in the gospel; then you might conclude the great design of it were accomplished upon your soul; but to rest in general convictions and transient affections without this is but to mock and deceive your own soul. Alas! this comes not home to the main end of the gospel.

Inference 2. Learn from hence the prodigious stubbornness and hardness of the hearts of men living daily under the gospel, which still resist it, though it bear upon them in part of it. You have heard how all its commands, promises, threatenings, and examples, bear directly and jointly upon the hearts of sinners to get open the will to Christ; and yet how few are there, comparatively, that obey and answer this great design of it! All these are like heaven's great artillery planted against the unbelief and stubbornness of the hearts of men, to batter down their carnal reasonings, overthrow their vain hopes, and open a fair passage for Christ into their souls. 2Cor. 10:4, 5, "For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds, casting down imaginations, and everything that exalts itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ." If a mount be raised, and many cannon planted thereon, and all played against the wall of a fort, thousands of shots made, and yet no breach, not one stone moved out of its place, you will say, that is a strong wall indeed. Beloved, God hath, as I may say, raised a mount in the gospel, planted the great ordnance of heaven upon it, discharged many dreadful volleys of threatenings; nay, he hath as it were, come under the walls of the unbelieving soul, with terms of grace and mercy, and yet no opening; Oh prodigious obstinacy! "We have piped unto you, but ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, but ye have not lamented," Matt. 11:17. Neither the sweet airs of gospel-grace, nor the dreadful thunders of the law, make any impression upon you. O what an obdurate rock is the heart by nature! Certainly, every Christian may see enough in others, and find enough in himself, without the help of other books to confute the Arminian doctrine, which so extols and flatters the nature of man. It is as possible to make an impression with your finger upon a wall of brass, as for the best sermon in the world, in its own strength, to make an effectual saving impression upon a sinner's will.

John Flavel, vol. 6 pg 191 Exposition of the Assembly's Catechism

Q. 6. To whom doth the Spirit apply Christ?

A. To those that were given him of the Father before the world was; Acts xiii. 48. And as many as were ordained to eternal life believed. John 14:17, Even the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; but ye know him, for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you. [How can anyone pray in the sinner's prayer that he believes in Jesus, etc., without a spiritual sight of him or a saving knowledge of him? He can't; he is self-deceived and therefore cannot receive Him until faith be bestowed. This is a wicked presumption and yields a fatal security as is seen in Question 8] So it is here again, the cart before the horse. Calvin writes, he [God] cannot be toughted with repentance, and his heart cannot undergo changes. Confessing the Impassible God, pg 157. Study this subject of impassibility!]

Q. 8. What learn we from hence?

A. What a destitute thing the soul is that is out of Christ; Rev. 3:18, Because thou sayest I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou are wretched and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked. [This is the state of mind of all unregenerate souls, a false peace; see Luke 11:21, "When a strong man, fully armed, guards his own palace, his goods are in peace."

And so the only way of salvation is by effectual vocation as seen in 1Cor. 1:30 and many other places, "But of Him you are in Christ Jesus, who became for us wisdom from God—and righteousness and sanctification and redemption—"

"Justifying faith is more properly called faith than acceptance, because the things received are spiritual and unseen, and because they are received as future, and entirely the free gift of God." Jonathan Edwards – Concerning Faith, p 589

John Gill explains

1 Corinthians 4:7

For who maketh thee to differ from another

This question, and the following, are put to the members of this church, who were glorying in, and boasting of the ministers under whom they were converted, and by whom they were baptized, to the neglect and contempt of others; when the apostle would have them consider, and whatever difference was made between them and others, was made, not by man, but God; that whatever good and benefit they had enjoyed under their respective ministers, were in a way of receiving, and from God; and therefore they ought not to glory in themselves, nor in their ministers, but in God, who had distinguished them by his favours:

whatever difference is made among men, is of God; it is he that makes them to differ from the rest of the creation; from angels, to whom they are inferior; and from beasts, to whom they are superior; and from one another in their person, size, shape, and countenance, which is a physical, or natural difference. It is God that makes them to differ from one another in things of a civil nature; as kings and subjects, masters and servants, high and low, rich and poor, bond and free, which may be called a political, or civil difference; and there is an ecclesiastical difference which God makes in his own people, who have gifts differing one from another; there are diversities of gifts, administrations, and operations among them, and all from the same spirit: but the grand distinction God has made among men, lies in his special, distinguishing, and everlasting love to some, and not others; in his choice of them in Christ unto everlasting salvation; in the gift of them to Christ in the eternal covenant; in the redemption of them by his blood; in his powerful and prevalent intercession for them; in God's effectual calling of them by his grace; in his resurrection of them from the dead to everlasting life, placing them at Christ's right hand, and their entrance into everlasting glory; when the distinction will be kept up, as in the above instances, throughout the endless ages of eternity; all which is owing, not to anything of man's, but to the free grace, sovereign will, and good pleasure of God.

And what hast thou that thou didst not receive?

whatever mercies and blessings men enjoy, they have in a way of receiving, and from God the Father of all mercies: all natural and temporal mercies are received from him; even such as respect the body, the make, form, and shape of it, perfection of limbs, health, strength, food, raiment, preservation of life, continuance in being, with all the comforts of it: and such as relate to the soul, its formation, which is by the father of spirits, its powers and faculties, natural light, reason, and understanding, all its endowments, abilities, all natural parts, and sharpness of wit; so that no man ought to glory in his wisdom, as if it was owing to himself, when it is all of God. All supernatural and spiritual blessings are received from God; such as a justifying righteousness, sanctifying grace, remission of sin, the new name of adoption, strength to perform good works, to bear and suffer reproach and persecution for Christ, and to persevere to the end, with a right and title to eternal glory.

Now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory as if thou hadst not received it?

To glory in any mercy, favour, or blessing received from God, as if it was not received from him, but as owing to human power, care, and industry, betrays wretched vanity, stupid and more than brutish ignorance, horrid ingratitude, abominable pride and wickedness; and is contrary to the grace of God, which teaches men humility and thankfulness. To God alone should all the blessings of nature, providence, and grace be ascribed; he ought to have all the glory of them; and to him, and him only, praise is due for them. That proud Arminian, Grevinchovius ^{F20}, in answer to this text, said,

``I make myself to differ; since I could resist God, and divine predetermination, but have not resisted, why may not I glory in it as of my own?''

Ignorance of Regenerating Grace, Costly

Now multitudes think they are really saved by saying a prayer and by making a profession, yet wholly ignorant of any sovereign work upon their hearts. Many remain deluded by this means and settled into a stupid security, remain asleep and expose themselves to many other delusions and fatal securities. Hence the great duty of Christians is to examine themselves, to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling, to use all diligence to make their call and election sure!

John Flavel, pg 104, Vol. 4 England's Duty

Look over Satan's kingdom, and you shall find a general stillness and quietness among his subjects; there is no trouble for sin, no strivings after salvation, no cryings out,

"What shall we do to be saved?" [Luke 11:21, "When a strong man, fully armed, guards his own palace, his goods are in peace."] Go into the crowds of carnal men and women, and you shall find them all intent and busy about other matters. How long shall you be in their company before you hear one groan for sin, or see one tear slide from their eyes on that account? Oh! What a marvellous thing is here! Do not their consciences know the guilt that lies upon them? Are they not aware of a day of reckoning which approaches? Yes, yes, these things are not hid from their consciences. What art then is used to keep them so still and quiet? Why, there are divers rattles to still the consciences of sinners, and they do it effectually. There are four causes and occasions of this wonderful stillness in the souls of sinners.

1. Ignorance of the nature of regenerating grace, taking that for regeneration, which is none of it; thus did the Jews, John 8:25, confidently affirm God to be their God, and yet they did not know him. How many poor ignorant creatures think there is no need of any other work of regeneration, but what passed upon them in baptism? They were born and baptized Christians, and that is enough, they think, to save them. Mat. 3:9, "We have Abraham as our father." They thought it sufficient that Abraham's blood ran in their veins, though there were not a spark of Abraham's faith kindled in their souls. The Lord forgive the sin of those men that lead poor souls into such fatal mistakes. Oh if men were but aware of the necessity of a greater and farther work to pass upon their souls than their baptism, common powerless profession, [e.g., the sinner's prayer] or the similar works which appear upon formal hypocrites, heaven and earth would ring with their cries. But ignorance of the nature and necessity of special regenerating grace, like a dose of opium casts the consciences of many into this deep sleep.

2. Freedom from grosser sins and pollutions of the world, stills and quiets the consciences of thousands; they have had a civil, sober, and fair education ; and though there be no grace and regeneration, yet what saints do they seem to themselves, being adorned with sobriety and civility! This stilled the conscience of the Pharisee, Luke xviii. 11, "God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican." Thus, like delicate Agag, they spruce up themselves with moral homolitical virtues, wherein many thousand Heathens were more gay than themselves; but justice will hew them to pieces as Agag was, for all their moral ornaments and endowments.

3. The strict performance of the external duties of religion quiets the consciences of many ; they question not but those that do so well shall fare well, and that God will never damn men and women that keep their church and say their prayers as they do. Thus the carnal Jews deluded themselves, crying, "The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord." As malefactors, in some of our neighboring kingdoms, fly to the church from the hand of justice, so do these; but God will pluck them from the horns of the altar, and convince them that the empty name of religion is no security from damnation.

4. Many consciences are still and quieted in a natural, sinful state, by misinterpreting the voices of providence; it may be God prospers your earthly affairs, succeeds and smiles upon your undertakings; and this you conclude must be a token of his love and favour. But alas! this is a great mistake, the Lord gives you better evidences of his love than these; for who prospers more in the world than wicked men? And who are more crossed than the people of God? Read Job 21 and Ps. 73 and compare both with Eccl. 9:1 and you will quickly find the vanity of all hopes built upon such a foundation.

However, by such things as these are, the god of this world blinds the eyes of multitudes.

Upon the Ingrafting of Fruit-trees

code232

Of his own will he brought us forth by the word of truth, that we should be a kind of firstfruits of his creatures. James 1:18 ESV

You will know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes from thorn bushes or figs from thistles? Even so, every good tree bears good fruit, but a bad tree bears bad fruit. A good tree cannot bear bad fruit, nor can a bad tree bear good fruit. Every tree that does not bear good fruit is cut down and thrown into the fire. Therefore by their fruits you will know them.

Matthew 7:16-20 NKJV

More scriptural evidence that the sinner's prayer is built on sand, proceeding from natural principles, from the corrupt stock of Adam which corrupts all that comes forth, even though it looks like good fruit, i.e., sincere, humble, etc. He who is unconverted, is still in Adam, is a bad tree from which nothing good, nothing holy, nothing pleasing to God, can proceed; making any kind of prayer to God for anything, highly provoking, and presumptuous. How this is so, Flavel explains below. Additional comments by Elisha Coles.

*Ungrafted trees can never bear good fruit;
Nor we, till grafted on a better root.
John Flavel, Husbandry Spiritualized, p 141, Vol. 5*

OBSERVATION

A WILD tree naturally springing up in the wood or hedge, and never grafted or removed from its native soil, may bear some fruit, and that fair and beautiful to the eye ; but it will give you no content at all in eating, being always harsh, sour, and unpleasant to the taste; but if such a stock be removed into a good soil, and grafted with a better kind, it may become a good tree, and yield store of choice and pleasant fruit.

APPLICATION.

UNREGENERATE men, who never were acquainted with the mystery of spiritual union with Jesus Christ, but still grow upon on their natural root, old Adam, may, by the force and power of natural principles, bring forth some fruit, which, like the wild hedge fruit we speak of, may, indeed, be fair and pleasant to the eyes of men, but God takes no pleasure at all in it; it is sour, harsh, and distasteful to him, because it springs not from the Spirit of Christ, Isa. 1:13, "I cannot away with it, it is iniquity," etc. But that I may not entangle the thread of my discourse, I shall (as in the former chapters) set before you a parallel betwixt the best fruits of natural men, and those of a wild ungrafted tree. [Already you are seeing why men think the sinner's prayer is ok because it looks like good fruit from the outward looks of it, which lends credibility to this prayer and so beguiles many into trusting in it. The fact is, that nothing good, i.e., holy and acceptable to God, no matter how good it looks, can come from a bad tree, Matt. 7:16, above. The tree must be made good through regeneration.]

1. The root that bears this wild fruit is a degenerate root, and that is the cause of all this sourness and harshness in the fruit it bears; it is the seed of some better tree accidentally blown, or cast into some waste and bad soil, where not being manured and ordered aright, it is turned wild. So all the fruits of unregenerate men flow from the first Adam, a corrupt and degenerate root; he was indeed planted a right seed, but soon turned a wild and degenerate plant; he being the root from which every man naturally springs, corrupts all the fruit that any man bears from him. It is observed by Gregory pertinently to my present purpose, Genus humanum in parente primo, velut in radice putruit; Mankind was putrefied in the root of its first parent; Matt. 7:18, "A corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit."

2. This corrupt root spoils the fruit, by the transmission of its sour and naughty sap into all the branches and fruits that grow upon it; they suck no other nourishment, but what the root affords them, and that being bad, spoils all; [all prayers, works, etc.] for the same cause and reason, no mere natural or unregenerate man can ever do one holy or acceptable action, because the corruption of the root is in all those actions. The necessity of our drawing corruption into all our actions, from this cursed root Adam, is expressed by a quick and smart interrogation. Job xiv. 4, "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one." The sense of it is well delivered us (by .Mr. Caryl, in loc.) This question (saith he) may undergo a twofold construction. First, thus. Who can bring a morally clean person out of a person originally unclean ? and so he lays his hand upon his birth sin. Or, Secondly, which speaks to my purpose, it may refer to the action of the same man; man being unclean, cannot bring forth a clean thing; i.e., a clean or holy action; that which is originated is like its original. And that this sour sap of the first stock (I mean Adam's sin) is transmitted into all mankind, not only corrupting their fruit, but ruining and withering all the branches, the apostle shows us in that excellent parallel betwixt the two Adam's, Rom. 5:1, "Wherefore, as by one man [one, not only in individuo, sed "in specie, one representing the whole root or stock,] sin entered "into the world;" not by imitation only, but by propagation; and this brought death and ruin upon all the branches.

3. Although these wild hedge-fruits be unwholesome and unpleasant to the taste, yet they are fair and beautiful to the eye; a man that looks upon them, and doth not know what fruit it is, would judge it by its show and colour, to be excellent fruit; [that is the deception and self-deceiving properties of the sinner's prayer!] for it makes a fairer show oftentimes than the best and most wholesome fruit doth; even so, these natural gifts and endowments which some unregenerate persons have, seem exceeding fair to the eye, and a fruit to be desired. What excellent qualities have some mere natural men and women! What a winning affability, humble condescension, meekness, righteousness, ingenuous tenderness and sweetness of nature! [which is why those who say the sinner's prayer look so convincing and sincere] As it was (hyperbolically enough) said of one. In hoc homine, non peccavit Ada: Adam never sinned in this man; meaning that he excelled the generality of Adam's children in sweetness of temper and natural endowments. What curious phantasies, nimble wits, solid judgments, tenacious memories, rare elocution, etc., are to be found among mere natural men ! by which they are assisted in discoursing, praying, preaching and writing to the admiration of such as know them. But that which is highly esteemed of men, is abomination to God, Luke

xvi. 15. It finds no acceptance with him, because it springs from that cursed root of nature, and is not the production of his own Spirit. [that's the sum of it.]

4. If such a stock were removed into a better soil and grafted with a better kind, it might bring forth fruit pleasant and grateful to the husbandman; and if such persons (before described) were but regenerated and changed in their spirits and principles, what excellent and useful persons would they be in the church of God? And then their fruits would be sweet and acceptable to him. One observes of Tertullian, Origen, and Jerome, that they came into Canaan laden with Egyptian gold, i.e., they came into the church full of excellent human learning, which did Christ much service.

5. When the husbandman cuts down his woods or hedges, he cuts down these crab stocks with the rest, because he values them not any more than the thorns and brambles among which they grow; and as little will God regard or spare these natural branches, how much soever they are laden with such fruit. The threatening is universal, John iii. 3, "Except you be regenerate, and born again, you cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven." And again, Heb. 12:14, "Without holiness no man (be his natural gifts never so excellent) shall see God." [an unregenerate sinners saying the sinner's prayer has not holiness yet; he is still a bad tree. So how can see even see the object (Christ) of his so called faith? He can't! It is just a fancy in his mind; a God of his own making. The true God and Christ, he is still blind to and he still hates, etc.] Embellished nature, is nature still, "That which is born of the flesh, is but flesh," however it be set off with advantage to the eye of man.

REFLECTIONS

A Presumptuous Soul's Reflection

By Elisha Coles

A Practical Discourse of God's Sovereignty, Ch3

1. To what purpose then do I glory in my natural accomplishments? Though I have a better an nature than some others have, yet it is a cursed nature still. These sweet qualities and excellent gifts, do only hide, but not kill the corruption of nature, I am but a rotten post gilded over, and all my duties but hedge-fruity which on, God makes no account of. O cunning thought! That the unlearned shall rise and take heaven, when I with all my excellent gifts shall descend into hell. Heaven was not made for scholars, as such, but for believers; as one said, when they comforted him upon his deathbed, that he was a knowing man, a doctor of divinity; O, said he, I shall not appear before God as a doctor, but as a man; I shall stand upon a level with the most illiterate in the day of judgment. What does it avail me that I have a nimble wit, while I have none to do myself good? Will my judge be charmed with a rhetorical tongue? Things will not be carried in that world, as they are in this. If I could, with Berengarius, discourse de omni scibili, of everything that is knowable; or with Solomon, unravel nature from the cedar, to the hyssop, what would this advantage me, as long as I am ignorant of Christ, and the mystery of regeneration? My head hath often ached with study, but when did my heart ache for sin? Methinks, O my soul! thou trimmest up thyself in these natural ornaments, to appear before God, as much as that delicate Agag did, when he was to come before Samuel, and fondly conceited [effect of sinner's prayer, a fatal security] that these things would procure favour, or, at least, pity from him; but yet think not, for all that, the bitterness of death is past. Say not within thyself, Will God cast such a one as I into hell? Shall a man of such parts be damned? Alas? Justice will hew thee to pieces, as Samuel did that spruce king, and not abate thee the least for these things; many thousand branches of nature, as fair and fruitful as thyself, are now blazing in hell, because not transplanted by regeneration into Christ; and if he spared not them, neither will he spare thee. Flavel, p 141

"O see the vileness of thy nature, and the necessity of a change to pass upon it! First make the tree good, and then his fruit good; a new nature will produce new words and actions. To bind your souls with vows and resolutions, while you are strangers to a regenerate work, is to bind Samson with green withs, whilst his locks remain upon his head." [green withs = undried twigs or crude vegetable stalks, easily broken] Flavel, pg 314 Vol. V

At the latter day Christ will know none but such as have made "their robes white in the blood of the Lamb." All hangby's and ivyclaspers will then be shaken off, and those only retained that have his substance in them. Many shall come, and plead their works, what they have been, and what they have done [or what they professed in a sinner's prayer]; and their old hypocrisy will be so immoveable and impudent, that they will even expostulate the matter with him; "Have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name cast out devils, and done many wonderful works!" Matthew 7:22, of whom our Lord will profess, that he knows them not; "no, nor he never knew them." verse 23. His own he knows, by their likeness to him: he knows, and cannot but know, the members of his body: "my sheep I know, but who are ye?" will he then say to all that are but professing members of him; which will (indeed) be a doleful conclusion of their groundless (though specious) confidence: look to it therefore in time.

The Saving Knowledge of Christ

It is the gift of God, not of works, not of any effort on man's part; he is wholly passive in his conversion, regarding the very first act of faith. Prior to this, man can do nothing to effect his salvation.

For who ^[a] makes you differ from another? And what do you have that you did not receive? Now if you did indeed receive it, why do you boast as if you had not received it? 1Cor. 4:7

SAVING KNOWLEDGE NO. 782

A SERMON

DELIVERED ON LORD'S-DAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 24, 1867,
 BY C. H. SPURGEON,
 AT THE METROPOLITAN TABERNACLE, NEWINGTON.

“Jesus answered and said unto her, If you knew the gift of God, and who it is that says to you, Give me to drink; you would have asked of him, and he would have given you living water.” John 4:10.

<https://www.spurgeongems.org/vols13-15/chs782.pdf>

THE matter will turn, this morning, upon those few words, “If you knew the gift of God.” The woman of Samaria, who was met by our Lord at the well, was an object of electing love, but she was not yet regenerated. One difficulty alone lay in the way—she was an honest ingenuous spirit, willing to receive the truth, perfectly willing to be obedient to it. But ignorance lay like a stone before the door of her sepulcher. “If you knew the gift of God,” says Christ, “then you would have asked, and I would have given.” There was the one barrier. If that could be removed, she would be a saved soul.

The impediment which lay so much in her way was ignorance concerning the Lord Jesus Himself. She was not an uninstructed woman. She was evidently acquainted at least with portions of Biblical history. She could speak of “Father Jacob, which gave us the well, and drank thereof himself, and his children, and his cattle.” She was versed certainly in the peculiarities of her sect. “How is it that you, being a Jew, ask for a drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria? for the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans.”

She was equally well-acquainted with the hopes which were common to her people and to the Jewish nation—“I know that Messiah comes, which is called Christ: when he is come, he will tell us all things.” She was not, therefore, kept out of the kingdom on account of ignorance. In these matters she was better instructed. I am afraid there are some of you—for, alas! in this age there are hundreds of people who are educated in everything except their Bibles—who could answer questions upon most sciences, but concerning Christ crucified, they know not even so much as the very elements. But the point which kept this woman, I say, out of the kingdom was this, that she did not know

Christ. She knew not “the gift of God,” and who it was that said to her, “Give me to drink.”

And this, indeed, is enough to keep any of us out of peace, and life, and joy, for, until we know God in human flesh, we cannot find peace and comfort. The great riddle of, “What must I do to be saved?” remains unsolved till we know Christ and are found in Him. We may go about, and we may study this, and that, and the other, but we shall remain fools in the matters of eternal salvation until we come and sit at the feet of the great Teacher, and know Him, and are known of Him.

I shall essay, this morning, as God may help me, to speak with you upon spiritual ignorance, upon what would follow if that ignorance were removed, hoping that I may be allowed to say a few stirring things to some of you, to induce you to get rid of any ignorance which now bars you out of peace, and that others of you who know the truths of Jesus Christ, may be more earnest to tell to the unenlightened what you know yourselves, lest they should perish and their blood should be required at your hands.

I shall commence, then, this morning, by some few remarks upon the gift of God and the knowledge of it. And then, secondly, I shall turn to the “if” of the text, and what then? And thirdly, I shall take up the “if” of the text once more, and show what it has to do with the believer.

I. First, our text speaks of A GIFT AND OF THE KNOWLEDGE OF IT.

The latter half of the verse informs us that the gift of God is no other than the Man who spoke to the woman and said, “Give me to drink.” In fact, Jesus Christ is “God’s unspeakable gift” for whom we should daily and hourly lift up our hearts in gratitude to God. Christ was God’s gift to the fallen seed of man. Long ere this world was made, He ordained in His eternal purpose that Christ should be the covenant Head of His elect, their Surety, and their Redeemer: He gave Christ to us before He spread the starry sky. He was the Father’s goodly gift when the fullness of time was come. Many promises had heralded the Master’s coming, and at last He appeared, a babe of a span long in His mother’s arms.

His holy life and His suffering death were the gifts of God to us, for “He spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all.” To the whole company of God’s elect, Christ

Jesus is the priceless boon which the Father's love has bestowed upon them. And when you and I receive Jesus Christ into our heart, He evermore comes as a gift. The faith by which we receive Him is a gift—the gift of God is faith, but Jesus Christ Himself never comes to a soul that has faith, as a reward. that's key; see Owen's comment on this. see end of [code293, or code250 – on the 8th page]

No man ever received Christ by the works of the law or the deeds of the flesh. It is not possible, my brethren, that the highest and most perfect obedience should ever deserve such a reward as the gift of the Son of God. Conceive of any virtue, and you will not dare to blaspheme so much as to think that it could deserve the death of Christ. No, the price is too great to be a recompense for any of our exertions [i.e., any work of our own doings, e.g., sinner's prayer, sacraments of any kind, etc.] . It is the spontaneous boon of heaven given to us, not on the footing of the law [upon which the sinner's prayer is founded, it is a legal act from a legal spirit or principle, as opposed to an evangelical spirit from a new principle of spiritual life, saving faith, true love for God.], but on the grounds of the sovereign grace of God, who gives as He wills [Rom. 9:16] to the unworthy sons of men.

If you come to God with a price in your hands, you shall not have Christ. If you come to God thinking to force your way to heaven, or supposing that you could even contribute towards your entrance there, you shall find the gates of the law shutting you out forever. But if you come humbly penitent [which only converted people can do], confessing your soul-poverty, and plead with the Father that He would give to you His Son, you shall receive the gift of God into your soul most freely. “The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life.” “We are justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus.” Man is dead in sin, but Christ is a gift bringing life to the dead.

The text uses the definite article, “If you knew the gift of God,” setting Christ as God's gift beyond all other gifts. True, the light of the sun is the gift of God to us. There is not a piece of bread we eat, nor a drop of water we drink, but what it may be called the gift of God. But the gift which comprehends, excels, and sanctifies all other gifts, is the gift of Jesus Christ to the sons of men. I wish I had the power to speak as I should of this gift, but I am reminded by God's Word that it is "unspeakable." "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift."

I can comprehend God's giving the earth to the children of men, giving to Adam and his seed dominion over all the works of His hands. I think I can understand God's giving heaven to His people, and permitting them to dwell at His right hand forever and ever. But that God should give the only begotten, "very God of very God," to take upon Himself our nature, and in that nature actually to be "obedient unto death, even the death of the cross"—this we cannot understand, and even the angels with their mightier intellects cannot grasp it fully. They look into it, but as they gaze they desire to see more, for even they feel they cannot search this out to perfection. An unfathomable depth of divine love is there in the condescending lovingkindness which gave Jesus Christ to die for us when we were yet sinners.

Beloved, it is an unrivalled gift. God has given to us such a treasure, that if heaven and earth were melted down, the price could not buy another like to Him. All eternity cannot yield such a person as the Lord Jesus. Eternal God, You have no equal! and becoming Son of Man, Your condescension has nothing that can rival it. Oh, what a gift! You cannot conceive of anything that you can put side by side with it. It is a gift, beloved, which comprehends all things within itself. "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?"

Get Christ and you have the pardon of sin, the justification of your person. In the bowels of that redemption you shall find sanctification, adoption, regeneration. Every covenant gift is wrapped up in Christ Jesus. "A bundle of myrrh is my well-beloved unto me," not one sprig of it, but a whole bundle. All things that can possibly be needed for the Christian for time and for eternity, are given to him in the person of the Lord Jesus.

And as this gift comprehends all, so it sweetens all. Temporal mercies without Christ are like ciphers without a figure. But when you have these temporal mercies, and Christ stands in front of them, oh, what an amount they make! Temporal mercies without Christ are unripe fruit. But when Christ shines upon them, they grow mellow and sweet. Temporal mercies without Christ are the dry rivers—Christ fills them to the brim. They are like trees with leaves only, but Christ comes to give them fruit upon which we may live.

Brethren, what are all the mercies of this life to us without Christ? Would they not make our souls hunger? “Whom have I in heaven but you? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside you.” The full wine vat, or the barn that needs to be enlarged, what would these be without a Savior? O God, take them all away if You will, but give us more of Christ. Fill our hearts with the love of Christ, and You may empty the cupboard and purse if You will. Mercies are blessed when we have Christ with them, but if Christ be gone, they are but empty vanities.

Our Lord Jesus Christ is a gift [if we ask for it (assuming we know it, which we don't as the woman did not), before we actually ask, then it is no more a gift but a debt that God owes us. As Martin Luther said, “No one can give himself faith; it is a gift of God.”] most precious moreover, my brethren, because he who gets it is sure that he has the favor of God. Other mercies do not necessarily bring with them God’s favor. God gives the most of this world full often to wicked men. He pours the husks out to the swine. As for His children, He often wrings out to them a full cup of bitterness. This world is not our portion, as we know right well. The wicked have their portion here, and they are full of fatness. Their houses are full of store, and they leave the rest of their substance unto their babes.

But get Christ, and you have God’s favor—you are sure of it. This is “The blessing of the LORD that makes rich, and he adds no sorrow with it.” It is a right-hand and a left-hand blessing. Get Christ, and it is all blessing and no curse whatsoever. If you have Christ, as sure as you live, God loves you, for there never was a soul that had Christ’s name written upon its forehead but what eternal love had inscribed it there, and in that writing had given a sure evidence and pledge of love that could not end.

If you have Christ, again, you must prize the gift, because this is a token of your everlasting salvation. Hell never did enclose within its gates a single soul that rested on the cross of Christ, and it never shall. If you have Christ, you have the melodies of heaven, you have the goodly land that “flows with milk and honey.” You shall never bear the wrath of God, Christ has borne it for you. You shall never hear it said, “Depart, you cursed,” for Christ has said it, “You are blessed forever and ever,” yea, and you shall be blessed.

We shall now turn to the further thought which stands linked to the one I have thus tried to lay before you.

In the text knowledge is put with the gift, “If you knew the gift of God.” Yonder woman in the wilderness is sorely vexed, her heart is ready to break. She has left the abode of her master, and journeyed far. She is faint herself, but a far greater trouble depresses her. Her child, her only boy, lies under yonder shrubs to die for want of a drop of water. Do you see the anguish depicted on her face? Do you hear her bitter cries? Ah, woman, you may well wipe your eyes, your distress is causeless. You have room for thanksgiving, and not for sorrow. Yonder is a spring of water, dip your pitcher and refresh your child. But beloved, what was the use of the spring of water to her if she could not see it? Till her eyes were opened, Hagar could not see that God had provided for her—she must suffer and her child must die till she could perceive the supply.

It is so with the gift of God. Beloved, until we know Christ, we famish for Him, but we find no relief. A sense of need is a very blessed work of grace, but it will not save you. You must get beyond knowing your need, you must perceive, accept, and enjoy the supply, or else assuredly you will perish, none the less because of your knowledge of your need. Now, a knowledge of Christ is the gift of God. No man ever knew Christ experientially and truly, except by the operation of the Holy Spirit upon his heart. In vain for those who are the advocates of free agency and human power to talk [will worship, the foundation of the sinner's prayer], but wherever you meet with a gracious spirit [a converted soul], you will be sure to find the confession that it was as much the work and gift of God to give us faith as to give us the object of faith—

“’Twas the same love that spread the feast,
That sweetly forced us in.
Else we had still refused to taste,
And perish’d in our sin.”

If God did nothing more for men than provide a Savior, and leave it for them to accept, if He never operated upon their souls and affections by His Holy Spirit, not one of Adam’s race would ever enter into eternal life. [Why? Because unconverted man is unwilling, blind, bound by sin and Satan, etc. He must be set free by the Spirit, etc.] If you would have a knowledge of Christ, you must have it through the Holy Spirit, for this comes not by the works of the law [i.e., a prayer, a legal act], nor by the efforts of the flesh. That which is born of the flesh is still flesh, and only that which is born of the Spirit is spirit, and can make you acquainted with spiritual truth.

A saving knowledge of Christ is always personal. The man does not take it at second hand, he does not get it from what his mother told him. She may be the instrument, the happy instrument, but the man learns for himself, or else he does not know savingly. Beware, beloved, of copying your religion out of other men's books. It must be written with the pen of the Holy Spirit upon the fleshy tablet of your own heart [part of regeneration], or else you know nothing aright.

Observe also, that as this knowledge is spiritual, so, as it is spoken of in the text, it immediately concerns Christ. All other knowledge, whatever it may be, will fail to save unless we know the gift of God, unless we are clearly acquainted with the person of the Lord Jesus Christ. [And this must be given to us (freely, i.e., by free grace, not of ourselves, but by the will of God just as Christ was revealed to Peter by the Father, not by flesh and blood...Matt. 16:17)] I say, with the person, for let me insist upon it, it is necessary for you and me to rest wholly upon the person, work, and righteousness of Jesus. You may know a great deal about His offices, you may have read much about what He did, but you must pass through all these, and get to Himself—"Come unto ME," says He, "all you who labor and are heavy laden." At His feet your soul must cast itself down, kissing the Son lest He be angry. Before Him, the Great High Priest, you must present yourselves, desiring to be sprinkled with His precious blood, and to be saved in Him. Remember He is a man like yourselves. Though "God over all, blessed forever," yet is He man of the substance of His mother. Let your soul advance to Him in thought this morning, lay hold upon Him!

If you cannot put your finger into the print of the nails, and your hand into His side literally, with Thomas, yet do it spiritually. Remember, it is to know Christ and His cross, which is the saving knowledge. And everything short of this will leave you short of eternal life. Brethren, it must be spiritual knowledge. Any acquaintance with Christ that can be derived from pictures, or that may come to us through the use of outward symbols, will be all valueless. We must know Christ, not after the flesh, by the eye and ear, we must comprehend Him by our inmost souls being acquainted with Him. [But this is only revealed by the Spirit.]

Our heart must trust Him. Put away the crucifix! Let your soul wear the cross, not your body! Hang not up the image of Christ on the wall, hang it upon the walls of your heart, there let His image be stored. Bear about you the marks of the Lord Jesus Christ in your life and character, and let your contemplations and thoughts be continually exercised about Him. [All of which is the fruit of the Spirit] This is the kind of knowledge of Christ—heart-knowledge, spiritual fellowship, the knowledge of the most vital part of the man, his soul, his newborn spirit.

Now, such knowledge as this, when God has once given it to us, becomes very operative upon the entire man. [aka, a new spiritual principle of life] He has found the great secret, and he feels inclined to tell it. He has learned a great mystery, and it at once affects all the parts and passions of his nature, making a new man of him. This knowledge he never loses—he may forget much, but he never can forget Christ if he has once known Him. Like the dying saint who had forgotten his wife, forgotten his children, forgotten his own name, and yet smiled sweetly when they asked him if he remembered Christ Jesus.

This is printed on the believer's heart—the warp and woof of his being bears this, like a golden thread, right through its center. Jesus, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, and let my right hand forget its cunning, but never shall my heart forget You who has given Yourself for me! This is the knowledge which we should desire, the knowledge spoken of in the text. Desire it, I beseech you, above gold, yes, seek it above much fine gold. [hence Paul commands us to seek him...to grow in this knowledge]

O you who have it not, open your mouths and pant after it! Hunger and thirst to know Christ, and take no rest, and get no satisfaction till you do know Him! If you ask me how this can be, I remind you that God alone can reveal Him to you, but yet you are to use the means. “Search the Scriptures, for in them you think you have eternal life,” and these are they which testify of Christ. Attend a Christ honoring ministry! If you have been sitting under any minister who does not extol Christ, and lift Him up before you, however eloquent and intelligent he may be, leave his ministry, it is not fit for poor dying souls to listen to.

You that need salvation can only find it in Christ. Seek, therefore, a ministry that is full of Christ. Christ the first, and Christ the midst, and Christ the last, and without end. Depend upon it, as men would think it folly to deal at a shop where the bread (so called) was not bread, where the food that was given was so adulterated as to yield no nutriment, so is it a sin on our part if we do not seek out the pure unadulterated milk of the Word, and endeavor to grow thereby.

Oh! how many souls are poisoned by listening to a ministry that is not full of Christ! But oh, if you do get a ministry that savors of the Lord Jesus, hear with both your ears, drink it in. Be like the thirsty furrows that do not refuse a single drop of heaven's rain. Receive with meekness the living Word. Add to this an earnest prayer for illumination. Wait upon God each day, and say, "Show me Your Son. Lo, I would know Christ. I would know Him so as to be saved by Him." And remember, "He that seeks finds; and to him that knocks it shall be opened," "Ask and it shall be given you." They who seek the Lord shall in due time be found of Him. "He that calls upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." [Keep in mind, though God commands that we obey God, seek God, believe on Christ, this does not mean that we have it ourselves to do this; we do not; the Spirit must work it! There is much to say on this. God's salvation, his revealing the Son, is all left up to him; the council of his own will, not man's will in doing, seeking, etc. It is monergistic (God alone) as opposed to synergistic (God and man working together).]

II. The first word of the text is "If." "If you knew the gift of God." "IF." AND WHAT THEN?

The "if" seems to me to wear a black side. It supposes that there are many who do not know "the gift of God." Alas! no supposition, but a fearful fact. Dear hearer, may I ask you to look to your own soul now? You are a church member. You have been considered to be a Christian from your youth till the present time. At least you have reckoned yourself to be so. But ask yourself if you now know the gift of God. Is Jesus Christ all in all to you? Do you rest on Him as the unbuttressed pillar of your confidence? Do you love Him? Is He your Master? Are you conformed unto His image? Have you ever spoken to Him? Has He ever had communion with you—supping with you, and you with Him?

As the Lord my God lives, before whom I stand, if you know not Christ, your high profession is but a painted pageant to go to hell in. Your fancied experience is a will-o'- the-wisp leading you to destruction, and all your fond hopes shall come tumbling about your ears, like a house that is founded on sand, which totters in the day of storm. I pray you, then, dear hearers, as you would be right at the last, make heart-searching inquiries now, and let this be the question, Whether you know the gift of God in your soul or no?

But we will deal better with the bright side, knowing that there are many here who do not know the grace of God at all, it is a mercy to think that they may know it, for the “If you knew” implies that some who do not know it yet may know it before they die. And thank God, some of you shall know it, and glorious results will follow at once. “If you knew the gift of God,” my dear hearer, you who are not yet converted, what a change would come over you! Let me single you out.

You are here, this morning, quite uninterested in religion. You have come here this morning out of curiosity to look at the large assembly and hear the strange preacher, but religion has no interest in it for you. Life and death, and all the problems that connect themselves with time and eternity, are nothing to you. You are a butterfly, flying from flower to flower. You have no deeper sense of things than a man of the world, who thinks to live and die, and so to come to his end.

Ah! but if you knew Christ, it would soon be different with you. That vain mind of yours would soon be full of thoughts. These worldly toys which are now so engrossing would then be put into their proper places. You would become thoughtful, and let me tell you, you would become infinitely happier than you are now, for your present ease is a hollow thing. You are afraid to try it. You dare not sit down and think for an hour of your own state and future—you know you dare not. But oh! “if you knew the gift of God,” you could endure sober thought, yea, it would be your delight. And as for the future, you would dare to look into it. Yea, it would be your greatest comfort to anticipate the glories which God has prepared for them that love Him.

As I think on some of you indifferent ones, I could gladly weep over you, not merely because of the hell which will be your portion, but because of the heaven which you are losing even now. A heaven below is to know Christ, and you are missing this. Man of pleasure! Christ is pleasure! Men who would have ease and peace! Christ is the true ease, and if you knew Him, you would find true peace.

Possibly there may be some few in this assembly to whom religion is not even a matter of indifference, but worse—they have persecuted it. They are accustomed to vent their sharpest wit upon anything religious. To them, godliness is always known by the name of cant, and if a man be known to profess religion, he is at once the butt of every sneer.

Ah, but if you knew Christ, you would not do this. Saul of Tarsus sought much the destruction of the people of God, but when once Christ had said to Him, “Why persecute you me?” and Saul understood that Christ was no other than God over all, the Redeemer of men, then he said, “Lord, what will you have me do?”

Ah, persecutor! You would be just as warm for the cause as you are hot against it if you did but know Christ. Man, you would not have the heart to spit into the face of the Crucified. You would never crucify Him afresh who died for His enemies. You would never be so cruel and barbarous as to trample on the members of Christ when you know that Christ, out of pure love, suffered for the sons of men. “If you knew the gift of God,” persecutor, it would be otherwise with you than it is now.

Ay, and there are some here who would never persecute, but nevertheless they trifle with religion. Many more belong to this class than to the two I have just mentioned. I know many of you are impressed when we are delivering the truth earnestly, and you vow what you do not pay, and you promise reformations which are never made. Ah, you triflers, you who halt between two opinions, who, like Felix, would wait for a more convenient season, “if you knew the gift of God,” this morning would be the convenient season.

Oh! if God did but give you an understanding [1John 5:20] of the preciousness and sweetness of Christ, you would not delay! Who delays to be crowned when the time has come for him to receive a kingdom? What heir would ever postpone the day in which he should enter into the heritage? Does the bridegroom put off the hour of his marriage? Do men wish their happiness to be removed far away? Oh, no! And if you knew what Christ would be to your soul, and what joy and blessedness you would have in receiving Him, you would say, “Now is my time as it is God’s time. O God, I give myself to You!” Trifler, may you yet know the gift of God!

Alas, there are some here who are not exactly triflers. They have serious thoughts, but they have some sin which they cannot give up. I cannot particularize cases, but there are such here. There are men here who would be Christ's, but the habit of taking intoxicating drink to excess clings hard to them. Have I not talked to some of you, who have with tears confessed the sin, and longed to be delivered from the snare, but you could not? Your besetting sins are too dear to you for you to give them up. With some it may be filthier vices still.

With others it is the thought, "Religion is too severe. To follow Christ is to give up so much. I must have a little more indulgence. I must for a little time at any rate drink of the wine of Satan's banquet." Ah, "if you knew the gift of God," you would give up the sweetest thing earth ever knew, to know the greater sweetness of Christ.

What! Will you put my Lord and Master in comparison with the painted harlot of this wicked world? Will you put the solid gold of heaven's kingdom in contrast with the filthy draff and dross of this world's merchandise? O my Master, You are no more to be compared to the riches and enjoyments of life, than the sun is to be likened to a glowworm. Let Christ arise in your soul, and all your starry joys will be gone. [Again, though this be the command, the Spirit must work it. We, in the flesh, cannot and will not. Rom. 8:7-8, etc.] You will find this one great joy fills your spirit to the brim and overflows, so that there is an exceeding and eternal weight of glory too great for your spirit to be able to compass. If you knew the gift of God, voluptuary, you would turn from your tables to feed on Him. You would leave your gilded couches of pomp and vanity, and all the world calls good or great. You would leave it all, turning from ashes to feed upon angels' food, even upon Christ the Lord, and the Redeemer of men.

There is another class here present, represented by some few, who would gladly be saved, but they fear they are too bad. They think that they could never be saved after delaying so long and sinning so foully. "If you knew the gift of God," you would never think that, for my Lord Jesus loves great sinners. "This Man," it is said, "receives sinners, and eats with them."

When the woman who had been a sinner washed His feet with her tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head, He did not utter an upbraiding word. The Lord is gentle, and full of compassion and tenderness and truth. He came not with a sword to slay, but

He came to be slain Himself, that we might not die. You have only to come to Him, and let this encourage you. He has said it, “Him that comes unto me, I will in no wise cast out.” He cannot cast you out. He must receive you. His word binds Him to it. He cannot deny Himself, and therefore He cannot refuse you.

If it were proper for us to prolong this addressing of separate characters, I think there would be in this suggestion, “If you knew the gift of God,” something for everyone. I am sure if any of us who are now at enmity to God did but know what Christ is, if they could but know as with the knowledge I have before described, the person of the Lord Jesus, faith would follow immediately. [It is by faith, saving faith, the gift in Eph. 2:8, that is bestowed or given to us, that we come to this knowledge!] We should trust our souls to God, and feel safe in the hands of God’s appointed propitiation. Faith would be sure to be followed by prayer—we would cry to Him whom we now know, and prayer would be followed by His blessing.

At the heels of that would come holy love to Him. And holy love would prompt us to serve. Service would be followed by increasing strength, and increasing strength would augment daily joy, till we should go up Jacob’s ladder, gaining virtue after virtue by the power of the Son of God, till we were meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. Each point in Christ’s character, if known, would work good in us.

For instance, “if you knew the gift of God,” that He came to save the vilest of the vile, how could you doubt or despair because of your sins? If you knew that the salvation of Christ is finished by Himself, and not by us, how could you dream of adding thereto, or think it necessary to bring your own feelings, and frames, and doings, to make the salvation complete which Christ has finished altogether apart from you? If you knew that Christ never forsook His people, would you be trembling and fearing lest in the hour of temptation He should fail you? If you knew how suitable Christ is to you, how ready He is to receive you, how full of love He is to all His people, how He feels in His heart all your pains and all your groans, how His honor is bound up in your salvation, how He has pledged Himself to bring every one of the saints to the Father’s right hand—if you knew all this, Christian, you would live above your doubts, and fears, and feelings. You would live a heavenly life, like one who has seen Christ, and then has been made like unto Him.

Beloved, if we were to take a walk, this morning, through the streets of London, how many cases we would see where we might say sorrowfully of the persons we looked upon, “Alas for you! If you knew the grace of God, what a difference would come over you!”

Perhaps at this very hour you will find the great mass of the working men in London in their shirt sleeves. It has not struck them at all that going to a place of worship is desirable. They will be lounging about. The penny paper has been taken, and they have begun to read that. But as yet the public house is not open—they feel as if there is nothing in the world to do but just lounge about and let the time run on.

Ah! stepping into such a house you might say, “If you knew the gift of God, your Sabbaths would assume quite a different appearance. You would not talk about pharisaic Sabbatarians, and the strictness of shutting up the house of drink, and only opening the house of worship, but you would feel the Sabbath a delight, and the holy of the Lord honorable. Instead of wasting your time, it would seem to you as though Sabbaths were too short, and opportunities and means of grace too few. If you knew the gift of God, it would be otherwise with you, working man.”

Step into the next church or chapel, I do not care which, and observe the multitudes of the people going through the worship with mere formality, confessing what they never felt, and professing to believe what they know nothing of. [which is the essential problem of the sinner's prayer!] Ah, we might look into the face of each worshipper and say, “If you knew the gift of God, you would give up this formalism, and worship God in spirit and in truth.” We need not go far. There are many of you here in that state. May you know the gift of God, and forget formalities, and worship God in truth. At some places you may step into the church or meeting house, and listen to the minister—an eloquent address, but altogether Christless—no care about the souls of men, no dealing with human consciences. Pompous sentences, sounding periods, high flights, climaxes, and I know not what oratorical flower, but nothing concerning the weighty matter of eternity, about the undying soul, and the precious cleansing blood. Ah! preacher, “if you knew the gift of God,” if you had in your soul any sense of the preciousness of the salvation of Christ, you would preach after another fashion.

Step in where the Ritualist has dressed himself in all his gaudy apparel, flaunting like a peacock before God Himself, and you may well say to him, "If you knew the gift of God" you would lay aside these fooleries and come before God sooner in sackcloth than in your tag-rags, humbling yourself before the Most High as a poor, guilty sinner, most accursed of all the human race for having dared to call yourself a priest. For priest you are not for your fellow men, for one is priest, even Christ Jesus, and no other is priest, save only that all saints have a common priesthood which some cannot usurp to themselves alone, unless they dare to bring upon themselves the vengeance of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, who called themselves priests and were not. "If you knew the gift of God," poor simpleton that you are, you would doff that priestly array, and bow before the great High Priest of our profession, and worship Him alone.

I might knock at that door yonder going down the street, after leaving that ritualistic "mass house," and might find the merchant in his counting house. He looks a little disconcerted that I should call upon him on the Sabbath morning and find him with his pen behind his ear. But he says he has no time to cast up his accounts at any other period. Ah, but "if you knew the gift of God," you would find other time, and find another occupation for this time than spending upon yourself what God claims to be His own.

I pass on into the chamber of sickness, and I see on the bed of death a sinner full of fears and dread about the world which lies before him. Listen to his groans. He has no hope. He has lived without Christ. The world has been his portion, and now he has to leave it, and he is unprepared to meet his Judge. All is dark as the pit whither he is going. How miserable his state as he feels he is parting with all he has loved, and for which he has lived, and that there is nothing before him but a dread unknown existence in another world.

Ah! if he only knew the gift of God, what a change there would be at once! What light, joy, and peace would come into that chamber! All its gloom would pass away, and in the place of it would come such rapture as would lead men to say, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." I shall not detain you longer. We might go down one street and up another for many a day, and we should find thousands to whom we could say, “If you knew the gift of God, you would be another and different man from what you are.”

III. And now, lastly—THE “IF” OF OUR TEXT, AND HOW DOES IT CONCERN BELIEVERS?

It seems to me to concern believers this way. Evidently there are tens of thousands who do not know the gift of God. Inquiry, then, of the most solemn kind should at once be made, “Has this ignorance of theirs been my fault? These men know not the gift of God—how can they know it unless there is someone to teach them? How shall they hear without a preacher? Is this ignorance to be laid at my door?”

Beloved, in the name of Jesus Christ, I ask you seat-holders and members of this place who know Christ yourselves, is there a person sitting next to you in the pew who does not know Christ, and have you done your best to tell him about Christ? I pause, that conscience may give its reply. And you who do often speak about Christ in the school or in the street, preaching or not preaching, let me ask you, do you so talk about Christ that people can understand you? Believe me, I try to use very simple words, but I often hear of words I have uttered which have not been understood by people present. I am always grieved when such is the case. God knows I would speak the most vulgar words I could find if people could understand them better. To me the finery of language is less than nothing. I would sooner preach Christ’s cross in the tongue of Billingsgate, if all would understand, than speak in the most polished tongue so that the poor could not comprehend me.

My dear brethren, that a soul should go to hell lost through our fine sentences, who shall be accountable for this? The watchman is not to speak in Greek to those who only know English, or even in good English to those who do not understand the language if it be well spoken. Augustine, I believe, frequently preached in exceedingly bad Latin, because it was the common talk of the people, and if he had spoken classic Latin he would not have been understood. And so must we do.

If any man does not know Christ, have you told it to him in all the ways which you can find out of making it plain and clear? If you have not, then some responsibility lies with you. Then next, suppose you have not, will you, my brethren, for the future resolve in God’s strength that if any man perishes for lack of knowledge, it shall not in the future be your fault? Make no rash vows, but do solemnly put it to your heart. But if you cannot speak as you would, yet you will distribute such publications, and give away such tracts as may tell the Gospel simply. If you cannot do what you would, O resolve, dear brethren, to do what you can, that none here may be without the knowledge of Christ!

But though a professor, I shall venture to say to you, that the text seems to say to you, Do you know the gift of God yourself? When I asked you whether you told others about it, I think a question might have been raised—if you have not told others, it is very questionable whether you know it yourself. If you never weep for other men's sins, and never desire their salvation, you are not a saved soul. One of the first instincts of the saved soul is to say, "What can I do that others may be saved also?" Now, if you have done nothing, let a suspicion arise. And to us all, I think, there may be this query put—judging by my efforts, judging by my actions, judging by my inward feelings, may I not often ask myself, Do I know this gift of God? And may I not come, this morning, just as I did at the first, as a sinner, and look up to the wounds of Jesus, and cast myself again upon Him? If I never did believe before, Lord Jesus, I trust You now. Up till now if I have been a deceived one, here I am— “My faith looks up to Thee, Thou Lamb of Calvary, Savior divine: Now hear me while I pray. Take all my guilt away. Oh let me from this day Be wholly Thine.” [synergistic here; God is not dependent upon man's efforts or prayer for this knowledge; first, the sinner is wholly ignorant of this knowledge for it to properly be an object of his prayer as Spurgeon points out earlier, which makes the sinner's prayer a gross or wicked presumption; second, God is not dependent upon the creature, but the creature upon man. Second, the gift of faith is exactly that, a gift; it cannot be prayed for, otherwise, as Paul says in Romans 11, But if it is by grace, it is no longer on the basis of works; otherwise grace would no longer be grace. It is no longer a gift, but is turned into a debt, for which God is not obliged, Romans 11:35, "Or who has given a gift to him that he might be repaid?" Now, after one is given this knowledge by faith, then the believer is commanded to ask for more, to increase his faith, to ask for his faith to be increased, Luke 17:5, and hence, Matt. 13:12, to him who has [saving faith] more will be given...and Matt. 7:7-8, ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; The first act of faith is wholly of God, not of ourselves, lest we boast; we are passive in it (John Owen and others); but subsequent acts of faith, we play a more active role, though the Spirit still works it as Edwards explains below. It is in this sense, we are passive: we cannot ask for the first act of faith since it takes saving faith to ask for saving faith, that is, without faith we cannot please Him (Heb. 11:6), but after we have received the gift of faith, then we are commanded to pray for more of it...to seek him, to grow in grace and faith, hence, Luke 17:5, "...Lord, Increase our faith." & Matt. 7:7-8 above, and many other places; and in that sense we are more active. Martin Luther said, "No one can give himself faith; it is a gift of God."

We work all, God works all, we are the proper actors - Jonathan Edwards; it is not, God does all and we do nothing. Edwards explains:

§ 64. In efficacious grace we are not merely passive, nor yet does God do some, and we do the rest. But God does all, and we do all. God produces all, and we act all. For that is what he produces, viz. our own acts. God is the only proper author and fountain; we only are the proper actors. We are, in different respects, wholly passive and wholly active.]

The Danger of False Conversion

by Jonathan Edwards

And therefore this is the nature of spiritual affections, that the greater they be, the greater the appetite and longing is, after grace and holiness.

But with those joys, and other religious affections, that are false and counterfeit, it is otherwise. If before there was a great desire, of some sort, after grace; as these affections rise, that desire ceases, or is abated. It may be before, while the man was under legal convictions, and much afraid of hell, he earnestly longed that he might obtain spiritual light in his understanding, faith in Christ, and love to God: not now, when these false affections deceive him, and make him confident that he is converted, and his state good, there are no more earnest longings after light and grace; for his end is answered; he is confident that his sins are forgiven him, and that he shall go to heaven; and so he is satisfied. And especially when false affections are raised very high, do they put an end to longings after grace and holiness. The man now is far from appearing to himself a poor and empty creature; on the contrary, he is rich, and increased with goods, and hardly conceives of anything more excellent, than what he has already attained. -Jonathon Edwards, On Religious Affections

Footnote: It is an argument of want of grace, when a man saith to himself, as the glutton said to his soul, "Take thy rest, for thou hast goods laid up for many years." So you have repentance and grace, and peace enough for many years: and hence the soul takes its rest, grows sluggish and negligent. Oh, if you die in this case, this might your soul will be taken away to hell." Shepard's Parable

Total Depravity of Man Expounded

From this you will get a fuller appreciation for man's liableness to sin, corruption and self-reliance, and hence his complete depravity - his unwillingness and inability to believe on Christ without the sovereign, free, converting grace of God. CHAP. III

Within these smooth fac'd seas strange creatures crawl;

*But in man's heart far stranger than them all.
John Flavel Vol. 5 p 224*

OBSERVATION

IT was an unadvised saying of Plato, Mare nil memorabile producit: the sea produceth nothing memorable. But surely there is much of the wisdom, power, and goodness of God manifested in those inhabitants of the water region; notwithstanding the sea's azure and smiling face, strange creatures are bred in its womb, "O Lord, (saith David) how manifold are thy works. In wisdom hast thou made them all; the earth is full of thy riches. So is this great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts," Ps. 105:24, 25. And we read Lam. 4:5, of sea-monsters, which draw out their breasts to their young. Pliny and Purchas tell incredible stories about them. About the tropic of Capricorn, our seamen meet with flying fishes, that have wings like a rere-mouse [a bat], but of a silver colour; they fly in flocks like stares. There are creatures of very strange forms and properties; some resembling a cow, called by the Spaniards, manates, by some supposed to be the sea-monster spoken of by Jeremy. In the rivers of Guinea, Purchas saith, there are fishes that have four eyes, bearing two above, and two beneath the water, when they swim; both resembling a toad, and very poisonous. How strange, both in shape and property, is the sword-fish and thresher, that fight with the whale. Even our own seas produce creatures of strange shapes, but the commonness takes off the wonder.

APPLICATION.

Thus doth the heart of man naturally swarm and abound with strange and monstrous lusts and abominations, Rom. 1:29, 30, 31. "Being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness, full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant-breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful." O what a swarm is here! And yet there are multitudes more, in the depths of the heart! And it is no wonder, considering that with this nature, we received the spawn of the blackest and vilest abominations. This original lust is productive of them all, James 1: 14, 15. Which lust, though it be in every man, numerically different from that of others, yet it is one and the same specifically for sort and kind, in all the children of Adam; even as the reasonable soul, though every man hath his own soul, namely, a soul individually distinct from another man's, yet it is the same for kind in all men. So that whatever abominations are in the hearts and lives of the vilest Sodomites, and the most profligate wretches under heaven; there is the same matter in thy heart out of which they were shaped and formed. In the depths of the heart they are conceived, and thence they crawl out of the eyes, hands, lips, and all the members. Mat. 15:18, 19 "Those things (saith Christ) which proceed out of the mouth, come forth from the heart, and defile a man. For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies;" even such monsters as would make a gracious heart tremble to behold. 'What are my lusts (saith one) but so many toads spitting of venom, and spawning of poison; croaking in my judgment, creeping in my will, and crawling into my affections?' The apostle in 1 Cor. v. 1. tells us of a sin, "not to be named;" so monstrous, that nature itself startles at it; even such monsters are generated in the depths of the hearts. Whence come evils? was a question that much puzzled the philosophers of old. Now here you may see whence they come, and where they are begotten.

REFLECTION.

And are there such strange abominations in the heart of man? Then how is he degenerated from his primitive perfection and glory! His streams were once as clear as crystal, and the fountain of them pure, there, was no unclean creature moving in them. What a stately fabric was the soul at first! And what holy inhabitants possessed the several rooms thereof! But now, as God speaks of Idumea, Isa. 34:11, "The line of confusion is stretched out upon it, and the stones of emptiness. The cormorant and bittern possess it; the owl and the raven dwell in it." Yea, as Isa. 13:21, 22, "The wild beasts of the desert lie there; it is full of doleful creatures, the satyrs dance in it, and dragons cry in those sometimes pleasant places." O sad change! How sadly may we look back towards our first state! and take up the words of Job, "O that I were as in months past, as in the days of my youth; when the Almighty was yet with me, when I put on righteousness, and it clothed me, when my glory was fresh in me," Job 29:2, 4, 5.

Again, think, O my soul, what a miserable condition the unregenerate abide in! Thus swarmed and over-run with hellish lusts, under the dominion and vassalage of divers lusts, Tit. 3:3. What a tumultuous sea is such a soul; how do these lusts rage within them! How do they contest and scuffle for the throne! [I think it was Edwards that said that if man knew that the throne of God was free for the taking, it wouldn't be safe for one hour.] And usually take it by turns; for as all diseases are contrary to health, yet some contrary to each other, so are lusts. Hence poor creatures are hurried on to different kinds of servitude, according to the nature of that imperious lust that is in the throne; and, like the lunatic, Mat. 17, are sometimes cast into the water, and sometimes into the fire. Well might the prophet say, "The wicked is like a troubled sea, that cannot rest," Isa. 7:20. They have no peace now in the service of sin, and less shall they have hereafter, when they receive the wages of sin. "There is no peace to the wicked, saith my God." They indeed cry Peace, peace; but my God doth not so. The last issue and result of this is eternal death; no sooner is it delivered of its deceitful pleasures, but presently it falls in travail again, and brings forth death, Jam. i. 15. [Hence a false peace from a mere profession of Christ and an ungrounded claim of an interest in Christ made in the Sinner's Prayer, leads to a fatal security; there is no security or true peace generated from such a profession of Christ; only from a proper self-examination of one's being regenerated by the Spirit of God and seeing fruit meet for repentance from which assurance comes. Jeremiah says regarding the heart, "The heart is deceitful above all things, And ^[a]desperately wicked; Who can know it? Many are self deceived by this prayer.]

Once more; and is the heart such a sea, abounding with monstrous abominations? Then stand astonished, O my soul, at that free grace which hath delivered thee from so sad a condition. O fall down and kiss the feet of mercy that moved so freely and seasonably to thy rescue? Let my heart be enlarged abundantly here. Lord, what am I, that I should be taken, and others left? Reflect, O my soul, upon the conceptions and bursts of lusts in the days of vanity, which you now blush to own. O what black imaginations, hellish desires, vile affections are lodged there! Who made me to differ? Or, how came I to be thus wonderfully separated? Surely, it is by thy free grace, and nothing else [in other words, I did not ask for it!! See Isaiah 65:1, "I was sought by those who did not ask for Me; I was found by those who did not seek Me." Because I did ask for it, God gets all the glory. See also Hosea 5:6, John 7:34, where even if the do try to seek Him, they will not find him.], that I am what I am; and by that grace I have escaped (to mine own astonishment) the corruption that is in the world through lust. O that ever the holy God should set his eyes on such an one; or cast a look of love towards me, in whom were legions of unclean lusts and abominations. [So the result of God's sovereign mercy on us should put a holy and reverential fear - an awe - a holy wonderment over our souls, as well as squashing all human boasting. The glory of God's grace is exclusively reserved for Him.]

THE POEM.

MY soul's the sea, wherein, from day to day,
Sins like Leviathans do sport and play.
Great master-lusts, with all the lesser try.
Therein increase, and strangely multiply.
Yet strange it is not, sin so fast should breed,
Since with this nature I received the seed
And spawn of ev'ry species, which was shed
Into its caverns first, then nourished
By its own native warmth; which like the sun
Hath quickened them, and now abroad they come;
And like the frogs of Egypt creep and crawl
Into the closest rooms within my soul.
My fancy swarms, for there they frisk and play,

In dreams by night, and foolish toys by day.
 My judgment's clouded by them, and my will Perverted, every corner, they do fill.
 As locusts seize on all that's fresh and green.
 Unclothe the beauteous spring, and make it seem Like drooping autumn; so my soul, that first
 As Eden seem'd, now's like a ground that's curst.
 Lord purge my streams, and kill those lusts that lie
 Within them; if they do not, I must die.

AW Pink (The insincerity of the Sinner's Prayer exemplified)

By way of introduction let us bring before the readers the following Scriptures. (1) "Ye will not come to me, that ye might have life" John 5:40. (2) "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest" Matthew 11:28.

The first of these passages applies to every unregenerate man and woman on this earth. While he is in a state of nature, no man can come to Christ. Though all excellencies, both Divine and human, are found in the Lord Jesus, though He is "altogether lovely" (Song of Sol. 5:16), yet the fallen sons of Adam see in Him no beauty that they should desire Him. They may be well instructed in "the doctrine of Christ," they may believe unhesitatingly all that Scripture affirms concerning Him, they may frequently take His name upon their lips, profess to be resting on His finished work, sing His praises, yet their hearts are far from Him. The things of this world have the first place in their affections. The gratifying of self is their dominant concern. They surrender not their lives to Him. He is too holy to suit their love of sin; His claims are too exacting to suit their selfish hearts; His terms of discipleship are too severe to suit their fleshly ways. They will not yield to His Lordship—true alike with each one of us till God performs a miracle of grace upon our hearts. [All of which is clear evidence that the Sinner's Prayer is not truly sincere; he is self-deceived, praying to God with corrupt motives, guilty of presumptuous sin, Ps. 19:13]

My note:

Here is a statement that I heard on the Ben Shapiro Show this morning that sums up original sin, man's depravity: his pride, self-reliance, self-righteousness, addictedness to his own will, practical atheism, and an Arminian/Pelagian bent:

"Man was born on third base, and he thinks he hit a triple."

This is so true! Now you can get a clearer sense of our miserable, self-deceived condition as we are born into the world.

10. Create in me a clean heart, O God! and renew a right spirit 268 in my inward parts. 11. Cast me not away from thy presence, and take not the Spirit of thy holiness from me. 12. Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and uphold me with a free spirit.

10 Create in me a clean heart, O God!

In the previous part of the psalm David has been praying for pardon. He now requests that the grace of the Spirit, which he had forfeited, or deserved to have forfeited, might be restored to him. The two requests are quite distinct, though sometimes confounded together, even by men of learning. He passes from the subject of the gratuitous remission of sin to that of sanctification. And to this he was naturally led with earnest anxiety, by the consciousness of his having merited the loss of all the gifts of the Spirit, and of his having actually, in a great measure, lost them. By employing the term create, he expresses his persuasion that nothing less than a miracle could effect his reformation, and emphatically declares that repentance is the gift of God. The Sophists grant the necessity of the aids of the Spirit, and allow that assisting grace must both go before and come after; but by assigning a middle place to the free will of man, they rob God of a great part of his glory. David, by the word which he here uses, describes the work of God in renewing the heart in a manner suitable to its extraordinary nature, representing it as the formation of a new creature.

As he had already been endued with the Spirit, he prays in the latter part of the verse that God would renew a right spirit within him. But by the term create, which he had previously employed, he acknowledges that we are indebted entirely to the grace of God, both for our first regeneration, and, in the event of our falling, for subsequent restoration. He does not merely assert that his heart and spirit were weak, requiring divine assistance, but that they must remain destitute of all purity and rectitude till these be communicated from above. By this it appears that our nature is entirely corrupt: for were it possessed of any rectitude or purity, David would not, as in this verse, have called the one a gift of the Spirit, and the other a creation.

In the verse which follows, he presents the same petition, in language which implies the connection of pardon with the enjoyment of the leading of the Holy Spirit. If God reconcile us gratuitously to himself, it follows that he will guide us by the Spirit of adoption. It is only such as he loves, and has numbered among his own children, that he blesses with a share of his Spirit; and David shows that he was sensible of this when he prays for the continuance of the grace of adoption as indispensable to the continued possession of the Spirit. The words of this verse imply that the Spirit had not altogether been taken away from him, however much his gifts had been temporarily obscured. Indeed, it is evident that he could not be altogether divested of his former excellencies, for he seems to have discharged his duties as a king with credit, to have conscientiously observed the ordinances of religion, and to have regulated his conduct by the divine law. Upon one point he had fallen into a deadly lethargy, but he was not given over to a reprobate mind;” and it is scarcely conceivable that the rebuke of Nathan the prophet should have operated so easily and so suddenly in arousing him, had there been no latent spark of godliness still remaining in his soul. He prays, it is true, that his spirit may be renewed, but this must be understood with a limitation. The truth on which we are now insisting is an important one, as many learned men have been inconsiderately drawn into the opinion that the elect, by falling into mortal sin, may lose the Spirit altogether, and be alienated from God. The contrary is clearly declared by Peter, who tells us that the word by which we are born again is an incorruptible seed, (1Pe 1:23;) and John is equally explicit in informing us that the elect are preserved from falling away altogether, (1Jo 3:9.) However much they may appear for a time to have been cast off by God, it is afterwards seen that grace must have been alive in their breast, even during that interval when it seemed to be extinct. Nor is there any force in the objection that David speaks as if he feared that he might be deprived of the Spirit. It is natural that the saints, when they have fallen into sin, and have thus done what they could to expel the grace of God, should feel an anxiety upon this point; but it is their duty to hold fast the truth that grace is the incorruptible seed of God, which never can perish in any heart where it has been deposited. This is the spirit displayed by David. Reflecting upon his offense, he is agitated with fears, and yet rests in the persuasion that, being a child of God, he would not be deprived of what indeed he had justly forfeited.

12 Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation

He cannot dismiss his grief of mind until he have obtained peace with God. This he declares once and again, for David had no sympathy with those who can indulge themselves in ease when they are lying under the divine displeasure. In the latter clause of the verse, he prays as in the verses preceding, that the Holy Spirit might not be taken away from him. There is a slight ambiguity in the words. Some take תסמכני, thismecheni, to be the third person of the verb, because רוח, ruach, is feminine, and translate, let the Spirit uphold me. The difference is immaterial, and does not affect the meaning of the passage. There is more difficulty in fixing the sense of the epithet נדיבה, nedibah, which I have translated free. As the verb נדב, nadab, signifies to deal liberally, princes are in the Hebrew called, by way of eminence, נדיבים, nedibim, which has led several learned men to think that David speaks here of a princely or royal spirit; and the translators of the Septuagint rendered it accordingly ἡγεμονικον. The prayer, in this sense, would no doubt be a suitable one for David, who was a king, and required a heroic courage for the execution of his office. But it seems better to adopt the more extensive meaning, and to suppose that David, under a painful consciousness of the bondage to which he had been reduced by a sense of guilt, prays for a free and cheerful spirit. 269 This invaluable attainment, he was sensible, could only be recovered through divine grace.

From this excellent description of the fallen nature of natural man (unconverted man, still in Adam), you will see the hypocrisy of the sinner's prayer, that it is not at all consistent with reality of man's enmity with God. In other words, men are taught, in order to get saved, they can pray to God while being his arch enemies, blind to the existence of Him, ignorant of Christ, hater of all spiritual truths, and yet he confesses the exact opposite to recommend himself to God! That is a clear contradiction; it is absurd on its face. But carnal men don't want to go to hell, and want to quiet conscience, though they hate the very person they are petitioning! That is the reality of this situation; and it has its issue in a secure and stupid security. My comments in [blue], red for emphasis.

BY JONATHAN EDWARDS

SECT. I.In what respects natural men are God's enemies.

1. THEIR enmity appears in their judgments, their natural relish, their wills, affections, and practice. They have a very mean esteem of God. Men are ready to entertain a good esteem of those with whom they are friends: they are apt to think highly of their qualities, to give them their due praises; and if there be defects, to cover them. But of those to whom they are enemies, they are disposed to have mean thoughts; they are apt to entertain a dishonorable opinion of them: they will be ready to look contemptibly upon anything that is praiseworthy in them.

So it is with natural men towards God. They entertain very low and contemptible thoughts of God. Whatever honour and respect they may pretend, and make a show of towards God, [and the sinner's prayer is pretending - presumption, as is clearly demonstrated by man's actual depraved condition as Edwards aptly describes proving the sinner's complete insincerity], if their practice be examined, it will show, that they certainly look upon him as a Being that is but little to be regarded. The language of their hearts is, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice?" Exod. v. 2. "What is the Almighty, that we should serve him? and what profit should we have if we pray unto him?" Job xxi. 15. They count him worthy neither to be loved nor feared. They dare not behave with that slight and disregard towards one of their fellow-creatures, when a little raised above them in power and authority, as they dare, and do, towards God. They value one of their equals much more than God, and are ten times more afraid of offending such, than of displeasing the God that made them. They cast such exceeding contempt on God, as to prefer every vile lust before him. And every worldly enjoyment is set higher in their esteem, than God. A morsel of meat, or a few pence of worldly gain, is preferred before him. God is set last and lowest in the esteem of natural men.

2. They are enemies in the natural relish of their souls. They have an inbred distaste and disrelish of God's perfections. [So, despite what the sinner proclaims about God or his love to him, he is self-deceived] God is not such a being as they would have. Though they are ignorant of God; yet from what they hear of him, and from what is manifest by the light of nature, they do not like him. By his being endowed with such attributes as he is, they have an aversion to him. They hear God is an infinitely holy, pure, and righteous Being, and they do not like him upon this account; they have no relish of such qualifications; they take no delight in contemplating them. It would be a mere task, a bondage to a natural man, to be obliged to set himself to contemplate those attributes of God. They see no manner of beauty or loveliness, nor taste any sweetness, in them. And on account of their distaste of these perfections, they dislike all his other attributes. They have greater aversion to him because he is omniscient and knows all things; and because his omniscience is a holy omniscience. They are not pleased that he is omnipotent, and can do whatever he pleases; because it is a holy omnipotence. They are enemies even to his mercy, because it is a holy mercy. They do not like his immutability, because by this he never will be otherwise than he is, an infinitely holy God.

It is from this disrelish that natural men have of the attributes of God, that they do not love to have much to do with God. The natural tendency of the heart of man is to fly from God, and keep at a distance from him, as far off as possible.—A natural man is averse to communion with God, and is naturally disinclined to those exercises of religion, wherein he has immediately to do with him. It is said of wicked men, Psal. x. 4. “God is not in all their thoughts.” It is evident, that the mind of man is naturally averse to thinking about God: and hence if any thoughts of him be suggested to the mind, they soon go away; such thoughts are not apt to rest in the minds of natural men. If anything is said to them of God, they are apt to forget it: it is like seed that falls upon the hard path, the fowls of the air soon take it away: or like seed that falls upon a rock. Other things will stick; but divine things rebound: and if they were cast into the mind, they meet with that there which soon thrusts them out again: they meet with no suitable entertainment, but are soon chased away.

Hence also it is, that natural men are with difficulty persuaded to be constant in the duty of secret prayer. They would not be so averse to spending a quarter of an hour, night and morning, in some bodily labour; but it is because they are averse to a work, wherein they have so immediately to do with God; and they naturally love to keep at a distance from him.

3. Their wills are contrary to his will. God’s will and theirs are exceeding cross the one to the other, God wills those things that they hate, and are most averse to; and they will those things that God hates. Hence they oppose God in their wills: there is a dreadful, violent, and obstinate opposition of the will of natural men to the will of God.

[Whatever the sinner promises to God in his pray to him for salvation, he is naturally averse to! What a contradiction if I ever heard of one. This prayer is a complete fraud. It is hypocrisy on a massive scale.]

They are very opposite to the commands of God. It is from the enmity of the will, (Rom. vii. 7.) that “the carnal mind is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.” Hence natural men are enemies to God’s government. They are not loyal subjects, but enemies to God, considered as Lord of the world. They are entire enemies to God’s authority.

4. They are enemies to God in their affections. There is in every natural man a seed of malice against God. And it often dreadfully breaks forth. Though it may in great measure lie hid in secure times, when God lets men alone, and they meet with no great disturbance of body or mind; yet, if God does but touch men in their consciences, by manifesting to them a little of his wrath for their sins, this oftentimes brings out the principle of malice against him. This is exercised in dreadful heart-risings, inward wranglings and quarrelings, and blasphemous thoughts; wherein the heart is like a viper, hissing and spitting poison at God. And however free from it the heart may seem to be, when let alone and secure, yet a very little thing will set it in a rage. Temptations will show what is in the heart. The alteration of a man’s circumstances will often discover the heart. Pharaoh had no more natural enmity against God than other men; and if other natural men had been in Pharaoh’s circumstances, the same corruptions would have put forth themselves in as dreadful a manner. The scribes and Pharisees had naturally no more malice in their hearts against Christ, than other men, and other natural men would, in their case, and having as little restraint, exercise as much malice against Christ as they did. When wicked men come to be cast into hell, then their malice against God will appear. Then their hearts will appear as full of malice, as hell is full of fire. But when wicked men come to be in hell, there will be no new corruptions put into their heart; but only old ones will then break forth without restraint. That is all the difference between a wicked man on earth, and a wicked man in hell, that in hell there will be more to stir up the exercise of corruption, and less to restrain it, than on earth: but there will be no new corruption put in. A wicked man will have no principle of corruption in hell, but what he carried to hell with him. There are now the seeds of all the malice that will be exercised then. The malice of damned spirits is but a branch of the root, that is in the hearts of natural men now. A natural man has a heart like the heart of a devil; only corruption is more under restraint in man than in devils.

5. They are enemies in their practice. They walk contrary to him. In their enmity against God, they are exceeding active. They are engaged in war against God. Indeed they cannot injure God, he is so much above them; but yet they do what they can. They oppose themselves to his honour and glory; they oppose themselves to the interest of his kingdom in the world: they oppose themselves to the will and command of God: and oppose him in his government. They oppose God in his works, and in his declared designs; while he is doing one work, they are doing the contrary. God seeks one thing, and they seek directly the contrary. They list under Satan's banner, and are his willing soldiers in opposing the kingdom of God.

SECT. II.

The degree of men's natural enmity to God.

I NOW proceed to say something with respect to the degree of this enmity: tending in some measure to show, how great enemies to God are natural men.

1. They have no love to God; their enmity is mere enmity without any mixture of love. A natural man is wholly destitute of any principle of love to God, and therefore never had the least exercise of this love. Some natural men have better tempers than others; and some are better educated than others; and some live a great deal more soberly than others: but one has no more love to God than another; for none have the least spark of that. The heart of a natural man is as destitute of love to God, as a dead, stiff, cold corpse is of vital heat. John v. 43. "I know you, that ye have not the love of God in you."

2. Every faculty and principle of action is wholly under the dominion of enmity against God. The nature of man is wholly infected with this enmity against God. He is tainted with it throughout, in all his faculties and principles. And not only so, but every faculty is entirely and perfectly subdued under it, and enslaved to it. This enmity against God, has the absolute possession of the man. The apostle Paul, speaking of what he was naturally, says, "I am carnal, sold under sin." ¹³⁷ "

The understanding is under the reigning power of this enmity against God, so that it is entirely darkened and blinded with regard to the glory and excellency of God. The will is wholly under the reigning power of it. All the affections are governed by enmity against God: there is not one affection, nor one desire, that a natural man has, or that he is ever stirred up to act from, but what contains in it enmity against God. A natural man is as full of enmity against God, as any viper, or any venomous beast, is full of poison.

3. The power of the enmity of natural men against God, is so great, that it is insuperable by any finite power. It has too great and strong a possession of the heart, to be overcome by any created power. Indeed, a natural man never sincerely strives to root out his enmity against God; his endeavours are hypocritical; he delights in his enmity, and chooses it. Neither can others do it, though they sincerely, and to their utmost, endeavour to overcome this enmity. If godly friends and neighbors labour to persuade them to cast away their enmity, and become friends to God, they cannot persuade them to it. Though ministers use never so many arguments and entreaties, and set forth the loveliness of God; tell them of the goodness of God to them, hold forth God's own gracious invitations, and entreat them never so earnestly to cast off their opposition, and be reconciled; yet they cannot overcome it: still they will be as bad enemies to God, as ever they were.—The tongue of men or of angels cannot persuade them to relinquish their opposition to God. Miracles will not do it.—How many miracles did the children of Israel see in the wilderness! yet their enmity against God remained; as appeared by their often murmuring. And how often did Christ use miracles to this end without effect, but the Jews obstinately stood out. Matt. xxiii. 37. “O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, now often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not.” And how great did the enmity of these people appear to be after all; how spiteful and venomous were their hearts towards Christ, as appears by their cruel treatment of him, in his last sufferings!

4. They are mortal enemies to God; i e., They have that enmity in their hearts, that strikes at the life of God. A man may be no friend to another, and may have an ill spirit towards him; and yet not be his mortal enemy: his enmity will be satisfied with something short of the death of the person. But it is not so with natural men, with respect to God: they are mortal enemies. Their imbecility is no argument that this is not the tendency of the principle.

Natural men are enemies to the dominion of God; and their nature shows their good-will to dethrone him if they could! Yea, they are enemies to the being of God, and would be glad if there was no God. And therefore it necessarily follows, that they would cause that there should be none, if they could. Psal. xiv. 1. “The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.” This implies, not only an aptness to question the being of God; but, that he inclines it should be so. His heart says, i. e. his inclination says. The words in the original are, "The fool hath said in his heart, No God." That is, I would have none, I do not desire any, I wish there was none; that would suit my inclination best. Let the world be emptied of a God, he stands in my way. And hence he is an atheist in his heart.

The viper's poison is deadly poison; and when he bites he seeks the precious life. And men are in this respect a generation of vipers. Their poison, which is enmity against God, seeks the life of God. Matt. iii. 7. "O generation of vipers." Psal. lviii. 3, 4. "The wicked are estranged from the womb—Their poison is like the poison of a serpent." Deut. xxxii. 32, 33. "For their vine is the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah: their grapes are the grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter. Their vine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps." The divine nature being immortal, and infinitely out of our reach, there is no other trial possible, whether the enmity that is naturally in the heart against God, be mortal or no, but only for God to take on him the human nature, and become man; so as to come within man's reach. There can be no other experiment. And what has been the event? Why, when once God became man, and came down to dwell here, among such vipers as fallen men, they hated and persecuted him; and never desisted till they had imbrued their hands in his blood. There was a multitude of them that appeared combined in this design. Nothing would do, but he must be put to death. All cry out, Crucify him, crucify him. Away with him. They had rather Barabbas, who greatly deserved death, should live, than he should not die. Nothing would restrain them from it; even all his preaching, and all his miracles: but they would kill him. And it was not the ordinary kind of execution that would satisfy them; but it must be the most cruel and most ignominious they possibly could invent. And they aggravated it as much as they could, by mocking him, and spitting on him, and scourging him. This shows what the nature and tendency of man's enmity against God is; here it appeared in its true colours.

5. Natural men are greater enemies to God than they are to any other being whatsoever. Natural men may be very great enemies to their fellow-creatures; but not so great as they are to God. There is no other being that so much stands in sinners' way, in those things that they chiefly set their hearts upon, as God. Men are wont to hate their enemies in proportion to two things, viz. their opposition to what they look upon to be their interest,—and their power and ability. A great and powerful enemy will be more hated, than one who is weak and impotent. But none is so powerful as God.

Man's enmity to others may be got over: time may wear it out, and they may be reconciled. But natural men, without a mighty work of God to change their hearts, will never get over their enmity against God. They are greater enemies to God, than they are to the devil. Yea, they treat the devil as their friend and master, and join with him against God. John viii. 44. “Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do: he was a murderer from the beginning.”

SECT. III.

On what account men are enemies to God.

the general reason is, That God is opposite to them in the worship of their idols. The apostasy of man summarily consists in departing from the true God, to idols; forsaking his Creator, and setting up other things in his room. When God at first created man, he was united to his Creator; the God that made him was his God. The true God was the object of his highest respect, and had the possession of his heart. Love to God was the principle in his heart, that ruled over all other principles; and everything in the soul was wholly in subjection to it. But when man fell, he departed from the true God, and the union that was between his heart and his Creator was broken: he wholly lost his principle of love to God. And henceforward man clave to other gods. He gave that respect to the creature, which is due to the Creator.—When God ceased to be the object of his supreme love and respect, other things of course became the objects of it.

Man will necessarily have something that he respects as his god. If man do not give his highest respect to the God that made him, there will be something else that has the possession of it. Men will either worship the true God, or some idol; it is impossible it should be otherwise; something will have the heart of man. And that which a man gives his heart to, may be called his god; and therefore when man by the fall extinguished all love to the true God, he set up the creature in his room. For having lost his esteem and love of the true God, and set up other gods in his room, and in opposition to him; and God still demanding their worship, and opposing them; enmity necessarily follows.

That which a man chooses for his god, he sets his heart mainly upon. And nothing will so soon excite enmity, as opposition in that which is dearest. A man will be the greatest enemy to him who opposes him in what he chooses for his god; he will look on none as standing so much in his way, as he that would deprive him of his god. Judg. xviii. 24. “Ye have taken away my gods; and what have I more?” A man, in this respect, cannot serve two masters, that stand in competition for his service. And not only, if he serves one, he cannot serve the other; but if he cleaves to one, he will necessarily hate the other. Matt. vi. 24. “No man can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one, and love the other, or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon." And this is the very reason that men hate God. In this case it is, as when two kings set up in one kingdom, in opposition one to the other; and they both challenge the same throne, and are competitors for the same crown; they who are loyal, hearty subjects to the one, will necessarily be enemies to the other. As that which is a man's god, is the object of his highest love; so that God who chiefly opposes him in it, must be the object of his greatest hatred.

The gods which a natural man worships, instead of the God that made him, are himself and the world. He has withdrawn his esteem and honour from God, and proudly exalts himself. As Satan was not willing to be in subjection; and therefore rebelled, and set up himself; so a natural man, in the proud and high thoughts he has of himself, sets up himself upon God's throne. He gives his heart to the world, worldly riches, worldly pleasures, and worldly honours; they have the possession of that regard which is due to God. The apostle sums up all the idolatry of wicked men in their love of the world. 1 John ii. 15, 16. "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world." And the apostle James observes, that a man must necessarily be the enemy of the true God, if he be a friend of the world. "Whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world, is the enemy of God." James iv. 4.

All the sin that men commit, is what they do in the service of their idols: there is no one act of sin, but what is an act of service to some false god. And therefore whereinsoever God opposes sin in them, he is opposite to their worship of their idols: on which account they are his enemies. God opposes them in their service of their idols, in the following respects:

1. He manifests his utter abhorrence of their attachment to their idols. Their idols are what they love above all things: they would by no means part with them. This wickedness is sweet unto them. Job xx. 12. If you take them away, what have they more? If they lose their idols, they lose their all.—To rend away their idols from them, would be more grievous to them, than to rend body and soul asunder: it is like rending their heart in twain. They love their idolatry: but God does not approve of it, but exceedingly hates it: he will by no means be reconciled to it; and therefore they hate him. God declares an infinite hatred of every act they do, in the service of their false gods. He declares himself to be a holy and a jealous God; a God who is very jealous of his own honor; and that greatly abhors giving that honour to another.

2. He utterly forbids their cleaving to those idols, and all the service that they do to them. He not only shows that he dislikes it, but he utterly forbids it; and demands that they should worship him; serve him only, and give their hearts wholly to him: without tolerating any competitor. He allows them to serve their idols in no degree; but requires them to cast them away utterly, and pay no more worship to them, at any time. He requires a final parting with their idols. Not only that they should refrain from them for a while, but cast them away forever; and never gratify their idolatrous respect to them anymore. This is so exceeding contrary to them, and what they are so averse to, that they are enemies to God for it. They cannot endure God's commands, because they forbid all that in which their hearts are so engaged. And as they hate God's commands, so they hate Him whose commands they are.

3. He threatens them with everlasting damnation for their service of their idols. He threatens them for their past idolatry. He threatens them with his eternal wrath, for their having departed from him, and their having chosen to themselves other gods. He threatens them for that disposition they have in their hearts to cleave to other gods; he threatens the least degrees of that respect which they have in their hearts to their idols. He manifests that he will not tolerate any regard to them, but has fixed eternal death, as the wages of every degree of it. And he will not release them from their guilt; he holds them to their obligations; and he will accept of no atonement that they can make. He will not forgive them for whatever they do in religion; whatever pains they take; whatever tears they shed. He will accept of no money or price that they have to offer.

And he threatens every future act of their idolatry. He not only forbids them ever to be guilty of the least act, but forbids them on pain of eternal damnation. So strictly does God prohibit them from the service of their beloved idols! He threatens them with everlasting wrath for all exercises of inordinate love of worldly profit; for all manifestations of inordinate regard to worldly pleasures, or worldly honors. He threatens them with everlasting torments for their self-exaltation. He requires them to deny and renounce themselves, and to abase themselves at his feet, on pain of bearing his wrath to all eternity.

The strictness of God's law is a principal cause of man's enmity against God. If God were one that did not so much hate sin; if he would allow them in the gratification of their lusts in some degree, and his threatenings were not so awful against all criminal indulgence; if his threatenings were not so absolute; if his displeasure could be appeased by a few tears, a little reformation, or the like; they would not be so great enemies, nor hate him so much as they do. But God shows himself to be an implacable enemy to their idols, and has threatened everlasting wrath, infinite calamity, for all that they do in the service of their lusts; and this makes them irreconcilable enemies to him.

For this reason, the scribes and Pharisees were such bitter enemies to Christ; because he showed himself to be such an enemy to their pride, conceit of their own wisdom, self-righteousness, and inordinate affectation of their own honor, which was their god. Natural men are enemies to God, because he is so opposite to them, in that in which they place their all. If you go to take away that which is very dear to a man, nothing will provoke him more. God is infinitely opposite to that in which natural men place all their delight, and all their happiness. He is an enemy to that which natural men value as their greatest honor and highest dignity; and to which they wholly trust; viz. their own righteousness.

Hence natural men are greater enemies to God, than they are to any other being. Some of their fellow-creatures may stand very much in their way, with regard to some things on which they set their hearts; but God opposes them with respect to ALL their idols, and his opposition to them is infinitely great. None of our fellow-creatures ever oppose us in any of our interests so much as God opposes wicked men in their idolatry. His infinite opposition is manifested by his threatening an infinite punishment, viz. his dreadful wrath to all eternity, misery without end. Hence we need not wonder that natural men are enemies to God.

This next section is very important; this objection to this doctrine is what deceives many, in grossly underestimating or even denying the enmity in man's heart and hence not see the hypocrisy of the sinner's prayer.

SECT. IV

The objection, that men are not conscious of this enmity, answered.

NATURAL men do not generally conceive themselves to be so bad; they have not this notion of themselves, that they are enemies to God. And therefore when they hear such doctrine as this taught them, they stand ready to make objections. Some may be ready to say, "I do not know, I am not sensible, that I hate God, and have a mortal enmity against him. I feel no such thing in myself, and if I have such enmity, why do not I feel it? If I am a mortal enemy, why should not I know it better than anybody else? How can others see what is in my heart better than I myself? If I hate one of my fellow-creatures, I can feel it inwardly working." To such an objection I would answer,

If you do but observe yourself, and search your own heart, unless you are strangely blinded, you may be sensible of those things, wherein enmity does fundamentally consist. Particularly, you may be sensible that you have at least had a low and contemptible estimation of God; and that, in your esteem, you set the trifles and vanities of this world far above him; so as to regard the enjoyment of these things far before the enjoyment of God, and to value these things better than his love.—And you may be sensible that you despise the authority of God, and value his commands and his honour but very little. Or if by some means you have blinded yourself, so as to think you do regard them now, doubtless you can look back and see that you have not regarded them. You may be sensible that you have had a disrelish and aversion towards God; an opposition to thinking of him; so that it would have been a very uncomfortable task to have been confined to that exercise for any time. The vanities of the world, at the same time, have been very pleasing to you; and you have been all swallowed up in them, while you have been averse to the things of religion. If you look into your heart, it is there plain to be seen, that there is an enmity in your will, that it is contrary to God's will, for you have been opposing the will of God all your life long.—These things are plain; it is nothing but some great delusion that can hide them from you. These are the foundation of all enmity: and if these things be in you, all the rest that we have spoken of will follow of course.

2. One reason why you have not more sensibly felt the exercises of malice against God, is that your enmity is now exercised partly in your unbelief of God's being; and this prevents its appearing in other ways. Man has naturally a principle of atheism in him; an indisposition to realize God's being, and a disposition to doubt of it. The being of God does not ordinarily seem real to natural men. All the discoveries that there are of God's being in his works, will not overcome the principle of atheism in the heart. And though they seem in some measure to be rationally convinced, yet it does not appear real; the conviction is feint, there is no strong conviction impressed on the mind, that there is a God: and oftentimes they are ready to think that there is none. Now this will prevent the exercise of this enmity, which otherwise would be felt; particularly, it may be an occasion of there not being sensible exercises of hatred.

It may in some measure be thus illustrated: if you had a rooted malice against another man, a principle that had been long established there, and if you should hear that he was dead, the sensible workings of your malice would not be felt, as when you realized it that he was alive. But if you should afterwards hear the news contradicted, and perceive that your enemy was still alive; you would feel the same workings of hatred that you did before. And thus your not realizing the fact, that God has a being, may prevent those sensible workings of hatred, that otherwise you would have. If wicked men in this world were sensible of the reality of God's being, as the wicked are in another, they would feel more of that hatred which men in another world do. The exercise of corruption in one way, may, and often does, prevent it working in other ways. As covetousness may prevent the exercise of pride, so atheism may prevent malice; and yet it may be no argument of there being any less enmity in the heart; for it is the same enmity, working in another way. The same enmity that in this world works by atheism, will in another world, where there will be no room for atheism, work by malice and blasphemy. The same mortal enmity which, if you saw there was a God, might make you to wish there were none, may now dispose and incline you to think there is none. Men are very often apt to think things are as they would have them to be. The same principle disposes you to think God has no existence, which, if you knew he had, would dispose you, if it were possible, to dispossess him of it.

3. If you think that there is a God, yet you do not realize it, that he is such a God as he really is. You do not realize it, that he is so holy as he is; that he has such a hatred of sin as indeed he has; that he is so just a God as he is, who will by no means clear the guilty. But that in the Psalms is applicable to you: "these things hast thou done, and I kept silence: thou thoughtest that I was altogether such an one as thyself." Psalm 1. 21. So that your atheism appears in this, as well as in thinking there is no God. So that your objection arises from this, that you do not find such a sensible hatred against that god which you have formed, to suit yourself; a god that you like better than the true God. [An unconverted man is praying to a god that suits himself!] But this is no argument that you have not bitter enmity against the true God; for it was your enmity against the true God, and your not liking him, that has put you upon forming up another in your imagination, that you like better. It is your enmity against those attributes of God's holiness and justice, and the like, that has put you upon conceiving another, who is not so holy as he is, and does not hate sin so much, and will not be so strictly just in punishing it; and whose wrath against sin is not so terrible.

But if you were sensible of the vanity of your own conceits, and that God was not such an one as you have imagined; but that he is, as he is indeed, an infinitely holy, just, sin hating and sin revenging God, who will not tolerate nor endure the worship of idols, you would be much more liable to feel the sensible exercises of enmity against him, than you are now. And this experience confirms. For we see that when men come to be under convictions, and to be made sensible that God is not as they have heretofore imagined; but that he is such a jealous, sin hating God, and whose wrath against sin is so dreadful, they are much more apt to have sensible exercises of enmity against him than before.

4. Your having always been taught that God is infinitely above you, and out of your reach, has prevented your enmity” being exercised in those ways, that otherwise it would have been. And hence your enmity has not been exercised in revengeful thoughts; because revenge has never found any room here; it has never found any handle to take hold of; there has been no conception of any such thing, and hence it has lain still. A serpent will not bite, or spit poison, at that which it sees at a great distance; which if it saw near, would do it immediately. Opportunity often shows what men are, whether friends or enemies. Opportunity to do puts men in mind of doing; wakens up such principles as lay dormant before. Opportunity stirs up desire to do, where there was before a disposition, that without opportunity would have lain still. If a man has had an old grudge against another, and has a fair opportunity to be revenged, this will revive his malice, and waken up a desire of revenge.

If a great and sovereign prince injures a poor man, and what he does is looked upon as very cruel, that will not ordinarily stir up passionate revenge, because he is so much above him, and out of his reach. Many a man has appeared calm and meek, when he has had no power in his hands, and has not appeared, either to himself or others, to have any disposition to cruel acts; yet afterwards, when he came to have opportunity by unexpected advancement, or otherwise, has appeared like a ravenous wolf, or devouring lion. So it was with Hazael. “And Hazael said, Why weepeth my lord? And he answered, Because I know the evil that thou wilt do unto the children of Israel: their strong holds wilt thou set on fire, and their young men wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt dash their children, and rip up their women with child. And Hazael said, But what is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing! And Elisha answered, the Lord hath showed me that thou shalt be king over Syria,” 2 Kings viii. 12, 13. Hazael was then a servant; he had no power in his hands to do as he pleased; and so his cruel disposition had lain hid, and he did not himself imagine that it was there: but afterwards, when he became King of Syria, and was absolute, having none to control him; then it broke out and appeared, and he did as the prophet had foretold. He committed those very acts of cruelty, that he thought it was not in his heart to do. It was want of opportunity that made the difference. It was all in his heart before; he was such a dog then as to do this thing, but only had not opportunity. And therefore when he seems surprised that the prophet should say so of him, all the reason the prophet gives is, “The Lord hath showed me that thou shall be king over Syria. ¹³⁸”

Some natural men are such “dogs” as to do things, if they had opportunity, which they do not imagine it is in their hearts to do. You object against your having a moral hatred against God; that you never felt any desire to dethrone him. But one reason has been, that it has always been conceived so impossible by you. But if the throne of God were within your reach, and you knew it, it would not be safe one hour. Who knows what thoughts would presently arise in your heart by such an opportunity, and what disposition would be raised up in your heart. Who would trust your heart, that there would not presently be such thoughts as these, though they are enough to make one tremble to mention them? “Now I have opportunity to set myself at liberty—that I need not be kept in continual slavery by the strict law of God.—Then I may take my liberty to walk in that way I like best, and need not be continually in such slavish fear of God’s displeasure. And God has not done well by me in many instances. He has done most unjustly by me, in holding me bound to destruction for unbelief, and other things which I cannot help.—He has shown mercy to others, and not to me. I have now an opportunity to deliver myself, and there can be no danger of my being hurt for it. There will be nothing for us to be terrified about, and so keep us in slavery.”

Who would trust your heart, that such thoughts would not arise? or others much more horrid and too dreadful to be mentioned? And therefore I forbear. Those natural men are foolishly insensible of what is in their own hearts, who think there would be no danger of any such workings of heart, if they knew they had opportunity.

5. You little consider, how much your having no more of the sensible exercises of hatred to God, is owing to a being restrained by fear. You have always been taught what a dreadful thing it is to hate God, and how terrible his displeasure; that God sees the heart and knows all the thoughts; and that you are in his hands, and he can make you as miserable as he pleases, and as soon as he pleases. And these things have restrained you: and the fear that has risen from them, has kept you from appearing what you are; it has kept down your enmity, and made that serpent afraid to show its head, as otherwise it would do. If a wrathful man were wholly under the power of an enemy, he would be afraid to exercise his hatred in outward acts, unless it were with great disguise. And if it be supposed that such an enemy, in whose power he was, could see his heart, and know all his thoughts; and apprehended that he would put him to a terrible death, if he saw the workings of malice there, how greatly would this restrain! He would be afraid so much as to believe himself, that he hated his enemy: but there would be all manner of disguise and hypocrisy, and feigning even of thoughts and affections.

Thus your enmity has been kept under restraint; and thus it has been from your infancy. You have grown up in it, so that it is become an habitual restraint. You dare not so much as think you hate God. If you do exercise hatred, you have a disguise for it, whereby you endeavour even to hide it from your own conscience; and so have all along deceived yourself. Your deceit is very old and habitual: there has been only restraint; not mortification.

There has been an enmity against God in its full strength It has been only restrained, like an enemy that durst not rise up and show himself.

6. One reason why you have not felt more sensible hatred to God may be, because you have not had much trial of what is in your heart. It may be God has hitherto, in a great measure, let you alone. The enmity that is in men's hearts against God, is like a serpent, which, if it be let alone lies still; but if anybody disturbs it, will soon hiss, and be enraged, and show its serpentine spiteful nature.

Notwithstanding the good opinion you have of yourself, yet a little trial would show you to be a viper, and your heart would be set all on rage against God. One thing that restrains you now is your hope. You hope to receive many things from God. Your own interest is concerned. So that both hope and fear operate together, to restrain your enmity from sensible exercises. But if once hope were gone, you would soon show what you were; you would feel your enmity against God in a rage.

7. If you pretend that you do not feel enmity against God, and yet act as an enemy, you may certainly conclude that it is not because you are no enemy, but because you do not know your own heart. Actions are the best interpreters of the disposition; they show, better than anything else, what the heart is. It must be because you do not observe your own behaviour, that you question whether you are an enemy to God.

What other account can you give of your own carriage, but only your being God's enemy? What other account can be given of your opposing God in your ways; walking so exceeding contrary to him, contrary to his counsels, contrary to his commands, and contrary to his glory? What other account can be given of your casting so much contempt upon God; your setting him so low; your acting so much against his authority, and against his kingdom and interest in the world? What other account can be given of your so setting your will in opposition to God's will, and that so obstinately, for so long a time, against so many warnings as you have had? What other account can be given of your joining so much with Satan, in the opposition he is making to the kingdom of God in the world? And that you will join with him against God, though it be so much against your own interest, and though you expose yourself by it to everlasting misery?

Such like behaviour in one man towards another, would be sufficient evidence of enmity. If he should be seen to behave thus, and that it was his constant manner, none would want better evidence that he was an enemy to his neighbour. If you yourself had a servant that carried it towards you, as you do towards God, you would not think there was need of any greater evidence of his being your enemy. Suppose your servant should manifest much contempt of you; and disregard your commands as much as you do the commands of God; should go directly contrary, and in many ways act the very reverse of your commands; should seem to set himself in ways that were contrary to your will obstinately and incorrigibly, without any amendment from your repeated calls, warnings, and threatenings; and should act so cross to you day and night, as you do to God; would he not be justly deemed your enemy? Suppose, further, when you sought one thing, he would seek the contrary; when you did any work, he would, as much as in him lay, undo and destroy that work; and suppose he should continually drive at such ends, as tended to overthrow the ends you aimed at: when you sought to bring to pass any design, he would endeavour to overthrow your design; and set himself as much against your interest, as you do yourself against God's honour. And suppose you should moreover see him, from time to time, with those who were your declared mortal enemies; making them his counsellors, and hearkening to their counsels, as much as you do to Satan's temptations: should you not think you had sufficient evidence that he was your enemy?—Therefore consider seriously your own ways, and weigh your own behavior, "How canst thou say, I am not polluted?—see thy way in the valley, know what thou hast done." Jer. ii. 23.

SECT. V.

The objections, that they show respect to God, and experience some religious affections, answered.

NATURAL men may be ready to object, the respect they show to God, from time to time. This makes many to think that they are far from being such enemies to God. They pray to him in secret, and attend on public worship, and take a great deal of pains to do it in a decent manner. It seems to them that they show God a great deal of respect; they use many very respectful terms in their prayer; they are respectful in their manner of speaking, their voice, gestures, and the like.—But to this I answer, That all this is done in mere hypocrisy. All this seeming respect is feigned, there is no sincerity in it: there is external respect, but none in the heart: there is a show, and nothing else. You only cover your enmity with a painted veil. You put on the disguise of a friend, but in your heart you are a mortal enemy. There is external honour, but inward contempt; there is a show of friendship and regard, but inward hatred. You do but deceive yourself with your show of respect; and endeavour to deceive God; not considering that God looks not on the outward appearance, but on the heart.—Here consider particularly,

1. That much of that seeming respect which natural men show to God, is owing to their education. They have been taught from their infancy that they ought to show great respect to God. They have been taught to use respectful language, when speaking about God, and to behave with solemnity, when attending on those exercises of religion, wherein they have to do with him. From their childhood, they have seen that this is the manner of others, when they pray to God, to use reverential expressions, and a reverential behaviour before him.

Those who are brought up in places where they have, commonly from their infancy, heard men take the name of God in vain, and swear and curse, and blaspheme; they learn to do the same; and it becomes habitual to them. And it is the same way, and no other, that you have learned to behave respectfully towards God; not that you have any more respect to God than they; but they have been brought up one way, and you another. In some parts of the world, men are brought up in the worship of idols of silver, and gold, and wood, and stone, made in the shape of men and beast. “They say of them, Let the men that sacrifice, kiss the calf.” Hos. xiii. 2. In some parts of the world, they are brought up to worship serpents, and are taught from their infancy to show great respect to them. And in some places, they are brought up in worshipping the devil, who appears to them in a bodily shape; and to behave with a show of great reverence and honor towards him. And what respect you show to God has no better foundation; it comes the same way, and is worth no more.

2. That show of respect which you make is forced. You come to God, and make a great show of respect to him, and use very respectful terms, with a reverential tone and manner of speaking; and your countenance is grave and solemn: you put on an humble aspect; and use humble, respectful postures, out of fear. You are afraid that God will execute his wrath upon you, and so you feign a great deal of respect, that he may not be angry with you. "Through the greatness of thy power shall thine enemies submit themselves unto thee." Psal. lxvi. 3. In the original it is, shall thine enemies lie to thee. It is rendered therefore in the margin, shall yield feigned obedience to thee. All that you do in religion is forced and feigned. Through the greatness of God's power, you yield feigned obedience. You are in God's power, and he is able to destroy you; and so you feign a great deal of respect to him, that he might not destroy you. As one might do towards an enemy that had taken him captive, though he at the same time would gladly make his escape, if he could, by taking away the life of him who had taken him captive.

3. It is not real respect that moves you to behave so towards God: you do it because you hope you shall get by it. It is respect to yourself, and not respect to God, that moves you. You hope to move God by it to bestow the rewards of his children. You are like the Jews who followed Christ, and called him Rabbi, and would make him a king. Not that they honored him so much in their hearts, as to think him worthy of the honor of a king; or that they had the respect of sincere subjects; but they did it for the sake of the loaves. "Jesus perceived that they would come and make him a king. And when they had found him on the other side of the sea, they said unto him, Rabbi, how camest thou hither? Jesus answered and said unto them, Verily, verily I say unto you, Ye seek me, not because you saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled." John vi. 15, 25, 26.

These things do not argue but that you are implacable enemies to God. If you examine your prayers and other duties, your own consciences will tell you, that the seeming respect which you have shown to God in them, has been only in hypocrisy. Oftentimes you have set forth in your prayers, that God was a great, a glorious, and an infinitely holy God, as if you greatly honoured him on the account of these attributes; and, at the same time, you had no sense in your heart of the greatness and glory of God, or of any excellency in his holiness. Your own consciences will tell you, that you have often pretended to be thankful; you have told God, that you thanked him you was alive, and thanked him for various mercies, when you have not found the least jot of thankfulness in your heart. And so you have told God of your own unworthiness, and set forth what a vile creature you was; when you have had no humble sense of your own unworthiness.

If these forementioned restraints were thrown off, you would soon throw off all your show of respect. Take away fear, and a regard to your own interest, and there would soon be an end to all those appearances of love, honour, and reverence, which now you make. All these things are not at all inconsistent with the most implacable enmity. The devil himself made a show of respect to Christ, when he was afraid that he was going to torment him; and when he hoped to persuade Christ to spare him longer. “When he saw Jesus, he cried out, and fell down before him, and with a loud voice said, What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God most high? I beseech thee, torment me not.” Luke viii. 28.

Some may perhaps object against this doctrine of their being God’s enemies, the religions affections they have sometimes experienced. They may be ready to say, That when they have come before God in prayer, they have not only used respectful terms and gestures, but they have prayed with affection; their prayers have been attended with tears, which they are ready to think showed something in the heart. But to this it is answered, that these affections have risen from other causes, and not from any true respect to God.

1. They have risen from self-love, and not love to God. If you have wept before God, from the consideration of your own pitiful case; that has been because you loved yourself, and not because you had any respect to God. If your tears have been from sorrow for your sins; you have mourned for your sins, because you have sinned against yourself, and not because you have sinned against God. “When ye fasted and mourned, did ye at all fast unto me, even unto me?” Zech. vii. 5.

2. Pride, and a good thought of themselves, very commonly has a great hand in the affections of natural men. They have a good opinion of what they are doing when they are praying; and the reflection on that affects them: they are affected with their own goodness. Men’s self-righteousness often occasions tears. A high opinion of themselves before God, and an imagination of their being persons of great account with him, has affected them in their transactions with God. There is commonly abundance of pride in the midst of tears; and often pride is in a great measure the source of them. And then they are so far from being an argument that you are not an enemy to God, that on the contrary, they are an argument, that you are. In your very tears, you are, in a vain conceit of yourself, exalting yourself against God.

3. The affections of natural men often arise from wrong notions they have of God. They conceive of God after the manner they do of men, as though he were a being liable to be wrought upon in his affections. They conceive of him as one whose heart could be drawn, whose affections can be overcome, by what he sees in them. They conceive of him as being taken with them, and their performances; and this works on their affections; and thus one tear draws another, and their affections increase by reflection. And oftentimes they conceive of God as one” that loves them, and is a friend to them; and such a mistake may work much on their affections. [But as Jesus said in Luke 6:36, But if you love those who love you, what credit is that to you? For even sinners love those who love them. Often deceiving affections are raised when a pastor tells an unbeliever that Jesus loves them. So now he may imagine that he really loves Jesus, when he is still an enemy to Him!] But such affections that arise towards God, as they conceit him to be, is no argument that they have not the same implacable hatred towards God, considered as he really is. There is no concluding that men are not enemies, because they are affected and shed tears in their prayers, and the like. Saul was very much affected when David expostulated with him about pursuing after him, and seeking to kill him. David’s words wrought exceedingly upon Saul’s affections. “And it came to pass when David had made an end of speaking these words unto Saul, that Saul said, Is this thy voice, my son David? and Saul lift up his voice and wept.” 1 Sam. xxiv. 16. chap. xxvi. 1. etc. He was so affected that he wept aloud, and called David his son, though he was but just before seeking his life. But this affection of Saul was no argument that he did not still continue in his enmity against David. He was David’s mortal enemy before, and sought his life; and so he did afterwards, it was but a pang: his enmity was not mortified or done away. The next news we hear of Saul is, that he was pursuing David, and seeking his life again.

SECT. VIII.

God may justly withhold mercy.

If natural men are God’s enemies, hence we may learn, how justly God may refuse to show you mercy. For is God obliged to show mercy to his enemies? Is God bound to set his love on them that have no love to him; but hate him with perfect hatred? Is he bound to come and dwell with them that have an aversion to him, and choose to keep at a distance from him, and fly from him as one that is hateful to them? Even should you desire the salvation of your soul, is God bound to comply with your desires, when you always resist and oppose his will? Is God bound to put honour upon you, and to advance you to such dignity as to be a child of the King of kings, and the heir of glory, while at the same time you set him too low to have even the lowest place in your heart?

This doctrine affords a strong argument for the absolute sovereignty of God, with respect to the salvation of sinners. If God is pleased to show mercy to his haters, it is certainly fit that he should do it in a sovereign way, without acting as any way obliged. God will show mercy to his mortal enemies; but then he will not be bound, he will have his liberty to choose the objects of his mercy; to show mercy to what enemy he pleases, and to punish and destroy which of his haters he pleases. And certainly this is a fit and reasonable thing. It is fit that God should distribute saving blessings in this way, and in no other, namely, in a sovereign and arbitrary way. And that ever anybody thought of or devised any other way for God to show mercy, than to have mercy on whom he will have mercy, must arise from ignorance of their own hearts, whereby they were insensible what enemies they naturally are to God. But consider here the following things:

1. How causelessly you are enemies to God. You have no manner of reason for it, either from what God is, or from what he has done. You have no reason for this from what he is. For he is an infinitely lovely and glorious Being; the fountain of all excellency, all that is amiable and lovely in the universe, is originally and eminently in him. Nothing can possibly be conceived of that could be lovely in God, that is not in him, and that in the greatest possible degree.

And you have no reason for this, from what God has done. For he has been a good and bountiful God to you. He has exercised abundance of kindness to you; has carried you from the womb, preserved your life, taken care of you, and provided for you, all your life long. he has exercised great patience and long-suffering towards you. If it had not been for the kindness of God to you, what would have become of you? What would have become of your body? And what, before this time, would have become of your soul? And you are now, every day and hour, maintained by the goodness and bounty of God. Every new breath you draw, is a new gift of his to you. How causelessly then are you such dreadful enemies to God! And how justly might he for it eternally deprive you of all mercy, seeing you do thus requite God for his mercy and kindness to you!

2. Consider, how you would resent it, if others were such enemies to you, as you are to God. If they had their hearts so full of enmity to you; if they treated you with such contempt, and opposed you, as you do God; how would you resent it! Do you not find that you are apt greatly to resent it, when any oppose you, and show an ill spirit towards you? And though you excuse your own enmity against God from your corrupt nature that you brought into the world with you, which you could not help; yet you do not excuse others for being enemies to you from their corrupt nature that they brought into the world, which they could not help; but are ready bitterly to resent it notwithstanding.

Consider therefore, if you, a poor, unworthy, unlovely creature, do so resent it, when you are hated, how may God justly resent it when you are enemies to him, an infinitely glorious Being; and a Being from whom you have received so much kindness!

3. How unreasonable is it for you to imagine that you can oblige God to have respect to you by anything that you can do, continuing still to be his enemy. If you think you have prayed, and read, and done something considerable for God; yet who cares for the seeming kindness of an enemy? What value would you yourself set upon a man making a show of friendship, when you knew at the same time, that he was inwardly your mortal enemy? Would you look upon yourself obliged for such respect and kindness? Would you not rather abhor it? Would you count such respect to be valued, as Joab's towards Amasa, who took him by the beard, and kissed him, and said, Art thou in health, my brother? And smote him at the same time under the fifth rib, and killed him! What if you do pray to God? Is he obliged to hear the prayers of an enemy? What if you have taken a great deal of pains, is God obliged to give heaven for the prayers of an enemy? He may justly abhor your prayers, and all that you do in religion, as the flattery of a mortal enemy. [Thomas Shepard calls any kind of prayer of this nature, a wicked presumption, highly provoking to God. Also, note Micah 3:4, "Then they will cry to the LORD, But He will not hear them; He will even hide His face from them at that time, Because they have been evil in their deeds." and John 9:31, "Now we know that God does not hear sinners;"]

The Conscience

Study this excerpt on what the conscience is. Flavel does an excellent job of it. From reading this, you'll see the way he (and other Reformers) interpret many bible passages in this light, hence the passage that says in Your light we see light, Ps 36:9 below - (light is knowledge in this case, which is part of God's glory; God's glory also consists in holiness, joy and happiness. These things such as knowledge (light) are communicated to God's elect, effecting their conversion, hence the effectual call...hence those who are the called). This is why multitudes, including me before I was converted, do not see; they do not see/understand or perceive spiritual things; it is all Greek to them, aka, foolishness (1Cor2:14). God had not spoken to them! i.e., communicated his light; hence, they are not in His light in order to see! God has not opened their eyes. The eyes of the elect, in each generation, he will open; but most eyes he leaves closed (God's judicial blinding of many). Read Isa. 6:9-10, And he said, "Go, and say to this people: "Keep on hearing,^[a] but do not understand; keep on seeing,^[b] but do not perceive.' ¹⁰ Make the heart of this people dull,^[c] and their ears heavy, and blind their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their hearts, and turn and be healed." This is not physical healing, but spiritual healing, i.e., saved from God's wrath due to the penalty of their sin! That being said, the scripture says that the Holy Spirit will convict the world of sin...by stirring up one's conscience so that they feel the guilt of sin, the remedy of which is Christ's speaking to the raging conscience likened by the raging waves of the sea, Peace be still. Flavel goes into this.

By this, it is clear that the prayer of an unconverted person does nothing to remove this guilt (which is a principle part or fruit of one being converted), that only Christ can remove! And he does this by the effectual call, as Owen stated, the only way of salvation is by effectual vocation. See John 6:44, & 65

Comments on Conscience by Flavel, pg 28, The Soul of Man

To this faculty [the understanding] belong two other excellent and wonderful powers of the soul, namely, 1. Thoughts 2. Conscience.

1. The power or ability of cogitation; "Thoughts are properly the actings and agitations of the mind, or any actual operation of the understanding." They are the musings of the mind, which are acted in the speculative part of the understanding. It is observable that the Hebrew word "suach", which is used for meditation, or thinking, signifies both to think and to speak in the mind. When the understanding, or mind resolves, and meditates the things that come into it, that very meditation is an inward speaking, or hidden word in the heart, Deut. 15:9. "Beware, lest there be a thought in thy wicked heart," as some render it: In the Hebrew it is "davar im levavech", a word in thy heart. So Mat. 9:3, 4. "eipon ei autois", "they spake within themselves," i.e. "they thought in their hearts." The objects presented to the mind are the companions with whom our hearts talk and converse.

Thoughts are the figments and creatures of the mind: they are formed within it, in multitudes innumerable. The power of cogitation is in the mind, yea, in the spirit of the mind.

"The fancy indeed, while the soul is embodied, ordinarily, and for the most part presents the appearances and likenesses of things to the mind;" but yet it can form thoughts of things which the fancy can present no image of, as when the soul thinks of God, or of itself. This power of cogitation goes with the soul, and is rooted in it when it is separated from the body; and by it we speak to God, and converse with angels, and other spirits in the unbodied state, as will be more fully opened in the process of this discourse.

2. The conscience belongs also to this faculty; for it being the judgement of a man upon himself, with respect or relation to the judgement of God, it must needs belong to the understanding part or faculty. "Thoughts are formed in the speculative, but conscience belongs to the practical understanding." It is a very high and awful power; it is solo Deo minor, and rides (as Joseph did) in the second chariot; the next and immediate officer under God. He says of conscience with respect to every man, as he once said of Moses with respect to Pharaoh. "See I have made thee a god to Pharaoh," Exod. 7:1. The voice of conscience is the voice of God; for it is his vicegerent and representative. What it binds on earth, is bound in heaven: and what it looseth on earth is loosed in heaven. It observes records, and bears witness of all our actions; and acquits and condemns, as in the name of God, for them. Its consolations are most sweet, and its condemnations most terrible: so terrible, that some have chosen death, which is the king of terrors, rather than to endure the scorching heat of their own consciences. The greatest deference and obedience is due to its command, and a man had better endure any rack or torture in the world, than incur the torments of it. It accompanies us as our shadow wherever we go: and when all others forsake us, (as at death they will) conscience is then with us, and is then never more active and vigorous than at that time. Nor does it forsake us after death; but where the soul goes, it goes, and will be its companion in the other world for ever. How glad would the damned be if they might but have left their consciences behind them, when they went hence! But as Bernard rightly says, "It is both witness, judge, tormentor, and prison;" it accuseth, judgeth, punisheth, and condemneth.

This is superb. My comments and added scriptures in [blue], red for emphasis.

CHAP. XX.

*Christ, with a word, can surging waves appease;
 His voice a troubled soul can quickly ease.*

OBSERVATION.

WHEN the sea works, and is tempestuous, it is not in the power of any creature to appease it. When the Egyptians would by their hieroglyphics express an impossibility, they did it by the picture of a man treading upon the waves. It is storied of Canute, an ancient Danish king, that when a mighty storm of flattery arose upon him, he appeased it by showing that he could not appease the sea. But one of his courtiers told him as he rode near the sea-side, 'That he was Lord of the sea as well as land.' 'Well, (said the king) we shall see that by and by;' and so went to the water-side, and with a loud voice cried, 'O ye seas and waves, come no further, touch not my feet.' But the sea came up notwithstanding that charge, and confuted the flattery. But now Jesus Christ hath command of them indeed. It is said of him, Mat. 8:26, That he rebuked them. And Mark 4:38, He quiets them with a word, Peace, be still; as one would hush a child, and it obeyed him.

APPLICATION.

Conscience, when awakened by the terrors of the Lord, is like a raging tempestuous sea; so it works, so it roars; and it is not in the power of all creatures to hush or quiet it. Spiritual terrors, as well as spiritual consolations are not known till felt. O when the arrows of the Almighty are shot into the spirit, and the terrors of God set themselves in array against the soul; when the venom of those arrows drink up the spirits, and those armies of terrors charge violently and successively upon it, as Job 6:4 [For the arrows of the Almighty are in me; my spirit drinks their poison; the terrors of God are arrayed against me.] What creature then is able to stand before them! Even God's own dear children have felt such terrors as have, distracted them, Ps. 81:15. Conscience is the seat of guilt; it is like a burning glass, so it contracts the beams of the threatenings, twists them together, and reflects them on the soul, until it smoke, scorch, and flame. If the wrath of the king be like the roaring of a lion, then what is the Almighty's wrath! which is burning wrath, Job 19:11 [He has also kindled His wrath against me.], a tearing wrath, Ps. 50:22 [Now consider this, you who forget God, Lest I tear you in pieces, And there be none to deliver:], a surprising wrath, Job 20:23, and an abiding wrath, Job 3:36 [no such verse; copying error].

