8. Finally, this call [the universal proclamation of the gospel] is not only a repressive but also a preparatory grace. Christ came into the world for judgment (κρίσις), for a fall but also for a rising of many (Mark 4: 12; Luke 2: 34; 8: 10; John 9: 39; 15: 22; 2 Cor. 2: 16; 1 Pet. 2: 7–8). This call by law and gospel is also intended, through what it gives and brings about both in humanity as a whole and in individual persons, to pave the way for the coming of Christ. Reformed theologians [Canon of Dort] have definitely rejected such a preparatory grace in an Arminian sense. [Remonstrant Confession and Apologia pro confessione, XI.4.] The spiritual life that is implanted in regeneration differs essentially from the natural and moral life that precedes it. It is brought about, not by human activity or evolution, but by a creative act of God. Some theologians, accordingly, preferred to call the activities that precede regeneration “antecedent actions” rather than “preparatory actions.” Still one can speak of “preparatory grace” in a sound sense. The expression is even eminently valuable against all Methodist trends that ignore the natural life. For the confession of preparatory grace does not imply that, by doing what they can on their own—regularly going to church, listening attentively to the Word of God, acknowledging their sins, and yearning for salvation, and so on—people can earn or make themselves receptive to the grace of regeneration on the basis of a merit of congruity. On the contrary, it implies that God is the creator, sustainer, and ruler of all things and that, even generations before they are born, he orders the life of those on whom he will in due time bestow the gift of faith. Humans did not originate on the sixth day by evolving from lower creatures, but are created by the hand of God. Still, his creation may be considered prepared by the antecedent acts of God. Though Christ himself came down from above, yet his coming had been prepared for centuries. Although nature and grace are distinct and may not be confused or mingled, God does link the two. Creation, redemption, and sanctification are, in an “economic” sense, attributed to the Father, Son, and Spirit, but these three constitute the one true God, and together they accomplish the whole work of redemption. No one can come to Christ unless the Father draws him or her; and no one receives the Holy Spirit except those to whom the Son sends him. For that reason we can properly speak of a preparatory grace. God himself, in many different ways, prepares for his gracious work in human hearts. He aroused in Zacchaeus the desire to see Jesus (Luke 19: 3), produced distress in the crowd that listened to Peter (Acts 2: 37), caused Paul to fall to the ground (9: 4), disconcerted the jailer at Philippi (16: 27), and so directs the lives of all his children even before and up to the hour of their rebirth. Even if on their part they have not yet received the benefits of reconciliation and justification and have not yet been born again and given faith, yet they are already the objects of his eternal love, and he himself already leads them by his grace to the Spirit, who alone can regenerate and comfort them. All things, accordingly, are connected by divine prearrangement to their subsequent “enlistment” and calling in the church. Conception and birth, family and lineage and people and land, upbringing and education, development of heart and mind, preservation from hideous sins, above all from blaspheming the Holy Spirit, or perhaps abandonment to all sorts of wickedness, disasters and judgment, blessings and benefits, the preaching of law and gospel, distress about sin and fear of judgment, development of conscience and the felt need for salvation: all of this is grace preparing people for rebirth by the Holy Spirit and for the role that they as believers will later play in the church. True: there is only one way to heaven, but many are the leadings of God both before and on that journey, and the grace of the Holy Spirit is abundant and free. Jeremiah, John the Baptist, and Timothy were brought into the kingdom differently from either Manasseh or Paul, and each performed a different task in the service of God. Pietism and Methodism tend to ignore these leadings, limit God's grace, and want to convert and mold everyone according to a single model. But Reformed theology respects the free sovereignty of God and marvels at the riches of his grace. Hermon Bavinck, Vol. 4, pgs 39-41