In this case no creature can relieve; all are physicians of no value; some under these terrors have thought hell more tolerable, and by a violent hand have thrust themselves out of the world into it to avoid these gnawings. [which is why many commit suicide after heinous acts, e.g., Judas, mass killers nowadays, etc.] Yet Jesus Christ can quickly calm these mystical waves also, and hush them with a word; yea, he is the physician, and no other. It is the sprinkling of his blood [reference to the sacrifices, the sprinkling of blood mentioned in Leviticus], which, like a cooling fomentation, allays those heats within. That blood of sprinkling speaks peace, when all others have practiced upon the soul to no purpose; and the reason is, because he is a Person, in whom God and man, justice and mercy meet and kiss each other, Eph. ii. 14. And hence fetches in peace to the soul, Rom. v. 1.

REFLECTION.

Can none appease a troubled conscience but Christ? Then learn, O my soul, to understand, and daily more and more to savor that glorious name, even Jesus, that delivers not only from the wrath to come, but that which is felt here also. O, if the foretaste of hell be so intolerable, if a few drops, let fall on the conscience in this life be so scalding and insufferable, what is it to have all the vials poured out to eternity, when there shall be nothing to divert, mitigate, or allay it?

Here men have somewhat to abate those terrors, some hopes of mercy, at least a possibility; but there is none. O my soul! how art thou loaded with guilt ! and what a Magormissabib wouldst thou be, should God rouse that sleepy lion in thy bosom! My condition is not at all the better because my conscience is quiet. Ah! the day is coming when it must awake, and will lighten and thunder terribly within me, if I get not into Christ the sooner. O Lord, who knows the power of thy wrath? O let me not carry this guilt out of the world with me, to maintain those everlasting flames, let me give no sleep to mine eyes, nor slumber to mine eye-lids, till I feel the comfort of that blood of sprinkling, which alone speaketh peace. [Men of all sorts seek to quiet their consciences by various means; by false professions of faith, just going to church, hanging out with Christians, going through various religious services can quiet conscience, doing religious works of all sorts, i.e., trusting in duties, drowning themselves in worldly activities, drinking to excess, etc. This is the main purpose of all false religions - to quiet conscience; to pacify an angry God! who they know they have not obeyed. Wow! Now you see the import of John 6:63, It is the Spirit who gives life; the flesh profits nothing. The words that I speak to you are spirit, and they are life. And, John 15:3, You are already clean because of the word which I have spoken to you. Clean from what? Cleansed from their guilt that was associated with sin; and guilt has to do with punishment; but those who are in Christ (those to whom God has effectually spoken to or called) are no longer under condemnation that was due to guilt, Rom. 8:1. So, true peace of mind is a clear conscience! But many say peace, peace when there is no peace, [peace with God and hence peace of conscience as well] Jer. 6:14, They have healed the wound of my people lightly, saying, 'Peace, peace,' when there is no peace. This is why it is vital to be under a good pastor who does not sugarcoat the gospel message of faith in Christ and repentance of sin (corrupt interpretations designed to accommodate carnal apprehensions).]

THE POEM

Among the dreadful works of God, I find
No metaphors to paint a troubled mind.
I think on this, now that, and yet will neither Come fully up, though all be put together.
'Tis like the raging sea that casts up mire,
Or like to Aetna, breathing smoke and fire;
Or like a roused lion, fierce and fell;
Or like those furies that do howl in hell.
O conscience! who can stand before thy power,
Endure thy gripes and twinges but an hour?
Stone, gout, strappado [torture], racks, whatever is Dreadful to sense, is but a toy to this.
No pleasures, riches, honours, friends can tell
How to give ease: In this 'tis like to hell.
Call for the pleasant timbrel, lute, and harp;
Alas! the music howls, the pain's too sharp
For these to charm, divert, or lull asleep;
These cannot reach it, no, the wound's too deep.
Let all the promises before it stand.
And set a Barnabas at its right hand;
These in themselves no comfort can afford,
'Tis Christ, and none but Christ can speak the word.
And he no sooner speaks but all is still,
The storm is over, and the mind tranquil.
There goes a pow'r, with his majestic voice,
To hush the dreadful storm, and still its noise.
Who would but fear and love this glorious Lord,
That can rebuke such tempests with a word?

Principle of Spiritual Life

On Self-examination Regarding Natural Principles vs.
The Principle of Spiritual Life

Parable of the Ten Virgins, p 282

Section IV Of Trial. We live in a country which hath goodly trappings, rich hangings glorious profession, burning lamps, and hence many think themselves rich when indeed poor; many look to meet the bridegroom when indeed they shall be shut out from the fellowship of the bridegroom. How shall I know that that all my sorrows, prayers, reformation, profession, is but a paint an appearance a fashion a church craft which will stand me in no stead when the Lord shall appear who shall judge the secrets of all hearts, by the word you hear this day; try it therefore by this rule, does it come from a principle of life or no? Your lamp burns, but look what is in your vessel that feeds this flame. That, as our divines speak, how the disciples could do greater works than Christ, and others wrought miracles besides Christ; how, then do they prove that he is Christ?

It is answered, in all his miraculous works we are to consider not only quid fecit i.e., what he did, but qua virtute fecit, from what power he did. The apostles and others did miracles but it was aliena virtute; Christ did them, but it was propria virtute. So many an unsound heart, he may do greater works than saints, and his lamp burn brighter.

Therefore, in this case, we are not to look so much to what is done, as from what power and principle it is done; for therein the best hypocrite ever fails. We shall ever observe in some beasts there are umbra rationis [shadow account], yet there is no rational soul, nor any wise man will believe that their acts proceed from such a principle; so there are shadows of the power of grace in a carnal heart, and yet no judicious Christian will say they come from an inward soul or principle of life. Consider, therefore, whether there is this principle or no; you see there is profession, you have a name to live in the judgment of all the church, but search your hearts, and see from what principle it proceeds; for, if this be wanting all is nothing. As he that had beer given him, when milk and wine and sugar were put into it to mend it, said, the wine is good and the milk is good, but the beer is bad; so profession, affection is good, but the heart, the man, is bad; (Jer 2:22) "Though thou wash thee with nitre, thy sin is marked before the Lord." And that the trial may be full and fair, I shall show negatively the several sorts of men that act not from an inward principle, yet carry it out as though the bitterness of death was past, and the bridegroom theirs.

1. When a man's principle is nothing but the power of created nature expressing itself, and setting the best face forward, in the gilded rottenness of some moral performances, wherein a man saith he does what he can; for there is this principle in most of men, a desire to be saved; nature saith so; and according to the intention of this desire; so according men will do more or less; and hereupon soothe up themselves, when they see they cannot do as others do, or as the Lord commands, I do as well as I can. Nay, when condemned by the word which meets them, I do as well as I can, I believe, I repent, I pray, I remember the word, I do as well as I can; and so they hope God accepts of that; and though I believe no man but may be hired to do more than he does, yet nature may do much. Hence, I heard an Arminian once say, If faith will not work it, then set reason a work, and we know how men have been kings and lords over their own passions by improving reason, and from some experience of the power of nature men have come to write large volumes in defense of it; and it is known the Arminians, though they ascribe somewhat to grace, and in words all to grace, yet indeed they lay the main stress of the work upon a man's own will and the royalty and sovereignty of that liberty. But to leave them, and to come to ourselves, is it not a common thing for men to make lies their refuge, and to say, I was in a woeful condition once, and never looked after God, but now I bless the Lord it is otherwise with me? How? Now I believe, repent, etc.

And so I confess all I do is full of weaknesses, yet I do what I can; and thus they are like to men that have old garments new dressed, they have made them as good as they can and like the young man, (Luke xviii 21), "All these things have I done from my youth; yet one thing was wanting, which was to forsake all, and so himself, that the disciples said, Who then can be saved? With man it is impossible, but with God all things are possible."

You say you do as much as you can; I say do so, but it is impossible for man from any strength of man, and you have no more yet; John 1:13, "Born again not of the will of man, but of God." There is in some men a birth, like to the new birth, which is of the will and power of man; but, O, this is not this inward principle which the almighty power of God creates; and therefore know it, if you get no other oil in your lamps, you shall never meet the bridegroom.

2. When a man's principle is the power of holy example, whereby many a one is drawn to do more than otherwise he would. Many men think for a while as that man spoke; men talk of being worth thousands, I would fain see the men, ministers preach and others speak well, we must do this and that, but I would fain see the men that do it. Now it sometimes falls out that the Lord sets before men's eyes some pattern Christians; hereupon they think thus: Here are two contrary ways, they cannot both lead to heaven, their way is better than mine, and doubtless leads to life; mine doth not, therefore let me live like them. And hence there shall not be any fast but they will be at it, not a sermon near but they will go wet and dry to hear it, nor any duty in family but they will imitate it, and hence read and learn, that they may be like them. No Christians in the country hated but they will love them, nor ceremonies cast off but they will abhor them; and hence they reflect upon their patterns and think their estate safe, because they are as good as a Christian's outside. And hence, like some dead cattle, there is nothing good but their skin, so there is nothing good in these but their imitating outside. Thus it was with Joash while Jehoiada lived, 2 Chron 24. Hence, he fell like ivy with the oak, when God cut him down. Thus it was with these five foolish virgins; a man may follow good examples, but not rest in bare imitation of them. And hence, a blessed man is described (Ps 1) negatively, from not imitating the wicked, not from imitating the good; because good men may be in many things ill examples, and it ever proves so in these men that have no more than this principle; hence, if they be loose in their tongues, or on the Sabbath, their plea is, they are like unto them. And hence, come all your acquired excellencies; a man is an imitating creature, led by example, and a carnal man, out of the heart of hypocrisy in himself, will imitate the divine nature which is in another, and hence, men not only take up such practices, but such opinions only, because such and such are of that mind. And men change practices and opinions as examples do change; in Joshua's time, great reformation; he no sooner died, but all fell off again; then they were for purity of ordinances and God's worship, now they serve Balaam. O, consider here in an outward, but no inward principle.

3. Those whose principle is nothing but external applause and praise of men, and this will carry a man beyond all the best examples; nay, sometime to be singular and a man alone; a Pharisee's trumpet shall be heard to the town's end while simplicity walks through the town unseen. Hence, a man will sometimes covertly commend himself, and myself ever comes in, and tells you a long story of conversion, and a hundred to one if some lie or other slip not out with it. Why the secret meaning is, I pray admire me; hence complain of wants and weaknesses; pray, think what a broken-hearted Christian I am; and hence, if comforted, they complain, if not, they will comfort themselves; hence many lift up eyes and hands, and fetch deep sighs in prayer, remember and note sermons, look now what a gift I have, hence, if you come to their company, they will have so many good words as may make you think well of them, and then the market is almost done with them, hence men forsake their friends, and trample underfoot the scorns of the world, they have credit elsewhere. To maintain their interest in the love of godly men they will suffer much; hence men in the ministry pray for grace to beautify and perfect their parts, that so they may preach, and convert, and have credit; hence men meditate new light, and profess deep things that few know, that men may worship the rising sun; hence the Lord is neglected secretly, yet honored openly, because there is no wind in their chambers to blow their sails, and therefore, there they stand still, hence many men keep their profession when they lose their affection, they have by the one a name to live, and that is enough, though their hearts be dead; and hence so long as you love or commend them, so long they love you, but if not they will forsake you; they were warm only by another's fire, and hence having no principle of life within, soon grow dead. This is the water that turns a Pharisee's mill and the Lord passes a heavy doom, "You have your reward." I have wondered that the opinion of men, nay, dream of men's thoughts should act men; only it is a curse of God, that when men despise his honor, the greatest good, they shall be fed with the basest good,

4. Those whose principle is nothing else but their own gain of outward blessings. Many there be that make not their honor so much as their bellies their gods and they rule them, (Phil 3:19), hence the shopkeeper will give good words when he sells his commodity, he should lose much of his custom else; and hence the minister preaches conscionably that his gain may come in, 1 Thess 2:4, 5. Hence people would be as good as the best, they cannot get a lot in all the country else. Hence a man is sometime content to forsake all for Christ, that he may make a booty of Christ as Judas did. Hence when Christ feeds them with loaves, then the people will make him a king, (John 6), though afterward they cry, Crucify him. So men deal with Christ as the soldiers did that caught him, that they might strip him of his garments. And hence many men if they see sorrows and wants attending them, if they attend on Christ, forsake him. Look upon our own land; many, so long as they could enjoy Christ with fair weather, cry out of ceremonies, and profaning of Sabbath; yet this not being to be had, creep to them, and read the book for profaning thereof. Many shadows have been seen since our sun hath risen here, and this way they looked; but viewing other men's wants, and fearing their own losses, and conceiving they may meet with Massah in this wilderness, refuse to follow. And lest this should seem to be the cause, cry out, we are separatists, or strongly possess themselves against all relations, there is no living at all here.

Look but at home; how many doves (that prove but ravens and live on the prey) come hither to our windows, and have followed Christ to this world's end; when he fed them with loaves, they made him their king; but now he hath taken away what once they desired, because there is better bread to be labored for; now they forsake him, and live on the spoil. This is no inward principle. And hence when men's expenses for Christ exceed their receipts from Christ, they cease spending, and fall in the highway to begging at the door of the world.

5. Those whose principle is nothing else but the strength of natural conscience which will set men a-doing when they have neither praise from men nor gain from Christ for their labor. For the Lord deals with some men as the Romans did with some of their prisoners; they would chain a prisoner and his keeper together, and let them go up and down; so God chains many a poor prisoner of hell and his conscience together, and lets them go together. And hence many a man keeps peace with his conscience and cannot give it the slip for all the world heaped up with gold as Balaam said.

Now there are two things in a natural conscience, Rom 2:15 .

1. To accuse; hence a man dares not omit prayer, dares not commit a sin he has a mind to; conscience would then roar. Hence many keep constantly set duties in private, and tremble at small sins; not because they take any delight in the one or are weary of the other, but because they are ever under the eye of this judge.

2. To excuse, and to give much sweetness when a man follows the dictates thereof; hence a man, though carnal, will die for his religion, and that with some cheerfulness, because conscience cheers within, and sings him asleep in trouble. And hence a man will cry out of all the glorious hypocrisies of men because to walk according to conscience is sweeter to him. And hence a man comforts himself, It is my conscience; (Mark 12:33) to love God “is better than burnt offerings.” Hence a man will profit exceedingly in what he holds (Gal. 1:14), because zealous for it for conscience; and yet this is but a principle of nature, not an inward principle of life, whose property is to seek the subversion of corrupt nature, as natural conscience seeks the garnishing of it and the actions thereof.

6. Those whose principle is the fear of death and hell; raised not so much by the power of conscience as by the power of the Word. And hence come complaints about a man's estate; that a man can have no rest by all duties that he has done, or does. Hence following of the means, running to the best ministry, mourning and lamenting and confessing sin; (Matt 3:7) “O generation of vipers,” etc. And hence prizing of favor and comfort, Ps 78:34, 35. Hence many do take this for their conversion, and say, I heard such a minister at such a time, and then I cried out I was damned, and thought I saw the devil; yea, and to hell you may for all this, if no other principle. Indeed there is this fear in the elect, but drives them to the ark, as Noah, but those, when their fear is over, they fall to fight against the Lord.

7. Those whose principle is nothing else but the immediate actings of the Spirit of God upon them. For sometime the Spirit of God comes upon men as light shines on the mud wall, yet dwells not there as in the sun. And hence many speak, pray, prophesy admirably, as Balaam, Num 24:3, 4. Many men, like carters, bring others' goods that are not possessors of them. Now, these are,

1. External enlargements. And hence a man doth many things which he has no inward power to perform; the Spirit is there assisting; hence, he cannot do so at another time, but it is the Spirit only assisting. And hence a man may have abundance of knowledge and he not affected with it; he may live and pray with applause of men, others wish they were like him, yet live without love and speak without feeling, and do without life; hence men leave themselves here.

2. Internal pangs. The Spirit of God begets some inward grief, especially when outward evils press, then inward flashes and desires, but they are soon done. There is no spring, no principle within. What the difference is between saints' unevenness and this inconstancy you shall hear hereafter, yet these are wrestlings of spirit not yet conquering, and hence it possesses not the soul.

8. When men's principle is nothing else but common gifts, which are inward, and abiding long in the soul. That a man now thinks he has grace, and sure signs of the Lord's love, and here is fastened. When there be two things wherein it appears there is no inward principle:

1. These gifts ever puff up, and make a man something in his own eyes, as the Corinthian knowledge did. And many a private man thinks himself fit to be a minister, many a minister better than all the parish besides when Paul was the least of all the saints. And hence commonly they degenerate to pride and form.

2. These keep men strangers to Christ and the life of faith; they have these affections, yet, ignorant of Christ, take these as signs of his love, and live without him. And this is indeed the inner principle which all the wicked in the world want [lack]; there is in true grace an infinite circle. A man by thirsting receives, and receiving, thirsts for more. But hence the Spirit is not poured out abundantly on churches because men shut it out by shutting in and contenting themselves with their common graces and gifts, Matt 7:29. Examine if it be thus. If so,

1. You cannot come to the Lord; John 5:44, "How can ye believe?"

2. Nor to receive anything from the Lord if you do, James 4:3, "when you ask to spend it on your lust," when that carries you.

3. This pulls down the kingdom of the Lord Jesus when other things rule us and not himself alone.

4. Satan will have this against you as against Job, "You serve not the Lord for nought." To what purpose are your new moons, church reformations, if it be thus? Now, because it hath been replied to what was formerly said, that Christ was the vessel not our souls, I shall, therefore, confirm the latter to be the truth by these reasons:

1. Mystical places of Scripture are to be interpreted by plain. Now, though Christ may be the antitype of these vessels of the temple, yet he is not plainly said to be a vessel; but souls are called so, Rom 9:23; 2Cor 4:7, Acts 9:15. "Paul is a chosen vessel." 1Thes 4:4, "We are to possess our vessels in holiness." 2 Tim 2:20, "Vessels of honor"

2. The Spirit is not in Christ as in a vessel, but as in a fountain; hence John 3:34, "Christ hath received the Spirit without measure."

3. The foolish virgins had vessels, because it is said, "They took their lamps but no oil with them." Their folly was not in not providing vessels. Hence the foolish virgins did not afterward beg their vessels, but their oil.

4. The wisdom of the wise did appear in that they did provide oil for their vessels. If, therefore, the vessel be Christ, therein lies the wisdom of the wise, that they got the Spirit to put into Christ, and the folly of the foolish they got not the Spirit to put into him. Or the one got Christ Jesus full of the Spirit, the other Christ Jesus void of it. When whoever hath Christ must have in him the fullness of the Spirit also.

5. The other interpretation crosses the main scope of this part of the parable, which is to show the difference between the virgins. All professed Christ went to meet the bridegroom, but here was the difference; they never looked for to get the Spirit in them. And this is most suitable to men raised out of the dregs of Popery, where works being abolished, Christ is owned, and therein do well, but herein fail.

Thus you have heard the use of trial negatively. What this inward principle is affirmatively you have generally heard, and shall more particularly in the other two doctrines. Only this I shall add it consists of two parts:

1. Our life in Christ by faith
2. Christ's life in us by his Spirit.

Faith empties the soul and looks upon it as dead and sees its life laid up in Christ, and hence forsakes itself and embraces the Lord of glory. Secondly, The Spirit comes and possesses a forsaken empty house and there lives and dwells. Both these the apostle mentions, Gal 2:20, Eph 3:17, John 15:4. As two married together, their souls live not where they are, but in each other. The one cares not how to please herself but her husband and e contra. So that lest any weak soul should be discouraged, that thinks there is no principle of life, because such a blind, empty, dead heart, wandering from God, etc. Nay, when the Lord quickens it, O, it is lost again. Nay when quickened, O, then, when it comes to, it is so feeble! I tell you it must be so. This makes you lay up your life in him; this death is your life. And lest any false heart should be here deceived that says he has Christ, "If you have not the Spirit of Christ you are none of his." The saints have this sometime, their temple is filled with glory; and for their general course they are admirers of the Lord Jesus, and account his life to be life, and all their life beside to be continual death. There is not any grace but they say, O that I had it!

The Consequences of False Doctrine

(a general redemption) illustrated by Elisha Coles,
A Practical Discourse on God's Sovereignty, p127

For, according to the principles of general redemption, he [God] did and does for all alike; and no more for one than for another.

6. It makes men presumptuous, and carnally secure: how many have soothed up themselves in their impenitency and hardness of heart, and fenced themselves against the word, on this very supposition, That Christ died for all; and why then should not they look to be saved as well as any other? and so they lean, pretendedly, on the Lord, and transgress; not considering, that those for whom Christ died, he purchased for them a freedom from sin, and not a liberty of sinning; nor impunity, but on terms of faith and repentance. And that the tempter disturbs them not in their rest on such a foundation, may be one reason why men so stiffly adhere to it; and that those of the general principle are so seldom troubled with terrors of conscience. - Elisha Coles

My comment: Profession of faith does not save anyone. For many wanted to enter in, and though they said that they prophesied and cast out demons in His name etc., they were refuse at last, "depart from Me..." The only way of salvation is by effectual vocation; that is, you must be called; and the evidence that one is effectually called is that he has been given a new heart, i.e., regeneration has taken place by the Spirit of God, Titus 3:5, John 3:8 etc. To rest your hope on a profession is a weak foundation. Therefore, the scriptures admonishes us to examine ourselves to see if this regeneration has actually taken place, to see if we are in the faith and exhibit fruit that is meet for repentance, Matt 3:8, James 2:18...

A Right Anthropology

code109 code239

From The Parable of the Ten Virgins
by Thomas Shepard

Pg 142-143

This is why prayers like the Sinner's Prayer are presumptuous and greatly provoke God. They flow from wicked principles and not from a new principle of life which only those who have been truly converted.

1. The root that bears this wild fruit is a degenerate root, and that is the cause of all this sourness and harshness in the fruit it bears; it is the seed of some better tree accidentally blown, or cast into some waste and bad soil, where not being manured and ordered aright, it is turned wild. So all the fruits of unregenerate men flow from the first

Adam, a corrupt and degenerate root; he was indeed planted a right seed, but soon turned a wild and degenerate plant; he being the root from which every man naturally springs, corrupts all the fruit that any man bears from him. It is observed by Gregory pertinently to my present purpose, Genus humanum in parente primo, velut in radice putruit: Mankind was putrefied in the root of its first parent, Matt. vii. 18, "A corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit."

2. This corrupt root spoils the fruit, by the transmission of its sour and naughty sap into all the branches and fruits that grow upon it; they suck no other nourishment, but what the root affords them, and that being bad, spoils all; for the same cause and reason, no mere natural or unregenerate man can ever do one holy or acceptable action, because the corruption of the root is in all those actions. The necessity of our drawing corruption into all our actions, from this cursed root Adam, is expressed by a quick and smart interrogation, Job xiv. 4, "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one." The sense of it is well delivered us (by Mr. Caryl, in loc.) This question (saith he) may undergo a twofold construction. First, thus, Who can bring a morally clean person out of a person originally unclean? And so he lays his hand upon his birth-sin. Or, Secondly, which speaks to my purpose, it may refer to the action of the same man; man being unclean, cannot bring forth a clean thing; i.e., a clean or holy action; that which is originated is like its original. And that this sour sap of the first stock (I mean Adam's sin) is transmitted into all mankind, not only corrupting their fruit, but ruining and withering all the branches, the apostle shows us in that excellent parallel betwixt the two Adam's, Rom. V. 12 "Wherefore, as by one man [one, not only in individuo, sed in specie, one representing the whole root or stock,] sin entered into the world," not by imitation only, but by propagation; and this brought death and ruin upon all the branches.

3. Although these wild hedge-fruits be unwholesome and unpleasant to the taste, yet they are fair and beautiful to the eye; a man that looks upon them, and doth not know what fruit it is, would judge it by its show and color, to be excellent fruit; for it makes a fairer show oftentimes than the best and most wholesome fruit doth; even so, these natural gifts and endowments which some unregenerate persons have, seem exceeding fair to the eye, and a fruit to be desired. What excellent qualities have some mere natural men and women! What a winning affability, humble condescension, meekness, righteousness, ingenuous tenderness and sweetness of nature! As it was (hyperbolically enough) said of one, In hoc homine, non peccavit Adam: Adam never sinned in this man; meaning that he excelled the generality of Adam's children in sweetness of temper and natural endowments. What curious fantasies, nimble wits, solid judgments, tenacious memories, rare elocution, etc., are to be found among mere natural men! By which they are assisted in discoursing, praying, preaching and writing to the admiration of such as know them. But that which is highly esteemed of men, is abomination to God, Luke xvi. 15. It finds no acceptance with him, because it springs from that cursed root of nature, and is not the production of his own Spirit.

The following excerpt of Jonathan Edwards' sermon is a very good reproof for those who oppose unconditional election, the limited atonement, and irresistible grace, and who promote the sinner's prayer, all of which fall under the category, contending with your maker. Excellent.

Application

A manifold improvement might be made of this doctrine, which a little reflection may suggest to each of us. But the improvement which I shall at this time make of it, shall be only in a use of reproof to such under convictions of sin, and fears of hell, as are not still, but oppose the sovereignty of God in the disposals of his grace. This doctrine shows the unreasonableness, and dreadful wickedness, of your refusing heartily to own the sovereignty of God in this matter. It shows that you know not that God is God. If you knew this, you would be inwardly still and quiet; you would humbly and calmly lie in the dust before a sovereign God, and would see sufficient reason for it.

In objecting and quarrelling about the righteousness of God's laws and threatenings, and his sovereign dispensations towards you and others, you oppose his divinity, you show your ignorance of his divine greatness and excellency, and that you cannot bear that he should have divine honor. It is from low, mean thoughts of God, that you do in your minds oppose his sovereignty, that you are not sensible how dangerous your conduct is; and what an audacious thing it is for such a creature as man to strive with his Maker.

What poor creatures are you, that you should set up yourselves for judges over the Most High; that you should take it upon you to call God to an account; that you should say to the great Jehovah, what dost thou? and that you should pass sentence against him! If you knew that he is God, you would not act in this manner; but this knowledge would be sufficient to still and calm you concerning all God's dispensations, and you would say with Eli, in 1 Sam. iii. 18. "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth good in his sight."—But here I shall be more particular in several things.

1. It is from mean thoughts of God that you are not convinced that you have by your sins deserved his eternal wrath and curse. If you had any proper sense of the infinite majesty, greatness, and holiness of God, you would see, that to be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, and there to have no rest day nor night, is not a punishment more than equal to the demerit of sin. You would not have so good a thought of yourselves; you would not be so clean and pure in your own eyes; you would see what vile, unworthy, hell-deserving creatures you are. If you had not little thoughts of God, and were to consider how you have set yourselves against him—how you have slighted him, his commandments and threatenings, and despised his goodness and mercy, how often you have disobeyed, how obstinate you have been, how your whole lives have been filled up with sin against God—you would not wonder that God threatens to destroy you forever, but would wonder that he hath not actually done it before now.

If you had not mean thoughts of God, you would not find fault with him for not setting his love on you who never exercised any love to him. You would not think it unjust in God not to seek your interest and eternal welfare, who never would be persuaded at all to seek his glory; you would not think it unjust in him to slight and disregard you, who have so often and so long made light of God. If you had not mean thoughts of God, you never would think him obliged to bestow eternal salvation upon you, who have never been truly thankful for one mercy which you have already received of him.—What do you think of yourselves? what great ideas have you of yourselves? and what thoughts have you of God, that you think he is obliged to do so much for you though you treat him ever so ungratefully for the kindness which he hath already bestowed upon you all the days of your lives? It must be from little thoughts of God, that you think it unjust in him not to regard you when you call upon him; when he hath earnestly called to you, so long and so often, and you would not be persuaded to hearken to him. What thoughts have you of God, that you think he is more obliged to hear what you say to him, than you are to regard what he says to you?

It is from diminutive thoughts of God, that you think he is obliged to show mercy to you when you seek it, though you have been for a long time willfully sinning against him, provoking him to anger, and presuming that he would show you mercy when you should seek it. What kind of thoughts have you of God, that you think he is obliged, as it were, to yield himself up to be abused by men, so that when they have done, his mercy and pardoning grace shall not be in his own power, but he must be obliged to dispense them at their call?

2. It is from little thoughts of God, that you quarrel against his justice in the condemnation of sinners, from the doctrine of original sin. It must be because you do not know him to be God, and will not allow him to be sovereign. It is for want of a sense how much God is above you, that those things in him which are above your comprehension, are such difficulties and stumbling-blocks to you: it is for want of a sense how much the wisdom and understanding of God are above yours, and what poor, short-sighted, blind creatures you are, in comparison with him. If you were sensible what God is, you would see it most reasonable to expect that his ways should be far above the reason of man, and that he dwells in light which no man can approach unto, which no man hath seen, nor can see.—If men were sensible how excellent and perfect a Being he is, they would not be so apt to be jealous of him, and to suspect him in things which lie beyond their understandings. It would be no difficulty with them to trust God out of sight. What horrid arrogance in worms of the dust, that they should think they have wisdom enough to examine and determine concerning what God doth, and to pass sentence on it as unjust! If you were sensible how great and glorious a being God is, it would not be such a difficulty with you to allow him the dignity of such absolute sovereignty, as that he should order as he pleases, whether every single man should stand for himself, or whether a common father should stand for all.

3. It is from mean thoughts of God, that you trust in your own righteousness, and think that God ought to respect you for it. If you knew how great a Being he is, if you saw that he is God indeed, you would see how unworthy, how miserable a present it is to be offered to such a Being. It is because you are blind, and know not what a Being he is with whom you have to do, that you make so much of your own righteousness. If you had your eyes open to see that he is God indeed, you would wonder how you could think to commend yourselves to so great a Being by your gifts, by such poor affections, such broken prayers, wherein is so much hypocrisy, and so much selfishness.—If you had not very mean thoughts of God, you would wonder that ever you could think of purchasing the favor and love of so great a God by your services. You would see that it would be unworthy of God to bestow such a mercy upon you, as peace with him, and his everlasting love, and the enjoyment of himself, for such a price as you have to offer; and that he would exceedingly dishonor himself in so doing.—If you saw what God is, you would exclaim, as Job did, Job xlii. 5, 6. “Now mine eye seeth thee; wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.” And as Isaiah did, chap. vi. 5. “Woe is me, for I am undone, because I am a man of unclean lips; for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts.”

4. It is from mean thoughts of God, that you contend with him, because he bestows grace on some, and not on others. Thus God doth: he hath mercy on whom he will have mercy; he takes one, and leaves another, of those who are in like circumstances; as it is said of Jacob and Esau, while they were not yet born, and had done neither good nor evil, Rom. ix. 10-13. With this sinners often quarrel; but they who upon this ground quarrel with God, suppose him to be bound to bestow his grace on sinners, for if he be bound to none, then he may take his choice, and bestow it on whom he pleases; and his bestowing it on some brings no obligation on him to bestow it on others. Has God no right to his own grace? is it not at his own disposal? and is God incapable of making a gift or present of it to any man? for a person cannot make a present of that which is not his own, or in his own right. It is impossible to give a debt.

But what a low thought of God does this argue! Consider what it is you would make of God. Must he be so tied up, that he cannot use his own pleasure in bestowing his own gifts? Is he obliged to bestow them on one, because it is his pleasure to bestow them on another? Is not God worthy to have the same right to dispose of his gifts, as a man has of his money? or is it because God is not so great, and therefore should be more subject, more under bounds, than men? Is not God worthy to have as absolute a propriety in his goods as man has in his? At this rate, God cannot make a present of anything; he has nothing of his own to bestow. If he have a mind to show a peculiar favor to some, to lay some under special obligations, he cannot do it, on the supposition, because his favor is not at his own disposal! The truth is, men have low thoughts of God, or else they would willingly ascribe sovereignty to him in this matter. Matt. xx. 15. “Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good?”

God is pleased to show mercy to his enemies, according to his own sovereign pleasure. And surely it is fit he should. How unreasonable is it to think that God stands bound to his enemies! Therefore consider what you do in quarrelling with God, and opposing his sovereignty. Consider with whom it is you contend. Let all who are sensible of their misery, and afraid of the wrath of God, consider these things. Those of you who have been long seeking salvation, but are in great terrors through fear that God will destroy you, consider what you have heard, be still, and know that he is God. When God seems to turn a deaf ear to your cries; when he seems to frown upon you; when he shows mercy to others, your equals, or those who are worse, and who have been seeking a less time than you; be still. Consider who he is that disposes and orders these things. You shall consider it; you shall know it: he will make all men to know that he is God. You shall either know it for your good here, by submission, or to your cost hereafter.

Notes on the Impassibility of God

This is a brief comment on God’s impassibility, God without passions who never changes, his immutability, his simplicity, one divine essence, his eternal decrees, etc., all of which are inconsistent with a man centered, Arminian view of conversion; who or what the determining cause.

...for we know that these feelings belong not to God; he cannot be touched with repentance, and his heart cannot undergo changes. To image such a thing would be impiety. But the design is to show, that if he dealt with the people of Israel as they deserved, they would be made like Sodom and Gomorra. But as God was merciful, and embrace his people with paternal affection, he could not forget that he was a Father, but would be willing to grant pardon; as is the case with a father, who, on seeing his son's wicked disposition, suddenly feels a strong displeasure, and then, being seized with relenting, is inclined to spare him. God then declares that he would thus deal with his people. John Calvin Commentaries, 13:402.

In the end, if God were seen as wishing for what he had not ordained, or changing his determined course of action based on his emotions, there would be implications for the entire doctrine of God. The 2nd London Confession of Faith closely connects God's spirituality, simplicity, and impassibility. For God to wish for what he has not ordained implies disunity in God, where one "part" of God is wishing for something which another "part" of God had chosen not to ordain. The resultant view of God would come dangerously close to denying his unity and simplicity, seeing God as composed of parts and attributes, rather than being one, simple, spiritual, perfect being whose essence is not a conglomeration of attributes but a united and singular whole. God is as much "without...parts" as he is "without...passion," and the two are inextricably connected. Confessing the Impassible God, pg 157-8

In other words for God to wish for someone to receive him, to believe on Him, that all God does is to wish they will repent, believe, etc., and that he is waiting for them to decide, is inconsistent with God immutability, his sovereignty over the wills of men, and his eternal decree to save some, and pass over others...even as he chose us in him before the foundation of the world, Eph. 1:4. God is not dependent upon the creature, but the creature dependent upon God. In some cases, it sounds like this is so, that God is waiting for man to respond from own resources, but this is only a anthropopathism, were God is lowering himself to our capacity of finite understanding, analogically speaking, so as to excite us to consider our miserable condition and hence our duty to believe, yet it is the Spirit who must work it and will work it in his elect.

This is excellent – describes the dangers of this fatal security as well as what constitutes a true conversion.

The Danger of the Common Profession of Christianity

excerpt from:

The Second Part,
evincing the Possibility, Necessity, and Excellency Of Conversion to God

The only thing that makes men truly happy, and perfectly blessed in the world to come

§ IV. Conversion frequently and fatally mistaken,

2. Some think, the common profession of Christianity makes men Christians enough; they are no Heathens, Mahometans, or idolatrous Papists; but Protestants, within the pale of the true church; that is, professed reformed Christians.

But, friends, I beg you to consider that convictive text, 1 Cor. 4:20, "The kingdom of God is not in word, but in power." Many there be, that in words confess Christ, but in works deny him. And why were the foolish virgins (that is, professed reformed Christians) shut out of the kingdom of God; if the lamp of verbal profession, without the oil of internal godliness, were enough for our salvation? Matt. 25:3, 12. Believe it, sirs, many will claim acquaintance with Christ upon this account, and expect favor from him in the great day, of whom he will profess he never knew them, Matt. 7:22. Christ need not have put men upon striving, as in an agony, to enter in at the strait gate, if baptism in our infancy, or verbal profession of Christianity, were all the difficulties men had to encounter in the way to heaven.

3. Formality in external duties of religion, is another fatal mistake of conversion. Have not these been the inward thoughts of your hearts? As bad as we are, though we take liberty to swear, be drunk, and unclean sometimes; yet we say our prayers, keep our church, and hope for heaven and salvation, as well as those that are more precise.

But tell me, gentlemen, seriously, what do you say, or plead for yourselves more in all this, than those convicted hypocrites did, Isa. 58:2, "Yet they seek me daily, and delight to know my way, as a nation that did righteousness, and forsook not the ordinances of their God. They ask of me the ordinances of justice, they take delight in approaching to God." Or to come nearer yet to your case, and cut off, at one stroke, forever this vain plea of yours, read and ponder God's own censure of it, in Jer. 7:8, 9, 10, 11, 12, "Behold, ye trust in lying words, that cannot profit. Will ye steal, murder, commit adultery, and swear falsely, &c. and come and stand before me in this house, which is called by my name, and say. We are delivered to do all these abominations? Is this house, which is called by my name, become a den of robbers in your eyes? Behold, even I have seen it, saith the Lord; but go ye now to my place, which was in Shiloh, where I set my name at the first, and see what I did to it, for the wickedness of my people Israel."

§ V. Of the nature of true conversion.

YOU have heard, that conversion does not consist in these external things; at your eternal peril be it, if you trust in them. But true conversion is the turning of the whole man to God, Acts 26:18, it is nothing less, than the total change of the inward temper and frame of the heart, and the external course of the life, Isa. 55:8. It is not the cool confession, but the real forsaking of sin, in which we shall find mercy, Prov. 28:13. Thy heart and will, love and delight, must turn sin out, and take Christ in, or thou art no gospel convert. A true convert loaths every sin, and himself for sin, Ezek. 36:31, but general confessions of sin are consistent with the full dominion of sin. Moreover, in all true conversion there is a positive turning unto God, a whole heart-choice of him, for your supreme and ultimate happiness and portion, Ps. 73:25³, [“Whom have I in heaven but You? And there is none upon earth that I desire besides You. My flesh and my heart fail; But God is the strength of my heart and my portion forever.”] and of the Lord Jesus Christ, as your Prince and Savior, Acts 5:31. And answerably, it will devote your whole life to his service and glory, Phil. 1:21. And thus it brings forth the new man, and the whole frame of your heart and life is marvelously changed and altered, 2Cor. 5:17, “Old things are passed away, behold, all things are become new.”

It may be, you will think such a change as this impossible to be made upon you. And so it is indeed, until the day of God's power come, Ps. 110:3¹, “They people shall be willing in the day of your power.” What! To forsake with loathing your old companions, and courses, which you have so long lived with and delighted in; and to embrace with highest pleasure, strict godliness, which you have so loathed, and ridiculed! This would be a strange alteration indeed. But as strange as it seems to be, it will be effected in a moment, when God fulfils that gracious promise (as I hope he is now doing) to you, Ezek. 36:26, “A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you.” Operations follow nature. When the heart of a beast was given to that great king Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. 5:21, his dwelling was with the wild asses; they fed him with grass, like oxen. But let the spirit of a man return to him again, and he will blush to think of his brutish company, and way of life; and so will you of yours also. As marvellous a change as this has passed upon as eminent and notorious sinners as yourselves, Gal. 1:22, the God of the spirits of all flesh can with ease and speed produce all this by that Almighty Power, whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself.

IF the Lord shall, in his rich grace and mercy to your souls, stir up in them the thoughts and resolutions of a change of your course; great care ought to be taken, in the time of this change, lest they miscarry in their remove from one state to another; multitudes miscarry betwixt a state of profaneness, and true godliness. To continue in the state of profaneness, is to be certainly lost; and so it is to take up short of Christ, in mere civility and formality in religion. This middle state takes up multitudes by the way, who do but change the open road, for a more private way to hell.

Mere civilized nature is unregenerated nature still; "They return, but not to the most High; they are like a deceitful bow," saith the prophet, Hosea vii. 16. They seem to aim at Christ, and salvation; but, as an arrow from a weak bow, it goes not home; or, as from a deceitful bow, it slants aside, and misses the mark. It is true, they are not openly profane, as they were before; but they take up and settle in an unregenerate state still: Their condition is the same, though their company be not.

This is excellently set forth by our Savior, Mat. xii. 43, 44, 45. The devil maybe cast out as a profane devil, and yet keep his propriety still as a former devil. The sense of that text is well expressed by one, in this note upon it; That a restraint by formality, keeps the devil's propriety, and disposes the soul to final apostasy. You are as far from Christ and salvation, under the power of formality, as you were before. He that is cured of a fever, hath no great cause to rejoice, if his fever has left him under a consumption, which will kill him as surely, though it may be less violently, or speedily.

WHATEVER the difficulties and hazards are, that attend this change by conversion unto God, the change itself is absolutely and indispensably necessary to every man's salvation. The door of salvation can never be opened, without the key of regeneration. Christ assures civil and formal Nicodemus, "That except he be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God," John 3:3. Think not conversion to be the attainment of some singular and extraordinary Christians, for it is the very point upon which every man's eternal happiness or misery depends. There is one law for all the world; they must be changed or damned. No restitutions or reformations, no common gifts or abilities, no religious duties or services, can save any man from hell, without a change by thorough conversion, Rom. 8:8, "They that are in the flesh, cannot please God."

Satisfy and please not yourselves with this: Though we live in sin, yet God is a merciful God. We will confess our sins to him, say our prayers, keep our church; and no doubt but God will be merciful to us, as well as others. Consider it, man, that this merciful God is also a God of truth; and this God of truth hath plainly assured thee, that all these external things signify nothing to thy salvation, unless you become a new creature, Gal. vi. 15, and that you must be born again, John 3:3. Say not, without this you will hope in God. If you hope in God, you must hope in his word, Ps. 119:11. Now here will you find that word in the bible, that warrants the hope of salvation in the unregenerate person? All scriptural hope is of a purifying nature, and evermore productive of a holy life, 1 John 3:3.

If you say, Christ died for the greatest of sinners, and you trust to be saved through him; it is true, he did so, but conversion is his only method of salvation, Tit. ii. 14, and those that are not washed by sanctification, have no part in him, or in his blood, John 13:8. He came not to save men continuing in their sins, but to save his people from their sins, Matt. 1:21. His way is to lead you through sanctification unto salvation, 2Thes. 2:13. If you have a mind to see whom, and how he saves; you have it before your eyes, Tit. i. 14, "Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." Those only are saved by him, that "denying ungodliness, and worldly lusts, live not only soberly and righteously, but godly in this present world."

And this is the change I am here pressing you to; and until this change be made, you cannot find yourselves within the compass of any covenant-promise, Eph. ii. 12, but if you will turn to Heb. 12:14, you may, the very next minute, find yourselves barred out of heaven by a scripture threatening. Let no man, therefore, impose so great a cheat upon his own soul, as once to imagine, that anything short of sound conversion can ever put him out of the danger of damnation.

It is not in any man's power to convert himself; but yet because every man might do more towards it than he doth do, and doth it not, he is justly chargeable with his own damnation. We are bid, and bound to strive to enter in at the strait gate, Luke xiii. 24. It is true, a man in his natural state, can do nothing that is spiritually, or supernaturally good; yet he can do, and forbear to do many things, the doing or forbearing of which, have a true (though remoter) tendency to his conversion; and not doing, or forbearing of them, his destruction is of and from himself.

You can, if you will, forbear to swear, and blaspheme the name of God. Who can, or does compel, or force your tongues to it? The devil can tempt, but not compel them; you can, if you will, stop, when nature is duly refreshed. Your wicked companions can provoke, but not force you. You can, if you please, shun lascivious books, and company, and keep your bodies chaste, at least from the external acts of uncleanness.

And why cannot you (if you please) perform, as well as neglect, the external acts of religious duties? The same feet that carry you to a tavern, can carry you to your closets, if you please to have them do so. Nor do I know any reason why you cannot compose yourselves, when engaged in God's public or private worship, to a close and serious attendance to those duties. The application of the mind to what is spoken is of great concernment to you; and if an unsanctified minister can apply his thoughts to compose a sermon, and preach it, I see no reason why an unsanctified hearer may not also compose, and apply his mind to hear it. And I am past all doubt, that something may be done beyond all this. You have some power certainly to reflect upon, and consider what concernment you have in the things you read or hear; and how they agree, or disagree with your experience.

Now, if men would but do this, (which certainly they have a power to do) though they cannot convert themselves, yet hereby they would lie in the hopeful way of converting grace; which is more than they could ever yet be persuaded to do. And though there be no positive certainty, or assurance, that conversion and salvation shall follow these acts; yet hope and probability are engagements enough. Hope sets all the world on work, without assurance. The ploughman ploughs in hope, and the merchant ventures in hope. Do but as much for your souls, as these do for their bodies.

“Will God ever ask you to do something you are not able to do? The answer is yes--all the time! It must be that way, for God's glory and kingdom. If we function according to our ability alone, we get the glory; if we function according to the power of the Spirit within us, God gets the glory. He wants to reveal Himself to a watching world.”

--Henry Blackaby—

The Arminians say that because God commands us to do something, like believing on the Son, we must, therefore have the innate ability to do so. Why else would he command us to repent and believe if we could not do it? their rationale goes. But this is a mistake. For if we had faith, God would not have to command us to believe, for we would believe already, because faith is believing (faith is often denominated as believing as well as *knowledge*¹). For not only is their anthropology wrong (man is dead in sin), but in order that God get all the glory of his free grace, the determining efficient to believe, it must come from Him, and that freely, not originating from us, answering to Eph. 2:7-10, “that in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness toward us in Christ Jesus. ⁸ For by grace you have been saved through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God, ⁹ not of works, lest anyone should boast. ¹⁰ For we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God prepared beforehand that we should walk in them.” G. Clark

¹ Herman Bavinck puts it this way regarding this knowledge: “It is Gods’ will, however, to give human beings a higher, a supernatural and heavenly, destiny. To that end he had to furnish them the so-called “superadded gifts” both before and after the fall. He must grant them a supernatural grace by which they can know and love God in another, a better and higher way, practice better and higher virtues, and attain a higher destiny. This higher knowledge is faith (fides) and this higher love is charity (caritas).” Reformed Dogmatics, pg 358

The Sinner's Prayer robs God of the chief part of God's glory, the glory of his free grace.

(red for emphasis, [blue] my insert)

Third argument, namely, That to suppose that we are justified by our own sincere obedience, or any of our own virtue or goodness, derogates from gospel grace.

That scheme of justification that manifestly takes from or diminishes the grace of God, is undoubtedly to be rejected; for it is the declared design of God in the gospel to exalt the freedom and riches of his grace, in that method of justification of sinners, and way of admitting them to his favor, and the blessed fruits of it, which it declares. The Scripture teaches, that the way of justification appointed in the gospel-covenant, is appointed for that end, that free grace might be expressed, and glorified; Rom. iv. 16. "Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace." The exercising and magnifying of free grace in the gospel-contrivance for the justification and salvation of sinners, is evidently the chief design of it. And this freedom and riches of grace in the gospel is every where spoken of in Scripture as the chief glory of it. Therefore that doctrine which derogates from the free grace of God in justifying sinners, as it is most opposite to God's design, so it must be exceedingly offensive to him. [Hence, Thomas Shepard calls the sinner's prayer or any like prayer to try to gain God's favor, a wicked presumption. My insert.]

Those who maintain, that we are justified by our own sincere obedience, pretend that their scheme does not diminish the grace of the gospel; for they say, that the grace of God is wonderfully manifested in appointing such a way and method of salvation by sincere obedience, in assisting us to perform such an obedience, and in accepting our imperfect obedience, instead of perfect.

Let us therefore examine that matter, whether their scheme, of a man's being justified by his own virtue and sincere obedience, does derogate from the grace of God or no; or whether free grace is not more exalted in supposing, as we do, that we are justified without any manner of goodness of our own. In order to this, I will lay down this self-evident

Proposition, that whatsoever that be by which the abundant benevolence of the giver is expressed, and gratitude in the receiver is obliged, that magnifies free grace. This I suppose none will ever controvert or dispute.—And it is not much less evident, that it doth both show a more abundant benevolence in the giver when he shows kindness without goodness or excellency in the object, to move him to it; and that it enhances the obligation to gratitude in the receiver.

1. It shows a more abundant goodness in the giver, when he shows kindness without any excellency in our persons or actions that should move the giver to love and beneficence. For it certainly shows the more abundant and overflowing goodness, or disposition to communicate good, by how much the less loveliness or excellency there is to entice beneficence. The less there is in the receiver to draw good-will and kindness, it argues the more of the principle of good-will and kindness in the giver. One that has but little of a principle of love and benevolence, may be drawn to do good, and to show kindness, when there is a great deal to draw him, or when there is much excellency and loveliness in the object to move good-will; when he whose goodness and benevolence is more abundant, will show kindness where there is less to draw it forth; for he does not so much need to have it drawn from without, he has enough of the principle within to move him of itself. Where there is most of the principle, there it is most sufficient for itself, and stands in least need of something without to excite it. For certainly a more abundant goodness more easily flows forth with less to impel or draw it, than where there is less; or, which is the same thing, the more anyone is disposed of himself, the less he needs from without himself, to put him upon it, or stir him up to it. And therefore his kindness and goodness appears the more exceeding great, when it is bestowed without any excellency or loveliness at all in the receiver, or when the receiver is respected in the gift, as wholly without excellency. And much more still when the benevolence of the giver not only finds nothing in the receiver to draw it, but a great deal of hatefulness to repel it. The abundance of goodness is then manifested, not only in flowing forth without any thing extrinsic to put it forward, but in overcoming great repulsion in the object. And then does kindness and love appear most triumphant, and wonderfully great, when the receiver is not only wholly without all excellency or beauty to attract it, but altogether, yea infinitely, vile and hateful.

2. It is apparent also that it enhances the obligation to gratitude in the receiver. This is agreeable to the common sense of mankind, that the less worthy or excellent the object of benevolence, or the receiver of kindness, is, the more he is obliged, and the greater gratitude is due. He therefore is most of all obliged, that receives kindness without any goodness or excellency in himself, but with a total and universal hatefulness. And as it is agreeable to the common sense of mankind, so it is agreeable to the common sense of mankind, so it is agreeable to the word of God. How often does God in the Scripture insist on this argument with men, to move them to love him, and to acknowledge his kindness! How much does he insist on this as an obligation to gratitude, that they are so sinful, and undeserving, and ill deserving!

Therefore it certainly follows, that the doctrine which teaches, that God, when he justifies a man, and shows him such great kindness as to give him a right to eternal life, does not do it for any obedience, or any manner of goodness, of his; but that justification respects a man as ungodly, and wholly without any manner of virtue, beauty, or excellency. I say, this doctrine does certainly more exalt the free grace of God in justification, and man's obligation to gratitude for such a favor, than the contrary doctrine, viz. That God, in showing this kindness to man, respects him as sincerely obedient and virtuous, and as having something in him that is truly excellent and lovely, and acceptable in his sight, and that this goodness or excellency of man is the very fundamental condition of the bestowment of that kindness on him, or of distinguishing him from others by that benefit. But I hasten to a Fourth argument for the truth of the doctrine, That to suppose a man is justified by his own virtue or obedience, derogates from the honor of the Mediator, and ascribes that to man's virtue which belongs only to the righteousness of Christ: it puts man in Christ's stead, and makes him his own savior, in a respect in which Christ only is his Savior. And so it is a doctrine contrary to the nature and design of the gospel, which is to abase man, and to ascribe all the glory of our salvation to Christ the Redeemer. It is inconsistent with the doctrine of the imputation of Christ's righteousness, which is a gospel-doctrine.

& more on ordo salutis, which comes first, faith or justification
Jonathan Edwards, Vol. 1, pg 640

Thus, I hope, I have made it evident, that the righteousness of Christ is indeed imputed to us. I proceed now to the Third and last thing under this argument, That this doctrine, of the imputation of Christ's righteousness, is utterly inconsistent with the doctrine of our being justified by our own virtue or sincere obedience. If acceptance to God's favour, and a title to life, be given to believers as the reward of Christ's obedience, then it is not given as the reward of our own obedience. In what respect so ever Christ is our Saviour, that doubtless excludes our being our own saviours in that same respect. If we can be our own saviours in the same respect that Christ is, it will thence follow, that the salvation of Christ is needless in that respect; according to the apostle's reasoning, Gal. v. 4. "Christ is rendered of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law." Doubtless, it is Christ's prerogative to be our Saviour in that sense wherein he is our Saviour. And therefore, if it be by his obedience that we are justified, then it is not by our own obedience.

Here perhaps it may be said, that a title to salvation is not directly given as the reward of our obedience; for that is not by any thing of ours, but only by Christ's satisfaction and righteousness; but yet an interest in that satisfaction and righteousness if given as a reward of our obedience.

But this does not at all help the case; for this is to ascribe as much to our obedience as if we ascribed salvation to it directly, without the intervention of Christ's righteousness. For it would be as a great thing for God to give us Christ, and his satisfaction and righteousness, in reward for our obedience, as to give us heaven immediately; it would be as great a reward, and as great a testimony of respect to our obedience. And if God gives as great a thing as salvation for our obedience, why could he not as well give salvation itself directly? and then there would have been no need of Christ's righteousness. And indeed if God gives us Christ, or an interest in him, properly in reward of our obedience, he does really give us salvation in reward for our obedience: for the former implies the latter; yea, it implies it, as the greater implies the less. So that indeed it exalts our virtue and obedience more, to suppose that God gives us Christ in reward of that virtue and obedience, than if he should give salvation without Christ.

The thing that the Scripture guards and militates against, is our imagining that it is our own goodness, virtue, or excellency that instates us in God's acceptance and favour. But to suppose that God gives us an interest in Christ in reward for our virtue, is as great an argument that it instates us in God's favour, as if he bestowed a title to eternal life as its direct reward. If God gives us an interest in Christ as a reward of our obedience, it will then follow, that we are instated in God's acceptance and favour by our own obedience, antecedent to our having an interest in Christ. For a rewarding any one's excellency, evermore supposes favour and acceptance on the account of that excellency: it is the very notion of a reward, that it is a good thing, bestowed in testimony of respect and favour for the virtue or excellency rewarded. So that it is not by virtue of our interest in Christ and his merits, that we first come into favour with God, according to this scheme; for we are in God's favour before we have any interest in those merits; in that we have an interest in those merits given as a fruit of God's favour for our own virtue. If our interest in Christ be the fruit of God's favour, then it cannot be the ground of it. If God did not accept us, and had no favour for us for our own excellency, he never would bestow so great a reward upon us, as a right in Christ's satisfaction and righteousness. So that such a scheme destroys itself; for it supposes that Christ's satisfaction and righteousness are necessary for us to recommend us to the favour of God; and yet supposes that we have God's favour and acceptance before we have Christ's satisfaction and righteousness, and have these given as a fruit of God's favour.

Indeed, neither salvation itself, nor Christ the Saviour, are given as a reward of any thing in man: they are not given as a reward of faith, nor any thing else of ours; we are not united to Christ as a reward of our faith, but have union with him by faith, only as faith is the very act of uniting or closing on our part.¹ As when a man offers himself to a woman in marriage, he does not give himself to her as a reward of her receiving him in marriage. Her receiving him is not considered as a worthy deed in her for which he rewards her by giving himself to her; but it is by her receiving him that the union is made, by which she hath him for her husband. It is on her part the union itself. By these things it appears how contrary to the gospel of Christ their scheme is, who say that faith justifies as a principle of obedience, or as a leading act of obedience; or (as others) the sum and comprehension of all evangelical obedience. For by this, the obedience or virtue that is in faith gives it its justifying influence; and that is the same thing as to say, that we are justified by our own obedience, virtue, or goodness.

Owen's quote on this subject is a few pages down, but I'll quote it here for convenience sake:

For although faith be required in order of nature antecedently unto our actual receiving of the pardon of sin, yet is that faith itself wrought in us by the grace of the promise, and so its precedency unto pardon respects only the order that God had appointed in the communication of the benefits of the covenant, and intends not that the pardon of sin is the reward of our faith.

Having thus considered the evidence of the truth of the doctrine, I proceed now to the

III. Thing proposed, viz. "To show in what sense the act of a Christian life, or of evangelical obedience, may be looked upon to be concerned in this affair."

From what has been said already, it is manifest that they cannot have any concern in this affair as good works, or by virtue of any moral goodness in them; not as works of the law, or as that moral excellency, or any part of it, which is the fulfilment of that great, universal, and everlasting law or covenant of works which the great lawgiver has established, as the highest and unalterable rule of judgment, which Christ alone answers, or does any thing towards it.

It having been shown out of the Scripture, that it is only by faith, or the soul's receiving and uniting to the Saviour who has wrought our righteousness, that we are justified; it therefore remains, that the acts of a christian life cannot be concerned in this affair any otherwise than as they imply, and are the expressions of, faith, and may be looked upon as so many acts of reception of Christ the Saviour. But the determining what concerns acts of christian obedience can have in justification in this respect, will depend on the resolving of another point, viz. Whether any other act of faith besides the first act, has any concern in our justification, or how far perseverance in faith, or the continued and renewed acts of faith, have influence in this affair. And it seems manifest that justification is by the first act of faith, in some respects, in a peculiar manner, because a sinner is actually and finally justified as soon as he has performed one act of faith; and faith in its first act does, virtually at least, depend on God for perseverance, and entitles to this among other benefits. But yet the perseverance of faith is not excluded in this affair; it is not only certainly connected with justification, but it is not to be excluded from that on which the justification of a sinner has a dependence, or that by which he is justified.

I have shown that the way in which justification has a dependence on faith, is, that it is the qualification on which the congruity of an interest in the righteousness of Christ depends, or wherein such a fitness consists. But the consideration of the perseverance of faith cannot be excluded out of this congruity or fitness, for it is congruous that he that believes in Christ should have an interest in Christ's righteousness, and so in the eternal benefits purchased by it, because faith is that by which the soul hath union or oneness with Christ; and there is a natural congruity in it, that they who are one with Christ should have a joint interest with him in his eternal benefits; but yet this congruity depends on its being an abiding union. As it is needful that the branch should abide in the vine, in order to its receiving the lasting benefits of the root; so it is necessary that the soul should abide in Christ, in order to its receiving those lasting benefits of God's final acceptance and favour. John xv. 6, 7. "If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch. If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you.” Ver. 9, 10. “Continue ye in my love. If ye keep (or abide in) my commandments, ye shall abide in my love: even as I have kept my Father’s commandments, and abide in his love.” There is the same reason why it is necessary that the union with Christ should remain, as why it should be begun; why it should continue to be, as why it should once be. If it should be begun without remaining, the beginning would be in vain. In order to the soul’s being now in a justified state, and now free from condemnation, it is necessary that it should now be in Christ, and not merely that it should once have been in him. Rom. viii. 1. “There is no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus.” The soul is saved in Christ, as being now in him, when the salvation is bestowed, and not merely as remembering that it once was in him. Philip. iii. 9. “That I may be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith.” 1 John ii. 28. “And now, little children, abide in him; that when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming.” In order to persons being blessed after death, it is necessary not only that they should once be in him, but that they should die in him. Rev. xiv. 13. “Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord.”—And there is the same reason why faith, the uniting qualification, should remain, in order to the union’s once being.

So that although the sinner is actually and finally justified on the first acts of faith, yet the perseverance of faith, even then, comes into consideration, as one thing on which the fitness of acceptance to life depends. God, in the act of justification, which is passed on a sinner’s first believing, has respect to perseverance, as being virtually contained in that first act of faith; and it is looked upon, and taken by him that justifies, as being as it were a property in that faith. God has respect to the believer’s continuance in faith, and he is justified by that, as though it already were, because by divine establishment it shall follow; and it being by divine constitution connected with that first faith, as much as if it were a property in it, it is then considered as such, and so justification is not suspended; but were it not for this, it would be needful that it should be suspended, till the sinner had actually persevered in faith.

And that it is so, that God in the act of final justification which he passes at the sinner’s conversion, has respect to perseverance in faith, and future acts of faith, as being virtually implied in the first act, is further manifest by this, viz. That in a sinner’s justification, at his conversion there is virtually contained a forgiveness as to eternal and deserved punishment, not only of all past sins, but also of all future infirmities and acts of sin that they shall be guilty of; because that first justification is decisive and final. And yet pardon, in the order of nature, properly follows the crime, and also follows those acts of repentance and faith that respect the crime pardoned, as is manifest both from reason and Scripture. David, in the beginning of Psalm xxxii. speaks of the forgiveness of sins which were doubtless committed long after he was first godly, as being consequent on those sins, and on his repentance and faith with respect to them; and yet this forgiveness is spoken of by the apostle in the 4th of Romans, as an instance of justification by faith. Probably the sin David there speaks of is the same that he committed in the matter of Uriah, and so the pardon the same with that release from death, or eternal punishment, which the prophet Nathan speaks of, 2 Sam. xii. 13. “The Lord also hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die.” Not only does the manifestation of this pardon follow the sin in the order of time, but the pardon itself, in the order of nature, follows David’s repentance and faith with respect to this sin; for it is spoken of in the Psalm xxxii., as depending on it.

But inasmuch as a sinner, in his first justification, is for ever justified and freed from all obligations to eternal punishment; it hence of necessity follows, that future faith and repentance are beheld, in that justification, as virtually contained in that first faith and repentance; because repentance of those future sins, and faith in a Redeemer, with respect to them, or, at least, the continuance of that habit and principle in the heart that has such an actual repentance and faith in its nature and tendency, is now made sure by God’s promise.—If remission of sins, committed after conversion, in the order of nature, follows that faith and repentance that is after them, then it follows that future sins are respected in the first justification, no otherwise than as future faith and repentance are respected in it. And future repentance and faith are looked upon by him that justifies, as virtually implied in the first repentance and faith, in the same manner as justification from future sins is virtually implied in the first justification; which is the thing that was to be proved.

[excellent reasonings by Edwards]

And besides, if no other act of faith could be concerned in justification but the first act, it will then follow, that Christians ought never to seek justification by any other act of faith. For if justification is not to be obtained by after acts of faith, then surely it is not a duty to seek it by such acts: and so it can never be a duty for persons after they are once converted, by faith to seek to God, or believingly to look to him, for the remission of sin, or deliverance from the guilt of it, because deliverance from the guilt of sin is part of what belongs to justification. And if it be not proper for converts by faith to look to God through Christ for it, then it will follow, that it is not proper for them to pray for it;

for christian prayer to God for a blessing, is but an expression of faith in God for that blessing; prayer is only the voice of faith. But if these things are so, it will follow that the petition of the Lord's prayer, forgive us our debts, is not proper to be put up by disciples of Christ, or to be used in christian assemblies; and that Christ improperly directed his disciples to use that petition, when they were all of them, except Judas, converted before. The debt that Christ directs his disciples to pray for the forgiveness of, can mean nothing else but the punishment that sin deserves, or the debt that we owe to divine justice, the ten thousand talents we owe our Lord. To pray that God would forgive our debts, is undoubtedly the same thing as to pray that God would release us from obligation to due punishment; but releasing from obligation to the punishment due to sin, and forgiving the debt that we owe to divine justice, is what appertains to justification.

And then to suppose that no after acts of faith are concerned in the business of justification, and so that it is not proper for any ever to seek justification by such acts, would be for ever to cut off those Christians that are doubtful concerning their first act of faith, from the joy and peace of believing. As the business of a justifying faith is to obtain pardon and peace with God, by looking to God, and trusting in him for these blessings; so the joy and peace of that faith is in the apprehension of pardon and peace obtained by such a trust. This a Christian that is doubtful of his first act of faith cannot have from that act, because, by the supposition, he is doubtful whether it be an act of faith, and so whether he did obtain pardon and peace by that act. The proper remedy, in such a case, is now by faith to look to God in Christ for these blessings; but he is cut off from this remedy, because he is uncertain whether he has warranted so to do; for he does not know but that he has believed already; and if so, then he has no warrant to look to God by faith for these blessings now, because, by the supposition, no new act of faith is a proper means of obtaining these blessings. And so he can never properly obtain the joy of faith; for there are acts of true faith that are very weak, and the first act may be so as well as others: it may be like the first motion of the infant in the womb; it may be so weak an act, that the Christian, by examining it, may never be able to determine whether it was a true act of faith or no; and it is evident from fact, and abundant experience, that many Christians are for ever at a loss to determine which was their first act of faith. And those saints who have had a good degree of satisfaction concerning their faith, may be subject to great declensions and falls, in which case they are liable to great fears of eternal punishment; and the proper way of deliverance, is to forsake their sin by repentance, and by faith now to come to Christ for deliverance from the deserved eternal punishment; but this it would not be, if deliverance from that punishment was not this way to be obtained.

But what is a still more plain and direct evidence of what I am now arguing for, is, that the act of faith which Abraham exercised in the great promise of the covenant of grace that God made to him, of which it is expressly said, Gal. iii. 6. “It was accounted to him for righteousness”—the grand instance and proof that the apostle so much insists upon throughout the 4th chapter of Romans, and 3d chapter of Galatians, to confirm his doctrine of justification by faith alone—was not Abraham’s first act of faith, but was exerted long after he had by faith forsaken his own country, Heb. xi. 8. and had been treated as an eminent friend of God.

Moreover, the apostle Paul, in the 3d chapter of Philip. tells us how earnestly he sought justification by faith, or to win Christ and obtain that righteousness which was by the faith of him, in what he did after his conversion. Verse 8, 9. “For whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung that I may win Christ, and be found in him, not having mine own righteousness which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith.” And in the two next verses he expresses the same thing in other words, and tells us how he went through sufferings, and became conformable to Christ’s death, that he might be a partaker with Christ in the benefit of his resurrection; which the same apostle elsewhere teaches us, is especially justification. Christ’s resurrection was his justification; in this, he that was put to death in the flesh, was justified by the Spirit; and he that was delivered for our offences, rose again for our justification. And the apostle tells us in the verses that follow in that 3d chapter of Philippians, that he thus sought to attain the righteousness which is through the faith of Christ, and so to partake of the benefit of his resurrection, still as though he had not already attained, but that he continued to follow after it.

On the whole, it appears, that the perseverance of faith is necessary, even to the congruity of justification; and that not the less, because the sinner is justified, and perseverance promised, on the first act of faith, but God, in that justification, has respect, not only to the past act of faith, but to his own promise of future acts, and to the fitness of a qualification beheld as yet only in his own promise. And that perseverance in faith is thus necessary to salvation, not merely as a sine qua non, nor as an universal concomitant of it, but by reason of such an influence and dependence, seems manifest by many scriptures: I would mention two or three; Heb. iii. 6. “Whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence, and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end.” Verse 14. “For we are made partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end.” Chap. vi. 12. “Be ye followers of them, who through faith and patience inherit the promises.” Rom. xi. 20. “Well, because of unbelief they were broken off; but thou standest by faith. Be not high minded, but fear.”

And, as the congruity to a final justification depends on perseverance in faith, as well as the first act, so oftentimes the manifestation of justification in the conscience, arises a great deal more from after acts, than the first act. And all the difference whereby the first act of faith has a concern in this affair that is peculiar, seems to be, as it were, only an accidental difference, arising from the circumstance of time, or its being first in order of time; and not from any peculiar respect that God has to it, or any influence it has of a peculiar nature, in the affair of our salvation.

Similar comment by John Owen on the order of nature of faith

For although faith be required in order of nature antecedently unto our actual receiving of the pardon of sin, yet is that faith itself wrought in us by the grace of the promise, and so its precedency unto pardon respects only the order that God had appointed in the communication of the benefits of the covenant, and intends not that the pardon of sin is the reward of our faith.

And thus it is that a truly Christian walk, and the acts of an evangelical, child-like, believing obedience, are concerned in the affair of our justification, and seem to be sometimes so spoken of in Scripture, viz. as an expression of a persevering faith in the Son of God, the only Saviour. Faith unites to Christ, and so gives a congruity to justification, not merely as remaining a dormant principle in the heart, but as being and appearing in its active expressions. The obedience of a Christian, so far as it is truly evangelical, and performed with the Spirit of the Son sent forth into the heart, has all relation to Christ, the Mediator, and is but an expression of the soul’s believing union to Christ. All evangelical works are works of that faith that worketh by love; and every such act of obedience, wherein it is inward, and the act of the soul, is only a new effective act of reception of Christ, and adherence to the glorious Saviour. Hence that of the apostle, Gal. ii.20. “I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life that I now live in the flesh, is by the faith of the Son of God.” And hence we are directed, in whatever we do, whether in word or deed, to do all in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, Col. iii.17.

And that God in justification has respect, not only to the first act of faith, but also to future persevering acts, as expressed in life, seems manifest by Rom. i. 17. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith: as it is written, “The just shall live by faith.” And Heb. x.38, 39. “Now the just shall live by faith; but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him. But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe [an ongoing believing], to the saving of the soul.”

So that as was before said of faith, so may it be said of a child-like believing obedience, it has no concern in justification by any virtue or excellency in it; but only as there is a reception of Christ in it. And this is no more contrary to the apostle’s frequent assertion of our being justified without the works of the law, than to say that we are justified by faith; for faith is as much a work, or act of christian obedience, as the expressions of faith, in spiritual life and walk. And therefore, as we say that faith does not justify as a work, so we say of all these effective expressions of faith.

This is the reverse of the scheme of our modern divines, who hold, that faith justifies only as an act or expression of obedience; whereas, in truth, obedience has no concern in justification, any otherwise than as an expression of faith.

5. No man has possessed a federal perfection, except by imputation, beside the first Adam while he obeyed without failure, and the second Adam when he completed his work of humiliation. For no eminence of grace in a mere descendant of Adam could possibly attain to federal perfection, from the very nature of such perfection. Nor indeed can the perfect obedience of glorified saints rise higher than a conformity to the divine law as a rule; their federal perfection is still derived from their union to Christ, and a consequent imputation, which implies a virtual approval. Hence,

6. The federal perfection of Messiah is the proper and sole ground of an actual interest in reconciliation and justification. In other words, the righteousness of Christ, his perfect obedience unto death as our substitute, is that alone on account of which we can stand before God with acceptance, in reference to the charge of a federal failure in Adam.

7. An actual interest in this federal perfection is obtained only by a vital or an effectual union to the Lord our righteousness. This is plain from Scripture, and is perfectly rational. It is compared to the union of a vine and its branches, the head and members of the human body, &c. That a participation of nature between Christ and us, or an effectual union, is requisite for a ground of imputation is evident, not only from scriptural comparisons, and the rational consistence of such an idea, but also from the fact of the Savior's incarnation. Without this union to us, our sin could not have been imputed to him; and without a vital union, his righteousness could not be imputed to us. This is fairly and fully implied in many parts of Scripture, as might be shown if necessary.—From whence it is plain, that union is the indispensable ground of imputation.

8. Whoever is the subject of a vital union to Christ, is in a justified state, as partaker of a federal perfection, prior to the performance of any moral duty whatever. But in order to explain and prove this it is requisite to attend to the following particulars.

9. Union to Christ is of two kinds, on his part by his spirit; and on our part by faith, as explained in a preceding note. In the former, we are passive; and in the latter, we are active. In the one he acts as a sovereign dispenser of benefits; in the other we act as accountable creatures.

10. By the order both of nature and of time, the union begins with him who is a quickening Spirit; and that of faith is consequent upon the other, and is the proper effect of it.

11. By his uniting act, which may be termed effectual calling, the enmity of sin is destroyed in the soul, and the Spirit of Christ is imparted, which as occasion offers, will manifest itself as the Spirit of faith, or love, etc. Hence,

12. To the soul thus in Christ, whether infant or adult, there is no condemnation arising from federal delinquency; for this charge is answered by the union on his part; and righteousness is imputed.

13. From the premises it follows, that the generally received theological maxim is perfectly just and plain, namely, that justification and regeneration are simultaneous.— Union is the immediate cause of both; and because the one is a relative and the other a vital effect, there is no interference as to the order of time. Thus a union of a tree and a branch by ingrafture, is attended with two simultaneous effects, the one relative and the other vital; it is related to the tree as a branch, and at the same time partakes of the vital sap. The union, however, must precede both, as to nature and time.

14. But where two effects are both real, as distinguished from relative, the one must precede the other, both as to nature and time. Thus union precedes vitality, and this of necessity must precede vital acts; and regeneration, as the act of the Spirit of Christ, must necessarily precede believing, which is one mode by which a vital principle operates. For to suppose that the operation produces, or is prior to the principle, either in nature or in time, is a direct contradiction. [which is why the sinner's prayer is complete presumption.]

15. If the preceding steps of these remarks be thoroughly weighed, it will be found, that justification, according to Scripture, and just reasoning upon it, has for its foundation the federal perfection of Messiah, and takes place as the immediate result of union to him.

16. But since this union is twofold, the one as the effect of the other, that is, union by faith is the effect of union by the Spirit of Christ, and these, cause and effect, cannot possibly be simultaneous, there must necessarily be a twofold justification as the result of the corresponding unions. Though in that union which is first in the order of nature and of time, the person, whether infant or adult, is passive [see pg 1884]; the result however is the imputation of righteousness, which is Messiah's federal perfection, and which entitles to life eternal. And by that union which is the effect of the other, and consequently posterior in it in the order both of nature and of time, (and of which infants cannot be partakers,) this is, by the union effected by believing, the result is the imputation of the same righteousness in circumstances totally different.

Skip to item 20.

20. It may be objected, if there be any justification before believing, then an unbeliever may be justified; whereas the Scripture saith, "He that believeth not is condemned already." This objecting arises from a mistaken notion of the true meaning of such passages of Scripture. Condemnation, in the real import of Scripture, is leveled against the rejecters of Christ, or of the divine testimony, and these only, considered as free agents in seeking acceptance with God and final happiness. These, not believing in Christ, while prevailing devoted to Moses or Mahomet, moral obedience or ceremonies, or indeed any other object whatever, reject in fact the testimony of God and his righteousness, and expose themselves to a double condemnation. They are condemned as being destitute of a perfect righteousness, and also for their actual disobedience to the divine authority. The sentence of the law is against them both as a covenant and as a rule; and the gospel which they reject will be a witness to prove the wickedness of their heart. But this can never take place in one who is vitally united to Christ. All allow that infants not believing are not to be ranked with unbelievers. To them no testimony is proposed, and therefore no testimony is rejected by them. Nor does any adult united to Christ reject the divine testimony, even before he believes. Let but the object of faith be presented to him, and his vital union secures the exercise of the living principle towards the proposed object in proportion as the terms are understood. A testimony not presented, or one presented in an unknown tongue, cannot be believed, notwithstanding the principle of faith. The existence of a principle does not necessarily imply its exercise, whether it be sense, reason, or faith. Men are not necessarily conversant with the objects of sense, because they possess the senses requisite for these purposes; nor are they always exercising the powers of the mind, however essential these powers are to human nature. In like manner, not exercising faith is a very different thing from not possessing the principle. A vital union and the spirit of faith are inseparably and essentially connected; but a vital union and believing are connected secundum quid, in certain circumstances. Without the circumstances of adult age, or a capacity of understanding, believing is impracticable. But how absurd would it be to say, that a sinner cannot be justified because he has not arrived at a certain advanced portion of understanding, or has not learned some language; as if a title to heaven depended on age, or knowing a language! And equally absurd is it to suppose that Christ cannot effect a vital union because the sinner's voluntary consent to it is wanting; as if God's high sovereignty were bound by the human will! That God requires the sinner's consent, as a matter of obligation, is a solemn fact; but God has not laid himself under any obligation that he will never unite a soul to Christ for justification of life but by the sinner's previous consent. He has declared, however, that the continued unbeliever, who is properly a willful rejecter of Christ and his righteousness, shall be condemned. Hence it is evident, that to make believing essential to a vital union, on the part of Christ; and to make the exercise of faith on a divine testimony essential to its existence, are erroneous conclusions, derogatory to gospel grace, and founded on wrong notions of moral government. -W

[What he is saying here is that no one can believe until he has been born again; until he has been regenerated, given a believing heart, etc. But Arminians believe that you must believe [first in order of time] in order to be accepted of God or to be saved - both meaning same thing. But this is the proverbial cart before the horse. For it takes saving faith (saving faith) to ask for salvation which is not of yourselves! As Martin Luther said, "No one can give himself faith; it is a gift of God." Yet by this very prayer, the sinners prayer, he is admitting that presently he has no saving faith; or else why would he be asking for it? And hence, the footnote above openly acknowledges this as a clear contradiction, for without faith, a saving faith, you cannot please God, Heb. 11:6, Romans 8:7, etc. Edwards makes this point on page 341, vol. 1, in a letter to Mr. Gillispie in the appendix to On Religious Affections:

"That a believing that I am in a good estate, is no part or ingredient in the essence of saving faith, is evident by this, that the essence of saving faith must be complete in me, before it can be true that I am in a good estate. If I have not as yet acted faith, yea if there be any thing wanting in me to make up the essence of saving faith, then I am not as yet in a state of salvation, and therefore can have no ground to believe that I am so. Anything that belongs to the essence of saving faith is prior, in the order of nature, to a man's being in a [believing] state of salvation, because it is saving faith that brings him into such a state. And therefore believing that he is in such a state cannot be one thing that is essential or necessary in order to his being in such a state; for that would imply a contradiction. It would be to suppose a man's believing that he is in a good estate to be prior, in the order of nature, to his being in a good estate. But a thing cannot be both prior and posterior, antecedent and consequent, with respect to the very same thing."]

For he grew up before him like a young plant, and like a root out of dry ground; he had no form or majesty that we should look at him, and no beauty that we should desire him. He was despised and rejected by men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; and as one from whom men hide their faces he was despised, and we esteemed him not. Surely he has borne our griefs and carried our sorrows; yet we esteemed him stricken, smitten by God, and afflicted. But he was pierced for our transgressions; he was crushed for our iniquities; upon him was the chastisement that brought us peace, and with his wounds we are healed. All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned—every one—to his own way; and the Lord has laid on him the iniquity of us all. Isaiah 53:2-6 ESV

This is the condition of unregenerate man highlighted in red above. See also Romans 3. This is why saying some kind of prayer in order to curry God's favor is a wicked presumption, an act of man flowing from not a principle of spirit life (i.e., faith and holiness) but from a principle of self-love or self-preservation. It is a contradiction to say that an unregenerate man's prayer is genuine or truly sincere (though it may sound sincere) coming from a heart full of love for God, when in truth he despises and rejects him, seeing no beauty that he should desire him!

The Call to Eternal Life

Effectual and Particular and Sweet

by Thomas Shepard , The Sound Believer, page 307-310

1. This call of offer hath three special qualifications. First, it is an inward as well as outward; for the Lord calls thousands outwardly, who yet never come, because they want [lack] and inward call to come; an inward, whispering, still voice of God's Spirit; and therefore it is said, "He that hath heard and learned" (not of man only, but) "of the Father cometh unto me." John 6:45. The Lord doth not stand at the outward door only, and call to open, but the Lord Jesus comes in; he comes near unto the very heart of a poor sinner, and makes that understand, Hosea 2:14, ""Therefore, behold, I will allure her, Will bring her into the wilderness, And speak ^[a]comfort to her." And the Lord makes his grace glorious, and his mercy sweet unto the ears of his elect. [This is that greatness of his power in Eph. 1, and the day of his power Ps 110:3, Phil. 2:13, etc.] Look, (saith the Lord Jesus), how I have left thousand in the world, and have had greater cause so to have left thee; but behold, I am come unto thee; O, come thou unto me.

2. It is a particular call; for there is a general call and offer of grace to every one. Now, though this be a means to make it particular, yet the Spirit of Christ, which is wont to apply generals unto particulars particularly, makes the call particular, that the soul sees that the Lord in special means me, singles out me in special to believe; otherwise the souls of the elect will not be much moved with the call of God, so long as they think the Lord offers no more mercy to me than to any reprobate; and therefore the Spirit of Christ makes the call particular (Is. 43:1) "I have called thee by name." (John 10:5) "He calleth all his sheep by name;" not that the Lord calls any by their Christian name, (as we say) as the Lord did extraordinarily call Samuel, Samuel, and Paul, Paul; but the meaning is, look, as the Lord from before all worlds writ down their name in the book of life, and loves them in special, so in vocation, (the 3 of election), the Lord makes his offer and call special, and so special as if it were by name; for the soul at this instant feels such a special stirring of the Spirit upon it, which it feels now, and never felt before; as also its particular case so spoken unto, and its particular objections so answered, and the grievousness of its sin in refusing grace so particularly applied, as if God, the only Searcher of hearts, only spake unto it; and so dares not but think and believe that the Lord meaneth me.

3. It is effectual as well as inward and particular. (Luke 24:33) "Compel them to come in." (John 10:16) Christ's other sheep shall hear Christ's voice, and those he must bring home; for every inward call is not effectual. There came a man in without his wedding garment, (Matt. 22:6-8) whence our Saviour saith, "Many are called, but few chosen;" but this I now speak of, as calling out of purpose, (Rom. 8:28) and therefore never leaves the soul until it hath real possession of Christ, and rests there. This call falls upon a sinner humbled, not hard hearted; and hence the call is effectual. (Matt. 9:12, 13. 2Chron. 30:10-11). It is such a call as was in creation. (Rom. 4:17) And hence the soul cannot but come, and when it is come it cannot depart, like Peter, "Lord, whither should we go?" And therefore, though it hath never so many objections in coming to Christ, never so much weakness or heartlessness to close with Christ, yet the Lord brings it home, and there keeps it; and now it infinitely blesses God that ever the Lord gave it an eye to see, a heart to come and seek after Jesus Christ. Thus much of the nature of this call; now follows the necessity of it, appears in these three particulars:

1. No man should come unless first called; as it is in calling to an ordinary office, so it is in our calling much more unto special grace. The apostle saith, (Heb. 5:4) that "no man takes this honor but he that is called of God;" so what hath any man to do with Christ, to make himself a son of God, and heir of glory thereby, but he that is called of God? What have we to do to take other men's goods, unless called thereto? What have we to do to take the riches of grace and peace, if not called thereto? It is presumption to take Christ whilst uncalled, but not when you are called thereunto.

2. Because no man would come without the Lord's call. (Matt. 20:6-7) "Why stand you here all the day idle?" The answer was, "No man hath hired," or "called us thereto." When there is an outward call only, yet men will not come in. (Matt. 23:37) And therefore there must be an effectual call to bring men home. (Is. 15:5) And therefore you shall see many; let there be a legal command, suppose to sanctify a Sabbath, or to speak the truth; they have no objections against obedience unto this. But press them to believe, show them God's call for it, they have more fears and objections rising against this than there be hairs on their head, because they would could not close with this.

3. Because no man could come, unless called. (John 6:44) "No man can come unto me, unless the Father draw him." And how doth the Father draw any man, but by this call? If the Lord should not come and speak himself, and make his call the most joyful tidings and the sweetest message that ever came to it, it would say, I have no heart, I cannot, I am not able, for (Rom. 2:32) "we are shut up under unbelief;" and therefore the Lord Jesus (Luke 15:5) must bring his sheep home upon his shoulders, else it will lie in the wilderness of its own droopings. Whereas, when the Lord effectually speaks, they could cannot but come.

– T Shepard

John 6:45 - It is written in the prophets, 'And they shall all be taught by God.' Therefore everyone who [a]has heard and learned from the Father comes to Me. That is, they will come infallibly, hence the call is irresistible. That cannot not come! Very similar to the clear inference in John 6:37, All that the Father gives Me will come to Me – G Clark

Foundations of Grace

Steven J Lawson

If any sinner is to know God, God must take the initiative to seek and to save. Because men hate the light, they will not come to it (John 3:19); no one in spiritual darkness will seek the Lord on his own initiative. Therefore, God must sovereignly bring the light to lost man. God must make Himself known to those who are spiritually blind. He must pursue the sinner. To those He pursues, God extends His irresistible call, His powerful summons by which He draws the lost sinner to faith in Himself. This divine call makes God known to the corrupt heart, leading the sinner to conversion.

1. Divine Calling. God take the initiative in calling the sinner to Himself. There is none who seeks after Him; rather, He is the Seeker. This was the case with Samuel:

Then the LORD called Samuel, and he said, "Here I am!" ⁵ and ran to Eli and said, "Here I am, for you called me." But he said, "I did not call; lie down again." So he went and lay down. (1Sam. 3:4-5)

Describing his conversion, Samuel writes that God sought him graciously and sovereignly. Affirming this truth, Ronald Youngblood writes, “Although Samuel did not yet know that it was the Lord who was speaking to him (v. 7), his answer was typical of the servant who hears and obeys the divine call: “Here I am.” If God had waited for Samuel to seek Him, Samuel never would have been saved. The Sheppard must always take the initiative in seeking and calling the lost sheep himself, not vice versa. Sovereign grace is seeking grace.

2. Definite Calling. God calls His elect individually to Himself. This definite call was issued to Samuel:

And the LORD called again, “Samuel!” and Samuel arose and went to Eli and said, “Here I am, for you called me.” But he said, “I did not call, my son; lie down again.”

In this divine summons, God called Samuel by name. This call was issued to Samuel, not to anyone else. The Lord Jesus calls His sheep by name (John 10:3). He would call Matthew individually, saying, “Follow Me” (Matt. 9:9). Again He would call, “Zacchaeus, hurry and come down” (Luke 19:5). And as He stood before the tomb of Lazarus, He would call, Lazarus, come out” (John 11:43). Had Jesus not said “Lazarus,” the entire graveyard would have come forth. The outward invitation of the gospel is extended indiscriminately to “whomsoever.” But the inward call is issued individually by name.

3. Dominate Calling. God always secures a favorable response in the heart of the one He calls inwardly. In this sense, God’s sovereign call is always effectual, or effective. It always effects the intended result:

And the LORD called Samuel again the third time. And he arose and went to Eli and said, “Here I am, for you called me.” Then Eli perceived that the LORD was calling the boy. (1Sam3:8)

Samuel records how God’s call procured the desired response in his heart. This call is a sovereign summons, a divine warrant that arrests the heart with omnipotent grace, making it captive to God. The divine call always obtains its intended effect; it cannot be resisted ultimately. Henry [Matthew Henry] affirms this when he writes, “The call which divine grace designs to make effectual shall be repeated till it is so, that is, till we come at the call; for the purpose of God, according to which we are called, shall certainly stand.” [see Isa 46:10, ““My counsel shall stand, and I will accomplish all my purpose,””] This is the glorious triumph of sovereign grace in the hearts of the elect.

Divine Sovereignty

The truth of the sovereignty of God over human hearts and events is the bedrock foundation of the doctrines of grace. Ezra teaches that God is free to work within human hearts, even those of unsaved men, turning them whatever direction He desires. No human heart is off limits to God.

1. Stirring Hearts. God is absolutely sovereign over the hearts of unconverted men, even those of the mightiest men on the earth. By arguing from the greater to the lesser, Ezra showed that God is free to direct any heart at any time:

In the first year of Cyrus king of Persia, that the word of the LORD by the mouth of Jeremiah might be fulfilled, the LORD stirred up the spirit of Cyrus king of Persia, so that he made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom and also put it in writing: (Ezra 1:1)

The first verse of Ezra’s book speaks of God’s intervening control over Cyrus’s heart in the days of Israel’s exile. No matter how great an earthly ruler may be, God’s unrestricted right to rule is greater still. Even unsaved kings are lesser subjects to be used by God to carry out His eternal purposes. Explaining this text, Jerry Bridges states, “The text clearly says that King Cyrus issued the proclamation because God moved his heart. The destiny of God’s people was, humanly speaking, in the hands of the most powerful monarch of that day. In reality, though, their destiny was completely in God’s hand, because He had the ability to sovereignly control the decisions on that monarch.” This sovereign act reveals the scope of God’s authority to act as He pleases.

2. Subduing Hearts. God is absolutely free to turn human hearts as He desires, coordinating all people and events for His own glory:

²² And they kept the Feast of Unleavened Bread seven days with joy, for the LORD had made them joyful and had turned the heart of the king of Assyria to them, so that he aided them in the work of the house of God, the God of Israel. (Ezra 6:22)

In this verse, Ezra described the scene surrounding Israel's dedication of the rebuilt temple following the return from Babylonian exile (515 BC). The people celebrated this significant rebuilding project, rightly recognizing that it had been accomplished because God had turned the heart of the Persian king. They gladly acknowledged the sovereign intervention of God in the king's heart. Recognizing the operation of this truth throughout the affairs of history, Louis Berkhof writes, "The Bible clearly teaches that the providence of God pertains not only to the being but also to the actions or operations of the creature. The general truth that men do not work independently, but are controlled by the will of God, appears from several passages of Scripture." This text in Ezra is definitely one of those signature passages. see Code446a

3. Superintending Hearts. God is supremely free to plant into the human heart whatever He desires it to do. In this way, God often directs people – even those who do not know Him – to do his bidding.

Ezra wrote earlier that he had approached King Artaxerxes, seeking his permission to lead a second group of Jews from Babylon to Jerusalem (458 BC). The purpose of this request was to complete the rebuilding of the temple in the holy city. Artaxerxes was agreeable, so he issued a decree granting Ezra's request (7:21). Afterward, the people recognized that this development was nothing less than the sovereign activity of God in the heart of his unsaved king. Here is strong evidence that God works sovereignly in the lives of men to effect His own purposes. Regarding this truth, Henry writes, "God can put things into men's hearts which would not arise there of themselves, and into their heads too, both by His providence and by His grace." This is precisely what the Lord does in salvation. He intervenes in order to turn the stubborn heart to Himself as He grants the gifts of repentance and faith.

Sovereign Election

Consistent with the other authors of Scripture, Nehemiah wrote about the doctrine of sovereign election. He recognized that, out of the mass of lost humanity, God had determined whom He would save. Since men are totally depraved and will not seek God, it is necessary that God make a distinguishing choice to save. It is obvious, then, that the reason some are not saved and others are lost lies entirely with God. All of mankind would remain lost if left to themselves. But God chose His people from among those who were not seeking Him. Never was this truth more clearly seen than in the case of Abraham.

You are the LORD, the God who chose Abraham. (Neh. 9:7a)

From among the unconverted multitudes in the land of Ur, God chose Abraham. He did not make this choice on the basis of any good works within Abraham, whether actual or potential. Neither did He make it on the basis of foreseen faith in Abraham. Rather, this sovereign choice originated exclusively within God. Regarding this lofty truth, James Montgomery Boice writes, "Notice that God is the subject of every action: (1) 'You...chose Abraham and brought him out of Ur of the Chaldeans and named him Abraham,' (2) 'You found his heart faithful to You,' (3) 'You made a covenant with him,' and (4) 'You have kept Your promise.'... The emphasis is entirely upon God. Boice is right. According to God's inscrutable wisdom, He chooses whom He wills for reasons known only to Himself. As it was with Abraham, so it is with all of God's elect.

The Irresistible Call

Nehemiah further upheld the doctrine of God's irresistible call, the biblical truth that God calls to Himself all whom He has chosen. The qualifying term irresistible means that when God chooses some to be saved, He sends the Holy Spirit in irresistible power, and the Spirit calls God's elect to Himself. The Spirit suddenly changes them from being God-haters to God-lovers. No one can resist the Spirit's power. He always secures the results for which He is sent. Having selected Abraham, God graciously brought him to Himself. \[This is consistent with reason: When the Spirit says that He, Jesus, will deliver his people from their sin, that all that the Father has given Me will come to me, etc., that the stony heart \(the resistance!\) will be removed and a heart of flesh put in \(Ezek. 36:26\), there is no room for man's resistance! It did not say that if man cooperates, and so on, but Scripture says, he will surely do it. 1Thes5:24 As Edwards states beautifully:

And how can God promise, as he oftentimes does in his word, glorious times, when righteousness shall generally prevail, and his will shall generally be done; and yet that it is not an effect which belongs to him to determine; it is not left to his determination, but to the sovereign, arbitrary determination of others, independently on any determination of him; and therefore surely they ought to be the promisers? For him to promise, who has it not in his hand to dispose and determine, is a great absurdity; and yet God oftentimes in promising, speaks of himself as the sovereign disposer of the matter, using such expressions as abundantly imply it, Isa. lx. 22, "I the Lord do hasten it in its time." Surely this is the language of a promiser, and not merely a predictor. God promises Abraham, that "all the families of the earth shall be blessed in him." God swears Rom. 14:11, "every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess." And it is said to be given to Christ, that every nation, etc., should serve and obey him, Dan. 7. After what manner they shall serve and obey him, is abundantly declared in other prophecies, as in Isa. 11 and innumerable others. These are spoken of in the next chapter, as excellent things that God does. - Jonathan Edwards

Hence, the outcome will always be what God wills, hence man will always come to the effectual call of God and therefore it needs be irresistible...For who can resist his will? Romans 9:19 Hence this doctrine is self evident. Also, [2Chron. 20:6, ...none is able to withstand you.]

The Limitations of the Will

Excerpt from A Treatise of the Soul of Man

By John Flavel

It has a political power over the faculties and passions of the soul, not by way of absolute command, but by way of suasion and insinuation. Thus it can oftentimes persuade the understanding and thoughts to lay by this or that subject, and apply themselves to the study of another. It can bridle and restrain the affections and passions, but yet it has no absolute command over the inner, as it has over the outward man. Its weakness and inability to govern the inner man appears in two things, more especially remarkable, viz. 1. It cannot, with all its power and skill command and fetch off the thoughts from some subjects, which are set on, at some times, with extraordinary weight upon the soul. However, the thoughts may obsequiously follow its beck at some times, yea, for the most part; yet there are cases and seasons, in which its authority and persuasions cannot disengage one thought.

As (1.) When God has to do with the soul, in the work of conversion, when he convinceth of sin and danger, and sets a man's evils in order before his eyes: These are terrible representations, and fain would the carnal will disengage the thoughts from such sad subjects, and strives by all manner of persuasions and diversions so to do, but all to no purpose, Ps. 2: 3. "My sin is ever before me." The thoughts are fixed, and there is no removing of them. It may give them a little interruption, but they return with the more impetuous violence. And instead of gaining them off, they at last, or rather God by them gains over the will also.

(2.) When Satan has to do with the soul, in the way of temptation and hellish suggestion: Look, as the carnal will opposes itself to the thoughts in the former case to no purpose; so that the sanctified will opposes itself to them in this case, oft times with as little effect or success, as he that opposes his weak breath to the strong current of a mighty river. Well were it, if the sanctified will were now the master of the fancy, and could control the thoughts of the heart; but, like a mad horse, the fancy takes the bit in its teeth, and runs whither it pleases; the will cannot govern it. Think quite another way says the will, turn thy thoughts to other things; but notwithstanding, the soul turns a deaf ear to its counsels. 2. It cannot quiet and compose a raging conscience, and reduce it at its pleasure to rest and peace. This is the peculiar work of God. He only that stills the stormy seas, can quiet the distressed and tempestuous soul. The impotence of the will, in this case, is known to all that have been in those deeps of trouble. And this is the misery of the devil and the damned, that though they would never so lain, yet they cannot get rid of those tormenting impressions made upon them by their own trembling and condemning consciences. There would not be so many pale, sweating, affrighted consciences on earth, and in hell, if the will had any command or power over them.

Monergistic Regeneration

Man's Depravity Necessitates God's Election, Irresistible Grace, etc.

Why did God create the world and people and stuff? To display and communicate his glory, which is his goodness, grace, mercy and love (to those he has chosen) and to display his justice, hatred of sin, etc., (to those he hasn't chosen; remember, God is the potter...Romans 9:21 Has the potter no right over the clay, to make out of the same lump one vessel for honorable use and another for dishonorable use?). In this way all of his attributes are shown as being most excellent (the excellence of the infinite and strict rectitude of his holy nature). It was his natural inclination to show his glory as the Sun displays its rays, as though the Godhead was incomplete without doing so, as the tree and the root are not complete until it bears fruit. These comments by Lawson fill in the rest.

A collections of short excerpts from Lawson's book, The Foundations of Grace. The key doctrines of grace are these:

Man's utter spiritual depravity: man will not believe and cannot believe until the Spirit works it. Romans 8:7-8; 3:11, etc.

Divine election or Sovereign Election: God chose before time began, who he will save, i.e., the elect or the church, or his sheep all meaning the same... Eph. 1, Rm. 8:29

Limited or Definite Atonement (Christ only died for the elect to secure their salvation) Rom. 8:29-34, Heb. 7:25, 2Pet3:9, etc.

Irresistible Grace: When God calls you, you cannot resist the call; you will be converted, that is, all the elect will be converted/saved in time. Ps. 110:3, Phil. 1:29, Deut. 30:6

Perseverance of the Saints: The elect will not perish, they will not lose their salvation, but God will see to it that they will go to heaven and be with him/enjoy him forever. "We are kept by the Power of God", 1Pet. 1:5, John 10:28

All these are interwoven in every page of scripture; Lawson (and the Reformers) brings them out in his book. It is these points that most people hate because they are a direct threat to their so called independence from God, their liberty. That's why many object by saying, God gave us free will... Lawson goes into this.

And this is all to the Glory of God which is the ultimate end that God had in mind in this whole scheme. "Father, I desire that they also whom You gave Me may be with Me where I am, that they may behold My glory which You have given Me; John 17:24

Here is an excerpt from Jonathan Edwards on why God created the world.

1. It seems a thing in itself proper and desirable, that the glorious attributes of God, which consist in a sufficiency to certain acts and effects, should be exerted in the production of such effects as might manifest his infinite power, wisdom, righteousness, goodness, etc. If the world had not been created, these attributes never would have had any exercise. The power of God, which is a sufficiency in him to produce great effects, must for ever have been dormant and useless as to any effect. The divine wisdom and prudence would have had no exercise in any wise contrivance, any prudent proceeding, or disposal of things; for there would have been no objects of contrivance or disposal. The same might be observed of God's justice, goodness, and truth. Indeed God might have known as perfectly that he possessed these attributes, if they never had been exerted or expressed in any effect. But then, if the attributes which consist in a sufficiency for correspondent effects, are in themselves excellent, the exercises of them must likewise be excellent. If it be an excellent thing, that there should be a sufficiency for a certain kind of action or operation, the excellency of such a sufficiency must consist in its relation to this kind of operation or effect; but that could not be, unless the operation itself were excellent. A sufficiency for any work is no further valuable, than the work itself is valuable 195 .

¹⁹⁵“The end of wisdom (says Mr. G. Tennent, in his sermon at the opening of the Presbyterian church of Philadelphia) is design; the end of power is action; the end of goodness is doing good. To suppose these perfections not to be exerted would be to represent them as insignificant. Of what use would God’s wisdom be, if it had nothing to design or direct? To what purpose his almightiness, if it never brought anything to pass? And of what avail his goodness, if it never did any good?”

As God therefore esteems these attributes themselves valuable, and delights in them; so it is natural to suppose that he delights in their proper exercise and expression. For the same reason that he esteems his own sufficiency wisely to contrive and dispose effects, he also will esteem the wise contrivance and disposition itself. And for the same reason, as he delights in his own disposition to do justly, and to dispose of things according to truth and just proportion; so he must delight in such a righteous disposal itself. – Jonathan Edwards, Vol. 1

SOVEREIGN GRACE: A FIRM FOUNDATION

By Steven J Lawson

The truths of sovereign grace form the strongest doctrinal foundation for any church or believer. The doctrines of God’s sovereignty in man’s salvation lay the sturdiest cornerstone and, thus, firmly undergird the lives and ministries of God’s people. The church’s worship is the purest when her teaching of sovereign grace is the clearest. Her manner of life is the cleanest when her exposition of the doctrines of grace is the richest. Her fellowship is the sweetest when her instruction in God’s sovereignty is the firmest. Her evangelism in the world is the strongest when her proclamation of transcendent theology is the boldest. The spiritual life of the entire church is elevated when her message is anchored to the highest view of God’s sovereign grace. It is in those times in history when the doctrines of grace have been presented in their rich fullness that the church has most thrived. Here remains the church's firm foundation—the impregnable truths of sovereign grace. Concerning this sturdy foundation, Benjamin B. Warfield has written, "Now these Five Points form an organic unity, a single body of truth. They are based on two presuppositions that Scripture abundantly supports. The first presupposition is the complete impotence of man, and the second is God's absolute sovereignty in grace. Everything else follows. The meeting place of these two foundation truths is the heart of the Gospel, for it follows that if man is totally depraved, the grace of God in saving him must of necessity be sovereign. Otherwise, man will inevitably refuse it in his depravity, and will remain unredeemed." Warfield is correct in his estimation. Human guilt and divine grace clearly intersect in the gospel, and the doctrines of sovereign grace most vividly portray the greatness of the salvation of God. To the point, Boice succinctly states, "The doctrines of grace stand or fall together, and together they point to one central truth: salvation is all of grace because it is all of God; and because it is all of God, it is all for His glory." May all glory go to Him who supplies all grace. pg 312

By His Grace and For His Glory

The doctrines of grace are so called because these five major headings of theology, often identified as the five points of biblical Calvinism, contain the purest expression of the saving grace of God. Each of these five doctrines—radical depravity, sovereign election, definite atonement, irresistible call, and preserving grace—supremely display the sovereign grace of God. These five headings stand together as one comprehensive statement of the saving purposes of God. For this reason, there is really only one point to the doctrines of grace, namely, that God saves sinners by His grace and for His glory. These two realities—God's grace and glory—are inseparably bound together. Whatever most magnifies God's grace most magnifies His glory. And that which most exalts God's grace is the truth expressed in the doctrines of grace.

On the other hand, compromising any one of the five points dilutes and diminishes the grace of God. For instance, to speak of a mere partial corruption of man, one in which the lost sinner is only spiritually sick in his sin, makes a misdiagnosis that grossly diminishes the grace of God. Likewise, to espouse a conditional election that is dependent upon God's foresight of man's faith corrupts the grace of God. To teach that Christ made a universal atonement, making salvation possible for all (though actual for none), cheapens the grace of God. To believe in a resistible call that allows for the free will of man compromises the grace of God. And to think of reversible grace, which would allow man to fall away from the faith, contaminates the pure grace of God. These views undermine the grace of God, and because of that, sad to say, they rob God of His glory. And yet, such views are widely held in the church today. In any syncretistic Arminian scheme of theology, salvation is seen as being partly of God and partly of man—whether it be that man adds his good works or that he contributes his own self-generated faith to the finished work of Christ. These schemes divide the glory between God and man. To whatever extent one deviates from any of the five doctrines of grace, one marginalizes the glory that is due to God alone for the salvation of sinners.

GIVING GLORY TO GOD ALONE

Writing shortly before his death in 2000, James Montgomery Boice noted, “Having a high view of God means something more than giving glory to God... it means giving glory to God alone. This is the difference between Calvinism and Arminianism. While the former declares that God alone saves sinners, the latter gives the impression that God enables sinners to have some part in saving themselves. Calvinism presents salvation as the work of the triune God—election by the Father, redemption in the Son, calling by the Spirit. Furthermore, each of these saving acts is directed toward the elect, thereby infallibly securing their salvation. By contrast, Arminianism views salvation as something that God makes possible but that man makes actual. This is because the saving acts of God are directed toward different persons: the Son’s redemption is for humanity in general; the Spirit’s calling is only for those who hear the gospel; narrower still, the Father’s election is only for those who believe the gospel. Yet in none of these cases (redemption, calling, or election) does God actually secure the salvation of even one sinner! The inevitable result is that rather than depending exclusively on divine grace, salvation depends partly on a human response. So although Arminianism is willing to give God the glory, when it comes to salvation, it is unwilling to give Him all the glory. It divides the glory between heaven and earth, for if what ultimately makes the difference between being saved and being lost is man’s ability to choose God, then to just that extent God is robbed of His glory. Yet God Himself has said, ‘I will not yield My glory to another’ (Isa. 48:11).”

This is why the doctrines of grace are so desperately needed in our churches. They give glory to God alone. They define salvation as being all of God. When salvation is correctly perceived in this way, then—and only then—God receives all the glory for it. Only sola gratia produces soli Deo gloria. "Life cannot make sense without an understanding of the sovereignty of God and the sinfulness of man." p145

RADICAL DEPRAVITY p142

Solomon taught the first main heading of the doctrines of grace—the radical depravity of the human heart. Unregenerate man is plagued by sinful corruption. His entire being is polluted by sin—mind, emotions, and will. In the very depths of his inner person, he is defiled and governed by sin. Professing to be free, he is a slave of sin.

1. Depraved Heart. The unconverted heart is filled with coveting of every kind. Such wrongful desiring of what belongs to others is a deeply rooted problem in the human heart:

Whoever is wicked covets the spoil of evildoers, but the root of the righteous bears fruit. (Prov. 12:12)

The wicked, rather than being content with what they have, always crave what they do not have. What is worse, they go so far as to covet what evil men have schemed to obtain by wicked means. Bridges writes on this verse, “Man is always restless to press onwards to something not yet enjoyed.... The wicked emulate each other in wickedness; and if they see evil men more successful than themselves, they desire their net (Ps. 10:8–10; Jer. 5:26–28).”³⁹ The lust of unregenerate man’s eyes and flesh can never be satisfied.

2. Deceived Eyes. The unregenerate are self-deceived. They are astute at rationalizing their sinful behavior and adept at justifying themselves in their own eyes before God: All the ways of a man are pure in his own eyes, but the LORD weighs the spirit. (Prov. 16:2)

The inward corruption of the sin nature causes lost men to live in a perpetual state of self-deception regarding their spiritual state before God. Presuming themselves to be morally clean, they are blind to their true wretched condition. Bridges writes, “If man were his own judge, who would be condemned?... Man will never believe his real character, until the looking-glass is held to his face with convincing light..... He confesses himself indeed to be a sinner. But what his sins are, he knows not.” Rather than seeing themselves as God sees them, the unconverted see themselves through self-righteous eyes of sin-excusing deception (12:15; 14:12; 21:2; 30:12).

3. Degenerate Mouth. The unconverted speak evil words from their wicked hearts, revealing their corrupt natures. They spew out all manner of evil things:

The heart of the righteous ponders how to answer, but the mouth of the wicked pours out evil things. (Prov. 15:28)

Radical depravity reveals itself most convincingly through the mouth. The lips of the wicked speak evil things because that is what fills their sin-defiled hearts. Bridges writes, “The wicked has no... restraint.... He cares not what he says. It is of little consequence to him, whether it be true, or well timed, or whom it wounds. His poisoned fountain poureth out poisonous waters. (Eccles. 10:3, 12–14).” Words provide the outward evidence of the inward corruption of the human heart.

4. Defiled Soul. The unsaved are morally unclean at the deepest levels of their innermost beings. None can claim to be pure before God:

Who can say, “I have made my heart pure; I am clean from my sin”? (Prov. 20:9)

The entirety of every unconverted person is corrupt. At the depths of their beings, they are depraved and defiled. What is worse, they cannot cleanse themselves through their own efforts or even cease from sinning. Waltke describes this problem as “‘humanity’s moral impotence,’ or inability to live without committing sin. All lost sinners are in ‘bondage to sin,’ rendering them ‘ethically impure’ and far from ‘sinless perfection.’” Ross adds, “Many passages affirm the inevitability of our sinfulness (Gen. 6:5; 1 Kings 8:46; Ps. 143:2), and Psalm 51:7 teaches that one can claim to be pure only if made pure by divine forgiveness.” In truth, all of man’s self-righteous efforts to cleanse himself only further compound his own impurity.

Throughout his prophetic book, Jeremiah delivered the devastating doctrine of the radical depravity of the human heart. This foundational doctrine, the first main heading of biblical Calvinism, was a staple in Jeremiah’s teaching. The weeping prophet spoke of radical depravity with absolute clarity. The verses from Jeremiah listed below are some of the Bible’s most descriptive regarding the utter foolishness and stubborn hardness of the unconverted heart. The heart of the human problem, it is often said, is the problem of the human heart. For this reason, the truths Jeremiah taught were applicable not just to apostate Judah in his day, they apply to every unconverted person in every generation in every place in varying degrees:

1. Sensual Affections. The unregenerate heart is filled with spiritual adultery. Rather than loving God supremely, it turns its illicit affections to lust after false gods, especially the greatest idol of all—self:

If a man divorces his wife and she goes from him and becomes another man's wife, will he return to her? Would not that land be greatly polluted? You have played the whore with many lovers; and would you return to me?" declares the Lord. (Jer. 3:1)

In this indictment, Jeremiah wrote that wayward Judah had become a filthy harlot. Rather than loving the Lord above all else, the people were culpable of craving forbidden deities. R. K. Harrison writes, "The imagery of harlotry, familiar from Hosea (Ho. 4:2, 10, 13, etc.), was applied to the nation's idolatry to show that the spiritual defilement of Israel had made reconciliation with God extremely difficult, if not actually impossible."⁵ So it is with all the unsaved. Their unregenerate hearts always fail to love God supremely, substituting other gods in His place. They lack a loyal love for God and are reduced to being spiritual adulterers, resulting in hostility toward God.

2. Senseless Mind. The fallen mind is foolish in choosing to practice evil rather than pursuing God and His holiness. The unconverted are spiritually ignorant about how to do good:

For my people are foolish they know me not; they are stupid children; they have no understanding. They are "wise"—in doing evil! But how to do good they know not. (Jer. 4:22)

Jeremiah recorded that the unregenerate are morally insane, possessing no spiritual understanding about how to do righteousness (5:21; 10:8, 14, 21; 51:17). On the other hand, they are stunningly brilliant in concocting and carrying out iniquity. Their entire inner being is backward regarding what is pleasing to God. They are wise toward sin and foolish toward good. Explaining their inverted nature, Charles L. Feinberg writes, "Their trouble is that they have no fellowship with the Lord in doing His will (cf. Hos. 4:1). Their moral values are completely reversed, majoring in evil and minoring in good (v. 22)." This foolishness describes every person suffering under the plague of radical depravity, which becomes "strengthened by habit and practice."

3. Sightless Eyes. The unbeliever also lives in spiritual blindness, groping about in moral darkness, and in spiritual deafness, being unable to hear the truth. Apart from a divine work of regeneration, he is unable to comprehend spiritual truth from God:

Hear this, O foolish and senseless people, who have eyes, but see not, who have ears, but hear not. (Jer. 5:21)

Jeremiah here documented the complete inability of the unregenerate mind to perceive the message of God's Word. An unbeliever has no spiritual capacity whatsoever to see and hear the truth of God with any degree of understanding. Commenting on this moral inability, Matthew Henry notes, "He complains of the shameful stupidity of this people... Their understandings were darkened and unapt to admit the rays of the divine light... they apprehend not the mind of God, though ever so plainly declared to them by the written word, by his prophets." Philip G. Ryken adds, "Their problem was not intellectual but spiritual. Their eyes and ears and minds were shut to the Word of God... it is only by the grace of God that anyone ever understands the message of salvation. The mind and heart of the natural man is closed to God's Word until he is regenerated by the Holy Spirit." Such spiritual blindness and deafness is characteristic of all unbelievers.

4. Sinful Tongue. All unbelievers are inwardly perverse, speaking deceptions and venomous lies. The fact is, the unconverted are ingenious and skilled in lying:

Everyone deceives his neighbor, and no one speaks the truth; they have taught their tongue to speak lies; they weary themselves committing iniquity. (Jer. 9:5)

In this verse, God indicted apostate Judah for speaking damnable lies to the exclusion of the truth of God. Of this lying, Feinberg writes, "They went to great pains to deceive one another. To show the unnaturalness of their wickedness, Jeremiah says that the people trained their tongues contrary to their proper function. Lying takes more effort than speaking the truth, but they were willing to endure the drudgery of sin. They persisted in their wrongdoing. Their desire to do evil exceeded their power and strength."¹⁰ Ryken adds, "The words that came from their mouths were like so many poison darts. They even took their tongues to boot camp, training them for verbal combat: 'They have taught their tongues to lie.'" Whether it is a subtle distortion or a sharp denial of the truth, unsaved people are given to speaking what is not true. They speak out of their fallen natures.

5. Spiritual Inability. The unregenerate person cannot change his sin nature or act contrary to his wicked heart. His will is essentially imprisoned:

Can the Ethiopian change his skin or the leopard his spots? Then also you can do good who are accustomed to do evil. (Jer. 13:23)

Jeremiah unequivocally affirmed that the unbeliever does not have the innate ability to repent of his sin or turn to God for true righteousness. Man's will cannot act contrary to his corrupt nature. A fallen heart can give rise only to a rebellious will that will not submit to God. [Can a bad tree produce good fruit? My insert] Concerning this text, John Calvin writes, "God declares that the people are so hardened in their wickedness that there is no hope of their repentance. If an Ethiopian washed a hundred times a day, he would still remain black. Jeremiah condemns the Jews for their habitual practice of doing evil. They were unable to repent, for their wickedness had become inherent or firmly fixed in their hearts, like the blackness that is inherent in the skin of the Ethiopians or the spots belonging to the leopard." That is to say, no unregenerate heart can change its nature; it cannot choose contrary to itself toward God. Regarding this startling verse, Charles H. Spurgeon proclaims, "You can make yourself filthy by sin, but you cannot make yourself spiritually clean, do what you will... You can do evil all too readily; you can do it with both hands, greedily, and do it again and again, and not grow weary of it; but to return to the right path, this is the difficulty.... But remember, dear friends, that, even if an Ethiopian could change his skin, that would be a far smaller difficulty than the one with which a sinner has to deal, for it is not his skin, but his heart, which has to be changed." The unconverted simply cannot change their ways.

6. Sick Heart. The unconverted heart—man's entire inner person—is completely wicked and incurably sick. In his fallen spiritual condition, man is plagued and polluted by sin far beyond human comprehension:

The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately sick; who can understand it? (Jer. 17:9)

Jeremiah wrote that the unconverted heart is so deceitful that man cannot comprehend the depths of its depravity. All the mental, emotional, and volitional faculties within a person are desperately ill. Without mincing words, J.C. Ryle writes, "Sin is a disease which pervades and runs through every part of our moral constitution and every faculty of our minds. The understanding, the affections, the reasoning powers, the will, are all more or less infected. Even the conscience is so blinded that it cannot be depended on as a sure guide, and is as likely to lead men wrong as right, unless it is enlightened by the Holy Ghost. In short, ‘from the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness’ about us (Isa. 1:6). The disease may be veiled under a thin covering of courtesy, politeness, good manners, and outward decorum; but it lies deep down in the constitution.”¹⁴ A. W. Pink adds, “[Unregenerate man] will not come to Christ, because he does not want to, and he does not want to because his heart hates Him and loves sin.”¹⁵ The fact is, fallen man suffers from massive heart failure.

4. Spiritual Inability.

Jesus taught that it is absolutely impossible for spiritually dead sinners to exercise saving faith. They are marked by a volitional inability, having no free will with which to exercise faith toward Christ:

No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him.... It is the Spirit who gives life; the flesh is of no avail.... This is why I told you that no one can come to me unless it is granted him by the Father. (John 6:44a, 63–65)

In no uncertain terms, Christ declared the bondage of the unregenerate human will. He announced that no man can come to Him—meaning no one can believe upon Him—apart from a sovereign work of God. In itself, the human will lacks the capacity to choose Christ. When Jesus said, “No one can come to me,” He intentionally used the word can as opposed to may. This significant distinction indicates the difference between man’s ability to believe and his permission to come to Christ. In these verses, Jesus is saying that no unregenerate person has the inherent ability to believe upon Him. He may come to Christ—he has permission to do so. But he cannot do so—he lacks the ability. Pinpointing this truth, Pink writes, “These words of Christ make manifest the depths of human depravity. They expose the inveterate stubbornness of the human will.” Leon Morris adds, “People like to feel independent. They think that they come or that they can come to Jesus entirely of their own volition. Jesus assures us that this is an utter impossibility. No one, no one at all, can come unless the Father draws him.”

5. Spiritual Slavery. Jesus further taught that the unregenerate heart is entirely enslaved to sin. As a slave is bound to obey his master, a lost sinner must always choose to obey sin: Jesus answered them,

Truly, truly, I say to you, everyone who commits sin is a slave to sin. (John 8:34)

Jesus proclaimed that the lost sinner's true master is sin. The unconverted man must do what sin commands. The entirety of his sinful nature—mind, emotion, and will—is fast bound in sin. Without equivocating, Calvin writes, "Here Christ declares that all who are not freed by Him are in slavery, and that all who derive the contagion of sin from corrupted nature are slaves from birth." Furthermore, no man can liberate himself from the power of sin. William Hendriksen explains, "Such a man is here called a slave of sin (cf. Rom. 6:16; 11:32; 2 Pet. 2:19). He is a slave, for he has been overcome and taken captive by his master, sin, and is unable to deliver himself from this bondage. He is as truly (nay, more truly) chained as is the prisoner with the iron band around his leg, the band that is fastened to a chain which is cemented into the wall of a dungeon. He cannot break the chain. On the contrary, every sin he commits draws it tighter, until at last it crushes him completely. That is the picture which Jesus draws here of sinners as they are by nature. Do the Jews regard themselves as free men? In reality they are slaves without any freedom at all. They are prisoners in chains." It is clear that committing acts of sin is the inevitable result—not the cause—of being enslaved to sin.

6. Spiritual Bondage.

Jesus announced that all unsaved people suffer an even greater bondage, being enslaved to Satan. Bound in his kingdom of darkness, the unconverted are under the restricting control of the devil, being induced to perform his deeds of rebellion:

You are of your father the devil, and your will is to do your father's desires. He was a murderer from the beginning, and has nothing to do with the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he lies, he speaks out of his own character, for he is a liar and the father of lies. But because I tell the truth, you do not believe me. (John 8:44–45)

Jesus pronounced that the spiritual father of every unsaved person is the devil himself. To be "of your father the devil" means to belong to Satan and be held captive by him to do his will. Every unbeliever suffers this dreadful enslavement. Boice writes that the unconverted religious leaders whom Jesus addressed "thought they had it made because they were descended from Abraham physically. Jesus pointed out that God is interested in a spiritual relationship and that their actions indicated that they were actually children of the devil." Morris adds, "They take their origin from the devil, their father. Consequently they set their will on doing his evil desires. They voluntarily choose to do his will.”¹⁸ Every aspect of one’s inner being is in bondage to Satan, including the will.