² Now if regeneration is neither an actual creation (an infusion of substance) nor a merely external moral amendment of life, it can only consist in a spiritual renewal of those inner dispositions of humans that from ancient times were called "habits" or "qualities." These new "habits" are distinguished, on the one hand, from the Holy Spirit, who effects them but does not coincide with them; they serve, on the other hand, as intermediaries between the essence (or substance) of the human soul and body and the activities that, as people mature and receive the enlightenment of Scripture and the guidance of the Spirit, spring from those "habits" in the intellect, the emotions, and the will. Hence, though these are new qualities that regeneration implants in a person, they are nevertheless no other than those that belong to human nature, just as health is the normal state of the body. They are "habits," dispositions, or inclinations that were originally included in the image of God and agreed with the law of God and whose restoration liberates the fallen, sinful human nature from its darkness and slavery, its misery and death. [This is the chief part of God's image that was lost at the fall of Adam, that is restored in regeneration!] They cannot be described in more beautiful language than what is used in the confession of Dort: "When God carries out his good pleasure in his chosen ones, he, by the effective operation of the same regenerating Spirit, also penetrates into the inmost being of man, opens the closed heart, softens the hard heart, and circumcises the heart that is uncircumcised. He infuses new qualities into the will, making the dead will alive, the evil one good, the unwilling one willing, and the stubborn one compliant; he activates and strengthens the will so that, like a good tree, it may be enabled to produce the fruits of good deeds." [Canons of Dort, III-IV, art. 12] Regeneration, accordingly, works so little with coercion that it is truer to say that it liberates people from the compulsion and power of sin: it "is at the same time most powerful and most pleasing." In addition, the Holy Spirit confers on these infused qualities a lasting character: though they are not inherently inadmissible [loseable] and do not owe their permanence to the will of humans, they derive their stability from the communion of the Holy Spirit, who created them, continually preserves and confirms them, and elevates the life that was infused in regeneration to a level above sin, corruption, and death. From its earliest beginnings the spiritual life is eternal life, and the seed that remains in the regenerate is imperishable. This has been denied by all who make the regeneration that is granted to the children of believers in their youth dependent for its continuity on a decision of the will that they must make later and leads to the distinction between a first and a second regeneration, between baptismal regeneration and a later spiritual renewal that again depends on the persons themselves. One cannot even stop here but must, in the interest of consistency, proceed to the acceptance of a series of rebirths, all of which can be lost and regained. Hollaz, for example, tried to argue that regeneration can be nullified three, four, or more times and yet regained. By taking that position, we are absolutely misjudging the love of God, the grace of the Son, and the communion of the Spirit, as well as the nature of the spiritual life. For this life is essentially distinct from all natural life. It is born of God, flows down to us from the resurrection of Christ, and is from the beginning effected, maintained, and confirmed in the fellowship of the Holy Spirit. For that reason it cannot sin or die, but lives, works, and grows, and in due time manifests itself in deeds of faith and conversion. Bavinck, vol. 4, pgs 94-95

Eternal Generation of the Son God's Disposition to Diffuse Himself

This excerpt from Bavinck expounds on Edwards' discourse on God disposition to diffuse himself in an emanation of his own infinite fullness, his internal glory ad extra, in abundance, as a spring tends to overflowing, etc.

The Holy Trinity

Son: Generation or Filiation

The special qualification of the second person in the Trinity is filiation. In Scripture he bears several names that denote his relation to the Father, such as word, wisdom, logos, son, the firstborn, only-begotten and only son, the image of God, image (εικων), substance (υποστασις), stamp (χαρακτηρ) [cf. Heb. 1:3]. The doctrine of “eternal generation” (αιωνος γεννησις), so called for the first time by Origen, was based on these names and a few texts cited above. In using these terms we are of course speaking in a human and hence an imperfect language, a fact that makes us cautious. Yet we have the right to speak this language. For just as the Bible speaks analogically of God’s ear, eye, and mouth, so human generation is an analogy and image of the divine deed by which the Father gives the Son “to have life in himself.” But when we resort to this imagery, we must be careful to remove all associations with imperfection and sensuality from it. The generation of a human being is imperfect and flawed. A husband needs a wife to bring forth a son. No man can ever fully impart his image, his whole nature, to a child or even to many children. A man becomes a father only in the course of time and then stops being a father, and a child soon becomes wholly independent from and self-reliant vis-à-vis his or her father. But it is not so with God. Generation occurs also in the divine being. Code192a God’s fecundity is a beautiful theme, one that frequently recurs in the church fathers. God is no abstract, fixed, monadic, solitary substance, but a plenitude of life. It is his nature (ουσια) to be generative (γεννητικη) and fruitful (καρπογονος). It is capable of expansion, unfolding, and communication. Those who deny this fecund productivity fail to take seriously the fact that God is an infinite fullness of blessed life. All such people have left is an abstract deistic concept of God, or to compensate for this sterility, in pantheistic fashion they include the life of the world in the divine being. Apart from the Trinity even the act of creation becomes inconceivable. For if God cannot communicate himself, he is a darkened light, a dry spring, unable to exert himself outward to communicate himself to creatures.