RADICAL DEPRAVITY

Painting a true picture of the nature of sinful man, Ezekiel taught the total corruption of the human heart. According to the prophet, sin has permeated the entirety of man’s fallen being. His complete person—mind, emotion, and will—has been ruined by the inward pollution of sin. Ezekiel taught that natural man is unable to do anything that is pleasing to God. To the contrary, he does evil all the time, provoking God’s wrath. Unregenerate man’s internal depravity means that he cannot understand, desire, or will to do what is good before God.

1. Stubborn Hearts. Unregenerate hearts are unwilling to listen to God’s Word. Because their spiritual ears are closed, they will not follow the Lord’s commands:

But the house of Israel will not be willing to listen to you, for they are not willing to listen to me. Because all the house of Israel have a hard forehead and a stubborn heart. (Ezek. 3:7)

The people of Judah were stubborn and hard-hearted, unwilling to hear and heed God’s Word. With stiff necks and rebellious hearts, they resisted the divine message when it came to them. They had “a hard forehead,” indicating a mind closed to divine truth and a heart impenetrable to God’s Word. This hardened condition is true of all unconverted people, though more true of some than others. To this point, Calvin writes, “They purposely rejected the Word of God, and hardened themselves in obstinacy.... The people were not only disobedient to the Prophet but to God himself, as Christ also when he exhorts his disciples to perseverance in teaching. Therefore, says he, they will not hear you, because they will not hear me, and why am I and my teaching hated by them, unless because they do not receive my Father? (John 15:18).... The people’s hardness of heart was untamable, and... they were not only obstinate in heart but brazen in countenance.” In like manner, every unconverted heart is unwilling to submit to the Lord in order to receive His Word. P189

In his second epistle, Peter further reinforced the doctrine of radical depravity with emphatic clarity. The aging Apostle accomplished this by uncovering the inner corruption of false teachers who were soon to infiltrate the church. Their sin natures were unspeakably perverse and wicked, yet no different from those of the rest of the human race. Those seduced by these false teachers would be easily duped because they were of the same foul nature. Like attracts like. The corruption of the false teachers showed the radical depravity of the human heart, which is wholly given over to sin.

1. Useless Claims. The unregenerate make empty claims regarding faith in Christ. They are often self-deceived about their true standing before God, professing to be bought by Christ even though they are not:

But false prophets also arose among the people, just as there will be false teachers among you, who will secretly bring in destructive heresies, even denying the Master who bought them, bringing upon themselves swift destruction. (2 Peter 2:1)

Peter warned his readers that many false teachers had invaded the early church, claiming to be saved. They professed faith in Christ, even claiming to have been bought by Him, but their professions were dead testimonies. They were not true believers; they had not been purchased by Christ. Concerning this verse, Boice writes, “It seems to speak of those who have actually been redeemed by Jesus’ death and yet perish. But we have to look closely at the nature of those about whom Peter is speaking. They are ‘false prophets,’ ‘false teachers’ who teach ‘destructive heresies.’ Are they Christians? No. Therefore, they are not saved people who perish, but rather unsaved people. How is it, then, that Peter can speak of them ‘denying the Sovereign Lord who bought them’? The best approach is to think of this as describing what these unbelieving teachers claimed rather than what they had actually received from Jesus.” The Reformation Study Bible concurs: “Peter is not saying Christians can lose their salvation (John 10:28–29; Rom. 8:28–30), but is describing the false teachers in terms of their own profession of faith (vv. 20–21). By teaching and practicing immorality they despise the lordship of Christ and prove their profession to be false (1 John 2:3, 4, 19).” The fact is, Christ had not died for these false prophets, no matter how much they claimed it was so. pg 305

Superstitious Hearts

The natural man [the unsaved man] fails to pursue God with supreme affection. On the contrary, he chooses to passionately pursue other gods: “and say, You mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord God! Thus says the Lord God to the mountains and the hills, to the ravines and the valleys: Behold, I, even I, will bring a sword upon you, and I will destroy your high places. Your altars shall become desolate, and your incense altars shall be broken, and I will cast down your slain before your idols.” Ezek. 6:3-4

Despite being abundantly blessed by receiving the Law and the Prophets, Israel chose to worship the gods of the Canaanites. Idolatry flooded the people’s hearts as they rejected the true knowledge of God for blasphemous lies. Israel chose to worship at the “high places,” which were altars raised up to false gods. The Hebrew word for “idol” is derived from the word for “heat,” an indication of the illegitimate, burning passion in the people’s hearts, for false gods. Calvin comments, “Idols therefore may very properly derive their name from heat, because their superstitious worshippers inflame themselves with love.” To be sure, such rival affections flood all radically corrupt hearts. Indeed, idolatry is an inevitable fruit of radical depravity. Because of the inherent corruption of their sin-plagued souls, the unregenerate lust after other gods. Rather than guarding their hearts, which belong to God alone, they let themselves be gripped by illicit desires for idols. pg 190

Sensual Hearts

Because the unconverted fail to love God supremely, they shamefully misuse His good gifts. They use the things He gives to fashion gods of their own making.

“But you trusted in your beauty and played the whore¹⁶ because of your renown and lavished your whorings on any passerby; your beauty¹⁶ became his. ¹⁶You took some of your garments and made for yourself colorful shrines, and on them played the whore. The like has never been, nor ever shall be. ¹⁷You also took your beautiful jewels of my gold and of my silver, which I had given you, and made for yourself images of men, and with them played the whore.” Ezek. 16:15-17

In the days before the Babylonian exile, the people of Judah behaved like harlots, lusting after other gods. Rather than maintaining loyalty in their hearts toward God, they fell into spiritual unfaithfulness and flirted with idols. By this, they showed themselves to be apostate. But the people magnified their sin by using the gold and silver that God had given them to fashion their own pagan gods. In short, they played the whore. Such is the tragic behavior of all unbelievers. They love the world and the things of the world to the exclusion of loving God, using His good gifts to spit in His face. It is not wonder that the love of the Father is not in them. pg 191

The doctrines of grace rest firmly upon this immovable foundation of the sovereignty of God. This unshakable divine supremacy is clearly taught in the book of Daniel. By the free exercise of His sovereign will, God determines the course of all human history. He always does as He desires on earth, regardless of the rebellious will of fallen men. No one can resist the sovereign will of God.

Unrivaled Sovereignty. God effortlessly controls the course of all human events, including the rise and fall of kings and kingdoms. This overruling providence implies that God also controls the lives of the individuals who live in these kingdoms.

*He changes times and seasons;
he removes kings and sets up kings;
he gives wisdom to the wise and knowledge to those who have understanding; Dan. 2:21*

God alone bestows a delegated authority upon men – even fallen men – to rule over nations. He alone gives wisdom and understanding to rulers, even unsaved kings. Without these gifts of common grace, human monarchs would not have the intuitive insight they need to perform their task. Thus, all earthly kings are completely dependent upon God for their thrones and for their abilities. Calvin writes, “If God resigns the supreme government of the world, so that all things are rashly mingled together, he is no longer God. But in this variety he rather displays his hand in claiming for himself the empire over the world... God, I say, so changes empires, and times, and seasons, that we should learn to look up to him.” Calvin is right, but we also must look to God in the spiritual realm. Just as kings are dependent on common grace, sinful man is completely dependent upon God for saving grace, being unable to come to God or to save himself. Only by sovereign grace does man receive the wisdom and understanding necessary to believe. This is an unmerited gift that God confers as He desires (Rom. 9:15, Eph. 2:8).

Divine Regeneration

One of the distinguishing features of the biblical view of the new birth is what theologians refer to as monergism. The prefix mono means “one”. The Greek word erg refers to “a unit of work”; it is from this root that we get the English word energy, which describes a powerful working. Monergism, then, refers to one agent doing a work, and Monergistic regeneration communicates the truth that only one agent is active in the work of regeneration, that one being God. The new birth is a work produced singularly by God. He alone is active in regeneration, while man is passive [see pg 1884]. The greatly esteemed Puritan pastor John Owen comments, “To say that we are able by our own efforts to think good thoughts or give God spiritual obedience before we are spiritually regenerate is to overthrow the gospel and the faith of the universal church in all ages.” God alone gives sinners new birth. God alone raises sinners from the dead and circumcises their hearts. God alone grants illumination and understanding of His Word to that we may believe in Christ. The biblical teaching is that “regeneration is the work of the Holy Spirit unaided by human effort or cooperation.” (Alex Carnes) The point is simply this – the doctrines of grace are unequivocally monergistic. Charles Hodge, the noted Princeton theologian of the mid-nineteenth century, writes, “No more soul destroying doctrine could well be devised than the doctrine that sinners can regenerate themselves, and repent and believe just when they please... As it is a truth both of Scripture and of experience it is essential that he should be brought to a practical conviction of that truth. When thus convinced, and not before, he seeks help from the only source whence it can be obtained.

Conversely, synergistic regeneration – the prefix syn meaning “together with” – lies on the other end of the theological spectrum, being distinctly man-centered. This Arminian view of the new birth claims not one but two agents – God and man, as if they were equal powers. Synergistic regeneration requires cooperation between God and man. Under this two-party view of the new birth, man must cooperate with the Holy Spirit, and the Holy Spirit must cooperate with man. In the end, man has the power of veto. It is touted that lowly, impotent man can resist the work of the omnipotent, sovereign Holy Spirit in salvation. Steven J Lawson, Foundations of Grace p 171

We Need Preachers of Divine Regeneration

On Thursday evening, February 15, 1883, Spurgeon preached a highly charged sermon titled "A Test for True Seekers." In that message, proclaimed with evangelistic fervor, "the Prince of Preachers" pressed his listeners on this direly important subject of the new birth. Spurgeon announced, "Do I address one here who imagines that an orthodox creed will save him? I suppose that no one is more orthodox than the devil, yet no one is more surely lost than he is. You may get a clear head, but if you have not a clean heart, it will not avail you at the last. You may know that Westminster Assembly's Catechism by heart, but unless you are born again, it will not benefit you. Did you say that you believed the thirty-nine articles? There is one article that is essential – 'Ye must be born again?' (John 3:7) And woe to that man who has not passed through that all-important change."

The necessity of the new birth is non-negotiable. Except one be born again, he cannot see or enter the kingdom of heaven (John 3:3-5). But the nature of this spiritual birth is so supernatural, there is nothing man can do to induce it or restrain it. Like the blowing of the wind, it cannot be caused, controlled, or constrained (John 3:8). Regeneration is entirely a sovereign work of the Holy Spirit of God, independent of man's fleshly manufacturing or manipulation.

An emphasis on divine regeneration of spiritually dead sinners was common in pulpits in past days. Not surprisingly, those were the days when the church was strongest. If we would see our churches vibrantly alive once more, the supernatural work of God in the soul of man – divine regeneration – must be proclaimed again in truth and power. Spurgeon knew the importance of this subject, and urged more preaching on it: "Salvation must be the work of the Spirit in us, because the means used in salvation are of themselves inadequate for the accomplishment of this work. Pg 197 Lawson

The Effectual Call of God

The prophet Isaiah also taught God's irresistibly gracious call, a necessary doctrine that is inseparably connected to the truths of radical depravity, sovereign election, and definite atonement. Man is totally depraved: His mind is darkened, his heart is defiled, and his will is dead. In other words, man's fallen will is in bondage to sin, unable to act independently of its depraved nature. Left to itself, man's fallen will always chooses to sin and reject Christ. Therefore, God must effectually call the elect to faith in Christ if they are to be converted. This saving call by the Holy Spirit is so powerful that it always secures the God-intended result for which it is extended. The Holy Spirit overpowers the sin-hardened hearts of the elect and effectually draws them to the Lord, causing them to put their trust in Him. This is irresistible grace, the omnipotent work of the Lord in the stubborn hearts of His chosen ones. Whenever any person comes to saving faith in the Lord, it is because he has been supernaturally drawn to believe. Steven Lawson, Foundations of Grace pg 165

John Flavel puts it this way: That it is utterly impossible for any man to come to Jesus Christ, unless he be drawn unto him by the special and mighty power of God. No man is compelled to come to Christ against his will; he that cometh, comes willingly, but even that will and desire to come is the effect of grace, Phil. ii. 13. "It is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do of his own good pleasure." "If we desire the help and assistance of grace, (saith Fulgentius) even the desire is of grace; grace must first be shed forth upon us, before we can begin to desire it." "By grace are ye saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God," Eph. 2:8. ...For though God does not force the will contrary to its nature, yet there is a real internal efficacy implied in this drawing, or an immediate operation of the Spirit upon the heart and will, which, in a way congruous and suitable to its nature, takes away the rebellion and reluctance of it, and of unwilling, makes it willing to come to Christ. ...so the next words tell us what the Father does, [Draw him] That is, powerfully and effectually incline his will to come to Christ: "Not by a violent co-action, but by a benevolent bending of the will which was averse;" and as it is not in the way of force and compulsion, so neither is it by a simple moral suasion, by the bare proposal of an object to the will, and so leaving the sinner to his own election; but it is such a persuasion, as hath a mighty overcoming efficacy accompanying it; pg 68-69 vol. 2 Sermon 4

G. Vos states: Reformed Dogmatics, p660

31. How does God move the will of man? In a manner that accords with the freedom and the spontaneous character of the will—not, therefore, by placing Himself against the will and bending it with force; also not by a physical or unspiritual power that occurs in baptism, as the Roman Catholics contend; but by bringing about a reversal in the root of life, out of which the will itself arises. The result of this, then, is that the will of itself works in the opposite direction than was previously the case, and that no longer unwillingly but spontaneously, willingly.

Regenerations – Monergism vs. Arminianism

One of the distinguishing features of the biblical view of the new birth is what theologians refer to as monergism. The prefix mono means "one." The Greek word erg refers to “a unit of work”; it is from this root that we get the English word energy, which describes a powerful working. Monergism, then, refers to one agent doing a work, and monergistic regeneration communicates the truth that only one agent is active in the work of regeneration, that one being God. The new birth is a work produced singularly by God. He alone is active in regeneration, while man is passive [see pg 1884]. The greatly esteemed Puritan pastor John Owen comments, “To say that we are able by our own efforts to think good thoughts or give God spiritual obedience before we are spiritually regenerate is to overthrow the gospel and the faith of the universal church in all ages.” God alone gives sinners new birth. God alone raises sinners from the dead and circumcises their hearts. God alone grants illumination and understanding of His Word so that we may believe in Christ. The biblical teaching is that “regeneration is the work of the Holy Spirit unaided by human effort or cooperation.”

The point is simply this—the doctrines of grace are unequivocally monergistic. Charles Hodge, the noted Princeton theologian of the mid-nineteenth century, writes, “No more soul-destroying doctrine could well be devised than the doctrine that sinners can regenerate themselves, and repent and believe just when they please.... As it is a truth both of Scripture and of experience that the unrenewed man can do nothing of himself to secure his salvation, it is essential that he should be brought to practical conviction of that truth. When thus convinced, and not before, he seeks help from the only source whence it can be obtained.”

Conversely, synergistic regeneration—the prefix syn meaning “together with”—lies on the other end of the theological spectrum, being distinctly man-centered. This Arminian view of the new birth claims not one but two agents—God and man, as if they were equal powers. Synergistic regeneration requires cooperation between God and man. Under this two-party view of the new birth, man must cooperate with the Holy Spirit, and the Holy Spirit must cooperate with man. In the end, man has the power of veto. It is touted that lowly, impotent man can resist the work of the omnipotent, sovereign Holy Spirit in salvation. Lawson, P 172

Consistent with the other biblical authors, Jeremiah also taught the doctrine of sovereign election. God revealed this majestic truth to Jeremiah at the time of his calling to the prophetic office. In the opening verses of his book, Jeremiah recorded that God had chosen him for salvation and ministry long before he was born. The prophet wrote that, before time began, God set His heart upon him with a distinguishing love and set him apart for His own purposes. Thus, Jeremiah did not treat the doctrine of sovereign election as a secondary truth, reserving it for an obscure section in his book. Rather, he revealed it at the very outset of his prophecy, making it the firm foundation for all that would follow. From the opening verses of his book, Jeremiah taught the doctrine of election. As a potter fashions clay into different objects for different purposes, so God sovereignly purposes to make His elect into objects of saving grace.

1. Predetermined Choice. God has known those individuals He will save from eternity past. Before they were conceived, God set His heart upon them: Before I formed you in the womb I knew you. (Jer. 1:5a) Jeremiah wrote that he was intimately known by God long before his birth. When God said He “knew” the prophet, He meant that He had chosen to love him with distinguishing love. Pink explains, “The word ‘foreknowledge’ is not found in the Old Testament. But ‘know’ occurs there frequently. When that term is used in connection with God, it often signifies to regard with favor, denoting not mere cognition but an affection for the object in view.” This is to say, God set His heart upon Jeremiah with electing love, choosing him for salvation and service before the foundation of the world. Jeremiah embraced this truth in order to endure the tough times that lay ahead for him in ministry.

2. Purposeful Choice. By an act of His sovereign will, God set Jeremiah apart to Himself for His own eternal purposes. In much the same way, God singles out His elect and determines what they will do to serve Him even before they are born: Before you were born I consecrated you; I appointed you a prophet to the nations. (Jer. 1:5b) In eternity past, God foreknew Jeremiah, having made the sovereign choice to consecrate him for His own purposes. God always chooses the elect with divine design for their lives. They are sovereignly appointed to serve God and do His work. Ryken elaborates upon this truth, saying, “When did God choose him? The prophet was set apart before he was born. While Jeremiah was being carried around in his mother’s womb, God was making preparations for his salvation and his ministry. To set something apart is to sanctify it or to dedicate it to holy service.... God is sovereign. He not only forms His people in the womb, He sets them apart for salvation from all eternity. God’s choice is not unique to Jeremiah; it is true for every believer. This is known as the doctrine of divine election.” As it was with Jeremiah, so it is with all God’s elect. They are chosen with divine design and purpose.

A Sovereign Work of God [my title]

Salvation, start to finish, is entirely a work of God’s grace. No spiritually dead sinner can work his way to heaven. No radically depraved individual can provide payment for his sins. In the face of this moral inability, if any sinful creature is to be in right standing with God, whatever is needed must arise from outside of man. What man cannot do to save himself, God does. What man cannot offer to commend himself to God, God provides. This is saving grace—God doing for sinful man what he cannot do for himself. Through the life and death of His Son, God provides the righteousness by which sinners can be accepted into His holy presence. He freely pays the sin debt of all who believe upon Him.

According to the terms of the gospel, a sinner must believe upon Christ to receive this great salvation. Saving faith is absolutely necessary if a lost sinner is to be saved. But some would have us believe that this personal trust in Christ is man's contribution to salvation. In other words, God supplies the grace and man supplies the faith. Under this fifty-fifty scheme of salvation, God and man work together. Salvation is seen as partly of God and partly of man. In essence, God and man are co-saviors.

But there is one major problem with this: The Bible teaches that salvation is all of grace. That is to say, man makes no contribution whatsoever. Instead, God supplies all that is necessary. More specifically, divine grace produces both the redeeming grace of the cross and the believing grace by which this redeeming grace is received. Even saving faith is God's gift to the lost sinner, enabling him to trust Christ. God, then, supplies everything necessary for man's salvation: both the perfect righteousness of Christ and even the repentance and faith to believe. Man adds nothing except his sin. P199

Out of the mass of morally defiled sinners, God has chosen to love certain individuals redemptively. This election unto salvation is based upon God's unconditional grace and distinguishing mercy, not upon any merit on man's part. God chose His elect, quite simply, because He chose them. To be sure, this discriminating selection by God was not made in a stoic, calculating way, for God is not an indifferent, mechanical deity. Rather, He is a God of deep love—electing love. He has set His affection upon His elect. The doctrine of election is the truth of God's fervent love for His chosen ones: And the Lord said to me, "Go again, love a woman who is loved by another man and is an adulteress, even as the Lord loves the children of Israel, though they turn to other gods and love cakes of raisins." (Hos. 3:1)

In this real-life story, God told Hosea to press on in his love for his adulterous bride, Gomer, despite her gross iniquity. Hosea's unconditional love for Gomer would beautifully portray God's unwavering love for His chosen ones, though they might be marred by great sin. The doctrine of election holds that God chooses to fix His heart upon His elect despite their defilements and perversions. His unconditional love toward these sinners is entirely undeserved. In response to this amazing love, John Calvin comments, "Wonderful was the patience of God, when He ceased not to love a people, whom He had found to be so perverse, that they could not be turned by any acts of kindness nor retained by any favours."⁴ That is, God chose His elect not because of them, but in spite of them. Such are the astonishing depths of the divine love behind God's sovereign electing grace. p203

IRRESISTIBLE CALL

In order to bring His elect to Himself in salvation, God must overcome their radical depravity by issuing a special inward call to them. This call is irresistible in its nature, infallibly bringing elect sinners to saving faith. God does not extend this effectual call to those who make themselves worthy, for none can do so. Also, He does not choose who gets the call on the basis of foreknowledge of who will respond positively, for then man's decision would be the determining factor. Rather, this special, sovereign summons is issued to sinners who are undeserving of mercy. Because God has chosen them to be the objects of His love, He determines that they will receive His grace:

I will sow her for myself in the land. And I will have mercy on No Mercy, and I will say to Not My People, "You are my people" and he shall say, "You are my God."
(Hos. 2:23)

As Hosea was commanded to pursue his estranged wife, even so God seeks His chosen ones until He brings them to Himself. He pursues those He has chosen even while they are entangled in spiritual adultery, looking to other gods. There will be a remnant who will become His people through a supernatural work initiated and accomplished by God. Recognizing God's role in turning sinful man's heart to Himself, Henry writes, "He first says, They are my people, and makes them willing to be so in the day of His power, and then they avouch Him to be theirs." At a time when Israel was mostly lost and under God's wrath, He declared that He would suddenly show Himself compassionate to His people. In that day, God would effectually call those who were not His people—meaning they were unconverted—and they would respond to Him. They would suddenly say,

“You are my God!” They would be dramatically converted and enter into a saving relationship with the Lord. P204

More on Irresistible Grace by John Flavel

O grace, for ever to be admired! that God should send forth his word and Spirit to plow up my hard and stony heart, yea, mine, when he has left so many of more tender, ingenious, sweet, and melting tempers without any culture or means of grace. O blessed gospel, heart-dissolving voice! I have felt thine efficacy, I have experienced thy divine and irresistible power; thou art indeed sharper than any two-edged sword, and woundest to the heart; but thy wounds are the wounds of a friend. All the wounds thou hast made in my soul, were so many doors opened to let in Christ; all the blows you have my conscience, were but to beat off my soul from sin, which I embraced, and had retained to my everlasting ruin, had you not separated them and me. O wise and merciful Physician! Thou didst indeed bind me with cords of conviction and sorrow, but it was only to cut out that stone in my heart, which had killed me if it had continued there. O how did I struggle and oppose thee, as if you had come with the sword of an enemy, rather than the lance and probe of a skillful and tender-hearted physician? Blessed be the day wherein my sin was discovered and embittered! O happy sorrows, which prepared for such matchless joys! O blessed hand, which turned my salt waters into pleasant wine! And after many pangs and sorrows of soul, didst, at length, bring forth deliverance and peace. John Flavel, p 65 Vol. 5

Conversion denotes the great change itself, which the Spirit causes upon the soul, turning it by a sweet irresistible efficacy from the power of sin and Satan, to God in Christ. Now all these are imported in, and done by the application of Christ to our souls; for when once the efficacy of Christ's death, and the virtue of his resurrection, come to take place upon the heart of any man, he cannot but turn from sin to God, and become a new creature, living and acting by new principles and rules. So the apostle observes, 1 Thess. i. 5, 6, speaking of the effect of this work of the Spirit upon that people, "Our gospel (saith he) came not to you in word only, but in power; and in the Holy Ghost;" There was the effectual application of Christ to them. "And you became followers of us, and of the Lord," ver. 6, there was their effectual call. "And ye turned from dumb idols to serve the living and true God," ver. 9. there was their conversion. "So that ye were ensamples to all that believe," ver. 9, there was their life of sanctification or dedication to God. So that all these are comprehended in effectual application. John Flavel, vol. Method of Grace, p 19

God hath entered into covenant with the Son, and sent him, stands obliged thereby, to bring the promised seed to him, and that he does by drawing them to Christ by faith; so the next words tell us the Father does, [Draw him] That is, powerfully and effectually incline his will to come to Christ: "Not by a violent co-action, but by a benevolent bending of the will which was averse;" and as it is not in the way of force and compulsion, so neither is it by a simple moral suasion, by the bare proposal of an object to the will, and so leaving the sinner to his own election; but it is such a persuasion, as hath a mighty overcoming efficacy accompanying it; of which more anon. The words thus opened, the observation will be this: Doctrine: That it is utterly impossible for any man to come to Jesus Christ, unless he be drawn unto him by the special and mighty power of God. John Flavel, p68 vol. 2

The doctrines of grace come under the broader truth of God's absolute sovereignty over all His creation. The Bible teaches that nothing comes to pass apart from God's eternal purposes—even evil and disasters. We see this truth in Amos' declaration that calamities occur under the purview of the sovereignty of God:

Is a trumpet blown in a city, and the people are not afraid? Does disaster come to a city, unless the Lord has done it? (Amos 3:6)

Here, the word translated as "come" (asah) means "doing, making, or appointing." Clearly, God is the Initiator who appoints "disaster," a word (raah) meaning "evil" in the ethical sense. God is not the author of sin, but Amos directly asserted that God sovereignly brings disaster, even evil, on nations, cities, and individuals as a just punishment for their sins (cf. Gen. 18:17; 20:7). Clearly, all events, both good and evil, great and small, come about as the result of God's eternal decree. Recognizing this transcendent theology, Henry writes, "The evil of sin is from ourselves; it is our own doing. But the evil of trouble, personal or public, is from God, and it is His doing; whoever are the instruments, God is the principle agent.” Thus, no disasters occur apart from the Lord. Even in the most difficult calamities, God remains absolutely sovereign.

P207

SOVEREIGN ELECTION

God chose those He would save before the foundation of the world. He purposed to know them in a special, saving way. Certainly, God could have chosen to save all. He also could have elected to save none. Instead, He determined to set His heart upon some—a multitude so vast that no one can number them. God knows these elect in a personal, intimate way:

You only have I known of all the families of the earth. (Amos 3:2a)

Through Amos, God declared that He had chosen—or known—His elect people from all eternity past. This declaration speaks of the deep, personal relationship God has with those He has chosen to be His. From among all the peoples of the earth, He has chosen some to be His own possession. The word translated “known” in this verse is the Hebrew word yada. The word connotes more than mere awareness or acknowledgement. Rather, it has to do with knowing someone intimately with deep, personal love. The Reformation Study Bible explains, “The Hebrew word for ‘know’ has a wide range of meaning, including sexual relations (Gen. 4:1). Here the term denotes God’s sovereign election of Israel as the object of His loving concern (Gen. 18:19; cf. Deut. 7:7–8).”

Seeing the truth of divine election in this verse, James Montgomery Boice writes, “The word ‘know’ (in ‘foreknew’) actually indicates God’s choice, just as in Amos 3:2, which the New International Version rightly renders: ‘You only have I chosen.’... Besides, the text does not say that God foreknew what certain individuals might do, only that He foreknew them as individuals to whom He would extend the grace of salvation.” This carries the idea of God’s sovereign activity whereby the object of His divine knowledge is chosen and set apart for a divine purpose. Far from merely knowing about His people, God intimately knows them, having chosen to enter into a relationship with them in eternity past.

DIVINE SOVEREIGNTY

The book of Jonah clearly reveals God's sovereignty over all creation, a supreme authority that extends over all aspects of the affairs of man. This involves the doctrine of divine providence, which holds that the invisible hand of God controls all aspects of this world. God rules over all things, even salvation, so that His eternal purposes might be carried forth. This was a lesson that Jonah needed to learn. After three days and three nights in the fish's belly, the prophet finally came to his senses and confessed that all that pertains to man's salvation is, in fact, from God. At the bottom of the sea, Jonah declared a deep and profound theological truth: "Salvation belongs to the Lord!" (Jonah 2:9c). Jonah himself embodied this truth; his own heart conviction of sin, his genuine repentance, his true faith, and his supernatural deliverance were all from God. The many conversions of the people of Nineveh also showed that salvation is of the Lord.

1. Controlling Events. God's absolute sovereignty extends over the sea and every facet of the weather. God is the One who sends great storms as He orders all the circumstances and occurrences of life for His own purposes:

But the Lord hurled a great wind upon the sea, and there was a mighty tempest on the sea, so that the ship threatened to break up. (Jonah 1:4)

When Jonah attempted to run away from God's will, he experienced God's control over the sea and the surrounding circumstances of his life. As Jonah fled by ship, a great storm arose on the Mediterranean, stopping Jonah in his tracks. Hugh Martin affirms, "The storm is attributed not to the elements of nature, but to the God of nature; to Him who is over all and 'above all.' He has established laws in nature; but they cannot administer themselves. The Lawgiver administers them.... He supports, maintains, controls, and moves them at His own pleasure." The point is abundantly clear: God controls all events on both a large and small scale, from an immense storm on the Mediterranean Sea to the individual life of one of his servants. P209

Sovereign Election: to Foreknow

In the opening of his book, Nahum gave an awesome description of the attributes of God. In detailing the divine character, he mentioned the Lord's sovereign choice of a people, whom He knows intimately. God chose His elect before the world began, apart from any good He might have foreseen in them. Election is a loving act of the sovereign will of God:

The Lord is good, a stronghold in the day of trouble; he knows those who take refuge in him. (Nah. 1:7)

God knows those who trust in Him. But they trust in the Lord because He knows them. As noted earlier in this chapter, the Hebrew verb yada (here translated as “knows”) means “to choose,” “to choose to love,” or “to select.” Arthur Custance writes, “The Septuagint translated the Old Testament Hebrew word yada, which means ‘to know,’ ‘to regard,’ ‘to care for,’ by the Greek word ginosko. In his treatment of ginosko in Kittel’s Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, Bultmann comments that the compound form proginosko has the more basic meaning of foreordaining or electing rather than merely foreknowing, even as yada can also mean ‘to elect.’” The order of events in this verse is important. God knows His elect people, and that knowing precedes and produces the fact that they take refuge in Him. p214

IRRESISTIBLE CALL

Saving grace is always irresistible grace. It is a work of God that inevitably triumphs in the lives of the elect. Zechariah taught that within the nation of Israel, a remnant would be called to faith in Christ and would surely be converted:

And I will pour out on the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem a spirit of grace and pleas for mercy, so that, when they look on me, on him whom they have pierced, they shall mourn for him, as one mourns for an only child, and weep bitterly over him, as one weeps over a firstborn. (Zech. 12:10)

Zechariah looked ahead to a time when God would pour out His Spirit upon Israel. In that day, Israel would be brought to deep conviction of its sin, especially the sin of crucifying Christ, Zechariah said. At that time, which is still in the future, there will be a great turning to the Lord. God will do a work of sovereign grace in the hearts of many Jews, with the result that “all Israel will be saved” (Rom. 11:26)—a reference to the vast majority in Israel [all Israel meaning, all true Israel, genuine believers or the church, the elect, – as Paul notes in Romans 9:6, For they are not all Israel who are of Israel – my insert]. God will pour out His Spirit on the house of David, bringing conviction of sin and granting true repentance, so that many will call upon His name with saving faith. In other words, God Himself will overcome the natural inclination of the unconverted heart, which is not able to seek God in and of itself.

Recognizing the absolute certainty of this fulfillment, MacArthur writes, “God, in His own perfect time and by His own power, will sovereignly act to save Israel.” Boice adds that Israel’s understanding of Christ’s crucifixion “will come about by the power of God’s Holy Spirit, for it is only as God pours out ‘a spirit of grace and supplication’ that the repentance and turning depicted in these verses occurs. It is only by the power of God’s Holy Spirit that they occur anywhere or to anyone.” It is God’s Spirit who causes unconverted sinners to look to the Savior they have long rejected. This is the basis of every true conversion. P217

Malachi made known that God’s love is an electing love. As the Sovereign Lord of heaven and earth, He chooses to set His love upon His elect (Eph. 1:4) and rejects with severe displeasure those whom He passes over. God loves the elect deeply, but He hates the non-elect because of their sin. In truth, a holy God must hate all who sin and fall short of His glory. This is more than God hating the sin but loving the sinner; this is God making no distinction between the sinner and his sin. God’s wrath abides upon them (John 3:36; Rom. 1:18; Eph. 5:6), but He has determined to love His chosen ones:

“I have loved you,” says the Lord. But you say, “How have you loved us?” “Is not Esau Jacob’s brother?” declares the Lord. “Yet I have loved Jacob but Esau I have hated.” (Mal. 1:2–3a)

With sovereign, distinguishing love, God chose Jacob over Esau (Gen. 25:22–23). He loved the one and hated the other, a fact affirmed later by the Apostle Paul (Rom. 9:13). The Lord chose to love His elect in Christ from before the foundation of the world (Eph. 1:4). For this reason, God loved Jacob, not because he was Jacob, but because God had chosen him in Christ. MacArthur writes, “God reaffirmed His love to them, recalling His covenant of Jacob over Esau, father of the Edomites (cf. Gen. 25:23). In this closing book of the Old Testament, God’s electing love toward Israel, sovereign, undeserved, and persistent (cf. Rom. 9:13), is boldly and explicitly reiterated by the Lord Himself and illustrated by His choice of Jacob and his offspring. Unconditionally, and completely apart from any consideration of human merit, God elected Jacob and his descendants to become His heirs of promise (cf. Rom. 9:6–29).”

To this truth of election, Boice adds, “This striking comparison—between Jacob and Esau... is to remind the self-righteous, critical citizens of Jerusalem of the unmerited and therefore electing love of God. They have had the audacity to demand that God show how He has loved them; utterly disregarding their unique status as His elect people. This is what God now brings to their willfully negligent attention. By birth Esau was as much a privileged child as Jacob; both were twin sons of the same Jewish father and mother, Isaac and Rebekah. Yet God had loved Jacob with a gracious love.” More than merely passing over Esau, God actively despised him as he was in his sin. P218

DIVINE REPROBATION

Although Joshua did not address the five points of the doctrines of grace per se, he did write about the sovereignty of God over the hearts of men. He showed that God is free to harden sinful hearts in order to carry out His purposes: For it was the LORD's doing to harden their hearts that they should come against Israel in battle, in order that they should be devoted to destruction and should receive no mercy but be destroyed, just as the LORD commanded Moses. (Josh. 11:20)

During Joshua's advance into the Promised Land, God hardened the hearts of the Canaanites so that Israel might defeat and destroy them. This hardening was an act of divine judgment. God raised the Canaanites up for this purpose, that He might destroy them. This reveals God's supreme right to act upon the hearts of men as He pleases. About this verse, John Calvin pointedly writes, “God hardens them for this very end, that they may shut themselves out from mercy. Hence that hardness is called His work, because it secures the accomplishment of His design. Should any attempt be made to darken so clear a matter by those who imagine that God only looks down from heaven to see what men will be pleased to do, and who cannot bear to think that the hearts of men are curbed by His secret agency, what else do they display than their own presumption? They only allow God a permissive power, and in this way make His counsel dependent on the pleasure of men. But what saith the Spirit? That the hardening is from God, who thus precipitates those whom He means to destroy.” p93

Jesus taught that before time began, God chose a vast number of individual sinners for salvation. He then gave these elect sinners to Christ to be His people. They were a love gift from the Father, a people who would worship the Son forever. Throughout the gospel of John, Jesus refers to these elect ones by the words “those whom the Father has given me” or similar terms (6:37, 39; 10:29; 17:2, 6, 9, 24). These are the same ones Christ chose for Himself when He came to earth. Because he is enslaved to sin, man cannot exercise his will to choose Christ. The sovereign choice of God both precedes and produces man’s choice of Him. God’s choice is the determinative factor that effects the saving faith of all believers. p255

1. Eternal Choice. God the Father sovereignly chose His elect before time began, long before any person was born or came to believe upon Christ. He then gave those elect ones to Christ as a gift:

All that the Father gives me will come to me, and whoever comes to me I will never cast out.... And this is the will of him who sent me, that I should lose nothing of all that he has given me, but raise it up on the last day. (John 6:37–39)

Christ stated that no sinner can come to Him unless he or she previously has been given to Him by the Father. Implied in this statement is the doctrine of sovereign election. God exercised His sovereignty in eternity past by selecting those whom He then gave to Christ. Morris explains, “The words stress the sovereignty of God. People do not come to Christ because it seems a good idea to them. It never does seem a good idea to sinful people. Apart from a divine work in their souls (cf. 16:8) people remain more or less contentedly in their sins. Before they can come to Christ it is necessary that the Father give them to Him.” D. A. Carson writes that the expression “all that” is “used to refer to the elect collectively.” Boice further notes, “Who are these who have been given by God the Father to Jesus Christ? They are those about whom Paul writes in Ephesians: ‘For He chose us in Him before the creation of the world’ (Eph. 1:4). These are the elect.”

Divine Foreknowledge

Just as he declared on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2:23), Peter stated in his first epistle that Christ was foreknown by the Father before the foundation of the world. That is, He was greatly loved by the Father and foreordained to His saving mission of entering this world to ransom the elect: He was foreknown before the foundation of the world but was made manifest in the last times for your sake. (1 Peter 1:20) Peter had already taught that the elect were foreknown by the Father in eternity past (1:2). This means they were foreloved and foreordained in a redemptive sense. Here Peter used the same word—foreknown—in regard to Jesus Christ, the Savior of the elect. He, too, was foreknown, meaning that He was foreloved by the Father and foreordained to His role of saving the elect. Calvin writes that God “ordained Him in His eternal council.” In other words, Jesus’ saving mission was set before the foundation of the world. But many long centuries of redemptive history had to pass before the time was ripe for His coming. When the time did come, however, Christ was “made manifest... for your sake”—that is, He appeared to save God’s elect. Christ fulfilled His appointed mission of redeeming those who had been given to Him by the Father. P296

Peter also explained that election is according to divine foreknowledge. In other words, God sovereignly chose His elect before time began with a special, saving love: ...according to the foreknowledge of God the Father. 1Peter 1:2 As noted above, foreknowledge does not simply mean that God looked down the tunnel of time to see what would happen in the future. Some in the church teach that God looked ahead to see who would receive Him. According to this lame explanation, God chose those He foresaw choosing Christ. Thus, God’s will is really man’s will. But this view does severe injustice to the biblical doctrine of foreknowledge, which means “to love beforehand.” This tender word describes the Father’s strong affection for His chosen people, an unalterable love that began in eternity past—hence, foreknowledge. MacArthur writes, “Any sort of man-centered definition of foreknowledge is incompatible with God’s absolute sovereignty over all things.... [Foreknowledge] refers to God’s eternal, predetermined, loving, and saving intention.... Foreknowledge involves God’s predetermining to have a relationship with some individuals, based on His eternal plan. It is the divine purpose that brings salvation for sinners to fulfillment.... Foreknowledge, then, involves God predetermining to know someone by having an intimate, saving relationship, so choosing them from eternity past to receive His redeeming love.” That is to say, God set His affections upon His chosen ones in a love relationship before the foundation of the world. Lawson, Foundations of Grace p 294

Over the thirty-plus years that followed Peter’s bold preaching in Acts 2, the Apostle never wavered from the doctrines of grace. Three decades later, when he wrote his two epistles—1 Peter in AD 63/64 and 2 Peter in AD 67—his doctrinal standard remained unaltered. Despite the passing of time, Peter continued to expound God’s sovereign grace in the salvation of undeserving sinners. In teaching these foundational truths, the Apostle addressed believers who were persecuted and scattered abroad in Asia Minor. Seeking to comfort and embolden them, he reminded them that God remained absolutely in control, even during this dark stage of opposition. Although they were being vehemently rejected by the world, the Apostle wanted them to know that they had been intentionally chosen by God. Could any truth be more precious to persecuted saints than the doctrine of God's eternal, immutable election? Could any truth be more fortifying to their faith? Not surprisingly, this strong teaching was the first doctrinal truth introduced in the first verse of both 1 and 2 Peter. Peter had to expound this truth of sovereign grace for believers who were in great need of encouragement. But he taught all of the doctrines of grace, beginning with radical depravity. Lawson, Foundations of Grace p 290

Peter understood that the heart of the unconverted man is so resistant to the preaching of the gospel that God Himself must intervene and sovereignly work if the elect are to have faith in Christ. God must graciously overpower the unregenerate heart, causing it to believe upon the Savior. Apart from this irresistible calling, no one would believe.

1. Spiritually Sanctified. Peter asserted that all whom the Father chose and foreknew in eternity past are set apart from sin to obey Christ. This effectual separation is accomplished by the irresistible work of the Spirit: To those who are elect exiles... according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, in the sanctification of the Spirit, for obedience to Jesus Christ.... (1 Peter 1:1b–2a) In the original language, the word translated as “sanctification” means “to separate” or “to consecrate.” It refers here to all the Spirit does in the salvation of the elect. This saving ministry includes the Spirit's work of convicting of sin, drawing to Christ, producing regeneration, granting repentance, and bestowing saving faith. Calvin writes, “Our salvation flows from the gratuitous election of God... because He sanctifies us by His Spirit.... We hence conclude, that election is not to be separated from calling.”²⁶ The Spirit releases the elect from their otherwise inescapable bondage to sin and brings them to faith in Christ. He consecrates them and transfers them from a state of unbelief to one of faith.

2. Sovereignly Reborn. Peter exulted that all who are chosen and foreknown by the Father are regenerated by the Spirit. The truth of the sinner being “caused” to be born again is reason for great praise in the heart of every believer:

Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ! According to his great mercy, he has caused us to be born again to a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead... You have been born again, not of perishable seed but of imperishable, through the living and abiding word of God. (1 Peter 1:3, 23)

The new birth is a work of sovereign grace within the human soul. No one can cause himself to be born physically. Neither can anyone cause himself to be born again spiritually. God, who alone is active in regeneration, must cause the unbelieving sinner to be born again. Boice comments, “No one is responsible for his or her physical birth. It is only as a human egg and sperm join, grow, and finally enter this world that birth occurs. The process is initiated and nurtured by the parents. Likewise spiritual rebirth is initiated and nurtured by our heavenly Father and is not our own doing.” Regeneration is entirely a divine work of sovereign grace that occurs at the deepest level of one’s being. Leighton writes, “Natural birth has always been acknowledged as belonging to God’s prerogative: ‘Sons are a heritage from the Lord, children a reward from Him’ (Psalm 127:3). How much more is the new birth completely dependent on God’s hand!” MacArthur adds, “The new birth is monergistic; it is a work solely of the Holy Spirit. Sinners do not cooperate in their spiritual births (cf. Eph. 2:1–10) any more than infants cooperate in their natural births. Jesus told Nicodemus, ‘The wind blows where it wishes and you hear the sound of it, but do not know where it comes from and where it is going; so is everyone who is born of the Spirit’ (John 3:8).”

5. Purposefully Drawn. Peter further taught his readers that God has graciously called His chosen ones to model Christ-likeness. This divine summons includes suffering unjustly as Christ suffered in the days of His humiliation:

For to this you have been called, because Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example, so that you might follow in His steps. (1 Peter 2:21)

This emulation of Christ in His suffering is non-negotiable. All believers have been called to believe in Christ. Included in this is the call to suffer unjustly for the sake of righteousness. Suffering was an integral part of the Father’s will for Christ, who was chosen and called by the Father to be the Savior of His people. It is the same for all who are chosen and called by Christ to believe upon Him. In fact, suffering for Christ and the gospel is a confirming mark of God's election. MacArthur states, "Have been called refers to the efficacious salvation call. As soon as the Holy Spirit calls people from darkness to light, they become an enemy of the world and a target of unjust and unfair attack as they seek to obey Christ."

IRRESISTIBLE CALL

Peter affirmed that it is God's irresistible call that draws those who are chosen to trust in Jesus Christ for salvation. This irresistible power triumphs in the hearts of the elect. Sovereign grace is always worked into the hearts of those chosen in effectual fashion.

1. Obtained Faith. Saving faith is graciously conveyed as a gift from God to all His elect. All to whom this gift of faith is given, in turn, use it to trust in Christ:

Simeon Peter, a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ, to those who have obtained a faith of equal standing with ours by the righteousness of our God and Savior Jesus Christ. (2 Peter 1:1)

Peter stated that all believers "have obtained a faith." The word translated "obtained" means "to gain by divine will" or "to be chosen to receive something." In this case, Peter was teaching that all believers are chosen by God to receive saving faith. He was saying that the faith necessary for salvation is given by divine allotment to the elect. Kistemaker writes, "First, let us consider the meaning of the Greek verb to receive. It suggests that someone obtains something by casting lots (refer to Luke 1:9; John 19:24) or by the will of God (consult the Greek text of Acts 1:17). Peter uses this verb to indicate that man receives his faith from God in accordance with God's will. He reminds his readers that faith does not originate in themselves but is a gift from God." All who believe do so because they have been chosen by God to receive the gift of faith from Him.

2. Overruling Summons. Peter taught that the divine power of God gives His elect all things necessary for salvation. "All things" must include new life and saving faith. Believers trust in Christ because they have been sovereignly enabled to do so:

His divine power has granted to us all things that pertain to life and godliness, through the knowledge of him who called us to his own glory and excellence. (2 Peter 1:3)

The call Peter mentioned here refers to the irresistible summons of God to the elect unto salvation. MacArthur comments, "As in all appearances of this call in the epistles, Peter's use of called here clearly refers to the effectual and irresistible call to salvation." Murray adds, "It is very striking that in the New Testament the terms for calling, when used specifically with reference to salvation, are almost uniformly applied, not to the universal call of the gospel, but to the call that ushers men into a state of salvation and is therefore effectual." All the elect receive this sovereign call of God to His own glory.

3. Chosen Calling. Peter insisted that all whom the Father has chosen will be called by the Spirit to salvation. Divine election and irresistible calling are inseparably bound together:

Therefore, brothers, be all the more diligent to make your calling and election sure, for if you practice these qualities you will never fall. (2 Peter 1:10)

This verse shows that Peter firmly believed that all whom God chooses He also calls. The Holy Spirit calls no more, no less, than the precise number of God's elect. Kistemaker writes, "Election and calling are and remain God's redemptive acts. God elects man in eternity (Eph. 1:4) but calls him in time (Rom. 8:30). Man does not elect or call himself, for Paul writes, 'God's gifts and His call are irrevocable' (Rom. 11:29). Hence, God alone decrees man's election and calling. The task for man is to appropriate his salvation, so that he is absolutely certain of the calling with which God has called him and can live in the knowledge that he is God's child (II Tim. 1:9). Calling is not merely an invitation; it is a royal command which man must obey. And election is evidence of God's grace and love toward man."

Supernaturally Illuminated

God commands divine light to shine into the darkened souls of unconverted sinners. Only through this divine initiative can the unconverted see and rightly respond to the truth of the gospel:

For God, who said, "Let light shine out of darkness," has shone in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. (2 Cor. 4:6)

Paul succinctly summarizes the irresistible call of God here. When a person is saved, it is because God decrees that His light should shine within. The basis for this teaching is the first act of Creation, in which God created everything out of nothing. So it is in the second act of creation, in which He creates repentance and saving faith out of nothing. Just as God said “Let there be light” (Gen. 1:3) on the first day of Creation, so He does again, spiritually speaking, in the salvation of His elect. Hodge writes, “This knowledge of God in Christ is not a mere matter of intellectual apprehension that one person may communicate to another. It is a spiritual discernment, to be derived only from the Spirit of God. God must shine into our hearts to give us this knowledge (Matt. 16:17; Gal. 1:16; 1 Cor. 2:10, 14).” p 369

Exclusive Riches

Through His self-humbling death, Jesus took on a sacrificial poverty. In so doing, He made spiritually bankrupt sinners rich in grace: For you know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sake he became poor, so that you by his poverty might become rich. (2 Cor. 8:9)

Paul writes that Jesus Christ, who was infinitely rich throughout all eternity past—“rich in the possession of the glory that He had with the Father before the world was,” and “rich in the fullness of all divine attributes and prerogatives”—became temporarily poor. That is, Christ voluntarily relinquished the use of His divine prerogatives in order to die upon the cross for sinners. Through His sin-bearing death, spiritually bankrupt sinners have become spiritually rich—rich in grace, in forgiveness, and in all things pertaining to salvation. All this self-divesting of His eternal glory in His incarnation was “for your sake”—a clear reference to believers, as opposed to the world in general. Kistemaker writes, “Through His suffering, death, and resurrection, we are heirs and co-heirs with Him (Rom. 8:17). We are children of the light, filled with joy and happiness, and partakers of His glory. Through Christ’s death on the cross, we have ‘become the righteousness of God’ (5:21). We already are spiritually rich in this life and rich beyond comparison in the world to come.” 368

Exclusive Death

The self-giving, sacrificial love of Christ was supremely shown at the cross in His death for undeserving sinners. Those for whom Christ died all die in Him, which is to say, all for whom Christ died—exclusively believers—die to their old way of life:

For the love of Christ controls us, because we have concluded this: that one has died for all, therefore all have died; and he died for all, that those who live might no longer live for themselves but for him who for their sake died and was raised. (2 Cor. 5:14–15)

The phrase all have died defines the extent of the atonement. Christ died for all who died and no longer live for themselves. In other words, Christ died for all who died in Him. In this case, all can refer only to all believers, or the elect. Unbelievers never die to themselves, but live for this world. By contrast, all believers have come to the end of themselves and have died to themselves. They no longer live for their own selfish pursuits, but for the Lord. MacArthur writes, “It is crucial to understand the identity of the all for whom Christ died. The phrase one died for all, if it stood alone, could imply that Christ died for every person who ever lived. But Paul clarified his meaning by adding the phrase therefore all died.... Together, the two phrases define the all for whom Christ died as the all who died in Him through faith in Him.” Because only the elect die to themselves, they are the ones for whom Christ died. The love of Christ at the cross was for us, that is, for all believers, the elect.

Clarifying this critical text, Hodge adds, “He did not die for all creatures; nor for all rational creatures; nor for all apostate rational creatures. The all is of necessity limited by what the Scriptures teach of the design of His death.... It is so obvious that the death of Christ was designed to save those for whom it was offered.... His death involved, or secured their death. This was its design and effect, and, therefore, this clause limits the extent of the word all in the preceding clause.” 366

Paul was well-acquainted with the repulsive depravity of the human heart. First, he could look back upon his own pre-conversion days and remember the corruption of his own unregenerate heart. As the self-proclaimed chief of sinners, his heart had been hardened by much sin. Further, Paul had witnessed the depravity of the human heart firsthand as he ministered on his missionary journeys. As he preached the truth in Jewish synagogues, as well as before kings and to Gentiles, the light of the truth he brought exposed the darkness within human hearts, sparking hostile reactions. These responses revealed the worst within man—the depravity of the human heart.

1. Hardened Mind. The minds of unconverted people are hardened to the gospel. The message of salvation does not penetrate to their understanding:

But their minds were hardened. For to this day, when they read the old covenant, that same veil remains unlifted, because only through Christ is it taken away. (2 Cor. 3:14)

In this verse, Paul described the state of the unconverted Jews. Their minds were hardened toward the gospel, so that they could not grasp its truth. Hodge explains that when Paul used the word mind here, “it means the whole inner man.... The word is used both of the understanding and of the feelings. It expresses an inaptitude both of seeing and feeling. They neither understood nor felt the power of the truth.” Such hardness of mind is characteristic of all those in unbelief.

2. Blinded Mind. The gospel is veiled to the unconverted. Further, Satan has blinded the minds of the unbelieving so they might not see the glory of the gospel: And even if our gospel is veiled, it is veiled only to those who are perishing. In their case the god of this world has blinded the minds of the unbelievers, to keep them from seeing the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God. (2 Cor. 4:3–4)

The true meaning of the cross is veiled to all unbelievers. It is a cloaked truth, shrouded with ambiguity and vagueness. Paul Barnett writes, “Such blindness is not merely the historic incapacity of the people of Israel under the old covenant (3:13–15). The darkness is universal, demonic and cosmic.” Under these conditions, the truth cannot be seen for what it is—the divine message that alone saves. The sinner’s mind is in total darkness regarding spiritual things. Furthermore, the devil exerts such an influence over unbelievers that he keeps them from apprehending the truth of the gospel. Satan’s purpose in spreading darkness over people’s minds is to prevent them from seeing the glory of Christ. Here is a double blindness. Not only is the gospel veiled (v. 3), but the sinner is blinded toward what is veiled (v. 4), the gospel truth. pg 364

Supernaturally Recreated

2. Supernaturally Re-created. In regeneration, the unconverted sinner, who is spiritually dead in sin, is supernaturally re-created. In His sovereignty, God makes the sinner a new creation:

Therefore, if anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation. The old has passed away; behold, the new has come. All this is from God. (2 Cor. 5:17–18a)

Paul teaches that God’s work in applying salvation is a sovereign act of creation. Far greater than the Creation of the universe is the re-creation of a lost soul. In this creative miracle, the sinner becomes a brand-new being. Hodge explains, “Old opinions, views, plans, desires, principles, and affections have gone; new views of truth, new principles, new apprehensions of human destiny, and new feelings and purposes fill and govern the soul.”²⁸ All this is from God, a sovereign work of grace that He initiates and performs. Charles Spurgeon writes, “Nothing will be effected, unless Jesus, who is the resurrection and the life, shall speak the quickening word. In His omnipotent voice lies the power, but only there.... We believe that in every case salvation is of the Lord alone and altogether. Regeneration is a supernatural work. Man must be born again from above—any power short of that from heaven will be ineffectual. The new creation is as much and entirely the work of God as the old creation.” Let us always remember, the greatest work God ever performs is re-creating lost sinners. p369

The doctrine of radical depravity holds that unregenerate people are corrupted by sin in the entirety of their inner persons. All that they are—mind, emotion, and will—is depraved. As it relates to spiritual things, their minds are darkened, their hearts are defiled, and their wills are dead. The prison epistles, especially Ephesians, provide much teaching on this pivotal doctrine, but the blackness of this truth only causes God’s grace to shine even brighter.

1. Spiritually Dead. The unconverted are spiritually dead in their sins, unable to do anything to commend themselves to God. They are devoid of all spiritual life, having a mere empty, meaningless existence:

You were dead in... trespasses and sins. (Eph. 2:1)

What is the spiritual condition of unregenerate people? It is not that they are merely sick. Rather, they are dead—devoid of all spiritual life. As a result, they are completely incapable of any right response to the gospel. After all, what can a dead man do? Nothing. Sinful man is unable to come to Christ, just as a corpse is unable to climb out of its coffin. John MacArthur writes, “Man does not become spiritually dead because he sins; he is spiritually dead because by nature he is sinful.... That is the condition of every human being since the Fall, including every believer before he is saved. It is the past condition of believers and the present condition of everyone else.” J. C. Ryle notes, “I admit fully that man has many grand and noble faculties left about him, and that in arts and sciences and literature he shows immense capacity. But the fact still remains that in spiritual things he is utterly ‘dead,’ and has no natural knowledge, or love, or fear of God. His best things are so interwoven and intermingled with corruption that the contrast only brings out into sharper relief the truth and extent of the Fall.” James Montgomery Boice adds, “Like a spiritual corpse, he is unable to make a single move toward God, think a right thought about God, or even respond to God—unless God first brings this spiritually dead corpse to life.” Dead means dead.

2. Spiritually Devilish. The unconverted live according to the dictates of the godless world system, over which Satan presides as the prince of this world. The devil holds all unbelievers captive, and they are unable to escape his tyranny by their own efforts:

You were dead in the trespasses and sins in which you once walked, following the course of this world, following the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that is now at work in the sons of disobedience. (Eph. 2:1–2)

Paul taught that unregenerate sinners live according to the values and standards of the world order, which is contrary to God. As such, they are held captive by Satan, who is “the ruler of this world” (John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11). Under his evil rule, they habitually live as “sons of disobedience” in active rebellion against God. John Calvin notes, “Until God has worked in us by His grace, then, whose are we? The devil’s! He is our prince. To be brief, he has all authority over us, and rules us with a tyranny that is nothing else but a being carried off to him by force. St. Paul uses this word ‘spirit’ purposely, to show that the devil rules all our thoughts, all our affections, and all our desires, that he possesses us, and that we are all wholly his bond slaves. In a word, we cannot stir one finger, we cannot once move, we cannot think one thought, but the devil is at our elbow and draws us in such a way that we utterly become deadly enemies to God.” Because the devil holds them captive, all unbelievers live in disobedience to God.

Eternally Loved

God chose His elect for salvation. By this sovereign decision, He set them apart to Himself and chose to love them with a distinguishing love: Put on then, as God’s chosen ones, holy and beloved, compassion, kindness, humility, meekness, and patience. (Col.

3:12) God made His elect the chosen objects of His special, redemptive love. He does not love them because they first loved Him.¹ Neither does He love them because they have met some special condition. Rather, God loves His elect simply because He chose to love them. The reason originated within God Himself, not within the sinner.

MacArthur writes, "That believers are beloved of God means they are objects of His special love. Election is not a cold, fatalistic doctrine. On the contrary, it is based in God's incomprehensible love for His elect: 'In love He predestined us to adoption as sons through Jesus Christ to Himself, according to the kind intention of His will' (Eph. 1:4–5)." ¹¹ p386

¹ Edward Leigh, A Treatise of Divinity Consisting of Three Books, God's love to Christ is the foundation of his love to us, Matt. 3:17; Eph. 1:6. God loves all creatures with a general love, Matt. 5:44, 45, as they are the work of his hands; but he doth delight in some especially, whom he hath chosen in his Son, John 3:16; Eph. 1:6." Otherwise, the personal and pastoral implications would be devastating. If 1 John 4:10 were to be inverted, "In this is love, not that God loved us, but that we loved him," God would be passible indeed, and all men would be without hope. – Confessing the Impassible God p313 [my insert]

Definite Atonement

The Father's electing choice before the foundation of the world is inseparably connected with the death of Christ. God's chosen ones were elected in Christ, meaning within the sphere of His future atoning work. It was for these chosen ones (Eph. 1:4) that the Lord Jesus came into this world to die upon the cross. Christ was predestined to die for all who were predestined for eternal life, in order to secure their adoption (1:5, 10–11; 3:12).

1. Definite Redemption. Paul specified that Christ died in order to redeem those whom the Father had chosen. Through His death, He secured forgiveness of sins for all the elect:

He chose us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and blameless before him.... In him we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses, according to the riches of his grace, which he lavished upon us, in all wisdom and insight making known to us the mystery of his will, according to his purpose, which he set forth in Christ as a plan for the fullness of time, to unite all things in him, things in heaven and things on earth. In him we have obtained an inheritance, having been predestined according to the purpose of him who works all things according to the counsel of his will, so that we who were the first to hope in Christ might be to the praise of his glory. (Eph. 1:4, 7–12)

By using pronouns such as we, our, and us in this text, Paul showed that the saving work of Christ upon the cross was very specific in its intent. It was designed by God to save His elect. In other words, Christ purposefully died in order to redeem those chosen by the Father, to secure forgiveness for all who would believe. Hendriksen explains, “From before the foundation of the world Christ was the Representative and Surety of all those who in time would be gathered into the fold. This was necessary, for election is not an abrogation of divine attributes. It has already been established that in the background of God’s decree is the dismal fact that those chosen are viewed as being, at the very outset, totally unworthy, having involved themselves in ruin and perdition. Now sin must be punished. The demands of God’s holy law must be satisfied.... ‘In Christ,’ then, saints and believers, though initially and by nature thoroughly unworthy, are righteous in the very sight of God, for Christ had promised that in their stead He would satisfy all the requirements of the law, a promise which was also completely fulfilled (Gal. 3:13).” p386

Sovereignly Graced

In the act of regeneration, God bestows the gift of saving faith to spiritually dead sinners. By this divine work, God enables them to believe upon Christ:

For by grace you have been saved through faith. And this is not your own doing; it is the gift of God, not a result of works, so that no one may boast. (Eph. 2:8–9)

Saving faith is a gift that God must give. Until He bestows this gift, no one can believe. But when He does, the sinner inevitably uses the gift of faith and is converted. MacArthur explains, “Our response in salvation is faith, but even that is not of ourselves [but is] the gift of God. Faith is nothing that we do in our own power or by our own resources. In the first place we do not have adequate power or resources.... When we accept the finished work of Christ on our behalf, we act by the faith supplied by God’s grace. That is the supreme act of human faith, the act which, though it is ours, is primarily God’s—His gift to us out of His grace.”

However, some people fail to acknowledge that faith is God’s gift. Of these, Calvin says, “He that attributes to himself any freedom of will, and takes upon himself to have any means or ability to do good of himself, certainly denotes his intention to step into God’s place and to show himself to be a creator.... And you, hypocrite, confess the same with your mouth, and yet you only lie, since you think that you have some freewill to advance yourself to good and to salvation. And so you deny the first article of your faith, for you make God only half a Creator.”

Sovereignly Called

God must call spiritually dead sinners to Christ if they are to believe upon Him. This irresistible call is extended to all God's elect:

I therefore, a prisoner for the Lord, urge you to walk in a manner worthy of the calling to which you have been called. (Eph. 4:1)

God's call to belief is an irresistible summons that is extended to all of His elect. The external call of the preacher takes God's Word to the sinner's ear. Only the internal call—the sovereign call of God's Spirit—can take the Word from the ear to the heart, leading to salvation. When this call is issued by God, it always draws the sinner to faith in Christ. Murray writes, "We often fail to grasp the rich meaning of biblical terms because in common usage the same words have suffered a great deal of attrition. This is true in respect of the word 'call.' If we are to understand the strength of this word, as used in this connection, we must use the word 'summons.' The action by which God makes His people the partakers of redemption is that of summons. And since it is God's summons it is an efficacious summons.... The summons is invested with the efficacy by which we are delivered to the destination intended—we are effectively ushered into the fellowship of Christ. There is something determinate about God's call; by His sovereign power and grace it cannot fail of accomplishment."

Sovereignly Granted

Paul affirmed that God grants saving faith to the sinner, which enables him to believe in Christ. Saving faith is a sovereign gift of God: For it has been granted to you that for the sake of Christ you should not only believe in him but also suffer for his sake. (Phil. 1:29) Being dead in sin, an unregenerate sinner has no capacity to believe upon Christ. God must grant faith. According to this verse, just as God gives times of suffering to believers, He gives saving faith to elect sinners. This gift is the supernatural ability to believe in Christ. Hendriksen writes, "Whether or not one regards Eph. 2:8 as proof for the proposition that such faith is God's gift, the conclusion is at any rate inescapable that here in Phil. 1:29 faith—not only its inception but also its continued activity—is so regarded."

Sovereign Election

Radical depravity makes the truth of sovereign election an absolute necessity. Fallen man loves sin and hates the gospel. Left to himself, no lost sinner seeks God or chooses to believe upon Christ. Therefore, God must initiate all that is necessary for any sinner to be saved. The doctrine of election teaches that God has chosen some individuals out of the fallen human race for salvation. Divine election is based exclusively on the mercy of God, not upon human merit, good works, or foreseen faith. Paul taught this truth with theological precision as he wrote to the Thessalonians. 1. Divine Choice. Paul emphatically taught the Thessalonians that God chose His elect for Himself. Out of the fallen human race, He made a distinguishing choice:

For we know, brothers loved by God, that he has chosen you. (1 Thess. 1:4)

Paul affirmed that the believers in Thessalonica had been chosen by God. The original saving choice in salvation was made by God, not man. Morris writes, "Election protects us from thinking of salvation as dependent on man's whims, and roots it squarely in the will of God.... Election, as Paul's words imply, proceeds from the fact of God's great love (notice the connection between love and election also in 2 Thess. 2:13). It is not a device for sentencing people to eternal torment, but for rescuing them from it."³⁴ MacArthur adds, "In salvation, the initiating will is God's not man's (cf. John 1:13; Acts 13:46–48; Rom. 9:15, 16; 1 Cor. 1:30; Col. 1:13; 2 Thess. 2:13; 1 Pet. 1:1). Man's will participates in response to God's prompting."³⁵ Elect sinners become believers because God chose them to be so. P397

Irresistible Call

In the perfect unity of God's saving purpose, there is a singular focus within the Godhead. And yet, the persons of the Trinity play unique roles in the fulfillment of this purpose. As sovereign election is the work of God the Father and definite atonement the work of God the Son, irresistible call is the work of God the Holy Spirit. Those whom the Father chose are the very ones whom the Son redeemed and the same ones whom the Spirit calls. In perfect cooperation with the Father and the Son, the Spirit works in the salvation of the elect. According to His sovereign power, He regenerates, convicts, and calls within time those who were chosen before time began. It is the Spirit's effectual ministry to bring all the elect to saving faith in Christ.

1. Supernatural Power. Paul taught that the Holy Spirit works with supernatural power in the elect. He causes them to believe the gospel as the Word is preached by God's messengers:

For we know, brothers loved by God, that he has chosen you, because our gospel came to you not only in word, but also in power and in the Holy Spirit and with full conviction. You know what kind of men we proved to be among you for your sake. (1 Thess. 1:4–5)

When the gospel is preached, the Holy Spirit works “in power.” Divine might is unleashed in the preacher to proclaim the truth and in the elect to receive it. As Paul preached in Thessalonica, the power of God was evident, and many were converted as a result. Hiebert explains, “[Paul and his companions] well knew that only a power beyond themselves could accomplish the task of transforming spiritually benighted souls, and they knew that the Spirit was working through them to that end.” But not only did the preachers know this power, so did elect sinners when they heard the truth. The power of the Spirit “delivered them from spiritual bondage.”⁴¹ John Stott underscores the necessity for this sovereign power as he writes, “Blind eyes and hard hearts do not appreciate the gospel.... [There must be]the internal operation of the Holy Spirit. It is only by His power that the Word can penetrate people’s mind, heart, conscience and will.”⁴² This is the irresistible call to salvation. Pg400

Imparted Repentance

God must grant the repentance that leads to salvation if any unconverted sinner is to escape the captivity of Satan. A turning of the heart from sin to Christ can come only from God:

And the Lord’s servant must not be quarrelsome but kind to everyone, able to teach, patiently enduring evil, correcting his opponents with gentleness. God may perhaps grant them repentance leading to a knowledge of the truth, and they may escape from the snare of the devil, after being captured by him to do his will. (2 Tim. 2:24–26)

Satan holds unconverted man captive to do his evil bidding. Thus, lost mankind’s will is doubly bound, once by his own sin nature and again by Satan. When the gospel is preached, the unregenerate person is completely unable to believe upon Christ. It is only by the powerful working of the Holy Spirit in the heart that the elect one comes to repentance. Only God can liberate the will, enabling the sinner to come to faith in Christ. Recognizing this bondage to sin, MacArthur writes, “All genuine repentance must be the product of God’s sovereign grace, just as is every aspect of salvation.... No person, no matter how sincere and determined, can truly repent and change his own sinful thoughts and ideas and correct his own sinful life. Only God can work that miracle in the heart.” In other words, God in His sovereignty must give repentance to the captive sinner before he can believe in Christ. This is a necessary component of man’s supernatural conversion by grace. P423

Irresistible Power

Paul stated the necessity for the Holy Spirit to regenerate elect sinners. In this supernatural work, God raises spiritually dead sinners to new life so that they might exercise His gift of saving faith in Christ:

But when the goodness and loving kindness of God our Savior appeared, he saved us, not because of works done by us in righteousness, but according to his own mercy, by the washing of regeneration and renewal of the Holy Spirit, whom he poured out on us richly through Jesus Christ our Savior. (Titus 3:4–6)

No living person was able to cause himself to be born physically. That matter is completely out of human hands, resting squarely with God’s sovereign will. So it is with the new birth—no unconverted sinner can cause himself to be born again. The radical corruption of the human heart—it is foolish, disobedient, deceived, enslaved to lusts and pleasures, full of malice and envy, and hateful (v. 3)—means that man is spiritually dead, so God must act in sovereign power if salvation is to come. The Holy Spirit must produce what Paul calls “regeneration,” which is, Louis Berkhof writes, “that act of God by which the principle of new life is implanted in man, the governing disposition of the soul is made holy, and the first holy exercise of this new disposition is secured.” Regeneration is entirely a supernatural work of God, “never directly perceived by man, and becomes known to him only because of its effects.” This miracle of regeneration is mysterious indeed. pg 424

Predetermined Appointment.

God appointed His elect unto eternal life before the foundation of the world. Every one of His chosen ones will surely believe and be saved:

And when the Gentiles heard this, they began rejoicing and glorifying the word of the Lord, and as many as were appointed to eternal life believed. (Acts 13:48)

When Paul preached the gospel, he knew the truth of divine election was no hindrance to his outreach. Instead, he saw sovereign grace as a guarantee of its success. As the Word of God was sounded by Paul, “as many as were appointed to eternal life believed.” Bruce writes, “Appointed is used in some ancient documents in the sense of ‘to inscribe’ or ‘to enroll.’” In other words, those who believe have been enrolled by God among His elect. Appointed is in the passive voice, indicating that the elect are passive in this act, God alone being the active agent. In addition, appointed is in the perfect tense, which specifies action in the past with continuing relevance in the future. These who believe do so because they were sovereignly appointed by God to eternal life in eternity past. A. W. Pink writes, “Here we learn four things: First, that believing is the consequence and not the cause of God’s decree. Second, that a limited number only are ‘ordained to eternal life,’ for if all men without exception were thus ordained by God, then the words ‘as many as’ are a meaningless qualification. Third, that this ‘ordination’ of God is not to mere external privileges but to ‘eternal life,’ not to service but to salvation itself. Fourth, that all—‘as many as,’ not one less—who are thus ordained by God to eternal life will most certainly believe.”

Adding profound insight, John Calvin writes, “This verse teaches that faith depends on God’s choice. Since the whole human race is blind and stubborn, those faults remain fixed in our nature until they are corrected by the grace of the Spirit, and that comes only from election. Two people may hear the same teaching together; yet one is willing to learn, and the other persists in his obstinacy. They do not differ in nature, but God illumines one and not the other... He does not begin to choose us after we believe, but by the gift of faith He seals the adoption that was hidden in our hearts and makes it manifest and sure.” p434

At the very heart of evangelism is the preaching of the cross of Jesus Christ. Luke recorded that Christ’s substitutionary death was for the sake of a very definite group of people. Working in perfect harmony with the Father’s eternal purpose and plan, Jesus died to save those whom God had chosen. He did not die for some different group, such as the entire world. Instead, Christ gave His life for all who had been given to Him by the Father—the elect. When Jesus died, He purchased the church with His blood. He laid down His life for all who would believe:

Pay careful attention to yourselves and to all the flock, in which the Holy Spirit has made you overseers, to care for the church of God, which he obtained with his own blood. (Acts 20:28)

This verse is remarkable in that it teaches that Jesus Christ purchased “the church” with His blood—the very blood of God. MacArthur notes, “Paul believed so strongly in the unity of God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ that he could speak of Christ’s death as shedding the blood of God—who has no body (John 4:24; cf. Luke 24:39) and hence no blood.” This close unity between the Father and the Son is displayed here in the fulfillment of their saving purpose. The Father chose His elect, and Christ then made a definite atonement for them. Christ’s work is portrayed here as perfectly consistent with the Father’s intent. Jesus died for the same group chosen by the Father—His elect bride, the church, which is composed of all believers. Paul did not say that Jesus made the church redeemable. Rather, Jesus redeemed the church. At the cross, a definite transaction occurred between the Father and the Son on behalf of the true church of God’s elect. 436

Irresistible Call

As the gospel is preached, God is pleased to irresistibly draw His elect to faith in Jesus Christ. Unquestionably, it is the Lord alone who adds to His church. If any sinner is to repent, the Lord must grant the gift of repentance. If any sinner is to believe, God must supply the faith. Before a sinner can turn away from sin to Him, God must convict and call. He must open the heart before it can believe the gospel. All who are appointed by God to eternal life inevitably respond to God’s irresistible call and believe upon Christ. Thus, all believing is the result of sovereign grace. That is, saving faith is a gift God grants to the elect, enabling them to believe. Luke taught all of this through his inspired record in the book of Acts.

Granted Repentance

If any sinner is to be saved, God must give him the repentance that leads to salvation. The granting of repentance to the elect is a crucial part of the irresistible call of God: “God exalted him at his right hand as Leader and Savior, to give repentance to Israel and forgiveness of sins.”... When they heard these things they fell silent. And they glorified

God, saying, “Then to the Gentiles also God has granted repentance that leads to life.” (Acts 5:31; 11:18) Repentance is a turning of the heart and sorrow over sin that is necessary for true salvation. All men are divinely commanded to repent (Acts 17:30), but no fallen sinner can do so of himself any more than he can forgive himself his own sins before God. The flesh cannot and will not repent, for “the flesh is of no avail” (John 6:63). This is why God must deposit repentance in the hearts of His chosen ones. By the repentance which God gives, the elect inevitably turn from sin to Christ. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones writes, “Here is the depth of human iniquity. Here is the measure of the problem. People cannot repent;... their whole nature is against it.... So what can be done? We are commanded to repent and yet we cannot. And the answer is in Peter’s words in Acts 5.... Our only hope lies in the grace and the kindness and the goodness of God. And that is why He sent His Son into this world: it was in order to give us repentance.” Barrett adds, “It is not enough that God should grant forgiveness to those who repent; he first makes repentance possible.”

It is important to note that when God grants repentance, it inevitably leads to eternal life. Calvin comments, “The phrase ‘to grant repentance’ may be understood... [that] He circumcised their hearts by His Spirit (Deuteronomy 30:6) and gave them hearts of flesh in place of hearts of stone (Ezekiel 11:19). It is God alone who remakes people and gives them new birth.” Kistemaker clarifies, “Repentance is not something that originates in man’s heart on his own initiative. Repentance, as the believers in Jerusalem confess, is a gift of God: ‘God has granted repentance that leads to life’. That is, God grants his people the gifts of repentance, forgiveness of sin, and eternal life.” Again, every grace in salvation flows from God. p 437

Predetermined People

God chose a people for Himself long before the Creation of the world. That divine choice marked these individuals as God’s people before they actually believe within time:

And the Lord said to Paul one night in a vision, “Do not be afraid, but go on speaking and do not be silent, for I am with you, and no one will attack you to harm you, for I have many in this city who are my people. (Acts 18:9–10)

Soon after Paul began ministering in Corinth, he became discouraged by the great opposition and many obstacles he faced. Filled with despair, the Apostle was ready to move to another city that might be more receptive to the gospel. But God appeared to

Paul in a vision and told him that He had many people in Corinth—a reference to His chosen ones, those who would believe once the truth was preached to them. This truth of divine election gave the Apostle great courage to hold fast. The salvation of these chosen individuals was so certain, God regarded them as His people before they were even saved. Leon Morris writes, “They had not yet done anything about being saved; many of them had not even heard the gospel. But they were God’s. Clearly it is he who would bring them to salvation in due course.” Speaking to the certainty of God’s previous choice, James Montgomery Boice writes, “If God said, I have many people in this city, it must have been because God, who alone is able to see the future and determine it, was looking ahead, saying that by the preaching of the Word through Paul’s ministry He would bring many people to faith in Jesus Christ. They were His people and they would stand together as a church and bear witness in this most corrupt city.” The truth of divine election guarantees the success of the outreach of the church.

Opened Door

The saving faith necessary for salvation comes from God as a divine gift exclusively bestowed upon His elect. Faith does not arise from within man, but must come down from God above:

And when they arrived and gathered the church together, they declared all that God had done with them, and how he had opened a door of faith to the Gentiles. (Acts 14:27)

Only God can open the door of faith for lost sinners to enter His kingdom. That is, only God can enable the unconverted to believe upon Christ. No man can open this door of faith by himself, for it is locked by sin, and only God has the key. This is another way of saying that God must bring sinners to faith in Himself. God graciously does this for His chosen ones. Calvin states, “Not only was the gospel preached with the external voice, but people were illuminated by the Spirit of God and so were called effectually to faith. The kingdom of heaven is indeed opened to us by the external preaching of the gospel. But no one enters without God reaching out his hand to him; no one draws near unless he is drawn inwardly by the Spirit.” God opens the door of faith in every conversion.

Unlocked Hearts. 440

God also must open the human heart before it can receive the saving message and believe. Left to itself, the fallen soul is closed to the gospel:

One who heard us was a woman named Lydia, from the city of Thyatira, a seller of purple goods, who was a worshiper of God. The Lord opened her heart to pay attention to what was said by Paul. (Acts 16:14)

Because of the radical depravity of man's fallen nature, the human heart is bolted shut by the twin locks of sin and Satan. In its natural state, no heart is open to God. When God saves His elect, He must open that heart so it can receive the message of salvation. The same word for "opened" is used later in Acts to describe the earthquake that struck Philippi, with the result that "immediately all the doors were opened" (16:26). Those closed and locked prison doors were instantly overpowered by the earthquake and made to open. This is precisely what God did to Lydia's heart—He instantly threw it open by a spiritual earthquake within her soul. Calvin writes, "Indeed, [believing] does not so stand in man's own impulse, and consequently even the pious and those who fear God still have need of the especial prompting of the Spirit. Lydia, the seller of purple, feared God, yet her heart had to be opened to receive Paul's teaching [Acts 16:14] and to profit by it."

Enabling Grace

It is only by the grace of God that any sinner is enabled to believe upon Christ. Human faith is exercised by divine grace alone:

And when he wished to cross to Achaia, the brothers encouraged him and wrote to the disciples to welcome him. When he arrived, he greatly helped those who through grace had believed. (Acts 18:27)

Saving faith should never be considered to be man's contribution to his salvation. If such were the case, man would be his own co-savior. Instead, man believes exclusively through divine grace. That is, faith is exercised in Christ through the God-given ability to believe. Thus, saving faith is the sovereign gift of God freely given to the elect. To this point, Barrett writes, "That they became and continued to be believers was due only to the grace of God. Luke does not develop the theme of grace as Paul does, but makes it quite clear that faith comes through divine not human initiative." Faith is one of the essential elements God supplies for man's salvation. pg 441

Authored Faith.

Saving faith has its origin in Christ, the Author and Originator of it. Saving faith in Christ comes from Christ:

Let us run with endurance the race that is set before us, looking to Jesus, the founder and perfecter of our faith, who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross. (Heb. 12:1b–2a)

No lost sinner can have faith in Christ until Christ creates it in him. Only then can an unregenerate person believe. Christ authors such saving faith for all the elect. Owen succinctly states, “Our faith from first to last is from Jesus Christ.” Morris agrees: “The ‘author and perfecter of faith’ (there is no ‘our’ in the Gr.) may mean that Jesus trod the way of faith first and brought it to completion. Or it may mean that He originated His people’s faith and will bring it to its perfection. Since it is not easy to think that the author sees the faith by which Jesus lived as essentially the same as our own, perhaps it is better to see the emphasis on what He does in His followers.” Hughes notes, “He alone evokes and stimulates faith; and it is because he is the pioneer of our salvation (Heb. 2:10) that he is the author of our faith. Our faith, moreover, is initiated and sustained by him because he has prayed the Father that we may come to faith (Jn. 17:20f.) and that our faith may not fail (Lk. 22:31f.)” 452

Sovereign Regeneration

A good summary

There may be no truth in the Bible more deeply loved and greatly cherished than the subject of the new birth. Here is the grace-centered message of a new beginning for those whose lives have been ruined by sin. Here is the life-changing truth that sinful men can be made new. When the new birth is caused by God, old things pass away – old practices, old cravings, old habits, old addictions, and old associations. Behold, new things come – new desires, new pursuits, and new passions. And entirely new life begins. Nothing could be more positive than this. It is no wonder that the truth of the new birth is so beloved.

Yet despite its great appeal, the new birth may be the most misunderstood doctrine in Scripture. Most people naively imagine that there is something they can do or cause themselves to be born again. They hear a well-meaning person say, “Believe and be born again,” and suppose that they can. So they try to effect their own regeneration. But this they cannot do. In attempting it, they are like someone who imagines he caused himself to be born physically. Did he meet with his parents and ask to be born? Did he initiate his own birth? Of course not. The truth is, the initiative in birth lies outside of the one being born. He is merely part of a process that started long before he came into being. His parents acted, then God acted. And as a result, that individual was brought into the world. He did not cause his own birth to happen. The same is true in regard to spiritual birth. If you have experienced the new birth, it is not because you initiated it. Rather, it was an event that God brought about in you. More specifically, you were not born again because you exercised faith. In truth, the new birth preceded your faith and produced it. Saving faith is the fruit of regeneration, not the root of it. The biblically correct order of salvation – known in theological language as the ordo salutis – is not “Believe and be born again,” but the very opposite: “Be born again and believe.” The living God must act upon the spiritually dead soul and cause it to be born again. The new birth is by divine choice and sovereign initiative. God’s will affects the human will, not vice versa. Scripture intentionally uses the imagery of birth to underscore this essential truth of the sovereignty of God in regeneration.

John Murray, one of the foremost theologians of the twentieth century, affirmed the divine initiative in the new birth when he wrote, “For entrance into the kingdom of God we are wholly dependent upon the action of the Holy Spirit, and action...which is compared to that on the part of our parents by which we were born into the world. We are as dependent upon the Holy Spirit as we are upon the action of our parents in connection with our natural birth. We were not begotten by our father because we decided to be. And we were not born of our mother because we decided to be. We were simply begotten and we were born. We did not decide to be born... If this privilege is ours it is because the Holy Spirit willed it and here all rests upon the Holy Spirit’s decision and action. He begets or bears when and where He pleases.”

Murray goes on to write, “Regeneration is the act of God and of God alone.” In other words, regeneration is monergistic, meaning that “the grace of God is the only efficient cause in beginning and effecting conversion.” The key word here is only. God is the only cause behind the new birth. The opposite of monergism is synergism. This latter word is derived from the Greek word synergos, meaning “working together.” According to the theory of synergistic regeneration, both the divine and human wills are active, and each must cooperate with the other. But what does the Scripture teach? According to James 1:18, “Of his own will he brought us forth” – an unmistakably monergistic statement. John 1:12-13 reads, “All who did receive him, who believed in his name...where born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh nor of the will of man, but of God.”

This view of the new birth could not be more monergistic. John 3:8 says, “The wind blows where it wishes, and you hear its sound, but you do not know where it comes from or where it goes. So it is with everyone who is born of the Spirit.” Man does not effect the movement of the Spirit – God does. First Peter 1:3 says, “Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ! According to his great mercy, he has caused us to be born again to a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.” Clearly, regeneration is monergistic, the activity of only one will, namely, the divine will.

In the latter epistles of the New Testament, this truth of regeneration appears with intentional regularity (James 1:18; 1John 2:29; 3:9; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18). This is a fundamental teaching within the doctrines of grace. It reveals that God must implant new life within your soul. God must effect a spiritual conception within you. God must impregnate your heart. In short, God must cause you to be born again. We will see this truth clearly taught as we consider three of the last authors of the New Testament – James, John, and Jude – and the contribution they made to the biblical truth of sovereign regeneration and the doctrines of grace as a whole. pg 458

Inseparably connected with the doctrine of election is the truth of monergistic regeneration. James teaches that the new birth is a sovereign act of God. The Holy Spirit produces new life in the Father’s elect when they are dead in trespasses and sins. The instrument the Spirit always uses in the new birth is “the word of truth.” The Spirit accompanies the proclamation of the Word with an irresistible inward call that causes the elect to believe the message of the gospel. [\[Flavel describes this irresistibility as a secret efficacious power that sweetly moves the will. “Conversion denotes the great change itself, which the Spirit causes upon the soul, turning it by a sweet irresistible efficacy from the power of sin and Satan, to God in Christ.” “He rules not by compulsion but most sweetly.” “These are Christ’s regal acts. And he puts them forth upon the souls of his people, powerfully, sweetly, suitably.” “For he delights in free, not in forced obedience.” See also, Ps 110:3. My inserts\]](#) God does this in all of those who are His, even in those unnoticed or unwanted by this world:

Of his own will he brought us forth by the word of truth, that we should be a kind of firstfruits of his creatures. (James 1:18)

When James wrote that God “brought us forth,” he was referring to sinners being born again. The Greek word translated as “brought us forth” is apokueo, which means “to be birthed, to be bred or begotten.” James’ choice of this word makes a strong statement that regeneration is effected by the sovereign will of God (John 1:13, 1Peter 1:3). It is by His will – not the will of man – that the new birth is initiated and brought to pass. God’s will is the sole cause of man’s regeneration. Manton explains, “This word means natural birth, and sometimes it is used for creation. So we are said to be ‘His offspring’ (Acts 17:28). Some people apply these words to God’s creation of us, making people His firstfruits, or the most special part of the whole creation. But this is beside the point, for James speaks of this as birth that is through the word of truth. In the next verse he uses this to argue that we should be more aware of the duty of listening; therefore this birth implies the work of grace on our souls.” James referred to these first believers as “firstfruits of his creatures.” This initial ingathering was a guarantee of a fuller harvest of believers to come. The truth of sovereign regeneration stood behind this confidence of James, for he knew that God would overcome all resistance in the hearts of all the elect.

Calvin saw this very clearly. The Genevan Reformer explains, “When he says that God of His own will, or spontaneously, hath begotten us, he intimates that He was induced by no other reason, as the will and counsel of God are often set in opposition to the merits of men... As our election before the foundation of the world was gratuitous, so we are illuminated by the grace of God alone as to the knowledge of the truth, so that our calling corresponds with our election. The Scripture shows that we have been gratuitously adopted by God before we were born. Such a view of regeneration gives all glory to God. pg 468

Spiritual Devilry

The unconverted practice sin and, in so doing, reveal that they are of the devil, who sinned from the beginning. All unbelievers live under the dominion of the devil and follow his influence into sin:

Whoever makes a practice of sinning is of the devil, for the devil has been sinning from the beginning... By this it is evident who are the children of God, and who are the children of the devil: whoever does not practice righteousness is not of God, nor is the one who does not love his brother... The whole world lies in the power of the evil one. (1John3:8a-10; 5:19b)

The one who practices sin gives evidence that he is unregenerate. The present tense of the verb translated as “practice” (poieo) indicates an ongoing, habitual lifestyle. Despite professing faith in Christ, some exhibit a habitual pattern of sin in their lives. They do so because they are “of the devil.” This means that all unsaved people live under the sinister influence of Satan. Their sinful practices reveal the satanic tyranny in their lives. Newton writes, “The goals and aims of the devil are sinister, driving a person to live for self, not God. Whatever is contrary to God’s glory, this is what they fallen flesh pursues under the control of Satan. Herein, indeed, they are [Satan’s] agents and willing servants; and because the blessed God is Himself out of their reach, they labor to show their despite to Him in the person of His people.” Unbelievers are of their father the devil (John 8:44 and, as Satan’s children, practice in – a family resemblance. pg 475

And exposing Gnosticism

As stated earlier, John wrote his three letters to warn the church about the false teaching of Gnosticism, which, among other errors, denied that Jesus had come in the flesh (1 John 2:22; 4:3). Affirming the full humanity of Christ was necessary if one was to rightly and savingly believe that He had died upon the cross for sinners. The Gnostics also denied the full deity of Christ, which had to be affirmed if one was to believe in the infinite merit of His death. Because of these heresies, the doctrine of the atonement was under a brutal attack in the church and needed to be defended. John affirmed that Christ – fully God and fully man, the God-man – made the perfect atonement for undeserving sinners. He died for the elect of God throughout the world.

1. Propitiating Death. In His death, Jesus satisfied the righteous wrath of God, appeasing the Father’s just anger toward elect sinners who would believe upon Him. It was for His chosen people throughout the world that Christ died:

My little children, I am writing these things to you so that you may not sin. But if anyone does sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous. ²He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only but also for the sins of the whole world. ...In this is love, not that we have loved God but that he loved us and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins. (1 John 2:1-2; 4:10)

John wrote that the death of Christ achieved an actual satisfaction of God’s holy wrath toward elect sinners. If Jesus had died for every individual in “the whole world,” God’s wrath toward everyone’s sin would have been appeased. As a result, there now would be no condemnation for anyone. But this is not the case. Only believers escape God’s wrath. Thus, it was for believers only – identified as “my little children,” “you,” and “we” – that Christ died. The substitutionary death of Christ was the actual propitiation for “our sins” – the sins of the elect around “the whole world,” among both Jews and Gentiles. Since Jesus died for those sins, God is eternally appeased toward the elect. Murray writes, “What does propitiation mean? In the Hebrew of the Old Testament it is expressed by a word which means to 'cover.' In connection with this covering there are, in particular, three things to be noted; (1) it is in reference to sin that the covering takes place; (2) the effect of this covering is cleansing and forgiveness; (3) it is before the Lord that both the covering and its effect take place... To propitiate means to 'placate,' 'pacify,' 'appease,' 'conciliate.' And it is this idea that is applied to the atonement accomplished by Christ. Propitiation presupposes the wrath and displeasure of God, and the purpose of propitiation is the removal of this displeasure. Very simply stated the doctrine of propitiation means that Christ propitiated the wrath of God and rendered God propitious to His people." pg 477

Supernatural Life

God begets new life in a spiritually dead sinner through His supernatural work of regeneration. The new birth, in turn, produces a new way of life:

If you know that he is righteous, you may be sure that everyone who practices righteousness has been born of him. (1 John 2:29)

The word translated "born of him" (gennao) is the same one Jesus used when He told Nicodemus, "You must be born again" (John 3:7). The verb points to God as the sole Procreator in the new birth. He initiates this creative act by sovereign choice, and He alone is active at the moment of the new birth, while man is passive. R.K. McGregor Wright notes, "Regeneration of the soul is a supernatural act of God whereby He gives life to whomever He will. When the gospel is heard by one of the elect, the Holy Spirit takes that word and applies it savingly to the heart, ensuring the begetting of eternal life within the soul... So regeneration is an act of God and is instantaneous, taking place deep in the innermost subconscious reaches of the heart, and is therefore nonexperiential. It is accurately compared in the Bible with natural birth. A woman does not 'experience' fertilization until the developing egg begins to have biological effects that are unmistakable. What she is 'experiencing' is the development of a new life within – the process of pregnancy. Accordingly, conversion is our human response to the movements of the new life within."

The one who is "born of him" inevitably begins to practice righteousness as an ongoing lifestyle. MacArthur explains, "Those truly born again as God's children partake of their heavenly Father's righteous nature (1 Pet. 1:3, 13-16). As a result, they will display characteristics of God's righteousness. John looks from effect (righteous behavior) to cause (being truly born again) to affirm that righteous living is the proof of being born again." In other words, regeneration produces righteous living. pg 480

Sanctified Life

Those who are regenerated experience the life-changing power of God. The habitual practice of sin ceases and a new practice of righteousness commences:

No one born of God makes a practice of sinning, for God's^[a] seed abides in him; and he cannot keep on sinning, because he has been born of God. ¹⁰ By this it is evident who are the children of God, and who are the children of the devil: whoever does not practice righteousness is not of God, nor is the one who does not love his brother. (1 John 3:9-10)

John noted that when one is “born of God,” a radical change takes place. Old practices of sin stop. New practices of righteousness begin. This change occurs because God plants the divine “seed” within him in the new birth. This “seed” is the divine nature that God gives to the one who is “born of God.” This implantation is a new heart, a new mind, and a new disposition (Ezek. 36:25-27; 2 Peter 1:4). MacArthur writes, “This new nature exhibits the habitual character of righteousness produced by the Holy Spirit (Gal.5:22-24)... The New Birth involves the acquisition of a seed, which refers to the principle of God’s life imparted to the believer at salvation’s New Birth. John uses this image of a planted seed to picture the divine element involved in being born again.” Regeneration dethrones old practices of sin. pg 481

Selfless Love

The divine nature that a person receives when he is born of God includes the divine attribute of love. Because God is love, all who are born of Him exhibit love:

Beloved, let us love one another, for love is from God, and whoever loves has been born of God and knows God. ⁸ Anyone who does not love does not know God, because God is love. (1 John 4:7-8)

John stated that the one who is “born of God” demonstrates genuine love for others, especially for other believers. This divine quality of love – which is initiating, sacrificial, long suffering, and forgiving – is evidenced in the believer because, in regeneration, the sinner receives the divine nature. God is love, and the one who is born of Him reflects His love for others. Calvin notes, “God is love – that is, it is His nature to love us... God is the fountain of love, this effect flows from Him and is diffused wherever the knowledge of Him comes... When anyone separates faith from love, it is as if he attempted to take away heat from the sun.” Those who truly are born again inevitably are marked by God-given love for others. pg 481

Saving Faith

The one who believes in Christ does so because he has been born of God. The act of regeneration causes saving faith to be exercised, not for a moment but throughout one's life.

Everyone who believes that Jesus is the Christ has been born of God, and everyone who loves the Father loves whoever has been born of him. (1 John 5:1)

In this important verse, John taught that being “born of God” produces saving faith. The verb tenses indicate that the one who “believes” (present tense) has already been “born” (perfect tense) of God. That is, regeneration precedes and produces faith. The proper biblical order is regeneration and then faith – not faith and then regeneration. The exercising of saving faith is the first act of the newly regenerated heart. MacArthur writes, “The tense of the Greek verb indicates that ongoing faith is the result of the New Birth and, therefore, the evidence of the New Birth. The sons of God will manifest the reality that they have been born again by continuing to believe in God's Son, the Savior. The New Birth brings us into a permanent faith relationship with God and Christ.” The one who believes in Christ does so because he has been born of God by divine initiative. This faith in the Lord is ongoing through one's life, for just as it is produced by God, it is supernaturally sustained by God. pg 482

Subduing Faith

The saving faith that God creates in His elect is a victorious faith. It overcomes the evil world system:

For everyone who has been born of God overcomes the world. And this is the victory that has overcome the world—our faith. ⁵ Who is it that overcomes the world except the one who believes that Jesus is the Son of God? (1Jn5:4-5)

When a person is regenerated, he is given saving faith. This faith is a dynamic, triumphant force that causes him to live victoriously over the world system. It should be noted that this text three times mentions that the believer “overcomes the world.” He does so because of his God-bestowed saving faith. Stressing this point, Hiebert writes, “The use of the neuter, ‘for whatsoever is born of God’ stresses not ‘the victorious person,’ and the perfect-passive participle presents this power as the abiding result of the new birth. The passive terms the attention from the believer himself to the God who wrought the new birth in him. This God-implanted new life is the true dynamic that ‘overcomes the world.’” pg 482

Sovereign Birth

Jesus Christ causes sinners to be born again just as He was born of a virgin. Both births are sovereign, supernatural, and monergistic.

We know that everyone who has been born of God does not keep on sinning, but he who was born of God protects him, and the evil one does not touch him.
(1John 5:18)

In this verse, the first “born of God” refers to sinners who are born again. The second “born of God” refers to Christ and His virgin birth. The supernatural birth of Christ made possible the supernatural birth of sinners. MacArthur notes that “he who was born of God” actually “refers to Christ as the only begotten of the Father (cf. Jn. 1:14-18).” Thus, the virgin birth of Christ is a perfect picture of what it is to be born again. The virgin birth was monergistic. Mary was passive. Joseph was passive. But the Holy Spirit was active. That which was conceived in her was by the Holy Spirit (Matt. 1:20). So it is in the new birth. The sinner is passive and the Holy Spirit is active, creating new life within a spiritually dead heart. Pg 483

Sovereign Regeneration

In light of the teaching of the doctrines of grace in these latter books of the New Testament, the truth of regeneration should be valued all the more highly by every believer. In the new birth, God imparts new life to spiritually dead souls. God resurrects sinners to newness of life. God re-creates sinners, giving them new life in Himself. Simply put, regeneration is a work of God on behalf of helpless sinners.

The new birth is, first, instantaneous. When He does a work of regeneration, God instantly imparts new life to a spiritually dead soul. This powerful working is never to be considered a process, but a divine work that occurs at a point in time. Second, it is independent. In the new birth, God’s will works independently of man’s will. The grace of God is the sole efficient cause in effecting conversion. He does not cooperate with man in the new birth; instead, He is the exclusive agent of regeneration. Third, the new birth is irresistible. As the wind cannot be stopped by man when it blows, neither can the movement of the Holy Spirit. Regeneration is a sovereign work of God in the heart of man. It cannot be hindered or thwarted. Fourth, it is individual. The new birth occurs one at a time. It is personal. Jesus calls His sheep by name. Fifth, it is inscrutable. There is a mystery to the new birth. No one can anticipate where the invisible hand of God will move next. God often regenerates the least likely candidates, those whom we would think would never be saved. Sixth, the new birth is irreversible. The one who is born again can never be unborn. The new life that is imparted to the sinner is eternal life, never to end. p 488

Spiritual Deception

Unconverted men, who re instinctively religious, often exercise a shallow, superficial faith in Christ that does not save. It is a spurious faith that arises from the flesh, the result of which is a counterfeit conversion:

Now when He was in Jerusalem at the Passover, during the feast, many believed in His name when they saw the signs which He did. ²⁴ But Jesus did not commit Himself to them, because He knew all men, ²⁵ and had no need that anyone should testify of man, for He knew what was in man. (John 2:23-25)

Although many supposedly “believed” in His name, Jesus did not “entrust” Himself to them. Both words – “believe” and “entrust” – are translations of the same Greek word (pisteuo). In other words, the people believed upon Christ, but He did not believe in them. In the superficiality of their faith, He recognized empty professions. Their faith was not true saving faith. John MacArthur writes that Christ “knows the true state of every heart... He saw in these people a superficial façade – a mere outward attraction to His spectacular signs (cf. 6:20). Genuine saving faith goes far beyond that. It demands wholehearted commitment to Jesus as the Lord of one’s life (Matt. 16:24-26); Romans 10:9.” Christ saw through the unbelief that was couched as saving faith. This “superficial façade” is a manifestation of the sinful corruption of the unconverted heart. pg492

In the face of such spiritual defiance, salvation cannot occur unless it is rooted and grounded in the sovereign will of God. Being dead in sin, unconverted man cannot exercise saving faith. A dead man can do nothing of any spiritual significance. So salvation must be trace back to the autonomous will of God, who freely chooses whom He will save. Free will in salvation belongs exclusively to God (although free will unto damnation belongs entirely to man). John was an able teacher and proponent of the doctrine of election, as we see in the Prologue to his gospel.

But as many as received Him, to them He gave the ^[a]right to become children of God, to those who believe in His name: ¹³ who were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. (John 1:12-13)

Here is the first mention of salvation in the gospel of John. It is an unmistakably strong statement in the gospel of John. It is an unmistakably strong statement of the sovereign election and monergistic regeneration of God. Those who receive Christ do not do so because of the inherent ability and initiative of their own wills, but because of the electing will of God. By the sovereign activity of the Father, lost sinners were selected out of the fallen human race in order to be brought to faith in Christ. Recognizing the divine initiative taught in this text, MacArthur explains, “The great truth of election and sovereign grace is here introduced appropriately at the very foundation of John’s mention of salvation.” MacArthur is right – divine sovereignty in salvation is unmistakable taught here at the very beginning of the fourth gospel. Standing behind the small phrase “of God” is the entirety of sovereign grace, beginning with His sovereign election of sinners. pg 494

In his gospel narrative, John chose to include the defiant statement of Caiaphas regarding the death of Christ. Without realizing the precision of his words, the high priest of Israel prophesied of a definite atonement for the elect of God. Caiaphas unknowingly defined the extent of the substitutionary atonement of Christ as being for the true children of God, whether they were of the remnant within the nation of Israel or elect Gentiles around the world. According to these worlds, Christ died for all those chosen by the Father for eternal life. By including these words, John reinforced his teaching of a definite atonement.

*⁴⁹And one of them, Caiaphas, being high priest that year, said to them, “You know nothing at all, ⁵⁰nor do you consider that it is expedient for ^[us]us that one man should die for the people, and not that the whole nation should perish.” ⁵¹Now this he did not say on his own authority; but being high priest that year he prophesied that Jesus would die for the nation, ⁵²and not for that nation only, but also that He would gather together in one the children of God who were scattered abroad.

In saying “one man should die for the people,” the high priest of Israel merely meant that it would be expedient for Jesus to be executed in order to spare the entire nation of Israel from Roman discipline. But as Caiaphas said this, unknown to him, he prophesied of the substitutionary death of Christ for sinners. Even more specifically, he foretold the definite atonement of Christ for “the people” among “the nation” – a reference to elect Jews. John then added that Jesus was to die also for “the children of God who are scattered abroad” – a reference to elect Gentiles. Through His particular death for all of those chosen by the Father, Jesus would gather them into one flock.

Regarding this definite atonement, A.W. Pink writes, “The great Sacrifice was not offered to God at random. The redemption-price which was paid at the Cross was not offered without definite design. Christ died not simply to make salvation possible, but to make it certain... The Atonement of Christ is sufficient because it is absolutely efficacious, and because it effects the salvation of all for whom it was made. Its sufficiency lies not in affording man a possibility of salvation, but in accomplishing their salvation with invincible power. Hence the Word of God never represents the sufficiency of the Atonement as wider than the design of the Atonement.” Likewise, Charles H. Spurgeon once proclaimed, “We are often told that we limit the atonement of Christ, because we say that Christ has not made a satisfaction for all men, or all men would be saved. Now, our reply to this is, that, on the other hand, our opponents limit it: we do not. The Arminians say, Christ died for all men. Ask them what they mean by it. Did Christ die so as to secure the salvation of all men? They say, ‘No, certainly not.’ We ask them the next question - Did Christ die so as to secure the salvation of any man in particular? They answer, ‘No.’ They are obliged to limit this, if they are consistent. They say, ‘No. Christ has died that any man may be saved if and then follow certain conditions of salvation. Now, who is it that limits the death of Christ? Why, you. You say that Christ did not die so as infallibly so secure the salvation of anybody. We beg your pardon, when you say we limit Christ’s death; we say, ‘No, my dear sir, it is you that do it.’ We say Christ so died that he infallibly secured the salvation of a multitude that no man can number, who through Christ’s death not only may be saved, but are saved, must be saved and cannot by any possibility run the hazard of being anything but saved. You are welcome to your atonement; you may keep it. We will never renounce ours for the sake of it.” Clearly, it is the Arminian view of the universal atonement that limits the work of Christ at the cross. The biblical view of the atonement is unlimited in the application of its particular work toward all for whom it was intended. Pg 495

Redeeming Death

Through His death, Jesus ransomed the elect of God out of every tribe, tongue, people, and nation. His triumphant death will be the focus of praise for all the elect forever.

“And they sang a new song, saying, “Worthy are you to take the scroll and to open its seals, for you were slain, and by your blood you ransomed people for God from every tribe and language and people and nation,” (Rev. 5:9)

According to this verse, Christ did not redeem all people. Rather, He ransomed many people out of (ek, “out of, from, separated from”) every tribe, language, people, and nation. That is, Christ’s death purchased a people for God from all people groups around the world. Hendriksen explains, “The Lamb did not purchase the salvation of every single individual. No, He paid the price for His elect, that is, for men out of every tribe and tongue, etc. Yet, on the other hand, there is nothing narrow or national about this redemption. It is world-wide in its scope and embraces every group; ethnic (tribe), linguistic (tongue), political (people), and social (nation).” Focusing on the actual redemption Christ accomplished, John Murray writes, “Christ redeemed us to God by His blood (Rev. 5:9)...Christ did not come to put men in a redeemable position but to redeem to Himself a people...Christ did not come to make sins expiable. He came to expiate sins... Christ did not come to make God reconcilable. He reconciled us to God by His own blood.” All for whom Christ died – the elect – will find themselves around the throne of God. pg 508

Studying the Church Fathers

On key doctrines of Grace

Excerpts from Steven J Lawson’s book, Pillars of Grace, describing some of the church fathers’ views on the irresistible call, God’s sovereignty in election, radical depravity of man, God’s sovereignty over the will of man in conversion, etc., and also on a good definition of sin.

p 265: Anselm of Canterbury (1033-1109)

[Very good explanation of the will of man in conversion]

Anselm clearly believed that God effectually calls all whom He elects to salvation. This summons causes them to believe on Christ. In commenting on John 6:44, Anselm declared that the Father irresistibly moves the sinner to come to faith in Christ. He writes: “As the Father is said to draw by imparting an inclination, so there is nothing improper in asserting that he moves man. For as the Son says of the Father: ‘No man cometh to Me except the Father draw him,’ he might as well have said, except he move him.” Anselm rightly understood that God initiates conversion. Unregenerate men cannot come to Christ until they are drawn by the Father.

In this divine initiative, God gives man a new will to believe. Anselm writes: “Since a man is drawn or moved, by his will, to that which he invariably chooses, it is not improper to say, that God draws or moves him, when he gives him this will. And in this drawing or impelling it is not to be understood that there is any constraint, but a free and grateful clinging to the holy will which has been given.” Here Anselm taught that when God calls a sinner to Himself, there is no constraint, meaning undue coercion; when the Holy Spirit works in the heart, the sinner then believes because he wants to do so. No one believes against his will. Rather, God changes the will so that the sinner freely believes.

Likewise, Anselm asserted that God graciously gives grace and faith to man in order to bring about salvation. Without grace, he argued, one can achieve nothing toward salvation. Anselm boldly asserts: “It must all be attributed to grace, because ‘it is not of the one who wills, nor of the one who runs, but of God who shows mercy’ (Rom. 9:16). For to all, except God alone, it is said: ‘What do you have that you have not received? And if you have received it all, why do you boast as though you had not received it?’ (1 Cor. 4:7).” Convinced by Scripture, Anselm was clear in his belief that man’s salvation is exclusively the result of God’s sovereign, saving grace.

Sinners, Anselm argued, have dishonored God and robbed Him of inherent glory, amassing an enormous debt that must be paid. He writes:

Sin is nothing else than not to render to God His due.... He who does not render to God this honor which is due to Him, robs God of what is His own, and dishonours God; and this is what it is to sin. ... Every one who sins [is] bound to pay back the honour of which he has robbed God; and this is the satisfaction which every sinner is bound to pay to God.... Nothing is less tolerable in the order of things than that a creature should rob his Creator of the honour due to Him and not repay Him that of which he robs Him.... This is the debt which men owe to God. – Anselm

Bernard of Clairvaux (1090-1153)

ON GRACE AND FREE CHOICE

On Grace and Free Choice (1128) proved to be the most profound and influential of Bernard's dogmatic works. This treatise has been called Bernard's commentary on Romans, as he addresses the essential problems of the relation of grace and freedom. Augustine's treatises against the Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians are similar to this work. In it, Bernard asserted that, left to themselves, fallen human beings will only sin. Man's power to do good, he claimed, was lost through sin. For this reason, Bernard saw grace as necessary to incline the will to God and holiness. "Grace," he says, "changes the will from evil to good—not by destroying its freedom but by transferring its allegiance." He adds: "What was begun by grace alone is completed by grace and free will together. This happens in such a way that they contribute to each achievement not singly but jointly, not in turns but simultaneously. It is not that grace does part of the work and free will the rest. But each does the whole work, according to its peculiar contribution. Grace does it all and so does free will—except that while all is done in free will, all is done out of [or "by"] grace." In other words, Bernard contended that God's grace transforms the nature of man's will to good. p 276 [very similar to Edwards' comments on page 123 & 1173]

DIVINE SOVEREIGNTY

Bernard held to the sovereignty of God over every realm, and he maintained that the distribution of saving grace is inextricably linked to God's supreme authority. He affirms that God, being under no obligation to create human beings, spoke them into being as an expression of His grace: "It was God's creative grace that out of nothingness raised us to the dignity of manhood; and from this appears our duty to love Him, and the justice of His claim to that love." Bernard recognized that mankind failed in that duty to love God, but he taught that God had sovereignly extended His saving love [see pg 2066] to His people. He writes: "O indulgent bounty of Divine love towards the sons of Adam, which does not cease to load us with benefits, not only where no merit was found, but often even where entire demerit was seen.” In other words, God sovereignly chose to bestow His grace and mercy where it was least deserved.

RADICAL DEPRAVITY

Bernard plainly affirmed that the Scriptures teach the depravity of human nature. He especially acknowledged the bondage of the human will. Summarizing Bernard’s teaching, Anthony Lane writes: “The human will is always free in the sense that we will voluntarily and spontaneously. But left to themselves, fallen human beings will only to sin.” In this vein, Bernard describes man’s will as being “deteriorated by sin” and “under a yoke.” Moreover, he writes that the will is “inexcusable, because the will, when it was free, made itself the slave of sin.... Thus the soul, in some strange and evil way, is held under this kind of voluntary, yet sadly free necessity, both bond and free; bond in respect of necessity, free in respect of will: and what is still more strange, and still more miserable, it is guilty because free, and enslaved because guilty, and therefore enslaved because free.” In other words, man’s will is in bondage because of his own sin. Bernard adds, “We are free in the sense that we sin willingly, without anyone forcing us to sin—but not in the sense that we can do otherwise.” In short, man’s will is free only to sin.

Bernard strongly rejected the heretical teaching of the fifth-century opponent of Augustine, Pelagius, who denied the doctrine of original sin. He writes: “We rest in the Christian faith, and not in the heresy of Pelagius, and confess that by generation and not by example was the sin of Adam imparted to us, and by sin death.” The problem, Bernard saw, is not that man merely imitates the bad example of Adam and others. Rather, it is that man is conceived with a sinful heart that is solely inclined to disobey God’s righteous commands. With this biblical understanding, Bernard “sought to answer those who desired to tone down or weaken the idea of man’s corruption in order to give more room to the freedom of man’s will.”

Looking at this subject from another perspective, Bernard maintained that regeneration is the sovereign working of God. A person is born again when God calls him or her, giving the gift of faith in Christ. He writes: “He [God] said ‘let there be light’ and there was light. He said ‘be converted’ and the children of men were converted. Clearly, then, the conversion of souls is the working of the divine, not the human, voice.”⁹⁸ The God who brought creation into existence with a word also causes salvation to happen by a mere command.

When God saves, He graciously changes the disposition of an individual to cause Him to want Christ. Bernard says, “It is grace which arouses our free choice, by sowing the seed of the good thought; it is grace which heals our free choice, by changing its disposition; it is grace which strengthens it so as to lead it to action; it is grace which saves it from experiencing a fall.”¹⁰¹ By grace, lost sinners are so changed as to want Christ for the first time.

Following Augustine, Isidore, and Gottschalk, Bernard held to the doctrine of divine reprobation. He affirmed that just as God elects some to salvation, He passes over others and leaves them in their sin. While the elect receive what they do not deserve, mercy, the reprobate suffer what they justly deserve, divine judgment. He notes, “Indeed, to saints and the elect tribulation worketh patience, patience experience, experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed; to the condemnable and reprobate, on the contrary, tribulation causes discouragement, and discouragement confusion, and confusion despair, which destroys them.” Bernard clearly recognized that there are two categories of people in God’s sight—those He intends to save (the elect) and those He intends to abandon to His judgment (the reprobate). Tribulation, he wrote, reveals the elect from the reprobate in that it works for the good of the first group but not of the second. Reaffirming this teaching in Romans 1, Bernard taught that the reprobate will inevitably fall into vanity: “The love of vanity is the contempt of truth, and the contempt of truth the cause of our blindness. And because they did not like, he says, to retain God in their knowledge, He gave them over unto a reprobate mind” (Rom. 1:28). Though salvation is freely offered to the reprobate, they remain lost and entangled in their sins. As a result, God gives their minds over to think increasingly evil thoughts. They will discover their wretched state when life ends.

INFLAMED BY SOVEREIGN GRACE pg 284

[an important purpose of the knowledge of divine things!]

The truths of sovereign grace generate awe toward God in the hearts of those who accept them. This wonder over God’s electing love and redeeming grace, in turn, fires these saints with passionate zeal for Him. Far from merely instructing minds, these doctrines inflame souls and activate wills. We see this dynamic at work in the long line of godly men who have upheld the sovereignty of God in salvation, for this grand theology fueled a spiritual fire in these men, igniting their spirits with affection for the glory of God and causing them to live for Him with intensity. Perhaps no one exhibited more passion for Christ and zeal for the glory of God than Bernard of Clairvaux.

In this way, Bernard represents the powerful effect that the doctrines of grace should have on every believer. These teachings are not given merely as fodder for theological arguments. These doctrines should never produce dogmatism without devotion, convictions without compassion, allegiance without affections, or fanaticism without fervor. A cold, clinical Calvinism should be an oxymoron, a contradiction in terms.

Instead, this high theology should ignite a blazing doxology. In other words, an exalted view of God and His sovereign grace should lead inevitably to heartfelt worship. J. Ligon Duncan describes the doctrines of grace as “joy-giving, life-changing, Christ-exalting, [and] God-glorifying... truths.” When genuinely understood and embraced, he says, the truth of God’s sovereignty in the salvation of sinners is “soul-transforming, heart-animating, and life-altering,” bringing joy to sinners who have been found by the amazing grace of God. It was true of Bernard, and it should be true of us. The doctrines of grace should produce hearts bursting with love and devotion for the triune God who alone saves. – Steven J Lawson

Thomas Bradwardine (1300-1349), God, the determining factor in salvation

Armed with this new, biblical understanding, Bradwardine was quick to oppose the Pelagians. He says, “[It is the] damnable error of the Pelagians to apportion faith or grace, with a reference to its beginning in growth, namely by assigning the former to God, and a latter to us, when in fact the totality of faith and grace is to be wholly assigning to God.” Bradwardine clearly understood the biblical teaching on man’s ability and the cause of salvation.

No one, Bradwardine said, can make himself a son of God by his own efforts. Only the elect will be adopted. He says: “Now when they bring forward the quotation from the Gospel of John, ‘He gave them power to become sons of God,’ they seemed to wish to conclude from this that some became, or can become the elect sons of God in the course of their life.... He did not say, ‘He gave them power to make themselves sons of God,’ but ‘to be made sons of God.’ But by whom? Not by themselves. Not out of their own will.... Therefore they do not make themselves sons of God. God does this.” God’s election is the determining factor in salvation.

Bradwardine asserted that God must act in grace on man before any individual can act in faith toward Him. He writes, "When we act we are the ones who act, but He acts so that we may act." [similar to Edwards' comments, pg 123 & 1173, and Bernard's] God must work on the mind and heart before anyone who is spiritually dead can believe in Christ. Thus, the will of God is the determining cause in regeneration. Bradwardine adds, "The will of God is the efficient cause of anything whatever that is done." Elsewhere he writes, "In every action of the created will God's will is the necessary co-effector." In sum, God's will determines what man's will chooses.

PRESERVING GRACE

Bradwardine was fully convinced that those who enter into salvation by faith will never fall from grace. He affirms, "No one can lose his salvation because it is not based on the unchanging winds of human decision but founded upon the bedrock of the eternal will of God." The believer's eternal security, he held, rests on the eternal will of God in salvation. Man cannot negate what God chose to bring about in eternity past.

Moreover, Bradwardine recognized sovereign grace as the undivided effort by God to save His elect. Pelikan writes, "Bradwardine... identified the divine assistance of grace, together with justification, merit, perseverance to the end, and eternal blessedness, all as effects of predestination; and he took all of these to be implied in Augustine's definition of predestination as 'the preparation of grace.'" The God who elects and justifies is the One who grants perseverance to the end. Because this is so, sovereign grace irrevocably leads to eternal blessedness. From everlasting to everlasting, salvation is all of grace. – Steven J Lawson

Gregory of Rimini (1300-1358), a Parisian philosopher-theologian of the Middle Ages, recounts the man-centered teaching that flowed from the churches during this time: "It is the opinion of many moderns that man, by his natural powers alone, with the general concurrence of God, can perform a morally good act in the present state of fallen nature, as for example to love God above all things, to be sorry for and to detest one's sins.... They depart from the definitions of the church and favor the condemned error of Pelagius." In short, many in the medieval church held that salvation was a cooperative effort, a combination of God's grace and human free will. Michael Horton comments, "The popular medieval phrase was, 'God will not deny His grace to those who do what they can.” The modern idea that “God helps those who help themselves” was already in vogue.

John Wycliffe (1330-1384) pg 312
The Morning Star of the Reformation
One of the Pre-reformers

Wycliffe believed that election is unconditional. H. B. Workman, a Wycliffe biographer, explains the Oxford professor’s position: “The Church, as the mystical body of the predestinated, is a unity that knows nothing of papal primacies and hierarchies, and of the ‘sects’ of monks, friars, and priests; nor can the salvation of the elect be conditioned by masses, indulgences, penance, or other devices of sacerdotalism.” e.g., [the sinner’s prayer] There are no conditions that the elect must meet in order to be chosen by God; indeed, they are incapable of meeting any conditions.

IRRESISTIBLE CALL

Wycliffe made known the sovereign regeneration of God, which gives life to the elect, causing them to believe in Jesus Christ [see Deut. 30:6, Ez36:26]. Regarding the new birth, he states: “God Himself is certainly the first cause and the only cause of predestination.” He asserted that God must overcome man’s resistance in order for salvation to be received. Wycliffe writes: “Lord Jesus, turn us to You, and we shall be turned! [clearly, a reference to Lam. 5:21 or Jer. 31:18] Heal us and then we shall be verily holy; for without grace and help from You, may no man be truly turned or healed.” No man can turn to Christ until he is turned by Him. Wycliffe adds, “It is impossible for a creature to know anything unless it knows it through grounding from the authority of God teaching and moving to assent.” Wycliffe explains: “The prophet speaks ... of souls perfectly turning to God, saying... He shall draw my feet, that is my soul and my affections, out of the snare, and the net of the love of this world.” God’s work of regeneration is irresistible.

What is more, Wycliffe taught that regeneration is entirely of grace. He writes: “For all things are of grace... God’s goodness is the first cause which gives men these good things. And so it may not be that God does good, unless he does these good things freely by His grace.” He adds that even saving faith is the gift of God: “Faith is a gift of God; and so God gives it not to man, unless he gives it graciously. And thus all good things that men have are gifts of God. And thus, when God rewards a good work of man, He crowns His own gift. And this is of grace.” Wycliffe maintained that God gives saving faith through grace. He writes: “The ground of all goodness is steadfast faith, or belief.

This, through grace and mercy, is obtained of God.” Finally, he insisted that love for God comes from Him. He says, “No man can... love God, or be chaste, unless God give it to him.” All these comments clearly show that Wycliffe believed God is the sole Author of saving faith and the love for Him that accompanies it.