Still, that generation is to be conceived in divine terms. In the first place, it is spiritual. The Arians, in opposing the idea of divine generation, objected that all generation necessarily brings along with it separation (τομη) and division (διάρσεις), passion (πάθος) and emanation (ἀπορροιά). And that would be correct if it were physical, sensual, and creaturely. But it is spiritual, divine, and therefore simple, without division (ἀρρευστως) or separation (ἀδιάρετως). It occurs without flux and division. While giving rise to distinction and distribution in the divine being, it does not create divergence and division. Athanasius writes: “Inasmuch as God is simple, the Father of the Son is indivisible and without passion, for although in the case of humans we speak of outflow and inflow, we cannot predicate these things of anything that is incorporeal.” The most striking analogy of divine generation is thought and speech, and Scripture itself suggests this when it calls the Son “Logos” [Speech, Word, Reason]. Just as the human mind objectivizes itself in speech, so God expresses his entire being in the Logos [Christ]. But here, too, we must note the difference. Humans need many words to express their ideas. These words are sounds and therefore material, sense-related. They have no existence by themselves. But when God speaks, he totally expresses himself in the one person of the Logos, whom he also “granted to have life in himself” (John 5:26 NIV).

In the second place, therefore, divine generation implies that the Father begets the Son out of the being of the Father, “God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father,” as the Nicene symbol has it. The Arians, by contrast, contended that the Son had been brought forth by the will of the Father out of nothing. This, however, is not generation but creation, as John of Damascus points out. Creation is “the bringing into being, from the outside and not from the substance of the Creator, of something created and made entirely dissimilar [in substance],” while “begetting” means “producing of the substance of the begetter an offspring similar in substance to the begetter.” The Son is not a creature but he is “God over all, forever praised!” (Rom. 9:5 NIV). Accordingly, he was not brought forth by the will of the Father out of nothing and in time. Rather, he is generated out of the being of the Father in eternity. Hence, instead of viewing “generation” as an actual work, a performance (ενεργειά), of the Father, we should ascribe to the Father “a generative nature” (φυσις γεννητική). This is not to say, of course, that the generation is an unconscious and unwilled emanation, occurring apart from the will and power of the Father. It is not an act of an antecedent decreeing will, like creation, but one that is so divinely natural to the Father that his concomitant will takes perfect delight in it. It is a manifestation of what is truly expressive of his nature and essence, and therefore also of his knowledge, will, and power, in fact of all his virtues.

In the third place, therefore, the church confesses its belief in the eternal character of this generation. The Arians said that there was a time when the Son did not exist (ην ποτε οτε ουκ ην). They appealed especially to the words “he brought me forth,” or “created me” in Proverbs 8:22, and pointed out the antinomy between the terms “eternal” (αιωνος) and “begetting” (γεννησις). But if the “Father” and the “Son” bear their names in a metaphysical sense, as Scripture incontrovertibly teaches, it follows that the generation in question has to be eternal as well. For if the Son is not eternal, then of course God is not the eternal Father either. In that case he was God before he was Father, and only later—in time—became Father. Hence, rejection of the eternal generation of the Son involves not only a failure to do justice to the deity of the Son, but also to that of the Father. It makes him changeable, robs him of his divine nature, deprives him of the eternity of his fatherhood, and leaves unexplained how God can truly and properly be called “Father” in time if the basis for calling him “Father” is not eternally present in his nature. We must, accordingly, conceive that generation as being eternal in the true sense of the word. It is not something that was completed and finished at some point in eternity, but an eternal unchanging act of God, at once always complete and eternally ongoing. Just as it is natural for the sun to shine and for a spring to pour out water, so it is natural for the Father to generate the Son. The Father is not and never was ungenerative; he begets everlastingly. “The Father did not by a single act beget the Son and then release him from his ‘genesis,’ but generates him perpetually.” For God to beget is to speak, and his speaking is eternal. God’s offspring is eternal.