Martin Luther

On the will vs. free grace and the [free] will of God

SOVEREIGN ELECTION

Luther was also deeply convinced of the truth of the unconditional election of God. He believed that before time began, God chose out of fallen humanity those whom He would save. He affirms, “He ordains by His own counsel which and what sort of persons He wills to be recipients and partakers of His preached and offered mercy.” He adds:

All things take place according to God’s election. Jacob was loved by God because he had been elected, and he obtained mercy because it thus pleased God from eternity, just as also He said to Moses: “I will show mercy, etc.” (Ex. 33:19).... It is solely because of a merciful God that anyone is chosen or is righteous, inasmuch as all men are equally a part of the mass of perdition and no one is righteous before God unless he receives mercy... that everything depends on a merciful God and not on someone’s will is evident and proved by the fact that in order that God might show this to be the case and that man might know that it is not due to his own running but to the mercy of God, that he wills and runs.

Luther also addressed the doctrine of election in his introduction to his commentary on Romans, affirming that if not for God’s election of some to receive salvation, no one would be saved:

In chapters 9, 10, and 11 he teaches of God’s eternal predestination—out of which originally proceeds who shall believe or not, who can or cannot get rid of sin—in order that our salvation may be taken entirely out of our hands and put in the hand of God alone. And this too is utterly necessary. For we are so weak and uncertain that if it depended on us, not even a single person would be saved; the devil would surely overpower us all. But since God is dependable—His predestination cannot fail, and no one can withstand Him—we still have hope in the face of sin.

Luther made this same point when commenting specifically on Romans 9:16, saying: “Concerning the statement, ‘It depends not upon man’s will or exertion, but upon God’s mercy,’ I respond:... ‘You must despair, give God the glory, and confess that you did not start it.’ When I was a monk I depended on such willing and exertion, but the longer [I worked at it] the farther away I got. What I have now I have not from exertion but from God. So in this passage Paul was saying everything against presumption, so that we may say, ‘Lord, whatever [good] there is in us exists by Your grace.’” It is clear that Luther believed that salvation depends on the determinative will of God, not the will of man.

That thought prompted Luther to rejoice that God’s election puts the outcome of salvation entirely in His hands. Luther says, “God has taken my salvation out of my hands into His, making it depend on His choice and not mine, and has promised to save me, not by my own work or exertion but by His grace and mercy.” Fallen man can never choose to believe on Christ due to the deadening effects of original sin. But by His electing love, God makes salvation certain for His elect.

Luther insisted that the doctrine of election should be preached because it humbles man, thus preparing the unconverted soul for the gospel. He says: “It is thus for the sake of the elect that these things are published, in order that being humbled and brought back to nothingness by this means they may be saved. The rest resist this humiliation, indeed they condemn this teaching of self-despair, wishing for something, however little, to be left for them to do themselves; so they remain secretly proud and enemies of the grace of God. This, I say, is one reason, namely, that the godly, being humbled, may recognize, call upon, and receive the grace of God.” Commenting elsewhere on the humbling effect of this doctrine, he writes:

No man can be thoroughly humbled until he knows that his salvation is utterly beyond his own powers, devices, endeavors, will, and works, and depends entirely on the choice, will, and work of another, namely, of God alone. For as long as he is persuaded that he himself can do even the least thing toward his salvation, he retains some self-confidence and does not altogether despair of himself, and therefore he is not humbled before God, but presumes that there is—or at least hopes or desires that there may be—some place, time, and work for him, by which he may at length attain to salvation. But when a man has no doubt that everything depends on the will of God, then he completely despairs of himself and chooses nothing for himself, but waits for God to work; then he has come close to grace, and can be saved.

When a man is thus brought to the end of himself and receives God's salvation as a gift, Luther said, the doctrine of God's election becomes beautiful and sweet. He affirms, "The matter of predestination and election... is not as deep a subject as is commonly thought, but rather is a wonderfully sweet thing for those who have the Spirit." Elsewhere he adds, "This will is not to be inquired into, but reverently adored, as by far the most awe-inspiring secret of the Divine Majesty, reserved for Himself." The doctrine of sovereign election should instill awe and reverence in a believer's heart.

Luther concluded that the doctrine of election is "very strong wine and the most complete meal, solid food for those who are perfect, that is, the most excellent theology." However, "he who has not denied himself and learned to subject his questions to the will of God and hold them down will always keep asking why God wills this and does that, and he will never find the reason." The unconverted heart will always reject this teaching. One must be taught by God in order to receive it.

The will of the natural man, Luther insisted, cannot choose to come to God to accept the offer of salvation. He writes:

man does not seek God, is the same as saying: man cannot seek God, as you may hence gather: If there were potency or power in man to will good, the movement of Divine omnipotence would not suffer it to remain inactive or keep holiday.... Paul's whole aim is to make grace necessary to all men, and if they could initiate something by themselves, they would not need grace... "free-will" is utterly laid low, and nothing good or upright is left to man; for he is declared to be unrighteous, ignorant of God, a despiser of God, turned away from Him and unprofitable in His sight.... Here is unbelief, disobedience, sacrilege, blasphemy towards God, cruelty and mercilessness towards one's neighbor, and love of self in all the things of God and of man! Here you have the glory and potency of "free-will"!

Luther was adamant on this impotency of the will. In explaining John 6:44, he says: "When Christ says in John 6: 'No man can come to Me, except My Father which hath sent Me draw him' (v. 44), what does He leave to 'freewill'?... Here, indeed, He declares, not only that the works and efforts of 'free-will' are unavailing, but that even the very word of the gospel (of which He is here speaking) is heard in vain, unless the Father Himself speaks within, and teaches, and draws. 'No man, no man can come,' He says, and what He is talking about is your 'power whereby man can make some endeavour towards Christ.’ In things that pertain to salvation, He asserts that power to be null.” No man has the power to believe the gospel on his own.

With this thought in mind, Luther was quick to refute those who held that man contributes to his salvation. He says: “Granted that they attribute very little to ‘free will,’ yet they teach that we are able to obtain righteousness and grace by that ‘very little.’” Luther believed man contributes nothing to his salvation, not even “very little.”

Luther described the radical change that comes over the human will when God issues His saving call. He writes: “If God works in us, the will is changed, and being gently breathed upon by the Spirit of God, it again wills and acts from pure willingness and inclination and of its own accord, not from compulsion, so that it cannot be turned another way by any opposition, nor be overcome or compelled even by the gates of hell, but it goes on willing and delighting in and loving the good, just as before it willed and delighted in and loved evil.” Elsewhere he adds: “The will does nothing. It is rather the substance in which the Holy Spirit works also in those who resist, as in Paul. But working on the will of him who resists He moves the will to consent.” When God changes a sinner’s heart, that person no longer hates and resents God. He now wants God and joyfully accepts His offer of salvation.

In the end, Luther had no doubts that salvation is God’s work from beginning to end. He writes: “We are people who have been born, not fashioned by man, but ‘begotten.’ This is not our work. As little as a child contributes to its being born, so little do we contribute to our being spiritually born. God is the Father... the ‘Word of Truth’ is the mother.” No one contributes to his natural birth. Neither, Luther reasoned, does anyone contribute to his supernatural birth.

(4.) Christ teaches easily. Others teach with difficulty. They have difficulty in finding out a truth, and in inculcating it. ‘Precept must be upon precept, and line upon line.’ Isa 28:10. Some may teach all their lives, and the word take no impression. They complain, ‘I have spent my labour in vain;’ Isa 49:4, plowed on rocks; but Christ the great Prophet teaches with ease. He can with the least touch of his Spirit convert: he can say, ‘Let there be light;’ with a word he can convey grace.

(5.) When Christ teaches he makes men willing to learn. Men may teach others, but they have no mind to learn. ‘Fools despise instruction.’ Prov 1:7. They rage at the word, as if a patient should rage at the physician when he brings him a cordial; thus backward are men to their own salvation. But Christ makes his people a 'willing people.' Psa 110:3. They prize knowledge, and hang it as a jewel upon their ear. Those that Christ teaches say, as Isa 2:3, 'Come let us go up to the mountains of the Lord, and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in them;' and as Acts 10:33; 'We are all here present before God, to hear all things commanded.'

(6.) When Christ teaches, he not only illuminates but animates. He so teaches, that he quickens. 'I am the light of the world: he that follows me shall have lumen vitae, the light of life.' John 8:12. By nature we are dead, therefore unfit for teaching. Who will make an oration to the dead? But Christ teaches them that are dead! he gives the light of life. As when Lazarus was dead, Christ said, 'Come forth,' and he made the dead to hear, for Lazarus came forth: so when he says to the dead soul, Come forth of the grave of unbelief, he hears Christ's voice, and comes forth, it is the light of life. The philosophers say, calor et lux concrescunt, 'heat and light increase together.' Where Christ comes with his light, there is the heat of spiritual life going along with it.

William Tyndale (1494-1536)

Excerpt from Steven Lawson, Pillars of Grace p 404

THE IRRESISTIBLE CALL

Tyndale believed that divine election is inseparably linked to the irresistible call of the Spirit. All whom the Father has chosen, he maintained, are divinely brought to saving faith in Christ. This is a work God must do because man is dead in his sin and cannot choose to believe the gospel. Before anyone can believe, Tyndale writes, "the Spirit must first come, and wake him out of his sleep with the thunder of the law, and fear Him, and show him his miserable estate and wretchedness; and make him abhor and hate himself, and to desire help; and then comfort him again with the pleasant rain of the gospel.”⁷⁴ Elsewhere he restates this work of the Spirit in these terms: “Note now the order: first God gives me light to see the goodness and righteousness of the law, and my own sin and unrighteousness; out of which knowledge springs repentance.... Then the same Spirit works in my heart trust and confidence, to believe the mercy of God and His truth, that He will do as He has promised; which belief saves me.” The sovereign work of the Spirit brings the elect sinner to faith in Christ.

This spiritual awakening is known as regeneration or the new birth. It is, Tyndale said, a sovereign work of God in the spiritually dead soul of the lost sinner. He writes, “We are, in... our second birth, God’s workmanship and creation in Christ; so that, as he which is yet unmade has no life or power to work, no more had we, till we were made again in Christ.” Tyndale strongly denied that the sinner has anything to do with his regeneration, writing, “The will has no operation at all in the working of faith in my soul, no more than the child has in the begetting of his father: for Paul said, ‘It is the gift of God,’ and not of us.” Just as a child does not cause the conception of his father or even of himself, an unsaved person does not initiate his salvation. That work is done upon him by the Spirit of God.

When a sinner is regenerated by the Spirit, Tyndale taught, he then believes on Christ through faith. This faith does not arise from within the sinner. Rather, it is a gift of God. Tyndale says, “True faith is... the gift of God; and is given to sinners, after the law has passed upon them, and has brought their consciences unto the brim of desperation and sorrows of hell.” Elsewhere he writes, “Faith springs not of man’s fantasy, neither is it in any man’s power to obtain it; but it is altogether the pure gift of God poured into us freely, without all manner doing of us, without deserving and merits, yea, and without seeking for us; and is... God’s gift and grace, purchased through Christ.” He described saving faith as “mighty in operation, full of virtue, and ever working; which also renews a man, and begets him afresh, altering him, changing him, and turning him altogether into a new creature and conversation.” The gift of faith works a great change in those to whom it is given.

Tyndale maintained that God bestows the gift of saving faith on the elect. He writes, “Of the whole multitude of the nature of man, whom God has chosen, and to whom He has appointed mercy and grace in Christ, to them sends He His Spirit; which opens their eyes, shows them their misery, and brings them unto the knowledge of themselves; so that they hate and abhor themselves.” He adds, “When His word is preached, faith roots herself in the hearts of the elect; and as faith enters, and the word of God is believed, the power of God looses the heart from captivity and bondage under sin.” The Spirit regenerates God’s elect, enabling them to hear the Word and believe it. The result is that they are set free from captivity to sin.

Tyndale held that it is an evil thing to teach that man has free will to believe in Christ.

He states: “Is it not a froward and perverse blindness, to teach how a man can do nothing of his own self; and yet presumptuously take upon them the greatest and highest work of God, even to make faith in themselves of their own power, and of their own false imagination and thoughts.” To say that fallen man has the ability in himself to believe, Tyndale stated, is perverse and presumptuous. [a wicked presumption – Thomas Shepard, e.g., because the sinner’s prayer from a creature’s so called free will is not from a spiritual sight of Christ by an newly infused principle of spiritual life, i.e., faith, but from natural principles such as self-love or self preservation which, by the way, devil’s are capable of!] Such a doctrine denies the teaching of Scripture and robs God of His glory. He advises: “Beware of the leaven that says, we have power in our free-will, before the preaching of the gospel, to deserve grace, to keep the law of congruity, or God to be unrighteous.... And when they say our deeds with grace deserve heaven, say thou with Paul, (Romans 6) that ‘everlasting life is the gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord.’” For Tyndale, it was essential that believers keep this truth before their eyes—that salvation is the gift of God, not something they earn or deserve.

Theology of John Calvin

On Free Will and God’s Free Will

My comments in [\[blue\]](#)

Radical Depravity pg 444

Depravity is indeed “total,” Calvin taught—the mind, affections, and will are ruined by original sin. Calvin says, “Corruption does not dwell in one part only, but... no part is free from its deadly taint.” In Calvin’s thinking, “The whole man, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot, is so deluged, as it were, that no part remains exempt from sin, and, therefore, everything which proceeds from him is imputed as sin." Elsewhere he adds, "Sin has seized both on the mind and heart." No part of man's nature is free from the taint of sin.

The result of total depravity is moral inability e.g., see [Romans 8:7-8], Calvin said. Man can only sin; he cannot do any truly good works on his own. Calvin writes, "The Holy Spirit teaches us in Scripture, that our mind is smitten with so much blindness, that the affections of our heart are so depraved and perverted, that our whole nature is so vitiated, that we can do nothing but sin, until He forms a new will within us." Illustrating the change that must occur in man's soul, he adds, "[We] are born lions, tigers, wolves and bears, until the Spirit of Christ tames us, and from wild and savage beasts forms us to be mild sheep." Man is responsible for this inability, Calvin says: "Our inability to [resist sin] is our own fault. If lust, in which sin has its dominion, so enthralls us, that we are not free to obey our Father, there is no ground for pleading necessity as a defense, since this evil necessity is within, and must be imputed to ourselves." This moral inability amounts to slavery. Calvin writes:

Man is a slave of sin.... Man's spirit is so alienated from the justice of God that man conceives, covets, and undertakes nothing that is not evil, perverse, iniquitous, and soiled. Because the heart, totally imbued with the poison of sin, can emit nothing but the fruits of sin. Yet one must not infer there from that man sins as constrained by violent necessity. For, man sins with the consent of a very prompt and inclined will. But because man, by the corruption of his affections, very strongly keeps hating the whole righteousness of God and, on the other hand, is fervent in all kinds of evil, it is said that he has not the free power of choosing between good and evil—which is called free will.

The result of human depravity, Calvin maintained, is divine judgment and eternal punishment. He writes, "By Adam's sin we are not condemned through imputation alone, as though we were punished only for the sin of another; but we suffer his punishment, because we also ourselves are guilty; for as our nature is vitiated in him, it is regarded by God as having committed sin." The entire human race is condemned before God, helpless to save itself.

Irresistible Call pg 455

Moreover, Calvin understood that God must first call individual sinners before they will turn to Him in faith. He says: "No one will dedicate himself to God till he be drawn by His goodness, and embrace Him with all his heart. He must therefore call us to Him before we call upon Him.” God works in a special way in the elect, Calvin taught, so that they believe the gospel. He adds, “The effectual cause of faith is not the perspicacity [the quality of having a ready insight into things; shrewdness] of our mind, but the calling of God.” Thus, it is through God’s efficacious grace that His elect are granted faith by which to trust Him.

Calvin maintained that divine election leads to God’s irresistible call, resulting in faith. He says: “We are near [God], not as having anticipated His grace, and come to Him of ourselves, but because, in His condescension, He has stretched out His hand as far as hell itself, to reach us.... He first elects us, and then testifies His love by calling us.” Furthermore, Calvin affirmed that God brings all of those He has chosen to faith in Christ. He writes, “Christ brings none to the Father, but those given Him by the Father; and this donation, as we know, depends on eternal election.” The elect, he adds, are regenerated by the Spirit: “[God] declares His election when He regenerates His elect by His Holy Spirit and thus inscribes them with a certain mark, while they prove the reality of their sonship by the whole course of their lives, and confirm their own adoption.” In regeneration, Calvin writes, “The one thing which distinguishes His elect from the Reprobate is, that... He presents the former with new eyes... and inclines their hearts to obey His word.” Using a similar metaphor, Calvin says, “God prepares His elect for hearing, and gives them ears for that purpose.” Calvin thus affirmed that God grants the faith by which the elect see the truth, hear the gospel, and believe in Christ.

Calvin spoke clearly on this matter when commenting on John 6:44, which reads: “No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him. And I will raise him up on the last day.” He writes: “We ought not to wonder if many refuse to embrace the Gospel; because no man will ever of himself be able to come to Christ, but God must first approach him by His Spirit; and hence it follows that all are not drawn, but that God bestows this grace on those whom He has elected. True, indeed, as to the kind of drawing, it is not violent, so as to compel men by external force; but still it is a powerful impulse of the Holy Spirit, which makes men willing who formerly were unwilling and reluctant.” Here Calvin again emphasized that God initiates the sovereign work of regeneration and that not all people are drawn to Christ, only the elect. Not even one of the elect can come to Christ unless God acts first. This is because all men are dead in sin and can do nothing to move toward Christ. God must overcome man’s stubborn resistance.

Because of man's sinfulness, Calvin believed, no one will turn to God in his own power, but must be changed by God. Only then, he said, will a man trust in Christ. He writes: "It is entirely the work of grace and a benefit conferred by it that our heart is changed from a stony one to one of flesh, that our will is made new, and that we, created anew in heart and mind, at length will what we ought to will." The new birth, he said, is not a work that is part God and part man, but entirely a monergistic work of sovereign grace.

Calvin gave careful attention to the cause-and-effect relationship between God's grace and man's will. He writes: "The human will is of itself evil and therefore needs transformation and renewal so that it may begin to be good, but that grace itself is not merely a tool which can help someone if he is pleased to stretch out his hand to [take] it. That is, [God] does not merely offer it, leaving [to man] the choice between receiving it and rejecting it, but He steers the mind to choose what is right, He moves the will also effectively to obedience [see Phil. 2:13], He arouses and advances the endeavor until the actual completion of the work is attained." For Calvin, sovereign grace is the cause and saving faith is the result.

Thomas Watson is great. Here you'll see the power of Christ [Ps 110:3], of his Spirit, in the secret efficacy of his power over the soul of man, to sweetly change the will without doing any violence to it. In this way he saves all this chosen ones at his will, according to his eternal decree of election; for who can resist his will? This is humbling (designedly so I may say) and once this beauty is seen, it will lead you to a more ardent endearment Him and to a more holy and fearful reverence of him so that you will esteem him, worship him and contemplate him and love him in a due manner. This infers clearly that your faith increases in this process over time and you are made more conformable to him and hence pleases God all the more.

How does Christ's teaching differ from other teaching?

By Thomas Watson, A Body of Divinity, pg 167-170

code120 code249

Several ways.

(1.) Christ teaches the heart. Others may teach the ear, Christ the heart. 'Whose heart the Lord opened.' Acts 16:14. All that the dispensers of the word can do is but to work knowledge, Christ works grace: they can but give the light of the truth; Christ gives the love of the truth; they can only teach what to believe, Christ teaches how to believe.

(2.) Christ gives us a taste of the word. Ministers may set the food of the word before you, and carve it out to you; but it is only Christ can cause you to taste it. 'If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious.' 1 Pet 2:2. 'Taste and see that the Lord is good.' Psa 34:4. It is one thing to hear a truth preached, another thing to taste it; one thing to read a promise, another thing to taste it. David had got a taste of the word. 'Thou hast taught me: How sweet are thy words unto my taste! yea, sweeter than honey to my mouth.' Psalm 119:902, 103. The apostle calls it the savour of knowledge. 2 Cor 2:14. The light of knowledge is one thing, the savour another. Christ makes us taste a savouriness in the word.

(3.) When Christ teaches, he makes us obey. Others may instruct, but cannot command obedience: they teach to be humble, but men remain proud. The prophet had been denouncing judgments against the people of Judah, but they would not hear. 'We will do whatsoever goeth out of our own mouth, to burn incense unto the queen of heaven.' Jer 44:17. Men come as it were, armed in a coat of mail that the sword of the word will not enter; but when Christ comes to teach, he removes this obstinacy see [Ezek. 36:24:26, "I will remove the heart of stone..."]; he not only informs the judgment, but inclines the will see [Deut. 30:6, "And the Lord your God will circumcise your heart...so that you will love the Lord...", Ezek. 11:19-20, etc.]. He does not only come with the light of his word, but the rod of his strength, and makes the stubborn sinner yield to him. His grace is irresistible.

(4.) Christ teaches easily. Others teach with difficulty. They have difficulty in finding out a truth, and in inculcating it. 'Precept must be upon precept, and line upon line.' Isa 28:80. Some may teach all their lives, and the word take no impression. They complain, 'I have spent my labour in vain;' Isa 49:9, plowed on rocks; but Christ the great Prophet teaches with ease. He can with the least touch of his Spirit convert: he can say, 'Let there be light;' with a word he can convey grace.

(5.) When Christ teaches he makes men willing to learn. Men may teach others, but they have no mind to learn. 'Fools despise instruction.' Prov 1:1. They rage at the word, as if a patient should rage at the physician when he brings him a cordial; thus backward are men to their own salvation. But Christ makes his people a 'willing people.' Psa 110:0. They prize knowledge, and hang it as a jewel upon their ear. Those that Christ teaches say, as Isa 2:2, 'Come let us go up to the mountains of the Lord, and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in them;' and as Acts 10:03; 'We are all here present before God, to hear all things commanded.'

(6.) When Christ teaches, he not only illuminates but animates. He so teaches, that he quickens. 'I am the light of the world: he that follows me shall have lumen vitae, the light of life.' John 8:12. By nature we are dead, therefore unfit for teaching. Who will make an oration to the dead? But Christ teaches them that are dead! he gives the light of life. As when Lazarus was dead, Christ said, 'Come forth,' and he made the dead to hear, for Lazarus came forth: so when he says to the dead soul, Come forth of the grave of unbelief, he hears Christ's voice, and comes forth, it is the light of life. The philosophers say, calor et lux concresecunt, 'heat and light increase together.' Where Christ comes with his light, there is the heat of spiritual life going along with it.

Use one: Of information. (1.) See here an argument of Christ's Divinity. Had he not been God, he could never have known the mind of God, or revealed to us those arcana caeli [the secrets of Heaven], those deep mysteries, which no man or angel could find out. Who but God can anoint the eyes of the blind, and give not only light, but sight? Who but he, who has the key of David, can open the heart? Who but God can bow the iron sinew of the will? [Romans 9:19, "For who can resist his will?"] He only who is God can enlighten the conscience, and make the stony heart bleed.

(2.) See what a cornucopia, or plenty of wisdom is in Christ, who is the great doctor of his church, and gives saving knowledge to all the elect. The body of the sun must needs be full of clearness and brightness, which enlightens the whole world. Christ is the great luminary; in him are hid all treasures of knowledge. Col 2:2. The middle lamp of the sanctuary gave light to all the other lamps; so Christ diffuses his glorious light to others. We are apt to admire the learning of Aristotle and Plato; alas! what is this poor spark of light to that which is in Christ, from whose infinite wisdom both men and angels light their lamps.

(3.) See the misery of man in the state of nature. Before Christ becomes their prophet they are enveloped in ignorance and darkness. Men know nothing in a sanctified manner, they know nothing as they ought to know. 1 Cor 8:8. This is sad. Men in the dark cannot discern colours so in the state of nature they cannot discern between morality and grace they take one for the other, pro dea nubem [They mistake the cloud for the goddess herself]. In the dark the greatest beauty is hid. Let there be rare flowers in the garden, and pictures in the room, in the dark their beauty is veiled over; so, though there be such transcendent beauty in Christ as amazes the angels, man in the state of nature sees none of this beauty. What is Christ to him? or heaven to him? The veil is upon his heart. A man in the dark is in danger every step he takes; so man in the state of nature [unconverted] is in danger, at every step, of falling into hell. Thus it is before Christ teaches us; nay, the darkness in which a sinner is, while in an unregenerate state, is worse than natural darkness; for natural darkness affrights. 'An horror of great darkness fell upon Abraham.' Gen 15:12. But the spiritual darkness is not accompanied with horror, men tremble not at their condition; nay, they like their condition well enough. 'Men loved darkness.' John 3:19. This is their sad condition, till Jesus Christ comes as a prophet to teach them, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God.

(4.) See the happy condition of the children of God. They have Christ to be their prophet. 'All thy children shall be taught of the Lord.' Isa 54:13. 'He is made to us wisdom.' I Cor 1:10. One man cannot see by another's eyes; but believers see with Christ's eyes. 'In his light they see light.' Christ gives them the light of grace and the light of glory.

This is an excellent narrative about conversions which will clear up many perplexities that people have as to whether or not they are really converted. And it also sheds light on why the sinner's prayer to curry God's favor to seek salvation seems so sincere when it is really not in the majority of cases, leading to a stupid security, and why those who are really converted prior to the prayer do it anyways because it was traditionally taught to them; or they don't think they are truly converted when saying this prayer, when they actually were, and so are unwittingly, truly seeking it by faith which is what believers do because of their new nature, that new principle of life infused. Hence, believers are the generation that seeks Him, Ps 24:6.

The Manner of Conversion Various

By Jonathan Edwards

Vol. 1 p 350

SECT. II.

The manner of conversion various, yet bearing a great analogy.

I therefore proceed to give an account of the manner of persons being wrought upon; and here there is a vast variety, perhaps as manifold as the subjects of the operation; but yet in many things there is a great analogy in all.—Persons are first awakened with a sense of their miserable condition by nature, the danger they are in of perishing eternally, and that it is of great importance to them that they speedily escape and get into a better state. Those who before were secure and senseless, are made sensible how much they were in the way to ruin, in their former courses. Some are more suddenly seized with convictions—it may be, by the news of others' conversion, or something they hear in public, or in private conference—their consciences are smitten, as if their hearts were pierced through with a dart. Others are awakened more gradually, they begin at first to be something more thoughtful and considerate, so as to come to a conclusion in their minds, that it is their best and wisest way to delay no longer, but to improve the present opportunity. They have accordingly set themselves seriously to meditate on those things that have the most awakening tendency, on purpose to obtain convictions; and so their awakenings have increased, till a sense of their misery, by God's Holy Spirit setting in therewith, has had fast hold of them. Others who before had been somewhat religious, and concerned for their salvation, have been awakened in a new manner; and made sensible that their slack and dull way of seeking, was never like to attain that purpose.

These awakenings when they have first seized on persons, have had two effects; one was, that they have brought | them immediately to quit their sinful practices; and the looser sort have been brought to forsake and dread their former vices and extravagancies. When once the Spirit of God began to be so wonderfully poured out in a general way through the town, people had soon done with their old quarrels, backbitings, and intermeddling with other men's matters. The tavern was soon left empty, and persons kept very much at home; none went abroad unless on necessary business, or on some religious account, and every day seemed in many respects like a Sabbath-day. The other effect was, that it put them on earnest application to the means of salvation, reading, prayer, meditation, the ordinances of God's house, and private conference; their cry was, What shall we do to be saved? The place of resort was now altered, it was no longer the tavern, but the minister's house that was thronged far more than ever the tavern had been wont to be.

There is a very great variety, as to the degree of fear and trouble that persons are exercised with, before they attain any comfortable evidences of pardon and acceptance with God. Some are from the beginning carried on with abundantly more encouragement and hope than others. Some have had ten times less trouble of mind than others, in whom yet the issue seems to be the same. Some have had such a sense of the displeasure of God, and the great danger they were in of damnation, that they could not sleep at nights; and many have said that when they have laid down, the thoughts of sleeping in such a condition have been frightful to them; they have scarcely been free from terror while asleep, and they have awakened with fear, heaviness, and distress, still abiding on their spirits. It has been very common, that the deep and fixed concern on persons' minds, has had a painful influence on their bodies, and given disturbance to animal nature.

The awful apprehensions persons have had of their misery, have for the most part been increasing, the nearer they have approached to deliverance; though they often pass through many changes and alterations in the frame and circumstances of their minds. Sometimes they think themselves wholly senseless, and fear that the Spirit of God has left them, and that they are given up to judicial hardness; yet they appear very deeply exercised about that fear, and are in great earnest to obtain convictions again.

Together with those fears, and that exercise of mind which is rational, and which they have just ground for, they have often suffered many needless distresses of thought, in which Satan probably has a great hand, to entangle them, and block up their way. Sometimes the distemper of melancholy has been evidently mixed; of which, when it happens, the tempter seems to take great advantage, and puts an unhappy bar in the way of any good effect. One knows not how to deal with such persons; they turn everything that is said to them the wrong way, and most to their own disadvantage. There is nothing that the devil seems to make so great a handle of, as a melancholy humour; unless it be the real corruption of the heart.

But it is very remarkable, that there has been far less of this mixture at this time of extraordinary blessing, than there was wont to be in persons under awakenings at other times; for it is evident that many who before had been exceedingly involved in such difficulties, seemed now strangely to be set at liberty. Some persons who had before, for a long time, been exceedingly entangled with peculiar temptations of one sort or other, unprofitable and hurtful distresses, were soon helped over former stumbling-blocks, that hindered their progress towards saving good; convictions have wrought more kindly, and they have been successfully carried on in the way to life. And thus Satan seemed to be restrained, till towards the latter end of this wonderful time, when God's Holy Spirit was about to withdraw.

Many times persons under great awakenings were concerned, because they thought they were not awakened, but miserable, hard-hearted, senseless, sottish creatures still, and sleeping upon the brink of hell. The sense of the need they have to be awakened, and of their comparative hardness, grows upon them with their awakenings; so that they seem to themselves to be very senseless, when indeed most sensible. There have been some instances of persons who have had as great a sense of their danger and misery, as their natures could well subsist under, so that a little more would probably have destroyed them; and yet they have expressed themselves much amazed at their own insensibility and sottishness, at such an extraordinary time.

Persons are sometimes brought to the borders of despair, and it looks as black as midnight to them a little before the day dawns in their souls. Some few instances there have been, of persons who have had such a sense of God's wrath for sin, that they have been overborne; and made to cry out under an astonishing sense of their guilt, wondering that God suffers such guilty wretches to live upon earth, and that he doth not immediately send them to hell.

Sometimes their guilt doth so stare them in the face, that they are in exceeding terror for fear that God will instantly do it; but more commonly their distresses under legal awakenings have not been to such a degree. [Legal as opposed to evangelical; evangelical has to do with faith, faith in the Savior, who has obeyed for us in our place, hence he is our Surety. Legal or legalism is doing things or works, works of obedience to please God without faith. The Jewish dispensation was a legal dispensation, the covenant of works, that is, if you keep this law perfectly you will merit eternal life, do this and live. Consequently this existence was quite disheartening and dreadful, horrifying terrors of conscience in many, since no one could keep the law, the sacrifices could not take away their sins nor the guilt of sin, so relief could only come through another way, that being by a Surety which was Messiah. So by this means, the law leads people to Christ who satisfied the law for us. Believers in the Old Covenant times, such as Abraham, saw this truth: Your father Abraham rejoiced to see My day, and he saw it and was glad, John 8:56, as Jesus relayed to the Pharisees, and saw the purpose of the ceremonial law as a shadow or type which pointed to Christ, the anti-type; but unbelievers did not see this.] In some, these terrors do not seem to be so sharp, when near comfort, as before; their convictions have not seemed to work so much that way, but to be led further down into their own hearts, to a further sense of their own universal depravity and deadness in sin.

The corruption of the heart has discovered itself in various exercises, in the time of legal convictions; [knowing that whatever one does to try to merit God's favor is fruitless on our own account. This many people know intuitively, but don't know the way out of this dilemma.] sometimes it appears in a great struggle, like something roused by an enemy, and Satan the old inhabitant seems to exert himself, like a serpent disturbed and enraged. Many in such circumstances, have felt a great spirit of envy towards the godly, especially towards those who are thought to have been lately converted, and most of all towards acquaintance and companions, when they are thought to be converted. Indeed, some have felt many heart-risings against God, and murmurings at his way of dealing with mankind, and his dealings with themselves in particular. It has been much insisted on, both in public and private, that persons should have the utmost dread of such envious thoughts; which if allowed tend exceedingly to quench the Spirit of God, if not to provoke him finally to forsake them. And when such a spirit has much prevailed, and persons have not so earnestly strove against it as they ought to have done, it has seemed to be exceedingly to the hinderance of the good of their souls. But in some other instances, where persons have been much terrified at the sight of such wickedness in their hearts, God has brought good to them out of evil; and made it a means of convincing them of their own desperate sinfulness, and bringing them off from all self-confidence.

The drift of the Spirit of God in his legal strivings with persons, have seemed most evidently to be, to bring to a conviction of their absolute dependence on his sovereign power and grace, and an universal necessity of a mediator. This has been effected by leading them more and more to a sense of their exceeding wickedness and guiltiness in his sight; their pollution, and the insufficiency of their own righteousness; that they can in no wise help themselves, and that God would be wholly just and righteous in rejecting them and all that they do, and in casting them off for ever. There is however, a vast variety, as to the manner and distinctness of such convictions.

As they are gradually more and more convinced of the corruption and wickedness of their hearts: they seem to themselves to grow worse and worse, harder and blinder, and more desperately wicked, instead of growing better. They are ready to be discouraged by it, and oftentimes never think themselves so far off from good, as when they are nearest. Under the sense which the Spirit of God gives them of their sinfulness, they often think that they differ from all others; their hearts are ready to sink with the thought, that they are the worst of all, and that none ever obtained mercy who were so wicked as they.

When awakenings first begin, their consciences are commonly most exercised about their outward vicious course, or other acts of sin; but afterwards, are much more burdened with a sense of heart-sins, the dreadful corruption of their nature, their enmity against God, the pride of their hearts, their unbelief, their rejection of Christ, the stubbornness and obstinacy of their wills; and the like. In many, God makes much use of their own experience, in the course of their awakenings and endeavors after saving good, to convince them of their own vile emptiness and universal depravity.

Very often under first awakenings, when they are brought to reflect on the sin of their past lives, and have something of a terrifying sense of God's anger, they set themselves to walk more strictly, and confess their sins, and perform many religious duties, with a secret hope of appeasing God's anger, and making up for the sins they have committed. And oftentimes, at first setting out, their affections are so moved, that they are full of tears, in their confessions and prayers; which they are ready to make very much of, as though they were some atonement, and had power to move correspondent affections in God too. Hence they are for a while big with expectation of what God will do for them; and conceive they grow better apace, and shall soon be thoroughly converted. But these affections are but short-lived; they quickly find that they fail, and then they think themselves to be grown worse again. They do not find such a prospect of being soon converted, as they thought: instead of being nearer, they seem to be farther off; their hearts they think are grown harder, and by this means their fears of perishing greatly increase. But though they are disappointed, they renew their attempts again and again; and still as their attempts are multiplied, so are their disappointments. All foils, they see no token of having inclined God's heart to them, they do not see that he hears their prayers at all, as they expected he would; and sometimes there have been great temptations arising hence to leave off seeking, and to yield up the case. But as they are still more terrified with fears of perishing, and their former hopes of prevailing on God to be merciful to them in a great measure fail; sometimes their religious affections have turned into heart-risings against God, because he will not pity them, and seems to have little regard to their distress, and piteous cries, and to all the pains they take. They think of the mercy God has shown to others; how soon and how easily others have obtained comfort, and those too who were worse than they, and have not laboured so much as they have done; and sometimes they have had even dreadful blasphemous thoughts, in these circumstances.

But when they reflect on these wicked workings of heart against God—if their convictions are continued, and the Spirit of God is not provoked utterly to forsake them—they have more distressing apprehensions of the anger of God towards those whose hearts work after such a sinful manner about him; and it may be, have great fears that they have committed the unpardonable sin, or that God will surely never show mercy to them who are such vipers; and are often tempted to leave off in despair. But then perhaps by something they read or hear of the infinite mercy of God, and all-sufficiency of Christ for the chief of sinners, they have some encouragement and hope renewed; but think that as yet they are not fit to come to Christ; they are so wicked that Christ will never accept of them. And then it may be they set themselves upon a new course of fruitless endeavours, in their own strength, to make themselves better; and still meet with new disappointments. They are earnest to inquire, what they shall do? They do not know but there is something else to be done, in order to their obtaining converting grace, that they have never done yet. It may be they hope, that they are something better than they were; but then the pleasing dream all vanishes again. If they are told, that they trust too much to their own strength and righteousness, they cannot unlearn this practice all at once, and find not yet the appearance of any good, but all looks as dark as midnight to them. Thus they wander about from mountain to hill, seeking rest, and finding none. When they are beat out of one refuge, they fly to another; till they are as it were debilitated, broken, and subdued with legal humblings; [doing things trying to repent or doing works trying to please God, but due to their insufficiency and corruptions, lose all hope and despair, and hence are lowered into the dust probably like the tax collector in Luke 18:13 who but beat his breast and said, 'God, have mercy on me, a sinner.' hence legal humblings.] in which God gives them a conviction of their own utter helplessness and insufficiency, and discovers the true remedy in a clearer knowledge of Christ and his gospel.

When they begin to seek salvation, they are commonly profoundly ignorant of themselves; they are not sensible how blind they are, and how little they can do towards bringing themselves to see spiritual things aright, and towards putting forth gracious exercises in their own souls.

They are not sensible how remote they are from love to God, and other holy dispositions, and how dead they are in sin. When they see unexpected pollution in their own hearts, they go about to wash away their own defilements, and make themselves clean; and they weary themselves in vain, till God shows them that it is in vain, and that their help is not where they have sought it.

But some persons continue wandering in such a kind of labyrinth, ten times as long as others, before their own experience will convince them of their insufficiency; and so it appears not to be their own experience only, but the convincing influence of God's Holy Spirit with their experience, that attains the effect. God has of late abundantly shown, that he does not need to wait to have men convinced by long and often repeated fruitless trials; for in multitudes of instances he has made a shorter work of it. He has so awakened and convinced persons' consciences, and made them so sensible of their exceeding great vileness, and given them such a sense of his wrath against sin, as has quickly overcome all their vain self-confidence, and borne them down into the dust before a holy and righteous God.

There have been some who have not had great terrors, but have had a very quick work. Some of those who have not had so deep a conviction of these things before their conversion, have much more of it afterwards. God has appeared far from limiting himself to any certain method in his proceedings with sinners under legal convictions. In some instances, it seems easy for our reasoning powers to discern the methods of divine wisdom, in his dealings with the soul under awakenings; in others, his footsteps cannot be traced, and his ways are past finding out. Some who are less distinctly wrought upon, in what is preparatory to grace, appear no less eminent in gracious experiences afterwards.

There is in nothing a greater difference, in different persons, than with respect to the time of their being under trouble; some but a few days, and others for months or years. There were many in this town, who had been, before this effusion of the Spirit upon us, for years, and some for many years, concerned about their salvation. Though probably they were not thoroughly awakened, yet they were concerned to such a degree as to be very uneasy, so as to live an uncomfortable disquieted life. They continued in a way of taking considerable pains about their salvation; but had never obtained any comfortable evidence of a good state. Several such persons, in this extraordinary time, have received light; but many of them were some of the last. They first saw multitudes of others rejoicing, with songs of deliverance in their mouths, who before had seemed wholly careless and at ease, and in pursuit of vanity; while they had been bowed down with solicitude about their souls. Yea, some had lived licentiously, and so continued till a little before they were converted; and yet soon grew up to a holy rejoicing in the infinite blessings God had bestowed upon them.

Whatever minister has a like occasion to deal with souls, in a flock under such circumstances, as this was in the last year, I cannot but think he will soon find himself under a necessity, greatly to insist upon it with them, that God is under no manner of obligation to show mercy to any natural man, whose heart is not turned to God: and that a man can challenge nothing either in absolute justice, or by free promise, from any thing he does before he has believed on Jesus Christ, or has true repentance begun in him. It appears to me, that if I had taught those who came to me under trouble, any other doctrine, I should have taken a most direct course utterly to undo them. [For example, many pastors say that if you say the sinner's prayer that God is faithful to answer you and save you. But God is not obliged to do it; he owes no man his favor or salvation, not to mention this turns God into a debtor. This sets cements person into a stupid security that ultimately damns him.] I should have directly crossed what was plainly the drift of the Spirit of God in his influences upon them; for if they had believed what I said, it would either have promoted self-flattery and carelessness, and so put an end to their awakenings; or cherished and established their contention and strife with God, concerning his dealings with them and others, and blocked up their way to that humiliation before the Sovereign Disposer of life and death, whereby God is wont to prepare them for his consolations. And yet those who have been under awakenings have oftentimes plainly stood in need of being encouraged, by being told of the infinite and all-sufficient mercy of God in Christ; and that it is God's manner to succeed diligence, and to bless his own means, that so awakenings and encouragements, fear and hope, may be duly mixed, and proportioned to preserve their minds in a just medium between the two extremes of self-flattery and despondence, both which tend to slackness and negligence, and in the end to security. I think I have found that no discourses have been more remarkably blessed, than those in which the doctrine of God's absolute sovereignty, with regard to the salvation of sinners, and his just liberty, with regard to answering the prayers, or succeeding the pains, of natural men, continuing such, have been insisted on. I never found so much immediate saving fruit, in any measure, of any discourses I have offered to my congregation, as some from these words, "That every mouth may be stopped;" (Rom 3:15) endeavouring to show from thence, that it would be just with God for ever to reject and cast off mere natural men.

As to those in whom awakenings seem to have a saving issue, commonly the first thing that appears after their legal troubles, is a conviction of the justice of God in their condemnation, appearing in a sense of their own exceeding sinfulness, and the vileness of all their performances. In giving an account of this, they expressed themselves very variously; some, that they saw God was sovereign, and might receive others and reject them; some, that they were convinced, God might justly bestow mercy on every person in the town, in the world, and damn themselves to all eternity; some, that they see God may justly have no regard to all the pains they have taken, and all the prayers they have made; some, that if they should seek, and take the utmost pains all their lives, God might justly cast them into hell at last, because all their labours, prayers, and tears cannot make an atonement for the least sin, nor merit any blessing at the hands of God. Some have declared themselves to be in the hands of God, that he may dispose of them just as he pleases; some, that God may glorify himself in their damnation, and they wonder that God has suffered them to live so long, and has not cast them into hell long ago.

Some are brought to this conviction by a great sense of their sinfulness, in general, that they are such vile wicked creatures in heart and life: others have the sins of their lives in an extraordinary manner set before them, multitudes of them coming just then fresh to their memory, and being set before them with their aggravations. Some have their minds especially fixed on some particular wicked practice they have indulged. Some are especially convinced by a sight of the corruption and wickedness of their hearts. Some, from a view they have of the horridness of some particular exercises of corruption, which they have had in the time of their awakening, whereby the enmity of the heart against God has been manifested. Some are convinced especially by a sense of the sin of unbelief, the opposition of their hearts to the way of salvation by Christ, and their obstinacy in rejecting him and his grace.

There is a great deal of difference as to distinctness here; some, who have not so clear a sight of God's justice in their condemnation, yet mention things that plainly imply it. They find a disposition to acknowledge God to be just and righteous in his threatenings; and that they are undeserving: and many times, though they had not so particular a sight of it at the beginning, they have very clear discoveries of it soon afterwards, with great humblings in the dust before God.

Commonly persons' minds immediately before this discovery of God's justice are exceedingly restless, in a kind of struggle and tumult, and sometimes in mere anguish; but generally, as soon as they have this conviction, it immediately brings their minds to a calm, an unexpected quietness and composure; and most frequently, though not always, then the pressing weight upon their spirits is taken away, and a general hope arises, that some time or other God will be gracious, even before any distinct and particular discoveries of mercy. Often they then come to a conclusion within themselves, that they will lie at God's feet, and wait his time; and they rest in that, not being sensible that the Spirit of God has now brought them to a frame whereby they are prepared for mercy. For it is remarkable, that persons when they first have this sense of the justice of God, rarely, at the time, think anything of its being that humiliation they have often heard insisted on, and that others experience.

In many persons, the first conviction of the justice of God in their condemnation, which they take particular notice of, and probably the first distinct conviction of it that they have, is of such a nature, as seems to be above any thing merely legal. Though it be after 'legal humblings, and much of a sense of their own helplessness, and of the insufficiency of their own duties; yet it does not appear to be forced by mere legal terrors and convictions; but rather from a high exercise of grace, in saving repentance, and evangelical humiliation. For there is in it a sort of complacency of soul, in the attribute of God's justice, as displayed in his threatenings of eternal damnation to sinners. Sometimes at the discovery of it, they can scarcely forbear crying out, it is just! it is just! Some express themselves, that they see the glory of God would shine bright in their own condemnation; and they are ready to think that if they are damned, they could take part with God against themselves, and would glorify his justice therein. And when it is thus, they commonly have some evident sense of free and all-sufficient grace, though they give no distinct account of it; but it is manifest, by that great degree of hope and encouragement they then conceive, though they were never so sensible of their own vileness and ill-deservings as they are at that time.

Some, when in such circumstances, have felt that sense of the excellency of God's justice, appearing in the vindictive exercises of it, against such sinfulness as theirs was; and have had such a submission of mind in their idea of this attribute, and of those exercises of it—together with an exceeding loathing of their own unworthiness, and a kind of indignation against themselves—that they have sometimes almost called it a willingness to be damned; though it must be owned they had not clear and distinct ideas of damnation, nor does any word in the Bible require such self-denial as this. But the truth is, as some have more clearly expressed it, that salvation has appeared too good for them, that they were worthy of nothing but condemnation, and they could not tell how to think of salvation being bestowed upon /hem, fearing it was inconsistent with the glory of God's majesty, that they had so much contemned and affronted.

That calm of spirit that some persons have found after their legal distresses, [they know intuitively that legal obedience does not work! Only God's righteousness imputed works,] continues some time before any special and delightful manifestation is made to the soul of the grace of God as revealed in the gospel. But very often some comfortable and sweet view of a merciful God, of a sufficient Redeemer, or of some great and joyful things of the gospel, immediately follows, or in a very little time: and in some, the first sight of their just desert of hell, and God's sovereignty with respect to their salvation, and a discovery of all-sufficient grace, are so near, that they seem to go as it were together.

Excellent summary here:

These gracious discoveries given, whence the first special comforts are derived, are in many respects very various. More frequently, Christ is distinctly made the object of the mind, in his all-sufficiency and willingness to save sinners; but some have their thoughts more especially fixed on God, in some of his sweet and glorious attributes manifested in the gospel, and shining forth in the face of Christ. Some view the all-sufficiency of the mercy and grace of God; some, chiefly the infinite power of God, and his ability to save them, and to do all things for them; and some look most at the truth and faithfulness of God. In some, the truth and certainty of the gospel in general is the first joyful discovery they have; in others, the certain truth of some particular promises; in some, the grace and sincerity of God in his invitations, very commonly in some particular invitation in the mind, and it now appears real to them that God does indeed invite them. Some are struck with the glory and wonderfulness of the dying love of Christ; and some with the sufficiency and preciousness of his blood, as offered to make an atonement for sin; and others with the value and glory of his obedience and righteousness. In some the excellency and loveliness of Christ, chiefly engages their thoughts; in some his divinity, that he is indeed the Son of the living God; and in others, the excellency of the way of salvation by Christ, and the suitableness of it to their necessities.

Some have an apprehension of these things so given, that it seems more natural to them to express it by sight or discovery; others think what they experience better expressed by the realizing conviction, or a lively or feeling sense of heart; meaning, as I suppose, no other difference but what is merely circumstantial or gradual.

There is, often, in the mind, some particular text of Scripture, holding forth some evangelical ground of consolation; sometimes a multitude of texts, gracious invitations and promises flowing in one after another, filling the soul more and more with comfort and satisfaction. Comfort is first given to some, while reading some portion of Scripture; but in some it is attended with no particular scripture at all, either in reading or meditation. In some, many divine things seem to be discovered to the soul as it were at once; others have their minds especially fixing on some one thing at first, and afterwards a sense is given of others; in some with a swifter, and others a slower, succession, and sometimes with interruptions of much darkness.

The way that grace seems sometimes first to appear, after legal humiliation, is in earnest longings of soul after God and Christ: to know God, to love him, to be humble before him, to have communion with Christ in his benefits; which longings, as they express them, seem evidently to be of such a nature as can arise from nothing but a sense of the superlative excellency of divine things, with a spiritual taste and relish of them, and an esteem of them as their highest happiness and best portion. Such longings as I speak of, are commonly attended with firm resolutions to pursue this good for ever, together with a hoping, waiting disposition. When persons have begun in such frames, commonly other experiences and discoveries have soon followed, which have yet more clearly manifested a change of heart.

It must needs be confessed that Christ is not always distinctly and explicitly thought of in the first sensible act of grace, (though most commonly he is,) but sometimes he is the object of the mind only implicitly. Thus sometimes when persons have seemed evidently to be stripped of all their own righteousness, and to have stood self-condemned as guilty of death, they have been comforted with a joyful and satisfying view, that the mercy and grace of God is sufficient for them—that their sins, though never so great, shall be no hinderance to their being accepted; that there is mercy enough in God for the whole world, and the like—when they give no account of any particular or distinct thought of Christ. But yet, when the account they give is duly weighed, and they are a little interrogated about it, it appears that the revelation of mercy in the gospel, is the ground of their encouragement and hope; and that it is indeed the mercy of God through Christ that is discovered to them, and that it is depended on in him, and not in any wise moved by any thing in them.

Sometimes disconsolate souls have been revived, and brought to rest in God, by a sweet sense of his grace and faithfulness, in some special invitation or promise; in which nevertheless there is no particular mention of Christ, nor is it accompanied with any distinct thought of him in their minds: but yet, it is not received as out of Christ, but as one of the invitations or promises made of God to poor sinners through his Son Jesus. And such persons afterwards have had clear and distinct discoveries of Christ, accompanied with lively and special actings of faith and love towards him.

[In the next several paragraphs, Edwards doesn't expressly talk about the sinner's prayer and Arminianism, but implies it, in how many people who are genuinely wrought upon, converted, yet due to this new thing that has happened to them of which they are completely unfamiliar with, they unwittingly go ahead with tradition and say the sinner's prayer as though they were still under the covenant of works...what must we do, though now they are doing it by faith, hence, evangelically, evangelical obedience, no longer legal]

Frequently, when persons have first had the gospel-ground of relief discovered to them, and have been entertaining their minds with the sweet prospect, they have thought nothing at that time of their being converted. To see, that there is an all-sufficiency in God, and such plentiful provision made in Christ, after they have been borne down, and sunk with a sense of their guilt and fears of wrath, exceedingly refreshes them. The view is joyful to them; as it is in its own nature glorious, gives them quite new and delightful ideas of God and Christ, greatly encourages them to seek conversion. This begets in them a strong resolution to devote themselves and their whole lives to God and his Son, and patiently to wait till God shall see fit to make all effectual; and very often entertain a strong persuasion, that he will in his own time do it for them.

There is wrought in them a holy repose of soul in God through Christ, with a secret disposition to fear and love him, and to hope for blessings from him in this way. [What Edwards just described here can only happen via saving grace as he notes next.] Yet, they have no imagination that they are now converted, it does not so much as come into their minds: and very often the reason is, that they do not see that they accept of this sufficiency of salvation they behold in Christ, having entertained a wrong notion of acceptance; not being sensible that the obedient and joyful entertainment which their hearts give to this discovery of grace, is a real acceptance of it. They know not that the sweet complacency they feel in the mercy and complete salvation of God, as it includes pardon and sanctification, and is held forth to them only through Christ, is a true receiving of this mercy, or a plain evidence of their receiving it. They expected I know not what kind of act of soul, and perhaps they had no distinct idea of it themselves.

And indeed it appears very plainly in some of them, that before their own conversion they had very imperfect ideas what conversion was. It is all new and strange, and what there was no clear conception of before. It is most evident, as they themselves acknowledge, that the expressions used to describe conversion, and the graces of God's Holy Spirit—such as a spiritual sight of Christ, faith in Christ, poverty of spirit, trust in God, &c.—did not convey those distinct ideas to their minds, which they were intended to signify. Perhaps to some of them it was but little more than the names of colours are to convey the ideas to one that is blind from his birth.

In this town there has always been a great deal of talk about conversion and spiritual experiences; and therefore people in general had formed a notion in their own minds what these things were. But when they come to be the subjects of them, they find themselves much confounded in their notions, and overthrown in many of their former conceits. And it has been very observable, that persons of the greatest understanding, and who had studied most about things of this nature, have been more confounded than others. Some such persons declare, that all their former wisdom is brought to nought, and that they appear to have been mere babes, who knew nothing. It has appeared, that none have stood more in need of instruction, even of their fellow-Christians, concerning their own circumstances and difficulties, than they: and it seems to have been with delight, that they have seen themselves thus brought down, and become nothing; that free grace and divine power may be exalted in them.

It was very wonderful to see how persons' affections were sometimes moved—when God did as it were suddenly open their eyes, and let into their minds a sense of the greatness of his grace, the fulness of Christ, and his readiness to save—after having been broken with apprehensions of divine wrath, and sunk into an abyss, under a sense of guilt which they were ready to think was beyond the mercy of God. Their joyful surprise has caused their hearts as it were to leap, so that they have been ready to break forth into laughter, tears often at the same time issuing like a flood, and intermingling a loud weeping. Sometimes they have not been able to forbear crying out with a loud voice, expressing their great admiration. In some, even the view of the glory of God's sovereignty, in the exercises of his grace, has surprised the soul with such sweetness, as to produce the same effects. I remember an instance of one, who, reading something concerning God's sovereign way of saving sinners, as being self-moved—having no regard to men's own righteousness as the motive of his grace, but as magnifying himself and abasing man, or to that purpose—felt such a sudden rapture of joy and delight in the consideration of it: and yet then he suspected himself to be in a Christless condition, and had been long in great distress for fear that God would not have mercy on him.

Many continue a long time in a course of gracious exercises and experiences, and do not think themselves to be converted, but conclude otherwise; and none knows how long they would continue so, were they not helped by particular instructions. There are undoubted instances of some who have lived in this way for many years together, and these circumstances had various consequences, with various persons, and with the same persons, at various times. Some continue in great encouragement and hope, that they shall obtain mercy in a steadfast resolution to persevere in seeking it, and in an humble waiting in it before God. But very often, when the lively sense of the sufficiency of Christ and the riches of divine grace, begins to vanish, upon a withdrawment of divine influences, they return to greater distress than ever. For they have now a far greater sense of the misery of a natural condition than before, being in a new manner sensible of the reality of eternal things, the greatness of God, his excellency, and how dreadful it is to be separated from him, and to be subject to his wrath; so that they are sometimes swallowed up with darkness and amazement. Satan has a vast advantage in such cases to ply them with various temptations, which he is not wont to neglect: in such a case, persons very much need a guide to lead them to an understanding of what we are taught in the word of God concerning the nature of grace, and to help them to apply it to themselves.

I have been much blamed and censured by many, that I should make it my practice, when I have been satisfied concerning persons' good estate, to signify it to them. This has been greatly misrepresented abroad, as innumerable other things concerning us, to prejudice the country against the whole affair. But let it be noted, that what I have undertaken to judge of, has rather been qualifications, and declared experiences, than persons. Not but that I have thought it my duty, as a pastor, to assist and instruct persons in applying scripture-rules and characters to their own case; (in which, I think, many greatly need a guide); and I have, where the case appeared plain, used freedom in signifying my hope of them to others. But I have been far from doing this concerning all that I have had some hopes of; and I believe have used much more caution than many have supposed. Yet I should account it a great calamity to be deprived of the comfort of rejoicing with those of my flock, who have been in great distress, whose circumstances I have been acquainted with, when there seems to be good evidence that those who were dead are alive, and that those who were lost are found. I am sensible the practice would have been safer in the hands of one of a riper judgment and greater experience: but yet, there seemed to be an absolute necessity of it on the fore-mentioned accounts; and it has been found what God has most remarkably owned and blessed amongst us, both to the persons themselves, and to others.

Grace in many persons, through this ignorance of their state, and their loosing on themselves still as the objects of God's displeasure, has been like the trees in winter, or like seed in the spring suppressed under a hard clod of earth. Many in such cases have laboured to their utmost to divert their minds from the pleasing and joyful views they have had, and to suppress those consolations and gracious affections that arose thereupon. And when it has once come into their minds to inquire, whether or no this was not true grace, they have been much afraid lest they should be deceived with common illuminations and flashes of affection, and eternally undone with a false hope. But when they have been better instructed, and so brought to allow of 'hope, this has awakened the gracious disposition of their hearts into life and vigour, as the warm beams of the sun in the spring have quickened the seeds and productions of the earth. Grace being now at liberty, and cherished with hope, has soon flowed out to their abundant satisfaction and increase.

There is no one thing that I know of which God has made such a means of promoting his work amongst us, as the news of others' conversion. This has been owned in awakening sinners, engaging them earnestly to seek the same blessing, and in quickening saints. Though I have thought that a minister declaring his judgment about particular persons' experiences, might from these things be justified; yet I often signify to my people, how unable man is to know another's heart, and how unsafe it is to depend merely on the judgment of others. I have abundantly insisted, that a manifestation of sincerity in fruits brought forth, is better than any manifestation they can make of it in words alone: and that without this, all pretences to spiritual experiences are vain. This all my congregation can witness. And the people in general have manifested an extraordinary dread of being deceived; being exceeding fearful lest they should build wrong. Some of them have been backward to receive hope, even to a great extreme, which has occasioned me to dwell longer on this part of the narrative.

Conversion is a great and glorious work of God's power, at once changing the heart, and infusing life into the dead soul; though the grace then implanted more gradually displays itself in some than in others. But as to fixing on the precise time when they put forth the very first act of grace, there is a great deal of difference in different persons; in some it seems to be very discernible when the very time was; but others are more at a loss. In thin respect, there are very many who do not know, even when they have it, that it is the grace of conversion, and sometimes do not think it to be so till a long time after. Many, even when they come to entertain great hopes that they are converted, if they remember what they experienced in the first exercises of grace, they are at a loss whether it was any more than a common illumination; or whether some other more clear and remarkable experience which they had afterwards, was not the first of a saving nature. The manner of God's work on the soul, sometimes especially, is very mysterious; and it is with the kingdom of God as to its manifestation in the heart of a convert, as is said, "So is the kingdom of God, as if a man should cast seed into the ground, and should sleep, and rise, night and day, and the seed should spring, and grow up, he knoweth not how; for the earth bringeth forth of herself, first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear." (Mark 4:26-28)

Various manners of conversion; this is good.

In some, converting light is like a glorious brightness suddenly shining upon a person, and all around him: they are in a remarkable manner brought out of darkness into marvelous light. In many others it has been like the dawning of the day, when at first but a little light appears, and it may be is presently hid with a cloud; and then it appears again, and shines a little brighter, and gradually increases, with intervening darkness, till at length it breaks forth more clearly from behind the clouds. And many are, doubtless, ready to date their conversion wrong, throwing by those lesser degrees of light that appeared at first dawning, and calling some more remarkable experience they had afterwards, their conversion. This often, in a great measure, arises from a wrong understanding of what they have always been taught, that conversion is a great change, wherein old things are done away, and nil things become new, or at least from a false inference from that doctrine.

Persons commonly at first conversion, and afterwards, have had many texts of Scripture brought to their minds, which are exceeding suitable to their circumstances, often come with great power, as the word of God or of Christ indeed; and many have a multitude of sweet invitations, promises, and doxologies flowing in one after another, bringing great light and comfort with them, filling the soul brimful, enlarging the heart, and opening the mouth in religion. And it seems to me necessary to suppose, that there is an immediate influence of the Spirit of God, oftentimes, in bringing texts of Scripture to the mind. Not that I suppose it is done in a way of immediate revelation, without any use of the memory; but yet there seems plainly to be an immediate and extraordinary influence, in leading their thoughts to such and such passages of Scripture, and exciting them in the memory. Indeed in some, God seems to bring texts of scripture to their minds no otherwise than by leading them into such frames and meditations, as harmonize with those scriptures; but in many persons there seems to be something more than this.

Those who, while under legal convictions, have had the greatest terrors, have not always obtained the greatest light and comfort; nor have they always light most suddenly communicated; but yet, I think, the time of conversion has generally been most sensible in such persons. Oftentimes, the first sensible change after the extremity of terrors, is a calmness, and then the light gradually comes in; small glimpses at first, after their midnight darkness, and a word or two of comfort, as it were softly spoken to them. They have a little taste of the sweetness of divine grace, and the love of a Saviour; when terror and distress of conscience begin to be turned into a humble, meek sense of their own unworthiness before God. There is felt, inwardly, sometimes a disposition to praise God; and after a little while the light comes in more clearly and powerfully. But yet, I think, more frequently, great terrors have been followed with more sudden and great light and comfort; when the sinner seems to be as it were subdued and brought to a calm, from a kind of tumult of mind, then God lets in an extraordinary sense of his great mercy through a Redeemer."

Converting influences very commonly bring an extraordinary conviction of the reality and certainty of the great things of religion; though in some this is much greater some time after conversion, than at first. They have that sight and taste of the divine excellency there is in the gospel, which is more effectual to convince them, than reading many volumes of arguments without it. It seems to me, that in many instances, when the glory of Christian truths has been set before persons, and they have at the same time as it were seen, and tasted, and felt the divinity of them, they have been as far from doubting their truth, as they are from doubting whether there be a sun, when their eyes are open in the midst of a clear hemisphere, and the strong blaze of his light overcomes all objections. And yet, many of them, if we should ask them why they believed those things to be true, would not be able well to express or communicate a sufficient reason to satisfy the inquirer; and perhaps would make no other answer but that they see them to be true. But a person might soon be satisfied, by a particular conversation with them, that what they mean by such an answer is, that they have intuitively beheld, and immediately felt, most illustrious and powerful evidence of divinity in them.

Some are thus convinced of the truth of the gospel in general, and that the Scriptures are the word of God': others have their minds more especially fixed on some particular great doctrine of the gospel, some particular truths that they are meditating on, or reading of, in some portion of Scripture. Some have such convictions in a much more remarkable manner than others: and there are some who never had such a special sense of the certainty of divine things impressed upon them, with such inward evidence and strength, have yet very clear exercises of grace; i.e., of love to God, repentance, and holiness. And if they be more particularly examined, they appear plainly to have an inward firm persuasion of the reality of divine things, such as they did not use to have before their conversion. And those who have the most clear discoveries of divine truth, in the manner that has been mentioned, cannot have this always in view. When the sense and relish of the divine excellency of these things fades, on a withdrawalment of the Spirit of God, they have not the medium of the conviction of their truth at command. In a dull frame, they cannot recall the idea and inward sense they had, perfectly to mind; things appear very dim to what they did before. And though there still remains a habitual strong persuasion; yet not so as to exclude temptations to unbelief, and all possibility of doubting. But then, at particular times, by God's Help, the same sense of things revives again, like fire that lay hid in ashes. I suppose the grounds of such a conviction of the truth of divine things to be just and rational; but yet, in some, God makes use of their own reason much more sensibly than in others. Oftentimes persons have (so far as could be judged) received the first saving conviction from renaming which they have heard from the pulpit; and often in the course of reasoning they are led into in their own meditations.

The arguments are the same that they have heard hundreds of times; but the force of the arguments, and their conviction by them, is altogether new; they come with a new and before unexperienced power. Before, they heard it was so, and they allowed it to be so; but now they see it to be so indeed. Things now look exceeding plain to them, and they wonder they did not see them before.

They are so greatly taken with their new discovery, and things appear so plain and so rational to them, that they are often at first ready to think they can convince others, and are apt to engage in talk with every one they meet with, almost to this end; and when they are disappointed, are ready to wonder that their reasonings seem to make no more impression.

Many fall under such a mistake as to be ready to doubt of their good estate, because there was so much use made of their own reason in the convictions they have received; they are afraid that they have no illumination above the natural force of their own faculties; and many make that an objection against the spirituality of their convictions, that it is so easy to see things as they now see them. They have often heard, that conversion is a work of mighty power, manifesting to the soul what neither man nor angel can give such a conviction of; but it seems to them that these things are so plain and easy, and rational, that any body can see them. If they are asked, why they never saw thus before; they say, it seems to them it was because they never thought of it. But very often these difficulties are soon removed by those of another nature; for when God withdraws, they find themselves as it were blind again, they for the present lose their realizing sense of those things that looked so plain to them, and, by all they can do, they cannot recover it, till God renews the influences of his Spirit.

Persons after their conversion often speak of religious things as seeming new to them; that preaching is a new thing; that it seems to them they never heard preaching before; that the Bible is a new book: they find there vein chapters, new psalms, new histories, because they see them in a new light. [Ps36:9, in your light we see light.] Here was a remarkable instance of an aged woman, of above seventy years, who had spent most of her days under Mr. Stoddard's powerful ministry. Reading in the New Testament concerning Christ's sufferings for sinners, she seemed to be astonished at what she read, as what was real and very wonderful, but quite new to her. At first, before she had time to turn her thoughts, she wondered within herself, that she had never heard of it before; but then immediately recollected herself, and thought she had often heard of it, and read it, but never till now saw it as real. She then cast in her mind, how wonderful this was, that the Son of God should undergo such things for sinners, and how she had spent her time in ungratefully sinning against so good a God, and such a Saviour; though she was a person, apparently, of a very blameless and inoffensive life. And she was so overcome by those considerations, that her nature was ready to fail under them: those who were about her, and knew not what was the matter, were surprised, and thought she was a dying.

Many have spoken much of their hearts being drawn out in love to God and Christ; and of their minds being wrapt up in delightful contemplation of the glory and wonderful grace of God, the excellency and dying love of Jesus Christ; and of their souls going forth in longing desires after God and Christ. Several of our young children have expressed much of this; and have manifested a willingness to leave father and mother and all things in the world, to go and be with Christ. Some persons having had such longing desires after Christ, or which have risen to such degree, as to take away their natural strength. Some have been so overcome with a sense of the dying love of Christ, to such poor, wretched, and unworthy creatures, as to weaken the body. Several persons have had so great a sense of the glory of God, and excellency of Christ, that nature and life seemed almost to sink under it; and in all probability, if God had showed them a little more of himself, it would have dissolved their frame. I have seen some, and conversed with them in such frames, who have certainly been perfectly sober, and very remote from anything like enthusiastic wildness. And they have talked, when able to speak, of the glory of God's perfections, the wonderfulness of his grace in Christ, and their own unworthiness, in such a manner as cannot be perfectly expressed after them. Their sense of their exceeding littleness and vileness, and their disposition to abase themselves before God, has appeared to be great in proportion to their light and joy.

Such persons amongst us as have been thus distinguished with the most extraordinary discoveries, have commonly nowise appeared with the assuming, self-conceited, and self-sufficient airs of enthusiasts; but exceedingly the contrary. They are eminent for a spirit of meekness, modesty, self-diffidence, and a low opinion of themselves. No persons appear so sensible of their need of instruction, and so eager to receive it, as some of them; nor so ready to think others better than themselves. Those that have been considered as converted amongst us, have generally manifested a longing to lie low, and in the dust before God; withal complaining of their not being able to lie low enough.

They speak much of their sense of excellency in the way of salvation by free and sovereign grace, through the righteousness of Christ alone; and how it is with delight that they renounce their own righteousness, and rejoice in having no account made of it. Many have expressed themselves to this purpose, that it would lessen the satisfaction they hope for in heaven to have it by their own righteousness, or in any other way than as bestowed by free grace, and for Christ's sake alone. They speak much of the inexpressibleness of what they experience, how their words fail, so that they cannot declare it. And particularly they speak with exceeding admiration of the superlative excellency of that pleasure and delight which they sometimes enjoy; how a little of it is sufficient to pay them for all the pains and trouble they have gone through in seeking salvation; and how far it exceeds all earthly pleasures. Some express much of the sense which these spiritual views give them of the vanity of earthly enjoyments, how mean and worthless all these things appear to them.

Many, while their minds have been filled with spiritual delights, have as it were forgot their food; their bodily appetite has failed, while their minds have been entertained with meat to eat that others knew not of. The light and comfort which some of them enjoy, give a new relish to their common blessings, and cause all things about them to appear as it were beautiful, sweet, and pleasant. All things abroad, the sun, moon, and stars, the clouds and sky, the heavens and earth, appear as it were with a cast of divine glory and sweetness upon them. Though this joy include in it a delightful sense of the safety of their own state, yet frequently, in times of their highest spiritual entertainment, this seems not to be the chief object of their fixed thought and meditation. The supreme attention of their minds is to the glorious excellencies of God and Christ; and there is very often a ravishing sense of God's love accompanying a sense of his excellency. They rejoice in a sense of the faithfulness of God's promises, as they respect the future, eternal enjoyment of him.

The unparalleled joy that many of them speak of, is what they find when they are lowest in the dust, emptied most of themselves, and as it were annihilating themselves before God; when they are nothing, and God is all; seeing their own unworthiness, depending not at all on themselves, but alone on Christ, and ascribing all glory to God. Then their souls are most in the enjoyment of satisfying rest; excepting that, at such times, they apprehend themselves to be not sufficiently self-abased; for then above all times do they long to be lower. Some speak much of the exquisite sweetness, and rest of soul, that is to be found in the exercise of resignation to God, and humble submission to his will. Many express earnest longings of soul to praise God; but at the same time complain that they cannot praise him as they would, and they want to have others help them in praising him. They want to have every one praise God, and are ready to call upon every thing to praise him. They express a longing desire to live to God's glory, and to do something to his honour; but at the same time complain of their insufficiency and barrenness; that they are poor and impotent creatures, can do nothing of themselves, and are utterly insufficient to glorify their Creator and Redeemer.

While God was so remarkably present amongst us by his Spirit, there was no book so delightful as the Bible; especially the Book of Psalms, the Prophecy of Isaiah, and the New Testament. Some, by reason of their love to God's word, at times, have been wonderfully delighted and affected at the sight of a Bible; and then, also, there was no time so prized as the Lord's day, and no place in this world so desired as God's house. Our converts then remarkably appeared united in dear affection to one another, and many have expressed much of that spirit of love which they felt toward all mankind; and particularly to those who had been least friendly to them. Never, I believe, was so much done in confessing injuries, and making up differences, as the last year. Persons, after their own conversion, have commonly expressed an exceeding great desire for the conversion of others. Some have thought that they should be willing to die for the conversion of any soul, though of one of the meanest of their fellow-creatures, or of their worst enemies; and many have, indeed, been in great distress with desires and longings for it. This work of God had also a good effect to unite the people's affections much to their minister.

There are some persons whom I have been acquainted with, but more especially two, that belong to other towns, who have been swallowed up exceedingly with a sense of the awful greatness and majesty of God; and both of them told me to this purpose, that if at the time, they had entertained the least fear that they were not at peace with this so great a God, they should certainly have died.

It is worthy to be remarked, that some persons, by their conversion, seem to be greatly helped as to their doctrinal notions of religion. It was particularly remarkable in one, who, having been taken captive in his childhood, was trained up in Canada, in the popish religion [legalistic, sacramentalist, etc.]. Some years since he returned to this his native place, and was in a measure brought off from popery; but seemed very awkward and dull in receiving any clear notion of the protestant scheme, till he was converted; and then he was remarkably altered in this respect.

This is good:

There is a vast difference, as observed, in the degree, and also in the particular manner, of persons' experiences, both at and after conversion; some have grace working more sensibly in one way, others in another. Some speak more fully of a conviction of the justice of God in their condemnation; others, more of their consenting to the way of salvation by Christ; and some, more of the actings of love to God and Christ. Some more of acts of affiance, in a sweet and assured conviction of the truth and faithfulness of God in his promises; others, more of their choosing and resting in God, as their whole and everlasting portion; and of their ardent and longing desire after God, to have communion with him; and others, more of their abhorrence to themselves for their past sins, and earnest longings to live to God's glory for the time to come. But it seems evidently to be the same work, the same habitual change wrought in the heart, it all tends the same way, and to the same end; and it is plainly the same spirit that breathes and acts in various persons. There is an endless variety in the particular manner and circumstances in which persons are wrought on; and an opportunity of seeing so much will show, that God is further from confining himself to a particular method in his work on souls, than some imagine. I believe it has occasioned some good people amongst us, who were before too ready to make their own experience a rule to others, to be less censorious and more extended in their charity; and this is an excellent advantage indeed. The work of God has been glorious in its variety; it has the more displayed the manifold and unsearchable wisdom of God, and wrought more charity among his people.

There is a great difference among those who are converted, as to the degree of hope and satisfaction they have concerning their own state. Some have a high degree of satisfaction in this matter almost constantly; and yet it is rare that any enjoy so full an assurance of their interest in Christ, that self-examination should seem needless to them; unless it be at particular seasons, while in the actual enjoyment of some great discovery God gives of his glory and rich grace in Christ, to the drawing forth of extraordinary acts of grace. But the greater part, as they sometimes fall into dead frames of spirit, are frequently exercised with scruples and fears concerning their condition.

They generally have an awful apprehension of the dreadful nature of a false hope; and there has been observable in most a great caution, lest in giving an account of their experiences, they should say too much, and use too strong terms. Many, after they have related their experiences, have been greatly afflicted with fears, lest they have played the hypocrite, and used stronger terms than their case would fairly allow of; and yet could not find how they could correct themselves.

I think the main ground of the doubts and fears, that persons after their conversion have been exercised with, about their own state, has been, that they have found so much corruption remaining in their hearts. At first, their souls seem to be all alive, their hearts are fixed, and their affections flowing; they seem to live quite above the world, and meet with but little difficulty in religious exercises; and they are ready to think it will always be so. Though they are truly abased under a sense of their vileness, by reason of former acts of sin; yet they are not then sufficiently sensible, what corruption still remains in their hearts; and therefore, are surprised when they find that they begin to be in dull and dead frames, troubled with wandering thoughts at the time of public and private worship, and utterly unable to keep themselves from them. When they find themselves unaffected, while yet there is the greatest occasion to be affected; and when they feel worldly dispositions working in them—pride, envy, stirrings of revenge, or some ill spirit towards some person that has injured them, as well as other workings of indwelling sin—their hearts are almost sunk with the disappointment; and they are ready presently to think that they are mere hypocrites.

They are ready to argue, if God had, indeed, done such great things for them, as they hoped, such ingratitude would be inconsistent with it. They complain of the hardness and wickedness of their hearts; and say there is so much corruption, that it seems to them impossible there should be any goodness there. Many of them seem to be much more sensible how corrupt their hearts are, than before they were converted; and some have been too ready to be impressed with fear, that instead of becoming better, they are grown much worse, and make it an argument against the goodness of their state. But in truth, the case seems plainly to be, that now they feel the pain of their own wound; they have a watchful eye upon their hearts, that they did not use to have. They take more notice of what sin is there, which is now more burdensome to them; they strive more against it, and feel more of its strength.

They are somewhat surprised that they should in this respect find themselves so different from the idea they generally had entertained of godly persons. For, though grace be indeed of a far more excellent nature than they imagined; yet, those who are godly have much less of it, and much more remaining corruption, than they thought. They never realized it, that persons were wont to meet with such difficulties, after they were once converted. When they are thus exercised with doubts about their state, through the deadness of their frames; as long as these frames last, they are commonly unable to satisfy themselves of the truth of their grace, by all their self-examination. When they hear of the signs of grace laid down for them to try themselves by, they are often so clouded, that they do not know how to apply them. They hardly know whether they have such and such things or no, and whether they have experienced them or not. That which was the sweetest, best, and most distinguishing in their experiences, they cannot recover a sense of. But on a return of the influences of the Spirit of God, to revive the lively actings of grace, the light breaks through the cloud, and doubting and darkness soon vanish away. [There are reasons for these various actings of the Holy Spirit; He comes and he goes, etc., and when his influence wanes, one fears that he may not be saved.]

Persons are often revived out of their dead and dark frames, by religious conversation: while they are talking of divine things, or ever they are aware, their souls are carried away into holy exercises with abundant pleasure. And oftentimes, while relating their past experiences to their Christian brethren, they have a sense of them revived, and the same experiences in a degree again renewed. Sometimes, while persons are exercised in mind with several objections against the goodness of their state, they have scriptures one after another coming to their minds, to answer their scruples, and unravel their difficulties, exceedingly apposite and proper to their circumstances. By these means, their darkness is scattered; and often, before the bestowment of any new remarkable comforts, especially after long-continued deadness and ill frames, there are renewed humblings, in a great sense of their own exceeding vileness and unworthiness, as before their first comforts were bestowed.

Many in the country have entertained a mean thought of this great work, from what they have heard of impressions made on persons' imaginations. But there have been exceeding great misrepresentations, and innumerable false reports, concerning that matter. It is not, that I know of, the profession or opinion of any one person in the town, that any weight is to be laid on any thing seen with the bodily eyes. I know the contrary to be a received and established principle amongst us. I cannot say that there have been no instances of persons who have been ready to give too much heed to vain and useless imaginations; but they have been easily corrected, and I conclude it will not be wondered at, that a congregation should need a guide in such cases, to assist them in distinguishing wheat from chaff. But such impressions on the imaginations as have been more usual, seem to me to be plainly no other than what is to be expected in human nature in such circumstances, and what is the natural result of the strong exercise of the mind, and impressions on the heart.

I do not suppose, that they themselves imagined they saw anything with their bodily eyes; but only have had within them ideas strongly impressed, and as it were lively pictures in their minds. For instance, some when in great terrors, through fear of hell, have had lively ideas of a dreadful furnace. Some, when their hearts have been strongly impressed, and their affections greatly moved with a sense of the beauty and excellency of Christ, have had their imaginations so wrought upon, that, together with a sense of his glorious spiritual perfections, there has arisen in the mind an idea of one of glorious majesty, and of a sweet and gracious aspect. Some, when they have been greatly affected with Christ's death, have at the same time a lively idea of Christ hanging upon the cross, and his blood running from his wounds. Surely such things will not be wondered at by them who have observed, how any strong affections about temporal matters will excite lively ideas and pictures of different things in the mind.

The vigorous exercises of the mind, doubtless, more strongly impress it with imaginary ideas in some than others, which probably may arise from the difference of constitution, and seems evidently in some, partly to arise from their peculiar circumstances. When persons have been exercised with extreme terrors, and there is a sudden change to light and joy, the imagination seems more susceptible of strong ideas; the inferior powers, and even the frame of the body, are much more affected, than when the same persons have as great spiritual light and joy afterwards; of which it might, perhaps, be easy to give a tea-son. The forementioned Reverend Messrs. Lord and Owen—who, I believe, are esteemed persons of learning and discretion where they are best known—declared, that they found these impressions on persons' imaginations quite different things from what fame had before represented to them, and that they were what none need to wonder at— or to that purpose.

There have indeed been some few instances of impressions on persons' imaginations, which have been somewhat mysterious to me, and I have been at a loss about them. For, though it has been exceeding evident to me, by many things that appeared both then and afterwards, that they indeed had a greater sense of the spiritual excellency of divine things accompanying them; yet I have not been able well to satisfy myself, whether their imaginary ideas have been more than could naturally arise from their spiritual sense of things. However, I have used the utmost caution in such cases; great care has been taken both in public and in private to teach persons the difference between what is spiritual and what is merely imaginary. I have often warned persons not to lay the stress of their hope on any ideas of any outward glory, or any external thing whatsoever, and have met with no opposition in such instructions. But it is not strange if some weaker persons, in giving an account of their experiences, have not so prudently distinguished between the spiritual and imaginary part; of which some who have not been well affected to religion might take advantage.

There has been much talk in many parts of the country, as though the people have symbolized with the quakers, and the quakers themselves have been moved with such reports; and some came here, once and again, hoping to find good waters to fish in; but without the least success, and have left off coming. There have also been reports spread about the country, as though the first occasion of so remarkable a concern was an apprehension that the world was near to an end; which was altogether a false report. Indeed, after this concern became so general and extraordinary, as related, the minds of some were filled with speculation, what so great a dispensation of Divine Providence might forebode; and some reports were heard from abroad, as though certain divines and others thought the conflagration was nigh; but such reports were never generally looked upon worthy of notice.

The work which has now been wrought on souls, is evidently the same that was wrought in my venerable predecessor's days; as I have had abundant opportunity to know, having been in the ministry here two years with him, and so conversed with a considerable number whom my grandfather thought to be savingly converted at that time; and having been particularly acquainted with the experiences of many who were converted under his ministry before. And I know no one of them, who in the least doubts of its being the same spirit and the same work. Persons have now no otherwise been subject to impressions on their imaginations than formerly: the work is of the same nature, and has not been attended with any extraordinary circumstances, excepting such as are analogous to the extraordinary degree of it before described. And God's people who were formerly converted, have now partaken of the same shower of divine blessing—in the renewing, strengthening, edifying influences of the Spirit of God—that others have in his converting influences; and the work here has also been plainly the same with that of other places which have been mentioned, as partaking of the same blessing. I have particularly conversed with persons, about their experiences, who belong to all parts of the country, and in various parts of Connecticut, where a religious concern has lately appeared: and have been informed of the experiences of many others by their own pastors.

It is easily perceived by the foregoing account, that it is very much the practice of the people here, to converse freely one with another about their spiritual experiences; which many have been disgusted at. But however our people may have, in some respects, gone to extremes in it, it is, doubtless, a practice that the circumstances of this town, and neighboring towns, have naturally led them into. Whatsoever people have their minds engaged to such a degree in the same affair, that it is ever uppermost in their thoughts, they will naturally make it the subject of conversation when they get together, in which they will grow more and more free. Restraints will soon vanish; and they will not conceal from one another what they meet with. And it has been a practice which, in the general, has been attended with many good effects, and what God has greatly blessed amongst us: but it must be confessed, there may have been some ill consequences of it; which yet are rather to be laid to the indiscreet management of it than to the practice itself; and none can wonder, if among such a multitude some fail of exercising so much prudence in choosing the time, manner, and occasion of such discourse, as is desirable.

A Wicked Presumption Expounded

Excerpt from The Justice of God in the Damnation of Sinners

By Jonathan Edwards

5. Consider how often you have refused to hear God's calls to you, and how just it would therefore be, if he should refuse to hear you when you call upon him. You are ready, it may be, to complain that you have often prayed, and earnestly begged of God to show you mercy, and yet have no answer of prayer. One says, I have been constant in prayer for so many years, and God has not heard me. Another says, I have done what I can; I have prayed as earnestly as I am able; I do not see how I can do more; and it will seem hard if after all I am denied. But do you consider how often God has called, and you have denied him? God has called earnestly, and for a long time; he has called and called again in his word, and in his providence, and you have refused. You were not uneasy for fear you should not show regard enough to his calls. You let him call as loud and as long as he would; for your part, you had no leisure to attend to what he said; you had other business to mind; you had these and those lusts to gratify and please, and worldly concerns to attend; you could not afford to stand considering of what God had to say to you. When the ministers of Christ have stood and pleaded with you, in his name, sabbath after sabbath, and have even spent their strength in it, how little was you moved! It did not alter you, but you went on still as you used to do; when you went away, you returned again to your sins, to your lasciviousness, to your vain mirth, to your covetousness, to your intemperance, and that has been the language of your heart and practice, Exodus 5:2. "Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice?" Was it no crime for you to refuse to hear when God called? And yet is it now very hard that God does not hear your earnest calls, and that though your calling on God be not from any respect to him, but merely from self-love? The devil would beg as earnestly as you, if he had any hope to get salvation by it, and a thousand times as earnestly, and yet be as much of a devil as he is now. Are your calls more worthy to be heard than God's? Or is God more obliged to regard what you say to him, than you to regard his commands, counsels, and invitations to you? What can be more justice than this, Proverbs 1:24, &c. "Because I have called, and ye refused, I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; but ye have set at nought all my counsel, and would none of my reproof: I will also laugh at your calamity, I will mock when your fear cometh; when your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish cometh upon you. Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me."

6. Have you not taken encouragement to sin against God, on that very presumption, that God would show you mercy when you sought it? And may not God justly refuse you that mercy that you have so presumed upon? You have flattered yourself, that though you did so, yet God would show you mercy when you cried earnestly to him for it: how righteous therefore would it be in God, to disappoint such a wicked presumption! It was upon that very hope that you dared to affront the majesty of heaven so dreadfully as you have done; and can you now be so sottish as to think that God is obliged not to frustrate that hope?

When a sinner takes encouragement to neglect secret prayer which God has commanded, to gratify his lusts, to live a carnal vain life, to thwart God, to run upon him, and contemn him to his face, thinking with himself, "If I do so, God would not damn me; he is a merciful God, and therefore when I seek his mercy he will bestow it upon me;" must God be accounted hard because he will not do according to such a sinner's presumption?

Cannot he be excused from showing such a sinner mercy when he is pleased to seek it, without incurring the charge of being unjust; if this be the case, God has no liberty to vindicate his own honour and majesty; but must lay himself open to all manner of affronts, and yield himself up to the abuse of vile men, though they disobey, despise, and dishonour him, as much as they will; and when they have done, his mercy and pardoning grace must not be in his own power and at his own disposal, but he must be obliged to dispense it at their call. He must take these bold and vile contemners of his majesty, when it suits them to ask it, and must forgive all their sins, and not only so, but must adopt them into his family, and make them his children, and bestow eternal glory upon them. What mean, low, and strange thoughts have such men of God, who think thus of him! Consider, that you have injured God the more, and have been the worse enemy to him, for his being a merciful God. So have you treated that attribute of God's mercy! How just is it therefore that you never should have any benefit of that attribute!

There is something peculiarly heinous in sinning against the mercy of God more than other attributes. There is such base and horrid ingratitude, in being the worse to God because he is a being of infinite goodness and grace, that it above all things renders wickedness vile and detestable. This ought to win us, and engage us to serve God better; but instead of that, to sin against him the more, has something inexpressibly bad in it, and does in a peculiar manner enhance guilt, and incense wrath; as seems to be intimated, Romans 2:4, 5. "Or despisest thou the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and long-suffering; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? But after thy hardness and impenitent heart, treasurest up unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God."

The greater the mercy of God is, the more should you be engaged to love him, and live to his glory. But it has been contrariwise with you; the consideration of the mercies of God being so exceeding great, is the thing wherewith you have encouraged yourself in sin. You have heard that the mercy of God was without bounds, that it was sufficient to pardon the greatest sinner, and you have upon that very account ventured to be a very great sinner. Though it was very offensive to God, though you heard that God infinitely hated sin, and that such practices as you went on in were exceeding contrary to his nature, will, and glory, yet that did not make you uneasy; you heard that he was a very merciful God, and had grace enough to pardon you, and so cared not how offensive your sins were to him. How long have some of you gone on in sin, and what great sins have some of you been guilty of, on that presumption! Your own conscience can give testimony to it, that this has made you refuse God's calls, and has made you regardless of his repeated commands. Now, how righteous would it be if God should swear in his wrath, that you should never be the better for his being infinitely merciful!

Your ingratitude has been the greater, that you have not only abused the attribute of God's mercy, taking encouragement from it to continue in sin, but you have also presumed that God would exercise infinite mercy to you in particular; which consideration should have especially endeared God to you. You have taken encouragement to sin the more, from that consideration, that Christ came into the world and died to save sinners; such thanks has Christ had from you, for enduring such a tormenting death for his enemies! Now, how justly might God refuse that you should ever be the better for his Son's laying down his life! It was because of these things that you put off seeking salvation. You would take the pleasures of sin still longer, hardening yourself because mercy was infinite, and it would not be too late, if you sought it afterwards; now, how justly may God disappoint you in this, and so order it that it shall be too late!

Indeed it would not become the glory of God's majesty to show mercy to you, so sinful and vile a creature, for anything that you have done; for such worthless and despicable things as your prayers, and other religious performances. It would be very dishonourable and unworthy of God so to do, and it is in vain to expect it. He will show mercy only on Christ's account; and that, according to his sovereign pleasure, on whom he pleases, when he pleases, and in what manner he pleases. You cannot bring him under obligation by your works; do what you will, he will not look on himself obliged. But if it be his pleasure, he can honourably show mercy through Christ to any sinner of you all, not one in this congregation excepted.

History of Redemption, pg 581

Is it any wonder, then, that a self-righteous spirit is so represented in Scripture, and spoken of, as that which is most fatal to the souls of men? And is it any wonder, that Christ is represented in Scripture as being so provoked with the Pharisees and others, who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and were proud of their goodness, and thought that their own performances were a valuable price of God's favour and love?

Let persons hence be warned against a self-righteous spirit. You that are seeking salvation, and taking pains in religion, take heed to yourselves that you do not trust in what you do. Harbour no such thoughts, that God now, seeing how much you are reformed, how you are sometimes affected, will be pacified towards you, and will not be so angry for your former sins; that you shall gain on him by such things, and draw his heart to show you mercy. If you entertain the thought, that God is obliged to do it, and does not act justly if he refuse to regard your prayers and pains; if you quarrel with God, and complain of him for not doing it, this shows what your opinion is of your own righteousness, namely, that it is a valuable price of salvation, and ought to be accepted of God as such. Such complaining of God, and quarrelling with him, for not taking more notice of your righteousness, plainly shows that you are guilty of arrogance, thinking yourself sufficient to offer the price of your own salvation.

Excellent discourse on moral inability as not excuse for non compliance to God's commands and invitations in answer to the common objection that God is not sincere in his offers of the Gospel to those he knows will not repent.

On Freedom of the Will

Part III, Section IV

Pg 50-51

III. Though the opposition of the Will itself, or the very want of Will to a thing commanded, implies a moral inability to that thing; yet, if it be, as has been already shown, that the being of a good state or act of will, is a thing most properly required by Command; then, in some cases, such a state or act of Will may properly be required, which at present is not, and which may also be wanting after it is commanded. And therefore those things may properly be commanded, for which men have a moral Inability.

Such a state or act of the Will, may be required by Command, as does not already exist. For if that volition only may be commanded to be, which already is, there could be no use of precept: Commands in all cases would be perfectly vain and impertinent. [So, regarding conversion, why would God command or invite one to believe the gospel if he already has saving faith; it's impertinent.] And not only may such a Will be required, as is wanting before the Command is given, but also such as may possibly be wanting afterwards; such as the exhibition of the Command may not be effectual to produce or excite. Otherwise, no such thing as disobedience to a proper and rightful Command is possible in any case; and there is no case possible, wherein there can be a faulty disobedience. Which Arminians cannot affirm, consistently with their principle: for this makes obedience to just and proper Commands always necessary, and disobedience impossible. And so the Arminian would overthrow himself, yielding the very point we are upon, which he so strenuously denies, viz. that Law and Command are consistent with necessity.

If merely that Inability will excuse disobedience, which is implied in the opposition or defect of inclination, remaining after the Command is exhibited, then wickedness always carries that in it which excuses it. By how much the more wickedness there is in a man's heart, by so much is his inclination to evil the stronger, and by so much the more, therefore, has he of moral Inability to the good required. His moral Inability consisting in the strength of his evil inclination, is the very thing wherein his wickedness consists; and yet, according to Arminian principles, it must be a thing inconsistent with wickedness; and by how much the more he has of it, by so much is he the further from wickedness.

Therefore, on the whole, it is manifest, that moral Inability alone (which consists in disinclination) never renders anything improperly the subject matter of Precept or Command, and never can excuse any person in disobedience, or want of conformity to a command.

Natural Inability, arising from the want of natural capacity, or external hindrance, (which alone is properly called Inability,) without doubt wholly excuses, or makes a thing improperly the matter of Command. If men are excused from doing or acting any good thing, supposed to be commanded, it must be through some defect or obstacle that is not in the Will itself, but either in the capacity of understanding, or body, or outward circumstances.— Here two or three things may be observed,

1. As to spiritual acts, or any good thing in the state or imminent acts of the will itself, or of the affections, (which are only certain modes of the exercise of the Will,) if persons are justly excused, it must be through want of capacity in the natural faculty of understanding. Thus the same spiritual duties, or holy affections and exercises of heart, cannot be required of men, as may be of angels; the capacity of understanding being so much inferior. So men cannot be required to love those amiable persons, whom they have had no opportunity to see, or hear of, or know in any way agreeable to the natural state and capacity of the human understanding. But the insufficiency of motives will not excuse; unless their being insufficient arises not from the moral state of the Will or inclination itself, but from the state of the natural understanding. The great kindness and generosity of another may be a motive insufficient to excite gratitude in the person that receives the kindness, through his vile and ungrateful temper: in this case, the insufficiency of the motive arises from the state of the Will or inclination of heart, and does not at all excuse. But if this generosity is not sufficient to excite gratitude, being unknown, there being no means of information adequate to the state and measure of the person's faculties, this insufficiency is attended with a natural Inability, which entirely excuses it.

2. As to such motions of body, or exercises and alterations of mind, which do not consist in the imminent acts or state of the Will itself — but are supposed to be required as effects of the will, in cases wherein there is no want of a capacity of understanding that inability, and that only, excuses, which consists in want of connexion between them and the Will. If the will fully complies, and the proposed effect does not prove, according to the laws of nature, to be connected with his volition, the man is perfectly excused; he has a natural Inability to the thing required. For the Will itself, as has been observed, is all that can be directly and immediately required by Command; and other things only indirectly, as connected with the Will. If therefore, there be a full compliance of Will, the person has done his duty; and if other things do not prove to be connected with his volition, that is not criminally owing to him.

Next, is a very good point on this subject of commands and invitations; Arminians accuse Calvinists that God's invitation to eternal life to those he knows will not believe, is insincere; that he invites those to eternal life knowing that they are reprobate and will not repent. Edwards answers this below. But also, Edwards explains in another discourse, this is no different than God's threatenings to believers lest they perish knowing that they will not be perish (this is a means to excite one to obedience); or as Paul says in 1Cor9:27, "But I discipline my body and bring it into subjection, lest, when I have preached to others, I myself should become disqualified." knowing certainly that he will not be.

3. Both these kinds of natural Inability, and all Inability that excuses, may be resolved into one thing; namely, want of natural capacity or strength; either capacity of understanding, or external strength. For when there are external defects and obstacles, they would be no obstacles, were it not for the imperfection and limitations of understanding and strength.

Corol. If things for which men have a moral Inability may properly be the matter of Precept or Command, then they may also of invitation and counsel. Commands and invitations come very much to the same thing; the difference is only circumstantial: Commands are as much a manifestation of the will of him that speaks, as invitations, and as much testimonies of expectation of compliance. The difference between them lies in nothing that touches the affair in hand. The main difference between Command and invitation consists in the enforcement of the Will of him who commands or invites. In the latter it is his kindness, the goodness from which his Will arises: in the former it is his authority. But whatever be the ground of Will in him that speaks, or the enforcement of what he says, yet, seeing neither his Will, nor his expectation, is any more testified in the one case than the other; therefore, a person being directed by invitation, is no more an evidence of insincerity in him that directs — in manifesting either a Will or expectation which he has not — than a person being known to be morally unable to do what he is directed by command is an evidence of insincerity. So that all this grand objection of Arminians against the Inability of fallen men to exert faith in Christ, or to perform other spiritual duties, from the sincerity of God's counsels and invitations, must be without force.

God Is Not A Debtor

No man can do anything to merit eternal life. Grace must be freely given or else it is not grace but a debt owed to man, Romans 11:6, But if it is by grace, it is no longer on the basis of works; otherwise grace would no longer be grace. And Romans 11:35, “For who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been his counselor?” ³⁵ “Or who has given a gift to him that he might be repaid?”

Pg 68 Chap. IV

Here, likewise, is matter of reproof to such as seek to come out of this misery from and by themselves [e.g., by a prayer or other sacramental work]. If they be ignorant, they hope to be saved by their good meaning and prayers. If civil, by paying all they owe, and doing as they would be done by, and by doing nobody any harm. If they be troubled about their estates, then they lick themselves whole by their mourning, repenting, and reforming. O, poor stubble, can you stand before this consuming fire without sin? Can you make yourself a Christ for yourself? Can you bear and come from under an infinite wrath? Can you bring in perfect righteousness into the presence of God? This Christ must do, else he could not satisfy and redeem. And if you can not do thus, and have no Christ, desire and pray that heaven and earth shake till you have worn your tongue to the stumps; endeavor as much as you can, and others commend thee for a diligent Christian; mourn in some wilderness till doomsday; dig your grave there with thy nails; weep buckets full of hourly tears, till you can weep no more; fast and pray till your skin and bones cleave together; promise and purpose with full resolution to be better; nay, reform your head, heart, life, and tongue, and some, nay, all sins; live like an angel; shine like a sun; walk up and down the world like a distressed pilgrim going to another country, so that all Christians commend and admire thee; die ten thousand deaths; lie at the fire back in hell so many millions of years as there be piles of grass on the earth, or sands upon the sea shore, or stars in heaven, or motes in the sun; I tell you, not one spark of God's wrath against your sin shall be, can be, quenched by all these duties, nor by any of these sorrows, or tears; for these are not the blood of Christ. Nay, if all the angels and saints in heaven and earth should pray for you, these cannot deliver you, for they are not the blood of Christ. Nay, God, as a Creator, having made a law, will not forgive one sin without the blood of Christ; nay, Christ's blood will not do it neither, if you do join never so little that you have or do unto Jesus Christ, and make yourself or any of thy duties copartners with Christ in that great work of saving thee. Cry out, therefore, as that blessed martyr did, None but Christ, none but Christ.

But I pray, and that often.

This you may do, and yet never be saved. (Isa. 1:11.) To what purpose is your multitude of sacrifices? Nay, thou mayest pray with much affection, with a good heart, as you think, yet a thousand miles off from being saved. (Prov. 1:8.)

But I fast sometimes, as well as pray.

So did the scribes and Pharisees, even twice a week, which could not be public, but private fasts. And yet this righteousness could never save them.

But I hear the word of God, and like the best preachers.

This you may do too, and yet never be saved. Nay, you may so hear, as to receive much joy and comfort in hearing, nay, to believe and catch hold on Christ, and so say and think he is thine, and yet not be saved; as the stony ground did, (Matt, 13), who heard the word with joy, and for a season believed.

I read the Scriptures often.

This you may do too, and yet never be saved; as the Pharisees, who were so perfect in reading the Bible, that Christ needed but only say, "It hath been said of old time;" for they knew the text and place well enough without intimation.

But I am grieved and am sorrowful, and repent for my sins past.

Judas did thus, (Matt, 27:3); he repents himself with a legal repentance for fear of hell, and with a natural sorrow for dealing so unkindly with Christ, in betraying not only blood, but innocent blood. True humiliation is ever accompanied with hearty reformation.

O, but I love good men and their company.

So did the five foolish virgins love the company, and (at the time of extremity) the very oil and grace of the wise; yet they were locked out of the gates of mercy.

But God hath given me more knowledge than others, or than I myself had once.

This you may have, and be able to teach others, and think so of yourself too, and yet never be saved.

But I keep the Lord's day strictly.

So did the Jews, whom yet Christ condemned, and were never saved.

I have very many good desires and endeavors to get to heaven.

These you and thousands may have, and yet miss of heaven.

Many shall seek to enter in at that narrow gate, and not be able.

True, you will say, Many men do many duties, but without any life or zeal; I am zealous.

So you may be, and yet never be saved, as Jehu. Paul was zealous when he was a Pharisee, and if he was so for a false religion, and a bad cause, why, much more may you be for a good cause; so zealous as not only to cry out against profaneness in the wicked, but civil honesty of others, and hypocrisy of others, yea, even of the coldness of the best of God's people; you may be the fore horse in the team, and the ringleader of good exercises amongst the best men, (as Joash, a wicked king, was the first that complained of the negligence of his best officers in not repairing the temple,) and so stir them up unto it; nay, you may be so forward as to be persecuted, and not yield an inch, nor shrink in the wetting, but may manfully and courageously stand it out in time of persecution, as the thorny ground did: so zealous you may be, as to like best of and to flock most unto the most zealous preachers, that search men's consciences best, as the whole country of Judea came flocking to John's ministry, and delighted to hear him for a season; nay, you may be zealous as to take sweet delight in doing of all these things. (Isa. 58:2, 3,) "They delight in approaching near unto God," yet come short of heaven.

But thou will say, True, many a man rides post that breaks his neck at last; many a man is zealous, but his fire is soon quenched, and his zeal is soon spent; they hold not out; whereas I am constant, and persevere in godly courses. So did that young man; yet he was a graceless man. (Matt. xix. 20,) "All these things have I done from my youth; what lack I yet?"

It is true, hypocrites may persevere; but they know themselves to be naught all the while, and so deceive others; but I am persuaded that I am in God's favor, and in a safe and happy estate, since I do all with a good heart for God. This you may verily think of yourself, and yet be deceived and damned, and go to the devil at last. "There is a way," says Solomon, "that seems right to a man, but the end thereof is the way of death." For he is a hypocrite not only that makes a seeming outward show of what he has not, but also that hath a true show of what indeed there is not. The first sort of hypocrites deceive others only; the latter, having some inward yet common work, deceive themselves too. (James i. 26,) "If any man seem to be religious," (so many are, and so deceive the world;) but it is added, "deceiving his own soul." Way, you may go so fairly, and live so honestly, that all the best Christians about you may think well of you and never suspect you, and so may pass through the world, and die with a deluded comfort that you shall go to heaven and be canonized for a saint in thy funeral sermon, and never know you are counterfeit till the Lord brings thee to thy strict and last examination, and so you receive that dreadful sentence, "Go, ye cursed." So it was with the five foolish virgins, that were never discovered by the wise, nor by themselves, until the gate of grace was shut upon them. If you have, therefore, no better evidences to show for thyself, that your estate is good, than these, I will not give a pin's point for all your nattering false hopes of being saved. But it may be you have never yet come so far as to this pitch; and if not, Lord, what will become of thee? Suspect yourself much, and when, in this shipwreck of souls, you see so many thousands sink, cry out, and conclude, It is a wonder of wonders, and a thousand and a thousand to one, if ever you come safe to shore.

O, strive, then, to be one of them that shall be saved, though it cost you your blood and the loss of all that you have; labor to go beyond all those that go so far and yet perish at the last. Do not say that, seeing so few shall be saved, therefore this discourages me from seeking, because all my labor may be in vain. Consider that Christ here makes another and a better use of it. (Luke iii 21.) Seeing that "many shall seek and not enter, therefore," saith he, "strive to enter in at the strait gate." Venture, at least, and try what the Lord will do for thee. Wherein doth the child of God, and so how may I, go beyond these hypocrites that go so far?

In three things principally.

First. No unregenerate man, though he go never so far, let him do never so much, but he lives in some one sin or other, secret or open, little or great. Judas went far, but he was covetous. Herod went far, but he loved his Herodias. Every dog hath his kennel; every swine has his swill, and every wicked man his lust. For no unregenerate man has fruition of God to content him, and there is no man's heart but it must have some good to content it; which good is to be found only in the fountain of all good, and that is God, or in the cistern, and that is in the creatures. Hence, a man having lost full content in God, he seeks for and feeds upon contentment in the creature which he makes a god to him; and here lies his lust or sin, which he must needs live in. Hence, ask those men that go very far, and take their penny for good silver, and commend themselves for their good desires — I say, ask them if they have no sin. Yes, say they; who can live without sin? And so they give way to sin, and therefore live in sin. Nay, commonly, all the duties, prayers, care, and zeal of the best hypocrites are to hide a lust, as the whore in the Proverbs, that wipes her mouth, and goes to the temple, and pays her vows; or to feed a lust, as Jehu his zeal against Baal was to get a kingdom. There remains a root of bitterness in the best hypocrites, which, howsoever it be lopped off sometimes by sickness or horror of conscience, and a man hath purposes never to commit again, yet there it secretly lurks; and, though it seems to be bound and conquered by the word, or by prayer, or by outward crosses, or while the hand of God is upon a man, yet the inward strength and power of it remains still; and therefore, when temptations, like strong Philistines, are upon this man again, he breaks all vows, promises, bonds of God, and will save the life of his sin.

Secondly. No unregenerate man or woman ever came to be poor in spirit, and so to be carried out of all duties unto Christ. If it were possible for them to forsake and break loose forever from all sin, yet here they stick, as the scribes and Pharisees; and so, like zealous Paul before his conversion, they fasted and prayed, and kept the Sabbath, but they rested in their legal righteousness, and in the performance of these and the like duties. Take the best hypocrite, that has the most strong persuasions of God's love to him, and ask him why he hopes to be saved. He will answer, I pray, read, hear, love good men, cry out of the sins of the time. And tell him again that a hypocrite may climb these stairs and go as far, he will reply, True, indeed; but they do not what they do with a sound heart, but to be seen of men. Mark, now, how these men feel a good heart in themselves and in all things they do; and therefore feel not a want of all good, which is poverty of spirit; and therefore here they fall short. (Is. lxvi. 2.) There were many hypocrites forward for the worship of God in the temple; but God loathes these, because not poor in spirit; to them only, it is said, the Lord will look. I have seen many professors very forward for all good duties, but as ignorant of Christ, when they are sifted, as blocks. And if a man (as few do) know not Christ, he must rest in his duties, because he knows not Christ, to whom he must go and be carried if ever he be saved. I have heard of a man that, being condemned to die, thought to escape the gallows, and to save himself from hanging, by a certain gift he said he had of whistling. So men seek to save themselves by their gifts of knowledge, gifts of memory, gifts of prayer; and when they see they must die for their sins, this is the ruin of many a soul, that, though he forsake Egypt and his sins and flesh pots there, and will never be so as he has been, yet he never comes into Canaan, but loses himself and his soul in a wilderness of many duties, and there perisheth.

Thirdly. If any unregenerate man come unto Christ, he never gets into Christ, that is, never takes his eternal rest and lodging in Jesus Christ only. (Heb. 6:4-5) Judas followed Christ for the bag; he would have the bag and Christ too. The young man came unto Christ to be his disciple; but he would have Christ and the world too. They will not content them-selves with Christ alone, nor with the world alone, but make their markets out of both, like whorish wives, that will please their husbands and others too. Men in distress of conscience, if they have comfort from Christ, they are contented; if they have salvation from hell by Christ, they are contented; but Christ himself contents them not. Thus far a hypocrite goes not. So much for the first doctrine observed out of the text. I come now to the second.

<https://thepuritans.files.wordpress.com/2009/12/flavel-vol-2.pdf>

The following excerpts from John Flavel show the necessity of our dependence upon Christ either for natural sustenance (in him we live and move and have our being, Acts 17:28, or for spiritual strength, for without Me you can do nothing, John 15:45. This will shed light on the main difference between the Old Covenant or the Covenant of Works under which Adam was (Adam being the federal head of all mankind), and the New Covenant or the Covenant of Grace in which the remnant or elect are promised a surety, righteousness and a continual supplies of grace to prevent any fall again, we are kept by the power of God (1Pet1:5). The whole purpose of this was to show man's nothingness compared to the infinite glory of God; actually, to display God glory, the ultimate end in the creation of the universe; that God's glory and especially, Christ, would be preeminent (Col. 1:18); that man of himself is insufficient, "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think of anything as being from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God," (2Cor 3:5).

Sixthly, The same power which created the world, still underprops and supports it in its being: the world owes its conservation, as well as its existence, to the power of God, without which it could not subsist one moment. Just so it is with the new creation, which entirely depends upon the preserving power, which first formed it, Jude ver. 1. "Preserved in Christ Jesus," and 1 Pet. i. 5. "Who are kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation." As in a natural way "we live, move, and have our being in God," Acts xvii. 28, so in a spiritual way, we continue believing, repenting, loving, and delighting in God; without whose continued influence upon our souls, we could do neither.

p 322-23 First use for information.

Inference 1. How notoriously false and absurd is that doctrine which asserts the possibility of believing without the efficacy of supernatural grace? The desire of self-sufficiency was the ruin of Adam, and the conceit of self-sufficiency is the ruin of multitudes of his posterity. This doctrine is not only contradictory to the current stream of scripture, Phil. ii. 13, 1 John 1:13, with many other scriptures; but it is also contradictory to the common sense and experience of believers; yet the pride of nature will strive to maintain what scripture and experience plainly contradict and overthrow.

5. The necessity of saving grace in all sufferers for Christ, will farther appear from this consideration, that he who will run all hazards for Christ, had need of a continual supply of strength and refreshment from time to time. He must not depend on anything that is failable; for what shall he do then when that stock is spent, and he hath no provision left to live upon? Now all natural qualifications, yea, all the common gifts of the Spirit, are failable and short-lived things; they are like a sweet flower in the bosom, that is an ornament for a little while, but withers presently. Or like a pond or brook occasioned by a great fall of rain, which quickly sinks and dries up, because it is not fed by springs in the bottom, as other fountain-waters are; and hence it is they cannot continue and hold out when sufferings come, Mat. 13:21, because there is no root to nourish and support. The hypocrite will not always call upon God, Job 27:10. Though they may keep company with Christ a few miles in this dirty way, yet they must turn back at last, and shake hands eternally with him, John 6:66. These comets may seem to shine for a time among the stars, but when that earthly matter is spent, they must fall and lose their glory. But now grace is an everlasting principle, it hath springs in the bottom that never fail, "I shall be in him (saith Christ) a well of water springing up into eternal life," John 4:14. The Spirit of God supplies it from time to time, as need requires. It hath daily incomes from heaven, 2 Cor. 1:5, Phil. 4:13, Col. 1:11. So that it is our union with Christ, the Fountain of grace, that is the true ground of our constancy and long suffering. pg 29 Vol. VI

It is true, that our ability to stand is not from our own inherent grace; "For by his strength shall no man prevail," 1 Sam. 2:9. And yet it is as true, that without grace, both inherent in us, and excited and prepared for a storm, we cannot expect to stand; for these two, grace inherent in us, and grace exciting and assisting without are not opposed, but co-ordinated. Grace in us, is the weapon by which our enemy falls; but then that weapon must be managed by the hand of the Spirit. Well then, look upon this as a choice mercy, which tends so much to your stability. Pg 23, Vol. VI

code126 code257

Fountain of Life \(Vol. 1\) by John Flavel, Sermon 28

<http://www.ccel.org/ccel/flavel/fountain.v.xxviii.html>

Little reason have the best of saints to depend upon their inherent grace, let their stock be as large as it will. The angels left to themselves, quickly left their own habitations, Jude 6. Upon which, one well observes, That the best of created perfections, are of themselves defectible. Every excellency without the prop of divine preservation, is but a weight which tends to a fall. The angels in their innocence, were but frail, without God's sustentation; even grace itself is but a creature, and therefore purely dependant. It is not from its being and nature, but from the assistance of something without it, that it is kept from annihilation. What becomes of the stream, if the fountain supply it not? What continuance has the reflection in the glass, if the man that looks into it, turn away his face? The constant supplies of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, are the food and fuel of all our graces. The best men will show themselves but men if God leave them. He who has set them up, must also keep them. It is safer to be humble with one talent, than proud with ten; yea, better to be an humble worm, than a proud angel. Adam had more advantage to maintain his station than any of you. For though he were left to the liberty of his own mutable and self-determining will; and though he was created upright, and had no inherent corruption to endanger him, yet he fell.

And shall we be self confident, after such instances of human frailty! Alas, Christian! What match art thou for principalities and powers, and spiritual wickedness! “Be not high-minded, but fear.” When you have considered well the example of Noah, Lot, David, and Hezekiah, men famous and renowned in their generations, who all fell by temptations; yea, and that when one would think they had never been better provided to cope with them. Lot fell after, yea, presently after the Lord had thrust him out of Sodom, and his eyes had seen the direful punishment of sin. Hell, as it were, rained upon them out of heaven. Noah, in like manner, immediately after God’s wonderful, and astonishing preservation of him in the ark; when he saw a world of men and women, perishing in the floods for their sins. David, after the Lord had settled the kingdom on him, which for sin he rent from Saul, and given him rest in his house. Hezekiah was but just up from a great sickness, wherein the Lord wrought a wonderful salvation for him. Did such men, and at such times, when one would think no temptations should have prevailed, fall; and that so foully? Then “let him that thinks he standeth, take heed lest he fall.” O be not high minded, but fear.*

Inference 2. Did Christ stand his ground, and go through with his suffering-work, when all that had followed him, forsook him? Then a resolved adherence to God, and duty, though left alone, without company or encouragement, is Christ-like, and truly excellent. You shall not want better company than that which has forsaken you in the way of God. Elijah complains, 1 Kings 19: 10 “They have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword; and I, even I only, am left, and they seek my life, to take it away” And yet all this did not damp or discourage him in following the Lord; for still he was very jealous for the Lord God of Hosts.

Paul complains, 2 Tim 4: 16 “At my first answer no man stood by me, all men forsook me: nevertheless the Lord stood with me.” And as the Lord stood by him, so he stood by his God alone, without any aids or support from men. How great an argument of integrity is this! He that professes Christ for company, will also leave him for company. But to be faithful to God, when forsaken of men; to be a Lot, in Sodomy a Noah, in a corrupted generation; oh, how excellent is it! It is sweet to travel over this earth to heaven, in the company of the saints, that are bound it thither with us, if we can; but if we can meet no company, we must not be discouraged to go on. It is not unlike, but before you have gone many steps farther, you may have cause to say, as one did once, Never less alone, than when alone.

Inference 3. Did the disciples thus forsake Christ, and yet were all recovered at last? Then, though believers are not privileged from backsliding, yet they are secured from final apostasy and ruin. The new creature may be sick, it cannot die. Saints may fall, but they shall rise again, Micah 7: 8. The highest flood, of natural zeal and resolution, may ebb, and be wholly dried up; but saving grace is “a well of water, still springing up into everlasting life,” John 4: 14. God’s unchangeable election, the frame and constitution of the New Covenant, the meritorious and prevalent intercession of Jesus Christ, do give the believer abundant security against the danger of a total and final apostasy. “My Father, which gave them me, saith Christ, is greater than all: and none is able to pluck them out of my Father’s hand,” John 10: 29.

And again, “The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal; the Lord knoweth who are his,” 2 Tim. 2: 19. Every person committed to Christ by the Father, shall be brought by him to the Father, and not one wanting.

God has also so framed and ordered the new covenant, that none of those souls, who are within the blessed clasp and bond of it can possibly be lost. It is settled upon immutable things: and we know all things are as their foundations be, Heb. 6: 18, 19. Among the many glorious promises contained in the bundle of promises, this is one, “I will not turn away from them, to do them good; but I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me.”

And as the fear of God in our hearts, pleads in us against sin, so our potent intercessor in the heavens pleads for us with the Father; and by reason thereof, we cannot finally miscarry, Rom. 8: 34, 35. Upon these grounds, we may (as the apostle in the place last cited does) triumph in that full security which God has given us; and say, What “shall separate us from the love of God?” Understand it either of God’s to us, as Calvin, Beza, and Martyr do; or of our love to God, as Ambrose and Augustine do: it is true in both senses, and a most comfortable truth.

Inference 4. Did the sheep fly, when the shepherd was smitten; such men, and so many forsake Christ in the trial? Then learn how sad a thing it is for the best of men to be left to their own carnal fears in a day of temptation: This was it that made those good men shrink away so shamefully from Christ in that trial: "The fear of man brings a snare," Prov. 29: 25. In that snare these good souls were taken, and for a time held fast. Oh what work will this unruly passion make, if the fear of God do not over-rule it! Is it not a shame to a Christian, a man of faith to see himself out done by an Heathen? Shall natural conscience and courage make them stand and keep their places in times of danger; when we shamefully turn our backs upon duty, because we see duty and danger together?

When the emperor Vespasian had commanded Fluidius Priscus not to come to the senate; or, if he did, to speak nothing but what he would have him; the senator returned this brave and noble answer, "That as he was a senator, it was fit he should be at the senate; and if, being there, he were required to give his advice, he would speak freely, that which his conscience commanded him." The emperor threatening that then he should die; he returned thus, "Did I ever tell you that I was immortal? Do you what you will, and I will do what I ought. It is in your power to put me to death unjustly, and in me to die constantly." O think, what mischief you; fears may do yourselves, and the discovery of them to others. O learn to trust God with your lives, liberties, and comforts, in the way of your duty; and at that time you are afraid trust in him; and do not magnify poor dust and ashes, as to be scared, by their threat, from your God and your duty. The politic design of Satan herein, is to affright you out of your coverts, where you are safe, into the net. I will enlarge on this no farther; I have elsewhere laid down fourteen rules for the cure of this, in what of mine is public.

Inference 5. Learn hence, How much a man may differ from himself, according as the Lord is with him, or withdrawn from him. The Christian does not always differ from other men, but sometimes from himself also; yea, so great is the difference betwixt himself and himself, as if he were not the same man. And where is he that does not so experience it? Sometimes bold and courageous, despising dangers, bearing down all discouragements in the strength of zeal, and love to God: at another time faint, feeble, and discourage at every petty thing. Whence is this but from the different administrations of the Spirit, who sometimes gives forth more, and sometimes less, of his gracious influence. These very men that flinched now, when the Spirit was more abundantly shed forth upon them, could boldly own Christ before the council, and despised all dangers for his sake.

A little dog, if his master be by, and encourage him, will venture upon a greater beast than himself. Peter stood at the door without, when the other disciple, (or one of the other disciples, as the Syrian turns it, and Grotius approves it as the best), i.e. one of the private disciples that lived at Jerusalem, went in so boldly, John 18: 16, 17. We are strong or weak, according to the degrees of assisting grace. So that as you cannot take the just measure of a Christian by one act, so neither must they judge of themselves, by what they sometimes feel in themselves.