The life of God is divinely rich: it is fecund [producing or capable of producing an abundance of offspring or new growth, rich, proliferating; and I would say, overflowing like a spring or as a fountain, God being the fountain of all good, a spring as having a disposition to overflow, etc... seen in John 4:14, but whoever drinks of the water that I will give him will never be thirsty again. The water that I will give him will become in him a spring of water welling up to eternal life.”]; it implies action, productivity. The doctrine of the Trinity, accordingly, speaks of the generation of the Son and the procession of the Spirit. Both of these acts are essentially distinct from the work of creation: the former are immanent relations, while the latter is work ad extra. The former are sufficient in themselves: God does not need the creation. He is life, blessedness, glory in himself. Still, the creation is most closely connected with this fecundity.

Amillennialism, Old Testament Kingdom Prophecy and the New Covenant Hermeneutic

Code474

I think view of the latter days is the most consistent view compared to Premillennialism, Postmillennialism and Dispensational Premillennialism – and significantly so! The hermeneutic is to use New Covenant/New Testament didactic (teaching) texts, those that are plain and simple to interpret the more difficult, obscure, figurative texts of the Old Testament and Revelation. This is the “key” that opens the understanding of the latter days. It is becoming more apparent to me that the tendency for many is to try to figure out what prophecies in Daniel, Ezekiel, Revelation and so on, mean by doing this in reverse, not considering the teaching texts in the New Testament. This opens one up to inconsistent speculations leading to many illogical, inconsistent and absurd conclusion. Dean Davis and others like Sam Storms, Sam Waldron, Tim Conway spell this out very well.

OT Prophecies Considered: Daniel

Excerpts from The High King of Heaven by Dean Davis

My inserts in [blue]; in red to emphasize

The Coronation of the Divine Son of Man (vv. 13-14) pg 359

As Daniel continues to watch, still another vision appears before his inward eye. He beholds a Personage—One like a Son of Man—coming with the clouds of heaven to the Ancient of Days. An entourage, presumably of angels, brings him near to the throne (v. 13). At this point, God gives him dominion, glory, and a kingdom—or a right of sovereignty—so that all peoples, nations, and languages might serve him. Unlike the dominion of the four beasts, the dominion of the Son of Man will be everlasting. Unlike the kingdoms of the four beasts, the Kingdom of the Son of Man—which is the fruit of his dominion—will never pass away or be destroyed (v. 14).

Regarding this brief, opaque text, three great questions arise, questions that only the NT can answer in such a way as to bring clarity and conviction: (1) Who is the One like a Son of Man, (2) What is the nature of the transfer of authority here envisioned, and (3) When exactly does the transfer occur?

As for the One like a Son of Man, nearly all evangelical commentators identify him as the Messiah, the divine-human Lord Jesus Christ (Dan. 9:25-26). True, our text displays a certain parallel between the inheritance of the Son of Man (v. 14) and the inheritance of the saints (vv. 18, 27), suggesting to some that the Son of Man symbolizes the saints. But Daniel explicitly identifies this Personage as One who is like a Son of Man, and he uses the singular pronoun throughout to speak of him. As for the parallelism, the NT explains all, declaring that through Christ the saints will indeed reign (and judge) upon the earth (Rev. 2:26-27, 5:10). Very importantly, in the days of his flesh, the Lord Jesus over and over again spoke of himself as the Son of Man; it was, by far, his favorite self-designation, meant not only to identify him as the Messiah, but as a divine Messiah whose true origin is heaven itself. Notably, towards the end of his earthly course he explicitly cited this text while speaking to the Sanhedrin about his Parousia, lest there should be any confusion at all about which “Son of Man” he understood himself to be (Mt. 26:64, Mark 14:62)!