But when their spirits are low, and their hearts discouraged, they should rather say to their souls, "Hope in God, for I shall yet praise him:" It is low with me now, but it will be better.

pg 154 vol. 2 Method of Grace, Flavel

How securely is the saints inheritance settled upon them, seeing they are in common with Jesus Christ f Christ and his saints are joint-heirs, and the inheritance cannot be alienated but by his consent; he must lose his interest, if you lose yours. Indeed Adam's inheritance was by a single title, and moreover, it was in his own hand, and so he might, (as indeed he soon did) divest himself and his posterity of it, but it is not so betwixt Christ and believers; we are secured in our inheritance by Christ our co-heir, who will never alienate it; and therefore it was truly observed by the father, Job was happier upon the dunghill, than Adam was in paradise. The covenant of grace is certainly the best tenure, as it hath the best mercies, so it gives the fullest security to enjoy them.

from Method of Grace, (Vol. 2) p349 John Flavel:

Sixthly, The same power which created the world, still underprops and supports it in its being; the world owes its conservation, as well as its existence, to the power of God, without which it could not subsist one moment. Just so it is with the new creation, which entirely depends upon the preserving power, which first formed it; Jude ver. 1. "Preserved in Christ Jesus," and 1 Pet. 1:5. "Who are kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation." As in a natural way "we live, move, and have our being in God," Acts 17:28, so in a spiritual way, we continue believing, repenting, loving, and delighting in God; without whose continued influence upon our souls, we could do neither. [And that's why Adam fell; all his perseverance depended upon him and not God, which is the whole point of the bible; for my namesake says God! for my glory!]

My note:

Here is a statement that I heard on the Ben Shapiro Show this morning that sums up original sin, man's depravity: his pride, self-reliance, self-righteousness, addictedness to his own will, practical atheism, and an Arminian/Pelagian bent:

"Man was born on third base, and he thinks he hit a triple."

This is so true! Now you can get a clearer sense of our miserable, self-deceived condition as we are born into the world.

This will give you more depth of understanding God's sovereignty over all things including sin and its use for God's glory. Bavinck explains that it occurs not by mere permission but by God's will. He also mentions that man, and in fact all things created are mutable, and in the case of man, defectible as Adam was, even having been created righteous and holy. Also included are comments on the image of God and God's glory.

Sin and the Will of God

Reformed Dogmatics

Not Mere "Permission"

Christian theology, for that matter, when speaking of God's government over sin, never stopped with the idea of permission. For if both Scripture and Christian thought forbade placing sin completely or partly outside the will and providence of God, a solution could only be attempted by making a distinction in the manner of God's government over the good and over the evil. And indeed, though in a sense it can be said that God willed sin, that is, he willed that there would be sin, he willed evil in a totally different sense than good. He takes delight in the good but hates evil with divine hatred. In order that this difference in God's government may stand out, we need first of all to point out that God and humanity, though never separate, are nevertheless always distinct. Faith is a gift. God causes people to believe; still, formally speaking, it is not God who believes, but the human being. This applies even more intensely to the sinful deed. Materially, certainly, this must be attributed to God, but formally it remains the responsibility of human beings. When a murderer kills somebody, all the planning ability and the power he needs for that purpose come from God, but the act, from a formal point of view, is his, not God's. Indeed, the fact of homicide taken by itself is not yet a sin, for the same thing frequently occurs in war and on the scaffold. What makes homicide a sin is not the matter, the substrate, but the form, that is, the depravity, the lawlessness (ἀνομία) of the deed; not the substance but the accident in the act.[99]

Lodged against this view is the objection that this distinction, even though correct, actually makes no difference because it places the formal aspect of the deed, the sinfulness in the sin, outside God's government.[100] This comment is only partly correct: it contains truth, not in general but in this particular case as it pertains to sin. In respect of faith, no one will infer from the fact that humans are the formal subject of it that it therefore lies outside God's providence. But it is true that, in the case of faith, things are very different than in the case of sin. Faith, after all, is an absolute gift and excludes all merit; sin, by contrast, is a human deed and carries guilt with it. Consequently, sin here must be opposed not to faith, which is given by God out of grace, but to the good that humans would have done had they not fallen. That good, materially speaking, would have been totally the work of God; formally, however, human beings would be the subject of it, and for them it would have carried with it—not of itself but in virtue of the covenant of works—a claim to reward. Now, sin is no more situated outside God's providence than the good, on the ground that it formally has humanity, not God, as subject.

Yet there is more. In the case of the good, God's providence must be understood as God himself by his Spirit working in the subject and positively enabling this subject to do good. [e.g., Isa. 26:12] In the case of sin, it may not be pictured that way. Sin is lawlessness, deformity, and does not have God as its efficient cause, but at most as its deficient cause. Light cannot of itself produce darkness; the darkness only arises when the light is withdrawn. God, therefore, is at most the negative or incidental cause of sin; its real and positive cause is located in human beings. However, because sin is merely a form and not a substance, it is in no way placed outside God's providence by being formally a human act. He impacts it in a way that completely corresponds to the nature of sin. Just as in his providence he governs all things in keeping with their nature, so in the domain of morality God also upholds the ordinances he has established specifically for that domain. Sin also arises and develops in accordance with a fixed law, not the laws of nature or of logic but those that are increaded in the ethical life and are still operative in its destruction. Sickness, decomposition, and death are the antipodes of health, development, and life, but are no less than these controlled from beginning to end by fixed laws. In the same way, there is a law of sin that determines its entire history both in individuals and in humanity as a whole. And precisely this normativity in sin proves that God's kingdom governs in and over it as well. People who sin do not make themselves free and independent of God; on the contrary, though they were sons and daughters before, they are now slaves. Those who commit sin become the slaves of sin.[101]

Possibility of Sin as God's Will

By the distinction of the material and the normal aspect of sin, however, we have not yet [in any way] answered the question why God included sin in his decree and its execution. The answer is implied in the providence of God as it also pertains to sin. Scripture repeatedly states that God uses sin as punishment of the wicked (Deut. 2:30; Josh. 11:20; Judg. 9:23–24; John 12:40; Rom. 1:21–28; 2 Thess. 2:11–12), as a means of saving his people (Gen. 45:5; 50:20), to test and chastise believers (Job 1:11–12; 2 Sam. 24:1; 1 Cor. 10:13; 11:19; 2 Cor. 12:7), and to glorify his name (Exod. 7:3; Prov. 16:4;

Rom. 9:17; 11:33; etc.). Precisely because God is the absolutely Holy and Almighty One, he can use sin as a means in his hand. Creatures cannot do that; with the least contact, they themselves become polluted and impure. But God is so infinitely far removed from wickedness that he can make sin, as an unresisting instrument, subservient to his glorification. There are countless examples that prove that also in this connection “when two parties do the same thing, it is not the same.” It was God’s will that Shimei cursed David, that Satan tested Job, that Jews and Gentiles wanted to give up God’s holy servant Jesus to death—still in all these iniquities, human creatures are guilty and God is innocent. For even when he wants there to be evil, he only wants it in a way that is holy: though using it, he never commits it. And for that reason, he has also allowed sin in his creation. He would not have tolerated it had he not been able to govern it in an absolute holy and sovereign manner. He would not have put up with it if he were not God, the Holy and Omnipotent One. But being God, he did not fear its existence and its power. He willed it so that in it and against it he might bring to light his divine attributes. If he had not allowed it to exist, there would always have been a rationale for the idea that he was not in all his attributes superior to a power whose possibility was inherent in creation itself. For all rational creatures as creatures, as finite, limited, changeable beings, have the possibility of apostatizing. But God, because he is God, never feared the way of freedom, the reality of sin, the eruption of wickedness, or the power of Satan. So, both in its origin and its development, God always exercises his rule over sin. He does not force it, nor does he block it with violence but rather allows it to reach its full dynamic potential. He remains king yet still gives it free rein in his kingdom. He allows it to have everything—his world, his creatures, even his Anointed—for evils cannot exist without goods. He allows it to use all that is his; he gives it opportunity to show what it can do in order, in the end, as King of kings, to leave the theater of battle. For sin is of such a nature that it destroys itself by the very freedom granted it; it dies of its own diseases; it dooms itself to death. At the apex of its power, it is, by the cross alone, publicly shown up in its powerlessness (Col. 2:15).[102]

For that reason God willed there to be sin. “Although, therefore, what is evil, insofar as it is evil is not a good, nevertheless it is well that not only good but also evil should exist. For, were it not a good that evil things should also exist, the Omnipotent Good would most certainly not allow evil to be, since beyond doubt it is just as easy for Him not to allow what He does not will, as it is for Him to do what He wills. Unless we believe this, the very first sentence of our profession of faith is endangered, wherein we profess to believe in God the Father Almighty.”[103] Because he knew he was absolutely able to control sin, “he deemed it better to bring good out of evil than not to permit any evil to exist at all.”[104] He thinks and guides evil for good and makes it subservient to his glory. Augustine even employs an array of images to assign to sin a place in the order of the whole. There it has the same function as the shadows in a painting, the solecisms and barbarisms in the language, the contrasts in a song.[105] God composed the order of history, like a beautiful poem, of antithetical elements to heighten the beauty and harmony of the whole.[106] Though these images contain some truth, they easily occasion misunderstanding. They tend to make sin appear necessary and entirely fitting in the whole of things. They sacrifice the particular to the universal and as a result offer no reconciliation or solace to those who wrestle with sin or experience suffering. But it is true that also and even especially in God's government over sin his attributes are splendidly displayed. The riches of God's grace, the depth of his compassion, the unchanging nature of his faithfulness, the inviolable character of his justice, the glory of his wisdom and power have shone out all the more brilliantly as a result of sin. When humans broke the covenant of works, God replaced it with the greatly improved covenant of grace. When Adam fell, God gave Christ as Lord from heaven. It is precisely God's greatness to so rule and overrule sin that against its own genius and intent it becomes serviceable to the honor of his name. And therefore the sin that is in the world, so far from being able to rob us of our faith in God, his love, and his power, rather confirms and strengthens us in that faith. "If there is evil, there is a God. For there would be no evil, if the order of good were removed, the privation of which is evil; and there would be no such order, if there were no God." [107]

Although sin has thus been subject to God's government from the beginning, its origin is in the will of the rational creature, not in God. At this point, however, there immediately arises another problem. How can sin ever be explained in terms of the will of a being created after God's image in true knowledge, righteousness, and holiness? The Pelagian notion that the first human existed in a state of childlike innocence, of moral indifference, already proved unacceptable to us earlier; [108] it does not explain the fall but changes it into a minor misfortune and renders unintelligible the fact that from it such appalling consequences and horrendous miseries for the entire human race should result. If a spring can produce such a stream of polluted water, it must itself be inwardly polluted. It is impermissible, therefore, to so minimize the distance between the state of integrity and the state of corruption that the transition becomes easy and gradual. Humans were not created morally indifferent by God, but positively holy. Still we have to bear in mind the following as well. In the first place, God most certainly willed the possibility of sin. The possibility of sinning is from God. The idea of sin was first conceived in his mind. [109] God eternally conceived sin as his absolute polar opposite and thus, in that sense, included it in his decree, or else it would never have been able to arise and exist in reality. It was not Satan, nor Adam and Eve, who first conceived the idea of sin: God himself as it were made it visible to their eyes. By means of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil and the probationary command, he clearly showed human beings the two roads they could take. And before the fall he even permitted an evil power from without to insinuate itself into Paradise, using the snake as its medium, and to discuss with Eve the meaning of the probationary command. There is therefore no doubt that God willed the possibility of sin.

In the second place, in keeping with this objective possibility, God so created angels and humans that they could sin and fall. They did not yet possess the highest [gift];[110] they were placed at the beginning of the road, not the end. The gift of perseverance, which is and always remains a gift and can never really be merited and be part of the nature of a creature, was still denied to them. [Adam, in the covenant of works, did not have the promise of continual supplies of grace as new testament believers do in the covenant of grace so as not to fall and perish.] Otherwise it would have seemed as if God feared the power of sin and wanted to prevent it by force. Angels and humans, accordingly, received the grace by which they could stand, not the grace by which they would stand in perpetuity.[111] They did not yet possess the highest, inadmissible freedom, that is, the freedom of no longer being able to want to sin. The image of God in humanity was therefore still limited; it had not developed in all its fullness; it still had its limit in the possibility of sinning. Humanity was positioned in the good, but the possibility of evil still lay right alongside it. Human beings, though they walked on the right road, could stray onto a side road. They were good, but changeably so. God alone is fully existent in all his attributes and herefore immutable. Creatures, however, become and can therefore also degenerate. All that has been created can change (pan ktiston trepton). If matter and form are distinct, as is always the case in creatures, there is always a possibility that the matter can change its form. What has been formed can be deformed and hence again be reformed; what has been created can become a miscreant and hence also be re-created. Moral freedom, however vigorous, is inherently distinct from logical necessity and physical force. A creature naturally incapable of sin, therefore, is a contradiction.[112]

In the third place, in the question concerning the origin of sin the faculty and activity of the imagination must be considered. In earlier times dogmatians paid little attention to this subject, even though they were aware that in the case of humans temptation is first of all and primarily directed toward the imagination and thereby seeks to affect desire and the will.[113] In mysticism, however, the imagination played a large role. According to Böhme, it was by fantasy that Lucifer imagined himself into the abyss of sin; he dipped deeply into fantasy, so it took hold of him and surrendered itself to him in his life.[114] And in fact this is how things always go in the origination of the sinful act, as Thomas à Kempis describes it: “At first it is a mere thought confronting the mind; then imagination paints it in stronger colours; only after that do we take pleasure in it, and the will makes a false move, and we give our assent.”[115] The mind entertains the idea of sin, the imagination beautifies and converts it into a fascinating ideal, desire reaches out to it, and the will goes ahead and does it. Thus, in the case of both angels and humans, the imagination was the faculty that made the violation of the commandment appear as the road to equality with God.[116]

God’s Decree With Respect to Sin

Reformed Dogmatics by Geerhardus Vos

Pg 103-106

Code454

16. How does one designate God’s decree as it functions with respect to sin?

A permissive decree (decretum permissivum). This term has become accepted in Reformed dogmatics and is even found in most confessions. Our own [Belgic]

Confession, on the doctrine of providence (Article 13), says, “All our enemies cannot harm us without His permission and will.”

Here and there objection is made to this distinction. Beza states it is not difficult to show that it is completely misunderstood by some, in a way that removes the devils and evil men from God’s control except that He keeps their actions and the consequences of their actions within certain limits. Nevertheless, Beza also wishes to see the terms decernius and permissivum (decreeing and permitting will) maintained, provided that they are explained correctly.

Danaeus speaks more dismissively: “From this it follows that that sophistical distinction that one is accustomed to make between God’s permission and His decree ought to be abandoned, because what happens by God’s permission happens with His will and consequently by virtue of His decree.”

a) First, it should be observed that by permissive decree the Lutherans understand something entirely negative. By it they mean that God does not decree to prevent or hinder sin by a positive act. Thus, sin itself is fully present in God’s decree as sure and certain. Concerning it God has nothing more to decide. His permissive decreeing, taken strictly, means to say that He does not decree rather than that He certainly decrees not, namely, to counter sin. This, of course, is a wrong and inadequate view. It teaches that sin has its reality and certainty from man. The former is true, as we have seen; the latter cannot be conceded. For, as for all things, so also for sin, certainty must lie in the decree of God. A permissive decree cannot be a bare budding in our spirit.

b) Others understand the permissive character of God’s decree concerning sin more in another sense, namely as follows: God decrees in a positive manner that certain things will happen. However, sin as an unavoidable consequence adheres to these things that God decrees. Thus, if He wills these things, He must also permit sin. So, it comes down to this: God has permitted sin not for itself but because of its necessary connection with other things that He willed. Usually this is worked out further as follows: At issue above everything was the freedom of the human will, that man, therefore, should choose for himself what he wanted, good or evil. Thus, involved as well in this freedom, in this possibility of going in either direction, was the permitting of evil, of sin. This view is entirely unacceptable. It still makes only the possibility of sin an object of God’s decree, but not the certainty of sin. We must not only maintain that God tolerated that possibility but also that its certainty is the result of His permissive decree. It may not be thought as though God decreed to create man and then to wait on how the choice of man would turn out. That would be the Pelagian conditional decree applied to the situation of man before the fall. This view, then, is also completely at home within the orbit of Pelagian ideas.

c) There are different conceptions of God's permissive decree that do not really pertain to the decreeing act but more to its execution and so need not be discussed here—for example, the difference between the formal and the material in sin. This is a point that has its place in the doctrine of providence and not here. Although one would see this distinction as a solution, it is of no help here, for God's decree concerns both the formal and the material.

d) It is not possible to explain fully in a corroborating way how we are to think about God's permissive decree. We wish, in general, to maintain the following:

1. The permissive decree is no less a certain decree than any other. Any thought as though we can speak of hesitation or uncertainty in God must be excluded by far. God is certain in everything He decrees, and for all things their certainty is secure solely in the decree of God. Also sin, in order to be certain, must be through God's decree. The one who denies this deviates from Reformed doctrine. Just on this point lies the one great error of the church father Augustine, who wanted to make sin only an object of God's foreknowledge but not of God's decree. Calvin says as decisively as possible, "Man falls because God's providence has so ordained it, but he falls by his own fault" (Institutes, 1.18.4); "I acknowledge that it is a horrible decree. Still, no one can deny that God certainly has known how it would turn out with man and that therefore He has known because he has so foreordained it in His decree." "For the first man has fallen because the Lord judged that it ought to be so. Why He judged that remains hidden to us" (3.23.7, 8). But Calvin also lets the reverse come out, as we immediately hope to see.

2. As its object the permissive decree had sin in view as something contrary to God's holy nature and on which His displeasure must rest. To permit something always means that it arouses my disapproval. Therefore, because on the one hand sin is against God's holy nature, on the other hand there must have been considerations in God that nonetheless caused Him to decree to permit it. It is not granted to man to know these considerations in detail. It must be enough for us to know that through sin God knew to glorify Himself by His righteousness and His redeeming love.

3. By permitting sin in His decree God remains completely free of any wrong. Calvin: “The destruction of the godless depends on God’s decree such that the cause and nature of that destruction is to be sought in man himself.” “Through his own malevolence, man has corrupted the nature that he had received from his God.” “God could not have judged other than that man ought to fall, because He saw that thereby the honor of His name would properly come to light. And where one speaks of God’s honor, there His justice must immediately be in view, for what deserves praise, must be just.” Thus, according to Calvin, it is a just decree, both in its origin as in its content (cf. Institutes, 2.4.3–5, where Calvin goes much further than we would presume to and where in principle he rejects the permissive decree).

In the execution of this decree, too, there is nothing that can make God a cause of sin. On this point Scripture speaks as emphatically as possible. God tempts no one to evil (Jas 1:13). God is light and in Him there is no darkness (1 John 1:5). God made man upright, but they have sought out many schemes (Eccl 7:29). The Spirit of God teaches His children to praise all that is good as the work of God but also to ascribe blame for all that is evil only to themselves. This testimony of the Spirit in the believer, founded on God’s word, teaches us how this matter appears in God’s light, and we must believe it though that same light does not illumine our understanding.

The origin of sin, its nature, what is it, Gnostic ideas about it, man’s attempt to dominate it or overcome it and a correct understanding of “flesh” as opposed to the Gnostic/dualist view in relation to sin and its effects on the soul. And, lastly, is sin only an act of the will as Pelagius believes? Fascinating!

Evolving Out Of a Sinful Nature?

In the first category are those who locate the origin of sin in the domination of humans by matter. Greek philosophy was generally committed to the view that the role of reason was to curb one's sensual urges and passions. Jews assumed the existence in humans of an "impulse toward evil" (יצר הרע) that in the course of one's physical development steadily gained in strength, reached its peak in sexual desire, and while not evil in itself nonetheless seduced humans into a variety of sins.[55] This notion regularly returns in ascetic movements. Catholic theology even recognized its relative validity when in the case of humans devoid of the controls of the superadded gift they spoke of a natural conflict between flesh and spirit and of a "sickness" and "faintness" (morbus and languor) of human nature.[56] In modern philosophy and theology, sin is often similarly derived from an original opposition between nature and reason, sensuality and intellect, a lower and a higher self, flesh and spirit, egoistic and social tendencies. Sensuality in this view, though not itself considered sinful, is nevertheless regarded as the occasion and stimulus to sin. All sin, therefore, essentially consists in a person's mind serving his or her sensuality and permitting it to control it; and all virtue consists in humans ruling over nature by their reason and thus developing into free and independent personalities.[57] For this view people even eagerly appeal to the Pauline doctrine of the flesh (σάρξ) and delight in this scriptural support.

Great insight on the Gnostic and dualistic/Platonist view:

But this interpretation of sin is marked by half heartedness. One has to make a choice: either the sensual nature of humans is not as such sinful, sin arising only if reason and will comply with its demands—and then the theory relapses into Pelagianism; or one's sensual nature is inherently sinful and then sin is inherent in matter as such—and the anthropological interpretation has to proceed to the cosmic. This, accordingly, is precisely what happened in the thinking of many. Plato assumed the existence of eternal matter (ὕλη) alongside of and over against God. Though the cosmos was a work of reason, from the beginning there was also at work in it another factor, a blind force that could not be completely controlled by the demiurge. Therefore, God could not make the world as good as he wanted it to be: he was bound to finiteness, to matter. The cause of sin, suffering, and death, therefore, lies in the corporeal; matter (ὕλη) holds back the invasive and pervasive power of the idea. The body is a prison house of the soul, the source of fear and unrest, of desire and passion.[58] Matter (ὕλη) has the same significance in Neoplatonism and Gnosticism and in numerous ascetic and theosophical schools of thought.[59] Related to this doctrine of Plato are all the theories that derive sin from matter, which, though created by God, is opposed to him;[60] or from the finiteness, “the original imperfection,” of creatures;[61] or, generally speaking, from the realization of the “cosmic idea.”

This interpretation of sin in terms of creaturely existence, however, cannot consistently avoid somehow having to go back to God to locate the origin of sin in his nature or work. In the thought of Plato, matter (ὕλη) itself had eternal and independent status alongside God. In Parsism and Manicheism, two personal divine entities stood eternally over against each other as the creators of light and darkness and gave to the existing world its dual character. Neoplatonism and Gnosticism made the creation, fall, redemption, and so on into aspects of an emanation that as the “unknown deep” (βυθος ἀγνωστος), the absolute pleroma, issued from God in ever-descending formations, finally giving existence to the material world with its ignorance, darkness, sin, suffering, and death, but then, by a process of redemption, led that divinely emanated but now fallen world back to God.[62]

Theosophy, in the case of Böhme and Schelling, fed on these ideas when it attempted to interpret the personality of God, the Trinity, creation, fall, and redemption in terms of the being of God.[63] The three potencies assumed in God—to ensure his becoming person, mind, spirit—are at the same time the basic elements of another existence, namely, that of the world. As person, God has the freedom and the power also to project outside himself and to set in polar tension the potencies that are present in him and that he eternally controls.[64] In that tension lies the possibility of sin. In the original creation, the first either ideally or also in reality, these potencies were at rest. Sin, misery, darkness, death, and so on existed only potentially; they slumbered in the womb of creation. But humans, who bore these potencies within themselves, broke their oneness and unleashed the evil forces that were potentially present in the creation. A world like the present one, with so much savagery and misery, can only be explained in terms of a fall. This fall is the Ur-fact of history.[65] Hegel, even more strongly, viewed it as a fall that the idea of the Absolute realized itself in the world as its own alternative existence. However much he regarded nature as a product of reason, he could not deny that it was powerless to fully realize the Idea; he therefore stated that the Idea, in giving existence to such a world, had become unfaithful to itself, had in fact apostatized from itself.[66] Thus he paved the way for the pessimism that, in the manner of Buddhism, considers existence itself the greatest sin, a sin committed by the blind irrational will, which is the ultimate guilty party.

The Enigma of Sin's Origin

The Sinful "Flesh"

Pg 54

This theory erroneously tries to keep itself afloat with an appeal to the idea of flesh (בשר and σαρξ) in Scripture, especially in Paul. This word first of all denotes the material substance of the human body (1 Cor. 15:39); second, the body itself that is composed of matter in contrast to spirit (πνευμα), mind (νοος), and heart (καρδια) (Rom. 2:28; 2 Cor. 7:5; Col. 2:5); further, in the Old Testament sense of humans as earthly, weak, fragile, and transient beings (Gen. 6:3; 18:27; Job 4:17–19; 15:14–15; 25:4–6; Pss. 78:39; 103:14; Isa. 40:6; Jer. 17:5; Rom. 3:20; 1 Cor. 1:29; Gal. 2:16); and finally in Paul the sinful life-orientation of humans. Thus he speaks of “carnal,” “in the flesh,” of “being, living, walking according to the flesh,” of “the body of sin,” “the mind of the flesh” (Rom. 3:7; 7:14; 8:3f.; 1 Cor. 3:3; 2 Cor. 10:2–3; etc.). In this sense “flesh” is contrasted with “spirit,” though not with the human πνευμα, which, after all, is also sinful and needs sanctification (Rom. 12:1–2; 1 Cor. 7:34; 2 Cor. 7:1; Eph. 4:23; 1 Thess. 5:23), but with the “Holy Spirit” (πνευμα ἅγιον) of God (Rom. 8:2, 9, 11), which renews the human spirit (Rom. 7:6; 8:14; Gal. 5:18) and also consecrates the body and puts it at the disposal of righteousness (Rom. 6:13, 19; 12:1; 1 Cor. 6:13, 15, 19–20), thus putting in people a “new person” (καινος ἄνθρωπος) in opposition to the old sinful life-orientation, the “flesh” (σαρξ) of the “old person” (παλαιος ἄνθρωπος) (Rom. 7:5f.; 8:1ff.; Gal. 5:13–25; Eph. 2:3, 11; Col. 3:9). Some now have the idea that in this view the “flesh” is not only the seat and organ of sin but also its source and origin.[68] But this cannot be maintained against or squared with the undeniable fact that Paul clearly traces sin to the temptation of the serpent and the transgression by Adam (Rom. 5:12; 2 Cor. 11:3). Paul also speaks of the defilement of the body and of the spirit and desires the cleansing of both (2 Cor. 7:1) and lists, among the works of the flesh, a range of spiritual sins such as idolatry, strife, anger, and even heresy (Gal. 5:19f.). [keep in mind that Gnostic view believes matter is evil and spirit is good; yet Paul says that both need to be cleansed.] Paul describes hostility against God as the “mind of the flesh” (φρονημα της σαρκος; Rom. 8:7) and accepts the existence of evil spirits, which, after all, have no σαρξ (Eph. 6:12). [Positively] Paul recognizes Christ, though born of a woman (Gal. 4:4) and of Jewish stock “according to the flesh” (το κατὰ σάρκα; Rom. 9:5), as being without any sin (2 Cor. 5:21) and calls the body a temple of God, claiming all its members for the service of righteousness [again, this view is against Gnosticism, that the body being matter, is evil.] (Rom. 6:13, 19; 12:1; 1 Cor. 6:13–20). Finally, Paul teaches a resurrection of dead bodies (1 Cor. 15), and in principle opposes asceticism (Col. 2:16; 1 Thess. 4:4). The proponents of the view that Paul considers the “flesh” to be the principle of sin, accordingly, often turn around halfway by saying that human flesh is not itself sinful and does not automatically bring sin with it but does incite and tempt people to sin.[69]

Other scholars have therefore expressed the view that Paul, when he uses the word σαρξ in an ethical sense, completely ignores the original meaning.[70] This in itself is not too likely, however, and fails to do justice to the connection Scripture repeatedly makes between the earthly, weak, and transient nature of humans and their sin. There is undoubtedly a close connection between the two; while the sensual nature of humans is not itself sin, nor the source or principle of sin, it is its dwelling place (Rom. 7:17–18) and the instrument of its dominion over us (Rom. 6:12). Human beings are not pure spirit but from the earth, people of “dust,” and become living souls (1 Cor. 15:45ff.), and are therefore connected with the cosmos and always have bodies as their instrument and as organs of their activity (Rom. 6:13; 8:13). This sensual nature gives to sin, as it characterizes our humanity, a character distinct from that of the angels, both in origin and in essence. Temptations come to us from without via “the desire of the flesh, the desire of the eyes, and the pride in riches” (1 John 2:16). It is the sensual nature of human beings that makes their sin such that they make a god of their belly, that they think the things that are below, that they are self-seeking and live for themselves, and honor the creature more than the Creator (Rom. 1:21ff.; Phil. 2:4, 21; 3:19; Col. 3:2; etc.).

Σαρξ denotes the sinful life-orientation of humans who in soul and body turn away from God and toward the creature. The Pauline use of the word “flesh” becomes clear to us when we abandon the familiar Greek contrast between the material and the immaterial and replace it with the biblical contrast between the earthly and the heavenly, the divine and the creaturely, between what is below and what is above. Thus Jesus spoke of the flesh in John 3:6. Flesh became “the proper designation of the race as self-evolved and self-continued. Human nature as now constituted can produce nothing but its like, and that like is now sinful. Flesh therefore may be appropriately used for the principle of corrupt nature in the individual, for the obvious reason that it is in the course of the flesh, or of the ordinary production of human nature, that the evil principle invariably originates.”[71]

Sin as God’s Design?

The explanation of sin from the sensual nature of humans cannot, however, as noted above, stop here but has to move on to locating its cause in the material nature or the finiteness of the creature, and so in an eternal and independent power alongside God, or in the dark nature or blind will in the divine being itself. [the Gnostic view] This view of the origin of sin commends itself over the preceding one by its profounder insight into the power and dominion of sin. It has a keen eye not only for its ethical and anthropological but also for its cosmic and theological meaning. It takes seriously the undeniable truth that a power as appalling as sin cannot have originated accidentally, outside God’s will and counsel. It finds support in the whole present state of the world, both the physical world and the world of ethics. Everywhere in nature and history there are stark and deep contrasts that seem to be necessary for life and development. Heaven and earth, light and darkness, day and night, summer and winter, storm and quiet, war and peace, labor and rest, prosperity and adversity, love and hate, joy and sorrow, health and sickness, life and death, truth and falsehood, sin and virtue: these are the contradictory factors of which the whole of our existence is composed and without which there can apparently be no continuation and progress. What storms are in nature, wars and revolutions in society, peasants and slaves in a drama, solecisms and barbarisms in a language, antitheses in a public address, false notes in music, dark shadows on a painting: that sin is in the world.[72] All activity seems also to presuppose some hindrance. A pigeon might imagine it could fly better in a vacuum, but precisely the resistance of the air is what enables it to fly. Similarly, human beings may think they could live better without sin, but in fact sin is necessary for their moral perfection (Kant). The law of contradiction is the fundamental law of all that is, the “source of eternal life. What prompts, even compels, us to act is contradiction alone. Without it there would be no movement, no life, no progress, but everlasting repose, the death slumber of all forces.”[73] What would be a life without sin? It would be an existence without content, an empty abstraction without opportunity for struggle and victory or conflict and reconciliation; without material for drama and song, for science and art. That was the reason why Dante could paint his inferno with colors derived from this earth, but for the portrayal of heaven this earth offers no materials (Schopenhauer). The proponents of this view of the origin of sin delight in appealing to many verses in Scripture that speak of a necessity of sins and disasters (Matt. 18:7; Luke 24:26; John 9:3; 1 Cor. 11:19; 2 Tim. 2:20); to the teaching of Augustine and Calvin, who include sin in God's counsel and providence; to the well-known words in the Easter vigil of the Roman missal: "O truly necessary sin of Adam that is wiped out by the death of Christ! O happy fault that was worthy to have such and so great a Savior!" There is so much truth in this conception that it need not surprise us that it has at all times fascinated people. Sin is not accidental or arbitrary but incorporated in the counsel of God. It is so intertwined with our whole existence that we cannot even picture a holy life or a sinless history. It is, against its will, made subservient by God Almighty to the revelation of his attributes and the honor of his name.

Still, despite all the truth that is concealed in this idea and will come out even more clearly later on, it cannot and may not be accepted. In the first place, it robs sin of its ethical character. Sin is certainly not only and not always an act of the will, as Pelagianism teaches, and certainly also a state of the will, but it never completely occurs apart from the will. Augustine said: "All sin is voluntary." This sentiment is undoubtedly true when understood in the sense in which Augustine understood it. In the view being considered, however, sin is made analogous to and—in Gnostic and theosophic fashion—equated with the physical phenomena of darkness, sickness, death, and so on. Moreover, it is inferred from the flesh, from matter, from the essence of creatures, from the nature of God, and thus made into a substance or a necessary quality of the existence of things. In the process, sin is deprived of its ethical character and degraded to a physical phenomenon. [Sin cannot be a substance because then God would have had created it which would make God the author of sin which is blaspheme.]

Second, in this view sin is made eternal and invincible. Inasmuch as it is not ethical but physical in nature, it is necessarily a feature of what exists, God as well as the universe, and indispensable to the existence of everything. Not only is the good necessary to evil, but, conversely, evil is necessary to the good. Evil, here, is not a quality of the good and of existence but is itself a kind of existence and good, without which even the good cannot exist. Human beings who strove to be freed from sin would entertain a wicked wish and work for their own ruin. A world without sin could not be, and a state of glory would be nothing but a dream.

In the third place, in this view sin ceases to be antithetical; it simply becomes a lower or lesser degree of the good, in its place as good as the good itself. It becomes a component in life and history that is always destined to disappear but never does: a not-yet being what a creature ought to be, yet never becomes or can become, a pure negation that has no reality and exists only in thought. "As far as good and evil are concerned, they also indicate nothing positive in things, considered in themselves, nor are they anything other than modes of thinking, or notions we form because we compare things to one another.”[74]

In the fourth place, in this view God has to become the author of sin. Parsism and Manichaeism still shrank from this conclusion, set the kingdom of light and the kingdom of darkness in direct opposition to each other, and placed an eternal divine being at the head of each. The god of nature is very different from the god of the good, the moral power, which asserts itself in the human conscience.[75] But Gnostic philosophy and theosophy incorporated the opposites into a single Absolute. God himself, in order to become a person or spirit, had to carry within himself and to perpetually overcome a dark nature as well. By a conflictual process, before and from without or in and through the world, he himself arrives at divine existence. In himself he is an “unknown abyss” (βυθος άγνωστος), a dark nature, a blind will, and as such the creator of matter. “In order for there to be no evil, God himself would have to not be.”[76]

Not only does Scripture testify against this view, but the moral consciousness of all humans rises up in protest against it. Sin may be whatever it is, but one thing is certain: God is the Righteous and Holy One who prohibits it in his law, witnesses against it in the human conscience, and visits it with punishments and judgments. Sin is not rational, nor is it lawful; it is lawlessness (άνομια); it is not necessary to the existence of creatures, much less to the existence of God. The good is necessary even for evil to exist, but the good does not need evil, nor does holiness need sin, nor truth falsehood, nor God Satan. If sin, nevertheless, frequently serves to bring the good to fuller disclosure and to glorify God’s attributes, this occurs—against sin’s intent, not with its consent and cooperation—by the wisdom and omnipotence of God. Against its own genius, sin is forced to serve the honor of God and the coming of his kingdom. Thus evil frequently pays tribute to the good, the lie is overtaken by the truth, and Satan, to accomplish his deceptions, often has to appear as an angel of light. But all this is attributable, not to sin, but to the almighty power of God, who is able to bring good out of evil, light out of darkness, and life out of death.

[I think we are seeing this effect described below in our current Biden administration!
Evil is rampant!]

Finally, this entire false conception has a horrible effect on the practice of life. If philosophy announces in so many words “God is to blame for everything; humans are blameless,” then in practice libertinism and pessimism are not far behind. This is the libertinism that considers sin an illusion, and this illusion, as the only sin, erases all boundaries between good and evil, falsifies or, with Nietzsche, transvalues all moral concepts, and, under the rallying cry of the emancipation of the flesh, glorifies bestiality as geniality. This is the pessimism that, blind to sin, has eyes only for suffering, projects the blame for all that suffering upon the irrational act of an absolute will, and seeks deliverance from suffering in the destruction of the existing world. Judging by the outcome, so-called independent philosophy is also guided by the native tendency of all humans to justify themselves and to charge God with injustice.⁷⁷

⁷⁷John H. Edwards, in "The Vanishing Sense of Sin," points out how positivism, pantheism, Buddhism, and others are accompanied with a weakened consciousness of sin. One can add to this list the new religion of Christian Science, according to which matter, illness, sin, and death exist only in the mind; they can be nothing except the results of material consciousness, but material consciousness can have no real existence, because it is not a living reality (Mary Baker G. Eddy, Unity of Good, 1898)

Comments on Gnosticism by John Flavel

(3.) A third sort there are, who deny that souls are created substances, and proceeded from God; but affirm withal, that he created them simul, et semel, together and at once, as the angels were, and not one by one, as men are born into the world. "Of this opinion was Plato, who thought all human souls to be created together before their bodies, and placed in some glorious and suitable mansions, as the stars, till, at last, growing weary of heavenly, and falling in love with earthly things, for a punishment of that crime, they were cast into bodies, as into so many prisons." Origen sucked in this notion of the pre-existence of souls: and upon this supposition it was that a Porphyry tells us, in the life of Plotinus, he blushed as often as he thought of his being in a body, as a man that lived in reputation and honour, blushes when he is lodged in a prison. The ground on which the Stoics bottomed their opinion was, the great dignity and excellency of the soul, which inclined them to think they had never been degraded and abased, as they are by dwelling in such vile bodes, but for their faults; and that it was for some former sins of theirs, that they slid down into gross matter, and were caught into a vital union with it; whereas, had they not sinned, they had lived in celestial and splendid habitations, more suitable to their dignity.

But this is a pure creature of fancy; for, (1.) No soul in the world is conscious to itself, of such a pre-existence, nor can remember when it was owner of any other habitation than that it now dwells in. (2.) Nor does the scripture give us the least hint of any such thing. Some indeed would catch hold of that expression, Gen. 2:2. "God rested the seventh day from all the works which he had made;" and it is true, he did so, the work of creation was finished and sealed up, as to any new species or kinds of creatures to be created; no other sort of souls will be created, than that which was at first: but yet God still creates individual souls, (My Father worketh hitherto and I work) of the same kind and nature with Adam's soul. And, (3.) For their detrusion into these bodies as a punishment of their sins in the former state; if we speak of sin in individuals, or particular persons, the scripture mentions none, either original or actual, defiling any soul in any other way but by its union with the body. Pre-existence therefore is but a dream.

Trading With God

A good commentary on one's duty to trade his talents to gain more, that is, to grow in grace by a due application of the talents or graces God has given us, by the due exercise of them - seeking God, prayer, meditations upon God's word, growing in knowledge of God, etc., so as to grow in grace and be transformed into the image of Christ (2Cor3:18). John Owen wrote a piece dealing with this entitled The Grace and Duty of Being Spiritually Minded. See the parable of the talents in Matt. 25, where many exercised this duty and grew in grace and whereas the one who did not know God (evidenced by his wrong notion of God...His harshness, the typical view of one who is unsaved, under condemnation of the law and the guilt for the violation thereof, etc., and never experienced God's mercy and compassion), hid his talent and thus bore no fruit and even what he thought he had, was taken from him: 'For to everyone who has, more will be given, and he will have abundance; but from him who does not have, even what he has will be taken away.³⁰ And cast the unprofitable servant into the outer darkness. There will be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'

Excerpts from
 by John Flavel
 Vol. 5

Thirdly, The disease of Laodicea is here opened to them in its aggravations; "Thou saidst I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; but knowest not," &c. To be really graceless and Christless, is a miserable condition; but to be so, and yet confidently persuaded of the contrary, is most miserable; to have the very symptoms of death upon us, and yet tell those that pity us we are as well as they, is lamentable indeed! O the efficacy of a spiritual delusion! This was their disease, gracelessness; and the aggravation of it, was their senselessness.

Secondly, We have a proper remedy prescribed, ver. 18, "I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich," etc. In which we have to consider. First, what is prescribed for the cure. Secondly, Where it is to be had. Thirdly, How to be obtained.

First, What are the remedies prescribed; and they are three; gold, white raiment, and eye-salve. First, gold, the cure of poverty, yea, gold tried in the fire; i.e., grace that hath been variously proved already; and the more it is proved, the more its truth will be conspicuous. The next is white raiment, the remedy against nakedness. And, lastly, eye-salve, the effectual cure of blindness. Under all these choice metaphors, more choice and excellent things are shadowed, even spiritual graces, real holiness, more precious than gold. Christ's imputed righteousness, the richest garment in all the wardrobe of heaven; and spiritual illumination, the most excellent collyrium or eye-salve that ever was, or can be applied to the mental eye or understanding; of man in this world.

Secondly, Where these precious remedies may be had; and you find Christ hath the monopoly of them all; Buy of me, saith Christ in the text; he is the repository of all graces. Angels, ministers, ordinances cannot furnish you with them without Christ.

Thirdly, How they may be obtained from him; Buy of me. On this place Estius, and others, build their doctrine of merit; which is to build a superstructure of hay and stubble upon a foundation of gold. The exigence of the very text itself destroys such conceits; for what have they that are poor, wretched, miserable, and want all things, to give as a price, or by way of merit for those inestimable treasures of grace? Buying therefore in this place can signify or intend no more than the acquisition, compassing, or obtaining these things from Jesus Christ, in the use of such means and methods as he hath appointed; and in the use of them we merit grace no more than the patient merits of his physician by coming to him, and carefully following his prescriptions in the use of such medicaments as he freely gives him. And that place Isa. 55:1. (from which this phrase seems to be borrowed) fully clears it; "He that hath no money, let him come and buy wine and milk without money, and without price."

4. Fourthly. View the precious worth of grace in its excellent effects and influences upon the soul in which it inheres.

(1.) It adorns with incomparable ornaments, which are of great price in the sight of God, 1 Pet. iii. 4. Yea, it reflects such beams of glory in the soul where its seat is, that Christ himself, the author, is also the admirer of it; Cant. iv. 9, "Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse! Thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes, with one of the chains of thy neck!" and as one overcome with its excelling beauty, he saith, "Turn away thine eyes from me, for they have overcome me," Cant. vi. 5.

(2.) It elevates and ennobles a man's spirit beyond all other principles in man; it sets the heart and affections upon heaven, and takes them up with the glory of the invisible world, Phil. iii. 20, "But our conversation is in heaven, from whence we look for the Saviour." Whilst others are trading for corn and wine, for sheep and oxen, for feathers and trifles, the gracious soul is trading with God for pardon and peace, for righteousness and life, for glory and immortality; "Truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ," John i. 3.

(3.) It doth not only raise the spirit by conversing with God, and things above, but transforms the soul, by that converse into the likeness of those heavenly objects it converses with; "It changes them into the same image," 2 Cor. iii. 18. So that though the sanctified man still remains the who he was, yet not the what he was before; the very temper of his Spirit is altered.

Inf. 6. To conclude. Is there such precious worth in saving grace? Then bless God for, and diligently use all means to increase and improve it in your souls. It is gold for preciousness, and for usefulness, and must not be laid up in a napkin. That is a sin condemned by the very scope of that parable. Mat. xxv. 14, 15, &c.

All Christians indeed have not the same advantages of improvement; but all must improve it according to the advantages they have, in order to an account. Reserved Christians, who live too abstracted from the society and communion of others, and disperse not their streams abroad to the benefit of others, nor improve the graces of others for their own benefit, are wanting both to their own duty and comfort. See you a man rich in grace, O trade with him if you can to improve yourselves by him; and the rather, because you know not how soon death may snatch him from you, and with him all his stock of grace is gone from you too, except what you made your own whilst you conversed with him. But alas! Instead of holy, profitable, soul-improving communion [trading with God¹], some are sullenly reserved; some are negligent and lazy; some are litigious and wrangling; more apt to draw forth the dross than the gold; I mean the corruptions, than graces of others. And how few there be that drive a profitable trade for increase of grace, is sad to consider.

¹To take God in Christ for, and instead of that thing, the withholding or taking away of which from you makes the crook in your lot. (Ps142:4,5) There is never a crook which God makes in our lot, but it is in effect Heaven's offer of a blessed exchange to us; such as, "Sell whatever you have, and you shall have treasure in heaven." (Mk. 10:21) In managing of which exchange, God first puts out His hand, and takes away some earthly thing from us; and it is expected we put out our hand next and take some heavenly things from Him in the stead of it, and particularly His Christ. Why has God emptied your left hand of such and such an earthly comfort? Stretch out your right hand to God in Christ, take Him in the room of it, and welcome. Therefore, the soul's closing with Christ is called buying, wherein parting with one thing, we get another in its stead, "the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchantman seeking goodly pearls, who, when he had found one pearly of great price, went and sold all that he had and bought it." (Matt. 13:45, 46) Do this, and you will be more than even hands with the crook in your lot. Thomas Boston

Ps 142:4-5 Look on my right hand and see, For there is no one who acknowledges me; Refuge has failed me; No one cares for my soul. ⁵I cried out to You, O Lord: I said, "You are my refuge, My portion in the land of the living."

And as grace is not improved by communion with men, so I doubt most Christians thrive but little in their communion with God. We are too seldom in our closets, too little upon our knees; and when we are there, we gain but little; we come not off such gainers by duty as we might. O Christians! Think when you are hearing and praying, I am now trading with heaven for that which is infinitely better than gold. God is rich to all that call upon him. What a treasure may I get this hour, if the fault be not in mine own heart?

CHAP. X.

*By navigation one place stores another,
And by communion we must help each other.*

John Flavel, pg 241 Vol. V

OBSERVATION

THE most wise God hath so dispensed his bounty to the several nations of the world, that one standing in need of another's commodities, there might be a sociable commerce and traffic maintained amongst them all, and all combining in a common league, may, by the help of navigation, exhibit mutual succours to each other. The staple commodities proper to each country, I find expressed by the poet, Bart. Coll.

Hence comes our sugars from Canary isles;
 From Candy currants, muskadels, and oils;
 From the Molucco's, spices; balsam um,
 From Egypt; odors from Arabia come;
 From India, gums, rich drugs, and ivory;
 From Syria, mummy; black, red ebony,
 From burning Chus; from Peru, pearl and gold;
 From Russia, furs, to keep the rich from cold;
 From Florence, silks; from Spain, fruit, saffron, sacks;
 From Denmark, amber; cordage, firs, and flax;
 From Holland, hops ; horse from the banks of Rhine;
 From France and Italy the choicest wine;
 From England, wool ; all lands as God distributes.
 To the world's treasure pay their sundry tributes.

APPLICATION.

Thus hath God distributed the more rich and precious gifts and graces of his Spirit among his people; some excelling in one grace, some in another, though every grace, in some degree, be in them all; even as in nature, though there be all the faculties in all, yet some faculties are in some more lively and vigorous than in others; some have a more vigorous eye, others a more ready ear, others a more voluble tongue; so it is in spirituals. Abraham excelled in faith, Job in patience, John in love. These were their peculiar excellencies. All the elect vessels are not of one quantity; yet even those that excel others in some particular grace, come short in other respects of those they so excelled in the former, and may be much improved by converse with such as in some respects are much below them. The solid, wise, and judicious Christian may want that liveliness of affections and tenderness of heart that appear in the weak and one that excels in gifts and utterance may learn humility from the very babes in Christ.

And one principal reason of this different distribution is to maintain fellowship among them all, 1 Cor. xii. 21, "The head cannot say to the feet, I have no need of you." As in a family where there is much business to be done, even the little children bear a part, according to their strength, Jer. vii. 18, "The children gather wood, the fathers kindle the fire, the women knead the dough." So in the family of Christ, the weakest Christian is serviceable to the strong. There be precious treasures in these earthen vessels, for which we should trade by mutual communion. The preciousness of the treasure should draw out our desires and endeavours after it; and the consideration of the brittleness of those vessels in which they are kept, should cause us to be the more expeditious in our trading with them, and make the quicker returns. For when those vessels (I mean bodies of the saints) are broken by death, there is no more to be gotten out of them. That treasure of grace which made them such profitable, pleasant, and desirable companions on earth, then ascends with them into heaven, where every grace receives its adolescence and perfection; [That is, in heaven we will live by sight! Sight is faith perfected. We will see him as he is. Faith on earth is imperfect - we see, by the eyes of faith, as through a glass darkly, etc.] and then, though they be ten thousand times more excellent and delightful than ever they were on earth, yet we can have no more communion with them till we come to glory ourselves. Now therefore it behoves us to be enriching ourselves by communication of what God hath dropt into us, and improvement of them, as one well notes. We should do by saints, as we use to do by some choice book lent us for a few days, we should fix in our memories, or transcribe all the choice notions we meet with in it, that they may be our own when the book is called for, and we can have it no longer by us.

REFLECTION

Lord, how short do I come of my duty in communicating to, or receiving good by others! My soul is either empty and barren, or if there be any treasure in it, yet is but as a treasure locked up in some chest, whose key is lost, when it should be opened for the use of others. Ah Lord! I have sinned greatly, not only by vain words, but sinful silence. I have been of little use in the world. How little also have I gotten by communion with others? Some it may be, that are of my own size, or judgment, or that I am otherwise obliged to, I can delight to converse with; but O, where is that largeness of heart and general delight I should have to, and in all thy people? How many of my old dear acquaintance are now in heaven, whose tongues were as choice silver, while they were here, Prov. 10:20. And blessed souls! How communicative were they of what you gave them? O what an improvement had I made of my talent this way, had I been diligent! Lord pardon my neglect of those sweet and blessed advantages. O let all my delight be in thy saints, who are the excellent of the earth. Let me never go out of their company, without an heart more warmed, quickened, and enlarged, than when I came amongst them.

THE POEM.

TO several nations God doth so distribute
 His bounty, that each one must pay a tribute
 Unto each other. Europe cannot vaunt,
 And say, Of Africa I have no want.
 America and Asia need not strive.
 Which of itself can best subsist and live.
 Each country's want, in something, doth maintain Commerce betwixt them all. Such is the aim
 And end of God, who doth dispense and give More grace to some, their brethren to relieve.
 This makes the sun ten thousand times more bright.
 Because it is diffusive of its light;
 Its beams are gilded gloriously; but then
 This property doth gild them o'er again.
 Should sun, moon, stars, impropriate all their light,
 What dismal darkness would the world benight?
 On this account men hate the vermin brood.
 Because they take in much, but do no good.
 What harm, if I at yours my candle light?

Except thereby I make your room more bright.
 He that by pumping sucks and draws the spring
 New streams, and sweeter, to the well doth bring.
 Grace is a treasure in an earthen pot;
 When death hath das'd it, no more can be got Out of that vessel; then, while it is whole.
 Get out the treasure to enrich your soul.

A Concluding Speech

John Flavel, pg 292, Vol. V

I HAVE now done, and am looking to heaven for a blessing upon these weak labours; what use you will make of them, I know not, but this I know, that the day is coming, when God will reckon with you for this, and all other helps and means afforded to you; and if it be not improved by you, be sure it will be produced as a witness against you. Sirs, I beg you, in the name of Christ, before whom both you and I must shortly appear, that you receive not these things in vain. Did I know what other lawful means to use that might reach your hearts, they should not be in vain to you; but I cannot do God's part of the work, nor yours; only I request you all, both masters, common men, and all others into whose hands this shall come, that you will lay to heart what you read; pray unto him that hath the key of the house of David, that openeth and no man shutteth, to open your hearts to give entertainment to these truths. Alas! If you apply it not to yourselves, I have labored to no purpose; the pen of the scribe is in vain; but God may make such an application of them, in one storm or another, as may make your hearts to tremble. Oh, sirs! When death and eternity look you in the face, conscience may reflect upon these things to your horror and amazement, and make you cry out, as Prov. v. 12, 13, "How have I hated knowledge, and my heart despised reproof and have not obeyed the voice of my teacher, nor inclined my ears to them that instructed me?" And O what a dreadful shriek will such souls give, when the Lord opens their eyes to see that misery that they are here warned of! But if the Lord shall bless these things to your conversion, then we may say to you, as Moses did to Zebulun, the mariners tribe, Deut. 33:12, "Rejoice Zebulun in thy going out." The Lord will be with you, which way soever you turn yourselves; and being in the bosom of the covenant, you are safe in the midst of all dangers. O thou, that art the Father of spirits, that formed and can easily reform the heart, open your the blind eye, unstop the deaf ear, let the world take hold upon the heart. If you will but say the word, these weak labours shall prosper, to bring home many lost souls unto thee. Amen.

The Use of Reason

code128 code259

This is a good explanation of the proper use of reason; suited for the old Covenant but unable to perceive the mysteries of the New Covenant vs. the Old Covenant, without divine revelation. See Luke 8:10, Matt. 13:11, "And He said, "To you it has been given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God, but to the rest it is given in parables, that 'Seeing they may not see, And hearing they may not understand.'

Explanation of the Doctrine of Justification

Sixthly. We can never state our thoughts aright in this matter, unless we have a clear apprehension of, and satisfaction in, the introduction of grace by Jesus Christ into the whole of our relation unto God, with its respect unto all parts of our obedience. There was no such thing, nothing of that nature or kind, in the first constitution of that relation and obedience by the law of our creation. We were made in a state of immediate relation unto God in our own persons, as our creator, preserver, and rewarder. There was no mystery of grace in the covenant of works. No more was required unto the consummation of that state but what was given us in our creation, enabling us unto rewardable obedience. “Do this, and live,” was the sole rule of our relation unto God. There was nothing in religion originally of that which the gospel celebrates under the name of the grace, kindness, and love of God, whence all our favorable relation unto God does now proceed, and whereinto it is resolved; nothing of the interposition of a mediator with respect unto our righteousness before God, and acceptance with him; — which is at present the life and soul of religion, the substance of the gospel, and the centre of all the truths revealed in it. The introduction of these things is that which makes our religion a mystery, yea, a “great mystery,” if the apostle may be believed, 1 Tim. iii. 16. All religion at first was suited and commensurable unto reason; but being now become a mystery, men for the most part are very unwilling to receive it. But so it must be; and unless we are restored unto our primitive rectitude, a religion suited unto the principles of our reason (of which it has none but what answer that first state) will not serve our turns.

Wherefore, of this introduction of Christ and grace in him into our relation unto God, there are no notions in the natural conceptions of our minds; nor are they discoverable by reason in the best and utmost of its exercise, 1 Cor. ii. 14. For before our understanding were darkened, and our reason debased by the fall, there were no such things revealed or proposed unto us; yea, the supposition of them is inconsistent with, and contradictory unto, that whole state and condition wherein we were to live to God, — seeing they all suppose the entrance of sin. And it is not likely that our reason, as now corrupted, should be willing to embrace that which it knew nothing of in its best condition, and which was inconsistent with that way of attaining happiness which was absolutely suited unto it: for it has no faculty or power but what it has derived from that state; and to suppose it is now of itself suited and ready to embrace such heavenly mysteries of truth and grace as it had no notions of, nor could have, in the state of innocence, is to suppose that by the fall our eyes were opened to know good and evil, in the sense that the serpent deceived our first parents with an expectation of. Whereas, therefore, our reason was given us for our only guide in the first constitution of our natures, it is naturally unready to receive what is above it; and, as corrupted, has an enmity thereunto.

Hence, in the first open proposal of this mystery, — namely, of the love and grace of God in Christ, of the introduction of a mediator and his righteousness into our relation unto God, in that way which God in infinite wisdom had designed, — the whole of it was looked on as mere folly by the generality of the wise and rational men of the world, as the apostle declares at large, 1 Cor. i.; neither was the faith of them ever really received in the world without an act of the Holy Ghost upon the mind in its renovation. And those who judge that there is nothing more needful to enable the mind of man to receive the mysteries of the gospel in a due manner but the outward proposal of the doctrine thereof, do not only deny the depravation of our nature by the fall, but, by just consequence, wholly renounce that grace whereby we are to be recovered. Wherefore, reason (as has been elsewhere proved), acting on and by its own innate principles and abilities, conveyed unto it from its original state, and as now corrupted, is repugnant unto the whole introduction of grace by Christ into our relation unto God, Rom. viii. 7. An endeavor, therefore, to reduce the doctrine of the gospel, or what is declared therein concerning the hidden mystery of the grace of God in Christ, unto the principles and inclinations of the minds of men, or reason as it remains in us after the entrance of sin, — under the power, at least, of those notions and conceptions of things religious which it retains from its first state and condition, — is to debase and corrupt them (as we shall see in sundry instances), and so make way for their rejection.

Hence, very difficult it is to keep up doctrinally and practically the minds of men unto the reality and spiritual height of this mystery; for men naturally do neither understand it nor like it: and therefore, every attempt to accommodate it unto the principles and inbred notions of corrupt reason is very acceptable unto many, yea, unto the most; for the things which such men speak and declare, are, without more ado, — without any exercise of faith or prayer, without any supernatural illumination, — easily intelligible, and exposed to the common sense of mankind. But whereas a declaration of the mysteries of the gospel can obtain no admission into the minds of men but by the effectual working of the Spirit of God, Eph. i. 17–19, it is generally looked on as difficult, perplexed, unintelligible; and even the minds of many, who find they cannot contradict it, are yet not at all delighted with it. And here lies the advantage of all them who, in these days, do attempt to corrupt the doctrine of the gospel, in the whole or any part of it; for the accommodation of it unto the common notions of corrupted reason is the whole of what they design. And in the confidence of the suffrage hereof, they not only oppose the things themselves, but despise the declaration of them as enthusiastical canting. And by nothing do they more prevail themselves than by a pretence of reducing all things to reason, and contempt of what they oppose, as unintelligible fanaticism. But I am not more satisfied in any thing of the most uncontrollable evidence, than that the understandings of these men are no just measure or standard of spiritual truth. Wherefore, notwithstanding all this fierceness of scorn, with the pretended advantages which some think they have made by traducing expressions in the writings of some men, it may be improper, it maybe only not suited unto their own genius and capacity in these things, we are not to be “ashamed of the gospel of Christ, which is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.”

This is a good commentary on prosperity being a means to discover of what make the person's soul is; regenerate or unregenerate. Also, that prosperity in unregenerate souls greatly leads them to center their thoughts and desires solely upon earthly things, and in so doing, transform their souls into that very image.

Prosperity A Great Trial

PROSPERITY discovers many sad symptoms of a naughty heart and, among others, these are ordinarily most conspicuous.

1. First, It casts the hearts of some men into a deep oblivion of God, and makes them lay aside all care of duty; Raro fumant foelicibus arce; the altars of rich men seldom smoke, Deut. xxxii. 13, 14, 15. Jeshurun sucked honey out of the rock, eat the fat of lambs, and kidneys of wheat. But what was the effect of this; he kicked and forsook God who made him, and lightly esteemed the rock of his salvation. Instead of lifting up their hearts in an humble thankful acknowledgment of God's bounty, they lifted up the heel in a wanton abuse of his mercy. In the fattest earth we find the most slippery footing.

He that is truly gracious may, in prosperity, remit some degrees; but a carnal heart there loses all that which in a low condition he seemed to save. Augur's deprecation, as to himself, no doubt, was built upon his frequent observation how it was with others; Prov. 30:8, 9, "Lest I be full, and deny God."

It is said Eccl. v. 12, "That the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep;" and I wish that were the worst injury it did him; but alas! It will not suffer him to pray, to meditate, to allow time and thoughts about his eternal concernments; he falls asleep in the lap of prosperity, and forgets that there is a God to be served, or a soul to be saved. O this is a dangerous symptom of a very graceless heart!

2. Secondly, Prosperity meeting with a graceless heart, makes it wholly sensual, and entirely swallows up its thoughts and affections. Earthly things transform and mould their hearts into their own similitude and nature; [the same effect that contemplating spiritual things, contemplating God's glory, does to the saints, transforming them into the very image of those things as the Spirit works it! 2Cor3:18.] the whole strength of their souls goes out to those enjoyments. So those graceless, yet prosperous persons are described, Job xxi. 11, 12, 13, "They take the timbrel and harp, and rejoice at the sound of the organ : they spend their days in wealth." They take the timbrel, not the Bible, "They rejoice at the sound of the organ;" not a word of their rejoicing in God, "They sent forth their little ones in the dance." That is all the catechism they are taught." They spend their days in wealth:" their whole time, that precious stock and talent is wholly laid out upon these sensitive things; either the pleasure of it powerfully charms them, or the cares of it wholly engross their minds, that there is no time to spare for God. They live in pleasure upon earth, as it is, Jam. v. 5. just as the fish lives in the water, its proper element; Take him off from these things, and put him upon spiritual, serious, heavenly employments, and he is Piscis in arido; like a fish upon the dry land.

Now, though prosperity may too much influence and ensnare the minds of good men, and estrange them too much from heavenly things; yet thus to engross their hearts, and convert them into their own similitude and nature, so that these things should be the centre of their hearts, the very proper element in which they live, is utterly impossible.

A hypocrite indeed may be brought to this, because, though Janus like, he have two faces, yet he really hath but one principle, and that is wholly carnal and earthly. So that it is easy to make all the water to run into one channel, to gather all into one entire stream, in which his heart shall pour out all its strength to the creature.

But a Christian indeed hath a double principle that acts him; though he have a law of sin that moves him one way, yet there is in him also the law of grace, which thwarts and crosses that principle of corruption. So that as grace cannot do what it would, because of sin; so neither can sin do what it would, because of grace, Gal. v. 17.

The heart of a Christian, in the midst of ensnaring, sensitive enjoyments, finds indeed a corrupt principle in it, which would incline him to fall asleep upon such a soft pillow, and forget God and duty; but it cannot. O no! It cannot do so; there is a principle of grace within him, that never leaves jogging, disturbing, and calling upon him till he rise and return to Ibis God, the true rest of his soul.

3. Thirdly, A false pretender to religion, a hypocritical professor, meeting with prosperity and success, grows altogether unconcerned about that interest of religion, and senseless of the calamities of God's people. Thus the prophet convinces the Jews of their hypocrisy, Amos vi. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, "They were at ease in Zion, and trusted in the mountain of Samaria;" And so, having a shadow of religion, and a fullness of all earthly things, they fell to feasting and sporting. "They drank wine in bowls, and anointed themselves with the chief ointments, but were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph." They condoled not, Gnal sheber, over the breakings or tearing to pieces of Joseph; if they were out of danger once, let the church shift for itself, they are secure in a warm nest. Let the birds of prey catch and devour that flock with which they sometimes associated, they are not touched with it. Moses could not do so, though in the greatest security and confluence of the honors and pleasures of Egypt, Acts vii. 23. Nehemiah could not do so, though the servant and favorite of a mighty monarch, and wanted nothing to make him outwardly happy; yet the pleasures of a king's court could not cheer his heart, or scatter the clouds of sorrow from his countenance, whilst his brethren were in affliction, and the city of his God lay waste, Nehemiah ii. 1, 2, 3. Nor indeed can any gracious heart be unconcerned and senseless; for that union that all the saints have with Christ their head, and with one another, as fellow-members in Christ, will beget sympathy among them in their sufferings, 1 Cor. xii. 26.

SECT. V.

BUT as the fire of prosperity discovers this and much more dross in a graceless heart, so it discovers the sincerity and grace of God's people. I say not that it discovers nothing but grace in them; O that it did not! Alas! Many of them have had a great deal of dross and corruption discovered by it, as was noted before. But yet in this trial, the graciousness and uprightness of their hearts will appear in these, and such like workings of it.

1. First, Under prosperity, success, and honour, the upright heart will labor to suppress pride, and keep itself lowly and humble? And still the more grace there is, the more humility there will be. If God lift him up, he v/ill lay himself low, and exalt his God high. So did Jacob when God had raised and enlarged him; Gen. xxxii. 10, "I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth which thou hast showed unto thy servant, for with ray staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands."

Great was the difference in Jacob's outward condition at his return, from what it was at his first passage over Jordan; then poor, now rich; then single and comfortless, now the head of a great family. Yea, but though this outward estate was altered, the frame of his heart was not altered. Jacob was a holy and humble man when he went out, and so he was when he returned. He saw a multitude of mercies about him, and among them all, not one but was greater than himself.

I dare not say every Christian under prosperity can at all times manifest like humility; but I am sure what pride and vanity so ever may rise in a gracious heart tried by prosperity, there is that within him which will give check to it. He dare not suffer such proud thoughts to lodge quietly in his heart; for, alas! He sees that in himself, and that in his God, that will abase him. Grace will make him look back to his original condition, and say, with David, "What am I, O Lord God? And what is my father's house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?" 2 Sam. vii. 18.

It will make him look in, and see the baseness of his own heart, and the corruptions that are there, and admire at the dealings of God with so vile a creature. O, thinks he, if others did but know what I know of myself, they would abhor me more than now they esteem and value me.

2. Secondly, Prosperity usually draws forth the saints love to the God of their mercies; that which heats a wicked man's lusts, warms a gracious man's heart with love and delight in God.

These were the words of that lovely song which David sang in the day that the Lord delivered him out of the hands of all his enemies, and from the hand of Saul; and he said, "I will love thee, O Lord, my strength," Psal. xviii. title and ver. 1. compared. These outward things are not the mam grounds and motives of their love to God; no; they love him when he takes away, as well as when he gives; but they are sanctified instruments to inflame their love to God; they boil up a wicked man's lusts, but they melt a gracious man's soul. O in what a pang of love did David go into the presence of God under the sense of his mercies! his melting mercies! when he thus poured out his whole soul in a stream of love to his God, 2 Sam. vii. 19, 20, "Is this the manner of men, O Lord God? And what can David say more unto thee?" An expression that turns up the very bottom of his heart.

3. Thirdly, Prosperity and comfortable Providences do usually become cautions against sin, when they meet with a sanctified soul. This is the natural inference of a gracious soul from them; hath God pleased me, then hath he obliged me to take more care to please him; let me not grieve him, that hath comforted me! So Ezra ix. 13, "After such a deliverance as this, should we again break thy commandments! What! Break thy commandments who hath broken our bonds! God forbid!

It was an excellent resolution of a Christian once, who receiving an eminent mercy at the same time he felt himself under the power of a special corruption. "Well, (saith he) now will I go forth in the strength of this mercy, to mortify and subdue that corruption." I will not measure every Christian by the eminent workings of grace in some one; but surely so far I may safely go, that sincerity knows not how to sin, because grace has abounded, any more than it dare sin, that grace may abound.

4. Fourthly, A truly gracious soul will not be satisfied with all the prosperity and comforts in the world for his portion. Not thine, Lord but thee, is the voice of grace. When providence had been more than ordinarily bountiful in outward things to Luther, he began to be afraid of its meaning, and earnestly protested, God should not put him off so, "The Lord is my portion, saith my soul," Lam. iii. 24, and the soul can best tell what it hath made its choice, and whereon it has bestowed its chief delights and expectations. An unsound heart will accept these for its portion; if the world be sure to him, and his designs fail not there, he can be content to leave God, and soul, and heaven, and hell at hazard; but so cannot the upright. These things in subordination; but neither these, nor anything under the sun, in comparison with, or opposition to God.

Vol. 5, pgs. 441-445

How a Christian under great afflictions may keep his heart from repining, or desponding under the hand of God? Now there are nine special helps. I shall here offer, to keep thy heart in this condition; and the first shall be this: to work upon your hearts this great truth,

1. That by these cross providences, God is faithfully pursuing the great design of electing love upon thy souls of his people, and orders all these afflictions as means sanctified to that end.

Afflictions fall not out by causality, but by counsel, Job 5:6, Eph. 1:11, by this counsel of God they are ordained as means of much spiritual good to saints, Isa27:9, "By this shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged," etc. Heb. 12:10, "But he for our profit," etc., Rom. 8:28, "All things work together for good." They are God's workmen upon our hearts, to pull down the pride and carnal security of them; and being so, their nature is changed; they are tuned into blessings and benefits, Ps. 119:71, "It is good for me that I have been afflicted." And sure, then, you have no reason to quarrel with, but rather to admire that God should concern himself so much in your good, to use any means for the accomplishment of it. Phil. 3:11, "Paul could bless God, if by any means he might attain the resurrection of the dead." "My brethren, (saith James) count it all joy when you fall into divers temptations," Jam. 1:2-3. My father is about a design of love upon my soul, and do I well to be angry with him? All that he does is in pursuance of and in reference to some eternal, glorious ends upon my soul. O It is my ignorance of god's design, that makes me quarrel with him! He say to you in this case, as to Peter, "What I do you know not now, but hereafter you shall know it."

Help 2. Though God has reserved to himself a liberty of afflicting his people yet he has tied up his own hands by promise never to take away his loving kindness from them. Can I look that scripture in the face with a ripening, discontented spirit, 2Sam. 7:14, "I shall be his father, and he will be my son; if he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of children of men. Nevertheless, my mercy shall not depart away from him." O my heart! My haughty heart! Do you well to be discontented, when God has given you the whole tree, with all the clusters of comfort growing on it, because he suffers the wind to blow down a few leaves. Christians have two sorts of goods, the goods of the throne, and the goods of the footstool; movables, and immovables. If God have secured these, never let my heart be troubled at the loss of those; indeed, if he had cut off his love, or discovenanted my soul, I had reason to be cast down; but this he has not, nor can he do it.

Help 3. It is of marvelous efficacy to keep the heart from sinking under afflictions, to call to mind, that thine own father has the ordering of them. Not a creature moves hand or tongue against you, but by his permission. [\[not that God operates only by bare permission, for then God would be dependent upon the creature, and God would be only a predictor of events and not the promiser of them; for to promise something without his sovereign disposal and determination of things is a great absurdity. – Edwards paraphrased; see the doctrine of concurrence and compatibility\]](#) Suppose the cup be a bitter cup, yet it is the cup which your father has given you to drink; and can you suspect poison to be in that cup which he delivers you? Foolish man, put home the case to you own heart, consult with you own bowels.; can you find in your heart to give you child that which would hurt, or undo him? No, you would as soon hurt yourself as him; "If thou then being evil know how to give good gifts to your children," how much more does God? Matt. 7:11. The very consideration of his nature, a God of love, pity, and tender mercies, or of his relation to you as a Father, Husband, Friend, might be security enough, if he had not spoken a word to quiet you in this case; and yet you have his word too, Jer. 25:6, "I will do you no hurt." You lie too near his heart to hurt you; nothing grieves him more than your groundless and unworthy suspicions of his designs do; would it not grieve a faithful, tender-hearted physician when he has studied the case of his patient, prepared the most excellent receipts to save his life, to hear him cry out, O he has undone me! He has poisoned me; because it gripes and pains him in the operation? O when will you be ingenious!

Help 4. God respects you as much in a law, as in a high condition; and therefore it need not so much trouble you to be made low; nay, to speak home, he manifests, more of his love, grace and tenderness, in the time of affliction, than prosperity. As God did not at first choose you because you were high, so he will not forsake you because you are low. Men may look shy upon you and alter their respects as your condition is altered. When providence has blasted your estates, your summer friends may grow strange, as fearing you may be troublesome, to them; but will God do so? No, no! "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee," Heb. 13:5. Indeed if adversity and poverty could bar you from access to God, it were a sad condition; but you may go to God as freely as ever. "My God (saith the church) will hear me," Mic. 7:7. Poor David, when stripped of all earthly comforts, could yet encourage himself in the Lord his God; and why cannot you? Suppose your husband or child had lost all at sea, and should come to you in rags; could you deny the relation, or refuse to entertain him? If you would not, much less would God. Why then are you so troubled? Thought your condition be changed, you Father's love and respects are not changed.

Help 5. And what if by the loss of outward comforts, God will preserve your souls from the reigning power of temptation? Sure then, you have little cause to sink you hearts by such sad thoughts about them. Are not these earthly enjoyments the things that made men shrink and warp in times of trial? For the love of these many have forsaken Christ in such an hour, Matt. 19:22, "He went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions." And if this be God's design, what have I done in quarrelling with him about it? We see mariners in a storm can throw overboard rich bales of silk, and precious things, to preserve the vessel and their lives with it, and everyone say they act prudently; we know it is usual for soldiers in a city besieged, to batter down, or burn the fairest buildings without the walls, in which the enemy may shelter in the siege; and no man doubts but it is wisely done. Such as have gangrened legs or arms, can willingly stretch then out to be cut off, and not only thank, but pay the chirurgeon for his pains. And must God only be repined at, for casting over what will sink you in a storm? For pulling down that which would advantage your enemy in the siege of temptation? For cutting off of what would endanger your everlasting life? O inconsiderate, ungrateful man! are not these things, for which you grieve, the very things that have ruined thousands of souls? Well, what Christ does in this, you know not now, but hereafter you may.

Help 6. It would much stay the heart under adversity, to consider That God, by such humbling providences, may be accomplishing that for which you have long prayed and waited. And should you be troubled at that? Say, Christian, have you not many prayers depending before God upon such accounts as these, that he would keep you from sin, discover to you the emptiness and insufficiency of the creature; that he would kill and mortify your lusts, that your heart may never find rest in any enjoyment but Christ/ Why now, by such humbling and impoverishing strokes, God may be fulfilling your desire. Would you be kept from sin? This is the way: now God takes away the food and fuel that maintained them; for as prosperity begat and fed them, so adversity, when sanctified, as a mean to kill them. Would you have your heart to rest no where but in the bosom of God? What better way can you imagine providence should take to accomplish your desire, than by pulling from under your head, that soft pillow of creature delights on which you rested before? And yet you fret at this, peevish child! How do you exercise you Father's patience? If he delay to answer your prayers, you are ready to say he regards you not; if he do that which really answers to scope and main end of them, but no in the way you expected, he were crossing all your hopes and aims; is this ingenuous? It is not enough that God is so gracious to do what you desire, but you must be so impudent to expect he should do it in the way which you prescribed?

Help 7. Again, it may you heart, if you consider, that in these troubles, God is about that work, which if you did see the design of, your soul would rejoice. [\[Jonathan Edwards said that it is important that Christians study the word so as to come to a knowledge of the wisdom of the way of salvation and in this sense Flavel explains.\]](#) We, poor creatures, are bemisted with much ignorance and are not able to discern how particular providences work towards God's end; and therefore, like Israel in the wilderness, are often murmuring, because Providence leads us about in a howling desert, where we are exposed to straits; though yet, then he led them, and is now leading us, but by the right way, to a city of habitations. If you could see how God, in his secret counsel, has exactly laid the whole plot and design of your salvation, even to the smallest means and circumstances; this way, and by these means such a one shall be saved, and by no other; such a number of afflictions I appoint for this man, at this time and in this order; they shall befall him thus, and thus they shall work for him. Could you, I say, but discern the admirable harmony of divine dispensations, their mutual relations to each other, together with the general respect and influence they all have unto the last end of all the conditions in the world, you would choose that you are now in, had you liberty to make your own choice. Providence is like a curious piece of arras [a wall hanging tapestry...], made up of a thousand shreds, which single we know not what to make of, but put together, and stitched up orderly, they represent a beautiful history to the eye. As God works all things according to the counsel of his own will, so that the counsel of God has ordained this as the best way to bring about your salvation; such a one has a proud heart, so many humbling providences appointed for him; such a one an earthly heart, so may impoverishing providences for him. Did you but see this, I need say no more to support the most dejected heart.

Think it not then debasing to you to be so often exposed to trials. If God did not value you highly, he would not try you so frequently. What would become of you if your condition here should be more settled and quiet than now it is? I believe you find dross enough in your hearts after all the fires into which God has cast you. Surely there is filth enough in the best of God's people to tale all this, it may be a great deal more trouble than they have yet met with. We fancy it a brave life to live at ease; and if we meet with longer respites and intervals of trial than usual, we are apt to say, We shall never be moved, as David did, ps. 30:6, or we shall die in our nest, as it is Job 29:18. Our hard and difficult days are over; but woe to you if God should give us the desire of our hearts in this. See what the temper of those men's spirits is, that meet with no changes, Ps. 55:19, "Because they have no changes, therefore, they fear not God." O it is better to be preserved sweet in brine, than to rot in honey.

Infer. 3 Thirdly, Let none boast in a carnal confidence of their own strength and stability. You are in a state of trial, Hitherto God has kept you upright in all your trials; bless God, but boast not; you are but feathers in the wind of temptation if God leave you to yourselves. Peter told Christ, (and doubtless he spoke no more than he honestly meant) "Though all men forsake thee, yet will not I." And you know what he did when the hour of his trial came, Matt. 26:35. Angels left to themselves have fallen. It is better to be a humble worm than a proud angel.

Added excerpt from page 315, Parable of the Ten Virgins by Thomas Shepard, regarding the feigned esteeming of Christ by hypocrites

IV. I add, he esteems him [Christ] thus,

1. As his present good; so that if the Lord do withdraw or deny himself, now unto him nothing in this world can for present quiet him, Jer. 50:4,5. Hence those in their judgments acknowledge Christ the greatest good, and when they are dying, and see he will so at the last day, yet now for the present a little more liberty in sin, sloth, lust, honor, gain, lots, large accommodations are better. You never saw him. O, vile world; thy Lord will one day condemn you out of your own mouth; thy own will was more dear to thee than his, this world's ease better than his peace, etc. When you lie on your death beds, you esteem him then. Why? Because he serves your turn then. Hence, before you did not.

While God keeps men under sad temptations, wants, and afflictions; O, then they are humble, and pray; but when blessed with ease, and peace, and plenty, and honor, then how lofty and secure! This is better than the Lord. Never such a decay of the spirit of prayer; never was there such a confusion in the world, such burning of cities, slaying of men, rents of churches, God minding to stain the pride of all glory; and yet never such hearts.

Save this and study it! It is one of the most important things to think about. Am I saved? How do I know it? What is the evidence of it? This will increase your faith and endearment to God from a dead and slothful frame to a more lively frame of daily contemplation and prayer, love to and adoration of God and due exercise of being spiritual minded.

Chap. IV
Upon the Feeding of fat Cattle
By John Flavel
vol. 5 p 170

Fat beasts you kill, the lean you use to save;

God's dispensations some such meaning have

Observation

It is a good observation of a Father, and well applied: Oxen for use are daily yoked and kept short, whilst those that are designed for the shambles, are let loose in green pastures to feed at pleasure. Store beasts fare hard, and are kept lean and low; feeding beasts are excused from the yoke, whilst others are labored and wrought hard every day; the one hath more than he can eat, the other would eat more if he had it.

Application

Thus deals the Lord oft-times with his own elect, whom he designs for glory; and with the wicked, who are preparing for the day of wrath. This are filled with earthly prosperity and creature-enjoyments, like lusty and wanton beasts turned out at liberty in a fat pasture, whilst poor saints are kept hard and short, Amos 4:1, "Hear this world, ye kine of Bashan, that are in the mountains of Samaria, which oppress the poor, crush the needy." These metaphorical kine are the prosperous oppressors of the world, full fed, and wanton, wicked men. It is true, heaven hath not all the poor, nor hell all the rich; but it is a very common dispensation of providence to bestow most of the things of this world upon them that have no portion in heaven; and to keep them short on earth, for whom that kingdom is provided. Let me draw forth the similitude in a few particulars.

1. The beasts of slaughter have the fattest pastures; so have the ungodly in the world; "Their eyes stand out with fatness: they have "more than heart could wish," Ps 73:7. Their hearts are as fit as grease, Ps 119:70. These be they that fleet off the cream of earthly enjoyments, "whose bellies are filled with hidden treasures," Ps 17:14, "The earth is given into the hand of the wicked," Job 9:24. O what full estates what an affluence of earthly delights hath God cast in upon some wicked men! There is much 14

Reflections

A reflection for a voluptuous worldling

Doth my prosperity fat me up for hell, and prepare me for the day of slaughter? Little cause have I then to glory in it, and lift up my heart upon these things, Indeed, God hath given (I cannot say blessed me with) a fullness of creature-enjoyments; upon these my carnal heart seizeth greedily and securely, not at all suspecting a snare lying in these things for the ruin of my soul. What are all these charming pleasures, but so may rattles to quiet my soul, whilst its damnation steals insensibly upon it? What are all my businesses and employments in the world, but so many diversions from the business of life? There are but two differences betwixt me and the poorest slave the devil hath on earth; such are whipped on to hell by outward miseries, and I am coached to hell in little more pomp and honour; these will have a less, and I a greater account in the day of reckoning. O that I had never known prosperity! I am now tumbling in a green pasture, and shortly shall be hanging up in the shambles of hell. If this be the best fruit of my prosperity, if I were taken captive by cruel cannibals, and fed with richest fare, but withal understood, that the design of it were to fat me up like a beast for them to feed upon, how little stomach should I have to their dainties! I my soul! It were much better for thee to have a sanctified poverty, which is the portion of many saints, than an ensnaring prosperity, set as a trap to ruin thee forever.

A reflection for a poor Christian

2. The wisdom of my God hath allotted me but short commons here; his providence feeds me, but from hand to mouth; but I am, and well may be, contented with my present state; that which sweetens it is, that I am one of the Lord's preserved. How much better is a morsel of bread and a draught of water here, with an expectancy of glory hereafter, than a fat pasture given in, and a fitting for the wrath to come? Well, since the case stands thus, blessed be God for my present lot! Though I have but a little in hand, I have much in hope; my present troubles will serve to sweeten my future joys; and the sorrows of this life will give a lustre to the glory of the next. That which is now hard to suffer, will then be sweet to remember; my songs will then be louder than my groans now are.

Elisha Coles \(Calvinist theologian in England in the 1650s\) comments on this same subject:

Are other men prosperous in the world, and free from trouble, while you are reduced to a low estate, and chastened every morning? have, perhaps, but a handful of meal, and a little oil in a cruse, etc., yet think not your portion mean, or hardly dealt out; good things are to come; they are growing in the other world; and at the time of harvest the Lord will send his angels for you; yea, your Lord himself will come and fetch you thither; and "you shall be forever with him, in whose presence is fullness of joy, and at whose right hand are rivers of pleasures for evermore; and then you will sing, "The lines are fallen to me in pleasant places;" at least say so now. As Abraham dealt by his concubines' children, so doth God by the Ishmaels of the world, he gives them portions, and sends them away, Genesis 25:6. But the inheritance he reserves for his Isaacs; to them he gives all that he has, yea, even himself; and what can we have more! - Elisha Coles

Gen 25:5 And Abraham gave all that he had unto Isaac.

Gen 25:6 But unto the sons of the concubines, which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his son, while he yet lived, eastward, unto the east country.

THE POEM

Those beasts which for the shambles are design'd
 In fragrant flow'ry meadows you shall find,
 Where they abound with rich and plenteous fare,
 Whilst others graze in commons thin and bare.
 Those live a short and pleasant life, but these Protract their lives in dry and shorter leas.
 Thus live the wicked; thus they do abound
 With earthly glory, and with honour crown'd
 Their lofty heads unto the stars aspire,
 And radiant beams their shining brows attire.
 The fattest portion's serv'd up in their dish;

Yea, they have more than their own hearts can wish.
 Dissolv'd in pleasures, crown'd with buds of May;
 They, for a time, in these fat pastures play,
 Frisk, dance and leap, like full-fed beasts; and even Turn up their wanton heels against the heaven;
 Not understanding that this pleasant life,
 Serves but to fit them for the butcher's knife.
 In fragrant meads they tumbling are to-day,
 Tomorrow to the slaughter led away.
 Their pleasure's gone, and vanish like a bubble,
 Which makes their future torments on them double.
 Meanwhile God's little flock is poor and lean,
 Because the Lord did ne'er intend or mean
 This for their portion; and besides doth know
 Their souls prove best, where shortest grass doth grow.
 Cheer up, poor flock, although your fare be thin,
 Yet here is something to take comfort in:
 You here securely feed, and need not fear,
 The infernal butcher can't approach you here.
 'Tis somewhat that; but, oh! Which far transcends,
 Your glorious shepherd's coming, who intends
 To lead you hence unto that fragrant hill,
 Where, with green pastures, he his flocks fill;
 Or which he from celestial casements pours
 The sweetest dews, and constant gracious show'rs;
 Along whose banks rivers of pleasures glide,
 There his bless'd flocks for ever shall abide,
 O envy not the worldling's present joys.
 Which to your future mercies are but toys,
 Their pasture now is green, your's dry and burn'd,
 But then the scene is chang'd, the tables turn'd.

Psalm 73

3 So, Lord, when You awake,
 You shall despise their image.
21 Thus my heart was grieved,
 And I was vexed in my mind.
22 I was so foolish and ignorant;
 I was like a beast before You.
23 Nevertheless I am continually with You;
 You hold me by my right hand.
24 You will guide me with Your counsel,
 And afterward receive me to glory.

²⁵ Whom have I in heaven but You?
 And there is none upon earth that I desire besides You.
²⁶ My flesh and my heart fail;
But God is the strength of my heart and my portion forever.
²⁷ For indeed, those who are far from You shall perish;
 You have destroyed all those who do desert You for harlotry.
²⁸ But it is good for me to draw near to God;
 I have put my trust in the Lord GOD,
 That I may declare all Your works.

1Cor4:15-18

¹⁵ For all things are for your sakes, that the abundant grace might through the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God. ¹⁶ For which cause we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. ¹⁷ For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; ¹⁸ While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal.

Another excerpt from Vol. IV, pg 97:

Ah it is good that God takes such a course with some sinners, else the word would do them no good; and to this purpose is that in Job 36:8-10, "And if they be bound in fetters, and Holden in cords of affliction; then he shewith with them their work and their transgression, that they have exceeded; and openeth their ears to discipline." This is that rough course the obstinacy of men's hearts makes necessary for their recovery, and therefore it is very observable, that some words of God have lain dead in some sinners hearts for years together, and at last have begun to work under some smart and close rod. Alas, while all things are pleasant and prosperous about us, the word hath but little operation and effect: Jer. 22:21-22, "I spake unto thee in thy prosperity, but thou saidst I will not hear; this hath been thy manner from thy youth, that thou obeyedst not my voice. The wind shall eat up all thy pastures, and thy lovers shall go into captivity; surely then shalt thou be ashamed and confounded for all thy wickedness." That is, Your eyes are so dazzled with the beautiful flowers, and your ears so charmed with the Syren songs or earthly delights, that my word can take no place upon you. Let an east wing blow and wither up these flowers; then the word shall work, and conscience resent the concernments of eternity. This course God is fain to take with many of you; here you sit from Sabbath to Sabbath under the word, and nothing takes place upon your hearts. Will you not hear the voice of my word? Go, death, saith God, smite that man's child dead, I will try what that will do; go, poverty, and blast this estate, and see what that will do; go, sickness, and smite his body, and shake him over the grave's mouth, I will see what that will do. Thus God sends to sinners, as Absalom sent to Joab, who refused to come near him, till he set fire to his field of corn, and then away comes Joab, 2Sam. 14:29-31. And thus the Lord opened the heart of the Jailor, by putting him into a fright, a panic fear of death, Acts 16:27. And thus doth the Lord devise means to bring back his banished.

And one last comment by Thomas Shepard that relates to this subject of prosperity and its spiritually numbing effects: It is this tendency to abuse our liberty that remains in believers in varying degrees, that God keeps them lean as Flavel stated above.

Use 2. Hence see the reason why the Lord hath deprived his churches of their liberty, and his government over them at sundry times, and hath put them under iron yokes and bonds, and sore pressures; the reason is shown - they have either openly or more secretly cast off the government of the Lord; here hath been the ail of all churches famous and glorious, Ps 81:14, "O that they had hearkened! I should then soon have subdued their enemies." The cause is not so hard to find to a discerning spirit who is privy in any measure to the counsels of God, 1 Kings 9:8, 9, Solomon hath a promise that "the Lord's eyes and heart shall be to his people" which are under him; but if once they slip the collar, then woe; and why? "Because they forsook the Lord that brought them out of Egypt;" they had liberty, but they cast it off.

What do you think was the moving cause of all those bloody persecutions, when the blood of dogs was more precious than of Christian churches? Were not they godly? Yes, I do not doubt of it. But as it was here, though humbled they must be in bondage, because they had cast off the government of the Lord Jesus. And hence in the apostle's time, evil times were come, sad apostasies from the truth, and because it was long before they were low enough. And hence, (Rev. vi) till the fifth seal was opened, no crying; as it was with Israel in bondage, no prayer to purpose and because the Lord saw they would abuse all liberties if they had them. And hence in Constantine's time when peace came in, contention came with it, and so abused all that their peace was their poison. And hence in the primitive churches they began to cast off the government of the Lord Jesus; murmurings there were, hence came persecution; but they were a precious people, and made blessed use of it. And the Lord couples their chief persecution with their rest. And it is said, (Acts 9:31) "Then had the churches rest," etc.

And what do you think of the reason of the long reign of Antichrist exalting himself above God and all that is called God, bringing the church under the heaviest bondage for body and soul that ever the earth saw? Men did not love the truth either speculative to guide their minds or practical to rule their wills and hence left to this day.

What is the cause of bleeding Germany's woe? O poor Germany! whence the gospel first brake out in its full strength, that now it is a field of blood, that men in woods like satyrs are afraid of men, and men in cities glad to eat the entrails of beasts and sometimes the flesh of their own babes to preserve their lives. What, was there no evil but the common condition of the church to be under the cross? Ask them, they cannot tell what ails them, but curse the emperor and Swedes, etc. O, think of it with sorrow, in secret, for them that know it not themselves; they have secretly, I say, secretly cast off the government of a merciful Christ and hence are under the hand of unmerciful men.

What is the cause in our native country, notwithstanding all prayers and tears, no deliverance? Truly, men do not know it, but the Lord sees it; they know not how to use their liberty.

This is one of the best discourses in what to look for to confirm your saving interest in Christ. Many Christians have scruples and doubts as to whether or not they are saved. This production of Shepard clears that up, a great consolation.

The Image of God Restored in our Sanctification

code130

Evidence of our Assurance of our Good Estate!

Heb 6:4,5, 2Tim3:5, Deut. 5:29 etc.

Thomas Shepard,

from The Sound Believer, p 352-362

Sect. IV - Fourthly, Sanctification

This is the fourth benefit, which follows in order of nature, our justification, reconciliation and adoption; for upon our being sons in adoption, we receive the image of our heavenly Father, in sanctification; because we are under grace. Hence it comes to pass, that we are freed from the reigning power of sin, Rom. 6:14, so that our sanctification follows our justification, and adoption goes not before it. In justification we have the love and righteousness of the Son; in reconciliation, the love of the Father; in adoption, the love of the Father, and presence of the Spirit assisting, witnessing; in sanctification, the image of our Father by the same Spirit; and this I conceive with submission, is the seal of the Spirit, mentioned, Eph. 1:13. The seal sealing, is the Spirit itself; and seal sealed, consists, First, in the expression of it in adoption. Secondly, in the impression of it in sanctification, and that he only shall pass full and clear expression and testimony of the Spirit is after all God's work is finished in glorification, but the beginning of it is here in adoption, a fuller measure of it in sanctification. God's seal is ever set to some promise (as men's seals to some bond, not to planks) the Lord's promise of actual justification and reconciliation, pertains only to men sanctified or called; in adoption therefore we receive the Spirit, which looks both way; testifying either you're sanctified, are justified, or you're called, are justified and reconciled.

I speak not now of external sanctification by outward show and profession, and common illumination and operation of the Spirit upon men, from which many fall away, Heb. 10:29 [and Heb 6:4-6], but of internal and special [i.e., saving grace]; the nature of which you may best conceive in these three particulars:

1. It is the renewing of a man, Tit. 3:5¹, so that by it a man is morally made a new man, another man; All things are become new, 2Cor. 5:17, he has new thoughts, new opinions of things, new desires, new prayers, and praises, new dispositions; regeneration not differing from it.

¹ Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost;

2. It is a renewing of the whole man, 1Thes. 5:23 [Now may the God of peace himself sanctify you completely], for in every part and faculty of man is corrupt by the first Adam, so they are renewed by the second Adam; not that we are perfectly renewed in this life by Christ, as we are corrupt by Adam, but in part in every faculty, Rom. 6:19. And hence arises our spiritual combat and warfare with sin, yea with all sin; it is not because of our sanctification simply (for if it were perfect, we should war and wrestle no more); but from the imperfection of it. And this renewal in part, is in every part, even in the whole man. And as the first Adam propagates sin chiefly and radically in the soul, especially into the heart of man; and from thence it diffuses itself like leaven, into the whole lump of our lives, so the Lord Jesus chiefly communicates this renewal into our hearts, and thence it sweetens our lives; and hence it is called the inner man [that new and vital living principle of life: faith grace and truth...Owen], Romans 7:22, Eph. 3:16. You see a little holiness in a Christian, I tell you, if he be of the right make, there is a kind of infinite endless holiness within him, from whence it springs [John 7:38, He who believes in Me, as the Scripture has said, out of his heart will flow rivers of living water.]; as there is a kind of endless infinite wickedness in a wicked man, from whence his sins spring; if a man be outwardly holy, but not within, he is not sanctified, no more than the painted sepulchres of the proud Pharisees; if any man say his heart is good, should he make no show in his life, he speaks not the truth, if the apostle may be believed, 1John1:6. For sanctification is a renewal of the whole man, within and without; it is not for a man to have his teeth white, and his tongue tipt, and his nails pared. No, no; the Lord makes all new when he comes.

3. It is a renewal unto the image of God, or of God in Christ; an unsanctified man may be in a sort renewed in the whole man, his outward conversation may be fair, his mind may be enlightened, his heart may taste of the heavenly gift, etc., Heb. 6:4, 5. He may have a form of godliness, 2Tim3:5, he may have strong resolutions within him unto godliness, Deut. 5:29, and hence with the five foolish virgins may be received into the fellowship of the wise, and not discerned of them neither, till the gate is shut; but they are never renewed in their whole man after the image of God, i.e., they do not know things and judge of them as God does, they do not love and will holiness and the means thereto, as God does, they hate not sin as God does, they do not delight in the whole law of God, it is not writ in their hearts, and hence they love it not as God does; and this is to cut off the thread between a sanctified and unsanctified spirit; by sanctification a man is renewed unto God's image, once lost, but here again restored, Eph. 4:24, John 1:16, We receive from Christ, grace for grace, as the seal of the wax has tittle for tittle to that in the seal itself; we are changed into the image of Christ by beholding him in the glass of the gospel, by faith, 2Cor3:18. I delight in the law of God in my inward man, Rom. 7:23, and hence a Christian by the life of sanctification, lives like unto God, at least has a holy disposition and inclination (the habits of holiness) so to do, Gal. 2:19, I live unto God, he calls us from darkness unto his marvelous light, that we might show forth his virtues, and that this is true sanctification, may thus appear; because our sanctification is opposed to our original corruption, as our justification to our original and contracted guilt of sin; now as original corruption is the defacing of God's image by contrary dispositions to sinfulness, so our sanctification can be nothing else but the removal of this pollution, by the contrary habits and dispositions to be like unto God again; our sanctification is to be holy, Lev. 20:7. Our holiness has no other primary pattern but God's holiness, 1Pet. 1:14-16, so that our sanctification is not the righteousness and holiness as it is inherent in Christ, for that is the matter of our justification, and therefore sanctification must be that holiness which is derived unto us from Christ, whereby we are made like unto him; and thus Christ is made sanctification unto us, 1Cor.1:30. There should be no difference between Christ our righteousness and sanctification, if that holiness which is in Christ should be both to us. Hence also sanctification is not the immediate operation of the Spirit upon us, without created habits of grace abiding in us, as the spirit that came upon Balaam, and mightily affected him for a time, but left him as destitute of any grace, or change of his nature, as the ass he rode on. No, no; it renews you unto the image of God himself, if you be truly sanctified. And therefore let those dreams of the Familists (denying all inherent graces, but only those that are in Christ, to be in the saints) let them vanish and perish from under the sun, and the good Lord reduce all such who in simplicity are misled from this blessed truth of God. I will not now enter into that depth concerning the means of our sanctification, in mortification by Christ's death, and vivification by the resurrection of Christ; this may suffice for explication of the nature of it.

Only see, and forever prize this privilege, all you blessed souls whom the Lord has justified; you have many sad complaints. What is it to me, if I be justified in Christ and be saved at last by Christ, and my heart remains all this while unholy and unsubdued unto the will of Christ; that he should comfort me and my unholy heart be always grieving him; what thought the Lord save me from misery but save me not from my sin? Oh consider this benefit. It is true, you find a woeful sinful nature within you, cross and contrary to holiness, and leading you daily into captivity; yet remember the Lord has given you another nature, a new nature; there is something else within you which makes you wrestle against sin, and shall in time prevail over all sin, Mat. 12:20¹. This is the Lord's grace sanctifying of you. Oh be thankful that the Lord has not left you wholly corrupt, but has begun to glorify himself in you and to bless you in turning you from your iniquities.

¹ A bruised reed he will not break, and a smoldering wick he will not snuff out, till he has brought justice through to victory.

1. By this you have a most sweet and comfortable evidence of your justification and favor with God; he that denies this must whatever distinctions he has) abolish many places of scripture, especially the epistles of James and John, who had to do with some spirits, that pretended faith and union to Christ, and communion with him, and so long as it was thus, this was evidence sufficient to them of their justified estates. What says James? Thou says thou has faith, show to me then; Prove it, says he: I will prove it by the blessed fruits and works which flow from it, as Abraham manifested his, James 2:18,22. What says John? You talk (says he) of fellowship and communion with Christ and yet what holiness is in your hearts of live? If we say we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie and do not the truth; but if you walk in the light, then although your holiness and confession, and daily repentance for sin do not wash away your sin, yet the blood of Christ does wash us, 1John1:6, 7. Again you say, you know Christ, and the love and good will of Christ toward you, and that he is the propitiation for your sins. How do you know this? Says he, He that says I know him and keep not his commandments, he that keeps not the commandments, is a liar, 1Jn2:4. True, might some reply, he that keeps not the command of Christ, has hereby a sure evidence that he know him not, and that he is not united to him, but is this any evidence that we do know him, and that we are united to him, if we do keep his commandments? Yes verily says the apostle, hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep his commandments, verse 8, and again, verse 5, Hereby know we that we are in him. What can be more plain? What a vanity is this to say, that this is running upon a covenant of works? Is not sanctification the writing of the law in our hearts³, a special benefit of the covenant of grace as well as justification? Heb. 13:10, 12. And can the evidencing then of one benefit, of such a covenant by another, be a running upon the covenant of works? Is it a truth contained in the covenant of grace, namely, that he that is justified, is also sanctified, and he that is sanctified is also justified? And is it an error against grace to see this truth, that he that is sanctified is certainly justified? And that therefore he that knows himself sanctified may also know thereby that he is justified. Tell me, how will you know that you are justified? You will say, by the testimony of the Spirit; and cannot the same Spirit shine upon your graces, and witness that you are sanctified as well? 1John4:13, 14¹, 1Cor 2:12² Can the Spirit make the one clearer to you and not the other?

³ Ezek. 11:19, 36:26, Jer. 31:33 - I will put my law within them, and I will write it on their hearts

Oh beloved, it is a sad thing to hear such questions and such cold answers, also that sanctification possibly may be an evidence; may be, it is not certain. Assuredly, to deny it, is as bad as to affirm that God's own promises of favor are true evidences thereof, and consequently that they are lies and untruths; for search the scriptures, and consider sadly, how many evangelical promises are made unto several graces, i.e., unto such persons as are invested with them; you may only take a taste from Matt. 5:3, 4, etc. Where our Savior (who was not legal preacher) pronounced, and consequently evidences blessedness by eight or nine promises, expressly made to such persons as had inherent graces of poverty, mourning, meekness, etc. there mentioned; the Lord Jesus leaving those precious legacies of his promise unto his children, that are called by those names of mourners, poor in spirit, pure in heart, etc. That so everyone may take and be assured of his portion manifested particularly therein; that I many times wonder how it comes to pass, that this so plain and ancient principle of catechism (for to it was among the Waldenses many hundred years since) grounded on so many scriptures, should come to be so much as questioned in our days; sometimes I think it arises from some wretched lusts men have a mind to live quietly in; desirous to keep their peace, and yet unwilling to forsake their lusts; and hence they exclude this witness of water, the witness of sanctification, to testify in the court of conscience, whether they are beloved of God, and sincere hearted or no, because this is a full witness against them, and tells them to their faces, that there is no peace to the wicked, Isa. 57 ult., Deut. 29:19, 20¹, and that they have nothing to do to take God's name in their polluted lips, who secretly hate to be reformed, Ps. 50:16²

¹¹⁹and so it may not happen, when he hears the words of this curse, that he blesses himself in his heart, saying, 'I shall have peace, even though I follow the dictates of my heart'—as though the drunkard could be included with the sober.

²But to the wicked God says: "What right have you to declare My statutes, Or take My covenant in your mouth, Seeing you hate instruction And cast My words behind you?"

[this is key here: this how we get a witness of the Spirit that Christ is ours, our sanctification in action! Shepard explains]

In others, I think it does not arise from want of grace, but because the spirit of grace and sanctification runs very low in them; it is so little that they can scarce see it by the help of spectacles; or if they do, they doubt continually of the truth of it; and hence, because it can speak little, and that little very darkly and obscurely for them, they have no great mind that it should be brought in as any witness for them. Others, I think, may have much grace and holiness, yet for a time cast it by as an evidence unto them, because they have experience how difficult and troublesome it is to find this evidence; and when it is found, how troublesome to read it, and keep it fair, and thereby have constant peace and quietness; and hence arise those speeches, why do you look to your sanctification, a blotted evidence? You may have it today and lose it tomorrow, and then where is our peace? And I do believe the Lord deprives many of his saints from the comfort of this evidence; either because they look only to this and not unto Christ, and their justification by faith, Rom 5:1, or else because there is some secret lust of guile of spirit, Ps. 32:1, 2 [Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, Whose sin is covered. ² Blessed is the man to whom the LORD does not impute iniquity, And in whose spirit there is no deceit.], which the Lord by sore and long shakings about their calling and sanctification, would first winnow out; or because there is a perverse forwardness of spirit, whereby, because they feel not that measure of sanctification which they would, do therefore vilify, and so come to deny what indeed they have; because they feel a law of sin in their members, leading them captive; will not, with Paul, take notice of the law of their minds, whereby that inner-man delight in the law of God, and mourns bitterly under the body of death, by which they might see with Paul, that there is no condemnation to such Rom. 8:1. To conclude, whatever is the cause of this crookedness of judgment, I do believe that the general cause is want of attendance and standing unto the judgment of the scriptures in this controversy. For if this was stood unto, men would not produce their own experience, namely, that they could never find any evidence from sanctification, but they have met with it in another way, by the immediate witness of the Spirit only; nor would men cry it down, because grace being mixed with so much corruption, it can hardly be discerned, and so will be always left in doubts, and that the heart is deceitful, and many that have evidenced their estates hereby, have been deceived. I confess thus the popish doctors argue against assurance of faith from the scriptures without special and extraordinary revelations, but what is all this to the purpose, if the scriptures make it an evidence? Away then with corrupt experience, shall this be judge, or the scripture rather? What though many judging of themselves by marks and signs have been deceived; yet, if the scripture make it an evidence (as we have proved) then, though men through their own weakness or wickedness have been deceived by misapplying the promises; yet the scriptures cannot deceive you. What though it be difficult to discern Christ's grace in us? Yet, if the scriptures will have us try our estates by that rule, which in itself is easy, but to our blindness and weakness difficult many time so see; who shall, who dare condemn the holy scriptures? Which as they shall judge us at last, should judge us no. Suppose that diverse books, and many ministers sometimes give false signs of grace and God's favor; yet, do the scriptures give any? I shall propose one thing to conscience, is the conclusion to this discourse. Suppose you were now lying on your death-bed, comforting yourself in your elected and justified estate; suppose the Spirit of God should now grapple with your conscience, and tell you, if you are justified, then you are called, and sanctified, 2Thes. 2:13, 14 [But we ought always to give thanks to God for you, brothers beloved by the Lord, because God chose you as the firstfruits^d to be saved, through sanctification by the Spirit and belief in the truth. ¹⁴ To this he called you through our gospel, so that you may obtain the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ.] Is it thus with you? What will you answer? If you say, you are not sanctified, the world and Spirit will bear witness then against you, and say, they you are not elected nor justified; if you say, you know not, you look not to sanctification, or fruits of the Spirit, they will then reply, how then can you say that you are elected or justified? For it is a truth as clear as the sun, and as immovable as heaven and earth; none are elected and justified but they are also sanctified, Romans 8. And now tell me, how can you have peace unless you make your faces like flint before the face of God's eternal truth, or heal your consciences by such a plaster as will not stick? If therefore the Lord ever made sin bitter to you, yet holiness be sweet; if continuance in sin has been an evidence unto you of your condemnation, Oh let the riches of the grace of Christ in redeeming you from the lamentable bondage and power of sin, be an evidence to you of your salvation; do not scorn, or secretly despise the Spirit of grace, [Zach 4:10] as many in this degenerate age do, saying, you look to graces and fruits, and marks and signs, and a holy frame of heart and sanctification; what is your sanctification? Oh let it be the more precious unto you, mourning that you have so little, and blessing the Father of all grace for what little you have, wearing it as a bracelet of gold about your neck, knowing hereby that you are born of God, and that the whole world lies in wickedness, and shall perish without this, 1 John 5:18, 19.

2. This is your glory and beauty, this is glorification begun; what greater glory than to be like God? To be like unto God is to be next to God; and therefore this is called glory, 2Cor3:18, we are changed from glory to glory. Every degree of grace is glory, and the perfection of glory in heaven consists chiefly in the perfection of grace; what is the work of some men at this day, but to cast reproach upon sanctification, our glory. However, the earthly man, unregenerate, is being formed into an earthly image; see [code129a]

3. This will give you abundance of sweet peace, and therefore, Heb. 12:11 [For the moment all discipline seems painful rather than pleasant, but later it yields the peaceful fruit of righteousness to those who have been trained by it.] It is called the quiet fruit of righteousness; for from whence come the sore troubles and continual doubts of God's favor in many men's consciences? Is it not some decay or guile here? Ps. 32:1, 2 [Blessed is the one whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered.² Blessed is the man against whom the LORD counts no iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no deceit.] Is it not some boldness to sin; that they walk not in fear, and therefore not in the consolation of the Holy Ghost? Is it not their secret dalliance with some known sin, continued in with impenitency? Is it not because they labor with some strong and unmortified corruption, pride, or passions that they are in daily pangs and throes of conscience for? Ps. 32:1-4 [Blessed is the one whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered.² Blessed is the man against whom the LORD counts no iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no deceit. ³ For when I kept silent, my bones wasted away through my groaning all day long. ⁴ For day and night your hand was heavy upon me; my strength was dried up as by the heat of summer.] What was the rejoicing of Paul? Was it not that in all sincerity and simplicity he had his conversation among men? 2Cor1:12 [For our boast is this, the testimony of our conscience, that we behaved in the world with simplicity^[d] and godly sincerity, not by earthly wisdom but by the grace of God, and supremely so toward you.] What was Hezekiah's peace when dying, as he thought? Was it not this, Lord, remember I have walked before thee uprightly? Isa. 38:2, 3. Not that this was the ground of their peace, for that only is free grace in Christ but this is the means of your peace, John 14:22, 23, it is a curse peace which is kept by looking to Christ, your living your lust.

4. This is that which will make you fit for God's use, 2Tim. 2:20, 21¹, a filthy unclean vessel is good for nothing till cleansed; God will not delight to glorify himself much by an unsanctified person; what is your wife, children, friends, family the better for you, if your heart remain unsanctified?

¹ Now in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and silver but also of wood and clay, some for honorable use, some for dishonorable. ²¹ Therefore, if anyone cleanses himself from what is dishonorable,^[d] he will be a vessel for honorable use, set apart as holy, useful to the master of the house, ready for every good work.

5. A little holiness is eminently all, springing up to eternal life; this little spring shall never cease running, but it shall fill heaven itself, and your soul in it with abundance of glory, John 4:14¹, and 8:38². You despise it, because it is little; [Zach. 4:10, don't despise small beginnings, etc.] I tell you this little is eminently all, and contains as much as shall be poured out by you so long as God is God. It is true, you say it is weak, and often foiled, and gives you not complete power and victory over all sin; yet know, that this shall, like the house of David, grow stronger and stronger, and it shall at last prevail, and the Lord will not break thee, though you are *bruised*³ by sin daily, until judgment come to victory; and the prince of this world shall be judged, and your soul perfected in the day of the Lord Jesus.

¹ but whoever drinks of the water that I will give him will never be thirsty again. The water that I will give him will become in him a spring of water welling up to eternal life." Jn 4:14

³ A bruised reed He will not break, And smoking flax He will not quench; He will bring forth justice for truth. Isa 42:3

4. Another effect we have of his, Rom. viii. 16, "The Spirit itself bears witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." You know whose children we are by nature, — children of Satan and of the curse, or of wrath. By the Spirit we are put into another capacity, and are adopted to be the children of God, inasmuch as by receiving the Spirit of our Father we become the children of our Father. Thence is he called, verse 15, "The Spirit of adoption." Now, sometimes the soul, because it has somewhat remaining in it of the principle that it had in its old condition, is put to question whether it be a child of God or not; and thereupon, as in a thing of the greatest importance, puts in its claim, with all the evidences that it hath to make good its title. The Spirit comes and bears witness in this case. An allusion it is to judicial proceedings in point of titles and evidences. The judge being set, the person concerned lays his claim, produces his evidences, and pleads them; his adversaries endeavoring all that in them lies to invalidate them, and disannul his plea, and to cast him in his claim. In the midst of the trial, a person of known and approved integrity comes into the court, and gives testimony fully and directly on the behalf of the claimer; which stops the mouths of all his adversaries, and fills the man that pleaded with joy and satisfaction. So is it in this case. The soul, by the power of its own conscience, is brought before the law of God. There a man puts in his plea, — that he is a child of God, that he belongs to God's family; and for this end produces all his evidences, everything whereby faith gives him an interest in God. Satan, in the meantime, opposes with all his might; sin and law assist him; many flaws are found in his evidences; the truth of them all is questioned; and the soul hangs in suspense as to the issue. In the midst of the plea and contest the Comforter comes, and, by a word of promise or otherwise, overpowers the heart with a comfortable persuasion (and bears down all objections) that his plea is good, and that he is a child of God. And therefore it is said of him, Συμμαρτυρεῖ τῷ Πνεύματι ἡμῶν. [He's a witness to our Spirit. MS translator] When our spirits are pleading their right and title, he comes in and bears witness on our side; at the same time enabling us to put forth acts of filial obedience, kind and childlike; which is called “crying, Abba, Father,” Gal. iv. 6. Remember still the manner of the Spirit's working, before mentioned, — that he does it effectually, voluntarily, and freely [freely: not owed as a debt as though someone asked for it or by compulsion, or from any influence outside himself; hence, God is sovereign, I will have mercy on whomever I will have mercy... For grace to be grace it must be given freely, Romans 11:6] Hence sometimes the dispute hangs long, — the cause is pleading many years. The law seems sometimes to prevail, sin and Satan to rejoice; and the poor soul is filled with dread about its inheritance. Perhaps its own witness, from its faith, sanctification, former experience, keeps up the plea with some life and comfort; but the work is not done, the conquest is not fully obtained, until the Spirit, who work freely and effectually, when and how he will, comes in with his testimony also; clothing his power with a word of promise, he makes all parties concerned to attend unto him, and puts an end to the controversy.

Herein he gives us holy communion with himself. The soul knows his voice when he speaks, “Nec hominem sonat.” There is something too great in it to be the effect of a created power. When the Lord Jesus Christ at one word stilled the raging of the sea and wind, all that were with him knew there was divine power at hand, Matt. viii. 25–27. And when the Holy Ghost by one word stills the tumults and storms that are raised in the soul, giving it an immediate calm and security, it knows his divine power, and rejoices in his presence.

5. He seals us. “We are sealed by the Holy Spirit of promise, Eph. i. 13; and, “Grieve not the Holy Spirit, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption,” chap. iv. 30. I am not very clear in the certain peculiar intendment of this metaphor; what I am persuaded of the mind of God in it I shall briefly impart. In a seal two things are considered:— (1.) The nature of it. (2.) The use of it.

(1.) The nature of sealing consists in the imparting of the image or character of the seal to the thing sealed. This is to seal a thing, — to stamp the character of the seal on it. In this sense, the effectual communication of the image of God unto us should be our sealing. The Spirit in believers, really communicating the image of God, in righteousness and true holiness, unto the soul, seals us. To have this stamp of the Holy Ghost, so as to be an evidence unto the soul that it is accepted with God, is to be sealed by the Spirit; taking the metaphor from the nature of sealing. [Rev. 7:4]³⁵⁶ And in this sense is our Savior said to be sealed of God, John vi. 27, even from that impression of the power, wisdom, and majesty of God that he had upon him in the discharge of his office.

(2.) The end of sealing is twofold:—

[1.] To confirm or ratify any grant or conveyance made in writing. In such cases men set their seals to make good and confirm their grants; and when this is done they are irrevocable. Or to confirm the testimony that is given by any one of the truth of any thing. Such was the manner among the Jews:— when any one had given true witness unto any thing or matter, and it was received by the judges, they instantly set their seals to it, to confirm it in judgment. Hence it is said, that he who receives the testimony of Christ “sets to his seal that God is true,” John iii. 33. The promise is the great grant and conveyance of life and salvation in Christ to the souls of believers. That we may have full assurance of the truth and irrevocableness of the promise, God gives us the Spirit to satisfy our hearts of it; and thence is he said to seal us, by assuring our hearts of those promises and their stability. But, though many expositors go this way, I do not see how this can consist with the very meaning of the word. It is not said that the promise is sealed, but that we are sealed; and when we seal a deed or grant to any one, we do not say the man is sealed, but the deed or grant.

[2.] To appropriate, distinguish, or keep safe. This is the end of sealing. Men set their seals on that which they appropriate and desire to keep safe for themselves. So, evidently, in this sense are the servants of God said to be sealed, Rev. vii. 4; that is, marked with God’s mark, as his peculiar ones, — for this sealing answers to the setting of a mark, Ezek. ix. 4. Then are believers sealed, when they are marked for God to be heirs of the purchased inheritance, and to be preserved to the day of redemption. Now, if this be the sealing intended, it denotes not an act of sense in the heart, but of security to the person. The Father gives the elect into the hands of Christ to be redeemed; having redeemed them, in due time they are called by the Spirit, and marked for God, and so give up themselves to the hands of the Father.

If you ask, now, “Which of these senses is chiefly intended in this expression of our being sealed by the Holy Ghost?” I answer, The first, not excluding the other. We are sealed to the day of redemption, when, from the stamp, image, and character of the Spirit upon our souls, we have a fresh sense of the love of God given to us, with a comfortable persuasion of our acceptation with him. But of this whole matter I have treated at large³⁵⁷ elsewhere.

Thus, then, the Holy Ghost communicates unto us his own likeness; which is also the image of the Father and the Son. “We are changed into this image by the Lord the Spirit,” 2 Cor. iii. 18; and herein he brings us into fellowship with himself. Our likeness to him gives us boldness with him. His work we look for, his fruits we pray for; and when any effect of grace, any discovery of the image of Christ implanted in us, gives us a persuasion of our being separated and set apart for God, we have a communion with him therein.

Jonathan Edwards: God may have a real and proper pleasure or happiness in seeing the happy state of the creature; yet this may not be different from his delight in himself; being a delight in his own infinite goodness; or the exercise of that glorious propensity of his nature to diffuse and communicate himself and so gratifying this inclination of his own heart. This delight which God has in his creature’s happiness, cannot properly be said to be what God receives from the creature. For it is only the effect of his own work in and communications to the creature; in making it, and admitting it to a participation of his fullness. As the sun receives nothing from the jewel that receives its light, and shines only, by a participation of its brightness. God's Chief End in Creation

The Subject of Faith

In receiving the image of God
 Excerpt from The Sound Believer, pg 275

2. The subject matter of faith.

This is the second thing in the description of faith, the soul of a humble sinner, is the subject or matter of faith. I do not mean, the matter out of which faith is wrought, (for there is nothing in man out of which the Spirit begets it) but that wherein faith is seated; I mean also, the habit of faith, not the principle of it; for that is out of man in the Lord Jesus, who is therefore called our hope, as well as our strength; the soul therefore is the subject of faith, called the heart, Rom. 10:9, compared with Matt. 6:21, for we cannot come to Christ in this life with our bodies, we are here absent from the Lord, 2Cor5:6, but the soul can go to him, the heart can be with him, as the eyes can see a thousand miles off, and receive the species or image of things into it; so the soul enlightened by faith, can see Christ afar off, it can long for, choose and rest upon the Lord of life and receive the lively image of Christ's glory in it, 2Cor3, ult. If Christ were present upon earth, the soul (not the body) only could truly receive him; Christ comes to his elect only by his Spirit; and hence our spirits only are fit to receive him, and close with him. Thousands hear Christ outwardly, that inwardly are deaf to all God's calls, their spirits see not, taste not, feel not; it is therefore the soul that is the subject of faith; and, I say, it is a humbled empty soul, which is the subject; for a full, proud, unbroken spirit cannot, nay, will not receive Christ, as we have proved. And therefore, Luke 14, the servant is commanded to bid the poor, halt, blind, and lame to come in; They would not make excuses as other did. They that were stung to death with fiery serpents, were the only men that the brazen serpent was lifted up for them to look upon, and so be healed, John 3:14.

What it Means To Be Dead in Sin

But here is not all. Consider, secondly, every man is born stark dead in sin. (Eph. 2:1.) He is born empty of every inward principle of life, void of all grace, and hath no more good in him (whatsoever he thinks) than a dead carrion hath. And he is under the power of sin, as a dead man is under the power of death, and cannot perform any act of life; their bodies are living coffins to carry a dead soul up and down in. It is true, (I confess,) many wicked men do many good actions, as praying, hearing, alms deeds; but it is not from any inward principle of life. External motives, like plummetts on a dead (yet artificial) clock, set them a-running. Jehu was zealous, but it was only for a kingdom; the Pharisees gave alms only to be seen of men. If one write a will with a dead man's hand deceased, that will cannot stand in any law; it was not his will, because it was not writ by him, by any inward principle of life of his own. Pride makes a man preach, pride makes a man hear, and pray sometimes. Self-love stirs up strange desires in men, so that we may say, This is none of God's act by his grace in the soul, but pride and self-love. Bring a dead man to the fire, and chafe him, and rub him, you may produce some heat by this external working upon him; but take him from the fire again, and he is soon cold; so many a man that lives under a sound a minister, under the lashes and knock of a chiding, striving conscience, he hath some heat in him, some affections, some fears, some desires, some sorrows stirred; yet take him from the minister and his chasing conscience, and he grows cold again presently, because he lacks an inward principle of life.

Which point might make us to take up a bitter lamentation for every natural man. It is said, (Ex. 12:30), "That there was a great cry in Egypt, for there was not a house wherein there was not one found dead." O Lord, in some towns and families, what a world of these are there! Dead husband, dead wife, dead servants, dead children, walking up and down with their sins, (as fame says some men do after death,) with grave clothes about them; and God only knows whether ever they shall live again or not. How do men lament the loss of their dead friends! O, you have a precious soul in thy bosom stark dead; therefore lament your estate, and consider it seriously.