But what about the nature and timing of the transfer of authority from the Ancient of Days to his Messiah? Admittedly, the most natural reading of the text—apart from any reference to explicit NT teaching on the subject—is to say that God will bestow absolute and universal sovereignty upon the Messiah at the Judgment described in the vision immediately preceding; and, indeed, that it may well be the Messiah himself who executes that Judgment (vv. 9-12). Interestingly, certain OT apocrypha, along with several NT texts, make it clear that this was indeed the impression of at least some Jews in Jesus’ day, possibly including John the Baptizer himself (Mt. 3:12, John 12:34). However, the ambiguity here is considerable, and it stands as an open invitation to search the NT for much-needed help.

Happily, the NT does not disappoint. When was it, according to the NT, that Christ came to the Ancient of Days, riding upon the clouds of heaven (v. 13)? And when was it that God gave him dominion, glory, and absolute sovereignty over all creation, so that in the end all peoples, nations, and men of every tongue might serve both him and his Father (v. 14)? As we have already seen, both Jesus and his apostles answer fulsomely: All this occurred when the Father highly exalted Christ by raising him from the dead, catching him up into heaven on clouds of glory, seating him at his own right hand, and bestowing upon him all authority in heaven and earth, so that he might apply and consummate the redemption that he achieved through his humiliation on earth, thereby bringing the Kingdom to its full, final, and glorious form (Luke 19:12, Mt. 28:18ff, Acts 1:9-11, 2:22-36, Phil. 2:5-11, Heb. 1:1-3).

On this score, Rev. 4-5 is of special importance. Indeed, one might well argue that these two chapters constitute a NT elaboration of Dan. 7:9-14. In Revelation 4 we behold the Ancient of Days, the eternal Creator and Judge of the world, seated in glory upon his throne. In Revelation 5 we then behold the Redeemer. Using apocalyptic imagery quite reminiscent of Daniel 7, the Spirit here depicts the session of the Lord Jesus Christ. Having “prevailed” on earth to fulfill all righteousness and atone for the sins of his people, the Lion/Lamb enters heaven, comes before the Father, and, in taking a scroll from his hand, receives all authority in heaven and on earth (Rev. 5:1-7, 12). Henceforth, he is authorized to “break the seals” on God’s last will and testament. That is, he is commissioned to superintend the remainder of Salvation History with a view to applying the merits of his redemptive work to the elect, gathering in a people for God’s possession from every tribe, tongue, people and nation, thereby creating a kingdom of priests who will inherit (the fullness of) eternal life and who will everlastingly reign upon the earth (Rev. 5:8-14). This is Daniel 7:9-14, writ large.

But this line of interpretation raises a legitimate question: Why, in Daniel 7, would the Spirit represent the heavenly reign of Christ as coming after the Last Judgment? Several answers, rooted in NT eschatology, come to mind.

First, the text itself hints that here we are in fact dealing with two visions rather than one, for both begin with the telltale introductory phrase: “I saw in my vision by night” (vv. 2-12, 13-14). Yes, the chapter as a whole may indeed be reckoned as a single vision; but at the very least, these verbal markers suggest that 7:13-14 touches upon a new (though related) theme. The NT, as we have just seen, seems to confirm this very thing in Revelation 4-5, where first we have a vision of God the Father as Judge, and then a vision of the Lord Jesus Christ as the High King of Heaven, with divine authority to rescue his people from the Judge.

Secondly, the burden of Daniel 7 is to speak of the great inversion of rulership that will occur at the end of Salvation History. It is, then, altogether fitting for the Spirit to touch on Christ’s heavenly reign in such a way as to emphasize its end result, precisely as he does in verse 14.

Finally, the sequence of the two visions effectively underscores a pervasive biblical theme: The Messianic Son of Man is subordinate to the Ancient of Days; the Ancient of Days is the fountainhead of all divine authority, from whom the Son of Man will receive the right to rule in such a way as to create the eternal Kingdom of God. As we have seen, the NT fleshes out this important theme in a number of texts, especially 1 Corinthians 15:20-28.

Given that Daniel received this vision in an era when God was pleased to conceal or veil the mystery of the Eternal Covenant, it should not surprise us that here much eschatological truth is fused, hidden, or (purposely) left unclear. This includes the two stages of the Kingdom, the Messiah's heavenly reign, its distinctly redemptive character, the exact sequence of events leading up to the Judgment, the Messiah's role in the Judgment, and his role in the coming of the Kingdom in its fullness. But in the NT—and especially in Revelation 4-5—all is unveiled, clarified, and set in good order. Therefore, the NT mysteries of the Kingdom—and the NCH [New Covenant Hermeneutic] that is built upon them—have prevailed, not only to open up Daniel 7, but all OTKP [Old Testament Kingdom Prophecy]. Without them we are at sea. With them, we reach our desired haven and stand confidently upon solid ground.

Chapter 18

OT Kingdom Prophecies

Considered: Zechariah
Pg 381

We turn our attention now to the most prolific—and most fascinating—of the three post-exilic prophets: Zechariah (fl. 500 BC). Like his rough contemporaries, Haggai and Malachi, this great OT priest, seer, and martyr comforted a subjugated and much enfeebled nation with visions and prophecies of a glorious future. Over and again, he spoke of the coming of the Messiah, the final defeat of Israel's enemies, and the final restoration of God's people, land, temple, priesthood, and holy city—Jerusalem.

Our focus in the present chapter is Zechariah 12-14. It is the second of two lengthy prophetic oracles dealing with the future Kingdom of God. In order to understand the second well, let us look briefly at the first.

Zechariah 9-11

In essence, these three chapters constitute a single word of promise: In days ahead, God will send the Messiah, a mighty warrior-king who will lead Israel—fully regathered to her homeland in a Second Exodus from all the nations where God had scattered them—to victory over her perennial foes, and then to the eternal enjoyment of his covenant promises and blessings (9:1-10:12). We observe, however, that this oracle concludes on a dark and mysterious note: Far from following their Messiah, it appears that Israel's wicked leaders will actually reject their God-sent Shepherd-King, thereby annulling the Old Covenant, forfeiting God's protection, and exposing the nation to destruction (11:1ff)! And yet, in spite of all this, God will still have mercy upon a portion of his people, whom Zechariah calls "the afflicted of the flock" (10:2; 11:7, 11; 13:7).

How are we to resolve this apparent contradiction? Here, NT hindsight gives us much-needed insight: The afflicted of the flock are a remnant of elect Jews (Rom. 9:6ff), called by God to recognize the divine-human Messiah (11:11; John 1:14, 6:40), enlist in his spiritual army (10:5f, 2 Cor. 10:4-6, 2 Tim. 2:4), preach his Gospel (9:10, 10:4f, 2 Cor. 2:14-16), gather eschatological “Judah” and “Ephraim” from the four corners of the earth to their spiritual homeland (9:11-17, 10:6; Titus 2:11-14), and— together with their new-born Gentile brethren—follow him to consummate victory on the Day of the LORD (9:11-17; Rev. 6:1-2, 19:11-16).

Summary:

We find, then, that Zechariah’s first oracle is primarily fulfilled in the first stage of the Kingdom; the stage in which Christ, through his humiliation and exaltation, purchases the “the Israel of God,” gathers her out of the Domain of Darkness, and leads her in triumphant Gospel combat beneath the banner of the High King of Heaven.