First. A dead man cannot stir, nor offer to stir; a wicked man cannot speak one good word, or do any good action, if heaven itself did lie at the stake for doing it, nor offer to shake off his sins, nor think one good thought. Indeed, he may speak and think of good things, but he cannot have good speeches, nor good thoughts; as a holy man may think of evil things as of the sins of the times, the thought of those evil things is good, not evil, so e contra.

Secondly. A dead man fears no dangers, though never so great, though never so near. Let ministers bring a natural man tidings of the approach of the devouring plagues of God denounced, he fears them not.

Thirdly. A dead man cannot be drawn to accept of the best offers. Let Christ come out of heaven, and fall about the neck of a natural man, and with tears in his eyes beseech him to take his blood, himself, his kingdom, and leave his sins, he cannot receive this offer.

Fourthly. A dead man is stark blind, and can see nothing, and stark deaf, and hears nothing, he cannot taste anything; so a natural man is stark blind, he sees no God, no Christ, no wrath of the Almighty, no glory of heaven. He hears the voice of a man, but he hears not the voice of God in a sermon; "he savoreth not the things of God's Spirit."

Fifthly. A dead man is senseless, and feels nothing: so cast mountains of sin upon a wicked man, he feels no hurt until the flames of hell break out upon him.

Sixthly. A dead man is a speechless man; he cannot speak unless it be like a parrot.

Seventhly. He is a breathless man; a natural man may say a prayer, or devise a prayer out of his memory and wit, or he may have a few short-winded wishes; but to pour out his soul in prayer, in the bosom of God, with groans unutterable, he cannot. I wonder not to see so many families without family prayer. Why? They are dead men, and lie rotting in their sins.

Eighthly. A dead man has lost all beauty: so a mere natural man has lost all glory; he is an ugly creature in the sight of God, good men, and angels, and shall one day be an abhorring to all flesh.

Ninthly. A dead man has his worms gnawing him: so natural men have the worm of conscience breeding now; which will be gnawing them shortly.

Lastly. Dead men lack nothing but casting into the grave: so there lacks nothing but casting into hell for a natural man. So that, as Abraham loved Sarah well while living, yet when she was dead, he seeks for a burying-place for her to carry her out of his sight. So God may let some fearful judgment loose, and say to it, Take this dead soul out of my sight, etc. It was a wonder that Lazarus, though lying but four days in the grave, should live again. O, wonder thou that ever God should let thee live, that has been rotting in thy sin twenty, thirty, perhaps sixty years together.

III. Every natural man and woman is born full of all sin, (Rom. 1:29,) as full as a toad is of poison, as full as ever his skin can hold; mind, will, eyes, mouth, every limb of his body, and every piece of his soul, is full of sin; their hearts are bundles of sin; hence Solomon saith, "Foolishness is bound up in the heart of a child;" whole treasures of sin. "An evil man, (said Christ,) out of the evil treasure of his heart, bringeth forth evil things;" nay, raging seas of sin. The tongue is a world of mischief. What is the heart then? "For out of the abundance of the heart the tongue speaketh :" so that, look about thee and see, whatever sin is broached, and runs out of any man's heart into his life through the whole world, all those sins are in your heart; thy mind is a nest of all the foul opinions, heresies, that ever were vented by any man; thy heart is a foul sink of all atheism, sodomy, blasphemy, murder, whoredom, adultery, witchcraft, buggery; so that, if thou hast any good thing in thee, it is but as a drop of rosewater in a bowl of poison; where fallen it is all corrupted.

It is true you feel not all these things stirring in thee at one time, no more than Hazael thought he was or should be such a bloodsucker, when he asked the prophet Elisha if he were a dog; but they are in thee like a nest of snakes in an old hedge. Although they break not out into thy life, they lie lurking in thy heart; they are there as a filthy puddle in a barrel, which runs not out, because you happily wantest [lack] the temptation or occasion to broach and tap your heart; or because of God's restraining grace by fear, shame, education, and good company, thou art restrained and bridled up, and therefore when one came to comfort that famous picture, pattern, and monument of God's justice by seven years' horror, and grievous distress of conscience, when one told him he never had committed such sins as Manasses, and therefore he was not the greatest sinner since the creation, as he conceived, he replied, that he should have been worse than ever Manasses was, if he had lived in his time, and been on his throne.

Mr. Bradford would never have looked upon any one's lewd life with one eye, but he would presently return within his own breast with the other eye, and say, "In this my vile breast remains that sin, which, without God's special grace, I should have committed as well as he." O, methinks this might pull down men's proud conceits of themselves, especially such as bear up and comfort themselves in their smooth, honest, civil life; such as through education have been washed from all foul sins; they were never tainted with whoredom, swearing, drunkenness, or profaneness; and here they think themselves so safe, that God cannot find in his heart to have a thought of damning them. O, consider of this point, which may make thee pull your hair from your head, and turn your clothes to sackcloth, and run up and down with amazement and paleness in thy face, and horror in thy conscience, and tears in your eyes. What, though thy life be smooth, what, though your outside, thy sepulcher, be painted. O, you are full of rottenness, of sin, within. Guilty, not before men, as the sins of thy life make thee, but before God, of all the sins that swarm and roar in the whole world at this day, for God looks to the heart; guilty thou art therefore of heart whoredom, heart-sodomy, heart blasphemy, heart drunkenness, heart buggery, heart oppression, heart idolatry; and these are the sins that terribly provoke the wrath of Almighty God against thee. (Is. 57:17) For the iniquity of his covetousness, saith our translation, I smote him; but the Hebrew renders it better — For the iniquity of his concupiscence (which is the sin of his heart and nature) I smote him. As a king is angry and musters up his army against rebels, not only which brings his soldiers out to fight, but who keeps soldiers in their trenches ready for to fight. These sins of your heart are all ready armed to fight against God at the watchword or alarm of any temptation. Nay, I dare affirm and will prove it, that these sins provoke God to anger, and are as bad, if not worse, than the sins of thy life.

1. The sin of your heart or nature is the cause, the womb that contains, breeds, brings forth, suckles all the litter, all the troop of sins that are in thy life; and therefore, giving-life and being to all other, it is the greatest sin.

2. Sin is more abundantly in the heart than in the life. An actual sin is but a little breach made by the sea of sin in your heart, where all sin, all poison, is met and mingled together. Every actual sin is but as a shred broken off from the great bottom of sin in the heart; and hence Christ saith, "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh; and out of the evil treasure of the heart we bring forth evil things." A man spending money (I mean sin in the life) is nothing to his treasure of sin in the heart.

3. Sin is continually in the heart. Actual sins of the life fly out like sparks, and vanish; but this brand is always glowing within; the toad spits poison sometimes, but it retains and keeps a poisonous nature always. Hence the apostle calls it "sin that dwells in me," that is, which always lies and remains in me. So that, in regard of the sins of your heart, you do rend in pieces and break, 1. All the laws of God. 2. At one clap. 3. Every moment of thy life. O, methinks the thought of this might rend a heart of rock in pieces; to think I am always grieving God at all times, whatsoever I do.

4. Actual sins are only in the life and outward porch; sins of the heart are within the inward house. One enemy within the city is worse than many without; a traitor on the throne is worse than a traitor in the open field. The heart is Christ's throne. A swine in the best room is worse than in the outward house. More I might say; but thus, you see, sins of the life are not so bad, nor provoke God's wrath so fiercely against thee, as the sins of your heart. Mourn, therefore, not so much that you have not been so bad as others are, but look upon your black feet — look within your own heart, and lament that, in regard of your sins there, you are as bad as any; mourn not so much merely that you hast sinned, as that you have a nature so sinful, that it is your nature to be proud, and your nature to be vain and deceitful, and loathe not only thy sins, but yourself for your sin, being brimful of unrighteousness. But here is not all. Consider fourthly,

IV. That whatever a natural man doth is sin; as the inside is full, so the outside is nothing else but sin, at least in the sight of a holy God, though not in the sight of blind, sinful men. Indeed, he may do many things, which, for the matter of them, are good; as he may give alms, pray, fast, come to church: but as they come from him they are sin; as a man may speak good words, but we cannot endure to hear him speak, because of his stinking breath which defiles them. Some actions indeed, from their general nature, are indifferent, for all indifferences lie in generals; but every deliberate action, considered in individuo, with all its circumstances, as time, place, motive, end, is either morally good or morally evil, as may be proved easily; morally good in good men, morally evil in unregenerate and bad men. For let us see particular actions of wicked men.

1. All their thoughts are only evil, and that continually. (Gen. vi. 5)
2. All their words are sins, (Ps. 50:16); their mouths are open sepulchers, which smell filthy when they are opened.
3. All their civil actions are sins, as their eating, drinking, buying, selling, sleeping, and ploughing. (Prov. 21:4)
4. All their religious actions are sins, as coming to church, praying, (Prov. 15: 8, 9; 28:9), fasting and mourning; roar and cry out of thyself till doomsday, they are sins. (Is. 58)
5. All their most zealous actions are sins, as Jehu, who killed all Baal's priests; because his action was outwardly and materially good, therefore God rewarded him with temporal favors; but because he had a hawk's eye to get and settle a kingdom to himself by this means, and so was theologically evil, therefore God threatens to be revenged upon him. (Hosea 1:4.)
6. Their wisdom is sin. O, men are often commended for their wisdom, wit, and parts; yet those wits, and that wisdom of theirs, are sin. (Rom. 8) The wisdom of the flesh is enmity against God.

Thus all they have or do are sins; for how can he do any good action whose person is filthy? "A corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit." You are out of Christ; therefore all your good things, all your kindnesses done unto the Lord, and for the Lord, as you think, are most odious to him. Let a woman seek to give all the content to her husband that may be, not out of any love to him, but only out of love to another man, he abhors all that she doth. Every wicked man wants an inward principle of love to God and Christ, and therefore, though he seeks to honor God never so much, all that he doth being done, out of love to himself, God abhors all that he performs. All the good things a wicked man doth are for himself, either for self-credit or self-ease, or self-content, or self-safety; he sleeps, prays, hears, speaks, professes for himself alone; hence, acting always for himself, he commits the highest degree of idolatry; he plucks God out of his throne, and makes himself a god, because he makes himself his last end in every action; for a man puts himself in the room of God as well by making himself his finis ultimus, as if he should make himself primum principium. Sin is a forsaking or departing from God. Now, every natural man remaining always in a state of separation from God, because he always wants [lacks] the bond of union, which is faith, is always sinning; God's curse lies upon him; therefore he brings out nothing but briars and thorns.

Objection. But you will say, If our praying and hearing be sin, why should we do these duties? We must not sin.

Answer

1. Good duties are good in themselves, although, coming from thy vile heart, they are sins.
2. It is less sin to do them than to omit them; therefore, if you will go to hell¹, go in the fairest path thou canst in thither.
3. Venture and try; it may be God may hear, not for thy prayers' sake, but for his name's sake. [In other words you may get saved despite your wicked prayer as Shepard says in another place!] The unjust judge helped the poor widow, not because he loved her suit, but for her importunity; and so be sure you shall have nothing if you do not seek. What though you are a dog, yet you are alive, and are for the present under the table. Catch not at Christ², snatch not at his bread, but wait till God give thee him; it may be you may have him one day. O, wonder then at God's patience, that you live one day longer, who have all your lifetime, like a filthy toad, spit your venom in the face of God, that he has never been quit of you. O, look upon that black bill that will one day be put in against thee at the great day of account, where thou must answer with flames of fire about your ears, not only for thy drunkenness, thy bloody oaths and whoring, but for all the actions of your short life, and just so many actions so many sins.

¹ "If you will go to hell." This is too coarse and insulting. The condition of the unconverted is in itself dark and perilous enough. It is wrong therefore to throw out jeering language, which may deeply wound those who are struggling between hope and fear; and will only give disgust and irritation to the secure.

² "Catch not at Christ." This must not be so understood as though it were not the duty of an unconverted sinner to endeavor immediately to believe in Christ. But the endeavor ought so to be made as to lay himself open to the full conviction of his sin and misery; and so as to beware of imagining that he can believe by his own power, or rashly to conclude that he has believed.

Thou hast painted thy face over now with good duties and good desires; and a little honesty, amongst some men, is of that worth and rarity, that they think God is beholding to them, if he can get any good action from. But when thy painted face shall be brought before the fire of God's wrath, then thy vileness shall appear before men and angels. O, know it, that as thou dost nothing else but sin, so God heaps up wrath against the dreadful day of wrath." Thus much for man's misery in regard of sin.

Now follows his misery in regard of the consequents or miseries that follow upon sin. And these are, 1. Present. 2. Future.

First. Man's present miseries, that already lie on him for sin, are these seven ; that is, – First. God is his dreadful enemy. (Ps. v. 5.)

Question. How may one know another to be his enemy?

Answer

1. By their looks. 2. By their threats. 3. By their blows.

So God,

1. Hides his face from every natural man, and will not look upon him. (Isa. 59:2)
2. God threatens, nay, curses every natural man. (Gal. 3:10.)
3. God gives them heavy, bloody lashes on their souls and bodies.

Never tell me, therefore, that God blesses you in your outward estate; no greater sign of God's wrath than for the Lord to give thee thy swing, as a father never looks after a desperate son, but lets him run where he pleases. And if God be your enemy, then every creature is so too, both in heaven and earth.

Secondly. God hath forsaken them, and they have lost God. (Eph. ii. 12.) It is said, that, in the grievous famine of Samaria, doves' dung was sold at a large price, because they wanted [lacked] bread. O, men live and pine away without God, without bread, and therefore the dung of worldly contentments are esteemed so much of, thou hast lost the sight of God, and the favor of God, and the special protection of God, and the government of God. Cain's punishment lies upon thee in thy natural estate; thou art a runagate from the face of God, and from his face thou art hid. Many have grown mad to see their houses burnt, and all their goods lost. O, but God, the greatest good, is lost. This loss made Saul cry out in distress of conscience, (1 Sam. 28:15,) The Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me; the loss of the sweetness of whose presence, for a little while only, made the Lord Jesus Christ cry out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? whereas thou hast lost God all thy lifetime. O, thou hast a heart of brass, that canst not mourn for his absence so long. The damned in hell have lost God, and know it, and so the plague of desperate horror lies upon them; thou hast lost God here, but know it not, and the plague of a hard heart lies upon you, you that can not mourn for this loss.

Thirdly. They are condemned men, condemned in the court of God's justice, by the law which cries, Treason, treason against the most high God, and condemned in the court of mercy, by the gospel, which cries, Murder, murder against the Son of God, (John iii. 18;) so that every natural man is damned in heaven, and damned on earth. God is thy all-seeing, terrible Judge; conscience is your accuser, a heavy witness; this world is thy jail; thy lusts are thy fetters [hence, being in bondage to sin]. In this Bible is pronounced and writ thy doom, thy sentence. Death is thy hangman, and that fire that shall never go out, thy torment. The Lord hath in his infinite patience reprieved thee for a time; O, take heed and get a pardon before the day of execution come.

Fourthly. Being condemned, take him, jailer; he is a bond-slave to Satan, (Eph. ii. 3;) for, His servants ye are whom ye obey, saith Christ. Now, every natural man does the devil's drudgery, and carries the devil's pack; and howsoever he says he defies the devil, yet he sins, and so does his work. Satan has overcome and conquered all men in Adam, and therefore they are under his bondage and dominion. And though he cannot compel a man to sin against his will, yet he has power, —

First. To present and allure man's heart by a sinful temptation.

Secondly. To follow him with it, if at first he be something shy of it.

Thirdly. To disquiet and rack him, if he will not yield, as might be made to appear in many instances.

Fourthly. Besides, he knows men's humors, as poor wandering, beggarly gentlemen do their friends in necessity, (yet in seeming courtesy,) he visits and applies himself unto them, and so gains them as his own. O, he is in a fearful slavery who is under Satan's dominion, who is, —

1. A secret enemy to thee.

2. A deceitful enemy to you, that will make a man believe (as he did Eve, even in her integrity) that he is in a fair way, when his condition is miserable.

3. He is a cruel enemy or lord over them that be his slaves, (2 Cor. iv. 3;) he gags them so that they cannot speak, (as that man that had a dumb devil,) neither for God, nor to God, in prayer; he starves them, so as no sermon shall ever do them good; he robs them of all they get in God's ordinances, within three hours after the market, the sermon is ended.

4. He is a strong enemy. (Luke 11:21.) So that if all the devils in hell are able to keep men from coming out of their sins, he will: so strong an enemy, that he keeps men from so much as sighing or groaning under their burdens and bondage. (Luke 11:21.) When the strong man keeps the palace, his goods are in peace.

Fifthly. He is cast into utter darkness; as cruel jailers put their prisoners into the worst dungeons, so Satan doth natural men, (2 Cor. iv. 3, 4:) they see no God, no Christ; they see not the happiness of the saints in light; they see not those dreadful torments that should now in this day of grace awaken them and humble them. O, those by-paths which thousands wander from God in, they have no lamp to their feet to show them where they ere. You that are in your natural estate, are born blind, and the devil hath blinded you eyes more by sin, and God in justice had blinded them worse for sin, so that you are in a corner of hell, because you are in utter darkness, where you have not a glimpse of any saving truth.

Sixthly. They are bound hand and foot in this estate, and cannot come out, (Rom. v. 6; 1 Cor. ii. 14;) for all kind of sins, like chains, have bound every part and faculty of man, so that he is sure for stirring; and those are very strong in him, they being as dear as his members, nay, as his life, (Col. iii. 7); so that when a man begins to forsake his vile courses, and purposes to become a new man, devils fetch him back, world entices him, and locks him up; and flesh says, O, it is too strict a course; farewell, then, merry days and good fellowship. O, you may wish and desire to come out some time, but cannot put strength to your desire, nor endure to do it. You may hang down your head like a bulrush for sin, but thou canst not repent of sin; you may presume, but you can not believe; you may come half way, and forsake some sins, but not all sins; you may come and knock at heaven's gate, as the foolish virgins did, but not enter in and pass through the gate; you may see the land of Canaan, and take much pain to go into Canaan, and may taste of the bunches of grapes of that good land, but never enter into Canaan, into heaven, but thou lie bound, hand and foot, in this woeful estate, and here thou must lie and rot like a dead carcass in his grave, until the Lord come and roll away the stone, [even take away the stony heart!] and bid thee come out and live.

Lastly. They are ready every moment to drop into hell. God is a consuming fire against you, and there is but one paper wall of thy body between your soul and eternal flames. How soon may God stop your breath! There is nothing but that between you and hell; if that were gone, then farewell all. You are condemned, and the muffler is before your eyes. God knows how soon the ladder may be turned; you hang but by one rotten twined thread of your life, over the flames of hell every hour. Thus much of man's present miseries.

Comments on True Virtue, Human Freedom, Concurrence, Original Sin, the Image of God in Man,
&
Dependency Upon a Sovereign God

Excerpts from Reformed Dogmatics, by Hermon Bavinck, Edited by John Bolt
Pg 241, 241 & 243

My comments in [blue]

It is a fact that subjective religion is not just an act of worship and adoration but primarily a disposition or mind-set that expresses itself in such devotion. Also, the distinction between moral virtues and theological virtues is too supernaturalistic and dualistic. There is of course some truth in it, the truth that also in a fallen humanity¹ there is still remnants of the image of God, and moral virtues are not – even religion is not – totally eradicated. But the moral virtues and also religious disposition must be renewed and reborn to be truly good. Thomas Aquinas therefore recognized that the theological virtues (faith, hope and love) “bring about the actuality of religion which works certain things in proper order toward God” but which nevertheless are themselves excluded from religion; and whereas intellectual and moral virtues are according to human nature, the theological virtues are above nature. (Aquinas, Summa Theologica, 1,2, qu. 62, art. 2) John Bolt, Editor, Reformed Dogmatics, pg 240

¹pg 241: But in fallen humanity this predisposition is corrupted band, being fecundated by an untrue and impure objective religion, also produces worship that is “idolatry” or “will-worship”. Two things are, therefore, necessary for a religion to be true: first, that the objective religion that come to us from without again makes God known to us as he really is; second, that the corrupted religious predisposition in human beings be regenerated and renewed. Hence in this sense subjective religion is “a virtue infused by the Holy Spirit.” (Hoorneck, Disputatio theologica practica, II, 207, 213) But this definition is inadequate. A human being has many virtues both in intellect and will. Hence the peculiar nature of the virtue at work in religion must be further qualified. [\[This is where Jonathan Edwards’ piece, The Nature of True Virtue, sheds light; there is a true virtue founded mainly upon faith in and true love for God \(holiness\), and a virtue that seems true but is not, founded upon the natural principles of self-love.\]](#) In earlier times this “virtue” was described as piety, reverence, fear, faith, etc. and similarly today as respect, deference, fear, a feeling of dependency. Still, these terms are not specific enough, for to some degree we have all these feelings in relation to creatures as well. There has to be an essential distinction between religious worship and civil devotion, between the feelings of fear, respect, deference, etc., as we have them toward God and those feelings as we have them toward creatures. That distinction can consist only in the fact that in religion the absolute dignity and power of God and absolute subjection on our part come into play. We are only partially dependent on creatures; as fellow creatures we are on the same level with them. God, however, is a being on whom we depend totally² and who decides about our weal and woe in every respect. Among pagans this divine absoluteness is as it were divided over many deities, but in his own territory every one of these deities nonetheless possesses such power that human beings are totally dependent on him for their good fortune or misfortune.

²We are dependent in the manner and sense that we simultaneously remain rational and moral creatures who are akin to God, are his offspring and his image. We are absolutely dependent in such a manner that the denial of this dependence never makes us free, while the acknowledgement of it never reduces us to the status of a slave. On the contrary: in the conscious and voluntary acceptance of this dependence, we human beings arrive at our greatest freedom. We become human to the degree that we are children of God. (John Bolt, Reformed Dogmatics, pg 243)

General and Special Revelation

Also thoughts from Augustine on Philosophy,

And Sin – the privation of good code394

Hermon Bavinck, Reformed Dogmatics, pg 322

The idea and existence of God, the spiritual independence and eternal destiny of the world, the moral world order and its ultimate triumph—all these are problems that never cease to engage the human mind. Metaphysical need cannot be suppressed. Philosophy perennially seeks to satisfy that need. It is general revelation that keeps that need alive. It keeps human beings from degrading themselves into animals. It binds them to a supersensible world. It maintains in them the awareness that they have been created in God's image and can only find rest in God. General revelation preserves humankind in order that it can be found and healed by Christ and until it is. To that extent natural theology used to be correctly denominated a "preamble of faith," a divine preparation and education for Christianity. General revelation is the foundation on which special revelation builds itself up.

Without general revelation, special revelation loses its connectedness with the whole cosmic existence and life.

It is one and the same God who in general revelation does not leave himself without a witness to anyone and who in special revelation makes himself known as a God of grace. Hence general and special revelation interact with each other, "God first sent forth nature as a teacher, intending also to send prophecy next, so that you, a disciple of nature, might more easily believe prophecy." (Tertullian). Nature precedes grace; grace perfects nature. Reason is perfected by faith, faith presupposes nature. Cf. P. Hofstede de Groot, Institute Theologia Natura

My comments: Everyone has experienced general revelation – see Ps19, the heavens declare the glory of God, etc. (Also Romans 1:19-20: For what can be known about God is plain to them, because God has shown it to them. ²⁰ For his invisible attributes, namely, his eternal power and divine nature, have been clearly perceived, ever since the creation of the world,^[9] in the things that have been made. So they are without excuse.). We look at creation and know that there is a God and that innate principle, what is left in our souls subsequent to the fall of Adam, the much defaced image of God, along with our conscience in us, testifies that we owe obedience to Him and are accountable to him. Special revelation is the communication from God of the saving knowledge of Jesus Christ without which you cannot be saved. As Jesus informs Peter after Peter had confessed Christ as God and Savior, "Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jonah! For flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. There ya go; that is special revelation; not every receives this, only those to whom God has chosen to reveal the Son.

On the insufficiency of general revelation, however, there can scarcely be any doubt. In the first place, it is evident from the fact that this revelation at most supplies us with knowledge of God's existence and of some of his attributes such as goodness and justice, but it leaves us absolutely unfamiliar with the person of Christ, who alone is the way to the Father (Matt. 11:27; John 14:6; 17:3; Acts 4:12) General revelation, therefore, is insufficient for human beings as sinners; it knows nothing of grace and forgiveness; it is frequently even a revelation of wrath (Romans 1:18-20). Grace and forgiveness, which for fallen human beings have to be the primary content of religion, are acts of God's good pleasure, not of nature and necessity. General revelation can at best communicate certain truths but conveys not facts, no history, and therefore changes nothing in existence. It somewhat illumines the mind and restrains sin but does not regenerate the nature of human beings and the world. It can instill fear but not trust and love.

This discourse on Romans 7:7-25 is good for self-examination - to see if you be in the faith. For Bavinck goes into the difference between how the unregenerate deal with sin compared to the regenerate. In this situation, the unregenerate are easily self-deceived, thinking because they are fighting against sin, they are in favor with God!

Sin Universal

Of the texts cited for the contrary view, only Romans 7:7–25 requires some further discussion. Pelagians have at all times appealed to this pericope to prove that the mind (νοῦς) or the spirit (πνεῦμα) in humans has remained free from sin, and the latter only resides in the flesh (σάρξ); in modern times this exegesis has been adopted almost universally. But Augustine in his later period and all his followers, both in the Catholic Church and in Protestant churches, have consistently rejected this interpretation and understood verses 14–25 as having been said by Paul as regenerate and with reference to the present, an explanation that is still advocated by Delitzsch, Philippi, Luthardt, Harless, Thomasius, Umbreit, Kohlbrugge, and others.[3] The latter exegesis deserves preference for various reasons: (1) Paul argues, in Romans 7:7–25, that the law from which the believer, by having died with Christ, has been released, is itself not sinful. And he does this by showing that the law has first brought the believer to the knowledge of his sin and his death (vv. 7–13) and that even now it still has the consent of his inner self, although his flesh is still opposed to it (vv. 14–25). In this connection the argument that the law still has the consent of the believer, though the believer is released from it, is necessary. For the thesis that the law itself is holy, it is not enough that the unregenerate should approve of it but necessary that the regenerate approve of it. Paul, accordingly, speaks from verse 14 on in the present tense, not to make the description more vivid, but because as a regenerate person he loves and approves of the law. Since the law served mediately to give him the painful experience of his sin and death, since in communion with Christ (v. 4; Gal. 2:19–20) Paul died to the law by the law and was freed from its curse (Gal. 3:13), he thereby learned to know it as holy, just, and good and testifies to and confirms the law by faith (Rom. 3:30). (2) Because Paul, following the course of his argument, wants to honor the holy character of the law, he throws all the blame on sin. First, it was an objective power that initially, as long as he lived without the law (v. 9), did not exist for Paul and was not known by him. Then sin, working by means of the law, produced covetousness in him (v. 8) and was able to do this because that covetousness resided in him by nature and he was carnal (v. 14).[4] Finally sin, thus revived and revealed as sin, made him die (vv. 9ff.), that is, made him despair of himself and his own righteousness.

But since this death was a death in communion with Christ (Gal. 2:19), Paul also rose again by that death, was inwardly reborn in his will and inner disposition, so that he can now make a sharp distinction between the center and the periphery of his being. Inwardly, in terms of his will, his inner self, he loves God's law, but in his members there lives another power and another law, namely, sin. Such a deep distinction is nowhere in Scripture assumed in the case of the unregenerate. In the case of the latter, there is indeed a knowledge of God and of the law and a doing by nature of the things of the law (Rom. 1:19; 2:14–15), that is, a struggle between reason and sensuality, conscience and covetousness, intellect and heart. However, a struggle between "flesh" and "spirit," as Paul pictures it here, occurs only in the life of the regenerate (Gal. 5:17): only they can say they love the law of God, approve of it, and want to keep it with all their heart. (3) Although as a regenerate person Paul still calls himself "of the flesh," "sold into slavery under sin" (Rom. 7:14), he does not mean by it that he is "in the flesh" (8:8–9) or walks "according to the flesh" (8:4). He only describes himself in those words because, on account of the sin "dwelling in his members," he cannot do what he wants to do and is held captive by "that law of sin in his members." Although he is wretched, because with the flesh he serves the law of sin, still he thanks God through Jesus Christ and with his mind (νοῦς) serves the law of God (v. 25); and it is above all this latter thing that is further developed in Romans 8. In Christ he is righteous and walks according to the Spirit. (4) Add to this that, if Romans 7:14ff were to be understood of the unregenerate, rebirth itself would be unnecessary, a helping grace would be sufficient, and the entire teaching of Scripture on sin and grace, justification and sanctification, faith and repentance would be toppled. Romans 7:7–25 is rather a strong proof for the total depravity of human nature. For if the regenerate person still has to complain so intensely about the power of sin that resides in him or her, then the unregenerate person is totally—without knowing it—a servant of sin, being in the flesh and walking according to the flesh; and the mind of the flesh is hostility to God.

The Reformation spoke out against that position, asserting that also the impure thoughts and desires that arose in us prior to and apart from our will are sin. By this it meant to say, not that all desiring was sin in a psychological and philosophical sense, but that in a scriptural and theological sense concupiscence made us guilty before God. And in this it was undoubtedly correct. For sin certainly began with a conscious and voluntary act of the will. But that first sinful act did not pass us by without leaving a trace; it in fact corrupted human nature and left a condition that in all respects is contrary to the law of God. So although sin originated by the will, it does now exist outside of the will and is also rooted in all the other faculties and powers of human beings, in soul and body, in the lower and the higher cognitive and conative capacities (Gen. 6: 3; 8: 21; Exod. 20: 17; Pss. 19: 13; 51: 5; Jer. 17: 9; Matt. 5: 28; Mark 7: 21; Rom. 7: 7, 15–17; 8: 7; Gal. 5: 7; etc.). “Sin cannot exist without the will because without the will it cannot exist as it is; without the will, however, it cannot be, because without the will, what exists cannot remain.” [Augustine]

Lutheran and Reformed theologians, therefore, usually fought against the position that all sin was voluntary. By taking that stance, they did not at all mean, however, that there could also be sin that totally and absolutely passed by the faculty of the will. The point is to gain a correct view of the nature and operation of the will. The will, after all, is absolutely not the whole of our capacity for desire but only a special power and expression of it. [40] In this restricted sense, the will is antecedent only to our actual sins, as James 1: 15 speaks of it, but absolutely not to the sins of our state and to our involuntary sins. If the condition of being voluntary in this sense were a necessary element of sin, not only all impure thoughts and desires would cease to be sin, but almost all actual sins could be excused with the motto “To understand all is, in a way, to forgive all.” In order to maintain the innocence of concupiscence, Bellarmine, accordingly, already arrived at the statement “Not everything that is contrary to the law is sin”; the involuntary motions, though in conflict with the law, are nonetheless not sins. [R. Bellarmine]

However, though it is true that the voluntary element in this restricted sense is not always a constituent in the concept of sin, the sins of the human state and involuntary sins still do not totally occur apart from the will. There is not only an antecedent but also a concomitant, a consequent, and an approving will. Later, to a greater or lesser degree, the will approves of the sinfulness of our nature and takes delight in it. And also when later the will, illumined by reason, fights against it, or the born-again person can testify with Paul that he does not will the evil that he does [cf. Rom. 7: 7– 25], then this certainly decreases the degree of sin but does not define the nature of the sin. For sin has its standard only in God's law. Paul definitely denominates as sin the evil he does not will but nevertheless commits and so agrees that the law is good. But even then the sin that is done without having been willed does not occur totally apart from the will. For, certainly, Paul can say: "It is no longer I that do it but sin that dwells within me" [Rom. 7: 17], thus drawing a contrast between his regenerate "I" and unregenerate flesh, but Augustine already rightly explained these words as follows: "Even though I do not consent to lust (concupiscence) and even if I do not pursue my desires, nevertheless, I still feel desire and am personally present in that very part of me. For I am not one person in my mind and another in my flesh. But then what am I? For I exist both in my mind and in my flesh. For the two natures are not contrary but the one human being is composed of both, inasmuch as God, the God by whom the person was made, is one." [Augustine] Certainly, it is not one person who does this sin in the flesh and another who does not want this sin. In both instances it is the same person who, on the one hand, impurely pursues what is forbidden (concupiscence) and who nevertheless in the deepest part of his will turns away from it and fights it. And since a human being, also the born-again person for as long as he or she is in the flesh, always to some degree desires what is forbidden, even though he or she fights it in the restricted sense, it can be said that at the most fundamental level all sin is voluntary. There is nobody or nothing that compels the sinner to serve sin. Sin is enthroned not outside the sinner but in the sinner and guides the sinner's thinking and desiring in its own direction. It is the sinner's sin insofar as the sinner has made it his or her own by means of his or her various faculties and powers. [P. Melancthon, Apology of the Augsburg Confession, art. 2]

Notes on self examination by Hermon Bavinck:

Finally, just as in the natural world every creature seeks the food that suits it, so the new life in the believer is always drawn toward the gospel, the word of Christ, the Scriptures, as the basis of its support, as the food by which it is strengthened. Scripture becomes not more but increasingly less dispensable and more glorious to those who are growing in the faith. The witness of the Holy Spirit in their hearts binds them to Scripture to the same degree and with the same force as to the person of Christ himself.

What is Sin

Pg 137, Augustine on Philosophy, Its insufficiency, and What is Sin

Augustine's firm point of departure was the human being, his self-consciousness, his ineradicable yearning and need for truth, happiness, and goodness, all of which are one. This starting point is certain and reliable (against the skeptics), since doubt itself still assumes belief in truth and self-consciousness is the final ground of truth. Augustine himself was consumed by this burning love of truth. Admittedly, Augustine accepted two cognitive organ, sense and intellect. But the knowledge gained by the latter goes far beyond that of the former. The sensible is not the truth itself but only an image of it. Eternal, immutable truth can only be found by the activity of the mind. Augustine does not deny that we can also rise up to the invisible through the visible, but as a rule he looked for the way to truth, not outside of ourselves through nature, but through the activity of the human spirit. There, in reason, his own and that of everyone, he finds eternal, immutable truths that themselves again refer back to and converge in God, who is the supreme truth, and the only good, eternal reason, the origin of all things. Therefore, because God is himself the whole truth, being itself, the good and the beautiful, there is rest of human beings thinking and striving in him alone. The knowledge of self and the knowledge of God are the two poles between which all human thought oscillates. Though knowledge of nature is not despised, it is made subordinate. “I desire to know God and the soul! O that I may know myself! O that I may know You!” God is the sun of spirits. We neither see nor know truth except in and by his light.

Still, philosophy is not sufficient, not only as a result of the inability of reason to find the way to truth but also and especially because it is blocked by pride (superbia). Humility alone is the way to life. Hence there is another way to the truth, the way of authority, the way of faith. On the one hand, faith assumes a measure of knowledge, but, on the other, it seeks to know, strives after knowledge. Augustine attempted to prove from nature, and especially from human nature, not only the existence of God and the immortality of the soul but also the Trinity. But for him God is not abstract, unqualified being but the living One, the supreme truth and the highest good, the greatest bliss and therefore the only being fully able to satisfy the human heart. All of Augustine’s thoughts I religious, theological; he views everything in the light of God. In that light he also views the world. On the one hand, it is nonbeing, an image, and therefore perishable. On the other, as God’s creation, it is a work of art created in accordance with the ideas in the mind of god, little by little, step by step, realizing those ideas and forming a universe that contains the richest diversity within itself. Things individually differ from each other in the measure of being and thus also of the truth and goodness each possesses. Creation is a cosmos, based on idea, number, order, spacious, immeasurable commonwealth in which miracles are events only against that which is known of nature, in which sin is merely a privation compensated for by punishment and a cocontributor to the beauty and harmony of the whole.

In the most beautiful song of creation, this antithesis is also needed. Sin is like the contrast in a speech, like barbarisms in language, like shadows in a painting. Augustine thus attempts to fit evil into the order of the whole. But he does not thereby excuse sin. The truth is, he does not locate the end of things in the ethically good but in the fact that Creation is, and will increasingly be, a harmonious revelation of all God’s attributes and perfections. And to that end, by the will of God, sin is subordinated as well. Also, we know how deeply and seriously Augustine view sin: “You have not yet considered what a great burden sin is.” Augustine saw it all around him and felt it: human beings seek God and need him while at the same time they cannot and will not come to him. What is good in humanity is only the fact that they exist. Humanity as a whole is a “mass of perdition.” Sin is, above all, haughtiness – pride (superbia) in the soul and lust (concupiscentia) in the body. In Adam we all sinned, and thus sin became the fate of us all. It is lack of God (carentia dei), a privation of good (privatio boni), not an inability not to sin. Salvation from this condition exists only by grace, which has its origin in predestination and is objectively revealed in the person and work of Christ. Objective grace is the sure and proper foundation of the Catholic (universal, nor Roman Catholic) faith but must also come into us subjectively as internal grace to infuse faith and love.

The Ground of Faith

Inadequacy of Proofs

Pg 578

As soon as Christian theology started to reflect seriously on the final and deepest ground of faith, it came to the conclusion that no single intellectual or historical proof advanced for the truth of revelation can ultimately serve as such. The apologists of the second century attached great value to those proofs and, against pagan naturalism, stressed that faith is a free rational act. Still, even among them one already finds the realization that all those proofs are powerless to effectually move a person to faith. Something different and something more is needed, viz., divine grace. Irenaeus compares it to the dew and the rain, which make the fields fruitful. But Augustine was the first to clearly understand and confess the necessity of internal grace. Elsewhere he ascribes great value to the church as a motive for believing; but his doctrine of internal grace proves that this motive was not for him the final and deepest cause of this faith. That cause was God alone. "God works our faith, acting in a marvelous way in our heart in order that we may believe." (Augustine, On the Predestination of the Saints, 2, 6.) Believing, after all, is always voluntary: "no one believes except willingly." To that end God by his grace bends the will and prompts us to believe with the intellect. (Augustine, Confessions, XIII) Later theologians as well ascribed great power to the "preamble of faith" and the motivations toward belief; and among them the church increasingly assumed a more prominent place. But all these theologians admit that these motives so not make revelation "evidently true" but only "evidently credible." They rule out rational doubt and demonstrate that it is not unreasonable to believe while it is unreasonable to assume the contrary. (Aquinas, Summa Theol.) But they are not sufficient. Indeed, when dealing with the philosophical proofs for the trinity, Thomas expressly states: "Whoever tries to prove the Trinity of persons by natural reason detracts from faith." Such proofs are of little value against opponents "because the very insufficiency of the reasons confirms them in their error inasmuch as they judge that we consent to the truth of faith on the basis of such weak reasons. (Aquinas) Revelation may ever so much be made credible by the proofs, yet it is and remains a truth of faith. (Bellarmine) In Roman Catholic theology too it must remain that, for otherwise the voluntary nature and the meritoriousness of faith would be lost. (Aquinas) Faith, therefore, accepts the truth, not on the basis of one's own insight, but on that of divine authority. "For faith does not assent to anything except on the ground that it has been revealed by God. (Aquinas) And in order for human beings to acknowledge that authority of God, an antecedent change of will has to occur. Believing is indeed an act of the intellect, but it presupposes a bending of the will by grace; the intellect must be deposed toward faith by the will. (Aquinas) The assent of faith, accordingly, occurs only by an act of God “moving inwardly through grace.” (Aquinas) Gregory XVI, in a letter dated September 26, 1835, condemned the opinion of Hermes that the motivations toward belief were the true ground of faith in revelation. And the Vatican Council decreed that though these motives could make divined revelation credible, still “no one can consent to the gospel preaching, as he must to obtain salvation, without the illumination and inspiration of the Holy Spirit.” (Documents of Vatican Council 1, Session 3...)

Demonstrating the Truth of Faith

Now what is the experience by which faith in revelation is first aroused and invigorated? It naturally differs in different believers, but it is always of a religious–ethical, a spiritual nature. What really causes us to believe is not the insight of our intellect, nor a decision of our will, but a power that is superior to us, bends our will, illumines our mind, and without compulsion still effectively takes our thoughts and reflections captive to the obedience of Christ [2Cor. 10:5]. This is what Augustine confessed with he attributed faith to “internal grace”; what Thomas recognized when he said that “the assent of faith” came from God, “inwardly moving us through grace”; what the Vatican Council stated when it testified that faith does not arise “apart from the illumination and inspiration of the Holy Spirit.” This was the conviction of the entire Reformation movement: faith is a gift of God, and effect of the Holy Spirit’s working. Believing is an act of the intellect, an immediate (= unmediated by proofs) linkage of the human consciousness to divine revelation.

But that faith presupposes a change in the relation of the whole person to God: it presupposes the new birth, the transformation of the will. “no one believes except willingly” (Nemo credit nisi volens). Knowledge is compelling; no one can deny a mathematical proposition. But believing is free; it is an act of supreme freedom inasmuch as it is an act of the deepest self-denial. When God links salvation, not to knowing but to believing, that is proof that he does not coerce nor wishes to coerce anyone. The Letter to Diognetus states beautifully: “It is not like God to use compulsion.” Precisely because faith is not the fruit of scientific proofs, it does not arise outside of the human heart and will. That is the truth implicit in the doctrine of Kant and the neo-Kantians concerning moral faith. Nor, on the other hand, is it a decision of the will, a postulate. Neither is faith an imperative of the will. People cannot believe when they please; the will cannot order the consciousness to accept something as truth when that consciousness itself does not in any way grasp that truth. Believing is not arbitrary, but neither is it blind. It presupposes a change of will: function follows being. It is itself a free, spontaneous, intellectual recognition of the word of God. Just as the human eye, seeing the sun, is immediately convinced of its reality, so the regenerate person “sees” the truth of God’s revelation. For the regenerate person faith in revelation is as natural as the recognition of the moral law is for the moral person. It is increased in the nature of the spiritual life; it is rooted in the mysterious depths of the regenerate heart. Believers cannot relinquish their faith. In the life of Christians, faith in revelation is inseparable from faith in themselves. Indeed, they can deny themselves, sacrifice their lives, but they cannot relinquish their faith. In the life of Christians, faith in revelation is inseparable from faith in themselves. (S. Hekstra, Wijsgerige Godsdienstwetenschap) Christians would have to abandon faith in themselves, in their adoption as children of God, in the forgiveness of their sins, in the trustworthiness and faithfulness of God, if they cease to understand revelation as the word of God. Faith in revelation is inseparable from the best that is in them. In their best moments they are most firmly established in that faith. Whatever may arise to challenge it, they cannot and may not act otherwise.

Finally, opposition to and resistance against this faith of theirs is rife, not just from without, but even much more from within. However much their will has been bent and their intellect enlightened, there remains much in believers that resists the obedience of faith. Faith, since it is the conviction of things not seen, is a continual struggle. The sins of the heart and the errors of the mind gang up on faith and often have appearance in their favor. As long as believers are on earth, there remains in them a dualism, a dualism not of the head and the hearts, but of the flesh and the spirit, of the “old” and the “new” person. Faith more or less retains a supernatural character insofar as it transcends the nature of unspiritual persons. It is not yet fully natural; the moment it becomes natural it ceases and become sight. Faith is above all faith because it sees something that the unspiritual do not perceive. On the other hand, this dualism, however painful, serves to confirm faith. For if faith does not arise from the natural habits of human beings and is not the conclusion of a syllogism nor a decision of the will, its presence is simultaneously a proof of its truth. Our own spirit does not by nature impel us to call God our Father and to count ourselves among his children. There is an essential and easily recognizable difference between the witness of the Holy Spirit, when he says to our soul, “I am your salvation,” and the temptation of Satan, when he whispers, “Peace, peace, and no danger.” “Can a person, impelled by the devil, possibly call God Abba! Father!” in faith?” (Heidegger, Copus Theol.) Christian faith points back to the testimony of the Holy Spirit. “Though theology scoffs and philosophy scorns, God himself is the final ground of my faith in God” (Beets).

FAITH IS NECESSARY BUT NO GROUND

Now God says in his law (Deut. 25: 1) that the righteous must be acquitted and the unrighteous condemned, and everyone’s conscience and sense of justice agrees with this. Even God acts according to this rule: he by no means clears the guilty, nor does he condemn the innocent (Exod. 20: 5ff., 34: 7;

Num. 14: 18). “One who justifies the wicked and one who condemns the righteous are both alike an abomination to the Lord” (Prov. 17: 15; cf. Exod. 23: 7; Prov. 24: 24; Isa. 5: 23). Yet, seemingly in flat opposition to this and contrary to what he himself has said (Rom. 1: 18; 2: 13), Paul says that God justifies the ungodly (4: 5). For humans have no righteousness in themselves on the basis of which they could be acquitted by God. Those who think in a Pelagian way and find the ground for acquittal in faith, that is, in the good disposition, virtues, and good works of humans, and mark them as perfect since they carry the warrant of perfection in themselves, or are counted as perfect by God for Christ’s sake, are at all points in conflict with Scripture and the Christian confession. For Scripture testifies that by the works of the law no “flesh” can or will be justified (Isa. 64: 6–7; Rom. 3: 19–20; 8: 7; Eph. 2: 2; and so forth). The works accomplished after justification by faith cannot be considered for justification, because then the order of redemption would be reversed and justification would be made dependent on sanctification, and also because those good works are still always imperfect and polluted by sin, and not in keeping with the full requirement of the divine law (Matt. 22: 37; Gal. 3: 10; James 2: 10). God, being faithful and true, cannot view as perfect that which is not perfect. As the righteous and holy One, God cannot give up the demands of the law nor content himself with a semi-righteousness, which is basically no righteousness at all. Scripture, accordingly, sets the person’s own righteousness and the righteousness of faith or the righteousness of God in contrast to each other (Rom. 10: 3; Phil. 3: 9); they are mutually exclusive as “works” and “faith” (Rom. 3: 28; Gal. 2: 16), as “reward” and “grace” (Rom. 4: 4; 11: 6). Hence, since according to the law God condemns, and has to condemn us on account of our sin, it has pleased him to disclose his righteousness, that is, his judiciary, and in this connection also his acquitting righteousness, in another way, that is, apart from the law and the works of the law, solely through the gospel. God, that is, put forward Christ as a means or sacrifice of atonement, thus showing himself to be righteous and at the same time able to justify or acquit those who have faith in Jesus (3: 21–26). [112] Christ’s sacrifice, accordingly, provided the ground for his acquittal of those who, though of themselves ungodly, nevertheless have faith in Jesus. In this disclosure of acquitting righteousness, the person of Christ with his sacrifice and faith in his name occupy a pivotal place. The two are inseparably bound up with each other: the righteousness of God has been revealed in Christ by his being put forward as a sacrifice of atonement by his blood, but he is that δια πίστεως (dia pisteōs, through faith; 3:25), and people are justified freely, out of grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus (3: 24). In a word, the righteousness of God is the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ (3: 22). But what is the place occupied by each of these two in God’s righteousness? Is Christ or is faith, or is a combination of these two, the ground, “the material or meritorious cause,” for his act of acquittal? Aside from those who modernize Paul, view faith as a good disposition that is completely separate from Christ and his sacrifice, and have God accept the will for the deed, only two approaches are possible. The first is that of Roman Catholics, Remonstrants, rationalists, mystics, as well as numerous modern Protestants, who, though sharply diverging among themselves, have in common the fact that, while linking faith in some fashion with the person of Christ, they nevertheless locate the righteousness on the basis of which God acquits the sinner, in whole or in part, in the human subject. Granted that righteousness may be imperfect, but God nevertheless counts it as perfect, either for Christ’s sake or because it is a form of obedience to God’s will expressed in the gospel and makes the human agent acceptable to God, or because it is perfect in principle and carries within itself the warrant of future perfection.

But this view does not stand up in the face of the clear pronouncements of Scripture. For, in the first place, the righteousness of God in terms of which he acquits believers is objectively revealed in the gospel, apart from the works of the law and before faith (Rom. 1: 17; 3: 21), as is also the reconciliation that God brought about in Christ between himself and the world (2 Cor. 5: 19). For God has put Christ forward as a propitiatory sacrifice (ἱλαστηριον, hilastērion; Rom. 3: 25), and this Christ was handed over to death for our trespasses (4: 25), died for us (5: 6–11), became a curse for us (Gal. 3: 13), was made to be sin (2 Cor. 5: 21), and was thus raised for our justification (Rom. 4: 25), because we were or had to be justified in him. He, therefore, is our righteousness (1 Cor. 1: 30), and our righteousness is not based on works but is from God (Phil. 3: 9), a gift of his grace (Rom. 3: 24; 5: 15–17). We are justified through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus (3: 24), by his blood (5: 9), in Christ (Gal. 2: 16). In Rom. 5: 12ff. Paul asserts that between Christ and Adam there is a kind of parallelism. On the basis of one trespass all humanity is condemned and subjected to death; similarly [but in the opposite direction], the gift of God, that is, righteousness in Christ, became a δικαίωμα, that is, a verdict of acquittal, for many (5: 16). One δικαίωμα (dikaiōma, that is, the verdict of acquittal pronounced upon Christ in his resurrection; 4: 25) leads for all to justification and life, that is, the act of justification that carries life with it (5: 18). By the obedience of one person the many are treated as righteous (5: 19). Alongside the righteousness that God granted in Christ and on the basis of which he justified Christ as mediator of the covenant for all his own in his resurrection, there is no room for a justification consisting in faith or love. If there were, the latter would nullify the former.

In the second place, faith is never presented as the ground for justification. Righteousness, or justification, is ἐκ πίστεως (ek pisteōs, through faith) or δια πίστεως (dia pisteōs, through faith) or πίστει (pistei, by faith; Rom. 1: 17; 3: 22, 26, 28, 30; Gal. 2: 16; 3: 8, 24; Phil. 3: 9; and so forth) but never δια πίστιν (dia pistin, on account of faith). We do read in Phil. 3: 9 that Paul possessed “a righteousness that is through faith in Christ, the righteousness from God that is based on faith,” but this righteousness is clearly “through faith” and “from God.” He only says that he possessed God’s righteousness for himself on the basis of faith. Faith never occurs as righteousness itself or as a part of it; on the contrary, it is from faith precisely because it is according to grace. Grace and faith are not opposed to each other; but faith and works, the righteousness that is of faith and the righteousness that is of works, are [opposed to each other] (Rom. 3: 20–28; 4: 4–6, 13–14; 9: 32; 10: 5–6; Gal. 2: 16; 3: 11–12, 23, 25; 5: 4–5; Eph. 2: 8–9). Faith does not justify by its own essence or act because it itself is righteousness, but by its content, because it is faith in Christ, who is our righteousness. If faith justified on account of itself, the object of that faith (that is, Christ) would totally lose its value. But the faith that justifies is precisely the faith that has Christ as its object and content. Therefore, if righteousness came through the law, and if faith were a work that had merit and value as such and made a person acceptable to God, then Christ died for nothing (Gal. 2: 21). In justification faith is so far from being regarded as a ground that Paul can say that God justifies the ungodly (Rom. 4: 5). Even when his doctrine elicits the accusation that it leads to indifference and wickedness, he never defends himself by saying that faith is in whole or in part the ground of justification (3: 5–8; 6: 1). Instead, he affirms that there is no condemnation for those who are in Christ, inasmuch as Christ died and was raised for them (8: 33–34).

In the third place, since faith is therefore not a work, but a relinquishment of all work, an unqualified trust in God who gives life to the dead (4: 17), who raised Christ from the dead (4: 24), who in Christ gave “a righteousness from God” (δικαιοσύνη ἐκ θεοῦ: Phil. 3: 9; Rom. 10: 3–11; 1 Cor. 1: 30), the expression that “faith was accounted as righteousness” cannot mean that faith itself was accepted by God as a work of righteousness in place of or alongside “the righteousness of God in Christ.” The word λογίζεσθαι (logizesthai) can certainly mean “to hold or consider a person for what he or she is” (1 Cor. 4: 1; 2 Cor. 12: 6). However, it can also have the sense of “to credit to a person something one does not personally possess.” Thus the sins of those who believe are not counted against them although they do have them (Rom. 4: 8; 2 Cor. 5: 19; cf. 2 Tim. 4: 16); and thus they are counted against Christ, although he was without sin (Isa. 53: 4–6; Matt. 20: 28; Rom. 3: 25; 8: 3; 2 Cor. 5: 21; Gal. 3: 13; 1 Tim. 2: 6). Similarly, to those who believe, a righteousness is imputed that they do not have (Rom. 4: 5), and for that reason that act of imputation is a gift (κατὰ χάριν, kata charin, according to grace; 4: 4), an act of crediting someone with righteousness apart from works (4: 6). The phrase “to reckon faith as righteousness” is an abbreviated way of saying that God in faith imputes his righteousness—the righteousness granted in Christ—to persons and on that basis acquits them. This is confirmed by that other expression “the righteous will live by faith.” Faith is not actually the principle and source of life, for Christ is life and grants life (Rom. 5: 17–18; 6: 4ff.; 2 Cor. 4: 10–11; Gal. 2: 20; Col. 3: 3–4; 2 Tim. 1: 10; cf. John 1: 4; 6: 33ff.; 11: 25; 1 John 1: 2; 5: 11; etc.). Those who believe have life precisely because they receive it from Christ. Similarly, those who believe have the righteousness of God (δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ, dikaïosynē theou), which God grants them in Christ.

Add to this, finally, that if faith itself is the ground of justification, God is contenting himself with a lesser righteousness than he demands in his law. In that case the gospel does not confirm the law, as Rom. 3: 31 says, but nullifies it. God then relinquishes his own righteousness and denies himself. Or he accounts faith as something it is not, as a complete and sufficient righteousness, and so fails to do justice to his truthfulness. The charge lodged by the proponents of infused righteousness against imputed righteousness that God regards certain people as something they are not—returns upon their own heads: they have God count something as righteousness which it is not. [That’s the key distinction – this error leads to proponents of the sinner’s prayer and like prayers for salvation, all to curry God’s favor, the wicked presumption that Thomas Shepard calls.]—In addition, they deprive believers of consolation. If our faith—a faith that is often little and weak and hidden under an overlay of doubt and fear, and that according to the proponents of infused righteousness can be lost altogether—if that faith is the ground for our justification, the Christian life is a life of continual fear and uncertainty. Instead of being fixed on Christ, the eye of faith is then consistently turned inward to oneself. A truly Christian life lived in the service of God becomes impossible, for, before one can truly speak of good works, one’s dread before God as Judge has to be transmuted into the consciousness of his fatherly love. [See the parable of the talents where the wicked servant hid his talents (could not serve God) because he saw God as a harsh task master. This is typical of the unregenerate. But Christians, due to their weak faith and wrong ideas of the nature of God, may have similar thoughts and hence not serve God in a due manner.)

Faith is Not a Formal Cause

Pgs. 221-223 vol. 4

Active and Passive Justification

In the third place, the above distinction makes it possible for us to regard faith as simultaneously a receptive organ and an active power. If in every respect justification comes after faith, faith becomes a condition, an activity that has to be performed in advance and cannot be purely receptive. [this is the Arminian position, which is why many churches favor the Sinner's Prayer.] But if the righteousness on the basis of which we are justified exists completely outside of us in Christ Jesus [that's the key!], it can naturally be appropriated by us only because we accept it in childlike faith. "The forgiveness of sins is a thing promised for Christ's sake. Therefore it can be accepted only by faith, since a promise can be accepted only on faith." [Apology of the Augsburg Confession, art. 4 par. 40-47] Faith, therefore, is not the material or formal cause of justification; it is not even a condition or instrument (instrumental cause) of justification, for it does not relate to justification as, for example, the eye to seeing or the ear to hearing. Faith is not a condition on which, and not an instrument or organ by which, we receive this benefit, but the very act of accepting Christ and all his benefits as he by his Word and Spirit offers himself to us, and faith therefore includes the consciousness that he is my Lord and that I am his possession. Faith therefore is not an instrument in the true sense, one that serves as the means by which a person accepts Christ, but is a sure knowledge and firm confidence that the Holy Spirit works in one's heart and by which he [the Spirit] persuades and assures people that, despite all their sins, they share in Christ and all his benefits. [Calvin]

But if this is saving faith, it cannot be a "knowledge of history" or a "bare assent" to certain truths; then it is by its very nature a living and active faith, and it is not in every respect antithetical to all work. It constitutes a contrast to the works of the law in a double sense, that is, in the fact that the latter can neither be the material nor the instrumental cause of justification. It is also antithetical to the works of faith (infused righteousness, obedience, love) the moment these are in even the slightest degree regarded as a ground for justification, as constituting in part or in whole the righteousness on the basis of which God justifies us. For that is Christ and Christ alone. Faith itself is not a ground for justification; neither, therefore, are the works that proceed from it. But faith is not opposed to work if by it one should mean that only a dead, inactive faith can justify us. For the dispute between Rome and the Reformation was not about whether we are justified by an active or an inactive faith, by a living or a dead faith. But the question was, as it was for Paul, whether faith with its works justifies us before God or in our conscience, or whether faith justifies apart from works. Nor is faith opposed to the works of faith insofar as these works, as the fruits of faith, are used by the Holy Spirit to assure believers of the genuineness of their faith and thus of their salvation. [Heidelberg Catechism, Q86] In this sense faith itself is even a work (John 6: 29), the best work and the principle of all good works. The Reformed therefore also said that, indeed, "it is faith alone that justifies; nevertheless the faith that justifies is not alone," and spoke, in addition to "the justification of the sinner," also of a "justification of the righteous." In this sense Paul and James are also in agreement. Granted, it is not correct to say that Paul speaks only of the "justification of the sinner" whereas James speaks of the "justification of the righteous." But both deny that the ground of our justification consists in the works of the law, and both acknowledge that faith, that is, living faith, the faith that includes and produces good works, is the means by which the Holy Spirit assures us of our righteousness in Christ. In this connection the only difference is that Paul fights against dead works while James wages a campaign against a dead faith. The faith that justifies is the certainty—produced in our hearts by the Holy Spirit—of our righteousness in Christ. Therefore, not the more passive but the more lively and forceful it is, the more it justifies us.

Faith, accordingly, is active along with works and is “brought to completion by the works” (James 2:22).

JUSTIFICATION IS FORENSIC, NOT ETHICAL

To correctly assess the benefit of justification, people must lift up their minds to the judgment seat of God and put themselves in his presence. [J. Calvin, Institutes, III, xxi] When they compare themselves with others or measure themselves by the standard that they apply to themselves or among each other, they have some reason perhaps to pride themselves in something and to put their trust in it. But when they put themselves before the face of God and examine themselves in the mirror of his holy law, all their conceit collapses, all self-confidence melts, and there is room left only for the prayer: “Enter not into judgment with your servant, for no one living is righteous before you” (Job 4: 17–19; 9: 2; 15: 14–16; Ps. 143: 2; cf. 130: 3), and their only comfort is that “there is forgiveness before you, so that you may be revered” (Ps. 130: 4). If for insignificant, guilty, and impure persons there is to be a possibility of true religion, that is, of genuine fellowship with God, of salvation and eternal life, then God on his part must reestablish the broken bond, again take them into fellowship with him and share his grace with them, regardless of their guilt and corruption. He, then, must descend from the height of his majesty, seek us out and come to us, take away our guilt and again open the way to his fatherly heart. If God were to wait until we—by our faith, our virtues, and good works of congruity or condignity—had made ourselves worthy, in part or in whole, to receive his favor, the restoration of communion between him and ourselves would never happen, and salvation would forever be out of reach for us.

This is why so much depends on the benefit of justification, and it is rightly denominated the article on which the church either stands or falls. For the fundamental question that arises in this connection is this: What is the way that leads to communion with God, to true religion, to salvation and eternal life: God’s grace or human merit, his forgiveness or our works, gospel or law, the covenant of grace or the covenant of works? If it is the latter, if our work, our virtue, our sanctification is primary, then the believers' consolation ends, and they remain in doubt and uncertainty to their last breath. Then Christ is violated in his unique, all-encompassing, and all-sufficient mediatorial office, and he himself is put on a level with other humans, with ourselves. Then God is robbed of his honor, for if humans are justified on the basis of their works, they have reason to boast of themselves and are, partly or totally, the craftsmen of their own salvation.

Driven by these three motives, the Reformation took up cudgels against Rome and confessed with great unanimity that the grace of God is the only impelling and efficient cause of our entire salvation. And by "grace" it meant not some metaphysical quality that was infused into humans who did "as much as they could" and elevated them to a supernatural state (gratia elevans), but rather the forgiving mercy and favor of God that precedes all human effort and again receives them, freely and without obligation, into his fellowship. The establishment of the covenant of grace proceeds from God and from him alone. It is he and he alone who for his own sake blots out our transgressions and no longer remembers our sins (Isa. 43: 25). We are justified by his grace as a gift (Rom. 3: 24; Gal. 3: 18; Eph. 2: 8; Titus 3: 5–7). More specifically, it is the Father from whom this benefit proceeds, for he is the lawgiver and judge (James 4: 12), but also the merciful God, who abounds in steadfast love, and blots out transgressions for his name's sake (Num. 14: 18; Pss. 32: 2; 103: 3; 130: 4; Isa. 43: 25; Rom. 3: 24; 4: 6; 8: 33; 2 Cor. 5: 19). He himself paved a way in Christ to distribute this benefit, so that Christ, too, possessed the power to forgive sins (Matt. 9: 2–6; John 5: 22, 27), and himself sent the Holy Spirit to apply this benefit to the hearts of his children (John 14: 26; Rom. 8: 15–16; 1 Cor. 6: 11). In the past, Reformed theologians put it as follows: The Father justifies effectively; the Son, meritoriously; the Holy Spirit, applicationally. And to complete the picture at once, let us add: faith apprehends, the sacraments seal, and works declare. [B. deMoor, Comm. Theo. IV 562]

But if the salvation of humans originates in a free and gracious act of God, it is certainly of the utmost importance to know of what this act consists, in other words, what justification means. At this point it is already quite clear that in itself it cannot consist in anything other than a judgment, in our terms, a changed disposition and mood toward us. For when people are legitimately angry with another person, the former cannot begin a sincere and intimate relationship with the latter unless they start by putting aside their anger and again become favorably disposed toward the other. And so it is also with the Lord our God. In Christ he loved the world and reconciled it to himself, not counting their sins against them (John 3: 16; 2 Cor. 5: 19). Although his wrath was revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and wickedness of humans, yet in the gospel God brought to light a righteousness apart from the law (Rom. 1: 17–18; 3: 20ff.). This righteousness, therefore, is not opposed to his grace, but includes it as it were and paves the way for it. It brings out that God, though according to the law he had to condemn us, yet in Christ has had different thoughts about us, generously forgives all our sins without charging us with anything, and accords to us divine compassion and fatherly sympathy in place of wrath and punishment. Justification, therefore, is not an ethical but a juridical (forensic) act; nor can it be anything other than that because all evidence of favor presupposes favor, and every benefit of grace presupposes grace. Rome, indeed, asserts the contrary. But in doing so, it reverses the true order. It makes God's grace dependent on human conduct and, along with all other nomistic schools of thought, builds religion on a foundation of morality. To the degree that it nevertheless tries to explain good works in terms of a prevenient and infused grace, it contradicts itself and finds itself compelled to again trace the gift of grace to a free disposition of God that is in no way motivated by the human situation but has its basis solely in his good pleasure.

Justification: Objective and Subjective; Active and Passive

OBJECTIVE AND SUBJECTIVE; ACTIVE AND PASSIVE

Although there is no material difference between Lutheran and Reformed theology with respect to the doctrine of justification, in the latter, nevertheless, it occupies a different place and acquires a different accent. This is first of all evident in the fact that Luther ever-increasingly pushed predestination into the background. Calvin, on the other hand, increasingly made it the center of his theology and also viewed justification in its light. “When the Lord calls, justifies, and glorifies us, he declares nothing other than his eternal election.” [Bavinck, RD III, 522-28] It is the elect who are justified. [Calvin] It is completely true that Calvin never for that reason weakens the objective satisfaction of Christ nor the benefit of justification, but what does follow from this fact is that the righteousness of Christ is presented to us much more as a gift granted to us by God than as a benefit we accept by faith. The objective act of donation is prior to the subjective act of acceptance. [Calvin] On the other hand, Calvin maintains our “being justified apart from our own merits” not only for the two reasons derived, respectively, from the sufficient merits of Christ and the comfort of believers, but no less firmly on account of the glory of God. Calvin feels that he is in the presence of God, placed before his judgment seat; and looking up at the holiness and majesty of God, he no longer dares to speak, with reference to puny sinful humans, of works of their own, of merits, or of reason for boasting in themselves. On the contrary, nothing befits such a person other than humility and confidence in God’s mercy. The elect are justified by God so that they would glory in him and in nothing else. [Calvin] In the third place, especially in his opposition to Osiander, Calvin makes a sharp distinction between justification and sanctification, for the former is a purely forensic act; but he never separates the two and consistently keeps them very closely connected. Christ, after all, cannot be divided anymore than the light and the warmth of the sun, though the two certainly produce distinct effects. [Calvin] Christ does not justify anyone whom he does not also at the same time sanctify. We, accordingly, are not justified by works, but neither are we justified without works. [Calvin] “Indeed, we do not contemplate Christ from afar in order that his righteousness might be imputed to us, but because we put on Christ and are ingrafted into his body—in short because he deigns to make us one with him. For this reason we glory that we have fellowship of righteousness with him.” [Calvin] Thus while in Calvin’s thinking justification kept its place and value, it did not become the one thing that overshadowed everything else in the order of salvation. It was given a place between election and the gift of Christ on the one hand, and salvation and glorification on the other. It was “something in the middle of the transition from eternal predestination to future glory.” [Luttege]

Yet, although Calvin proved his independence also in the doctrine of justification, he did not solve all the problems that present themselves in the study of this article of faith. This applies especially to the relationship of justification to election and satisfaction, on one hand, and to sanctification and glorification, on the other. If justification has a place somewhere between the two, there is always a reason to connect it more with the preceding or more with the following group of benefits, depending on the choice made, and justification itself acquires a different meaning. If one’s purpose is to maintain the objective forensic character of justification, it is natural to tie it closely with election and satisfaction. It then becomes the imputation of the righteousness of Christ, which took place long before, in the gospel, in the resurrection of Christ, or even from eternity, and is then appropriated much later by the subject in faith. Then that faith is no more than a vessel or instrument, a merely passive thing, [Calvin] so that it becomes hard to derive from it the new life of sanctification. On the other hand, if a person is focused more on practical than on speculative interests, one naturally tries to forge a close connection between justification and faith. In that case, justification coincides with the benefit of the forgiveness of sins, which is received and enjoyed in faith, and faith becomes communion with Christ. It has Christ dwell in us through his Spirit, assures us of God's benevolence toward us, and pours out new life and new powers in our hearts. [Calvin]

In Calvin, these two perspectives are still connected with each other, but in Reformed theology they soon split apart, and both developed in a one-sided direction. Under the influence of Socinianism and Remonstrantism, Cartesianism and Amyraldism, there sprang up the neonomian view of the order of salvation, which made the forgiveness of sins and eternal life dependent on faith and obedience, which, in keeping with the new law of the gospel, had to be accomplished by the human agent. Parallel to this movement ran that of Pietism and Methodism, which, for all the difference between the two, nevertheless equally shifted the center of gravity to the side of the subject, and insisted either on a lengthy period of religious experience or on a sudden conversion as the condition for the acquisition of salvation. Out of reaction to this came anti-neonomianism, which had justification precede faith, and antinomianism, which traced justification to the eternal love of God and dissolved sin and satisfaction into "inadequate" concepts from which humans had to liberate themselves by the superior insight of faith.⁹⁴ [Reminds me Christian Science, where sin is just a wrong idea in your head from which you must be liberated by the power of your mental strength. There is nothing new under the sun.]

As a rule, Reformed theologians tried to avoid the two extremes and to that end soon began to employ the distinction between active and passive justification. This distinction does not yet occur in the works of the Reformers, who usually speak of justification in a concrete sense; [Commrie also acknowledges this] they do not deal with justification from eternity, in the resurrection of Christ, in the gospel, before and after the gift of faith, but sum up everything in a single concept. That is why in some of their pronouncements they offer support to those who place justification before faith, but they can with equal warrant be cited as advocates of the belief that justification always occurs through and from within faith. But with the rise of nomism [legalism] and antinomianism [no law to be observed at all], Reformed theologians were compelled to undertake [deeper] conceptual analysis and, to avoid both errors, differentiated between active and passive justification. On the one hand, they rejected the nomism that had the benefit of forgiveness come into being only upon faith, "experience," or conversion of the human agent. On the other hand, they were also on their guard against antinomianism and almost unanimously rejected the doctrine of eternal justification.⁹⁸ Thus they commonly assumed that, even if one could with some warrant speak of a justification in the divine decree, in the resurrection of Christ, and in the gospel, active justification first occurred only in the internal calling before and until faith, but the intimation of it in human consciousness (in other words, passive justification) came into being only through and from within faith.⁹⁹ In this connection they did their utmost to keep the two parts as closely connected as possible and to assume only a logical, not a temporal, distinction between them. Even at that, however, others continued to object to this distinction. After all, the gospel mentions no names and it says to no one personally: Your sins have been forgiven. Therefore no person can and may start with the belief that one's sins have been forgiven.

In the Reformed position, there seemed to be all the less warrant and freedom for such a personalized statement, inasmuch as on it the satisfaction of Christ is not universal but particular. The preacher of the gospel cannot give to anyone the assurance that one's sins are forgiven, since he does not know the elect; and the persons who hear that gospel can and may not believe this either, since before and without faith they cannot be conscious of their election. So it seemed that the practical conclusion was that they must first be cast down by a deep sense of guilt, then by faith seek refuge in Christ, surrender to him, become actively involved with him, and thus gradually, persuaded by self-examination of the genuineness of their refuge-taking faith, receive the boldness to consider themselves assured of the forgiveness of their sins and future salvation. The human agent, accordingly, must first believe, that is, become actively involved with Christ, so that then one could be justified by God. But in that way the ground of their justification had again been shifted from God to the human agent, from Christ's righteousness to the activities of faith, from the gospel to the law. [typical progression of thinking of Arminians, and many modern day protestants, etc., that leads to the sinner's prayer and similar works.] Just as in Lutheran theology, so also in Reformed theology no agreement was achieved. Soon after the Reformation, two schools of thought emerged on the scene that have persisted and still today make themselves felt both in doctrine and in life.

⁹⁴Cf. H. Bavinck, Reformed Dogmatics, I, 181–83 (# 55); ... The “New Lights” from Zwijndrecht also taught that God never exercises his wrath but only loves from eternity and that Christ has revealed this to us. What Christ delivers us from, therefore, is the despair and fear of God's wrath and punishment. In this way he reconciles us to God (not God to us). It is faith in Jesus's preaching, namely, that God is love, that justifies us and leads us to follow him. Ed. note: Zwijndrecht is a town in the Dutch province of South Holland, just across the Maas River from Dordrecht and southeast of Rotterdam. From the 1820s to the 1840s it was the home of a small mystical, pantheistic sect, referred to by its critics as “New Lights,” thanks to their Quaker-like commitment to the inner light of revelation. Eschewing sacraments and civil laws of marriage, the group developed a bad reputation and disbanded in 1846 when a number of its members were attracted to Mormonism and emigrated to the United States.

⁹⁸Thus the Westminster Confession, XI, 4; in E. F. K. Müller, Die Bekenntnisschriften der reformierten Kirche (Leipzig: Deichert, 1903); It was also of utmost importance to Comrie, Holtius, and Brahe that justification be considered as eternal. They were correct in noting that the just judgment concerning the elect as an immanent act (actus immanentus) in God was eternal and indistinguishable from his essence. However, they judged it as indifferent whether one called this immanent act “justification” or not, as long as the substance remained firm. Second, they accepted a notion of eternal justification since they regarded all of God's immanent acts as eternal, including, for example, creation. These, however, must never exclude God's acts in time. On the contrary, justification, which as a benefit is firmly fixed in God's decree, is nonetheless realized in time, for example, in the resurrection of Christ, in the gospel, in the application [of Christ's benefits] to all the elect in their proper time (A. Comrie, Brief over de regtvaardigmaking des zondaars, 91ff.). Third, they explained expressly that their chief concern was whether the application of Christ's righteousness was mediated or unmediated; whether it preceded or followed faith; and whether it is a free, sovereign act of God, or whether in some way it comes to pass through human cooperation, for example, by means of the condition of faith (J. J. Brahe, Godgeleerde stellingen, 20ff....

⁹⁹Thus theologians mentioned above and many others, for example, Ursinus, Piscator, Bucanus, Owen, Trigland, Leydekker, Hoornbeek, Holtius; In the Reformed Confessions, as is the case in Calvin, justification is described in such a way that we receive the righteousness, the benefits of Christ, even justification itself, by faith. E. F. K. Müller, ...

OBJECTIONS TO IMPUTATION

Still, the objection that is raised against imputed righteousness has to be considered seriously. Bellarmine [an Arminian] developed this objection along the following lines: if the righteousness of Christ is only imputed to us and therefore remains outside of us, it cannot be the essential form in which we are justified before God. God's judgment, certainly, corresponds to truth. He cannot pronounce righteous a person who is not righteous. As long as the righteousness of Christ is only imputed and remains outside of a person, that person is not righteous and can therefore not be declared righteous. People will say: but sinners are clothed by faith with the righteousness of Christ! Still, though that be the case, if someone appears in a dual form, an extrinsic and an intrinsic form, that person will be named not according to the first but according to the second form. Let an Ethiopian put on a white garment; he nevertheless remains a black man and is called thus, even if he is white in terms of his extrinsic form. Indeed, there is a stronger analogy. Christ, too, can be viewed in two ways (forms): according to his intrinsic form, he was holy; according to his extrinsic form, he was burdened with our sins. Yet he is not named after the latter form but after the former. Similarly, in justification the righteousness that is imputed cannot be our true form; we can only be justified on the basis of an indwelling righteousness. This objection of Bellarmine returns in the work of all the critics of Reformation doctrine. Everything that is charged against the doctrine of imputed righteousness can be materially summed up in this objection.

To begin with the last analogy: in Scripture Christ is very definitely named and treated according to his extrinsic form. It is even said that he was made to be sin for us and became a curse for us. In a legal or juridical sense Christ can be called a sinner, though to avoid the antinomian misunderstanding this practice is not to be recommended. Thus it is said in Rom. 4: 5 and 5: 6 that God justifies the ungodly. It is impossible, in this connection, to use stronger language. The opponents of imputed righteousness should not lodge their objection against Luther and Calvin but against Paul. Furthermore, the simile of the Ethiopian is a most unfortunate choice. The two forms in which a human being appears in justification are related very differently than the black skin and the white garment in the case of the Ethiopian. A person is ungodly in an ethical sense, but on account of the righteousness of Christ that person becomes righteous in a juridical sense. The act of putting on a white garment in no way changes the legal state of the Ethiopian. A more correct image is that of a child who, having been graciously adopted by a wealthy man, can as a future heir be called rich even though at the moment he or she does not yet own a penny. God declares sinners righteous, adopts them as children, promises them Christ and all his benefits; for that reason they are called righteous and will one day gain possession of all the treasures of grace.

The imputation of Christ's righteousness, moreover, is totally misconstrued by Bellarmine and his associates. [a straw-man argument – very common] They picture it as a fiction that is opposed to reality. Imputed righteousness, according to them, is a righteousness that exists only in the imagination, whereas infused righteousness, according to them, is the only real and true righteousness. That picture, however, is completely mistaken. Justification is as real as sanctification, and imputation is no less real than infusion. The only difference is this: in justification righteousness is granted to us in a juridical sense, while in sanctification it becomes ours in an ethical sense. Both are very real and very necessary. The judge must first validate someone's claim to a piece of property before one can take possession of it. This first act is not a fiction or an illusion that cuts no ice and conflicts with reality. On the contrary: needed first is the imputation of righteousness, the recognition of a claim, and only then can the infusion of righteousness follow, the act of taking possession of that to which one is entitled. Now if all this is true in the case of an earthly judge, how much more in the case of the heavenly judge? If God justifies the ungodly, that is not a fiction, a putative imputation, but a present and future reality. The way God administers justice is the way it is and remains forever, and that is also how one day, on the day of judgment, it will be recognized by everyone. For when God justifies the ungodly, he does it on the basis of a righteousness that he himself has effected in Christ. By Christ's sacrifice, against all hostile powers, he has acquired the right to acquit the ungodly, and when he issues a verdict he will also carry it out. After the ungodly have become righteous in a legal sense, [i.e., in a forensic sense] they will certainly also become righteous in an ethical sense. For God is he who gives life to the dead and calls into existence the things that do not exist (Rom. 4: 17). And a justifying faith consists above all in an unshakable trust in that God of miracles with whom all things are possible.

The righteousness on the basis of which the ungodly are justified, accordingly, is indeed not their own. It is "a righteousness of God" in contrast to their own. Still, it is not an alien and external righteousness in the sense that it does not concern the person so justified and is in no way connected with that person. On the contrary, already in the pact of salvation (pactum salutis) Christ positioned himself in relation to his own and assumed their place as mediator. In the state of humiliation he died for their sins and was raised for their justification. A covenant of grace, a mystical union between Christ and his church, existed long before believers were personally incorporated into it—or else Christ could not have made satisfaction for them either. The imputation and donation of Christ and all his benefits by God takes place before the particular persons come to believe. Specifically that imputation and donation takes place in the internal calling, and regeneration is the passive acceptance of this gift of grace. God also had to give that gift in order for us to be able to receive it. The very first gift of grace given us already presupposes the imputation of Christ, for Christ is the only source of grace, the acquirer and distributor of the Spirit, who is his Spirit, the Spirit of Christ. Accordingly, the righteousness that is the basis for justification is only "alien" in a certain sense. It is the righteousness of the head, but for that reason also of all the members, of the Mediator but therefore also of all the members of the covenant.

We Are Sinners Explained

FAITH AND JUSTIFICATION

Faith, therefore, includes two things: believing that we are sinners and believing that out of grace God justifies us for Christ's sake. We also have to accept the first [that we are sinners], not because we experience it ourselves, but because God says so.

Even if we do not recognize any sin in ourselves, we must nevertheless believe that we are sinners. Hence the apostle says: "I am not aware of anything against myself, but I am not thereby justified" (1 Cor. 4: 4). For just as the righteousness of God is alive in me by faith, so by the same faith sin is alive in me; i.e., by faith alone we must believe that we are sinners, because it is not obvious to us. If truth be told, most of the time we do not seem to be conscious of ourselves [as sinners]. Therefore we must stand by God's judgment and believe the words by which he tells us that we are unjust, because he cannot tell a falsehood. [41]

Usually, however, Luther distinguishes this belief that we are sinners from faith in a restricted sense and calls it contrition, confession, self-humiliation, and so forth. For the authentic belief that God grants us his righteousness is above all born from the knowledge and confession of our sins. "Those who know this cry to God and, humbled, seek to be raised up and to be cured of this (evil) will. Those who do not know [it], however, do not seek, and those who do not seek, do not receive; neither are they therefore justified, because they are ignorant of their own sin." [42] Contrition, accordingly, precedes the faith that embraces the righteousness of God in Christ. Now if people thus believe God at his word that there is no righteousness in themselves but only in Christ, they justify God, and that is passive justification. "To justify God in his words" is "for him to be made just and true in his speech, or, alternatively, for his speech to be made just and true. This happens, moreover, by believing and accepting [those works] and by holding them to be true and just." [43] But this passive justification by which we on our part justify God "coincides with God's justification of us actively, because he regards as righteousness the faith that justifies his words." The two coincide: "When he is justified he justifies, and when he justifies he is justified." Indeed: "God's passive and active justification and faith or belief in him are the same. The fact that we justify his speech is his own gift, and on account of that very gift he regards us as just, that is, justifies us." [44]

By virtue of the intimate connection that Luther posits here between justification and faith, he also refrains from reducing justification to a mere sentence that God pronounces to himself and that has no further consequences. Instead, the act of regarding as just immediately brings with it the act of making just. When we justify God by faith, he justifies us in his word (speech), that is, "he makes us to be like his Word, namely, righteous, true, wise, and so forth. And thus he transforms us into his Word, not, however, his Word into us. Moreover, he makes us such at the time when we believe his Word to be such, that is, righteous and true. For then the same formal character exists both in his Word and in the believer, that is, the character of truth and righteousness." [45] God is justified "when he justifies the ungodly and infuses grace, or when he is believed to be just in his own words." And thus God "is effectively justified in us and praiseworthy inasmuch as he makes us like himself." [46] The act of justifying is described as "regarding as righteous" (justum reputare) and so forth but sometimes—in the same sentence and for the sake of variety also—by "making, perfecting, and acquitting as righteous and as justice" (justum facere, perficere ac absolvere justum ac justitiam). [47] The death of Christ is the death of sin and his resurrection is the life of righteousness, because by his death he made satisfaction for sin and by his resurrection he brought about righteousness for us. His death, therefore, does not just signify, but also effects the forgiveness of sins. And his resurrection is not only “a sacrament of our righteousness but also effects it in us.” [48] “All our good exists outside us in Christ, because that good is Christ,” but all of this also exists in us by faith and hope in him. [49] In the same way Luther can say that our sin is covered by Christ’s dwelling in us, [50] that God justifies believers because they confess their sins and seek their righteousness in him. [51]

Nevertheless, we would also err if we inferred from this that Luther located righteousness itself—the righteousness that is the basis for justification—in believers. His intent is clearly otherwise. The self-righteous person, that is, the person who wants to be justified by works, does not believe God at his word, does not justify God, but dishonors him and makes him a liar. Such a person does not humble himself nor acknowledge himself to be a sinner; he does not seek to be justified and yearn for righteousness but believes he already possesses it.

The situation is very different in the case of believers, not only at the start but also throughout their lives, and even in death. They do not say to God, “We can and will do what you command in your law,” but rather confess, “We have not done, and cannot do, what you command, but give what you command; give us both the will and the ability to do what you ask! The self-righteous person trusts in a righteousness he achieved; the believer aspires to a righteousness to be acquired.” [52] The believer is indeed in principle righteous, for although a person is only righteous because he is so regarded by God; still “no one is so regarded unless he fulfills the law by work. But no one fulfills the law except those who believe in Christ. And thus the Apostle argues that outside of Christ no one is just, no one fulfills the law.” [53] In other words, while believers may in principle be righteous, the righteousness they possess is due solely to God’s grace and is not the ground on which they put their trust. At the start of their lives as believers as well as in the course of their lives, they continue to take God at his word. They continue to believe that they are sinners and that their righteousness is grounded solely in the righteousness of God.

Thus, while on earth, they are and remain sick as well as healthy, sinners as well as righteous, guilty and innocent. “Intrinsically the saints are always sinners; extrinsically, therefore, they are always justified. Hypocrites, on the other hand, are always intrinsically righteous; extrinsically, therefore, they are always sinners.” To be extrinsically righteous signifies that we are not righteous in ourselves or on account of our works, “but only by virtue of God’s imputation. For justification is neither in us nor in our power. Therefore our righteousness is neither in us nor in our power. Intrinsically and from within ourselves we are and will always remain impious.” [54] Just as a sick person is sick within himself and may be called healthy if he believes the promise of improvement made by a competent physician and obeys his instructions, so believing sinners are “in actual fact sinners but righteous on account of the imputation and promise of God that they derive from him until they are perfectly healed.” [55] Justification, accordingly, is always a work in progress. “People of faith spend their entire life in seeking justification.” [56] In their case it is better to speak of “the justified” (justificati) than of “the just” (justi), for Christ alone “is just, and we are still always being justified and in the process of justification.” [57] Guided by this view of justification, Luther was led in the end to warn against both false security and despair. Our entire life on earth, he said, is “a time of desiring righteousness, yet in no way of fully attaining it; it is fully attained only in a future life.” Even after our justification, God permits original sin to remain operative in us, in order that by it he might keep us in fear and humility and prompt us continually to resort to his grace. On the other hand, we need not give in to despair because we cannot radically remove internal sin from us, for that is not possible in this life, and God forgives those and does not impute sin to those who invoke his mercy. “Therefore the royal road and the road of peace in the Spirit is to know sin and to hate it and to walk in the fear of God in such a way that he does not impute sin and permit us to be controlled by it; and to pray for his mercy that we may be released from it and he does not impute it. Fear excludes the one: false security; and mercy [excludes] the other: despair. The former is a foolish complacency; the latter a lack of hope in God.” [58]

Thus the life of Christians remains a life of faith. They do not experience and know that they are justified, for they are only righteous by imputation of God, but they call for it and hope it, believe and expect it, [59] and in that hope are gladdened and assured. [60] God does not forsake the work of his hands but accomplishes what he has promised. [61] Christians exhibit that faith in their obedience to God’s Word. For the best Christians are not those “who are very learned and read much and own many books. But they are the best who most freely do what they read in books and teach others. However, they are not able to act freely unless they possess love through the Holy Spirit.” Therefore, in our age they are most to be feared who become very rich in book learning but remain unlearned as Christians. [62] Obedience, furthermore, does not consist in the accumulation of many good and great works with the idea that they are good because they are hard, but is frequently manifest in fidelity to what is small and of little significance. [63] In all that we do the main thing is that we let God work through us and do not assess his word by the standard of our works but our works by the standard of his word. [64]

Elements of Justification

Now as it concerns the forgiveness of sins, this does not consist, as Rome asserts, in the removal of the pollution of sin, inasmuch as it has justification consist in the “infusion of grace” and has forgiveness depend on sanctification. Nor does it only consist in the removal of the liability to guilt (reatus culpae), that is, practically in the deliverance from eternal punishment, while the punishment for venial sins committed after the infusion of grace had to be expiated by believers themselves either here or in purgatory hereafter [he's talking about this error in Roman Catholicism], since guilt and punishment are correlative concepts. However, the forgiveness that is a part of justification is nothing less than the complete acquittal of all the guilt and punishment of sin, not only of past and present but also of future sins. Some, out of fear of antinomianism, objected to this rich and inclusive view of forgiveness and therefore confined it to acquittal from the guilt of past and repeatedly confessed sins, with an appeal also to Matt. 6: 12; 1 John 1: 9; 2: 1; and so forth. Against antinomianism they thus defended an important truth. It is a fact that believers, after receiving forgiveness, still make many mistakes, even fall into grave sins, and continue to experience numerous vicissitudes in life as punishment. Rome takes this to mean that believers still have to expiate for their venial sins themselves and thereby fails to do justice to the richness and grace of forgiveness. Antinomianism, wanting to honor this grace (in error), infers from it that the sins that believers commit are charged not to the new but to the old “person,” and that believers no longer even have to pray for the forgiveness of their sins. Against this all Reformed theologians maintained that while forgiveness removes the “actual liability” of sin, it does not remove its “potential liability”; that is, forgiveness removes the punishment but not the fact that it deserves punishment. The latter remains as long as sin remains. Sin brings with it, especially in the case of believers, a sense of guilt, pain, regret, alienation from God, remorse, and so forth. It takes away one’s tranquility of conscience, the boldness and assurance of faith. That is unavoidable. The nature of sin is such that it necessarily brings with it a sense of guilt and liability to punishment. Even when believers, having long before received forgiveness, later take a deeper look at the corruption of their own heart, they feel a need even to confess the sins of their youth and to trace their guilt even to their conception and birth (Pss. 25: 7; 51: 4–5). In that case,

In that case, confession is not a condition for forgiveness, but those who truly know their sin naturally confess it and in the face of it feel all the greater need for the consolation of forgiveness. For believers, prayer for forgiveness remains a daily necessity. But in that case they do not pray in doubt and despair; they do not pray as though they are no longer children of God and again face eternal damnation; they pray from within the faith as children to the Father who is in heaven, and say Amen to their prayer. And this praying is not just a felt need but also an actual necessity, for justification does not consist in a transcendent acquittal of the sinner on the part of God in the court of heaven but is an act that passes from one sphere to another, is carried by the Holy Spirit into the consciousness of believers, and in this holistic sense bears the name “justification” in Scripture. Thus confession and prayer are the way by which God again arouses and reinforces this consciousness of forgiveness. Under the impact of the awareness of sin, this consciousness of forgiveness goes into hiding. Though faith as disposition (habitus) remains, it can no longer express itself in deeds. Needed, after our falling into sin, is self-humiliation, confession, the prayer for forgiveness, in order that this faith may again revive and the Spirit of God may again clearly and forcefully bear witness with our spirit that we are children of God.

If we were completely positioned in faith, we would never question the forgiveness of our sins, our status as children of God, or our future inheritance in Christ, nor would we ever construe any disaster in this life as a punishment from the Lord, but only as fatherly chastisement. But to be perfectly positioned in faith would be possible only if we were also positioned above sin. Inasmuch as this is not the case, and sin always entails doubt, repentance and confession continue to be the means by which God restores us to his fellowship and assures us of his favor. From this, however, it must not be inferred, with Rivetus (et al.), that God over and over and in each case forgives only past sins and sins that have been confessed. The truth is, all the sins of the church have been transferred to Christ, and he has made full payment for them in his blood. In the imputation of Christ to the elect in the pact of redemption, in incarnation, and resurrection, in the external and internal call, he is granted to them with all his benefits. The moment they accept this gift of God, they are also on their part at once put in a new relation to God, one that is unchangeable and unbreakable. While for a time the activities of faith may be lacking, nevertheless the gift of faith by which they are incorporated into Christ and accept all his benefits cannot be lost (John 3: 36; Rom. 8: 30; Gal. 3: 27; Heb. 9: 12; 10: 12, 14; etc.). Christ, moreover, is not given them for a moment at the beginning, but is and remains their mediator and with his righteousness continually covers all their iniquity.[152] He justifies not only their person but also their works, even though the best of them are still stained with sin. Believers therefore also always have the right and the freedom, after every lapse, to go with confidence to the throne of grace and plead on the basis of the faithfulness of him whose gift of grace and calling are irrevocable (Rom. 11: 29; Heb. 4: 12; 1 John 1: 9). As Luther put it: "Because Christ alone is righteous and possesses righteousness, we are to this very moment always in process of being justified."

CALLING AND REGENERATION

The Triune God produces all things in creation and new creation by his Word and Spirit. All things thus speak to us of God. God's call as law comes to all people in nature, in history, and in a variety of experiences. While insufficient unto salvation, this call upholds human existence in society and culture, despite the ubiquity of sin. Though the restricted call unto salvation comes through the word of the gospel, it may not be separated from nature and history. The Logos who became incarnate is the same as he by whom all things were made. Grace does not abolish nature but restores it. Still, the special call of the gospel does not proceed from law and invite us to obedience, but it flows forth from grace and invites us to faith.

The call to faith must be universally preached; this is Christ's command. The outcome must be left in God's hands; we are simply to obey. The gospel is to be preached to human beings, not as elect or reprobate, but as sinners, all of whom need redemption. Of course, not to each individual person can it be said, "Christ died in your place." But neither do those who preach a hypothetical universalism do that since they only believe in the possibility of universal salvation, conditional upon human acceptance. And this no one knows for sure. God's offer is sincere in that he only tells us what we must do—believe. Since it is clear from history that the outcome of God's call does not universally lead to faith, we cannot avoid the intellectual problem. It is not solved through weakening the call by expanding it for the purpose of greater inclusiveness. Acknowledging in humility the mystery of God's will, we recognize that God's own glory is its final purpose and believe that his Word never returns to him empty.

The call of law also prepares the way for the gospel, not in the Arminian sense of an evolution from preparatory grace to saving grace through human willing, but as the created natural foundation for salvation. God does link his work of grace to our natural lives¹; creation, redemption, and sanctification are the work of the Triune God in the divine economy of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. God is sovereign and his grace is rich and varied. Following Augustine, Reformed theology distinguishes an external or revealed call from the savingly efficacious internal call of the Holy Spirit. This distinction honors the universality of sin, the need to have the word of proclamation take root in a sinner's heart by a special work of God, and ascribes all of our salvation to God's mercy and activity. This change is so dramatic that it is properly called "rebirth" or "regeneration."

The notion of rebirth is found in other religions of the Ancient East, notably in mystery religions such as Mithraism. Attempts to explain the Christian understanding of regeneration by means of the dying and rising gods of the mystery religions are not very persuasive. Even considering the paucity of our knowledge about the mystery religions, their ideas and practices come from a different religious environment and worldview. The New Testament here rather builds on the Old Testament, where the whole people of Israel as well as individual persons are told that they need new hearts, a new birth only God can accomplish (Ps. 51: 1–3). From the baptism of John through the preaching of Jesus and into the apostolic proclamation, the one consistent message is the need for μετανοια, for a radical turnabout, if one wishes to enter the kingdom of heaven. One must be "born from above" (John 3: 6–8). By faith, Christ or his Spirit is the author and origin of a new life in those who are called (Gal. 3: 2; 4: 6) so that they are now a "new creation" (2 Cor. 5: 17). While there is a difference between the Old Testament and New Testament in language and manner of presentation, the basic truth is the same. Whether rebirth is called "circumcision of the heart," "the giving of a new heart and a new spirit, a drawing from the Father, or a birth from God, it is always in the strict sense a work of God by which a person is inwardly changed and renewed. This change is signified and sealed in baptism.

In the missionary context of the early church, the rebirth signified by baptism was a momentous and life-changing event for the believer. Moving beyond this context, as the church began baptizing infants and children, the connection between baptism and regeneration had to be modified. In Western Catholicism, regeneration was increasingly understood in terms of the infusion of sacramental grace at the time of baptism. In the Eastern church, a similar result was achieved but thought of in terms of implanting a new seed of immortality. A new quality was infused into the soul, and baptism itself became essential for salvation. Remaining in the state of grace depends on the mediation of the church and its sacraments.

It is this sacramental system that the Reformation protested, restoring a direct relationship between God and the soul through the Holy Spirit. The Word of Scripture took priority over church and sacrament. This brought its own difficulties as the Anabaptists rejected church and sacraments as means of grace and made personal faith and confession the condition for baptism. In response, Lutherans again made regeneration dependent on baptism and, by implication, on the church, thus creating a dualism between primary regeneration, which precedes faith, and subsequent secondary renewal, which arises from faith. Reformed theologians wrestled mightily with this issue but found no solution satisfactory to everyone when it came to grounds for baptizing the children of believers. The attempt to ground it in a notion of prebaptismal regeneration satisfied some but ran aground on the reality that some who are baptized do not come to full faith as adults. Maintaining the continuity of the spiritual life proved difficult, and due to the Enlightenment, the notion of rebirth fell into disfavor and was replaced by humanistic notions of moral development, improvement, and nurture.

It was Schleiermacher who restored the idea of regeneration to theology, making it the center of his understanding of the Christian faith. For him, regeneration is the new consciousness of God's grace and human dependence on God gained by sharing in the consciousness of Christ. In the Mediating Theology, sin played a more significant role, but at bottom the new life in Christ was a participation in a new personality; there was no objective atonement for sin or justification, only a subjective appropriation of new consciousness. Faith's content is here reduced to mystical experience.

This locus of theology, namely, soteriology, is as beset with difficulties as are the doctrines of the Trinity and of the two natures of Christ. While it is understandable that missionary proclamation begins with repentance and faith and only after that speaks of regeneration, upon reflection on Scripture and experience we come to realize that, properly speaking, regeneration must precede faith. If salvation rests in God's will and not in the human will, that order is inviolable. Augustine must be chosen over Pelagius. However, there are ethical/ practical considerations too. Could overemphasis on regeneration lead some to feel uncertain about their regeneration and thus be paralyzed in their response to the gospel call—waiting for God to regenerate them? Similarly, what about children of believers? Does the church baptize children of believers on the ground of presumed regeneration? Or, as in Roman Catholicism and Lutheranism, does baptism somehow impart a seed of regeneration? The Reformed tradition distinguishes regeneration and faith, baptizes infants on the basis of covenant promises, but also acknowledges that the Holy Spirit could work sovereignly in the hearts of children apart from the preaching of the Word.

Because notions of rebirth are found outside of Scripture in the world's religions, it is important to be clear about the distinguishing features of the biblical view. Unlike Buddhism or Hinduism, rebirth does not mean reincarnation. While rebirth does apply to the Christian understanding of conversion, it is not sufficient to compare the biblical view with initiation into Greek mystery religions or even with Jewish proselytism. It is more than a change of consciousness, an enlightenment of the mind, or even a reformation of conduct, though it includes all of these. Nor should we be satisfied with the gnostic notion of redemption as the deliverance of the inner self from the "flesh" or matter. [Gnostics believed that all matter is evil; so salvation to them is dying! - the soul being set free from its body, being that the body is matter and all matter is evil; yep, that's crazy.] Neither rationalism nor mysticism provides us with a correct view of regeneration.

It is helpful to recognize a broader and more narrow use of the term "regeneration." In the broadest and fullest sense, regeneration refers to the total transformation of a person; in the restricted sense, it has in view the implantation of new life that then leads to conversion and further sanctification. The active word of God here—calling—must also be differentiated from the passive reception or fruit of God's initiating work. God's call has both an external and internal component. The external proclaimed Word addresses human consciousness persuasively; human response requires an inner work of the Holy Spirit. In Reformed thought, God's inner call logically precedes the outward call, though Word and Spirit must never be separated. The Reformed tradition also acknowledges the reality of the faith community's involvement in the external call upon its own children as a gracious work of God the Holy Spirit.

This operation of the Holy Spirit is both immediate and irresistible. The point made by Reformed theology here against the Pelagians, Arminians, and theologians of Saumur is that God's operation on the human person is independent of the will as well as the intellect. There is no room here to speak of cooperation or of God merely enlightening the mind, which then informs and changes the will. Though the term "irresistible" was used by opponents of the Reformed faith and does not sufficiently capture the Reformed view, its meaning is clear: When God freely chooses to renew a person's will, no one can withstand God. God's inner call is efficacious.

While the Augustinian and Reformed view can and does make room for human beings as created, rational, moral agents, the Pelagian and Remonstrant view cannot account for Scripture's teaching about the radical need for grace. If grace is resistible, God is deprived of his sovereignty; if the human will is capable on its own of assenting to God, then regeneration is unnecessary; and if, as the Pelagian and Remonstrant position teaches, some prevenient grace is necessary to prompt human willing, then the notion of an indifferent will remains a fiction. see [Bavinck's comment on indifferent freedom and prevenient grace, code419] The only gain here is an apparent but not real one, as becomes apparent with the case of children who die in infancy. Either they are saved by sovereign grace alone without any choosing on their part, or such grace is insufficient and all infants who die before choosing are lost. The Pelagian and Arminian position is not at all merciful.

The purpose of regeneration is to make us spiritual people, those who live and walk by the Spirit. This life is a life of intimate communion with God in Christ. Though believers are made new creatures in Christ, this does not mean that their created nature is qualitatively transformed. Believers remain fully human, fully created image-bearers of God as in the beginning. As in creation itself, no new substance enters into the world with redemption; the creature is liberated from sin's futility and bondage. Sin is not of the essence of creation but its deformity; Christ is not a second Creator but creation's Redeemer. Salvation is the restoration of creation and the reformation of life. Redemption is not coercive; it delivers people from the compulsion and power of sin. The new life comes from God and is born in his love.

THE PARTICULAR CALL OF GRACE pgs 41-44

Scripture and experience testify, however, that all these workings of external calling do not always and in every case lead people to a sincere faith and salvation. Hence the question arises: What is the ultimate cause of this diverse outcome? In the Christian church, in the main, a threefold answer was given to that question. Some said that this diverse outcome was due to the human will, whether that will had received the power to accept or reject the gospel from its natural self, or from the grace of the Logos, or from the grace of baptism, or from that of the calling. According to this view, there is no distinction between external and internal, or between efficient and efficacious calling. Inwardly and essentially the calling is always and in every case the same. It is only called efficacious in terms of the outcome when a person responds to the call. After everything we have said previously about Pelagianism, this answer does not call for a lengthy refutation. It clearly offers no solution. In practice one can indeed confine oneself to the proximate cause and attribute unbelief specifically to the human will. In that case, one is speaking truthfully (Deut. 30: 19; Josh. 24: 15; Isa. 65: 12; Matt. 22: 2–3; 23: 37; John 7: 17; Rom. 9: 32; etc.): the sinful will of humans is responsible for their unbelief. But even in practice all believers at all times and in all schools of thought have attributed their faith and salvation to God's grace alone. There is nothing that distinguishes them other than that gift of grace (1 Cor. 4: 7). Ultimately, therefore, this difference cannot lie in the human will. If one nevertheless insists on considering will the final cause, one is instantly faced with all the psychological, ethical, historical, and theological objections that have at all times been raised against Pelagianism. It introduces incalculable caprice and weakens sin; the decision about the outcome of world history is put in the hands of humans, the governance over all things is taken away from God; his grace is canceled out. Even if one ascribes the power to choose for or against the gospel to the restoration of grace, this does not help matters. In that case one introduces a grace that consists solely in the restoration of volitional choice, one that is nowhere mentioned in Scripture, that actually presupposes regeneration and yet has to bring it about only after the right choice has been made. [F.H.R. Frank] On this position one also gets stuck with all the millions of people who have never heard of the gospel or died as infants and for that reason were never in a position to accept or reject Christ. Accordingly, the free will of humans cannot be the ultimate cause of faith and unbelief.

Another answer to the above question was therefore devised by Bellarmine. He rejected both the doctrine of Pelagius and that of Augustine, sought a path somewhere between them, and said that the efficacy of the call depended on whether it came to a person at an opportune time when the will was inclined to follow it (congruitas).[14] Agreeing with this congruism are the views of Pajon, Kleman, as well as Shedd, who considers salvation "in the highest degree probable" for everyone who makes serious and diligent use of the means of grace. [W.G.T. Shedd] But this answer, too, is unsatisfactory. In this congruity theory there is indeed an important truth that, while ignored by Methodism, comes into its own in the Reformed doctrine of preparatory grace. But it is completely unable to explain the efficacy of the call. The reason is that it is inherently nothing other than moral suasion, which in the nature of the case is powerless to create the spiritual life that, according to Scripture, is the result of regeneration. Further, it presupposes that a human being is fit one moment and unfit the next to accept grace, thus locating sin in circumstances and weakening it in humans. In addition, it makes the ultimate decision dependent on the human will and thereby again provokes all the objections mentioned above and lodged by Bellarmine himself against Pelagianism. Finally, it links calling and conversion by a thread of congruity, which, being moral in nature, can at all times be broken by the will and hence cannot guarantee the efficacy of the call. Augustinians, Thomists, and Reformed theologians, therefore, located the reason why in one person the calling bore fruit and in another it did not in the nature of the calling itself. The first group said that when the call was efficacious, a “triumphant delight” (delectatio victrix) was present, which granted not only the capacity to act (posse) but also the will to act (velle). The Thomists spoke of a “natural predetermination” or “natural action of God” that prompted the capacity to act (posse agere), conferred by “sufficient calling,” to pass into action. The Reformed, however, objecting to the use of these terms, took exception especially to the description of an act of God in conversion as “natural” and preferred to speak of an “external” and an “internal” call. This distinction already occurs in Augustine, was taken over from him by Calvin, and was further adopted in Reformed theology. Earlier this twofold calling was referred to by other terms as well, such as the “material and formal,” the “revealed” call and the call of “God’s good pleasure,” the common and the personal, the universal and the special call, but the terms “external” and “internal” call gained the upper hand and gradually pushed out the others.

Now although this distinction does not occur in so many words in Scripture, it is based on Scripture.

1. It is already implied in the fact that all humans are the same by nature, worthy of condemnation before God (Rom. 3: 9–19; 5: 12; 9: 21; 11: 32), dead in sins and trespasses (Eph. 2: 2–3), darkened in their understanding (1 Cor. 2: 14; Eph. 4: 18; 5: 8). They cannot see the kingdom of God (John 3: 3), are the slaves of sin (8: 34; Rom. 6: 20), enemies of God (8: 7; Col. 1: 21), do not and cannot submit to God’s law (Rom. 8: 7), are unable to think or do anything good from within themselves (John 15: 5; 2 Cor. 3: 5); though the gospel is for the benefit of humans, they are hostile toward it and despise it as an offense or folly (1 Cor. 1: 23; 2: 14). Hence the difference that occurs among people after the calling is inexplicable in terms of human capacities. God and his grace alone make the difference (1 Cor. 4: 7).

2. Simply the preaching of the Word by itself is not sufficient (Isa. 6: 9–10; 53: 1; Matt. 13: 13ff.; Mark 4: 12; John 12: 38–40; etc.). Hence in the Old Testament already we learn of the promised Spirit who would teach everyone and grant them all a new heart (Isa. 32: 15; Jer. 31: 33; 32: 39; Ezek. 11: 19; 36: 26; Joel 2: 28). To that end he was poured out on the day of Pentecost to witness to Christ along with and through the apostles (John 15: 26–27), to convict the world of sin and righteousness and judgment (John 16: 8–11), to regenerate people (John 3: 5ff.; 6: 63; 16: 13), and to lead them to confess Jesus as Lord (1 Cor. 12: 3).

3. The work of redemption, therefore, is ascribed completely, both subjectively and objectively, to God. This is not just meant in a general sense, the way we say that God works all things by his providence, but definitely in the restricted sense that by a special divine power he works regeneration and conversions. So it depends not on human will or exertion, but on God who shows mercy (Rom. 9: 16). The calling is the implementation of divine election (8: 28; 11: 29). It is God who renews the human heart and inscribes his law on it (Ps. 51: 12; Jer. 31: 33; Ezek. 36: 26), who enlightens the eyes of the heart (Ps. 119: 18; Eph. 1: 18; Col. 1: 9–11), opens the heart (Acts 16: 14), makes his own recognize his Son as the Christ (Matt. 11: 25; 16: 17; Gal. 1: 16), and draws people to him with spiritual power (John 6: 44; Col. 1: 12–13). He causes the gospel to be preached, not only in words but also in demonstration of the spirit and power (1 Cor. 2: 4; 1 Thess. 1: 5–6), and himself gives wisdom (1 Cor. 2: 6–9). He, in short, is at work in us, enabling us both to will and to work according to his good pleasure (Phil. 2: 13) and to that end uses a power like the power by which he raised Christ from the dead and made him sit at his right hand (Eph. 1: 18–20).

4. The very act by which God accomplishes this change in humans is often called “rebirth” (John 1: 13; 3: 3ff.; Titus 3: 5; etc.), and the fruit of it is called a new heart (Jer. 31: 33), a new creation (2 Cor. 5: 17), his workmanship created in Christ Jesus (Eph. 2: 10), the work of God (Rom. 14: 20), and his building (1 Cor. 3: 9; Eph. 2: 21; etc.). This is to say that what is brought about in humans by the grace of God is much too rich and great for it to be explained in terms of the “moral suasion” of the preaching of the Word.

5. Finally, Scripture itself speaks of calling in a dual sense. Repeatedly it refers to a calling and invitation to which there was no positive response (Isa. 65: 12; Matt. 22: 3, 14; 23: 37; Mark 16: 15–16; etc.). In that case it could say that while God did everything on his part (Isa. 5: 4), people in their obstinacy refused to believe and resisted God’s counsel, the Holy Spirit, and calling (Matt. 11: 20ff.; 23: 37; Luke 7: 30; Acts 7: 51). But Scripture also knows a calling from God—a realization of election—that is always efficacious. This is especially true in Paul (Rom. 4: 17; 8: 30; 9: 11, 24; 1 Cor. 1: 9; 7: 15ff.; Gal. 1: 6, 15; 5: 8; Eph. 4: 1, 4; 1 Thess. 2: 12; 2 Tim. 1: 9; also cf. 1 Pet. 1: 15; 2: 9; 5: 10; 2 Pet. 1: 3). Believers are therefore repeatedly described simply as “those who are called” (Rom. 1: 7; 1 Cor. 1: 2, 24), and “those who are called in Christ” or “in the Lord” (1 Cor. 7: 22); that is, those who are called by God belong to Christ and live in communion with him. In addition, Paul also knows of a preaching of the gospel to those who reject it. To them the gospel is foolishness (1 Cor. 1: 18, 23), a fragrance from death to death (2 Cor. 2: 15–16). They do not understand it (1 Cor. 2: 14). As a power of God (1 Cor. 1: 18, 24), it proves itself to those who are called by God according to his purpose (Rom. 8: 28; 9: 11; 11: 28; Eph. 1: 4–5).

REGENERATION: SCRIPTURAL TEACHING pgs 46-53

The idea of rebirth has its roots in the Old Testament. The word παλιγγενεσία does not occur in the Septuagint except that Job says (14: 14): ὑπομένω ἕως ἂν παλιν γενωμαι (“I would wait until my release should come”). But materially the idea of rebirth clearly occurs already in Israelite religion. Entirely in keeping with the Old Testament dispensation, it is first of all a matter for the people as a whole. At the time of the giving of the law and later in prophecy the word is first of all addressed to all the people God has included in his covenant, and on the basis of that covenant the people are confronted with the demand that they serve the Lord with all their heart and soul (Deut. 10: 10; Josh. 22: 5). But as apostasy, unfaithfulness, and the hardness of people’s hearts became more and more evident in history, the prophets stressed with increasing forcefulness that an inner change had to come, not only among the people as a whole, but also in the heart of every member of that people in particular. And in that respect human beings of themselves are unable to bring it about (Gen. 6: 5; 8: 21; Job 14: 4; 15: 16; Ps. 51: 5). No more than an Ethiopian can change his skin or the leopard his spots can Israel do good, for it has learned to do evil (Jer. 13: 23). The heart is deceitful above all things and lethally corrupt (Jer. 17: 9). A stupid man will no more get understanding than the colt of a wild ass is born human (Job 11: 12). But what human beings cannot bring about in themselves or others God will do in the future. He alone can create a clean heart (Ps. 51: 10–12). He will take away their stony heart and give them a heart of flesh, circumcise the foreskin of their heart, put a new spirit within them, inscribe the law in their heart, and cause them to walk in his statutes. Then Israel will be his people, a shoot of his planting, a work of his hands, that he may be glorified (Deut. 10: 16; 30: 1–6; Isa. 54: 13; 60: 21; Jer. 24: 7; 31: 18, 31ff.; 32: 8ff.; Ezek. 11: 19; 36: 25ff.).

Initially John the Baptist and then Jesus required such an internal change from all who want to enter the kingdom of heaven. The people of Israel, despite all its external privileges, was nevertheless corrupt through and through. Despite its circumcision, it needed baptism, the baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins, in which a person is totally immersed in order to rise again as another person to a new life (Matt. 3: 2ff.). To obtain the benefits of the kingdom, a radical turnaround, a μετανοια, is needed. Those who want to enter the kingdom must break with their entire previous life, lose their life (Matt. 10: 37–39; 16: 25; Luke 14: 26), leave behind everything (14: 33), take up their cross and follow Jesus (Matt. 10: 38), become a child (18: 3), return to the Father with a confession of sin (Luke 15: 18), and go through the narrow gate and walk down the narrow path (Matt. 7: 14). Those who really do this are enabled to do so by God himself. For human beings are by nature evil (7: 11). Out of their hearts come nothing but wickedness (15: 19). Like a bad tree, they cannot produce good fruit (7: 17ff.). Accordingly, if there is to be good fruit, the tree must be made good first, something only God can do (19: 26). Children of God and citizens of his kingdom are those who have been planted by the heavenly Father (15: 13), to whom the Son has revealed the Father and the Father the Son (11: 25–27; 13: 11; 16: 17). Whereas they were spiritually dead before, they have a true life now and await eternal life (8: 22; Luke 15: 24; 18: 30). In all Christ's teaching as we find it in the first three Gospels, though the word "rebirth" does not occur, the matter itself is clearly presented. So when in his conversation with Nicodemus Jesus says that no one can see the kingdom of God unless he or she is born anew (from above) of water and the Spirit (John 3: 3–8), he is not contradicting his teaching in the other Gospels but briefly and pointedly summing up for the teacher Nicodemus what he has explained elsewhere at greater length and in more popular form. Nicodemus, we must know, was a distinguished man, a teacher in Israel, a member of the supreme council. He had heard of Jesus's miracles and on that basis regarded him a teacher sent by God. But being still in doubt whether Jesus was the Messiah, he went to Jesus by night for fear of the Jews in order to achieve certainty through a confidential interview with him. Nicodemus, accordingly, began the conversation with the admission that he viewed Jesus as a teacher sent by God and endowed by God with the capacity to do his works, and evidently wanted to go on to ask what one must do to enter the kingdom of God. Jesus, not giving him the time to pose that question, immediately answered: "Truly, truly, I say to you, unless one is born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God" [John 3: 3 RSV]. And with that answer, he abruptly cut off all human self-effort, all Pharisaic law observance, as the way to the kingdom.

Also, for that reason, Jesus does not speak of being born a second time, literally anew, but of being born from above. He stresses, not that entry into the kingdom requires a second birth (although regeneration can of course be called that), but wants especially to bring out for Nicodemus that only a birth from above (v. 3), of water and the Spirit (v. 5), of the Spirit (v. 8), admits a person to the kingdom. This birth occurs in contrast to that of the flesh, for what is born of the flesh is flesh (v. 6). It is not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of humans, but of God (John 1: 13). For that reason it is as equally incomprehensible in origin and direction as the wind, but nevertheless possible, for it is a birth of the Spirit (3: 8). After first having said in general that it is a birth from water and spirit (both without the article, v. 5), he specifically speaks in verses 6 and 8 of the Spirit (with the article) and that this Spirit, as the Spirit of God, can bring about this great work of regeneration from above. Hence, in speaking of water in verse 5, Jesus is not speaking of baptism, but describes by this term the nature of birth from above. It is a birth that has the character of a renewal, a purification, of which water is a symbol (Ezek. 36: 25; cf. the combination of Spirit and fire, Matt. 3: 11), and confers the existence of a new spiritual life. And that is something this birth from above can bring about, for it is a birth from the Spirit, who is God himself (John 3: 6–8).

The apostles, too, frequently speak of regeneration but describe it in varied terms, sometimes viewing it in a broad, and then again in a narrow sense. James (1: 18) says that God of his own will brought us forth (ἀπεκυσεν; cf. the same word in v. 15: “Sin when it is full-grown brings forth death” [RSV]), that we should be a kind of firstfruits of his creatures. This ἀποκυεῖν arises from the will of God, from whom all good and perfect gifts descend, and who offers us the greatest proof of his fatherly love in that he has brought us forth as his people. This came about by means of the word of truth (or just the truth [3: 14; 5: 19], or the perfect law, the law of liberty, the royal law [1: 25; 2: 8, 12]), which did not stop outside of or over against us so that we can only hear it, but was planted in us, is written on the tables of our hearts, according to Heb. 8: 10; 10: 16, and can therefore save our souls (James 1: 21). And the goal of this regenerative process is that Christians should be the firstfruits of God’s creation, as the true Israel, the special possession of God, like the people of Israel who existed in the days of the Old Testament (Exod. 19: 5; Deut. 7: 6; 14: 2; 26: 18; Ps. 135: 4; Isa. 43: 21; Mal. 3: 17; cf. 1 Pet. 1: 23; 2: 9) pg 51 More on Man’s Depravity – moral inability, spiritual blindness, etc.

Even more than in Paul, rebirth or regeneration occupies a central place in John. For what is born of flesh is flesh (3: 6) and hostile to God. Those who are born only of natural descent (1: 13) are of the world (8: 23; 15: 19) and belong to the world (14: 17, 19, 22; etc.), are from below (8: 23) and from the devil (8: 44), do not comprehend the light of the Logos (1: 5), do not receive him (1: 11), love the darkness more than the light (3: 19–20), do not hear what God says (8: 47), do not know God (8: 19; 15: 21), do not see the kingdom of God (3: 3), walk in darkness (12: 35), hate the light (3: 20), and are the slaves of sin (8: 34). Neither can they see the kingdom of God (3: 3), believe (5: 44; 12: 39), hear the Word of God (8: 43), come to Christ (6: 44), or receive the Holy Spirit (14: 17). What is needed, therefore, is rebirth or regeneration. Such an event is a γεννηθῆναι ἀνωθεν (“being born from above”: 3: 3; cf. 3: 31; 8: 23; 19: 11; of God: 1: 13; 1 John 3: 9; etc.) of water and Spirit (John 3: 5), that is, of the Spirit (3: 6, 8), whose cleansing activity is symbolized by water (cf. Ezek. 36: 25–27; Matt. 3: 11). It is mysterious and marvelous, so that no one knows its origin or essence (John 3: 8). In John this event of rebirth, therefore, is not as directly connected with the call as it is in Paul, but viewed rather as a work of the Father, who gave his own to Christ beforehand and leads them to Christ in time. Even before his incarnation, after all, Christ worked in the world as Logos (1: 1–13). As light he shone in the world, but the world did not recognize him (1: 5, 9–10). He came to his own, to Israel, but his own did not receive him (1: 11). But even then his coming was not totally fruitless, for as many as received him already received power to become children of God. And they were such as were born of God (1: 12–13; cf. 1 John 5: 1). Before people came to Christ and believed in him, they were already of God (John 8: 47), of the truth (18: 37). They were given to the Son by the Father (6: 37, 39; 17: 2, 9). He drew them to Christ (6: 44), and all those who thus come to Christ, far from being rejected or lost, are preserved by him for eternal life (6: 39; 10: 28; 17: 12). Christ came to bring into the fold those who were already his sheep given him by the Father (10: 27), to impel them to hear his voice and follow him, and to gather them into one flock (10: 16; 11: 52). He came to give those who in a sense were already the children of God (11: 52), the ἐξουσία, the right and authority, to become such children [1: 12], with a view toward manifesting themselves as such, as people born of God, as τέκνα του θεου, and to show this particularly in brotherly love, in love for those who are similarly born of God (1 John 5: 1).

Some scholars mistakenly trace this Johannine teaching to a gnostic dualism. [J.H. Scholten] But this dualism is not intrinsic in creation, for all things were originally created by the Logos (John 1: 3). The world in general is the object of God's love (3: 16). God gave his Son, not to condemn the world, but to save it (3: 17; 12: 47). By nature all people belong to the world, which hates the light because its works are evil (3: 19–20). So then it depends on faith whether a person receives eternal life (3: 15–16, 36). That faith is a "work" (ἔργον, 6: 29), a coming (5: 40; 6: 35, 37, 44; 7: 37), an act of receiving (1: 11–12; 3: 11ff.; 5: 43), thirsting and drinking, hungering and eating (4: 13–15; 6: 35, 50ff.; 7: 37). It does not bypass the intellect and will; in fact, only those who want to do the Father's will can know whether Jesus's teaching is from God or whether he speaks on his own authority (7: 17). Unbelief, therefore, is also attributed to the stubborn will of people (5: 40; 8: 44). A person remains responsible for it (3: 19; 9: 41; 12: 43; 15: 22, 24). God sent his Son into the world, so that whoever believes in him should not perish but have eternal life (3: 16, 36; 6: 47; 20: 31). By faith, therefore, one receives eternal life, passes from death into life (1 John 3: 14), has overcome the evil one and the world (2: 14; 5: 4), and possesses the anointing of the Holy One (2: 20, 27). Perdition is no longer an issue, for Christ preserves his own (John 10: 28–29) and the seed of God remains in them (1 John 3: 9). Yet believers are still admonished to remain in Christ and in his word (John 15: 4–10; 1 John 2: 24), that they may manifest the new life that is given to them in doing right (2: 29), in self-purification (3: 3), in self-preservation (5: 18), and in love for God and one's fellow believers, for God is love (4: 7–8; 5: 1). For sin continues to cling to believers throughout their lives (1: 8). Perfect godlikeness will be their lot only in the future (3: 2).

Accordingly, in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, while there is a difference between them in language and manner of presentation, there is essentially complete agreement. Whether rebirth is called the "circumcision of the heart," the giving of a new heart and a new spirit, "efficacious calling," a drawing by the Father, or birth from God, it is always in the strict sense a work of God by which a person is inwardly changed and renewed. It has its deepest cause in God's mercy; it is based on the resurrection of Christ and is brought about in communion with Christ, to whom the Word bears witness, and manifests itself in a holy life. Sometimes, as in John, the words stress that it is the principle of the new life whose consequence is the faithful hearing and reception of Jesus's words. Sometimes the other side comes more clearly to the fore. Then it is the unfolding and development of that new life that stands out. The two are most intimately intertwined, however, and belong inseparably to the one concept of regeneration. There is one verse, however, in which the word "rebirth" is given a much broader meaning. In Matt. 19: 28 Jesus says that at the "renewal of all things," when the Son of Man sits on his glorious throne, the twelve disciples who had left everything behind and followed him would also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. The absence of all further detail is proof that the word that Jesus used in the Aramaic must have referred to something that was well known. And that was in fact the case. Old Testament prophecy, focusing on the end time, already expected a renewal of heaven and earth (Isa. 11: 1–9; 65: 17–25; 66: 22; etc.). This expectation carried over into apocryphal literature and into the faith of the entire Jewish people.[F.W. Weber] The messianic kingdom would also bring with it a metamorphosis in nature and all earthly relations. Jesus confirms this expectation, as also the apostles do later (2 Pet. 3: 10–13; Rev.

21: 1, 5), and describes the change as a “rebirth.” If we link this meaning with the above, it turns out that Scripture speaks of rebirth mainly in three ways: (1) as the principle of the new life planted by the Spirit of God in humans before they believe, (2) as the moral renewal of humans manifesting itself in a holy walk of life, and finally (3) as the restoration of the whole world to its original completeness. Thus rebirth encompasses the entire scope of re-creation from its very first beginning in the heart of people to its ultimate completion in the new heaven and new earth.

Notes on the order of salvation from Hermon Bavinck (ordo salutis)

Now since regeneration is basically the re-creation of the whole person in the image of him who created humans, the capacity to believe (potential, seminal, or “habitual” faith, the seed or root of faith) is automatically implied. Pg 101 Vol. 4, Reformed Dogmatics

In addition, it was overlooked that in regeneration the seeds of hope and love (and so forth) are always implanted as well, that in principle the whole person is renewed by it. Aside from this, however, it is perfectly true that in regeneration, along with all human capacities and powers, the capacity to believe is also restored. To the regenerate person, believing in God or in Christ as such is just as natural as it is for everyone to believe in the world of the senses. Admittedly, just as every potentiality results in actions only when it receives a kind of stimulus from without, and a grain of wheat only germinates in the warm shelter of the soil, so also the capacity to believe implanted by regeneration only becomes an act of faith in response to the ongoing internal calling. But in regeneration, God nevertheless restores the vital rapport that originally existed between him and humanity. Created in God’s image, humans are again related to God himself and to all that is his: to his Christ, to the things of the Spirit, to his Word, to his church, to his heaven, to the things that are above. Crucified to the world and to sin, the regenerate live to God. And thus, having been enlightened by the Holy Spirit, they also know God and are saved through that knowledge (John 17: 3). G. Vos states in his Reformed Dogmatics, pg 635

e) Concerning the essence of this union (with Christ] in a positive sense, we can say that it is: skip to point 4.

4. A reciprocal unity. Establishing this unity is of course a work of Christ. Man does not take the initiative here by taking hold of Christ and drawing Him to himself or bringing himself to Him. The impossibility and inconceivability of that follows from what has already been said. How by any act from his side would man ever be able to make himself master of the Holy Spirit? It is entirely the reverse: Christ sends His Spirit, who, in the first grace that befalls man in the grace of regeneration, establishes the mystical bond. After this has happened and has also penetrated into the consciousness, one can certainly say that faith reaches out reciprocally to Christ, and the activity of faith and the nurturing of the spiritual life resident in union with Christ keep pace. But faith in itself, as subjective habit or subjective act, is not able to effect unity with Christ. It is one of the manifestations of the life of the Savior in us rather than the source of this life itself. When Scripture speaks of a union with Christ by faith, then this always applies to unity in the consciousness or the consciousness of unity: “so that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith” (Eph 3:17), where, however, precedes, “so that He might grant you though the riches of His glory to be strengthened with power by His Spirit in the inner man.” The Spirit’s activity, therefore, is antecedent, and only as a result of it does Christ dwell in the heart by faith. It is the drawing power of Christ Himself that in our faith draws us to His life. In this sense, then, Scripture clearly teaches that a reception of life from Christ by faith is possible for us— indeed, is necessary (John 6:47, 51). There is not merely a life of Christ in us but also a life of ours for God in union with Christ. According to Romans 7:4, the believer knows himself to be as closely united to the Mediator as husband to wife, and according to 2 Corinthians 11:2, the church is viewed as a bride presenting herself to her bridegroom, Christ. “The Spirit and the bride say, ‘Come!’ ” (Rev 22:17).

The Nature of God Proves Free Grace

The nature of God proves all grace, special and common, must be freely given by God and not owed to the creature; it necessarily follows that election has to be true and cannot be otherwise.

The nature of God, his immutability, impassibility, simplicity, sovereignty, etc., proves unconditional election. For if God is unchangeable, then there was never a time where he did not intend to save particular persons. He always was intending to save his elect. For if he was waiting [in time] to see if someone was going to believe in him all the while being neutral at best whether he was going to save him or not (or just wishing to save them) and then he would intend to save him, infers a change in his will, and infers that God depends upon the creature causing a change in His being or actuality. God would be somewhat moved upon by the creature. But this cannot happen in God; he is not moved upon by anything; he is self-moved (divine impassibility) as well as that there is no change in God, he is immutable – God’s will does not undergo change. He is not dependent upon the will of the creature not only because God cannot undergo change but also is contradictory to the nature of God as being self-sufficient, sovereign and simple, Romans 11:34-35 –

“For who has known the mind of the LORD?

Or who has become His counselor?”

³⁵ “Or who has first given to Him

And it shall be repaid to him?”

So God being purely active (or purely actual - divine simplicity: not composed of active and passive potency as creatures are), he has always loved the church, the elect, from the counsel of his own will and hence Scripture accommodates this profound truth of a pure act, the act of God's eternal will in election, choosing to love, to the capacity of our understanding by the words choosing, election, electing, etc. (See Edwards' comments on this below) God has always loved the church in this manner, clearly pointing to his immutability, simplicity and impassibility, and sovereignty. (e.g., Ps103:17, But the steadfast love of the LORD is from everlasting to everlasting... Also Jer. 31:3, I have loved you with an everlasting love;] but others, he never knew them, Matt. 7:21-23, *And then I will declare to them, 'I never knew you; depart from Me, [the verb knew or to know is to show saving favor, the fruit of the divine love of the Father] For the love of God, the foundation of election, is an act of God's will, and hence is freely given, not founded upon the common affection which is the result of being acted upon or moved by something outside himself which is impossible with God (divine impassibility, self-sufficiency, etc.); on the contrary, God says that I will have mercy on whomever I will have mercy, Romans 9:15.*

God cannot be actualized (changed into a new state of being, new states of affection, or have a new thought or change of his will by another entity or agent outside himself since there is no passive potency in God to be actualized because he is a purely actual (divine simplicity: not composed of passive and active potency as humans are and therefore liable to change to a different state of being); he is THE cause without a cause, and hence, God's immutability, impassibility; the two are inseparable, the latter flowing from the former. God's impassibility means that God does not undergo change by anything or agent. God cannot receive anything from the creature but is always giving and sustaining; he is self-sufficient, perfect, infinite and boundless in his being. "God is not someone who is done unto. He only gives but does not receive," "He does not receive new actuality of being from creatures or from others."

[James Dolezal, God Without Passions – YouTube video]. Job 35:4-8

God is the first cause in everything not the second; God is not the great Responder as Edwards notes. In other words he is already predisposed, or of a mind to save his elect irrespective of their works (hence his eternal decree of election, his good pleasure). So the sinner's prayer is at best superfluous, and at worse, a wicked presumption. In other words, God's actuality, the state of his mind toward the creature, cannot change from neutral to determinative to save due to one's prayer. Free grace, to be free, is wholly of God's sovereign will alone, to have mercy on whom he'll have mercy, as Paul says in

Rom. 9:16, "So then it depends not on human will or exertion, but on God, who has mercy." Free grace excludes all human boasting. Eph. 2:8-10; Rom. 11:6

Edwards explains, in this instance, regarding prayer:

It is not in order that God may be informed of our wants or desires. He is omniscient, and with respect to his knowledge unchangeable. God never gains any knowledge by information. He knows what we want, a thousand times more perfectly than we do ourselves, before we ask him. For though, speaking after the manner of men, God is sometimes represented as if he were moved and persuaded by the prayers of his people; yet it is not to be thought that God is properly moved or made willing by our prayers; for it is no more possible that there should be any new inclination or will in God, than new knowledge. The mercy of God is not moved or drawn by any thing in the creature; but the spring of God's beneficence is within himself only; he is self-moved; and whatsoever mercy he bestows, the reason and ground of it is not to be sought for in the creature, but in God's own good pleasure. It is the will of God to bestow mercy in this way, viz. in answer to prayer, when he designs beforehand to bestow mercy, yea, when he has promised it; as Ezek. 36:35, 37, "I the Lord have spoken it, and will do it. Thus saith the Lord, I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them." God has been pleased to constitute prayer to be antecedent to the bestowment of mercy; and he is pleased to bestow mercy in consequence of prayer, as though he were prevailed on by prayer.--When the people of God are stirred up to prayer, it is the effect of his intention to show mercy; therefore he pours out the spirit of grace and supplication.

There may be two reasons given why God requires prayer in order to the bestowment of mercy; one especially respects God, and the other respects ourselves.

1. With respect to God, prayer is but a sensible acknowledgment of our dependence on him to his glory. As he hath made all things for his own glory, so he will be glorified and acknowledged by his creatures; and it is fit that he should require this of those who would be the subjects of his mercy. That we, when we desire to receive any mercy from him, should humbly supplicate the Divine Being for the bestowment of that mercy, is but a suitable acknowledgment of our dependence on the power and mercy of God for that which we need, and but a suitable honour paid to the great Author and Fountain of all good.

2. With respect to ourselves, God requires prayer of us in order to the bestowment of mercy, because it tends to prepare us for its reception. Fervent prayer many ways tends to prepare the heart. Hereby is excited a sense of our need, and of the value of the mercy which we seek, and at the same time earnest desires for it; whereby the mind is more prepared to prize it, to rejoice in it when bestowed, and to be thankful for it. Prayer, with suitable confession, may excite a sense of our unworthiness of the mercy we seek; and the placing of ourselves in the immediate presence of God, may make us sensible of his majesty, and in a sense fit to receive mercy of him. Our prayer to God may excite in us a suitable sense and consideration of our dependence on God for the mercy we ask, and a suitable exercise of faith in God's sufficiency, that so we may be prepared to glorify his name when the mercy is received.

About God's Delight In His Glory

God's Immutability, Self-sufficiency, Perfection, Eternality, Impassibility

Miscellaneous Observations – Heaven

Jonathan Edwards, Vol. 2, pg 626

Goodness of God - Love of God Happiness of heaven. God stands in no need of creatures, and is not profited by them; neither can his happiness be said to be added to by the creature. But yet God has a real and proper delight in the excellency and happiness of his creatures: he hath a real delight in the excellency and loveliness of the creature, in his own image in the creature, as that is a manifestation, or expression, or shining forth of his own loveliness. God has a real delight in his own loveliness, and he also has a real delight in the shining forth, or glorifying of it. As it is a fit and condecant thing that God's glory should shine forth, so God delights in its shining forth. So that God has a real delight in the spiritual loveliness of the saints; which delight is not a delight distinct from what he has in himself, but is to be resolved into the delight he has in himself; for he delights in his image in the creature, as he delights in his own being glorified; or as he delights in it, that his own glory shines forth, and so he hath real proper delight in the happiness of his creatures, which also is not distinct from the delight that he has in himself, for it is to be resolved into the delight that he has in his own goodness; for as he delights in his own goodness, so he delights in the exercise of his goodness, and therefore he delights to make the creature happy, and delights to see him made happy, as he delights in exercising goodness, or communicating happiness. This is no proper addition to the happiness of God, because it is that which he eternally and unalterably had. God hath no new delight when he beholds his own glory shining forth in his image in the creature, and when he beholds the creature made happy from the exercises of his goodness; because those and all things are from eternity equally present with God. This delight in God cannot properly be said to be received from the creature, because it consists only in a delight in giving to the creature; neither will it hence follow that God is dependent on the creature for any of his joy, because it is his own act only that this delight is dependent on, and the creature is absolutely dependent on God for that excellency and happiness that God delights in. God cannot be said to be the more happy for the creature, because he is infinitely happy in himself, and he is not dependent on the creature for any thing, nor does he receive any addition from the creature. But yet in one sense it can be truly said that God has the more delight for the loveliness and happiness of the creature, viz. as God would be less happy if he were less good, or if it were possible for him to be hindered in exercising his own goodness, or to be hindered from glorifying himself. God has no addition to his happiness, when he exercises any act of holiness towards his creatures; and yet God has a real delight in the exercises of his own holiness, and would be less happy if he were less holy, or were capable of being hindered from any act of holiness.

Comments on Classical Theism, Specifically, Simplicity
Followed by notes on Impassibility and immutability

F.J. Sheed (1930), writing around the same time as Berkhof, offers a similarly sobering assessment: "A study of what is happening to theology in its higher reaches would almost certainly take as its starting point the attribute of simplicity, and show that every current heresy begins by being wrong on that."

These doctrines of divine simplicity, immutability and impassibility is foundational to seeing the rest of scripture in its proper light. It will guard your heart from many heresies and give you a right view of God.

Notes on God's Simplicity

These doctrines of divine simplicity, immutability and impassibility is foundational to seeing the rest of scripture in its proper light. It will guard your heart from many heresies and give you a right view of God.

In light of this, A note regarding the comments Dr. Dolezal and others make, that the attributes of God are distinguished ad extra to the glorification of God, yet ad intra, they are identical with one another, that his justice is his love, is his mercy, is his patience, his omniscience, etc., and that his attributes are identical with his essence. The former (ad intra view) is in question/speculation; the latter is true. In disagreement, Dr. White argues God's attributes are distinguishable ad intra (as does Charles Hodge and G. Vos, noted below in the article). I think the articles below do a good job in explaining the difficulties in understanding the part of the doctrine of simplicity in classical theism with which Dr. White, so far, contends.

Dr. White says that the attributes of God are distinguishable in God (ad intra) while at the same time distinguishable in their due exercise (ad extra). And I think the reason is, is that Dr. White does not consider them metaphysical parts which would defy the doctrine simplicity if they were. They are just names that describe God, who he is and what he is like, not describing constituent parts in God. I think that's what he means. His attributes are not in God as parts of God; they are God, e.g., God is love, light, wisdom, sanctification, life, etc., describing God who he is and what he is like – not in God as pieces that make up God. In a warning, Dr. White said (paraphrasing), Beware of figments of imagination coming from your own brain. Which, by the way, Dr. White said that this was the 'MO' of the medieval period: if you can imagine it in your mind then it exists in reality. Nobody in the bible functioned on that basis. (Dr. James White, video, Jan 2022) This would include the conclusions that Aquinas and other scholastics in his day come up with in some areas of theology. Also, keep in mind that it was Aquinas who was chief supporter of the effort to counter the Reformation in the Council of Trent! So this is White's position so far, as of Jan 2022. I have read commentaries by John Owen and other that mock the 'scholastics', that they go too far in their speculations or have presuppositions that are wrong. You have to be really careful in learning Christian doctrine, in formulating your views of what scripture says, by not going beyond what is written. John Calvin made specific mention of this. That being said, It sounds to me like Dr. White is correct.

So, below are two articles that I think will clarify what appears to me (so far) to be a misunderstanding of Dolezal et al about a particular aspect of this doctrine of simplicity by Dr. White. And then I'll add my two bits to it, as I see it so far.

Two articles:

No Biblical Support for Divine Simplicity?

Another Objection to Simplicity

In the [previous post \[copied below, following this article\]](#) we considered one common objection to divine simplicity: it makes God's attributes indistinguishable. This view, most popularly held by Charles Hodge, fails to make a proper distinction between God ad intra and God ad extra. In the end, this view makes "an objective difference in God," to quote Bavinck.[\[1\]](#)

In this post, I want to consider another prominent objection to simplicity: it isn't taught in Scripture.

Is It Biblical?

James White recently indicated that the historical formulation of divine simplicity (specifically in Turretin) is mere philosophical abstraction, and that defenders of simplicity have scuttled the Reformation principle of sola Scriptura.[\[2\]](#) I will refrain from responding to Dr. White directly until he releases his official response to simplicity, but he raises a very common question: is simplicity biblical?

Before answering this question, I want to emphasize the fact that this is a good question. It would be a mistake to think that only one side of this debate cares about the authority of Scripture, while the other is beholden to Aristotelian naval-gazing. However, defenders of simplicity have been wrongfully accused of philosophical abstraction for a very long time.

Over 300 years ago, Petrus van Mastricht encountered this exact same objection. He specifically responds to the objection that “not even one iota about simplicity exists in the Scriptures.” [3] In response, he summarizes six “orthodox arguments” from Scripture to defend simplicity. [4] For a modern example, Beeke and Smalley also anticipate and answer the claim that “divine simplicity is a ‘metaphysical abstraction,’ not a biblical teaching.” [5]

Because this objection is so common, let’s take a quick look at two biblical arguments for simplicity.

Good and Necessary Consequence

One strong biblical argument for simplicity is that other biblical doctrines demand it. James Dolezal notes, “There is no single biblical proof text for this doctrine. It follows, rather, by way of good and necessary consequence from a number of other doctrines that are clearly taught in Scripture.” [6] As others have pointed out, we arrive at the orthodox formulation of the Trinity in the exact same way.

D. Scott Meadows writes,

“The stock philosophical language used in trinitarian theology came about ‘by good and necessary consequence;’ it was ‘deduced from Scripture’ (WCF 1.6). The 1689 LBCF statement on this is similar, recognizing that doctrinal truth ‘is either expressly set down or necessarily contained in the Holy Scripture’ (1.6). Adherents to [simplicity] believe the same thing about it as the doctrine of the Trinity. Both are truly and rationally deduced from Scripture and necessarily contained in it.” [7]

As the argument goes, certain doctrines are explicitly taught in Scripture and those doctrines require divine simplicity to be coherent. Therefore, if 1) a certain doctrine can be proven exegetically and 2) that doctrine necessitates simplicity, then 3) simplicity is just as “biblical” as the original doctrine. So Sam Waldron concludes from 1.6 of the 1689 LBCF, “What may be by sound logic deduced from Scripture, that is to say, what is necessarily contained in it, has the authority of Scripture itself.” [8]

Meadows explains further,

“An illustration may be helpful. Consider a numerical series: 1, 3, __, __, 9, 11, 13, __, 17. It is a fact to state that the numbers 5, 7, and 15 are just as legitimate a part of this series as 1, 3, 9, 11, 13, and 17, though the former numbers are not explicitly stated and the latter are. Whatever doctrine is justifiably deduced from and truly contained in Holy Scripture is just as true and authoritative as that which it states explicitly.” [9]

This extremely common argument is illustrated by the chart below. The top row indicates which doctrines necessitate simplicity, or are necessitated by simplicity, according to the theologians on the left column.

	Independence	Perfection	Pure Act	Act of Creation	Spirituality	Unity	Infinity	Immutability	Eternality	Power	Omniscience	Omnipresence	Righteousness

¹⁰ Duby speaks of “singularity,” which may be slightly different than “unity.”

As we see, this is not a new or obscure argument. Beeke and Jones comment on Stephen Charnock’s method, “Charnock affirmed that divine simplicity is absolutely essential for understanding the other divine attributes; indeed, all other divine attributes depend upon this concept. In discussing the divine attributes (e.g., His immutability and eternity), the concept of divine simplicity is axiomatic for Charnock’s understanding of the doctrine of God, as it was for Reformed scholastic divines.” [\[10\]](#)

Most of the criticisms of simplicity that I’ve seen today are attacks on the doctrine in a vacuum without concern for how it is necessarily interconnected with other doctrines. When modern theologians do this, they unwittingly (and often with good intentions!) undermine God’s immutability, aseity, perfection, etc. Yet, each of these plain biblical doctrines require divine simplicity.

Thus Dolezal concludes, “...though the cognitive realization of divine simplicity requires that we contemplate the implications of other doctrines, it is not for that reason any less biblical.” [\[11\]](#)

Two Forms of Predication

The second biblical argument I want to summarize in this post is a bit more direct than the previous.

Bavinck summarizes this second common argument: “Scripture, to denote the fullness of the life of God, uses not only adjectives but also substantives: it tells us not only that God is truthful, righteous, living, illuminating, loving, and wise, but also that he is truth, righteousness, life, light, love, and wisdom (Jer. 10:10; 23:6; John 1:4–5, 9; 14:6; 1 Cor. 1:30; 1 John 1:5; 4:8). Hence, on account of its absolute perfection, every attribute of God is identical with his essence.” [12]

Sometimes Scripture speaks of God as loving (John 3:16), other times it speaks of God as love (1 John 4:8). So Wittman notes, “Aquinas recognizes two kinds of predication throughout Scripture, one concrete (‘living’) and the other abstract (‘life’), each equally applicable to God’s being as much as his act...The question is how to account for both forms of predication.” [13]

The doctrine of simplicity, then, arises from carefully trying to account for both types of predication.

When it comes to the abstract or substantive predication, they are most accurately interpreted as statements about God’s very nature. Commentators rightly conclude that 1 John 1:5 uses “light” as “the description of the being of God” [14] and “a penetrating description of the being and nature of God.” [15] Likewise, in 1 John 4:8, “John equates God with a qualitative noun “love”...By his very nature, God is love.” [16] Few commentators disagree.

Beeke and Smalley note that this conclusion makes sense in context. They observe, “When John writes that ‘God is light’ and ‘God is love,’ his contextual concern was to demonstrate that God is so closely identified with holiness and love that it is impossible to know him and fellowship with him while walking in the ‘darkness’ of unrepentant sin, in particular, in hatred of one’s brother (1 John 1:5–10; 4:7–11, 16).” [17]

John Frame understands the proper conclusion of these substantive texts (even though he wavers on simplicity elsewhere). On John 4:24, 1 John 1:5, and 1 John 4:8 he writes, “These expressions state what God really and truly is. In other words, they describe his essence, not merely what he happens to be on some occasions. But note that there are three of these attributions, not just one. So God’s essence can be described in three different ways. I am inclined to say that these expressions describe the whole divine essence from three different perspectives.” [18] [I think that is key. Therefore, as I say in my opinion later, these attributes are not ‘parts’ per se, they don’t make up God, they just describe God as he is, and hence do not qualify to be categorized as parts and hence to be said that they are identical with one another is a mis-construal of things, a dead end; not even a mute point at best. Frame and Bavinck makes this point in the next paragraph!]

Frame comes to the conclusion that each substantive claim about God refers to His entire essence from different perspectives. This is the historic position of divine simplicity. As Bavinck says, “God is so abundantly rich that we can gain some idea of his richness only by the availability of many names.

Every name refers to the same full divine being, but each time from a particular angle, the angle from which it reveals itself to us in his works.” [19] Spirit, light, and love are not different “things” in God. They are three different ways of referring to the same “thing,” which is God Himself.

So Frame observes, “The passages above do not show that all of God’s attributes are necessary to his being and perspectives on that being, but they do provide a pattern and a way of thinking about divine attributes to which it is hard to find plausible exceptions.” [20] For this reason, William Perkins writes, “It is manifest that to have life and to be life, to be in light and to be light in God are all one...Therefore, whatever is in God is His essence; and all that He is, He is by essence.” [21]

Conclusion

The claim that divine simplicity as taught by Francis Turretin, John Owen, and James Dolezal lacks biblical support is extremely misguided. These men, along with the others listed above, arrive at divine simplicity as a necessary consequence of Scripture. This method of forming doctrine in no way contradicts the principle of sola Scriptura. Instead, it recognizes that the authority of Scripture extends to the “necessary consequence” of Scripture.

Robert Lethem comments on the phrase “good and necessary consequence” from WCF 1.6,

“This is a profoundly important statement. It points to the need for careful thought in reading, preaching, and thinking about the Bible. It mandates theology. In order to begin to grasp the whole counsel of God, we need to be able to make legitimate deductions from the Bible. Orderly thought is the sine qua non of the Christian faith. Attempts to disparage the mind, and dismiss the intellectual reflection of Scripture as ‘cerebral’ undermine the teaching of Scripture and begin to unravel the message of salvation. In short, this chapter mandates systematic theology. That, of course, is how the church has defended itself against heresy. In the early church, it was found that simply to repeat the words of the Bible left the church defenseless. The gospel itself was threatened by unthinking repetition of biblical words and phrases.” [22]

This principle in chapter one of the confession is the foundation for the Trinity and simplicity in chapter two. If you reject this principle, you cannot affirm either doctrine. Consistency demands that we use the same method to arrive at both simplicity and the Trinity.

A Friendly Response to James White on Divine Simplicity

James White agreeing with William Lane Craig on anything is almost as shocking and confusing as the “Martha” scene in Batman v. Superman. Or, depending on what you think of both men, it may be more like the reunion of Mermaid Man and Barnacle Boy.

But regardless of their previous disagreements and our opinions of them, they have joined forces to critique divine simplicity in the Reformed Scholastic tradition. While the two doctors have multiple objections to simplicity, I want to focus on just one common objection: divine simplicity removes all distinction between God’s attributes.

Dr. White believes that simplicity described in Classical Theism makes God’s attributes all mean the same thing.^[1] He says,

“As Aquinas evidently takes this...you cannot discuss the attributes of God in a way that would make them different to one another because that then implies parts which denies the simplicity of God. So, God’s omniscience is His omnipresence and His imminence...and basically Craig was saying, ‘That doesn’t make any sense.’ And I was sitting there going, ‘Yeah. He’s right. It doesn’t make any sense.’ And yet that’s the Classical Theism stuff that’s being presented now.”^[2]

But does anyone actually teach that God’s attributes are all identical? Or, to use White’s examples, does anyone actually teach that God’s omniscience is His omnipotence?

They certainly do...in a way.

An Understandable Misunderstanding

It is not difficult to find theologians affirming exactly what White says.

- James Dolezal, in his watershed book on Classical Theism, says, “It further follows from God’s non-compositeness that in Him all His attributes are really identical with each other.”^[3]
- John Owen seems to say the same thing: “The attributes of God, which alone seem to be distinct in the essence of God, are all of them essentially the same with one another, and every one the same with the essence of God.”^[4]
- Francis Turretin says, “The attributes of God cannot really differ from his essence or from one another (as one thing from another) because God is most simple and perfect.”^[5]
- Petrus van Mastricht denies any objective difference between the attributes: “[The attributes] do not differ really, as one thing from another, but by our reason or thought.”^[6]
- Joel Beeke and Paul Smalley write, “God’s simplicity means that he has no parts, and his attributes and essence are all one in him.”^[7]

On face value, it seems like White has spotted a serious issue with divine simplicity. Indeed, he is not the first to make this observation. Charles Hodge made the same point.

In a statement similar to White's, Hodge writes, "If in God eternity is identical with knowledge, knowledge with power, power with ubiquity, and ubiquity with holiness, we are using words without meaning when we attribute any perfection to God." [8] Again he writes, "We must not confound the attributes, making them all mean the same thing, which is the equivalent to denying them all together." [9]

Hodge apparently had the same concern as White. And, based on the quotes listed above, it may seem like their concern is well grounded.

But is it really possible that Dolezal, Owen, Turretin, Mastricht, Beeke, Smalley, and countless others never considered this objection? Is it really true that they all forbid any distinction between the attributes? Do they teach, as White says, "You cannot discuss the attributes of God in a way that would make them different to one another?"

They certainly do not.

A Better Explanation

Dr. White's mischaracterization of simplicity is actually very common. For this reason, many defenders of simplicity have anticipated and answered it directly.

Richard Muller writes, "The various modern readings of simplicity as indicating an utter absence of distinction in the Godhead misinterpret the traditional doctrine." [10] In an article on Aquinas' doctrine of simplicity, Tyler Wittman notes, "With its purely negative function, simplicity rules out composition and divisibility in God but not distinction." [11] Explaining Turretin's ideas of "comparative" and "absolute" simplicity, Steven Doby writes, "Absolute simplicity excludes composition of all kinds, though, crucially, not distinctions of all kinds." [12]

So, these advocates of simplicity believe that the doctrine has never ruled out all distinction, as White claims. For lack of space (and skill on my part), we can't go through all the work of Dolezal, Owen, Turretin, Mastricht, Beeke, and Smalley on this subject. But a quick look at Francis Turretin will show a better explanation of simplicity than that offered by White.

In-n-Out Attributes

As noted above, Turretin does believe God's attributes are identical in some sense. He says, "Attributes may be mutually predicated of each other in an identical sense inasmuch as they may be considered as having unity and identity with each other." [13]

However, he is still able to distinguish between them because he differentiates between God's attributes ad intra and ad extra. Theologians speak of God ad intra when they refer to things strictly within God's being. They speak of God ad extra when they refer to God's action in creation.

So, Turretin is able to say the attributes are indivisibly identical ad intra yet distinguishable ad extra. He writes, "The properties are many on the part of the object and end (or of the operations and effects), but not on the part of the subject or principle, which is one and perfectly simple." [14]

In regards to the subject (ad intra), the attributes are identical. In regards to the object (ad extra), they are distinct. For Turretin, even justice and mercy are not separate ad intra. Again he writes,

"The divine attributes may be regarded either absolutely and subjectively in themselves (and on the part of God) or relatively as to their effects towards creatures (or on the part of the object). I confess that in the latter way punitive justice and sparing mercy are opposed, but not in the former (concerning which we treat)." [15]

à Brakel makes a similar point:

"We understand these attributes to be one from God's perspective, however, such that they can neither be divorced from the divine Being nor essentially and properly from each other as they exist in God [ad intra], but are the simple, absolute Being of God Himself. We, however, relate these attributes as distinct entities by themselves. Justice and mercy are one in God [ad intra], but we differentiate between them in reference to the objects towards which they are manifested, and the effects of these manifestations [ad extra]." [16]

You can see how careful à Brakel is to distinguish between "in God" and not "in God." He and Turretin carefully teach that the multiple attributes have their foundation in the divine essence but do not reflect actual distinctions within the essence. Duby writes, "Turretin clarifies that the foundation of the distinction between...one attribute and another is not intrinsic to the acting of the subject (God), for that would compromise his simplicity." Instead of finding their distinctions between one another in their subject, the attributes find their distinctions in their objects and effects. Duby continues,

"While there is no distinction between 'thing' and 'thing' in God himself, the distinction of the attributes does have a 'foundation in the thing' (fundamentum in re) or an extramental distinction because of the diversity of objects and effects to which our conceptions of the attributes respond." [17]

The attributes are not different things. But the one thing, which is God's essence, is known by its effects in creation. Furthermore, those effects do legitimately teach something about the one thing, even if what they teach is incomplete.

Beeke and Smalley conclude, "If asked how the attributes are distinct when God is simply one, we reply with Turretin that they are distinct intellectual concepts by which God reveals himself to man on a human level and they are properly said to be distinct because they represent God's activity 'as to their various objects and effects.'" [18]

Conclusion

Do Classical Theists say the attributes are indistinguishable? Yes, ad intra.

Do they say the attributes cannot be distinguished at all? No, they say the attributes can be distinguished ad extra.

Muller summarizes Alain of Lille saying,

"Everything in God is God, allowing no essential distinction between the various divine attributes and affirming the utter simplicity of the divine being. The distinction between the attributes, therefore, is not in God himself but in the effects of God's work *ad extra. Nonetheless, given that these attributes are evident to us by way of causality, they are not merely names of terms applied by us to God but are in fact proper designations of the divine substance." [19]

Beeke and Smalley suggest a prism to illustrate this position. They write, "For us to understand and appreciate God's attributes, we must view the full spectrum of colors through the prism of God's Word, but in God, the attributes shine a single, infinitely brilliant light." [20] In this illustration, the spectrum of colors coming out of the prism are like God's attributes ad extra because they reveal something about the singular light going into the prism, which is like God's simple essence *ad intra.

We comprehend God's attributes as distinct not because there is actual complexity within God, but because we cannot comprehend the fullness of God's being. We must comprehend Him in parts because we can't comprehend Him any other way. As Turretin says, we comprehend Him "imperfectly and inadequately on account of the weakness of the human intellect and the eminence and perfection of the divine nature." [21] And again, "For what we cannot take in by one adequate conception as being finite, we divide into various inadequate conceptions so as to obtain some knowledge of him." [22]

The Puritan William Ames agrees, "Because we are not able to take in this essence in one act of comprehension, it is explained as manifold, that is to say, as if consisting of many attributes." [23] Cornelius Van Til also states, "God himself has in his revelation instructed us to make distinctions with respect to his being. These distinctions help us to understand something of the wealth and richness of his being." [24]

Turretin, Ames, and Van Til all affirm here that we distinguish between God's attributes because of 1) our finitude and 2) the "the richness of his being." Therefore, the distinctions made between the attributes are not based on any real distinction in God's essence, as Hodge (and White) believes. Instead, we distinguish between them in order to comprehend different aspects of God's indivisible being.

I want to give Dr. White the benefit of the doubt and assume that he has studied and spoken on this topic elsewhere, but he unfortunately does not present the position accurately in this video. The “Classical Theism stuff” being presented today does not deny all distinction between the attributes. It denies distinction ad intra but demands it ad extra.

Although this whole debate may seem like doctrinal minutia, what is more fundamental to our faith than the very being of God? All believers should strive to worship and love God as He is. As Van Til rightly understood, we don’t study theology with merely pragmatic motivations. Instead, “The question of truth and of duty is primary.” [25] This is why we care about the details. We have a duty to love and worship God as He has revealed Himself to us.

To be omniscience is obviously not be good. To be omnipotent is not the same as to be eternal. So, there can be a plurality or multiplicity of properties that God would have. And therefore, there would be composition in that sense. I find that sense unobjectionable. But the Thomist can’t even allow that.” <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=RIUv-pg0KmA>

My Two Bits:

If constituent parts or metaphysical parts are things that are less than God and more fundamental than God, then they cannot be in God; God is not made up of them; God is not a composite being in this sense [true, and Dolezal et al, agrees here]; but are his attributes to be considered metaphysical parts? Because they are distinct in their exercise or display (ad extra), does that make them parts, being more fundamental than God when we say that God has these attributes? I don't think so. They just describe God's essence as Frame and Bavinck said above in the first article. So what Dr. Dolezal is saying is that those attributes that are displayed ad extra are distinct, displaying his works, his glory, etc., [true], but ad intra they are not distinct, but are all equal to each other – his assumption being, that they are now considered parts (metaphysical), that because his attributes are identical to his essence [true], then these parts must be identical with each other. But, as I mentioned in a my comment above, that if these attributes are not to be considered parts at all, then Dolezal’s conclusion about identity of the parts is a mute point at best. And so this identity issue should never come to the fore. If that is not the case then his attributes must be finite and more fundamental than God, i.e., parts; but how can that be if God is love, light, wisdom, etc.?? For there is not love in God or wisdom in God, etc., but God is those very things. It is just that these attributes describe who God is according to our way and capacity of understanding Him; Again, they are not properly parts of him. We are composite beings and we think compositely; we cannot have a simple thought of a simple God just like we can’t have an infinite thought of an infinite God. And if he is those things then those things can’t be called a parts; I think Dr. Dolezal would agree with this reasoning. God’s attributes when considered ad intra are not less than God or more fundamental than Him, which is the key point of contention (or in misunderstanding): they are Him! Hence, properly speaking, they are not parts, yet they are still distinguishable because they are only describing God, his ‘isness’, who he is, not what he is composed of. They describe God in different ways of who he is, as Frame and Bavinck mentioned, hence, in that sense, they are distinct, and yet are not parts metaphysical or otherwise that make up God.

Here’s another way to say this:

Regarding the doctrine of simplicity, specifically the attributes of God ad intra, whether they are parts [metaphysical] or not - if they are parts then they would be finite in their being and would be more fundamental than God such that when added up or combined, make God who he is; but finite added to other finites can’t make God who is infinite in his being. Also, all that is in God is God, not finite parts, since infinite parts to make an infinite God is impossible and doesn’t make sense. Furthermore, since this would require his attributes (supposed parts) to be less than God, etc., doesn’t reconcile with the fact that God is love; there is not a part of God that is love; God is love, 1John 4:16. This is a profound and deep mystery. And I would think that the other attributes can be treated the same, e.g., God is mercy, light, truth, omniscient, omnipresent, sanctification, etc. Therefore, God’s attributes cannot qualify as a part in this scheme of Simplicity where, ad intra, all God’s attributes are not distinct, but being that they are Him, they are only identical with his essence ad intra but distinct ad extra.

Summary

So when Dr. Dolezal, et al, considers God’s attributes ad intra, they are assuming that God’s attributes are parts; that, all added up, make God who he is, to be God. But I say, properly speaking, they are not parts; they are not things that make up God; they are what God is, what he is like, e.g., God is love, etc., in which case his attributes are identical with his essence - that’s true; but they are not identical with each other, though they work inextricably and harmoniously with one another. So, because they pursue this line of thinking that the attributes are parts when considered ad intra, and since simplicity demands that God has not parts, the logical consequence of this error in thinking is that they must be identical with one another ad intra. And that’s where the problem lies.

Note on Simplicity

The doctrine of divine simplicity is a safeguard against attempts to make God divisible. He is one in his essence, as well as one numerically. Neither the diversity of divine attributes nor his Trinity contradicts simplicity,... William Edgar, editor, An Introduction to Systematic Theology by Cornelius Van Til, note 7 pg 323

Notes on God's Impassibility by G Clark

Now you have to ask the question, why are we not taught these doctrines nowadays? Fallen human nature tends to drift away from Truth, God, etc. And that is what happened starting about the 1600s-1800s (The Enlightenment period) as people glommed onto the scientific method to answer life's deep spiritual concerns trying to solve a "problem" rather than trying to clarify the "mystery." God cannot be put into an intellectual box where he can be solved like a mathematical problem, which inevitably leads to error – wrong ideas of God (as Job had!) So this subject drifted away into obscurity.

In my writing below, I add at the end, John Owen's commentary on John 3:16. I did this for this reason: when I read his comments for the first time several years ago, he mentions that God does not have common affections as man does, but he never formally went into nor mentioned the term impassibility or simplicity etc. But after I read Weinandy's book Does God Suffer as well as James Dolezal's and Samuel Renihan's books on impassibility, I read Owen's comments again and saw much more clearly what Owen was talking about. You'll see things more clearly in other's writings and sermons after you get this knowledge, you'll understand far more clearly the depth of what they are saying, and you'll be able to discern false teaching more so! This is why Hosea said that my people are destroyed for lack of knowledge. See also Prov. 1

"How long, O simple ones, will you love being simple?

How long will scoffers delight in their scoffing and fools hate knowledge?

²³ If you turn at my reproof,^[a] behold, I will pour out my spirit to you;

I will make my words known to you.

²⁴ Because I have called and you refused to listen, have stretched out my hand and no one has heeded,

²⁵ because you have ignored all my counsel and would have none of my reproof,

²⁶ I also will laugh at your calamity;

I will mock when terror strikes you,

²⁷ when terror strikes you like a storm and your calamity comes like a whirlwind, when distress and anguish come upon you.

²⁸ Then they will call upon me, but I will not answer;
they will seek me diligently but will not find me.
²⁹ Because they hated knowledge and did not choose the fear of the LORD, ³⁰ would have none of my counsel and despised all my reproof, ³¹ therefore they shall eat the fruit of their way, and have their fill of their own devices.
³² For the simple are killed by their turning away, and the complacency of fools destroys them;
³³ but whoever listens to me will dwell secure and will be at ease, without dread of disaster.”

Here we go:

First, the rubric we should use in examining this doctrine of classical theism in understanding God, who he is and what he is like, should be directed toward clarifying a mystery as opposed to trying to solve a problem. The reason for this is that God is ineffable, beyond our comprehension, transcending our understanding. So at best we can only clarify the mystery, never arriving at a final and complete answer. God is an infinite fountain of knowledge and we can never come to the end of it. Thinking that we can solve this ‘problem,’ tends to errors in understanding God’s nature and in the end, reduces our esteem, praise, reverential awe, amazement, wonder and adoration of Him.

That being said, many things are going to be weighed in your mind all of which help paint the picture of this mystery, clarifying it as you add colors and definition to the canvas, never seeing him as he is, but only through the eyes of faith; and that is described as looking through a glass darkly.

Many people have wrong ideas of God; they tend to think that God is a perfect version of them without the human limitations, a greater being in the class of beings, not someone who is an infinite distance from us, completely transcendent, yet immanent, closely relating to his creatures. This alone is a mystery. [See Ps 50:21 where God tells the wicked, you thought that I was altogether like you.]

People think God has affections just like us; that he is moved by things outside himself causing him to take on different states of being or actuality such as being angry or more angry, or love like humans love; we see someone that’s attractive, etc., so it affects us so that the passive potential (or potency) in us to love is actualized and we thus love the object by which we are affected. What I have just described is not in God. No common affections can be assigned to him; I’ll explain.

God is one divine essence. Even though the scripture assigns him many attributes such as love, mercy, patience, kindness, etc., these are anthropomorphisms – they merely describe what God is like according to our way of conceiving things due to our limited creaturely capacity. God in speaking to us in his word, lowers himself to our level of imbecility as Owen puts it. These attributes are not properly in God, for God is not composed of parts, metaphysical or physical; he is one simple pure essence, not a composite being as all created things are. All that is in God is God. If God were composed of parts, then he would be dependent on those parts, finite parts that cannot be in God, in order to make him what he is, to be God, an infinitely boundless being. Yet finitude cannot add up to an infinitude which God is. Also, God is not dependent on things or parts that are not God in order for him to be God! And if God were composed of these parts, who put them together?? God becomes a created being dependent upon someone else.

Now we get to the subject of divine impassibility; that there are no passions in God as we humans have. God is not aroused to new states of actuality by things or person outside himself. For God to be aroused like us, he would have to have parts, i.e., passive potency or potential that could be actualized, causing God to become something that before he was not (which would argue against his divine perfection, and immutability) He would, for example, have to have a potential in him to be angry or to love, that upon seeing or experiencing something outside himself would affect those ‘potentials’ causing him to be angry or to love, just like what happens in us. But here is the key: God does not have those ‘potentials’ in him or parts as noted in the London confession to be actualized. He is one pure essence and hence he is pure act. see Owen’s definition at [code306a, see purely active: ‘God is never idle’ – for comments by Hermon Bavinck and also code25, code305a] So, for example then, how does he love? This is where you have to put your thinking cap on and chew on this for a while. If he has no parts, then this love has to be a sovereign act of his own will and not an act of love caused or influenced by outside stimuli. God does not undergo anything. And thus the scripture says, God is love, John 4:16

And now you can see what Paul was saying about God choosing those for eternal life; it was not the common affections like in us, that something in the creature attracted God or caused him to love and hence show favor by choosing him for eternal life, but was this described in Romans 9:15, ¹⁵ For He says to Moses, “I will have mercy on whomever I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whomever I will have compassion.” God is pure act. He is not a composite being like us who are composed of actuality and potency, that is, we have in us parts that can be actualized as we are affected by things outside ourselves, after which, because we are thus affected, our state of being changes, say from sad to happy. But think about this: God is immutable; he does not change; he does not change from being sad to happy, etc. How can he, if he is pure act and not composed of these parts, passive potency or potential? This is one reason why people unwittingly believe in the Sinner’s Prayer or any other man made sacrament (due to a misunderstanding of God’s impassible nature; they think God is like them), as a means to convince God or cause God to save them as though man had something in him to recommend himself to God, and thus cause God to be moved or acted upon, actualizing his love (as though God were passible). But the opposite is the case as seen in 1John 4:19, We love because he first loved us. We don’t produce anything in God; God is not in the state of becoming constantly responding to the creature; he just is; pure act.

Notes John Owen’s comments from his book, The Death of Death in the Death of Christ pg 94 and pg 123:

“This would make the cause of sending his Son to die to be a common love, or rather wishing that he might do good¹ or show mercy to all, and not an entire act of his will or purpose, of knowing, redeeming, and saving his elect;” pg. 94

¹In which case, God’s love would be a passible love in which there would be something in God, a potency to do good or show mercy, that needed to be actualized by the creature via for example the sinner’s prayer. In this way there would be a change of state of being in God from neutrality to desiring to show mercy in responding to the creature. But this violates God’s immutability, his simplicity (he is pure act, not potency & actuality) and he is impassible. So God’s nature rules out the wicked presumptuous nature of the sinner’s prayer. See Owen’s comments below on page 7.

“For a close of all; that which in the cause we affirm may be summed up in this: Christ did not die for any upon condition², if they do believe; but he died for all God’s elect, that they should believe, and believing have eternal life.” Also, and this is a good point by Owen, “Faith itself is among the principal effects and fruits of the death of Christ; as shall be declared. It is nowhere said in Scripture, nor can it reasonably be affirmed, that if we believe, Christ died for us, as though our believing should make that to be which otherwise was not, - the act create the object; but Christ died for us that we might believe. Salvation, indeed, is bestowed conditionally; but faith, which is the condition, is absolutely procured.” Pg 123

²This ‘conditional’ rubric infers that God is passible, that man’s will is determinative in this affair, that God can undergo a change in his state of being by causes outside himself. This view is strongly maintained by Arminian/Pelagians which are most people’s view, man’s attempt at maintaining his supposed autonomy and his warped view of the liberty of his will.

We cannot produce a change of being or state of being in God because God is simple; he is not a composite being of actuality and potency, potency being the potential that needs to be actualized by something outside himself as in the case with humans. We humans, composite beings of actuality and potency, are affected by things, hence affections – we can be moved upon, and experience changes in us; but God is immutable and impassible, without affections (passions) and simple. He does love but not in the passible sense; he is love. In us we have potency mixed with actuality; potencies are the things that are actualized by causes outside ourselves after which we change into a different state of being. Now when we think of God, we tend to impose our composite way of thinking onto the being of God, thus thinking that God is like us, having passions (potency) or potentials to be actualized into a new state of being. But God is already love, mercy, justice, etc., without any arousals from causes from outside himself. He is pure act, simple, non-composite; nothing in him (i.e., potency) to be actualized. His caring, loving, etc., is not a passible caring, loving, or mercying, etc.; he is those things, hence his name: I AM WHO I AM.

Taking this a step further in application, if God were like us, then his saving grace towards us would not be freely given, but the result of us causing in him a potency, i.e., a common affection to be actualized. Not only is this contrary to divine simplicity, but also to his free sovereign grace; it would not be free, an act solely from his own council of his will, from pure act. His saving grace would owed, Romans 11:6, ⁵*So too at the present time there is a remnant, chosen by grace.* ⁶*But if it is by grace, it is no longer on the basis of works; otherwise grace would no longer be grace.* It would be a debt. But God is not indebted to anyone, Rom. 11:34-5, ³⁴“For who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been his counselor?” ³⁵“Or who has given a gift to him that he might be repaid?” Thus we cannot produce any change in a state of being in God to cause him to show favor to us because there is no potency in him that can be actualized; he is already pure act, simple in being, not a composite being of actuality and potency; only created things or human beings are so.

It is not that God doesn't care; you cannot make God care more! And, how can you add to the unboundedness of his love and care and mercy? You can't. Therefore, we cannot arouse something in him (i.e., a potency) to save us by what we do or say. So now you know what 'free' means in the theological sense. God's love, his grace, etc., is freely given of his own will; not caused or coerced or bribed.

God does not need to be aroused by you to cause him to love you in his divine manner, a love that is impassible and boundless; in other words he cannot love you more or care for you more than he does already. If he did he would be changeable or mutable and not perfect in his being; and not only that, his love, for instance, would be finite and dependent upon you! Well if that were the case, since you are a sinner and have nothing in you that warrants God's favor, and if he were passible, he would never have saved you but would have had no mercy on you and would have judged you and cast you into hell. You don't want a passible God! But because he is pure act, without these potencies in him, his eternal (and impassible) love is not based upon the creature but on his own immutable eternal act of his will. Weinandy explains further:

Actually, since God does not suffer, his love becomes absolutely free in its expression and supremely pure in its purpose. [free, meaning that his love is not aroused or caused by anything outside himself; it is from the council of his own will, i.e., an act of his will as Owen notes. That's why grace is freely given as opposed to a dept. Man deserves judgment, not grace! So it must be freely given, hence a testimony to God's impassibility, etc.] If God did suffer, it would mean that God would need not only to alleviate the suffering of others, but also his own suffering, and thus there would be an inbuilt self-interest in God's love and consolation. However, since God does not suffer, his card for those who do suffer is freely given and not evoked by some need on his part.²⁷ His love is freely expressed entirely for the sake of those he loves. Weinandy, pg 160

It is impossible for the Trinity to be more loving, for the persons of the Trinity self-actualizing potential to become more loving. Weinandy, p 161

M. Dodds: Only an entirely perfect being, subject to no defect and lacking in nothing [a being without parts, i.e., without potencies that can be actualized as they can be in humans], is able to love with a fully gratuitous love.'

See footnote #29, near the bottom of this discourse, for an important application of this doctrine!

If God is pure act without these potencies in him, then he loves, cares solely from his own will or council, i.e., a fully gratuitous love. This is incredible! This is why grace is freely given and why we are passive in our conversion; conversion happens to us; we do not work to attain it or cause God to give it to us. See Eph. 2:8-9, faith is a gift, not of ourselves!!! This is the mystery that we can understand but cannot comprehend, for God to be love fully in act is beyond human comprehension – Weinandy p161.

Now you can see more clearly the meaning of Romans 9:10-

¹⁰ And not only this, but when Rebecca also had conceived by one man, even by our father Isaac ¹¹ (for the children not yet being born, nor having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works but of Him who calls), ¹² it was said to her, "The older shall serve the younger." ¹³ As it is written, "Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated."

And what Eph. 1:11

-that is, not by the council of our will, but by his will only; why? If he was dependent upon our will, it would infer that God is dependent upon the creature and that God responds to the creature via his actualizing of supposed 'passive potency' (parts). But he doesn't have passive potencies! He is pure act, one divine essence, no parts that can be actualized are in him. In other words people think that it is the creature that moves God to respond (via for example, the sinner's prayer); that God undergoes a change in state of being by the creature thus causing God to act. But this is impossible since God is simple (divine simplicity – one divine essence), immutable (he cannot change) and impassible (God is not affected by anything outside himself); he is pure act. All these three things are interwoven in a divine fabric, so to speak, that if you take away one thread the whole fabric is destroyed. And as Jonathan Edwards said, the fact that our all comes from him:

The notion of God creating the world, in order to receive any thing properly from the creature, is not only contrary to the nature of God, but inconsistent with the notion of creation; which implies a being receiving its existence, and all that belongs to it, out of nothing. And this implies the most perfect, absolute, and universal derivation and dependence. Now, if the creature receives its ALL from God, entirely and perfectly, how is it possible that it should have anything to add to God, to make him in any respect more than he was before, and so the Creator become dependent on the creature?¹

Bavinck states:

He receives nothing, but only gives. All things need him; he needs nothing or nobody. He always aims at himself because he cannot rest in anything other than himself. Inasmuch as he himself is the absolutely good and perfect one, he may not love anything else except with a view to himself. He may not and cannot be content with less than absolute perfection.

When he loves others, he loves himself in them: his own virtues, works, and gifts. For the same reason he is also blessed in himself as the sum of all goodness, of all perfection. Hermon Bavinck, Vol. 2 p 211]

Cornelius Van Til states:

Once more: Not only do all facts reveal God but they, in revealing him, manifest his attitude toward men. God is love. He loves himself above all else. He loved himself from all eternity when he had as yet made no creatures to love. But when he made creatures, he made them lovable like himself. He loved them because in loving them, he loved himself above all else. Pg 132 Common Grace & the Gospel

Note Edwards' words, "how is it possible that it should have anything to add to God". Here is God's simplicity, immutability and impassibility and perfection stated. For if man could cause God to undergo a change in disposition, then God would be mutable and passible!

John Flavel makes this clear regarding our absolute dependence upon God, in his comments on the soul in his book, The Treatise of the Soul of Man, pg 21

"A substance which has an essential principle of life in itself; a living, active being. A living soul, says Moses in the text; and hereby it is distinguished from, and opposed to matter or body. The soul moves itself and the body too; it has a self-moving virtue or power in itself; whereas the matter, or body is wholly passive, and is moved and acted, not by itself, but by this vital spirit, James 2:26, "The body without the spirit is dead." It acts not at all, but as it is acted by this invisible spirit. This is so plain, that it admits of sensible proof and demonstration. Take mere matter, and compound or divide it, alter it, and change it how you will, you can never make it see, feel, hear, or act vitally without a quickening and actuating soul. Yet we must still remember, that this active principle, the soul, though it has this vital power in itself, it has it not from itself, but in a constant receptive dependence upon God, the first cause, both of its being and power."

God cannot receive anything from the creature since God is perfect, lacking nothing, and thus can't receive anything, for if he could, God would be lacking something; but he is perfect. If he could receive something, then before he wasn't perfect, was lacking something and hence, not God! To add to him would be adding to him who cannot be added to, for he is infinite. Also, nothing can take away from his felicity...and on and on. The more you ruminate on this subject, you'll get more familiar with the terms and in how they all interrelate.

The problem that many have is that they are trying to make God more relational, more give and take in their composite way of thinking since we are creatures; we think that way. They think that if God is immutable, impassible and simple that he is just inert, see [codeinert] static, a rock, a metaphysical iceberg; but the true nature of God as depicted by these terms make him boundless in his love, mercy, patience, hence wholly relational to his creatures. We cannot cause God to care more than he does! Think about that!

What you don't want is a passible God who would be finite in his attributes, not boundless; for the parts in him in this case have to be finite, and hence being passible, he would respond to our corrupted nature and treat us as our sins deserve. But if he is not passible, but pure act, then he is not moved by our sinfulness by necessity, which would inevitably lead to our being judged, but he can, by an act of his will (an eternal act in his eternal decree), he can choose to save, to have mercy on whom he will, overlooking our sin.

This is why John Owen attributes the foundation of the Father's electing love to an act of his will and not the passible common affection which would depend upon us doing something to arouse (actualize) his potential love. But he loved us without our arousing him!!! without us doing any good or evil (Rom 9). If God were passible it would limit God's love, making it finite and not boundless in its operation. And as I said before, due to our total depravity, we could never arouse his love but would be subject to his justice in our deserved condemnation!

The Death of Death in the Death of Christ

by John Owen, Book IV, Chp II

<https://ccel.org/ccel/owen/deathofdeath/deathofdeath.i.x.ii.html>

In this excerpt John Owen mentions some terms and understandings relating to impassibility but does not mention term impassibility nor explain it in depth; that was my first exposure to this doctrine. Note that he only says that affections are not in God and that this was a commonly accepted doctrine during his time (1600s) by all kinds of Christians. Beginning about the time of the Enlightenment in the 17th & 18th centuries this doctrine faded into obscurity. Now that I've read several books on impassibility, simplicity, and immutability of God, I have gotten a much more deeper understanding of Owen's comments as I re-read this excerpt. Note the terms that Owen uses such as act of the will, free, unchangeable purpose, natural affection, and common affection, and transcendent love. He doesn't mention the term 'pure act', but from that flows an understanding of the term act of his will.

In this excerpt Owen refers to the Arminian view of God's love as a "natural inclination, velleity, and propensity to the good of 'the world,' as well as the common affection of love in opposition to divine love as an act of His will as the foundation of the Father's saving mercy. The key here is that since God is impassible and pure act, that nothing in the creature causes God to show mercy or saving love, it must be an act of his will as Owen describes and not the common affection or natural inclination etc.

With that in mind, read Owen's comments on an . In this excerpt, Owen is comparing the reformed view with the Arminian view of what kind of love is meant in John 3:16 – the common affection and a natural inclination to good, or an act of His will.

My comments in [blue].

This place, I say, the Universalists exceedingly boast in; for which we are persuaded they have so little cause, that we doubt not but, with the Lord's assistance, to demonstrate that it is destructive to their whole defense: to which end I will give you, in brief, a double paraphrase of the words, the first containing their sense, the latter ours. Thus, then, our adversaries explain these words:— “ 'God so loved,' had such a natural inclination, velleity, and propensity to the good of 'the world,' Adam, with all and every one of his posterity, of all ages, times, and conditions (whereof some were in heaven, some in hell long before), 'that he gave his only-begotten Son,' causing him to be incarnate in the fulness of time, to die, not with a purpose and resolution to save any, but 'that whosoever,' what persons soever of those which he had propensity unto, 'believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life,' should have this fruit and issue, that he should escape death and hell, and live eternally." In which explication of the sense of the place these things are to be observed:—

First, What is that love which was the cause of the sending or giving of Christ; which they make to be a natural propensity to the good of all. Secondly, Who are the objects of this love; all and every man of all generations. Thirdly, Wherein this giving consisteth; of which I cannot find whether they mean by it the appointment of Christ to be a recoverer, or his actual exhibition in the flesh for the accomplishment of his ministration. Fourthly, Whosoever, they make distributive of the persons in the world, and so not restrictive in the intention to some. Fifthly, That life eternal is the fruit obtained by believers, but not the end intended by God.

Now, look a little, in the second place, at what we conceive to be the mind of God in those words; whose aim we take to be the advancement and setting forth of the free love of God to lost sinners, in sending Christ to procure for them eternal redemption, as may appear in this following paraphrase:—

“ ‘God’ the Father 'so loved,' had such a peculiar, transcendent love, being an unchangeable purpose and an act of his will see [code454b ref act of his will] concerning their salvation, towards 'the world,' miserable, sinful, lost men of all sorts, not only Jews but Gentiles also, which he peculiarly loved, 'that,' intending their salvation, as in the last words, for the praise of his glorious grace, 'he gave,' he prepared a way to prevent their everlasting destruction, by appointing and sending 'his only-begotten Son' to be an all-sufficient Saviour to all that look up unto him, 'that whosoever believeth in him,' all believers whatsoever, and only they, 'should not perish, but have everlasting life,' and so effectually be brought to the obtaining of those glorious things through him which the Lord in his free love had designed for them.”

In which enlargement of the words, for the setting forth of what we conceive to be the mind of the Holy Ghost in them, these things are to be observed:—

First, What we understand by the "love" of God, even that act of his will which was the cause of sending his Son Jesus Christ, being the most eminent act of love and favour to the creature; for love is velle alicui bonum, “to will good to any.” And never did God will greater good to the creature than in appointing his Son for their redemption. Notwithstanding, I would have it observed that I do not make the purpose of sending or giving Christ to be absolutely subordinate to God’s love to his elect, as though that were the end of the other absolutely, but rather that they are both co-ordinate to the same supreme end, or the manifestation of God’s glory by the way of mercy tempered with justice; but in respect of our apprehension, that is the relation wherein they stand one to another. Now, this love we say to be that, greater than which there is none.

Secondly, By the “world,” we understand the elect of God only, though not considered in this place as such, but under such a notion as, being true of them, serves for the farther exaltation of God’s love towards them, which is the end here designed; and this is, as they are poor, miserable, lost creatures in the world, of the world, scattered abroad in all places of the world, not tied to Jews or Greeks, but dispersed in any nation, kindred, and language under heaven.

Thirdly, ἵνα πᾶς ὁ πιστεύων, is to us, “that every believer,” and is declarative of the intention of God in sending or giving his Son, containing no distribution of the world beloved, but a direction to the persons whose good was intended, that love being an unchangeable intention of the chiefest good.

Fourthly, “Should not perish, but have life everlasting,” contains an expression of the particular aim and intention of God in this business; which is, the certain salvation of believers by Christ. And this, in general, is the interpretation of the words which we adhere unto, which will yield us sundry arguments, sufficient each of them to evert the general ransom; which, that they may be the better bottomed, and the more clearly convincing, we will lay down and compare the several words and expressions of this place, about whose interpretation we differ, with the reason of our rejecting the one sense and embracing the other:—

The first difference in the interpretation of this place is about the cause of sending Christ; called here love. The second, about the object of this love; called here the world. Thirdly, Concerning the intention of God in sending his Son; said to be that believers might be saved.

For the FIRST, By “love” in this place, all our adversaries agree that a natural affection and propensity in God to the good of the creature, lost under sin, in general, which moved him to take some way whereby it might possibly be remedied, is intended. We, on the contrary, say that by love here is not meant an inclination or propensity of his nature¹, but an act of his will (where we conceive his love to be seated), and eternal purpose to do good to man, being the most transcendent and eminent act of God’s love to the creature.

That both these may be weighed, to see which is most agreeable to the mind of the Holy Ghost, I shall give you, first, some of the reasons whereby we oppose the former interpretation; and, secondly, those whereby we confirm our own.

First, If no natural affection, whereby he should necessarily be carried to any thing without himself, can or ought to be ascribed unto God, then no such thing is here intended in the word love; for that cannot be here intended which is not in God at all. [Doctrine of Simplicity: God is not a composite being, composed of parts such as love, mercy, patience, etc., but he is those things!] But now, that there neither is nor can be any such natural affection in God is most apparent, and may be evidenced by many demonstrations. I shall briefly recount a few of them:—

First, Nothing that includes any imperfection is to be assigned to Almighty God: he is God all-sufficient; he is our rock, and his work is perfect. But a natural affection in God to the good and salvation of all, being never completed nor perfected, carrieth along with it a great deal of imperfection and weakness; and not only so, but it must also needs be exceedingly prejudicial to the absolute blessedness and happiness of Almighty God. Look, how much any thing wants of the fulfilling of that whereunto it is carried out with any desire, natural or voluntary, so much it wanteth of blessedness and happiness. So that, without impairing of the infinite blessedness of the ever-blessed God, no natural affection unto any thing never to be accomplished can be ascribed unto him, such as this general love to all is supposed to be.

Secondly, If the Lord hath such a natural affection to all, as to love them so far as to send his Son to die for them, whence is it that this affection of his doth not receive accomplishment? whence is it that it is hindered, and doth not produce its effects? why doth not the Lord engage his power for the fulfilling of his desire? “It doth not seem good to his infinite wisdom,” say they, “so to do.” Then is there an affection in God to that which, in his wisdom, he cannot prosecute. This among the sons of men, the worms of the earth, would be called a brutish affection.

Thirdly, No affection or natural propensity to good is to be ascribed to God which the Scripture nowhere assigns to him, and is contrary to what the Scripture doth assign unto him. Now, the Scripture doth nowhere assign unto God any natural affection whereby he should be naturally inclined to the good of the creature; the place to prove it clearly is yet to be produced. And that it is contrary to what the Scripture assigns him is apparent; for it describes him to be free in showing mercy, every act of it being by him performed freely, even as he pleaseth, for “he hath mercy on whom he will have mercy.” Now, if every act of mercy showed unto any do proceed from the free distinguishing will of God (as is apparent), certainly there can be in him no such natural affection. In other words, from the standpoint of impassibility, there is no potency in God that can be actualized by anything outside of God, i.e., by the creature, by anything the creature does or says such as a sinner’s prayer or sacramental act, to curry God’s favor and cause God (actualizing this potency) to show favor. This also places God in debt to the creature and hence grace is not free, not freely given (because it’s caused by the creature. See [code439, Common Love vs. Divine Love for more in depth comment in Owen’s alluding to God’s impassibility.)] And the truth is, if the Lord should not show mercy, and be carried out towards the creature, merely upon his own distinguishing will, but should naturally be moved to show mercy to the miserable, he should, first, be no more merciful to men than to devils, nor, secondly, to those that are saved than to those that are damned: for that which is natural must be equal in all its operations; and that which is natural to God must be eternal. Many more effectual reasons are produced by our divines for the denial of this natural affection in God, in the resolution of the Arminian distinction (I call it so, as now by them abused) of God's antecedent and consequent will, to whom the learned reader may repair for satisfaction. So that the love mentioned in this place is not that natural affection to all in general, which is not. But, —

Secondly, It is the special love of God to his elect, as we affirm, and so, consequently, not any such thing as our adversaries suppose to be intended by it, — namely, a velleity or natural inclination to the good of all. For, —

First, The love here intimated is absolutely the most eminent and transcendent love that ever God showed or bare towards any miserable creature; yea, the intention of our Saviour is so to set it forth, as is apparent by the emphatical expression of it used in this place. The particles "so," "that," declare no less, pointing out an eximiousness peculiarly remarkable in the thing whereof the affirmation is [made], above any other thing in the same kind. Expositors usually lay weight upon almost every particular word of the verse, for the exaltation and demonstration of the love here mentioned. "So," that is, in such a degree, to such a remarkable, astonishable height: "God," the glorious, all-sufficient God, that could have manifested his justice to eternity in the condemnation of all sinners, and no way wanted them to be partakers of his blessedness: "loved," with such an earnest, intense affection, consisting in an eternal, unchangeable act and purpose of his will, for the bestowing of the chiefest good (the choicest effectual love): "the world," men in the world, of the world, subject to the iniquities and miseries of the world, lying in their blood, having nothing to render them commendable in his eyes, or before him: "that he gave," did not, as he made all the world at first, speak the word and it was done, but proceeded higher, to the performance of a great deal more and longer work, wherein he was to do more than exercise an act of his almighty power, as before; and therefore gave "his Son;" not any favourite or other well-pleasing creature; not sun, moon, or stars; not the rich treasure of his creation (all too mean, and coming short of expressing this love); but his Son: "begotten Son," and that not so called by reason of some near approaches to him, and filial, obediential reverence of him, as the angels are called the sons of God; for it was not an angel that he gave, which yet had been an expression of most intense love; nor yet any son by adoption, as believers are the sons of God; but his begotten Son, begotten of his own person from eternity; and that "his only-begotten Son;" not any one of his sons, but whereas he had or hath but one only-begotten Son, always in his bosom, his Isaac, he gave him:— than which how could the infinite wisdom of God make or give any higher testimony of his love? especially if ye will add what is here evidently included, though the time was not as yet come that it should be openly expressed, namely, whereunto he gave his Son, his only one; not to be a king, and worshipped in the first place, — but he “spared him not, but delivered him up” to death “for us all,” Rom. viii. 32. Whereunto, for a close of all, cast your eyes upon his design and purpose in this whole business, and ye shall find that it was that believers, those whom he thus loved, “might not perish,” — that is, undergo the utmost misery and wrath to eternity, which they had deserved, — “but have everlasting life,” eternal glory with himself, which of themselves they could no way attain; and ye will easily grant that “greater love hath no man than this.” Now, if the love here mentioned be the greatest, highest, and chiefest of all, certainly it cannot be that common affection towards all that we discussed before; for the love whereby men are actually and eternally saved is greater than that which may consist with the perishing of men to eternity.

Secondly, The Scripture positively asserts this very love as the chiefest act of the love of God, and that which he would have us take notice of in the first place: Rom. v. 8, “God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us;” and fully, 1 John iv. 9, 10, “In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only-begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins.” In both which places the eminency of this love is set forth exceeding emphatically to believers, with such expressions as can no way be accommodated to a natural velleity to the good of all.

Thirdly, That seeing all love in God is but velle alicui bonum, to will good to them that are beloved, they certainly are the object of his love to whom he intends that good which is the issue and effect of that love; but now the issue of this love or good intended, being not perishing, and obtaining eternal life through Christ, happens alone to, and is bestowed on, only elect believers: therefore, they certainly are the object of this love, and they alone; — which was the thing we had to declare.

Fourthly, That love which is the cause of giving Christ is also always the cause of the bestowing of all other good things: Rom. viii. 32, “He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?” Therefore, if the love there mentioned be the cause of sending Christ, as it is, it must also cause all other things to be given with him, and so can be towards none but those who have those things bestowed on them; which are only the elect, only believers. Who else have grace here, or glory hereafter?

¹What I think Owen is saying here doesn't really relate to possible or impossible so much as it has to do with God's natural propensity regardless of any outward causes that may actualize any potency in God to show favor. So if it is God's propensity to show good to all, then no one is going to hell; he would show equal favor to devils, reprobates, and the elect; he would, by necessity, show good to all. Then Owen says, If no natural affection, whereby he should necessarily be carried to any thing without himself can or ought to be ascribed unto God [there's the passableness – my insert], then no such thing is here intended in the word love. This is true; there is no potency in God (since he is simple) as there is in humans, that something outside himself can arouse a common affection (potency) such as love. God is love. He is already pure act; no one can make him love more than he is acting.

You see, there is nothing loveable in us; so if God did have potency, the common affection of love that needed to be actualized by man, would never get actualized due to man's radical depravity, hence, Romans 8:7-8, ⁷ For the mind that is set on the flesh is hostile to God, for it does not submit to God's law; indeed, it cannot. ⁸ Those who are in the flesh cannot please God. And Heb. 11:6, without faith it is impossible to please Him, and other like passages such as 1Cor2:14, ¹⁴ The natural person does not accept the things of the Spirit of God, for they are folly to him, and he is not able to understand them because they are spiritually discerned.

Contemporary critics, nonetheless, say that if God is truly an unmoved mover, He can only be "rigid dead substance," wholly inactive and immobile. As James Dolezal explains, however, "the very opposite is the case. The God of classical theism is not unmoved because He lacks actuality and dynamism, but because He is pure unbounded act and dynamism and thus cannot be moved to some additional state of actuality, power, or liveliness." Similarly, Muller writes, "Immutability does not indicate inactivity or unrelatedness, but the fulfillment of being." God is therefore, as Charnock put it, "nothing but vigor and act." Life is in Him "originally, radically, therefore eternally," and He has by His nature "that life which others have by his grant" (cf. 1 Tim 6:16). Alan Quinone, Master's Seminary

God is therefore like an architect who from eternity holds a blueprint of the form of what He intends to build, and then affects His work over time. In these egressions, God is not transitioning from passive potency to actuality, but is rather directing His essence to the execution of His ad extra works. Once more, the change is outside, about, and around God, but not in Him. While God is pure actuality, His creation stands, in relation to Him, in potentia. This makes creation entirely dependent upon God to reach actualization. See [code305a code306a]

As it is widely known, the doctrine of predestination stands as one of the chief tenets of the Reformed faith. One of its principal articles, moreover, is the belief that one ought to look no further than God's will as the ultimate cause for either the election or the reprobation of men; for, as Paul wrote, "He has mercy on whom He desires, and He hardens whom He desires” (Rom 9:18). This is precisely the point against which Arminianism reacts so strongly.

Predestination comments by Alan Quinones

In their first article of affirmation, the followers of Jacob Arminius sought to redefine the doctrine of predestination as indicating that God has eternally determined to save “those who ... shall believe on his Son Jesus, and shall persevere in this faith and obedience of faith ... and on the other hand, to leave the incorrigible and unbelieving in sin and under wrath.” In other words, something outside of God—namely man’s faith, obedience, and perseverance, or else his incorrigibility and unbelief—moves Him either to elect or reprobate men.

Pink thus explained, “Perverters of this truth [predestination] invariably seek to find some cause outside God’s own will, which moves Him to bestow salvation on sinners.” In doing so, they undermine the perfection and all-sufficiency of God, for they make Him liable to change, and to have His own counsels “disturbed,” in the words of van Mastricht, “subjugated to a master, as it were.” Nevertheless, because of God’s pure actuality, nothing in creation can be greater or prior to His will, which is always in act and never in potency. After all, whatever is in potentia is also caused, and therefore dependent upon its cause to reach actualization.

The will of God cannot thus be said to be dependent upon any external causes, whether instrumental, impulsive, or final. This is why Jonathan Edwards wrote that our language concerning God’s decree is ultimately improper, though no “more improper than all our other ways of speaking about God.” The doctrine of predestination, nevertheless, must be defined under the assumption that all the decrees of God are harmonious. And, as this study has shown, they are harmonious precisely because they entail one simple and eternal act, which is identical with the divine essence.

God’s love is not the passable kind as it is in humans, but impassible; it’s the highest form of love (God so loved in Jn 3:16- J Owen) that passes knowledge, an act of his will, being that he is pure act; that is, it is from the council of his own will. There is the mystery. If we don’t cause God to love us then why does he love those he loves or why does he say in Romans 9, I will have mercy on whom I have mercy? But that fact is that he does, in the end, is for His glory! That’s the mystery and it should lead us to reverential awe, praise, humility and obedience to his commands.

This is the love that passes knowledge. We cannot comprehend it. And I think the same thing goes for those he reprobates. Yes, they are guilty and without excuse, but we can’t chalk that up to the creature alone as though God is just responding to their sin and rebellion and so damns them; God is not dependent upon the creature! Ultimately, it all comes down to God’s will. Either way, regarding election or reprobation, He is not the Great Responder as Edwards notes. He is sovereign in all that he does. See the London Baptist Confession regarding the will of God and his decree.

1. God hath decreed in himself, from all eternity, by the most wise and holy counsel of his own will, freely and unchangeably, all things, whatsoever comes to pass; yet so as thereby is God neither the author of sin nor hath fellowship with any therein; nor is violence offered to the will of the creature, nor yet is the liberty or contingency of second causes taken away, but rather established; in which appears his wisdom in disposing all things, and power and faithfulness in accomplishing his decree. (Isaiah 46:10; Ephesians 1:11; Hebrews 6:17; Romans 9:15, 18; James 1:13; 1 John 1:5; Acts 4:27, 28; John 19:11; Numbers 23:19; Ephesians 1:3-5)

Edwards explains, in this instance, regarding prayer: note the comments on the nature of God; he doesn't mention the word impassible but he clearly teaches it here when he says that God is not moved or persuaded by the prayers of his people; this seems strange but as I noted above, we cannot cause God to care, etc. more than he does already.

It is not in order that God may be informed of our wants or desires. He is omniscient, and with respect to his knowledge unchangeable. God never gains any knowledge by information. He knows what we want, a thousand times more perfectly than we do ourselves, before we ask him. For though, speaking after the manner of men, God is sometimes represented as if he were moved and persuaded by the prayers of his people; yet it is not to be thought that God is properly moved or made willing by our prayers; for it is no more possible that there should be any new inclination or will in God, than new knowledge. The mercy of God is not moved or drawn by any thing in the creature; but the spring of God's beneficence is within himself only; he is self-moved; and whatsoever mercy he bestows, the reason and ground of it is not to be sought for in the creature, but in God's own good pleasure. It is the will of God to bestow mercy in this way, viz. in answer to prayer, when he designs beforehand to bestow mercy, yea, when he has promised it; as Ezek. 36:35, 37, "I the Lord have spoken it, and will do it. Thus saith the Lord, I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them." God has been pleased to constitute prayer to be antecedent to the bestowment of mercy; and he is pleased to bestow mercy in consequence of prayer, as though he were prevailed on by prayer.--When the people of God are stirred up to prayer, it is the effect of his intention to show mercy; therefore he pours out the spirit of grace and supplication.

God's Sovereignty Over the Wills of Men & Doctrine of Concurrence

By G Clark

God's relations with his creatures vs. Deism Divine Simplicity, Immutability and Impassibility

This is, by far, not an exhaustive treatise on this subject, but is principally to introduce these subjects to you that have, since the 1700s, drifted by the wayside rarely to be ever heard again, since it is man's nature is to want to have their brains entertained with notions that tickle their carnal apprehensions of divine things or accommodate their whining appetites. That being said, here are the dots to connect in your mind. Through much meditation on these we become more familiar with them and they begin to manifest in a beautiful image (of his glory), that excites and leads us to our duty. Look for a common thread in the following passages, God will and the Creature's will. These passages are very deep theologically, and many miss the meaning. Hint: man is desperately attempting to defend his supposed autonomy, his supposed self-directed will and as Psalm 50:21 states, thinks God is altogether like himself. This following explanation requires much re-reading and contemplation over several months and even years. But it is crucial that you learn this so that you come to a right knowledge of God, as F.J. Sheed warns:

F.J. Sheed (1930), writing around the same time as Berkhof, offers a similarly sobering assessment: "A study of what is happening to theology in its higher reaches would almost certainly take as its starting point the attribute of simplicity, and show that every current heresy begins by being wrong on that."

First, some notes on the doctrine of Concurrence, God's ultimate sovereignty over the wills of men:

Edwards on God's Promises vs. a Predictor

§ 52. If it be as the Arminians suppose, that all men's virtue is of the determination of their own free will, independent on any prior determining, deciding, and disposing of the event; that it is no part of the ordering of God, whether there be many virtuous or few in the world, whether there shall be much virtue or little, or where it shall be, in what nation, country, or when, or in what generation or age; or whether there shall be any at all: then none of these things belong to God's disposal, and therefore, surely it does not belong to him to promise them. For it does not belong to him to promise in an affair, concerning which he has not the disposal.

And how can God promise, as he oftentimes does in his word, glorious times, when righteousness shall generally prevail, and his will shall generally be done; and yet that it is not an effect which belongs to him to determine; it is not left to his determination, but to the sovereign, arbitrary determination of others, independently on any determination of him; and therefore surely they ought to be the promisers? For him to promise, who has it not in his hand to dispose and determine, is a great absurdity; and yet God oftentimes in promising, speaks of himself as the sovereign disposer of the matter, using such expressions as abundantly imply it. Isa. Lx. 22. "I the Lord do hasten it in its time." Also [Isa 46:11-9 above.] Surely this is the language of promiser, and not merely a predictor. God promises Abraham, that "all the families of the earth shall be blessed in him." God swears Rom. Xiv. 11. "every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess." And it is said to be given to Christ, that every nation, &c. should serve and obey him, Dan. Vii. After what manner they shall serve and obey him, is abundantly declared in other prophecies, as in Isa. Xi. And innumerable others. These are spoken of in the next chapter, as excellent things that God does.

Bottom line: these doctrines should have a reverential awe over our mind and affections leading us to more ardent worship, adoration, prayer, dependence upon God, and obedience, exciting us to our duty. For God is orchestrating everything; whether one is going to hell, in which a person willingly goes, or one who will be born again (converted) in which case he willingly comes, without coercion or doing any violence to man's liberty, his creaturely freedom. This is a great mystery as to how this all works, that God is sovereign over the wills of men yet rules and directs them without coercion; but it is true as many scriptures plainly demonstrate. So do not let the fact that you cannot have an infinite thought about an infinite God, or have a notion of God's impassibility (since we are passible creatures), or have a simple thought of God's simplicity (the fact that he is not a composite being but one divine essence) and so on, cause you to reject these doctrines!

The words of Thomas Watson in A Body of Divinity:

From Adam's sudden fall, learn how sad it is for a man to be left to himself. Adam being left to himself, fell. Oh then, what will become of us, how soon fall, if God should leave us to ourselves! A man without God's grace, left to himself, is like a ship in a storm, without pilot or anchor, and is ready to dash upon every rock. Make this prayer to God, 'Lord, do not leave me to myself. If Adam fell so soon who had strength, how soon shall I fall who have no strength!' [and are living in much worse times of temptation and corruption than Adam was before he fell – my insert] Oh! Urge God with this hand and seal, 'My strength shall be made perfect in weakness.' 2Cor 12:9

Pertinent scriptures:

1Sam. 2:7 - The LORD makes poor and makes rich; he brings low and he exalts.

Prov 16:4 - The LORD has made everything for its purpose, even the wicked for the day of trouble.

Romans 9:19- ¹⁹You will say to me then, "Why does He still find fault? For who has resisted His will?" ²⁰But indeed, O man, who are you to reply against God? Will the thing formed say to him who formed it, "Why have you made me like this?" ²¹Does not the potter have power over the clay, from the same lump to make one vessel for honor and another for dishonor?

²² What if God, wanting to show His wrath and to make His power known, endured with much longsuffering the vessels of wrath prepared for destruction, ²³ and that He might make known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy, which He had prepared beforehand for glory, Prov 16:9 - The heart of man plans his way, but the LORD establishes his steps.

Ps 37:32 - The steps of a man are established by the LORD, when he delights in his way;

Jas 4:14 - Come now, you who say, "Today or tomorrow we will go into such and such a town and spend a year there and trade and make a profit"— ¹⁴yet you do not know what tomorrow will bring. What is your life? For you are a mist that appears for a little time and then vanishes. ¹⁵ Instead you ought to say, "If the Lord wills, we will live and do this or that." ¹⁶ As it is, you boast in your arrogance. All such boasting is evil.

Prov 19:21 - Many are the plans in the mind of a man, but it is the purpose of the LORD that will stand.

Prov. 21:1 The king's heart is a stream of water in the hand of the LORD; he turns it wherever he will.

Prov 20:24 - A man's steps are from the LORD; how then can man understand his way?

Ps 139:16 Your eyes saw my unformed substance; in your book were written, every one of them, the days that were formed for me, when as yet there was none of them.

Ps115:3 - Our God is in the heavens; he does all that he pleases.

Isa 46:9- for I am God, and there is no other; I am God, and there is none like me,¹⁰ declaring the end from the beginning and from ancient times things not yet done, saying, 'My counsel shall stand, and I will accomplish all my purpose,' ¹¹ calling a bird of prey from the east, the man of my counsel from a far country. I have spoken, and I will bring it to pass; I have purposed, and I will do it.

Jer. 10:23 - I know, O LORD, that the way of man is not in himself, that it is not in man who walks to direct his steps.

Exod. 3:21 - And I will give this people favor in the sight of the Egyptians; and when you go, you shall not go empty, Exod. 7:3 But I will harden Pharaoh's heart, and though I multiply my signs and wonders in the land of Egypt, ⁴Pharaoh will not listen to you.

Regarding the doctrine of concurrence, where God's eternal decree is consistence with man's liberty; in other words, God does not make men to be as puppets or blocks of wood. Though God decrees man will do this or that, man is still an accountable creature to God and is responsible for his actions, yet God does not do violence to their will, e.g., via coercion. This is a great mystery. We can understand it, believe it, but cannot comprehend it. There are many instances of this in Scripture, e.g., 2Cor. 8:16-17, Isaiah 10, the Story of Joseph and his brothers, and Exodus 14 and Acts 4. Here is the warning; because many do not understand the mystery, they deny this truth altogether; they do not have a right notion of the nature of God, and thus suffer in many trials, e.g., Job.

Jonathan Edwards on Concurrence

§ 64. In efficacious grace we are not merely passive, nor yet does God do some, and we do the rest. But God does all, and we do all. God produces all, and we act all. For that is what he produces, viz. our own acts. God is the only proper author and fountain; we only are the proper actors. We are, in different respects, wholly passive and wholly active.

In the Scriptures the same things are represented as from God and from us. God is said to convert, and men are said to convert and turn. God makes a new heart, and we are commanded to make us a new heart. God circumcises the heart, and we are commanded to circumcise our own hearts; not merely because we must use the means in order to the effect, but the effect itself is our act and our duty. These things are agreeable to that text, "God worketh in you both to will and to do."

Now read these:

Exod. 14:8 - And the LORD hardened the heart of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and he pursued the people of Israel while the people of Israel were going out defiantly.

Exod. 8:15 - But when Pharaoh saw that there was a respite, he hardened his heart and would not listen to them [there's man hardening his own heart of his own accord! not forced.], as the LORD had said.

Exod. 14:32 - But Pharaoh hardened his heart this time also, and did not let the people go.

Gen. 50:19 Joseph

¹⁹ But Joseph said to them, "Do not fear, for am I in the place of God? ²⁰ As for you, you meant evil against me [there is man doing evil of his own accord, not forced by God.], but God meant it for good, to bring it about that many people^l should be kept alive, as they are today.

Isaiah 10: Assyria Here God had ordained, just like Herod and Pontius Pilate, et al, in Acts 4:27-8 (see below), that Assyria would attack Israel to punish them for their idolatry, yet God does not force them to do this; they are just wicked people who like raping and pillaging nations; and the Assyrians did not say to God, Oh please God have us not do this wicked thing nor did they acknowledge God in any way, but of their own corrupt accord they did what had been decreed by God! And then! God punishes the Assyrians because of the wickedness of their hearts! This is an excellent example of Concurrence.

...for truly in this city there were gathered together against your holy servant Jesus, whom you anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, along with the Gentiles and the peoples of Israel, to do whatever your hand and your plan had predestined to take place. Acts 4:27-28 ESV

Judgment on Arrogant Assyria

⁵ Woe to Assyria, the rod of my anger;
the staff in their hands is my fury!

⁶ Against a godless nation I send him, and against the people of my wrath I command him, to take spoil and seize plunder, and to tread them down like the mire of the streets. [There is God's decree regarding Assyria]

⁷ But he does not so intend, and his heart does not so think;
but it is in his heart to destroy, and to cut off nations not a few; [there is the clear evidence that Assyria is not being coerced by God]

⁸ for he says:

"Are not my commanders all kings?

⁹ Is not Calno like Carchemish?

Is not Hamath like Arpad?

Is not Samaria like Damascus?

¹⁰ As my hand has reached to the kingdoms of the idols, whose carved images were greater than those of Jerusalem and Samaria,

¹¹ shall I not do to Jerusalem and her idols
as I have done to Samaria and her images?"

¹² When the Lord has finished all his work on Mount Zion and on Jerusalem, he^l will punish the speech^l of the arrogant heart of the king of Assyria and the boastful look in his eyes. ¹³ For he says:

"By the strength of my hand I have done it,
and by my wisdom, for I have understanding;

I remove the boundaries of peoples,
and plunder their treasures;

like a bull I bring down those who sit on thrones.

¹⁴ My hand has found like a nest
the wealth of the peoples;
and as one gathers eggs that have been forsaken,
so I have gathered all the earth;
and there was none that moved a wing
or opened the mouth or chirped."

¹⁵ Shall the axe boast over him who hews with it, or the saw magnify itself against him who wields it?

As if a rod should wield him who lifts it,
or as if a staff should lift him who is not wood!

¹⁶ Therefore the Lord GOD of hosts will send wasting sickness among his stout warriors, and under his glory a burning will be kindled,
like the burning of fire.

¹⁷ The light of Israel will become a fire, and his Holy One a flame, and it will burn and devour his thorns and briers in one day.

2Cor. 8:16 is a textbook example of concurrence:

2Cor. 8:16-17 - But thanks be to God, who put into the heart of Titus [there is God's divine influence to effect his will in the creature] the same earnest care I have for you. ¹⁷ For he not only accepted our appeal, but being himself very earnest he is going to you of his own accord. [There is Titus doing this of his own accord without any coercion whatsoever. He freely does it because he wants to, just like Joseph's brothers wanted to kill Joseph, just like Pharaoh did not want to let God's people go as God had told Moses.] So you might object and say that God predicts all these things not because God has sovereign control over man's wills but because God just knows everything before it happens. I answer with this explanation by Jonathan Edwards:

§ 52. If it be as the Arminians suppose, that all men's virtue is of the determination of their own free will, independent on any prior determining, deciding, and disposing of the event; that it is no part of the ordering of God, whether there be many virtuous or few in the world, whether there shall be much virtue or little, or where it shall be, in what nation, country, or when, or in what generation or age; or whether there shall be any at all: then none of these things belong to God's disposal, and therefore, surely it does not belong to him to promise them. For it does not belong to him to promise in an affair, concerning which he has not the disposal.

And how can God promise, as he oftentimes does in his word, glorious times, when righteousness shall generally prevail, and his will shall generally be done; and yet that it is not an effect which belongs to him to determine; it is not left to his determination, but to the sovereign, arbitrary determination of others, independently on any determination of him; and therefore surely they ought to be the promisers? For him to promise, who has it not in his hand to dispose and determine, is a great absurdity; and yet God oftentimes in promising, speaks of himself as the sovereign disposer of the matter, using such expressions as abundantly imply it. Isa. Lx. 22. "I the Lord do hasten it in its time." Surely this is the language of promiser, and not merely a predictor. God promises Abraham, that "all the families of the earth shall be blessed in him." God swears Rom. Xiv. 11. "every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess." And it is said to be given to Christ, that every nation, &c. should serve and obey him, Dan. Vii. After what manner they shall serve and obey him, is abundantly declared in other prophecies, as in Isa. Xi. And innumerable others. These are spoken of in the next chapter, as excellent things that God does.

Other passages that show God working in us:

Phil 2:13 - Therefore, my beloved, as you have always obeyed, so now, not only as in my presence but much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling,¹³ for it is God who works in you, both to will and to work for his good pleasure.

1Cor15 ⁹ For I am the least of the apostles, unworthy to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God. ¹⁰ But by the grace of God I am what I am, and his grace toward me was not in vain. On the contrary, I worked harder than any of them, though it was not I, but the grace of God that is with me.

Isa 26:12 - O LORD, you will ordain peace for us, for you have indeed done for us all our works.

Eph 2:10 - ¹⁰ For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God prepared beforehand, that we should walk in them.

John 6:29 ²⁹ Jesus answered them, "This is the work of God, that you believe in him whom he has sent."

Dan 4 - Nebuchadnezzar's Humiliation

²⁸ All this came upon King Nebuchadnezzar. ²⁹ At the end of twelve months he was walking on the roof of the royal palace of Babylon, ³⁰ and the king answered and said, "Is not this great Babylon, which I have built by my mighty power as a royal residence and for the glory of my majesty?" ³¹ While the words were still in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven, "O King Nebuchadnezzar, to you it is spoken: The kingdom has departed from you, ³² and you shall be driven from among men, and your dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field. And you shall be made to eat grass like an ox, and seven periods of time shall pass over you, until you know that the Most High rules the kingdom of men and gives it to whom he will." ³³ Immediately the word was fulfilled against Nebuchadnezzar. He was driven from among men and ate grass like an ox, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven till his hair grew as long as eagles' feathers, and his nails were like birds' claws.

Nebuchadnezzar Restored

³⁴ At the end of the days I, Nebuchadnezzar, lifted my eyes to heaven, and my reason returned to me, and I blessed the Most High, and praised and honored him who lives forever, for his dominion is an everlasting dominion, and his kingdom endures from generation to generation;

³⁵ all the inhabitants of the earth are accounted as nothing, and he does according to his will among the host of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand or say to him, "What have you done?"

³⁶ At the same time my reason returned to me, and for the glory of my kingdom, my majesty and splendor returned to me. My counselors and my lords sought me, and I was established in my kingdom, and still more greatness was added to me. ³⁷ Now I, Nebuchadnezzar, praise and extol and honor the King of heaven, for all his works are right and his ways are just; and those who walk in pride he is able to humble.

Amos 3:6 - Is a trumpet blown in a city, and the people are not afraid? Does disaster come to a city, unless the LORD has done it?

Eph 1:5- In love ⁵ he predestined us[□] for adoption to himself as sons through Jesus Christ, according to the purpose of his will, ⁶ to the praise of his glorious grace, with which he has blessed us in the Beloved. ⁷ In him we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses, according to the riches of his grace, ⁸ which he lavished upon us, in all wisdom and insight ⁹ making known[□] to us the mystery of his will, according to his purpose, which he set forth in Christ ¹⁰ as a plan for the fullness of time, to unite all things in him, things in heaven and things on earth. ¹¹ In him we have obtained an inheritance, having been predestined according to the purpose of him who works all things according to the counsel of his will, ¹² so that we who were the first to hope in Christ might be to the praise of his glory.

Immutability

Job 23:10 But he is unchangeable, and who can turn him back? What he desires, that he does.

Mal. 3:6 "For I the LORD do not change; therefore you, O children of Jacob, are not consumed.

Application: Because God is not passible - that he does not have common affections assigned to him as we humans do, where our affections are the result of arousals or influences outside ourselves that actuate those potentials (e.g., love, anger, etc.) in us which God does not have, him being simple (not composed of parts, i.e., potencies waiting to be actualized), then God is pure act; he 13

Acts 17:26 - And he made from one man every nation of mankind to live on all the face of the earth, having determined allotted periods and the boundaries of their dwelling place, ²⁷ that they should seek God, and perhaps feel their way toward him and find him. Yet he is actually not far from each one of us, ²⁸ for “In him we live and move and have our being’; as even some of your own poets have said, “For we are indeed his offspring.’

God is everywhere, but not in a salvific manner. He's a lot closer than you realize. For it is in Him that we live and move and have our being. Act 17:28. God is far away, however, in another sense in that one's lips may praise him, but their hearts are far from him, Isa 29:13, And the Lord said: “Because this people draw near with their mouth and honor me with their lips, while their hearts are far from me,...” Now Deism says that God made everything, but he does not relate to his creatures; all of creation is just like a wound up clock left to run on its own while God is off in the distance only observing how things will shake out. Many of our founding fathers were Deists. In fact I think we came into the world with this line of thinking.

Jonathan Edwards: 1. That no notion of God's last end in the creation of the world, is agreeable to reason, which would truly imply any indigence, insufficiency, and mutability in God; or any dependence of the Creator on the creature, for any part of his perfection or happiness. Because it is evident, by both Scripture and reason, that God is infinitely, eternally, unchangeably, and independently glorious and happy: that he cannot be profited by, or receive anything from, the creature; or be the subject of any sufferings, or diminution of his glory and felicity, from any other being. The notion of God creating the world, in order to receive any thing properly from the creature, is not only contrary to the nature of God, but inconsistent with the notion of creation; which implies a being receiving its existence, and all that belongs to it, out of nothing. And this implies the most perfect, absolute, and universal derivation and dependence. Now, if the creature receives its ALL from God, entirely and perfectly, how is it possible that it should have anything to add to God, to make him in any respect more than he was before, and so the Creator become dependent on the creature?

Bavinck states:

He receives nothing, but only gives. All things need him; he needs nothing or nobody. He always aims at himself because he cannot rest in anything other than himself. Inasmuch as he himself is the absolutely good and perfect one, he may not love anything else except with a view to himself. He may not and cannot be content with less than absolute perfection. When he loves others, he loves himself in them: his own virtues, works, and gifts. For the same reason he is also blessed in himself as the sum of all goodness, of all perfection. Hermon Bavinck, Vol. 2 p 211]

Cornelius Van Til states:

Once more: Not only do all facts reveal God but they, in revealing him, manifest his attitude toward men. God is love. He loves himself above all else. He loved himself from all eternity when he had as yet made no creatures to love. But when he made creatures, he made them lovable like himself. He loved them because in loving them, he loved himself above all else. Pg 132 Common Grace & the Gospel

We are not autonomous, self-willed creatures!!! But we think we are and we come into this world thinking we are. Unregenerate man worships his own will. Note the words of John Flavel on this doctrine of concurrence:

“But still the pride of nature will not let men see the necessity of divine efficacious influences upon the will and the consistency thereof with natural liberty.” Pg 28 A Treatise on the Soul of Man

In other words man thinks he is independent of God, self-sufficient, self-willed; in fact, we act as if we are God. In other words man thinks he is independent of God, self-sufficient, self-willed; in fact, we act as if we are God. When you see this more clearly as you contemplate these passages it will transform your thinking on what we are truly like and what God is truly like. This is what Eve was tempted with, to decide for herself what was good or evil, thus declaring here independence from God, disregarding God’s law; and this has been the problem (or curse) with man since then! God punishes sin with sin; the sin that Eve was guilty of.

Ps 2:4, Why do the nations rage and the peoples plot in vain? ² The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the LORD and against his Anointed, saying, ³ “Let us burst their bonds apart and cast away their cords from us.” ⁴ He who sits in the heavens laughs; the Lord holds them in derision.

Rom. 1:24 - ²⁴ Therefore God gave them up in the lusts of their hearts to impurity, to the dishonoring of their bodies among themselves, ²⁵ because they exchanged the truth about God for a lie and worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed forever! Amen.

²⁸ And since they did not see fit to acknowledge God, God gave them up to a debased mind to do what ought not to be done. ²⁹ They were filled with all manner of unrighteousness, evil, covetousness, malice. They are full of envy, murder, strife, deceit, maliciousness. They are gossips, ³⁰ slanderers, haters of God, insolent, haughty, boastful, inventors of evil, disobedient to parents, ³¹ foolish, faithless, heartless, ruthless. ³² Though they know God's righteous decree that those who practice such things deserve to die, they not only do them but give approval to those who practice them.

John 6

³⁷ All that the Father gives me will come to me, and whoever comes to me I will never cast out.

⁴⁴ No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him. And I will raise him up on the last day.

⁶⁵ And he said, "This is why I told you that no one can come to me unless it is granted him by the Father."

Phil 1:29 - For it has been granted to you that for the sake of Christ you should not only believe in him but also suffer for his sake,

John 6:29 - ²⁹ Jesus answered them, "This is the work of God, that you believe in him whom he has sent."

Edwards on God's Promises vs. a Predictor repeated again for your learning!

§ 52. If it be as the Arminians suppose, that all men's virtue is of the determination of their own free will, independent on any prior determining, deciding, and disposing of the event; that it is no part of the ordering of God, whether there be many virtuous or few in the world, whether there shall be much virtue or little, or where it shall be, in what nation, country, or when, or in what generation or age; or whether there shall be any at all: then none of these things belong to God's disposal, and therefore, surely it does not belong to him to promise them. This is a great mystery as to how this all works, that God is sovereign over the wills of men yet rules and directs them without coercion; but it is true as many scriptures plainly demonstrate. See Ps. 110:3

¹This could be one reason why we must fear God, have a reverential awe of Him, for in Phil. 2:12b-13 it says, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; [why?] ¹³for it is God who works in you both to will and to do for His good pleasure.

The words of Thomas Watson in A Body of Divinity:

From Adam's sudden fall, learn how sad it is for a man to be left to himself. Adam being left to himself, fell. Oh then, what will become of us, how soon fall, if God should leave us to ourselves! A man without God's grace, left to himself, is like a ship in a storm, without pilot or anchor, and is ready to dash upon every rock. Make this prayer to God, 'Lord, do not leave me to myself. If Adam fell so soon who had strength, how soon shall I fall who have no strength!' [and are living in much worse times of temptation and corruption than Adam was before he fell – my insert] Oh! Urge God with this hand and seal, 'My strength shall be made perfect in weakness.' 2Cor 12:9

Ps 51:10-12 ¹⁰ Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me.

And in the end, we will cast our crowns before him for we will see that it was all Christ's works in us, for we are his workmanship...Eph. 2. See also Edwards' comment § 64 above.

Rev. 4:9 - ⁹ And whenever the living creatures give glory and honor and thanks to him who is seated on the throne, who lives forever and ever, ¹⁰ the twenty-four elders fall down before him who is seated on the throne and worship him who lives forever and ever. They cast their crowns before the throne, saying,

¹¹ "Worthy are you, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power,
for you created all things, and by your will they existed and were created."

This is one reason why we are so absolutely dependent upon God: If God ceased to exist, we would cease to exist. As Acts 17:28 says, for in Him we live and move and have our being.

Concurrence in The work of Conversion Seen in Ezek. 36:24-27, 11:19; Jer. 24:7, Deut. 30:6, Acts 16:14

Here you can see the will of God in converting his elect while at the same time the elect are not forced but come willingly - that they have new hearts that will love God. A forced love is impossible.

Ezek. 36

²⁴ I will take you from the nations and gather you from all the countries and bring you into your own land. ²⁵ I will sprinkle clean water on you, and you shall be clean from all your uncleannesses, and from all your idols I will cleanse you. ²⁶ And I will give you a new heart, and a new spirit I will put within you. And I will remove the heart of stone from your flesh and give you a heart of flesh. ²⁷ And I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes and be careful to obey my rules.

¹⁹ And I will give them one heart, and a new spirit I will put within them. I will remove the heart of stone from their flesh and give them a heart of flesh, ²⁰ that they may walk in my statutes and keep my rules and obey them. And they shall be my people, and I will be their God.

Jer. 24

⁷ I will give them a heart to know that I am the LORD, and they shall be my people and I will be their God, for they shall return to me with their whole heart.

Deut. 30

⁶ And the LORD your God will circumcise your heart and the heart of your offspring, so that you will love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul, that you may live.

Prior to Deut. 30:6, God commands them in verse 10:16, ¹⁶ Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your heart, and be no longer stubborn. knowing that without his saving grace they cannot and will not do it; so in verse 30:6, God says that he will do it. But the key is that he does it without doing violence their liberty, but by a secret efficacy of the Spirit that changes the will, the heart. This is seen the conversion of Lydia in Acts 16:14, “The Lord opened her heart to pay attention to what was said by Paul. ¹⁵ And after she was baptized,” Just like God who put it into the heart of Titus the same earnest care and then Titus being himself very earnest went to them of his own accord. (2Cor. 8:16-17) So it is with our conversion; God who works in us to will and to work for his good pleasure. He works within us and we come of our own accord, i.e., willingly and wholeheartedly, not by compulsion. God promises that all his elect will be saved; not one of them lost and yet none are forced to believe. That is the mystery as to how all this actually happens. We know or understand this mystery; we believe it, but we cannot comprehend it, but we do get clearer and clearer understandings of it.

Acts 4:27-28

Here in acts 4 you see God’s eternal decree predestinating certain things to happen (God’s sovereignty over the wills of men) and yet what they did was not forced upon them; they did it of their own accord, very similar to the Assyrians in Isaiah 10. This is amazing, which is the effect of a mystery - to generate adoration, reverential awe, and worship and a thirst for more understandings of it.

...for truly in this city there were gathered together against your holy servant Jesus, whom you anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, along with the Gentiles and the peoples of Israel, to do whatever your hand and your plan had predestined to take place. Acts 4:27-28 ESV

Ps. 139:16-17

Your eyes saw my unformed substance; in your book were written, every one of them, the days that were formed for me, when as yet there was none of them. How precious to me are your thoughts, O God! How vast is the sum of them!

2Kings 7:3-

³ Now there were four men who were lepers^[c] at the entrance to the gate. And they said to one another, "Why are we sitting here until we die? ⁴ If we say, 'Let us enter the city,' the famine is in the city, and we shall die there. And if we sit here, we die also. So now come, let us go over to the camp of the Syrians. If they spare our lives we shall live, and if they kill us we shall but die." ⁵ So they arose at twilight to go to the camp of the Syrians. But when they came to the edge of the camp of the Syrians, behold, there was no one there. ⁶ For the Lord had made the army of the Syrians hear the sound of chariots and of horses, the sound of a great army, so that they said to one another, "Behold, the king of Israel has hired against us the kings of the Hittites and the kings of Egypt to come against us." ⁷ So they fled away in the twilight and abandoned their tents, their horses, and their donkeys, leaving the camp as it was, and fled for their lives.

Does God Suffer

God as Actus Purus

(pure act)

Pg 120 - 128

My comments in [\[blue\]](#)

Having just argued that the Christian doctrine of the Trinity demands that the divine persons be immutably and impassibly who they are, not in a stagnant or inert manner, but in a way that is supremely dynamic and supremely relational, I now want to put forth the purely philosophical reasons for why God is immutable and impassible. Because these arguments are solely philosophical in nature, and thus according to reason, and not founded upon revelation, they will concern the one God rather than the Trinity since reason alone cannot establish that God is a trinity of persons. However, as we will see, what is established through revelation and doctrine is reinforced and in accord with what can be grasped by reason, and vice-versa.

The Christian biblical and patristic tradition holds that God is almighty, all-powerful, all-perfect, eternal, immutable, and impassible. But what is it about the very nature of God which demands that he possess these and similar attributes? Here I would argue, in accordance with Aquinas

, that God's nature is 'to be', that he is ipsum esse (to-be itself) and thus, actus purus (pure act). In order to understand what it means for God to be 'to-be itself' it is first necessary to discern the meaning of esse (to be) with regards to finite beings.

In finite beings Aquinas makes a distinction between what something is, its essence or quiddity, and that something is. 'I can know, for instance, what a man or a phoenix is and still be ignorant whether it has being or reality. From this it is clear that being is other than essence or quiddity, unless perhaps there is a reality whose quiddity is its being. Thus, for Aquinas, esse is that act by which something actually does exist. Esse (to be) is a verb and as such does not possess any quiddity, but purely specifies the act by which something exists and so is the foundation of all subsequent actions performed by the existing being.¹⁸ ¹⁸Because esse has not quiddity it cannot be conceptualized by the mind. Being a verb, esse designates action as do all verbs, but here it specifies that act by which a being is and without which it would not be. For Aquinas 'a being is said to be in as much as it possesses being (esse)'. Thus esse is the basis of all subsequent actions.

G Phelan writes:

Things which 'have being' are not 'just there' (Dasein) like lumps of static essence, inert, immovable, unprogressive, and unchanging. The act of existence (esse) is not a state, it is an act, the act of all acts, and therefore, must be understood as act and not as any static and definable object of conception. Esse is dynamic impulse, energy, act – the first, the most persistent and enduring of all dynamisms, all energies, all acts. 'The Existentialism of St. Thomas,' Selective Paper, ed. AG Kirn 1967

While esse (to be) and essentia (quiddity) are distinct in that esse possesses no quiddity and essentia possesses not esse, yet they are not realities in themselves. Rather, only beings actually exist and so esse and essentia are related to one another, for Aquinas, in an act-potency relationship. Esse makes to be what potentially is and potentially what is only is because of esse.²⁰

²⁰Aquinas states: ‘That in which act is present is a potentiality, since act, as such is referred to potentiality. Therefore, in every created substance there is potentiality and act.’ [This is key; all created things are composites – actuality and potential actuality, aka, passive potency. God is not a composite being, hence simple, hence the term divine simplicity. See code306; see potentiality on the second page]

Because esse and essentia are distinct within finite reality, no finite being, whether it be a man, dog, or star, is of such a nature that its nature demand that it be. Therefore, Aquinas argues that the esse of finite creatures must come from an extrinsic cause.²¹

²¹Aquinas states:

Whatever belongs to a thing is either caused by the principles of its nature...or comes to it from an extrinsic principle...Now being itself cannot be caused by the form or quiddity of a thing (by ‘caused’ I mean by an efficient cause) because that thing would then be its own cause and it would bring itself into being, which is impossible. It follows that everything whose being is distinct from its nature must have being from another. De Ente et Essentia

‘There must be a reality that is the cause of being for all things, because it is pure being (esse tantum). If this were not so, one would go on to infinity in causes, for everything that is not pure being has a cause of its being.’ [In other words, ‘the metaphysical buck has to stop somewhere.’ Edward Feser] This being who is pure esse is ‘the first cause of God.’ Aquinas’ understanding of God as pure esse is founded upon what esse is in creatures. God must be pure esse for this is what finite being lack, and what they must be given if they are to be. If God were not pure esse, he would be in the same situation as creatures and so be in need of esse himself. While finite beings are composite beings in which their essence and esse are in an act-potency relationship, God, whose very nature is to be, ipsum esse, is not composite, and ‘therefore his essence is his existence,’ that is, his very nature or quiddity is ‘to be’ and nothing more.

What must be grasped and remembered, something which Aquinas’ critics never seem to do, is that esse is an act, that esse is a verb.²⁴

²⁴D. Burrell states that to say God is ipsum esse or actus purus is to say that ‘God’s essence is to exist, more precisely as: “to be God is to be to-be.”’

Being pure act (pure verb) as ipsum esse does not mean that God is something fully in act, such as a creature might actualize its full potential, but rather that God is act pure and simple. Because God is ipsum esse he has no self-constituting potency which needs to be actualized in order for him to be more fully who he is, not because he is something fully in act, but again, because he is act pure and simple. God is actus purus.²⁵

²⁵Aquinas argues that his understanding of God as ipsum esse and actus purus is totally in keeping with the biblical revelation that God is 'He Who Is' (Exod. 3:14). 'He who Is' is the most proper name of God 'For it does not signify form, but simply existence itself. Hence since the existence of God is his essence itself, which can be said of no other, it is clear that among the other names this one specially denotes God, for everything is denominated by its form. 1. Because God's name is 'he Who Is' and thus specifies that his essence is 'to be,' he is unknowable for human beings cannot conceive what pure being is. To know that the proper name of God is to-be (ipsum esse) is different from knowing what to be to-be is or means. Thus Aquinas' understanding of God is totally in keeping with the biblical understanding. For God in revealing his name as 'He Who Is,' has also revealed that he is unknowable.

Because God is actus purus it is evident why God is all-perfect, and thus immutable. If 'esse [to be] is the actuality of all acts, and on account of this is the perfection of all perfections,' then God as actus purus 'must needs be most actual, and therefore most perfect; for a thing is perfect in proportion to its state of actuality, because we call that perfect which lacks nothing of the mode of its perfection. God is then perfect not because he has perfected all his potential, but, being ipsum esse [to be itself], he is perfection itself.

This is why God is immutable. Because God is pure act it is impossible for him to acquire more perfection through some change which would make him more actual. 'Everything which is in any way changed, is in some way potentiality. Hence it is evident that it is impossible for God to be in any way changeable.' Being pure act, God possesses 'all the plenitude of perfection of all being. He cannot acquire anything new' through change, that is, by actualizing some potential.²⁷ [Doctrines of divine simplicity: God is one pure divine essence, not a composite being composed of actuality and potential actuality (an act-potency relationship) in which the potentials can be actualized by something or someone outside himself as humans are so affected or moved upon.] While the attribute of immutability is a negative attribute, it is founded on something that is entirely positive – God Being pure act or being itself. God is immutable not because his is static, inert, or inactive, but precisely because he, as pure act, is supremely active and dynamic and cannot ontologically become more in act. As M. Dodds states.

The true significance of the attribute of divine immutability in the theology of St. Thomas consists, not in the fact that it indicates the invariable self-identity of god, but in the fact that it indicates the dynamic and boundless perfection of God as ipsum esse subsistens Far from implying, therefore, that God may be somehow static or inert, the attribute of immutability directly signifies that God, as pure esse is pure dynamic actuality.

God then is supremely immutable because he is supremely in act.

The problem is that all critics of Aquinas and the Christian tradition consistently interpret divine immutability in a positive manner, as if to say that God is immutable is to conceive him as static and inert. As was noted earlier, Barth [see code498] gives one of the most striking accounts of this understanding when he states that if God were absolutely immutable, he would be utterly immobile and lifeless, and thus God would be death.

Dodds, in what is by far the best comprehensive study on Aquinas' understanding of divine immutability, comments on this misinterpretation by noting that 'it is quite possible for us to assume that when immutability is predicated of God, it is that creaturely sort of immutability, whose image is present in our imagination, which is intended. The result of such an assumption is, as we have seen, usually a monstrous image of the unchanging God.'

²⁷Aquinas also writes: 'All motion or mutation, in whatever way it is predicated, results from some potentiality since motion is the act of something existing in potency. Therefore, since God is pure act, having no admixture of potency, there cannot be any change in him.' [my comment: humans and all other created are compounded things consisting in passive potency and actuality; they are compounded things as opposed to God who is not; he is simple, one divine essence, not compounded in his essence, not being made up of things, i.e., without parts, hence God is pure act or pure actuality. There is nothing in him (potency) that can be moved upon (hence God cannot suffer or undergo anything from without himself) to cause him to alter his actuality, his state of being, e.g., to make him change, to be more happy or less happy, or suffer any emotion as is the case with us humans who are not simple. You will see that the doctrine of divine simplicity, immutability, impassibility, eternity and perfection are all interdependent and cannot be separated. You try to pull out one of these threads of truth and the whole garment will unravel.]

Owen, on God's love, is an act of his will, not a passible passion of love, I will have mercy on whom I have mercy...from the council of his own will, not from outside influence.

G. Grisez argues that because one holds that God is immutable, it does not follow that he is 'standing still, fixed, inert, or rigid.' Moreover, to say that God 'is not affected by man's suffering and stops with this negation, one strongly suggests that he is cold and unconcerned about evil. One must negate of God everything descriptive of entities given in experience.

I state in Does God Change?

One should not be misled into thinking that God's immutability is like the immutability of a rock only more so. What God and rocks appear to have in common is only the fact that they do not change. The reason for their unchangeableness is for polar-opposite reasons...God is unchangeable not because he is inert or static like a rock, but for just the opposite reason. He is so dynamic, so active that no change can make him more active. He is act pure and simple.

This should be kept in mind when one considers process theology or any other theology that predicates change in God in order to make him more dynamic. In making God mutable, process theology's notion of God has more in common with rocks than does Aquinas' notion of God.

What the critics consistently fail to grasp is that God's immutability is not opposed to his vitality. Nor need one hold together in some dialectical fashion his immutability and his vibrancy, as if in spite of being immutable he is nonetheless dynamic. Rather, it is precisely God's immutability as actus purus that guarantees and authenticates his pure vitality and absolute dynamism. Thus, when the critics assert that because Aquinas and the tradition believe God to be immutable they espouse a static and inert conception of god, they but demonstrate their own lack of understanding.

Aquinas did not treat impassibility when considering the various attributes of God within his two Summae. It arises primarily in the context of discussing God's willing and loving. The objection is raised: 'It seems that love does not exist in God. For in God there are no passions. Now love is a passion. Therefore love is not in God.' Obviously, Aquinas wants to hold that God does love and does so supremely. He therefore distinguishes between passion and love within human beings and love (without passibility) within God.

In response to the above objection Aquinas argues that passion in human beings pertains to the will and to the objects toward which the will tends. The will tends toward the good as an object known and so loved. In human beings the knowledge of a thing as good arouse the sensitive appetite (pertaining to the senses) with its concomitant sensible emotion, which in turn motivates the will to desire and obtain the good as loved. For example, I come to know someone and in so doing I find him or her to be good and attractive. This knowledge arouses within me thoughts and feelings of love and affection and so my will desires to express this love in the hope of becoming friends with the person. For Aquinas, this process, this arousal of the sensitive appetite through sensitive knowledge with its concomitant sensible emotion by a known and loved good is passion. 'Therefore acts of the sensitive appetite, inasmuch as they have annexed to them some bodily change, are called passions.’ In human beings then passion denotes a twofold change. First, through knowledge of a know good the sensitive appetite is aroused, which carries with it a sensible bodily emotional change; and second, the will is thus motivated and moved to desire and obtain the good as loved.³⁷

³⁷ Since this process is the activating of the intellect and the will to desire and obtain a known good as loved, it exemplifies, for Aquinas, an act-potency relationship which therefore marks a change.

In contrast God does not undergo this passible process. God is not corporeal and so does not possess sensitive knowledge or a sensitive appetite. ‘Therefore, there is no passion in God.’³⁸

³⁸ Aquinas further states:

Moreover, every passion of the appetite takes place through some bodily change, for example, the contraction or distension of the heart, or something of the sort. Now, none of this can take place in God, since he is not a body or a power in a body [simplicity: he is one pure simple essence, not of parts, metaphysical or physical]...There is therefore no passion of the appetite in him.

However, God does possess intellect and will. God, being pure act, knows and wills in the one act that he himself is. While God does not then possess an sensitive intellect and a sensitive appetite, both of which pertain to human knowing or willing as a corporeal being, God does possess and intellectual appetite in that his will is focused on the known good [himself!] and so loved. Therefore, ‘there are certain passions which, though they do not befit God as passions, do not signify anything by the nature of their species that is repugnant to the divine perfection. [Aquinas] What Aquinas means here is that there are human passions which are not contrary to the nature of God but, because he possesses them not through a passible process but as part of his unchanging nature, they are not passions, strictly speaking, within him.

Aquinas can equally state that ‘Love, therefore, and joy and delight are passions, [but] in so far as they denote acts of the intellectual appetite they are not passions. It is in this latter sense that they are in God.’⁴²

What has become evident from the above discussion is that Aquinas, in denying passion in God, is simply denying of God the passible and so changing process which is inherent within human passion. Thus there is no passion in God, not in the sense that he does not love, but because, being pure act, there is no need to and arousal of his will to love the good and so to come to desire the good and rejoice in it. [That is KEY! God cannot be made to care more or love more that he does in his perfect immutable unboundedness, etc. All things are done by the council of his own will, not the council of anything outside himself! He already loves you without you having to convince him or do anything to merit his favor, e.g., he has always loved the church, an eternal love. So that the love that moved the Father to elect some was not the passible passion, but an act of his will seen in Romans 9: "I will have mercy on whomever I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whomever I will have compassion." ¹⁶ So then it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy. Romans 9:15-16] God's arousal to the good as loved, and so rejoicing and delighting in it, is eternally and perfectly in act.⁴³

⁴³In the Summa Contra Gentiles Aquinas states that 'there must be love in God according to the act of his will.'

If there were changeable and passible passions within God, as there are found in human beings, it would mean that he is not fully loving for he would have to actualize further 'loving' potential. This is why Aquinas states that God 'loves without passion.' This only means that he loves without undergoing the passible processes and changes that are inherent within human love. While God is not passionate in the sense that there are passible passionate changes within him, he can be said, although Aquinas does not say this, to be passionate in the sense that his will is fully and wholly fixed on the good as loved. Being fully in act his love is fully in act and therefore his passion is fully in act. God cannot become more passionate or loving by actualizing, as human beings do, some further potential and so become more passionate or loving. God is supremely passionate because he is supremely loving and he is both because both are fully in act since God is ipsum esse [to be itself] is pure act. This is why 'God is love' (1Jn 4:6). God would not be simply love if he were not pure love in act, and thus absolute passion in act. God is impassible precisely because he is supremely passionate and cannot become any more passionate. [M Dodds speaks of 'the dynamic stillness' of God's immutable love.] God simply loves himself and all things in himself in the one act which he himself is.

The Nature of God Proves Free Grace

Code434

The nature of God proves all grace, special and common, must be freely given by God and not owed to the creature; it necessarily follows that election has to be true and cannot be otherwise.

Notes on the Doctrine of God and & God's Delights in His Glory

By G Clark

See also code438

The nature of God, his immutability, impassibility, simplicity, sovereignty, etc., proves unconditional election. For if God is unchangeable, then there was never a time where he did not intend to save particular persons. He always was intending to save his elect. For if he was waiting [in time] to see if someone was going to believe in him all the while being neutral at best whether he was going to save him or not (or just wishing to save them) and then he would intend to save him, infers a change in his will, and infers that God depends upon the creature causing a change in His being or actuality. God would be somewhat moved upon by the creature. But this cannot happen in God; he is not moved upon by anything; he is self-moved (divine impassibility) as well as that there is no change in God, he is immutable – God's will does not undergo change. He is not dependent upon the will of the creature not only because God cannot undergo change but also is contradictory to the nature of God as being self-sufficient, sovereign and simple, Romans 11:34-35 –

"For who has known the mind of the LORD?

Or who has become His counselor?"

³⁵ "Or who has first given to Him

And it shall be repaid to him?"

So God being purely active (or purely actual - divine simplicity: not composed of active and passive potency as creatures are), he has always loved the church, the elect, from the counsel of his own will and hence Scripture accommodates this profound truth of a pure act, the act of God's eternal will in election, choosing to love, to the capacity of our understanding by the words choosing, election, electing, etc. (See Edwards' comments on this below) God has always loved the church in this manner, clearly pointing to his immutability, simplicity and impassibility, and sovereignty. (e.g., Ps103:17, But the steadfast love of the LORD is from everlasting to everlasting... Also Jer. 31:3, I have loved you with an everlasting love;] but others, he never knew them, Matt. 7:21-23, *And then I will declare to them, 'I never knew you; depart from Me, [the verb knew or to know is to show saving favor, the fruit of the divine love of the Father] For the love of God, the foundation of election, is* an act of God's will, and hence is freely given, not founded upon the common affection which is the result of being acted upon or moved by something outside himself which is impossible with God (divine impassibility, self-sufficiency, etc.); on the contrary, God says that I will have mercy on whomever I will have mercy, Romans 9:15.

God cannot be actualized (changed into a new state of being, new states of affection, or have a new thought or change of his will by another entity or agent outside himself since there is no passive potency in God to be actualized because he is a purely actual (divine simplicity: not composed of passive and active potency as humans are and therefore liable to change to a different state of being); he is THE cause without a cause, and hence, God's immutability, impassibility; the two are inseparable, the latter flowing from the former. God's impassibility means that God does not undergo change by anything or agent. God cannot receive anything from the creature but is always giving and sustaining; he is self-sufficient, perfect, infinite and boundless in his being. "God is not someone who is done unto. He only gives but does not receive," "He does not receive new actuality of being from creatures or from others."

[James Dolezal, God Without Passions – YouTube video]. Job 35:4-8

God is the first cause in everything not the second; God is not the great Responder as Edwards notes. In other words he is already predisposed, or of a mind to save his elect irrespective of their works (hence his eternal decree of election, his good pleasure). So the sinner's prayer is at best superfluous, and at worse, a wicked presumption. In other words, God's actuality, the state of his mind toward the creature, cannot change from neutral to determinative to save due to one's prayer. Free grace, to be free, is wholly of God's sovereign will alone, to have mercy on whom he'll have mercy, as Paul says in Rom. 9:16, "So then it depends not on human will or exertion, but on God, who has mercy." Free grace excludes all human boasting. Eph. 2:8-10; Rom. 11:6

Edwards explains, in this instance, regarding prayer:

It is not in order that God may be informed of our wants or desires. He is omniscient, and with respect to his knowledge unchangeable. God never gains any knowledge by information. He knows what we want, a thousand times more perfectly than we do ourselves, before we ask him. For though, speaking after the manner of men, God is sometimes represented as if he were moved and persuaded by the prayers of his people; yet it is not to be thought that God is properly moved or made willing by our prayers; for it is no more possible that there should be any new inclination or will in God, than new knowledge. The mercy of God is not moved or drawn by any thing in the creature; but the spring of God's beneficence is within himself only; he is self-moved; and whatsoever mercy he bestows, the reason and ground of it is not to be sought for in the creature, but in God's own good pleasure. It is the will of God to bestow mercy in this way, viz. in answer to prayer, when he designs beforehand to bestow mercy, yea, when he has promised it; as Ezek. 36:35, 37, "I the Lord have spoken it, and will do it. Thus saith the Lord, I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them." God has been pleased to constitute prayer to be antecedent to the bestowment of mercy; and he is pleased to bestow mercy in consequence of prayer, as though he were prevailed on by prayer.--When the people of God are stirred up to prayer, it is the effect of his intention to show mercy; therefore he pours out the spirit of grace and supplication.

There may be two reasons given why God requires prayer in order to the bestowment of mercy; one especially respects God, and the other respects ourselves.

1. With respect to God, prayer is but a sensible acknowledgment of our dependence on him to his glory. As he hath made all things for his own glory, so he will be glorified and acknowledged by his creatures; and it is fit that he should require this of those who would be the subjects of his mercy. That we, when we desire to receive any mercy from him, should humbly supplicate the Divine Being for the bestowment of that mercy, is but a suitable acknowledgment of our dependence on the power and mercy of God for that which we need, and but a suitable honour paid to the great Author and Fountain of all good.

2. With respect to ourselves, God requires prayer of us in order to the bestowment of mercy, because it tends to prepare us for its reception. Fervent prayer many ways tends to prepare the heart. Hereby is excited a sense of our need, and of the value of the mercy which we seek, and at the same time earnest desires for it; whereby the mind is more prepared to prize it, to rejoice in it when bestowed, and to be thankful for it. Prayer, with suitable confession, may excite a sense of our unworthiness of the mercy we seek; and the placing of ourselves in the immediate presence of God, may make us sensible of his majesty, and in a sense fit to receive mercy of him. Our prayer to God may excite in us a suitable sense and consideration of our dependence on God for the mercy we ask, and a suitable exercise of faith in God's sufficiency, that so we may be prepared to glorify his name when the mercy is received.

Goodness of God - Love of God Happiness of heaven. God stands in no need of creatures, and is not profited by them; neither can his happiness be said to be added to by the creature. But yet God has a real and proper delight in the excellency and happiness of his creatures: he hath a real delight in the excellency and loveliness of the creature, in his own image in the creature, as that is a manifestation, or expression, or shining forth of his own loveliness. God has a real delight in his own loveliness, and he also has a real delight in the shining forth, or glorifying of it. As it is a fit and condecant thing that God's glory should shine forth, so God delights in its shining forth. So that God has a real delight in the spiritual loveliness of the saints; which delight is not a delight distinct from what he has in himself, but is to be resolved into the delight he has in himself; for he delights in his image in the creature, as he delights in his own being glorified; or as he delights in it, that his own glory shines forth, and so he hath real proper delight in the happiness of his creatures, which also is not distinct from the delight that he has in himself, for it is to be resolved into the delight that he has in his own goodness; for as he delights in his own goodness, so he delights in the exercise of his goodness, and therefore he delights to make the creature happy, and delights to see him made happy, as he delights in exercising goodness, or communicating happiness. This is no proper addition to the happiness of God, because it is that which he eternally and unalterably had. God hath no new delight when he beholds his own glory shining forth in his image in the creature, and when he beholds the creature made happy from the exercises of his goodness; because those and all things are from eternity equally present with God. This delight in God cannot properly be said to be received from the creature, because it consists only in a delight in giving to the creature; neither will it hence follow that God is dependent on the creature for any of his joy, because it is his own act only that this delight is dependent on, and the creature is absolutely dependent on God for that excellency and happiness that God delights in. God cannot be said to be the more happy for the creature, because he is infinitely happy in himself, and he is not dependent on the creature for any thing, nor does he receive any addition from the creature. But yet in one sense it can be truly said that God has the more delight for the loveliness and happiness of the creature, viz. as God would be less happy if he were less good, or if it were possible for him to be hindered in exercising his own goodness, or to be hindered from glorifying himself. God has no addition to his happiness, when he exercises any act of holiness towards his creatures; and yet God has a real delight in the exercises of his own holiness, and would be less happy if he were less holy, or were capable of being hindered from any act of holiness.

A Summary

Divine Impassibility, Simplicity, Immutability, Perfection, Eternality, and Self-sufficiency

By G Clark

God speaks to us in Scripture as though he were a man so as to accommodate the knowledge of himself to our limited capacity. If he spoke in 'God talk' to us we would never understand him so he must babble to us as a father would speak to his new born baby. So scripture is rightly stated, though improperly assigns body parts to God such as a nose or arm and assigns to him attributes as though these things are parts of God or make up God. Neither of these things are properly of God or in God for God is one divine essence, not consisting of parts, metaphysical or physical. If he were, then he would be dependent upon something that is not God, more fundamental than Himself, for him to be God, as well as dependent upon the entity that put those parts together in the first place, which would mean that we should be worshipping that person and not God! And because God is not composed of any kind of parts (he is not a composite being as humans are) he is pure act. In other words, he is not composed of actuality and potential actuality or passive potency. There are no parts in him that are dormant so to speak, that are awaiting for some outside cause to cause those parts (potencies) to actualize, like love for instance. So, we cannot cause God to love us or care for us, for being pure act, his care is unbounded and freely given and thus cannot be made more than it is. He already loves you with an unbounded perfect love. You'll have to meditate on that. His perfection demands this too; for nothing can be added to God nor cause God to be more than he is. He is love; He is justice... He just is! referring to his name, I AM. He isn't I AM and I WAS and will BECOME. He is not increasing in love or becoming something he wasn't before as time goes on because that would infer that he has potencies in him that are continually being actualized by causes outside himself and that he is not eternal but in time and hence a creature like us. But only creatures are subject to these things. Also, he being self-sufficient, he needs nothing from the creature to cause him to do anything. God cannot receive anything from the creature for he lacks nothing; he is perfect. If he could be added to, then he was not God. Romans 11:35, ³⁵ "Or who has first given to Him And it shall be repaid to him?" Now you can begin to understand Paul's reaction to God's purposes in Romans 11:

³³ Oh, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments and His ways past finding out!

³⁴ "For who has known the mind of the LORD?
Or who has become His counselor?"

³⁵ "Or who has first given to Him
And it shall be repaid to him?"

³⁶ For of Him and through Him and to Him are all things, to whom be glory forever.
Amen.

Now read Jonathan Edwards' comment on God's nature:

The notion of God creating the world, in order to receive any thing properly from the creature, is not only contrary to the nature of God, but inconsistent with the notion of creation; which implies a being receiving its existence, and all that belongs to it, out of nothing. And this implies the most perfect, absolute, and universal derivation and dependence. Now, if the creature receives its ALL from God, entirely and perfectly, how is it possible that it should have anything to add to God, to make him in any respect more than he was before, and so the Creator become dependent on the creature?¹

Now, impassibility, immutability, God's perfection and eternity all are related to his simplicity; they are all threads in a fabric, neither of which can be removed without destroying the whole garment.

God is eternal; he transcends time. Time is that period between changes which only has to do with all created things. Man is a created being. And being created, he is mutable, that is, he is subject to changes in his state of being happy to sad, to be caused to love, or to seek revenge, etc., which is why we have affections; we are affected by things outside ourselves. We are filled with passive potencies waiting to be aroused; hence we are passible. But God, being simple, not composite, is not so, hence, cannot be affected, i.e., changed. He does not undergo anything. He is without succession. He is pure act. He is love, he is mercy, etc. So the prosperity movement and the sinner's prayer are all presumption, trying to get God to be affected with our acts. Now God does say to pray for things, but with a proper mindset, having an understanding of who God really is and not just a genie in a bottle...it is his will to be done, not our will. Now you can see more clearly James 4:13

¹³ Come now, you who say, "Today or tomorrow we will go to such and such a city, spend a year there, buy and sell, and make a profit"; ¹⁴ whereas you do not know what will happen tomorrow. For what is your life? It is even a vapor that appears for a little time and then vanishes away. ¹⁵ Instead you ought to say, "If the Lord wills, we shall live and do this or that." ¹⁶ But now you boast in your arrogance. All such boasting is evil.

This subject of pure act is amazing; it is pure because there are no parts in God, i.e., no passive potencies or things that can be actualized (and hence change in God) as they are in creatures. So now, apply this to John 3:16. What love is this describing? Is it a common love like we humans have that is caused in him by outward appearances, etc. Or is it a divine love that passes knowledge, that is, an act of his will (as Owen and others put it). God is not responding to the creature as though he is loveable, because we are not loveable; we were dead in sin, haters of God, self-willed stubborn and selfish. For as John said in 1John 4, We love because he first loved us. Or in Romans 9 where God is said to have loved Jacob before he had done anything good or evil:

¹⁰ And not only this, but when Rebecca also had conceived by one man, even by our father Isaac ¹¹ (for the children not yet being born, nor having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works but of Him who calls), ¹² it was said to her, "The older shall serve the younger." ¹³ As it is written, "Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated."

And so, the act of his will is seen in Romans 9:15

¹⁵ For He says to Moses, "I will have mercy on whomever I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whomever I will have compassion." ¹⁶ So then it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy.

In this sense, his love and mercy has to be freely given; freely as opposed to caused, coerced or bribed by something or someone outside himself (divine simplicity); God is not a debtor, he owes no one anything. This is one reason why the sinner's prayer is presumption; salvation is received; it happens to you due to God's good pleasure; his freedom to choose to love whom he will. All the heresies of the world hinge on a misunderstanding or rejection of God's freedom to do as he pleases and hence they despise it. It threatens their supposed autonomy, man's declaration of his independence from God, and so that's why you have all these religions of the world saying that you can come to God by your own will, by your own stock and furniture and that God is obligated to oblige. The freewillers and unregenerate men in general are offended when you mention the doctrines of predestination, election or man's bondage to sin because this is a direct condemnation of them on this key issue. Their first response is, "Well, God gave us free will" as though man is an autonomous being independent of God's sovereign control; that it's not fair that God do violence to our liberty (which is a total misunderstanding of how God does rule over the wills of men.), that God has no right to rule over them. Roman Catholicism is built on the concept of sacramentalism, where man has devised many ways to curry God's favor. All this is a desperate attempt to maintain man's supposed autonomy.

Now, you do believe of your own accord, but this is a gift and not of yourselves, Eph. 2:8-9. So being that God is pure act, this act of his will, that flows from this truth, is from himself alone, from the council of his own will according to his good pleasure (same thing) and not a reaction to anything outside himself which, in that case, would make it a passible love, not impassible. It is not that God is not loving or that he is some inert, static, metaphysical iceberg. It's the opposite; because his love is impassible, it is uncaused, without limit, unbounded, and perfect. It does not depend upon your performance, etc. He cannot love more than he does now which is unbounded, for how can you add to unboundedness? He cannot love you or care for you more than he does now. This passes knowledge.

So when God created mutable creatures, time was a necessary concomitant. Since all creatures are mutable, time is the distance between successive changes. One reason why God is immutable is because there are no succession or changes in God – there is no past or present with God, hence he cannot change since time is the distance between successive changes. So we as creatures cannot cause God to change in any fashion.

On Prayer: Even though God says to pray for things and God is said to respond to these prayers, this again, is God speaking to us in baby talk, for God's state of being is not caused to change by anything outside himself. Then why does he ask us to pray? See Edwards' comment on this:

It is not in order that God may be informed of our wants or desires. He is omniscient, and with respect to his knowledge unchangeable. God never gains any knowledge by information. He knows what we want, a thousand times more perfectly than we do ourselves, before we ask him. For though, speaking after the manner of men, God is sometimes represented as if he were moved and persuaded by the prayers of his people; yet it is not to be thought that God is properly moved or made willing by our prayers; for it is no more possible that there should be any new inclination or will in God, than new knowledge. The mercy of God is not moved or drawn by any thing in the creature; but the spring of God's beneficence is within himself only; he is self-moved; and whatsoever mercy he bestows, the reason and ground of it is not to be sought for in the creature, but in God's own good pleasure. It is the will of God to bestow mercy in this way, namely, in answer to prayer, when he designs beforehand to bestow mercy, yea, when he has promised it; as Ezek. 36:35, 37, "I the Lord have spoken it, and will do it. Thus saith the Lord, I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them." God has been pleased to constitute prayer to be antecedent to the bestowment of mercy; and he is pleased to bestow mercy in consequence of prayer, as though he were prevailed on by prayer.--When the people of God are stirred up to prayer, it is the effect of his intention to show mercy; therefore he pours out the spirit of grace and supplication.

Now you can see the wicked and presumptuous nature of the Arminians or Pelagians in their approach to how one is converted, to be saved. They think that God is like man in that we can actualize some potential in God, an affection of love and mercy for instance, to cause God to save them. They believe that God is passible as opposed to impassible. They believe that you can convince God via the sinner's prayer to have mercy on you,... to come into your heart, etc. So why didn't Jesus tell Nicodemus that in John 3, when Nicodemus asked how to attain eternal life? See John 3:3-

³ Jesus answered and said to him, "Most assuredly, I say to you, unless one is born ^aagain, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

⁵ Jesus answered, "Most assuredly, I say to you, unless one is born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God. ⁶ That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. ⁷ Do not marvel that I said to you, 'You must be born again.' ⁸ The wind blows where it wishes, and you hear the sound of it, but cannot tell where it comes from and where it goes. So is everyone who is born of the Spirit."

⁹ Nicodemus answered and said to Him, "How can these things be?"

Basically, Jesus tells him, the wind blows where it wishes. In other words, just like Paul said in Romans 9, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy. It's not by your will, e.g., your Arminian prayer or what you do, e.g., Roman Catholic sacramentalism, that moves God to save you, for God is unmoved; he is the cause without a cause, the Unmoved Mover. All things are done by the council of his will, Eph. 1:11,

¹¹ In Him also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestined according to the purpose of Him who works all things according to the counsel of His will,

Regarding this wicked presumption noted above, read Ps 50:16-

¹⁶ But to the wicked God says:

*"What right have you to declare My statutes,
Or take My covenant in your mouth, [there's the presumption!!]*

¹⁷ Seeing you hate instruction

And cast My words behind you? [There's man's depraved nature, the fountain of presumption]

¹⁸ When you saw a thief, you consented^{sq} with him,

And have been a partaker with adulterers.

¹⁹ You give your mouth to evil,

And your tongue frames deceit.

²⁰ You sit and speak against your brother;

You slander your own mother's son.

²¹ These things you have done, and I kept silent;

You thought that I was altogether like you; [there's man's ignorance of God's true nature]

But I will rebuke you,

And set them in order before your eyes.

²² "Now consider this, you who forget God,

Lest I tear you in pieces,

And there be none to deliver:

²³ Whoever offers praise glorifies Me;

And to him who orders his conduct aright

I will show the salvation of God."

The truth is we are passive in our conversion. We do nothing to warrant God's favor. As Jesus told Nicodemus, you must be born again [there's the passivity noted: something happens to us]. You can see this in John 1:12 & Isa. 65:1:

¹² But as many as received Him, to them He gave the ^{sq}right to become children of God, to those who believe in His name: ¹³who were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. Jn. 1:12-13

"I was sought by those who did not ask for Me;

I was found by those who did not seek Me. Isa. 65:1

This is why God's love for the church, the elect is totally from the council of his own will, that is, an act of his will and not from an affection in God (a passive potency in God that needs to be actualized) because there are no passive potencies in God to be actualized!! He is one divine essence and pure act. All that is in God is God, not a bunch of metaphysical parts. This is heavy; in one sense I don't understand it but I adore it and though this mystery is understood in another sense, it is not comprehended.

God speaks to us as though he is like us, lowering himself to our level of imbecility, to have us understanding something of what he is like, not what he actually is, and thus, to excite us to our duty to obey, to believe, to repent, etc. and yet it is the Spirit that must work all this.

More Comments on an Act of His Will see [code454b ref act of his will]

In the Old Testament, why did God love Israel? Ans.: Deut. 7:6-10

⁷ The LORD did not set His love on you nor choose you because you were more in number than any other people, for you were the least of all peoples; ⁸ but because the LORD loves you, [there's the act of his will; impassible love, divine, agape, not because they did anything good] and because He would keep the oath which He swore to your fathers,

That's the answer: because the Lord loves you. This has to be an act of his will as opposed to impassible love which is dependent upon the creature to arouse God to love in which case his love would be finite, conditional, passible, not freely given but a debt. If this was not the case, read Mal. 3:6 below:

"For I am the LORD, I do not change; Therefore you are not consumed, O sons of Jacob."

Why would they be consumed? Because if God does change, it is because he is passible, having affections (passive potencies) in him that are aroused, altering his state of being from, for example, love to hate. This change or mutability is not in God, hence he could not be passible, always changing in his state of being because of what the creature does and doesn't do. Thankfully this is not the case with God regarding his elect of which Israel was a type, otherwise we would be consumed. This is why you don't want a God who is passible, not simple, and mutable.

So he chose to love Israel not because they were worthy, therefore it has to be an act of his will...Not from a re-action (common affection) to any good in them, for they were a stiff-necked people; but from pure act only, a divine love, because he loved them! This is heavy and has multiple applications.

See Deut 9-

"Do not say in your heart, after the Lord your God has thrust them out before you, 'It is because of my righteousness that the Lord has brought me in to possess this land,' whereas it is because of the wickedness of these nations that the Lord is driving them out before you. Not because of your righteousness or the uprightness of your heart are you going in to possess their land, but because of the wickedness of these nations the Lord your God is driving them out from before you, and that he may confirm the word that the Lord swore to your fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob. "Know, therefore, that the Lord your God is not giving you this good land to possess because of your righteousness, for you are a stubborn people. Remember and do not forget how you provoked the Lord your God to wrath in the wilderness. From the day you came out of the land of Egypt until you came to this place, you have been rebellious against the Lord .

Deuteronomy 9:4-7 ESV

See Rom. 9:11-

¹¹ (for the children not yet being born, nor having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works but of Him who calls), ¹² it was said to her, "The older shall serve the younger." ¹³ As it is written, "Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated."

This is why John Owen said that the so loved in John 3:16 was an act of his will and not the common affection, an affection in God that was aroused by the creature's goodness that caused him to so love, because there is no goodness in the creature! This choosing to show favor is election, and act of his will. Think on these things! Mull them over in your mind. [see code454b ref act of his will]

He loved us not because of anything we did (which would be a passible love) For all our acts or works are as filthy rags. And even before we were converted we were continually provoking the Lord, yet God chose us. Why? Because he loved us; it all comes to that, an act of his will. This is a great mystery. I understand it; I don't comprehend it, however, I adore it. So his love is unconditional, a fruit of his impassibility, simplicity and immutability! A fruit of him being God. In fact, this is why election is true. See Romans 9 above! If it were conditional it would be passible, God being aroused by some good in us. And as a result God would not be free in the disposal of his love and all his other gifts, but would be indebted to the creature! But this is what unregenerate man hates; he hates the fact that God is sovereign and free to do as he pleases. They hate God's freedom in this sense because they love their own supposed freedom from God...the idol of will worship.

God is always giving, an infinite fountain of good, never receiving anything from the creature for he is perfect, self-sufficient, unchanging, in need of nothing, etc., because, All things are from him and through him and for him. To Him be the glory; not to us be glory, which would be the case if God's love were passible – but because it is not, all the glory belongs to God. See Ps. 115:

Ps 115-

Not unto us, O LORD, not unto us,

But to Your name give glory,
 Because of Your mercy,
 Because of Your truth.
² Why should the ^{1a}Gentiles say,
 "So where is their God?"
³ But our God is in heaven;
 He does whatever He pleases.
⁴ Their idols are silver and gold,
 The work of men's hands.

Isa 64:6

But we are all like an unclean thing,
 And all our righteousnesses are like filthy rags;
 We all fade as a leaf, [there's our mutability]
 And our iniquities, like the wind,
 Have taken us away.
⁷ And there is no one who calls on Your name,
 Who stirs himself up to take hold of You;
 For You have hidden Your face from us,
 And have consumed us because of our iniquities.

Paul said that in my flesh there is no good thing and in the above text in Isaiah it is said that all our works are as filthy rags. Thank God that he is without change and is impassible for the only way God loves us and cares for us is because of an act of his will not because we deserve it. I loved them because I loved them, i.e., not because they/we were worthy.

Common Love vs. Divine Love, Distinguished & God's Impassibility

Code439

Excerpt from Does God Suffer by Thomas Weinandy

pp 160-163

(read the footnotes!!) my comments in [blue].

We have previously argued that God cannot suffer because he cannot be deprived of any aspect of his fully actualized goodness which would cause him to suffer [to undergo a change in his state of being, being affected by something outside himself such as changing from indifference to love]. Moreover, since suffering is not constitutive of love, we can also perceive why the absence of suffering in God does not necessarily imply the absence of love and thus divine indifference. Actually, since God does not suffer, his love becomes absolutely free in its expression and supremely pure in its purpose. [free, meaning that his love is not aroused or caused by anything outside himself; it is from the council of his own will, i.e., an act of his own will as Owen notes.] If God did suffer, it would mean that God would need not only to alleviate the suffering of others, but also his own suffering, and thus there would be an inbuilt self-interest in God's love and consolation. However, since God does not suffer, his card for those who do suffer is freely given and not evoked by some need on his part.²⁷ His love is freely expressed entirely for the sake of those he loves. For Aquinas, moreover, what God does to alleviate suffering is done solely for the good and benefit of those suffering and not his own. But if God's love does not involve suffering, what is the relationship between the suffering encountered by human beings and the love of God?

In response to Moltmann, M. Dodds rightly perceives that a suffering God who, by necessity, is an ontologically imperfect being, 'will inevitably seek his own perfection and try to overcome his own deficiency. Only an entirely perfect being, subject to no defect and lacking in nothing, is able to love with a fully gratuitous love.'

W. Hill likewise states: It is this uniqueness of divine being, whereby God does not and cannot suffer in himself, that explains why he can love unfathomably, in a totally altruistic way, why divine love can be what the New Testament calls agape rather than only the self-fulfilling eros of Greek rational thought.

Again we must first recall that God as pure act and, correlatively, the trinity of persons as subsistent relations fully in act means that the divine attribute of love is fully in act. The trinity of persons subsist in relation to one another, as the one God, with their love for one another fully completely actualized. They are immutable and impassible in their love for one another, not because their love is static or inert, but because it is utterly dynamic and totally passionate in its self-giving. It is impossible for the Trinity to be more loving, for the persons of the Trinity possess not self-actualizing potential to become more loving. This is not only in keeping with the biblical proclamation that God is love, but it actually gives to it befitting, exact, and even literal philosophical and theological depth. God 'is' love because God's love, as reciprocally expressed within the Trinity, is fully in act.²⁹

²⁹God's love as fully actualized in the pure act that he is as a trinity of persons accounts for the all-consuming passion of God expressed in the Old Testament.

It should be noted that to say that God's love is fully in act in no way implies that we can fully grasp what it means to say such. We can know that the trinity of persons love one another fully and completely, but we cannot fully comprehend what such a loving relationship is like. For God to be love fully in act is beyond human comprehension. Again we can know what the mystery is, but we cannot comprehend the mystery.

Moreover, we now can grasp why God cannot merely be 'ethical immutable' as I.A. Domer, K. Barth, K. Ward, R. Swinburne and others have proposed. If God is not pure goodness and love ontologically in act, and thus ontologically immutable, then there is not philosophical or theological ground upon which one can claim that God will always be ethical and faithful. Only an ontologically immutable God, in the pure act that he is, embraces, fully in act, goodness itself and love itself. Only as such is he always assured to act ethically in his dealings with human beings and so remain faithful to his promises. [great application of these three doctrines] The 'ethical immutability' of the Bible (if that is in fact only what the Bible actually asserts) testifies to and mandates the 'ontological immutability' of god.

R. A. Muller writes:

Ethical, intentional constancy...must have an ontological basis. The constancy of the divine purpose, the consistency of the God who is what he is and will be what he will be, must also indicate a consistency, and immutability of the divine being...The issue is not so much whether Scripture declares ontological immutability, but that this concept is strongly implied. [see the theology of Karl Barth at code498]

Two extraordinary and marvelous conclusions can be drawn from this which bear upon God's love and human suffering.

First, God as a trinity of persons, in their love for human beings, never needs to actualize some aspect of love in order to become more loving.³⁰ [This is a key application from divine impassibility, immutability, and simplicity!]

³⁰J. Quinn argues that it is the love expressed within the Trinity that is the basis for the Trinity's love for human beings. As the persons of the Trinity give themselves entirely to one another in love so they give themselves entirely to human beings in love. It is this complete self-giving love of the Trinity, especially witnessed within the Incarnation, which is the Trinity's answer to human suffering. [My comment: I don't get this preoccupation with human suffering; Weinandy goes on toward the end of his book on this subject. It seems Weinandy is a universalist and has a wrong idea of salvation (as can be seen in the following quotes) in short, that because man suffers, he partakes in Christ's suffering, and hence has an interest in Christ, and so God will save all since all suffer. Weinandy states: "However, all suffering, whatever its cause is to redound to the glory of those who suffer. In light of the cross of Christ, while suffering may be due to evil, it can be transfigured through the Holy Spirit into a means of obtaining and manifesting heroic virtue. (pg 281) Then he quotes Pope John Paul II, “suffering is, in itself, an experience of evil. But Christ has made suffering the firmest basis of the definitive good, namely the good of eternal salvation.” Here’s another quote from Weinandy on this: “Christians, in their own suffering, and in solidarity with and on behalf of others, offer their lives, in union with Christ, as a sacrifice, even unto death, not only to achieve peace and justice within the world, but also for the eternal salvation of all.” Here’s an example that Weinandy recounts, of a Jewish Christian, Edith Stein, who suffered during the Holocaust and how her suffering was used for the saving of many people, which I think is blasphemous: “Moreover, and more so, she exemplifies a person who made her own suffering and death a sharing in the sufferings of Christ for the salvation of her own Jewish people and for the redemption of her German nation (pg 282) ...She must suffer on behalf of, ‘for our people.’ This was the very answer, she believed, which had been provided by her heavenly Father and which had been obediently carried out by his son in the love of the Spirit. So, in communion with Christ, one was called to offer one’s own life as an atonement for sin for the salvation of all. Then, in a subsequent footnote, #⁸² pg 286, he says, “After she began seeing the destiny of Israel from the standpoint of the Cross, our newly beatified sister let Christ lead her more and more deeply into the mystery of his salvation to be able to bear the multiple pains of humankind in spiritual union with Him and to help atone for the outrageous injustices in the world. As Benedicta a Cruce – Blessed by the Cross – she wanted to bear the cross with Christ for the salvation of her people, her Church and the world as a whole. She offered herself to God as a ‘sacrifice for genuine peace’ and above all for her threatened and humiliated Jewish people. After she recognized that God had once again laid a heavy hand on his people, she was convinced ‘that the destiny of this people was also my destiny.’ (pg285—286)

God’s love possesses, as does human love, many different facets and expressions. His love embraces goodness, commitment, affection, joy, kindness, generosity, strength, courage, power, and passion (see 1Cor13:4-7). Because sin affects human beings and their relationship to him, God’s love, as does human love, also embraces mercy, compassion, patience, forgiveness and even sorrow and grief. At times it equally, again as does human love, entails justice, anger, admonition, correction, rebuke, and even condemnation. Within human being all these various aspects of love are actualized at disparate times depending upon which aspect of love is appropriate given the circumstances. In his relationship to the created order and to human beings in particular, because God’s love is fully in act, he need not actualize, depending upon the changing situations and circumstances, these various facets of love. All of these facets of love are fully actualized and wholly contained within the one fully actualized love of God as a trinity of persons. When a human person repents of sin, God need not change the manner of his love within himself from being that of an admonishing love to that being a forgiving love. When an innocent person suffers an injustice, God need not adapt himself to as to express compassionate love toward the persons so injured and simultaneously adapt his love so as to reprove the perpetrator of the injustice. Eternally God is immutably and impassibly adapt to every situation and circumstance, not because his love is indifferent and unresponsive, but because his love, with all its facets, is fully in act, and so he is supremely and utterly responsive to every situation and circumstance. God is unconditionally adaptable in his dynamic and passionate love because his love is immutably and impassibly in act.³¹

³¹In Chapter 1, fn. 39 I noted that , while J. Galot and H.U. von Balthasar (and maybe K. Barth as well) hold that God is immutable and impassible in himself, yet in their own distinctive manner, they feel obliged to argue that, in his freely constituted relationship with humankind, he is indeed passible. [see code498] The reason for proffering such a position lies in their belief that God's immutability and impassibility are incompatible with his engaging in a loving relationship with human kind, a relationship in which he is compassionate and merciful, and even suffers. What they have failed to grasp is the argument that I have just offered. They do not perceive that God's immutability and impassibility do not make him less loving toward humankind, but actually guarantee that his love contains all it various attributes fully and perfectly in act. Immutability and impassibility must never be perceived, as Galto and von Balthasar do, as stumbling blocks that need to be overcome, as if, despite being immutable and impassible, God is nonetheless, in a dialectic fashion, still loving and merciful. Rather, God's immutability and impassibility are the absolute presuppositions and prolegomena for ensuring that he is perfectly loving. Moreover, by attempting to distinguish between God-in-himself and God-for-us, a distinction that is highly dubious in itself, they have place a breach between God as he truly is and God who relates to us. Such a chasm is not only philosophically unwarranted, but is also theologically detrimental to biblical revelation and the Christian tradition, which glories in the fact that God actually interacts with and relates to us as he truly is in the fullness of his divinity. God need not 're-fashion' himself in order to interact with us.

[perfectly in act or perfectly loving: I think this is the rationale behind Owen's comment that the "so loved" in John 3:16 has to be an act of his will and not a passible love, the result of God undergoing or being affected by the creature! In this passible case, his love would be finite, limited in its exercise and conditional upon our performance. Hence, God's simplicity, immutability and impassibility displayed altogether, is seen in his impassible love. It has to be an act of his will and not God being dependent upon the creature - that God does not have potency (i.e., love in this case) in him that needs to be actualized by the creature (hence his divine simplicity necessitating his impassibility, immutability, and perfection). For God's love would not be an impassible love if he depended upon the creature; and if he did, no one would be saved, hence Mal. 3:6, because I change not, Oh Jacob, you are not consumed. This has tremendous pastoral implications for providing help to people who need to know that God's love is perfect, full and unbounded in its actuality and exercise despite our dire circumstances.*

If God did need, sequentially in a potency/act manner, to adapt and re-adapt and re-adapt himself again to every personal situation in every momentary instance, he would be conceive as an infinite mega-computer (PC, obviously, and user-friendly) continuously and simultaneously processing trillions of conflicting bits of emotional data. He would then be seen to be perpetually entangled in an unending internal emotional whirligig.³² [Not to mention, God would be dependent upon the creature, constantly responding to him in acts of judgment due to man's total depravity; i.e., you don't want a passible God! Actually, he wouldn't be God if he were passible for then he would not be simple nor immutable since he would be composed of parts, i.e., potencies.]

³²P. Helm argues that if God's love is seen as dispositional in a human manner, then we might think of God as exercising this disposition depend upon the need of creatures. 'Once the need vanishes, the disposition vanishes.'

But this is altogether the wrong way of thinking about the character of God; for it supposes that there are occasions when God is less than wholly active, and moreover that these are the typical conditions of his existence. So that while it may be helpful to think of God's moral attributes as dispositions, in that they have the stability and uniformity that dispositions in general have, unlike human dispositions that are always/eternally exercised. They are maximally active; that is, there is no actual situation in which God requires to exercise a given disposition in which that disposition is not exercised, every disposition that comprises the divine character is exercised, and each is exercised never not exercised where it is appropriate for it to be exercised. The Impossibility of Divine Passibility, pp. 124-25

Correlatively, because all of the facets of God's love are fully actualized within the love of God, human persons are able to know in faith, and even experience, that love in accordance with their personal situation at any one time. If a person sins, he or she knows and experiences God's love as a rebuke and as an admonishment. If the person repents, he or she knows and experiences God's love as compassionate and forgiving, and so rejoices in his merciful love.³³

³³R. Creel states that 'if I repent and consequently experience God's forgiveness, it is not because God has responded to my repentance that I feel forgiveness; rather it is the case that by my repentance I have put myself in the stream of his forgiveness.' Divine Impassibility, p30. While I basically agree with Creel, I would want to say that God does respond to 'my repentance' though he does so in a manner that does not imply a change in him since his forgiveness is a facet of his fully actualized, and so unchanging love. [that God does not act passibly as though the creature aroused (actualized) some potential in God.]

If a person suffers die to injustice, he or she knows, in faith and sometimes by experience, that God's loveingkindness and consolation are present. God's love as fully actualized is ‘ready made’ to meet any situation, and human beings are able to know and experience this love in all its varied actualized fulness. Therefore, not only are joy, kindness, and generosity truly contained within the fully actualized love of God, but also compassion, mercy, grief, and even anger are also truly subsumed within his perfect love.³⁴

³⁴This notion of God’s fully actualized love as containing all the various facets and expressions of love provides theological depth and philosophical precision to the patristic understanding which equally subsumed God’s anger under the rubric of God’s love.

Aquinas states that ‘God takes pity (miseretur) on us through love alone. While some facets of love within human beings entail suffering, such as compassion and grief, they are subsumed and contained within the perfectly actualized love of God, but now devoid of the suffering which would render his love less than perfectly actualized. While compassion is defined as ‘suffering with,’ the heart of compassion is the love expressed within the suffering and not the suffering itself. Thus God is perfectly compassionate not because he ‘suffers with’ those who suffer, but because his love fully and feely embraces those who suffer. What human beings cry out for in their suffering is not a God who suffers, but a God who loves wholly and completely, something a suffering God could not do.

Pure Act

Comments help explain the ‘pure act’ of the impassible God

G. Vos – Reformed Dogmatics pg 476

& Thomas Weinandy – Does God Suffer

After reading Geerhardus Vos’s comments below on God’s nature, he mentions things that pertain to God’s impassibility indirectly. So I thought I would expound on this below with applications for believers. I highlighted in red the key words referencing this subject. Refer to code439 on more treatment of this subject.

Vos:

37. Show that this righteousness of God is compatible with His grace and His love for sinners, from which this grace flows. [see Ps. 85:10-11, Steadfast love and faithfulness meet; righteousness and peace kiss each other.]

The difficulty in grasping the compatibility of these two lies in our own psychological experience. In our limited minds, attitudes of anger and love at the same time with regard to the same subject generally exclude each other. Even in the most favorable case conceivable, that of a loving father toward his child, we do not have complete likeness to what is present in God. A father can indeed be angry and punish his child and at the same time love his child. His punishing, however, is not an exercise of justice in the same sense as the punishing of sinners is for God. It is rather a chastising that he administers to the child precisely because he loves it in his heart and seeks its well-being, although a God-given paternal authority is also expressed in this chastisement. Also, if we imagine the case of a judge passing sentence on his son, whom he loves, it is not completely the same, for the judge does not pronounce judgment of himself as if both love for his child as well as the impulse to sentence and to punish came from his own heart in the same sense. It is rather the case that his sense of justice arises from his sense of official responsibility toward God. He pronounces judgment before God; he loves of himself.

With God, on the other hand, both love and the impulse for righteousness flow directly from His own being and not from any relationship to something else. [that is, he is impassible; nothing outside himself moves him to actions; he is self-moved.] He loves, is merciful, gracious, kind—and at the same time, with equally the same spontaneity, He is angry with the sinner and in His righteousness wishes to punish him. That this is so incomprehensible for us stems not only from the fact that we cannot find a perfect parallel for it in our own experience; it stems much more from the fact that evidence against this concurrence seems to occur again and again in our sinful experience.

When we feel angry toward someone, then there is not room in us for favor toward him. Self-centered, human anger cannot coexist with it. Our anger “does not work bring about the righteousness of God” (Jas 1:20). That is precisely because it is an anger that occupies our entire spirit and with the mist of passion clouds our vision so that we can no longer see and judge impartially. The anger of man is always so little a holy anger that, once inflamed, it derives new strength from the entirety of the object against which it is directed. Every virtue that we note in our enemy can incite us to new rage. That was the case with the Jews and Christ.

My comments with quotes from Thomas Weinandy; this give insight on why we need to know this (application).

We passible humans are not ‘pure act’ in our being as God is. We are composite creatures composed of actuality and potential actuality; we are mutable! God’s anger, love, mercy, kindness, etc., is boundless in its actuality and is not waiting to be actualized by causes outside himself; it is not something in God that needs to be awakened by our acts which would make God like us having passions, as I said, God being stimulated from causes outside himself. But God is fully actualized already in all his attributes. For example, we cannot cause God to care more for us that he does already; his love and care is boundlessly continuously actualized already. This is incomprehensible to our thinking. So as Owen said regarding the love in John 3:16, was an act of his will, not a common love or common affection of love that is in man. God does not choose one over the other because he sees something good in us, for God is impassible; has not the passions as man has that needs to be actualized into action. There is no passive potential in God that can be actualized. In this sense there are not parts in God that make us God. So this is why the love in John 3:16 has to be an act of his will not a passible act like the passions or emotions in man since God is pure act; his being is not a composed of actuality (act) and potential actuality (as man is). The following quote is from Does God Suffer, by Thomas Weinandy:

G.I. Prestige’s comments are again appropriate:

It is clear that impassibility means not that God is inactive or uninterested, not that he surveys existence with Epicurean impassibility from the shelter of a metaphysical isolation, but that his will is determined from within instead of being swayed from without. It safeguards the truth that the impulse alike in providential order and in redemption and sanctification come from the will of God. God in Patristic Thought, p. 7

Now, Romans 9:16 becomes clear; an act of God's will is seen in the statement by Paul when he describes God's act of his will in election: "I will have mercy on whom I have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion." God did not choose because he was moved by the creature! But it was an act of his will. It has to be! God is pure act, immutable, impassible (both are intertwined, inseparable). Think on this. This is a wonderful mystery.

Weinandy continues, page 162 regarding God's pure actuality:

In his relationship to the created order and to human beings in particular, because God's love is fully in act, he need not actualize, depending upon the changing situations and circumstances, these various facets of love. All of these facets of love are fully actualized and wholly contained within the one fully actualized love of God as a trinity of persons....Eternally God is immutably and impassibly adapted to every situation and circumstance, not because his love is indifferent and unresponsive, but because his love, with all its facets is fully in act, and so he is supremely and utterly responsive to every situation and circumstance.

More insight is seen in footnote #29 & #31 page 161

²⁹God's love as fully actualized in the pure act that he is as a trinity of persons accounts for the all-consuming passion of God expressed in the Old Testament.

It should be noted that to say that God's love is fully in act in no way implies that we can fully grasp what it means to say such. We can know that the trinity of persons love one another fully and completely, but we cannot fully comprehend what such a loving relationship is like. For God to be love fully in act is beyond human comprehension. Again we can know what the mystery is, but we cannot comprehend the mystery.

Moreover, we now can grasp why God cannot merely be 'ethical immutable' as I.A. Domer, K. Barth, K. Ward, R. Swinburne and others have proposed. If God is not pure goodness and love ontologically in act, and thus ontologically immutable, then there is not philosophical or theological ground upon which one can claim that God will always be ethical and faithful. Only an ontologically immutable God, in the pure act that he is, embraces, fully in act, goodness itself and love itself. Only as such is he always assured to act ethically in his dealings with human beings and so remain faithful to his promises. [great application of these three doctrines] The 'ethical immutability' of the Bible (if that is in fact only what the Bible actually asserts) testifies to and mandates the 'ontological immutability' of God. [see code498 on Barth's theology]

R. A. Muller writes:

Ethical, intentional constancy...must have an ontological basis. The constancy of the divine purpose, the consistency of the God who is what he is and will be what he will be, must also indicate a consistency, and immutability of the divine being...The issue is not so much whether Scripture declares ontological immutability, but that this concept is strongly implied.

³¹In Chapter 1, fn. 39 I noted that , while J. Galot and H.U. von Balthasar (and maybe K. Comments on Song of Solomon in John Owen's & Jonathan Edwards' works

Code440

Note the allusions to God's divine nature,

Immutability

First, a letter to my daughter on this subject:

What we were talking about the other day or what I said regarding what you don't receive from husband, you can get from Christ Jesus. We as fallen creatures try to suck life out of the breast of the world, whether it be money, food, relations i.e., husbands, girl friends of boy friends, our children...all of which can be idols! That's why Jesus said in Luke 14:26, ²⁶ "If anyone comes to Me and does not hate his father and mother, wife [or husband] and children, brothers and sisters, yes, and his own life also, he cannot be My disciple." This is a statement of comparison; we are not supposed to really hate them but to supremely prefer Christ in a comparison to them. He is altogether lovely, Song of Solomon 5:16. In your thoughts etc., work towards this disposition towards Christ. That's the answer!

His mouth is most sweet,
 Yes, he is altogether lovely.
 This is my beloved,
 And this is my friend,
 O daughters of Jerusalem!

Remember the woman at the well who had 5 husbands! And what did Jesus say?

¹³ Jesus answered and said to her, "Whoever drinks of this water [the water at that well, natural water, worldly things, etc.] will thirst again [will thirst for them over and over to no avail], ¹⁴ but whoever drinks of the water that I shall give him [that is, contemplating his glory, his person as we learn of him, growing in knowledge of Him...] will never thirst [will never thirst for empty and vain things that the world offers]. But the water that I shall give him [his graces! His glory, that new principle of life, faith, grace & love] will become in him a fountain of water springing up into everlasting life."

Once you drink of this water, you will not thirst for the things of the world anymore to the extent as you did before. You'll be more in balance. You will then have peace in your soul and not go from one extreme to the other...That's one reason why Jesus is called the rock of my salvation, the covert from the storm, etc. Isa. 32:2, And a man shall be as an hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest; as rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.

What the Jesus does in our lives is to wean us off idols, onto Him, getting us back into a right balance. You can see this in the Song of Solomon and Ps 45. John Owen and Jonathan Edwards comment:

Owen's comments first:

(2dly), Times of gracious discoveries either of the glory of Christ in himself, or of his love unto us, are seasons that call for this duty. The glory of Christ in his person and offices is always the same, and the revelation that is made of it in the Scripture varies not; but as unto our perception and apprehension of it, whereby our hearts and minds are affected with it in an especial manner--there are apparent seasons of it which no believers are unacquainted withal. Sometimes such a sense of it is attained under the dispensation of the Word; wherein as Christ on the one hand is set forth evidently crucified before our eyes, so on the other he is gloriously exalted. Sometimes it is so in prayer, in meditation, in contemplation on him. As an ability was given unto the bodily sight of Stephen, to see, upon the opening of the heavens, "the glory of God, and Jesus standing at his right hand," Acts 7:55, 56--so he opens the veil sometimes, and gives a clear, affecting discovery of his glory unto the minds and souls of believers; and in such seasons are they drawn forth and excited unto invocation and praise. So Thomas--being surprised with an apprehension and evidence of his divine glory and power after his resurrection, wherein he was declared to be the Son of God with power, Rom. 1:4--cried unto him, "My Lord and my God," John 20:28. There was in his words both a profession of his own faith and a solemn invocation of Christ. When, therefore, we have real discoveries of the glory of Christ, we cannot but speak to him, or of him. "These things said Isaiah, when he saw his glory, and spake of him," John 12:41. And Stephen, upon a view of it in the midst of his enraged enemies, testified immediately, "I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God." And thereby was he prepared for that solemn invocation of his name which he used presently after, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit," Acts 7:56, 59. And so, also, upon his appearance as the Lamb, to open the book of prophecies; wherein there was an eminent manifestation of his glory seeing none else could be found in heaven, or earth, or under the earth, that was able to open the book, or so much as to look thereon," Rev. 5:3. "The four and twenty elders fell down before him," and presenting all the prayers of the saints, "sang a new song" of praise unto him, verses 8-10. This is our duty, this will be our wisdom, upon affecting discoveries of the glory of Christ; namely, to apply ourselves unto him by invocation or praise; and thereby will the refreshment and advantage of them abide upon our minds.

So is it also as unto his love. The love of Christ is always the same and equal unto the church. Howbeit there are peculiar seasons of the manifestation and application of a sense of it unto the souls of believers. [God does not change, but we do in our perception and in our experiences of him.] So it is when it is witnessed unto them, or shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy ghost. Then is it accompanied with a constraining power, to oblige us to live unto him who died for use and rose again, 2 Cor. 5:14, 15. And of our spiritual life unto Christ, invocation of him is no small portion and this sense of his love we might enjoy more frequently than for the most part we do, were we not so much wanting unto ourselves and our own concerns. [hence the dangers of worldliness] For although it be an act of sovereign grace in God to grant it unto us, and affect us with it, as it seems good unto him, yet is our duty required to dispose our hearts unto its reception. Were we diligent in casting out all that "filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness" which corrupts our affections, and disposes the mind to abound in vain imaginations; were our hearts more taken off from the love of the world, which is exclusive of a sense of divine love; did we more meditate on Christ and his glory;-we should more frequently enjoy these constraining visits of his love than now we do. So himself expresseth it, Rev. 3:20, "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." [this is often misunderstood as salvific message to those who are lost; but it is Christ wooing his church to come back to their first love, which is Him!] He makes intimation of his love and kindness unto us. But oftentimes we neither hear his voice when he speaks, nor do open our hearts unto him. So do we lose that gracious, refreshing sense of his love, which he expresseth in that promise, "I will sup with him, and he shall sup with me." [This is where we should be living off Christ rather than trying to squeeze every drop of life out of worldly dainties, relations, etc. Drink of this water (the infinite fountain of good that I will give you, and you will never thirst again (for the things of the world...)] No tongue can express that heavenly communion and blessed intercourse which is intimated in this promise. The expression is metaphorical, but the grace expressed is real, and more valued than the whole world by all that have experience of it. This sense of the love of Christ and the effect of it in communion with him, by prayer and praises, is divinely set forth in the Book of canticles. The church therein is represented as the spouse of Christ; and, as a faithful spouse, she is always either solicitous about his love, or rejoicing in it. And when she has attained a sense of it, she aboundeth in invocation admiration and praise. So does the church of the New Testament, upon an apprehension of his love, and the unspeakable fruits of it: "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and has made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever, Amen." Rev. 1:5, 6. This, therefore, is another season that calls for this duty.

(3.) The church of mankind is the other part of the rational creation whereon the image of God is renewed. Love unto the person of Christ, proceeding from faith, is their life, their joy, and glory. It was so unto the church under the Old Testament. The whole Book of Canticles is designed to no other purpose, but variously to shadow forth, to insinuate and represent, the mutual love of Christ and the church. Blessed is he who understands the sayings of that book, and has the experience of them in his heart. The 45th Psalm, among others, is designed unto the same purpose. All the glorious descriptions which are given of his person in the residue of the prophets, were only means to excite love unto him, and desires after him. Hence is he called "chemdat kol-hagohim", Hag. 2:7, "The Desire of all nations"-- he alone who is desirable unto, and the only beloved of the church gathered out of all nations.

Loc.5071

A due consideration of, and meditation on, the proposal of the person of Christ unto us in the Scripture, are the proper foundation of this love. This is the formal reason of our faith in him, and love unto him. He is so proposed unto us in the Scripture, that we may believe in him and love him, and for that very end. And in particular with respect unto our love, to in generate it in us, and to excite it unto its due exercise, are those excellencies of his person [which is his glory we are to contemplate, upon which to meditate day, Joshua 1:8, and night so as to be conformed to the same image...2Cor3:18, see below in red, also see code129a]--as the principal effect of divine wisdom and goodness, which we have before insisted on--frequently proposed unto us. John Flavel states:

code129a View the precious worth of grace in its excellent effects and influences upon the soul in which it inheres. (1) It adorns with incomparable ornaments, which are of great price in the sight of God, 1 Pet. 3:4. Yes, it reflects such beams of glory in the soul where its seat is, that Christ himself, the author, is also the admirer of it; Cant. 4:9, "Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse! Thou hast ravished my heart with one of then eyes, with one of the chains of thy rock!" and as one overcome with its excelling beauty, he says, "Turn away thine eyes from me, for they have overcome me," Cant. 6:5. (2) It elevates and ennobles a man's spirit beyond all other principles in man; it sets the heart and affections upon heaven, and takes them up with the glory of the invisible world, Phil. 3:20, "But our conversation is in heaven, from whence we look for the Saviour." While others are trading for corn and wine, for sheep and oxen, for feathers and trifles, the gracious soul is trading with God for pardon and peace, for righteousness and life, for glory and immortality: "Truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ," John 1:3. (3) It does not only raise the spirit by conversion with God, and things above, but transforms the soul, by that converse into the likeness of those heavenly objects it converses with; "It changes them into the same image," 2Cro3:18. So that though the sanctified man still remains the who he was, yet not the what he was before; the very temper of his Spirit is altered. (4) It does not only transform the soul in which it is , but preserves the subject in which it is; it is a singular preservative from sin; so that though sin be in them still, and works in them still, yet it cannot prevail in them still to fulfil the lusts of it, as it was wont to do, Gal. 5:17. Sin conceives, but cannot bring forth fruit unto death; this gives a miscarrying womb. (5) It does not only preserve it from sin, but grace establishes the soul, in whom it is, far beyond any other arguments without, or any other principles within man. "It is a good thing to be established in grace," Heb. 13:9 This is that which the apostle calls our own steadfastness, or that ballast we have within ourselves; which keeps us right and stable. O the excellency of grace! (6) To conclude: it is the root of all that precious fruit which we bring forth to God in this world; it is the root of every gracious word in our lips, and of every gracious work in our hands; be the heavenly discourses and prayers never so sweet, still grace is the root of the matter, Job 19:28. O then what a precious thing is grace! p 530 Vol. 5 Flavel

To this end is he represented as "altogether lovely," and the especial glories of his person are delineated, yea, drawn to the life, in the holy records of the Old and New Testaments. It is no work of fancy or imagination--it is not the feigning images in our minds of such things as are meet to satisfy our carnal affections, to excite and act them; but it is a due adherence unto that object which is represented unto faith in the proposal of the gospel. Therein, as in a glass, do we behold the glory of Christ, who is the image of the invisible God, and have our souls filled with transforming affections unto him.

The whole Book of Canticles is nothing but a mystical declaration of the mutual love between Christ and the church. And it is expressed by all such ways and means as may represent it intense, fervent, and exceeding all other love whatever; which none, I suppose, will deny, at least on the part of Christ. And a great part of it consists in such descriptions of the person of Christ and his love as may render him amiable and desirable unto our souls, even "altogether lovely." To what end does the Holy Spirit so graphically describe and represent unto us the beauty and desirableness of his person, if it be not to ingenerate love in us unto him? All want of love unto him on this proposal is the effect of prevalent unbelief. It is pretended that the descriptions given of Christ in this book are allegorical, from whence nothing can be gathered or concluded. But God forbid we should so reflect on the wisdom and love of the Holy Spirit unto the church--that he has proposed unto the faith of the church an empty sound and noise of words, without mind or sense. The expressions he uses are figurative, and the whole nature of the discourse, as unto its outward structure, is allegorical. But the things intended are real and substantial; and the metaphors used in the expression of them are suited, in a due attendance unto the analogy of faith, to convey a spiritual understanding and sense of the things themselves proposed in them. The church of God will not part with the unspeakable advantage and consolation--those supports of faith and incentives of love--which it receives by that divine proposal of the person of Christ and his love which is made therein, because some men have no experience of them nor understanding in them. The faith and love of believers is not to be regulated by the ignorance and boldness of them who have neither the one nor the other. The title of the 45th Psalm is, "shir jedidot", "A song of loves;"--that is, of the mutual love of Christ and the church. And unto this end--that our souls may be stirred up unto the most ardent affection towards him--is a description given us of his person, as "altogether lovely." To what other end is he so evidently delineated in the whole harmony of his divine beauties by the pencil of the Holy Spirit?

These next two entries are excellent!

So, to manifest how nigh he is unto us, it is said that "he stands at the door, and knocks," Rev. 3:20, in the continual tender that he makes of himself and his grace unto our souls. For he is always accompanied with the glorious train of his graces; and if they are not received, he himself is not so. It is to no purpose to boast of Christ, if we have not an evidence of his graces in our hearts and lives. But unto whom he is the hope of future glory, unto them he is the life of present grace.

Sometimes it may be that He is withdrawn from us, so as that we cannot hear his voice, nor behold his countenance, nor obtain any sense of his love, though we seek him with diligence. In this state, all our thoughts and meditations concerning him will be barren and fruitless, bringing in no spiritual refreshment into our souls. And if we learn to be content with such lifeless, unaffected thoughts of him as bring in no experience of his love, nor give us a real view of the glory of his person, we shall wither away as unto all the power of religion.

What is our duty in this case is so fully expressed by the spouse in the Canticles, as represents it plainly unto the minds of believers, who have any experience of these things, chap. 3:1-4, "By night on my bed I sought him whom my soul loveth: I sought him, but I found him not. I will rise now, and go about the city in the streets, and in the broad ways I will seek him whom my soul loveth: I sought him, but I found him not. The watchmen that go about the city found me: to whom I said, Saw ye him whom my soul loveth? It was but a little that I passed from them, but I found him whom my soul loveth: I held him, and would not let him go." The like account she gives of herself, and of her behaviour on the like occasion, chap. 5:2-8.

This is the substance of what by this example we are instructed unto. The Lord Christ is pleased sometimes to withdraw himself from the spiritual experience of believers; as to any refreshing sense of his love, or the fresh communications of consolatory graces. Those who never had experience of any such thing, who never had any refreshing communion with him, cannot be sensible of his absence; - they never were so of his presence. But those whom he has visited, - to whom he has given of his loves, - with whom he has made his abode, - whom he has refreshed, relieved, and comforted, - in whom he has lived in the power of his grace, - they know what it is to be forsaken by him, though but for a moment. And their trouble is increased, when they seek him with diligence in the wonted ways of obtaining his presence, and cannot find him. Our duty, in this case, is to persevere in our inquiries after him, in prayer, meditation, mourning, reading and hearing of the Word, in all ordinances of divine worship, private and public, in diligent obedience, - until we find him, or he return unto us, as in former days.

It were well if all churches and professors now would manifest the same diligence herein as did the church of old in this example. Many of them, if they are not hardened by the deceitfulness of sin, cannot but be sensible that the Lord Christ is variously withdrawn from them, if ever they had experience of the power of his presence. Yet are the generality of them far from the frame of heart here described in the spouse; for they are slothful, careless, negligent, and stir not up themselves to inquire after him, or his return unto their souls. So was it with Laodicea of old, so was it with Sardis, and so it is to be feared that it is with many at present. But to return.

Generally, Christ is nigh unto believers, and of a ready access; and the principal acting of the life of faith consist in the frequency of our thoughts concerning him; for hereby Christ liveth in us, as he is said to do, Gal. 2:20. This we cannot do, unless we have frequent thoughts of him and converse with him. It is often said among men, that one lives in another; this cannot be but where the affections of one are so engaged unto another, that night and day he thinks of him, and is thereby, as it were, present with him. So ought it to be between Christ and believers. He dwells in them by faith; but the acting of this life in them (as wherever life is, it will be in act and exercise) are proportionable unto their thoughts of him, and delight in him.

If, therefore, we would behold the glory of Christ, the present direction is, that on all occasions, and frequently when there are no occasions for it by the performance of other duties, we would abound in thoughts of him and his glory. I intend not at present fixed and stated meditations, which were spoken unto before; but such thoughts as are more transient, according as our opportunities are. And a great rebuke it ought to be unto us, when Christ has at any time in a day been long out of our minds. The spouse affirms that, ere she was aware, her soul made her as the chariots of Ammi-nadib, Cant. 6:12. It so fell out, that when she had no thoughts, no design or purpose, for attendance on communion with Christ, that she was surprised into a readiness and willingness unto it. So it will be with them that love him in sincerity. Their own souls, without previous designs or outward occasions, will frequently engage them in holy thoughts of him; which is the most eminent character of a truly spiritual Christian.

Whilst we are in this life, the Lord Christ is pleased, in his sovereign wisdom, sometimes to withdraw, and, as it were, to hide himself from us. Then do our minds fall into clouds and darkness; faith is at a loss; we cannot behold his glory; yea, we may seek him, but cannot find him. So Job complains, as we observed before, "Behold, I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him: on the left hand, where he does work, but I cannot behold him: he hideth himself on the right hand, that I cannot see him," chap. 23:8, 9. Which way soever I turn myself, whatever are my endeavours, in what way or work of his own I seek him, I cannot find him, I cannot see him, - I cannot behold his glory. So the church also complains, "Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself, O God of Israel, the Saviour," Isa. 45:15; and the Psalmist, "How long, LORD? wilt thou hide thyself for ever?" Ps. 89:46. This hiding of the face of God is the hiding of the shining of his glory in the face of Christ Jesus, and therefore of the glory of Christ himself, for it is the glory of Christ to be the representative of the glory of God. The spouse in the canticles is often at a loss, and herein bemoans herself, that her Beloved was withdrawn, - that she could neither find him nor see him, chap. 3:1, 2; 5:6.

Men may retain their notions concerning Christ, his person and his glory. These cannot be blotted out of their minds but by heresy or obdurate stupidity. They may have the same doctrinal knowledge of him with others; but the sight of his glory does not consist therein. They may abide in the outward performance of duties towards him as formerly; but yet all this while, as unto the especial gracious communications of himself unto their souls, and as unto a cheerful refreshing view of his glory, he may withdraw and hide himself from them.

As under the same outward dispensations of the Word he does manifest himself unto some, and not unto others - ("how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world?" John 14:22), - whereon they to whom he does so manifest himself do see him to be beautiful, glorious, and lovely (for "unto them that believe, he is precious"); whilst the others see nothing hereof, but wonder at them by whom he is admired, Cant. 5:9; - so, in the same dispensation of the Word he sometimes hides his face, turns away the light of his countenance, clouds the beams of his glory unto some, whilst others are cherished and warmed with them.

Two things we must here speak unto.

1. Why does the Lord Christ, at any time, thus hide himself in his glory from the faith of believers, that they cannot behold him?

2. How we may perceive and know that he does so withdraw himself from us, so that, however we may please ourselves, we do not indeed behold his glory.

1. As unto the first of these, though what he does is supposed an act of sovereign, unaccountable wisdom, yet there are many holy ends of it, and consequently reasons for it. I shall mention one only. He does it to stir us up in an eminent manner unto a diligent search and inquiry after him. Woeful sloth and negligence are apt to prevail in us in our meditations on heavenly things. Though our hearts wake (as the spouse speaks, Cant. 5:2), in a valuation of Christ, his love, and his grace, yet we sleep as unto the due exercise of faith and love towards him. Who is it that can justify himself herein? - that can say, "My heart is pure, I am clean from this sin?" Yea, it is so far otherwise with many of us, that he is for ever to be admired in his patience, - that on the account of our unkindness and woeful negligence herein, he has not only withdrawn himself at seasons, but that he has not utterly departed from us. Now, he knows that those with whom he has been graciously present, - who have had views of his glory, although they have not valued the mercy and privilege of it as they ought, yet can they not bear a sense of his absence and his hiding himself from them. By this, therefore, will he awake them unto a diligent inquiry after him. Upon the discovery of his absence, and such a distance of his glory from them as their faith cannot reach unto it, they become like the doves of the valleys, all of them mourning every one for his iniquity, and do stir up themselves to seek him early and with diligence. See Hosea 5:15. So wherever the spouse intimates this withdrawing of Christ from her, she immediately gives an account of her restless diligence and endeavours in her inquiries after him until she have found him, chap. 3:1-4; 5:2-8. And in these inquiries there is such an exercise of faith and love, though it may be acting themselves mostly in sighs and groans, as is acceptable and well-pleasing to him. We are like him in the parable of the prophet that spake unto Ahab, who having one committed unto him to keep, affirms that whilst he was busy here and there, he was gone. Christ commits himself unto us, and we ought carefully to keep his presence. "I held him," saith the church, "and would not let him go," Cant. 3:4. But whilst we are busy here and there, while our minds are overfilled with other things, he withdraws himself, - we cannot find him. But even this rebuke is a sanctified ordinance for our recovery, and his return unto us.

2. Our second inquiry is, how we may know when Christ does so withdraw himself from us, that we do not, that we cannot, behold his glory....

Yea, Paul is so delighted with this, that he makes it his motto, and the token whereby he would have his epistles known, 2 Thess. 3:17, 18, "The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle: so I write. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all." Yea, he makes these two, "Grace be with you," and, "The Lord Jesus be with you," to be equivalent expressions; for whereas he affirmed the one to be the token in all his epistles, yet sometimes he useth the one only, sometimes the other of these, and sometimes puts them both together. This, then, is that which we are peculiarly to eye in the Lord Jesus, to receive it from him, even grace, gospel-grace, revealed in or exhibited by the gospel. He is the head-stone in the building of the temple of God, to whom "Grace, grace," is to be cried, Zech. 4:7.

Grace is a word of various acceptations. In its most eminent significations it may be referred unto one of these three heads: -

1. Grace of personal presence and comeliness. So we say, "A graceful and comely person," either from himself or his ornaments. This in Christ (upon the matter) is the subject of near one-half of the book of Canticles; it is also mentioned, Ps. 45:2, "Thou art fairer than the children of men; grace is poured into thy lips." And unto this first head, in respect of Christ, do I refer also that acceptation of grace which, in respect of us, I fix in the third place. Those inconceivable gifts and fruits of the Spirit which were bestowed on him, and brought forth in him, concur to his personal excellency; as will afterward appear.

2. Grace of free favour and acceptance. "By this grace we are saved;" that is, the free favour and gracious acceptance of God in Christ. In this sense is it used in that frequent expression, "If I have found grace in thy sight;" that is, if I be freely and favourably accepted before thee. So he "giveth grace" (that is, favour) "unto the humble," James 4:6; Gen. 39:21, 41:37; Acts 7:10; 1 Sam. 2:26; 2 Kings 25:27, etc. 3. The fruits of the Spirit, sanctifying and renewing our natures, enabling unto good, and preventing from evil, are so termed. Thus the Lord tells Paul, "his grace was sufficient for him;" that is, the assistance against temptation which he afforded him, Col. 3:16; 2 Cor. 8:6, 7; Heb. 12:28.

The chastity we owe unto him requires another frame. The necessity, usefulness, and excellency of gospel obedience shall be afterward declared. It is marvellous to see how hard it is to keep some professors to any faithfulness with Christ in this thing; - how many disputes have been managed, how many distinctions invented, how many shifts and evasions studied, to keep up something, in some place or other, to some purpose or other, that they may dally withal. Those that love him indeed are otherwise minded. Herein, then, of all things, do the saints endeavour to keep their affections chaste and loyal to Jesus Christ. He is made unto them of God "righteousness;" and they will own nothing else to that purpose: yea, sometimes they know not whether they have any interest in him or no, - he absents and withdraws himself; they still continue solitary, in a state of widowhood, refusing to be comforted, though many things offer themselves to that purpose, because he is not. When Christ is at any time absent from the soul, when it cannot see that it has any interest in him, many lovers offer themselves to it, many woo its affections [the world and its bewitching enchantments], to get it to rest on this or that thing for relief and succour; but though it go mourning never so long, it will have nothing but Christ to lean upon. Whenever the soul is in the wilderness, in the saddest condition, there it will stay until Christ come for to take it up, until it can come forth leaning upon him, Cant. 8:5.

The many instances of this that the book of Canticles affords us, we have in part spoken of before.

This does he who has communion with Christ: - he watcheth diligently over his own heart, that nothing creep into its affections, to give it any peace or establishment before God, but Christ only. Whenever that question is to be answered, "Wherewith shall I come before the LORD, and appear before the high God?" he does not gather up, "This or that I will do;" or, "Here and there I will watch, and amend my ways;" but instantly he cries, "In the Lord Jesus have I righteousness, All my desire is, to be found in him, not having on my own righteousness."

2. In cherishing that Spirit, that holy Comforter, which Christ sends to us, to abide with us in his room and stead. He tells us that he sends him to that purpose, John 16:7. He gives him to us, "vicariam navare operam," saith Tertullian, - to abide with us for ever, for all those ends and purposes which he has to fulfil toward us and upon us; he gives him to dwell in us, to keep us, and preserve us blameless for himself. His name is in him, and with him: and it is upon this account that whatever is done to any of Christ's is done to him, because it is done to them in whom he is and dwells by his Spirit. Now, herein do the saints preserve their conjugal affections entire to Christ, that they labour by all means not to grieve his Holy Spirit, which he has sent in his stead to abide with them. This the apostle puts them in mind of, Eph. 4:30, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit." ...

LocLoc.23850

First, That we may love him with a pure unmixed love. It is true, it is the person of Christ as God and man that is the proper and ultimate object of our love towards him; but a clear distinct consideration of his natures and their excellencies is effectual to stir up and draw forth our love towards him. So the spouse in the Canticles, rendering a reason of her intense affections towards him, says that "he is white and ruddy, the chiefest of ten thousand;" that is, perfect in the beauty of the graces of the Holy Spirit, which rendered him exceeding amiable. So also Ps. 45:2. Would you, therefore, propose Christ unto your affections, so as that your love unto him may be sincere and without corruption, as it is required to be, Eph. 6:24, that you may not lavish away the actings of your souls upon a false object, and think you love Christ, when you love only the imaginations of your own breasts? -- consider his human nature, as it was rendered beautiful and lovely by the work of the Spirit of God upon it, before described. Do you love him because he was and is so full of grace, so full of holiness, because in him there was an all-fullness of the graces of the Spirit of God? Consider aright what hath been delivered concerning him, and if you can and do, on the account thereof, delight in him and love him, your love is genuine and spiritual; but if your love be merely out of an apprehension of his being now glorious in heaven, and there able to do you good or evil, it differs not much from that of the Papists, whose love is much regulated in its actings by the good or bad painting of the images whereby they represent him. You are often pressed to direct your love unto the person of Christ, and it is that which is your principal duty in this world; but this you cannot do without a distinct notion and knowledge of him. There are, therefore, three things in general that you are to consider to this purpose:--

Jonathan Edwards quote re Song of Solomon
w/ Special attention to patience

We cannot expect that, after a long time of degeneracy and depravity in the state of things in the church, all should come to rights at once, it must be a work of time. And for God's people to be over-hasty and violent, in such a case, being resolved to have everything rectified at once, or else forcibly to deliver themselves by breaches and separations, is the way to hinder things coming to rights as they otherwise would. It is the way to keep them back, and to break all in pieces. Indeed the difficulty may be so intolerable as to allow of no delay, and God's people cannot continue in the state wherein they were, without violations of God's absolute commands: but otherwise, though the difficulty may be very great, another course should be taken. God's people should have recourse directly to the throne of grace, to represent their difficulties before the great Shepherd of the sheep, who has the care of all the affairs of his church; and, when they have done, they should wait patiently upon him. If they do so, they may expect that in his time he will appear for their deliverance; but if, instead of that, they are impatient, and take the work into their own hands, they will betray their want of faith, will dishonour God, and have reason to fear that he will leave them to manage their affairs for themselves as well as they can. If they had waited on Christ patiently, continuing still instant in prayer, they might have had him appearing for them, much more effectually to deliver them. He that believeth shall not make haste. And it is for those that are found patiently waiting on the Lord, under difficulties, that he will especially appear, when he comes to do great things for his church; as is evident by Isa. 30:18, at the latter end, and Isa. 49:23. and Ps. 37: 9, and many other places.

I have somewhere, not long since, met with an exposition of those words of the spouse, several times repeated in the book of Canticles, I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please. It was the only satisfying exposition that ever I met with, and was to this purpose, namely, That when the church of God is under great difficulties, and in distress, and Christ does not appear for her help, but seems to neglect her, as though he were asleep, God's people, or the daughters of Jerusalem, in such a case, should not show a hasty spirit, and, not having patience to wait for Christ to awake for their help till his time comes, take indirect courses for their own deliverance, and use violent means for their escape, before Christ appears to open the door for them; and so, as it were, stir up, and awake Christ, before this time. When the church is in distress, and God seems not to appear for her in his providence, he is very often represented in Scripture as being asleep; as Christ was asleep in the ship, when the disciples were tossed by the storm, and the ship covered with waves. And God's appearing for his people's help, is represented as his awaking out of sleep, Ps. 7:6. Ps. 35:23. Ps. 44:23. Ps. 59:4. Psal.73:20. Christ has an appointed time for his thus awaking out of sleep; and his people ought to wait upon him, and not, in an impatient fit, stir him up before his time. It is worthy to be observed, how strict this charge is given to the daughters of Jerusalem; it is repeated three times over in the book of Canticles, chap. 2:7.—3:5.—8:4. In the 2d chapter and six first verses, are represented the support Christ gives his church, while she is in a suffering state, as the lily among thorns. In the 7th verse is represented her patience in waiting for Christ, to appear for her deliverance, when she charges the daughters of Jerusalem not to stir up, nor awake her love till he please, by the roes, and the hinds of the field; which are creatures of a gentle, harmless nature. They are not beasts of prey, do not devour one another, do not fight with their enemies, but flee from them; and are of a pleasant loving nature, Prov. v. 19. In the next verse, we see the church's success, in this way of waiting under sufferings, with meekness and patience; Christ soon awakes, speedily appears, and swiftly comes; Cant. ii. 8. "The voice of my beloved! Behold, he cometh, leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills!"

Does God Love Everybody?

Code441

A Commentary on God's Nature

By G Clark

This is a common question that many people ask. What it really boils down to is this: does God love everyone to an extent that God will save them from hell and have them be with Him forever in heaven? In other words, does God have a special or saving love for all? The answer to that is no; because if he did love all in that manner, he would save everyone. But not all are saved - far from it. But there is a kind of love that God has for people, his creatures, in this sense – that he rains on the just and the unjust, that is, he provides bountifully to many people who are on the way to hell, those who God has no intention to save. These are called reprobates, the Ishmaels of the world, as opposed to God's elect, his church. God died for his church, for his sheep (John 10), not for the goats, the un-elect; for as John Owen stated in his book The Death of Death in the Death of Christ, regarding Gen. 3:15,

Yea, that first distinction between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent is enough to overthrow the pretended universality of the covenant of grace; for who dares affirm that God entered into a covenant of grace with the seed of the serpent?

But why is this the case? If we study the nature of God we understand more of this mystery. God in his simplicity (that he is one divine essence), is immutable, impassible, perfect and self-sufficient.

God is not dependent upon the creature for anything nor does God properly receive anything from the creature for that would argue that God is not perfect, that he lacks something. Jonathan Edwards notes:

As to the first of these, I think the following things appear to be the dictates of reason:

1. That no notion of God's last end in the creation of the world, is agreeable to reason, which would truly imply any indigence, insufficiency, and mutability in God; or any dependence of the Creator on the creature, for any part of his perfection or happiness. Because it is evident, by both Scripture and reason, that God is infinitely, eternally, unchangeably, and independently glorious and happy: that he cannot be profited by, or receive anything from, the creature; or be the subject of any sufferings, or diminution of his glory and felicity, from any other being. The notion of God creating the world, in order to receive any thing properly from the creature, is not only contrary to the nature of God, but inconsistent with the notion of creation; which implies a being receiving its existence, and all that belongs to it, out of nothing. And this implies the most perfect, absolute, and universal derivation and dependence. Now, if the creature receives its ALL from God, entirely and perfectly, how is it possible that it should have anything to add to God, to make him in any respect more than he was before, and so the Creator become dependent on the creature?

That God is simple means that God is one divine essence – all that is in God is God. There is nothing in God that is not God that makes him to be God. He is not a composite being composed of parts of any kind, physical or metaphysical. He is not made up of love, mercy, compassion, patience, etc.; he is those things, e.g., God is love, he is mercy and so on. He just IS; not going to be or was; he is. Hence his name, I AM. Another way to say this is that God is pure act. He does not have potential actuality (passive potency) and actuality in him all mixed together. A potential actuality in him would be something that needs to be actualized by something or someone outside himself...to influence him or cause that potential actuality to actualize, for example, to cause this potential actuality of love in God to love something or someone. Now, because God does not have these metaphysical parts in him waiting to be actualized, this can't happen. His love or mercy is already actualized and in its full unbounded exercise! Nothing you do or don't do can cause God to love you more or care for you more than he does right now! Think about that! Affections that are in us (potential actuality) are caused to be actualized all the time because all created beings are not simple but composites, exposed to constant changing by outward causes. We are mutable. If this was God's nature then he would change all the time depending upon those outside causes to our great disadvantage; but this can't be, not only because He is The first cause without a cause, the unmoved mover, but also because God is immutable (impassibility is a subset of immutability). This is heavy, isn't it? Lots to ponder. So this love that God is (impassible love, that God does not undergo or is not moved upon to love), is not like the love that is caused in us (passible, we undergo or are moved upon or are affected, hence, our affections), that we, in ignorance, attribute to or predicate of God; for most people think God is like them, but perfect and without human limitations. In fact, they also have a wrong notion of what perfect means. How can you add to perfection? Or how can you add to God's infinitude? The key is that God loves and cares full time, perfectly and unboundedly, solely due to the council of his own will, as God freely chooses to do so without regard to anything else. Otherwise it wouldn't be freely given, hence the term, free grace. (The Arminians, Pelagians, Roman Catholics and all unregenerate people hate the idea that God is free and they are not! They believe that man is free and autonomous, and that God must cater to their desires and wills. That's why you have all these false religions that are founded upon man's supposed freedom and good works to try to appease God or curry his favor. The sinner's prayer is an outgrowth of this view which Thomas Shepard calls a wicked presumption.)

So how does this love of God that saves people work? What is this love?
 Ans: It is an act of his will! That's the only way to describe it...something that is indescribable. It has to be that. It cannot be the common affection that we humans have. If God is not caused by anything or anyone to love (a common or saving love), then it has to be self moved, aka, an act of his will, a free act of his will, which is why God's grace is only freely given and not owed to the creature as a debt because of the creature's works or whatever he does to try to curry God's saving favor (love). It is a function of God being pure act and not the result of arousals of supposed passive potencies in him, because there are none in him! he is simple, i.e., not composite in his being as humans and all created things are. This act of his will is seen in scriptures like this in Eph. 1 (highlighted in red, my comments in [blue])

⁴just as He chose us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love, ⁵having predestined us to adoption as sons by Jesus Christ to Himself, according to the good pleasure of His will, ⁶to the praise of the glory of His grace, by which He [Ⓜ]made us accepted in the Beloved.

⁷In Him we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace ⁸which He made to abound toward us in all wisdom and [Ⓜ]prudence, ⁹having made known to us the mystery of His will, according to His good pleasure which He purposed in Himself, [there's the act of his will!!! He purposed it in himself, not the result of outward causes] ¹⁰that in the dispensation of the fullness of the times He might gather together in one all things in Christ, [Ⓜ]both which are in heaven and which are on earth—in Him. ¹¹In Him also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestined according to the purpose of Him who works all things according to the counsel of His will, ¹²that we who first trusted in Christ should be to the praise of His glory.

See it? God does not undergo or is affected (hence affections) by anyone or anything. Why? Because he is God and not like us. We are composite beings affected by things all the time, but God is not composite, but is pure act. All his acts are from the council of his own will, not the result of potencies in him that are aroused by things outside himself. You'll have to think on this for awhile to have it sink in.

In other words, if God is not caused to do things, e.g., love, have mercy, etc., then it must be solely an act of his will according to his good pleasure and not by the arousal of some potency in him, which would be a common affection as it is in humans. So does this make God a metaphysical iceberg, some inert, static, cold being? NO! His love, his mercy, etc., is perfect, unbounded in its exercise, not determined by his creatures. If it were, we would all be destroyed, sent to hell because our sin, or rebellion of God would require his justice; but in his mercy, he chose some to save. This is incomprehensible to our feeble minds. Now you can see the meaning of Mal. 3:6,

“For I am the LORD, I do not change;
Therefore you are not consumed, O sons of Jacob.

If God was changeable, that there were affections (passive potencies) in God that could be wrought upon by our performance or lack thereof (sin, and God then being dependent upon the creature), then God would be changeable, mutable in his state of being, say from neutral to angry – angry in that we are sinners and we are liable to his justice, which is why Malachi said that if God was changeable, moved upon by his creatures, we would be judged for our sin and sent to hell, i.e., no one would be saved! But because God, in an act of his will, said in Romans 9:15-

“I will have mercy on whomever I will have mercy [there’s the act of his will], and I will have compassion on whomever I will have compassion.” ¹⁶ So then it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, [there it is! That God’s act of his will, to have mercy is not due to man’s will - God is not caused or aroused by man in any way because God is pure act, having no passive potency in him to be wrought upon!] but of God who shows mercy [there’s the act of his will again].

He is not subject to passions as humans are hence God’s impassibility. God’s love is an impassible love as opposed to being passible. The human affection of love is passible; it’s caused in us (actualized) by outward influences or appearances, etc. Before I knew my first girl friend, I did not love her; but after I saw her, my affections (potencies in me, i.e., parts) were actualized or wrought upon, and so I loved her. See? But with God it is not so! See Romans 9-

¹⁰ And not only this, but when Rebecca also had conceived by one man, even by our father Isaac ¹¹ (for the children not yet being born, nor having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election [not man’s will] might stand, not of works but of Him who calls), ¹² it was said to her, “The older shall serve the younger.” ¹³ As it is written, “Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated.”

This is a great mystery; we can understand it but not comprehend it. Do you see this? - that God loved Jacob and hated Esau before they had done anything good or evil? This is inhuman. It is total mercy to Jacob when he would have deserved justice; it is love divine, an act of his will, God’s freedom to choose/love, not the passible love or common affection that possesses humans. Otherwise, Jacob would have been consumed as time played out. For all that are in Adam are subject to the curse of the law, unless God has mercy. You don’t want a passible God! For then his love would be limited and conditional.

It is a misunderstanding of God’s true nature that many reject God’s sovereignty in election, predestination, etc., and in essence reject God, and thus deprive themselves of the peace, consolation, immovable hope, wonderment, reverential awe, excitement to obedience and due worship, praise, honor and esteem of God. Is it any wonder that God’s people go through trials and temptations as a result of falling short of this knowledge? See Job. For God disciplines those he loves. The clear inference is that he does not discipline those he does not love (love in the saving sense); for those he leaves to their own devices. See the words of Elisha Coles on this:

Are other men prosperous in the world, and free from trouble, while you are reduced to a low estate, and chastened every morning? have, perhaps, but a handful of meal, and a little oil in a cruse, etc., yet think not your portion mean, or hardly dealt out: your good things are to come; they are growing in the other world; and at the time of harvest the Lord will send his angels for you: yea, your Lord himself will come and fetch you thither; and "you shall be forever with him, in whose presence is fullness of joy, and at whose right hand are rivers of pleasures for evermore: "and then you will sing, "The lines are fallen to me in pleasant places;" at least say so now. As Abraham dealt by his concubines' children, so doth God by the Ishmaels of the world, he gives them portions, and sends them away, (Genesis 25:6). But the inheritance he reserves for his Isaacs; to them he gives all that he has, yea, even himself; and what can we have more! - Elisha Coles, The Sovereignty of God

Now read Jonathan Edwards' comments again on God's nature in his discourse on why God created the world and you'll see him weave these doctrines in his answer.

As to the first of these, I think the following things appear to be the dictates of reason:

1. That no notion of God's last end in the creation of the world, is agreeable to reason, which would truly imply any indigence, insufficiency, and mutability in God; or any dependence of the Creator on the creature, for any part of his perfection or happiness. Because it is evident, by both Scripture and reason, that God is infinitely, eternally, unchangeably, and independently glorious and happy: that he cannot be profited by, or receive anything from, the creature; or be the subject of any sufferings, or diminution of his glory and felicity, from any other being. The notion of God creating the world, in order to receive any thing properly from the creature, is not only contrary to the nature of God, but inconsistent with the notion of creation; which implies a being receiving its existence, and all that belongs to it, out of nothing. And this implies the most perfect, absolute, and universal derivation and dependence. Now, if the creature receives its ALL from God, entirely and perfectly, how is it possible that it should have anything to add to God, to make him in any respect more than he was before, and so the Creator become dependent on the creature?¹

More On Regeneration

And Erroneous Ideas of It

code417

This goes deeper into regeneration, the different views some philosophers and false religions like, for instance, Buddhism had about it. In this you'll see how people can get into serious error on what regeneration is and thus be self deceived: it is not a new illumination of, enlightenment of or a new consciousness of God but a transformation of the whole soul, all its faculties, that is described in Scripture, a new creation, the image of God re-instamped upon the soul. False teachers will use Christian words but assign different meanings to them to suit their goals.

THE NATURE AND EXTENT OF REGENERATION

Even greater than the differences over the order and time is the disagreement existing in dogmatics over the nature of rebirth or regeneration. As stated above, the word “rebirth” is also used outside of Scripture and in very different senses. Sometimes it was used to denote the doctrine of metempsychosis (reincarnation), which, coming perhaps from India, penetrated Greece and found ardent advocates in Pythagoras and his school. When, from the end of the eighteenth century onward, the literature of India became known in Europe, Oriental wisdom began to exert strong influence on Western thought. Buddhism and theosophy penetrated Christianity, and along with them the doctrine of metempsychosis was welcomed by many, under the name “rebirth,” as noble divine wisdom. [Sometimes its proponents try to represent reincarnation also as a Christian Doctrine that Jesus himself taught. [cf. C. Anderson Die Lehre von der Wiedergeburt auf... (Hamburg, Germany, 1899)] But this Indian rebirth has nothing in common, other than the name, with the Christian doctrine of rebirth. Whereas Scripture means by rebirth an internal, spiritual, and moral transformation that only indirectly influences the body, Buddhism construes it as a countlessly repeated incorporation of souls in a series of different bodies without it effecting any change in the soul itself. And to Buddhists, this repeated reincarnation is not an object of hope and eager expectation but, on the contrary, an object of fear and dread from which they seek to free themselves by the suppression of their consciousness and will. This doctrine of metempsychosis, accordingly, does not belong in this section but will be treated later, in the doctrine of the last things. That is also the case with the meaning of the word “rebirth” (παλιγγενεσία), which occurs, among other places, in Matthew 19: 28. The world renewal referred to there can most certainly be described with the word “rebirth” and is also closely associated with the internal, spiritual rebirth of believers, but is nevertheless distinct from it. It is no longer implied in the word “rebirth” as it is ordinarily used today and will be discussed later in the locus of eschatology.

The Greeks, furthermore, spoke of initiates in the mysteries as the “born-again,” and the Jews similarly described proselytes. This usage seems also to have been followed by Christian authors when they repeatedly applied the word “rebirth” to the act of converting to Christianity and specifically to baptism, the rite in which this passage became visible to all. In this connection one cannot tell either whether, and to what extent, the meaning of the word included an inner renewal of the heart. In the early years of the church the sign and the thing signified always went hand in hand and were not so clearly differentiated as was the case later. In any case, the internal change also automatically implied an external, visible turnabout, the abandonment of Judaism or paganism, and the act of joining the Christian church by baptism. Even today such an objective sense is occasionally attached to “rebirth.” Bishop Waterland, for example, said that regeneration is not “a change of mind” but “a change of stand,” so that even Simon Magus, though he remained in “the gall of bitterness,” could be called “regenerate.” [C. Hodge] Ritschl, too, spoke of a “state” or “stand” of rebirth [“Stand der Wiedergeburt”] [There you see how subjective their views on regeneration are as opposed to an objective clear transformation of the soul from a God hater to a God lover who delights in his word, and in biblically spiritual things.]

Here we have the view of regeneration from the Arminians et al:

Akin to this is the view of regeneration held by those who regard the human will as not at all corrupted, or merely weakened, by sin. In that case, as in the thinking of Pelagius, no internal grace is needed or, as in the case of the semi-Pelagians, only an ancillary, cooperating kind of grace. And regeneration, accordingly, need not consist in a renewal of the faculties of intellect and will, in an infusion of new dispositions, but only concerns the operations of those faculties. This was the view of regeneration presented by Socinians, Remonstrants, and rationalists. They were even more or less averse to the word, emphasizing, when they continued to use it, that it was a “figurative way of speaking, whose elements are not to be pressed, unless we want to fall into many absurdities.” Rebirth is a figurative expression for the “reformation of life as previously lived, according to the teaching of our Lord Jesus”; it only relates to the habits and actions of life. Actually regeneration and conversion are one and the same thing, viewed in the former case from God’s perspective and in the latter from the human perspective.

Another view from John Cameron who thought the will was not corrupted by sin:

According to others, regeneration consists in a renewal of the human consciousness. But here again we must distinguish two distinct tendencies. Reformed theologians, like their Catholic and Lutheran counterparts, taught that regeneration not only brought about a change in the actions but especially also in the faculties of a person. As a result of the psychological view that the will always and automatically follows the latest pronouncement of the practical intelligence and with a view toward maintaining the moral nature of humans also in conversion, John Cameron [1580–1625], who for a short while was a professor at Montauban, adopted the view that in regeneration the enlightenment of the mind was sufficient since in consequence the will would automatically be guided in the right direction. The Reformed in the Netherlands almost unanimously opposed this view and stuck with the pronouncement of the Synod of Dort that in regeneration the Holy Spirit not only enlightens the mind but also infuses new qualities into the will. ⁷⁰ Footnote #70 is fascinating:

Canons of Dort, III– IV, art. 12, “Rejection of Errors IV.” In this connection one can again differentiate between the faculties that are transformed in regeneration or conversion. Depending on whether sin is located more in the intellect, the emotions, or the will, and, accordingly, viewed more as darkness, passion, or aversion from and hostility to God, the emphasis in re-creation is on the enlightenment of the mind, the regulation of the emotions, or the renewal of the will. The picture also differs depending on the way conversion itself is experienced, in keeping with one’s personal sinful state. Even one’s psychology exerts its influence. Melanchthon, for example, in the early period spoke only of the mind and heart (affections) and barely mentioned the will. It was included in and subject to the emotions. As a result, conversion consisted mainly in the infusion of new emotions. Later, when he spent more time with Aristotle and adopted his psychology, he distinguished the will from the emotions, placed the will outside of and above them, gave it a measure of power to regulate and guide them, and even came to the point where he gave it the power, in conversion, to cooperate with God’s grace (synergism). Cf. E. F. Fischer, Melanchthons Lehre von der Bekehrung (Tübingen: Mohr, 1905), 19ff., 47ff., 97ff.

Still, Cameron exerted great influence on the school of Saumur (Amyraut, Cappellus, Pajon) and by his ideas laid the groundwork for the later rationalism. Here, accordingly, regeneration is equated with the illumination that precedes faith. It is also possible, however, to equate regeneration with the renewal of the consciousness that arises from faith or coincides with it. Luther, for example, saw regeneration one moment as the gift of faith and another as the change effected in the consciousness by faith and consisting in comfort, joy, peace, and so forth. “Where the forgiveness of sin is, there is life and blessedness.” This terminology is also followed in the Lutheran confessions: one moment regeneration is a benefit distinct from justification and then again the two are equated. Ritschl and his disciples appealed to the latter meaning of the word “regeneration” when they accepted no other rebirth than that which originates by faith. In the Christian, a new life begins with the birth of faith. This faith brings with it a fundamental transformation of the mind, a life in the power of God in place of the incapacity that prevailed till then. And not only the Göttingen school promoted this doctrine but others as well, especially H. Cremer, E. Cremer, and Althaus, who, having adopted it, defended it with vigor.

Overlooked here, however, is the fact that Luther and his followers often speak of regeneration in a different sense and distinguish it from justification. When they do, it is not just an elevation and renewal of the consciousness resulting from the exercise of faith but specifically an infusion of spiritual energies preceding faith. Catholics in this connection spoke of “infused grace.” Lutheran theologians spoke of “the gift of spiritual life,” “a generous bestowal of the powers of believing and of saving faith,” or “the illumination of our mind and the arousal in our heart of trust,” [H.F.F. Schmid] and the Reformed express themselves along similar lines. But they stressed even more vigorously that not just the actions and not even the faculties alone but also the whole person with all one’s capacities, soul and body, heart, intellect, and will, is the subject of regeneration. [the correct view] Regeneration, therefore, consists in dying to the “old man” that must not only be suppressed but also killed and in the rising of a totally new person created in the likeness of God in true righteousness and holiness. [J. Calvin]

But it struck many that not even this concept of regeneration is deep enough. According to Gnosticism, true redemption consists in the deliverance of the inner self from the bonds of matter. On account of its corruptibility, the body is not susceptible to redemption, and also the soul, which is most intimately bound up with the body, cannot be purged of its many defects. Redemption, therefore, has a bearing only on the spirit (πνευμα) and is obtained by humans, first of all, through knowledge, but second, also by means of the mysteries, among them particularly a threefold baptism with water, fire, and spirit. These mysteries free the spirit, protect it from evil angels, impart to it heavenly and divine powers, and make it a partaker of the divine nature. Rebirth, accordingly, is at the center of doctrine and cultic worship but is at the same time, as it is in the pagan mysteries, transmuted into a physical process. [G, Kruger, “Gnosis, Gnosticismus] Similarly, in Neoplatonism people sought a most intimate union with the deity by way of purification, illumination, and contemplation; the soul (or the spirit), we are told, is by nature divine but is oppressed by the external world (matter, observation, conceptual imagery, and so forth) and hindered from becoming one with the deity. But when it frees itself from all earthly ties, suppresses all its conceptual images, kills consciousness and will, and turns inward to its own deepest being, it finds God himself there and enters into full communion with him. [i.e. you save yourself] On this sublime level there is no longer any barrier between God and the soul. The soul has become pure luminosity, spiritualized and divinized. All distinction and separation is gone: God and the soul are one.

These ideas, which are essentially characteristic of all mysticism, also penetrated the Christian church, primarily through the writings of Pseudo-Dionysius. In part they were taken over and standardized by Rome in the doctrine of the superadded gift, of habitual grace, and of the vision of God in terms of being (per essentiam); and they return in all mystics in Protestantism as well as in Catholicism. Of course, by that time they have all been given a Christian coloring, elaborated by some in a more theistic direction, by others in a more pantheistic direction. But in all cases, they insist on claiming a higher knowledge of God and a more intimate fellowship with God than those that are attainable by the ordinary believer. According to this position, regeneration becomes an essential participation in the divine nature, a substantial union of the soul with the deity. This reality is expressed in various ways: God voices his eternal word in the soul; he brings forth his Son in us; Christ himself is born in us, just as he was once conceived in Mary; he is born and brought forth in us just as the Son was eternally born of the Father; God so accomplishes the creation of the new creature that he gives up Adam's flesh and blood into death and offers a new heavenly flesh and blood in its place; Christ changes us, not by reparation but by annihilation; he does not bestow another set of qualities but another nature and another being; and to be born again is to become truly Spirit.

When regeneration is thus traced back from the actions to the faculties, and from the faculties to the soul itself, and from the soul to its essence and substance, it naturally and necessarily has to take place in the unconscious. Now in the past, in psychology and hence also in the locus on regeneration, little notice was taken of the unconscious. Factually it was assumed, for the benefit of regeneration was also granted to small children before they became self-conscious. The Holy Spirit, it was said, could also work in their hearts apart from the Word preached. And "although our children do not understand these things, we may not therefore exclude them from baptism, since they are without their knowledge partakers of the condemnation in Adam, and so again are received unto grace in Christ." Moreover, against the Anabaptists it was stated that believers did not have to know, and could not always know, the time of their regeneration. [J Calvin, Institutes] Rebirth as such, it was said, was not a matter of experience but of faith. "This birth is neither seen nor apprehended but only believed." [Luther] But ever since Leibniz "the unconscious" has become of great significance both in philosophy and in psychology. The term, however, is unclear and can be taken to mean very different things. If we leave out of account, as being irrelevant here, those workings of our biological, physiological, and negative functions that occur completely outside of our consciousness and can be known only by intentional scientific research, there still remain essentially two areas that may be treated under the heading of the unconscious. In the first place, one can list under this heading all those impressions, ideas, passions, desires, and so forth, that at any given moment are not present in our consciousness but that, surrounding it on all sides or more or less dimly hidden beneath the threshold of it, may return to it on some occasion or other by recollection, association, and so forth. Belonging to this storehouse are all those impressions we have accumulated since our early childhood, as well as all those skills and abilities we have acquired by long practice and training. In the second place, the unconscious may also be associated with all those intuitions that strike the consciousness like lightning, have such weighty significance in the lives of geniuses, heroes, prophets, and seers, and also assert themselves in clairvoyance, somnambulism, telepathy, and a wide range of occult phenomena. In the opinion of many people, these phenomena point back to mysterious forces hidden in the human mind or to another spiritual world with which humans are, or can be, in touch.

Depending on whether the unconscious was viewed in the former or the latter sense, modern psychologists of religion presented a different version of regeneration or conversion. In the first case, regeneration was said to occur when concepts, impressions, experiences, and so forth sometimes dating back to one's earliest years, gradually or suddenly returned to one's consciousness as a result of some shocking event, drove out the up-until-then-dominant conceptions and desires, and brought into existence a whole new world of thoughts and ideals. [notice that has nothing to do with a biblical regeneration, being transformed into the image of Christ, etc., and what that means.] In that case regeneration essentially meant a transformation of one's consciousness. But others found this explanation unsatisfactory, not because it was contradicted by the facts, but because it would deprive religious phenomena of all their validity and value. Hence they assumed the presence in these phenomena, specifically in conversion, of the operation of an objective supernatural factor that guarantees not indeed the form but the content of these phenomena. All people, after all, interpret the experiences they have in their own way, in their own language and concepts. But the experience itself arises from contact, from a connection, with the supreme reality we call God. And from that connection there comes to people new energy, a new, broader, and richer life. They feel united with that Being, who works throughout the universe and saves both themselves and all the world.

Here Bavinck points out the weakness of philosophy in their various understandings of regeneration:

Both explanations of regeneration (conversion) appear to be new and original but are reminiscent of those that have been given to it throughout the centuries, by rationalism on the one hand and mysticism on the other. The former is more deistic, the latter more pantheistic. The former explains everything in terms of the working of the word; the latter goes back behind the word and speaks of the spirit. In the former, regeneration has a purely moral character; in the latter, it is the revelation of a supernatural power. Both interpretations, however, bring out the serious weaknesses inherent in the psychology of religion. If, in accordance with its original intent, this science seeks to be totally unbiased and does not wish to be guided by any a priori conviction, it can, at least to some extent, observe and describe the religious phenomena in question, but it cannot penetrate their inner nature, nor, in the absence of any norm, pronounce itself on their validity and value. It remains embarrassed and powerless as it faces the question of truth. It may perhaps clarify a good many things psychologically, but it has no answer based on logic. Inasmuch as it cannot be content with such a negative outcome—since every science after all is in pursuit of truth—in pursuing its investigations it very soon comes into conflict with the impartiality it initially adopted, views the phenomena in light of certain religious or philosophical convictions, and attempts to offer an explanation that is composed on the basis of these rather free, subjective, and arbitrary premises. Consequently, and by way of example, conversion then becomes a phenomenon that is on a level with various other alterations of human consciousness, or, equally arbitrarily, is explained in terms of the unconscious inward operation of some supernatural factor. But what conversion really is and, similarly, what faith, prayer, justification, religion, and so forth really are, neither the psychology nor the philosophy of religion can tell us. Only Scripture can.

Remember, Pelagius was an English monk who believed that man comes into this world innocent, without sin; he only begins to sin because of the bad examples set by adults, parents, etc., therefore he believed that one could believe on Christ for salvation without any determining grace (saving grace) by the Holy Spirit. Augustine argued strongly against him way back in about 400 A.D. and in the final issue, Pelagius was kicked out of the church for his heresy. Arminians and semi-Pelagians are in the same boat in that salvation is in the hands of man's will in deciding; and that God gives them information and tries to persuade them (moral suasion) in that direction (prevenient grace, which concept is not in the bible but only in men's brains), that the final decision is up to man, up to the almighty will of man and not God! (we call this will-worship, that man is ultimate) It's like this: God is for you, Satan is against you and you cast the deciding vote. This is what is preached in most churches.

The Irresistible Call of God in Regeneration Explained

IMMEDIATE AND IRRESISTIBLE

For all these reasons the Reformed unanimously held on to the linkage between external and internal calling and hence also to the order of calling and regeneration. They opposed the notion that the division of the call into an external and an internal one was a "division into two separate species" and viewed it as a "division of the whole into its parts and members." Just as, by taking this position, they turned against the Anabaptists on the one hand, so against Pelagians of all sorts they took the position that the external call and moral suasion by the Word is insufficient for salvation and has to be followed by a special operation of the Holy Spirit in the human heart.

This operation of the Spirit was, first of all, called an immediate one. [as opposed to mediate, using another cause other than the Spirit himself, i.e. a direct act without using an intermediary means. Another example on this: Some people think that God speaks directly to them, that God told me this or that, thus in an immediate manner (which is dangerous by the way) as opposed to reading their bibles where God speaks infallibly, the bible being an indirect or a mediate manner to learn of God.] With this term they did not, however, intend to negate what they had earlier said about the connection between the external and internal call, but rather to define their position against two alternative currents. First of all, against the Remonstrants [Arminians], who held the working of God's Spirit to be a purely moral one, a working whose fruit was dependent on human assent and compliance. Posted between God's activity and its effect in the human heart (which is regeneration) is thus the free human will. Over against that position the Reformed [e.g., Calvin, Edwards, Owen, etc.] said that the operation of God's Spirit in regeneration is immediate; in other words, that God's Spirit itself directly enters the human heart and with infallible certainty brings about regeneration without in any way being dependent on the human will. Second, by adopting the term "immediate," they sided against Cameron and the theologians of Saumur, who deemed the "enlightenment of the intellect" to be sufficient in regeneration and believed that this enlightened intellect then so impacts the will that, by virtue of its character, it must necessarily follow the intellect. Accordingly, what we have here is an immediate operation of God's Spirit in the human intellect but not in the human will. Over against this Saumurian position the Reformed generally claimed that the Holy Spirit not only impacted the human will through the intellect, but also that it penetrated the will directly and there instilled new habits immediately. [e.g., when God open the heart of Lydia.]

In the second place, if the operation of God's Spirit in regeneration is absolutely independent of the human will, it may be called "irresistible." Augustine already stated: "Aid must be given to the weakness of the human will in order that divine grace may be inexorably and invincibly effective." Materially the Augustinians and Thomists [referring to Thomas Aquinas] among Catholic theologians, such as the Jansenists, also agreed with this position, for they assume an essential distinction between "sufficient" and "efficacious" grace, seeing the former as conferring the capacity and the latter as conferring the actual willing and accomplishing, and hence taught an infallible activity of efficacious grace. But Rome firmly rejected this doctrine. At Trent it stated that when the human heart has been touched by the illumination of the Holy Spirit, “neither is man himself utterly without doing anything while he receives that inspiration, forasmuch as he is also able to reject it; yet he is not able, by his own free will, without the grace of God, to move himself unto justice in his sight.” And to remove all doubt and uncertainty concerning the sense of this pronouncement, it declared at the [First] Vatican Council: “Faith in itself is a gift of God, even if it does not work through love; and an act of faith is a work pertaining to salvation. Through this act man freely renders obedience to God Himself by consenting to and by cooperating with His grace, when he could resist it.” By that decree the infallible operation of grace is factually denied and the decision about whether a person will be saved or not is made a matter of the human will. [Man will defend his supposed autonomy and will to the death!] From ancient times, that was the teaching of Pelagians and semi-Pelagians, which in the Molinistic and Congruistic systems of the Jesuits won out over Augustine and Thomas and found acceptance also among the Anabaptists, Socinians, the later Lutherans (et al.), and in the Netherlands by the Remonstrants.

The term “irresistible grace” is not really of Reformed origin but was used by Jesuits and Remonstrants to characterize the doctrine of the efficacy of grace as it was advocated by Augustine and those who believed as he did. The Reformed in fact had some objections to the term because it was absolutely not their intent to deny that grace is often and indeed always resisted by the unregenerate person and therefore could be resisted. They therefore preferred to speak of the efficacy or of the insuperability of grace, or interpreted the term “irresistible” in the sense that grace is ultimately irresistible. The point of the disagreement, accordingly, was not whether humans continually resisted and could resist God’s grace, but whether they could ultimately—at the specific moment in which God wanted to regenerate them and work with his efficacious grace in their heart—still reject that grace. [that’s the key point at issue between Arminians et al and the Reformed view] The answer to this question, as is clearly evident from the five articles of the Remonstrants, is most intimately tied in with the doctrine of the corruption of human nature; with election (based or not based on foreseen faith); the universality and particularity of Christ’s atonement; the identification of, or the distinction between, the sufficient call (external) and the efficacious call (internal); and the correctness of the distinction between the will of God’s good pleasure and the revealed will in the divine being. Whereas the Remonstrants appealed to Isa. 5: 1–8; 65: 2–3; Ezek. 12: 2; Matt. 11: 21–23; 23: 37; Luke 7: 30; John 5: 34; and Acts 7: 51, and to all the exhortations to faith and repentance occurring in Scripture, the Reformed theologians took their cue from the picture Scripture offers of fallen humanity as blind, powerless, natural, dead in sins and trespasses (Jer. 13: 23; Matt. 6: 23; 7: 18; John 8: 34; Rom. 6: 17; 8: 7; 1 Cor. 2: 14; 2 Cor. 3: 5; Eph. 2: 1; etc.), and from all the forceful words and images with which the work of grace in the human soul is described (Deut. 30:6; Jer. 31: 31; Ezek. 36: 26; John 3: 3, 5; 6: 44; Eph. 2: 1, 6; Phil. 2: 13; 1 Pet. 1: 3; etc.). So they spoke of the efficacy and invincibility of God's grace in regeneration and articulated this truth in a confession at the Synod of Dort.

[My comment on this: God tells the Israelites in Deut. 10:16, Therefore circumcise the foreskin of your heart, and be stiff-necked¹⁰ no longer. He is basically saying to them, convert yourself by the power of your own will in choosing to do so knowing that they cannot and will not do it. (Romans 8:7-8, Because the ¹¹carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, nor indeed can be. ⁸*So then, those who are in the flesh cannot please God.*) So, twenty chapters later in Deut. 30:6 God says, And the LORD your God will circumcise your heart and the heart of your descendants, to love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul, that you may live. The will in is bondage to sin, so the only way one is delivered from this bondage to be free to worship God acceptably is by God's sovereign efficacious power that sweetly transforms the whole man, sweetly moving his will into compliance.

Third, the activity of God in regeneration was also described as a “physical operation.” But there was much controversy over the correctness of this description. People were agreed that the adjective “moral” or “ethical” was too weak and wide open to misunderstanding as well. Just as on the point of human incapacity people had objected to calling it “moral incapacity,” although this incapacity was in no way rooted in the substance of human nature, so in connection with the work of God's Spirit in the human heart, people could not confine themselves to the term “moral.” This word, after all, had been used by the Remonstrants to indicate that the operation of grace was dependent on human consent and compliance and therefore resulted only externally in a change of the actions of the will, a reformation of life. And people could be even less content with the word “moral” when later, in the Reformed churches themselves, Cameron and his pupils Amyraut, Testard, Daillé, and Blondel described “particular” or “subjective” grace (which they distinguished from “universal” or “objective” grace) as an “ethical” or “moral” grace and in so doing paved the way for the congruist doctrine of Pajon and Placaëus. But then exactly what was the correct description was hard to say. The Synod of Dort stated that “regeneration, the new creation, the raising from the dead and the making alive . . . is an entirely supernatural work, one that is at the same time most powerful and most pleasing, a marvelous, hidden, and inexpressible work, which is not lesser than or inferior in power to that of creation or of raising the dead, as Scripture (inspired by the author of this work) teaches.” And theologians speak of a “physical” or “hyperphysical,” a “real” or “effective,” a “persuasive” or “effective,” a “supernatural” or “divine” working of the Holy Spirit. But whatever word was used, the intent was clear: the working of grace in regeneration is not “simply natural” because it has to do with a rational, moral being, who, however corrupted by sin, nevertheless remains a human being and therefore has to be restored in keeping with that human nature. Neither is this working “simply ethical,” for it is not dependent on the consent of humans but, with divine power, penetrates their inmost being and re-creates them, in principle, according to the image of God. It is therefore in a class of its own, simultaneously ethical and natural (supernatural), powerful and most pleasing¹.

¹John Flavel and others describe the power of God in converting the soul, as a power that sweetly moves the will into compliance without doing violence to man’s creaturely liberty. Hence Ps. 110:3, Your people shall be volunteers [or willing] In the day of Your power;

Objections to Saving Grace in Regeneration

THE REMONSTRANT OBJECTION

Against this confession of God's omnipotent and infallibly effective grace in regeneration, the Remonstrants cite a series of Scripture verses that contain all sorts of admonitions and threats and are addressed to the heart and conscience, the mind and the will, of humans. But against this Scripture "proof," the Reformed are nevertheless consistently in a more favorable position than their opponents. [They site those passages with this reasoning: why would God command us to do anything that we are not able to do by our own power? In other words, we don't need God's determining grace (insuperable as Bavinck calls it), we can do these things, e.g., choose to savingly believe on Christ, without it. This is short sighted, of course and clearly against many scriptures having to do with man's total or radical depravity (bondage of the will), e.g., 1Cor. 2:14, Rom. 8:7-8.] For if one proceeds from the free will and wants to maintain it before all else as the most precious good, one cannot possibly do justice to all those texts that unmistakably teach God's efficacious and insuperable grace. On the other hand, if one proceeds along theological lines and seeks above all to secure the rights of God, one will still always have room left for the content of the Scripture verses that consistently address and treat humans as rational, moral beings. This is how humans were created by God, this is how they are upheld by his providence, and this is how they are renewed and saved in re-creation. But this is precisely what is denied by the Remonstrants. Their primary objection is always that the doctrine of efficacious and insuperable grace introduces a "natural" coercion into the spiritual life, militates against the nature of rational beings, renders humans totally passive, and undermines moral freedom and responsibility. Pelagianism, accordingly, is always out to maintain the resistibility of the calling and to let regeneration, conversion, sanctification, preservation, and so forth, depend on a decision of the will. Regenerated and justified are only those persons who voluntarily and antecedently meet some condition—believes, repents, is disposed to keep God's commandments, and so forth.

In so doing, Pelagianism immediately wraps itself up in countless insoluble difficulties. If humans are by nature capable of meeting those conditions, they are in fact so good that there is no need whatever for regeneration in a scriptural sense. In that case, a moral upbringing and self-improvement are more than sufficient.¹ If humans have to receive the power to accept or reject the gospel in advance by the prevenient grace conferred in baptism or calling, then here too a kind of irresistible grace precedes believing, for preparatory grace is granted to all without their knowledge or consent. Then regeneration actually does occur before the decision of the human will, for "functioning follows being" (operari sequitur esse). The act follows the ability to act. The will enabling persons to accept the gospel, according to the Gospel of John, is a renewed and regenerate will existing prior to the act of acceptance. In that case, however, it is impossible to understand how, after all this, a “free” act of volition is still possible. The will, after all, thanks to the good power conferred on it without its consent, has already been determined for good, and is so determined precisely in the same measure as it received the power to make a good choice. The more one construes the will as being weakened by sin, the more power one accords to it in prevenient grace, the more, and to the same degree, its indifferent freedom ceases to exist. [this indifferent freedom is what Arminians believe the condition that the will is in, or has to be in, in order for what proceeds out of it to be genuine, for if God by his determining grace moves the will out of this indifferent state, they consider this doing violence to their liberty, an act against man’s so called autonomy, which fallen man defends to the death. Naturally, this all stems from a huge error in their idea human anthropology, man’s deadness in and bondage to sin.] In addition, it is unfathomable why such an act of free will is still necessary. For if God has to renew human beings beforehand and irresistibly to the extent that they can choose for the gospel, what purpose does the maintenance of the indifferent freedom of the will still serve other than again to frustrate God’s grace, to render his covenant of grace as shaky and unstable as the covenant of works was before the fall, and to picture Christ as being even more powerless and loveless than Adam? For he has accomplished and acquired everything, but when he wants to apply it, his power and his love bounce off the human will, a will, mind you, that has even been endowed with new energies! Merely to rescue a pseudo freedom attributed to humans, God is deprived of his sovereignty, the covenant of grace of its firmness, and Christ of his royal power.

This would be somewhat understandable if something were gained by it, but in reality one loses everything. Not only is the indifferent freedom of the will saved only in appearance, but in the case of infants this whole doctrine proves inadequate and even merciless. We have to make a choice here: either the grace granted to children is sufficient for salvation and, if they die in infancy, opens the gates of heaven—and in that case they are saved without any contribution of their own and without having made a choice of their own—or it is not sufficient, but in that case all infants who die before they can make a choice are lost, and of the children who grow to maturity, thousands upon thousands apostatize by their own freewill choices.

Pelagianism in its various forms seems to be merciful, but in essence this attitude is nothing other than the mercy of the Pharisee, who does not trouble himself about publicans. In order to save freedom of the will in the case of a few thousand adults—and then only in appearance—it is prepared, proportionately speaking, to abandon millions of infants to damnation. In the final analysis, it remains a riddle what Pelagianism can have against God glorifying his efficacious grace in the lives of sinners.

If it raised the question why God would only grant his grace to many and not to all, it would find a well-disposed response everywhere. Who has not felt that question rising in his or her own mind and has not been profoundly moved by it? But that question comes back in either case and is answered neither by Pelagius nor by Augustine. All without distinction must rest in the good pleasure of God. Those who confess God's sovereignty are by no means in a less favorable position than the defenders of free will. For, as was shown above, external grace, in the Reformed view, grants to all who live under the gospel at least as much grace as, in the Pelagian view, is granted to them in so-called "sufficient grace," and is judged sufficient by them for making a free choice for or against the gospel. The doctrine of the internal calling does not deprive the external calling of any blessing or benefit that according to Pelagianism or semi-Pelagianism, Roman Catholics, Lutherans, or Remonstrants is bestowed in it by God. According to the Reformed view, all those who are externally called remain objectively in the same condition as that in which they are according to other confessions. The Reformed only claim that all that abundant grace for and in humans, if it is not specifically the grace of regeneration, is insufficient to move people to a free and decisive acceptance of the gospel. What is needed to believe in Christ, according to the clear teaching of the Gospel of John, is nothing less than a rebirth, a working of God's power on a par with raising Christ from the dead (Eph. 1: 19–20). All lesser grace, however rich and wonderful it may be, is insufficient. A grace that does not regenerate people yet restores their will to the point where they can opt for the gospel is nowhere taught in Scripture and is also a psychological absurdity. Even if their response were wrong (hence a "no"), it would produce absolutely no detrimental change in the condition of those who, according to the confessions of all Christians, will finally perish on account of their unbelief.

In any case the Reformed have the edge over the proponents of free will. The advantage is that God's counsel will stand, that his covenant of grace will not waver, that Christ is the true and perfect Savior, that goodness will one day triumph infallibly over evil. What serious objections could possibly be raised against that position? If, without our knowledge, we can share in Adam's condemnation—a fact that nobody can deny—why could we not much more, without our knowledge, be received into God's favor in Christ? Certainly this grace is not one that involves force. To speak for a moment in strong language: if this grace did not by virtue of its very nature exclude force and God actually used force, who would in the end have the right or even the desire to complain if by this action he or she were snatched out of eternal perdition and transferred into eternal life? Who would agree with the man who complained that someone had rescued him from mortal danger without respecting his freedom of choice? [This is the kind of reasoning is consistent and makes total sense, but Arminians et al are blind to this; they just don't think things through.] But it is not so: in the internal calling and regeneration, there is no coercion² on the part of God. Not a single godly person, even if one had been snatched like a piece of kindling from the fire, has ever spoken of coercion² in connection with the work of grace. It would likely have been their wish that God had more forcefully broken sin in them and made them partakers of salvation and blessedness without their having to travel such a long road of struggle and grief. But that is not how God acts in the work of grace: all coercion is alien to its essence. [See John Flavel's or Owen's comments on God sweetly moving the will.] There is no more reason to speak of coercion here than in connection with a person's birth. It is indisputably the case that the differences among people—in gender, class, privileges, physical strength, gifts of intellect and heart (and so forth)—are not first of all caused by their conduct but come along with their conception and birth. Who has a right to complain if he or she has been apportioned less than others? Who can boast if he or she has been entrusted, not with one or two, but with five or ten talents? Who are so foolish as to throw away the gifts bestowed on them over others, the inheritance that their parents have left them, the treasures of culture available to them at birth because they received them apart from their consent and knowledge, out of pure grace? [Excellent point! This can be applied to many social evils that we seeing today with made up Marxist ideas such as white privilege and so forth. People like blacks are really not complaining at white people's privileges, but against God's sovereign disposal of his gifts and graces!! They are shaking their fists at God! with a high hand I might add!]

If one should wish to call this unequal apportionment in the natural or spiritual domain a kind of physical coercion or dare to charge it with being unjust, one must adopt the theory of Origen and of present-day theosophists that originally all souls were the same and that all diversity is due to the varying behaviors and actions of people. In that perspective only the law of karma prevails in the world, the law of reward based on performance, as it was also set forth and elaborated by nomistic Judaism. But the Christian religion is diametrically opposed to this view. Jesus did not pronounce blessed the self-righteous but the poor in spirit and the meek. He came not to call the righteous but publicans and sinners to repentance, to seek and to save what is lost. The grace of God in Christ, grace that is full, abundant, free, omnipotent, and insuperable, is the heart of the gospel.

¹A Short Note on Preparatory Grace – (though prevenient grace is not scriptural as Bavinck rightly notes, it is helpful to understand this subject of Preparatory grace so that the two are properly distinguished and not conflated.)