Zechariah 12-14

This brings us to Zechariah’s second oracle, found in chapters 12-14. Here again his theme is the coming Kingdom, but this time with an emphasis upon the Consummation. I have entitled it “Jerusalem in that Day,” since here the expression “in that Day” occurs some 15 times! To read the oracle itself is to see why: In essence, it is a series of prophetic “snapshots,” most of which look ahead to one or another facet of the eschatological “Day” wherein God will bring his Kingdom purposes to complete fulfillment. As we shall see, the prophet does indeed include a few references to the Era of Proclamation. But again, the emphasis here clearly falls upon the Consummation; upon the Day in which the LORD God will intervene in history one last time to execute final judgment upon Israel’s enemies, administer final redemption to his people, and usher them into the everlasting age of blessing and worship for which they have patiently waited, hoped, and longed, generation after generation.

In short, the “burden” of Zechariah’s final oracle is to reveal the final acts of God in the final stages of Salvation History.

Interpretive Approaches

As every student of the prophetic Scriptures knows, Zechariah 12-14 contains especially difficult and controversial OTKP’s. Therefore, we do well to ask at the outset: What method of prophetic interpretation will best guide us through the maze of competing views, and bring us safely to the insight and certainty we desire?

As we have seen, our premillennarian brethren are not shy about answering: We must use the method of prophetic literalism. Wayne Grudem, a respected historic premillennarian, is among them. Citing Zechariah 14:5-17, he writes:

Here again the description does not fit the present (Church) age, for the Lord is King over all the earth in this situation. But it does not fit the eternal state, either, because of the disobedience and rebellion against the Lord that is clearly present ... (Passages like this) indicate some future stage in the history of redemption which is far greater than the present church age but which still does not see the removal of all sin and rebellion and death from the earth.”

In this defense of premillennialism, Grudem does not openly espouse prophetic literalism. Nevertheless, it is quite clear that he approaches Zechariah's prophecy—and all OTKP—on the assumption that it is indeed the only valid method of prophetic interpretation. And if Grudem is right, then his conclusion is also right: Zechariah's oracle must be fulfilled in the eschatological agony, conversion, and millennial exaltation of ethnic Israel. For the prophetic literalist who is trying to honor NT revelation, there is simply no other option.

However, as natural as this approach may appear to be, we have seen repeatedly that the NT positively rejects it both by precept and example. For again, both Christ and the apostles consistently teach that the true sphere of fulfillment of all OTKP is the New Covenant, and also the new spiritual nation to which it gives birth: the eschatological "Israel of God," the Church (comprised of Jew and Gentile). But if this is so, then we cannot interpret this or any other OTKP literally. Rather, we must interpret it eschatologically, covenantally, typologically, and ecclesiologically. We must understand it as a "veiled" and "mysterious" representation of life under the New Covenant; life in one or both of the stages of the spiritual Kingdom that the New Covenant creates. Importantly, to adopt this approach is to see immediately that in Zechariah's great oracle, God was speaking not only to OT Jews, but also—and primarily—to the Christian Church, supplying her with the wisdom, strength, and comfort she will need for her arduous pilgrimage through the Domain of Darkness, especially as she enters the last of the last days (Col. 2:2, Eph. 4:3, 13).

A Critique of Premillennial Approaches

I have suggested that the NCH gives us the best possible understanding of Zechariah 12-14. We should rejoice that it does, seeing that premillennial views involve so many intractable problems. Because of the popularity of those views, let us mention a few of the most important.

First, the oracle says nothing at all about a temporary millennial reign of Christ. Anyone who reads the text objectively, refusing to import millennial presuppositions into it, will see immediately that Zechariah is speaking of the conversion of eschatological Israel, the Last Battle, the Day of the LORD, and the eternal worship of the World to Come. It is completely counterintuitive to think that an oracle so grand—so cosmic—in its scale, should have as its terminus ad quem a temporary millennial reign of the Messiah, rather than the ultimate glories of the perfected Kingdom of God.

Secondly, we have already seen that this oracle gives us one of at least five different OT prophecies of the Last Battle. We have also seen that if we interpret them all literally, it is impossible to reconcile the conflicting data. Therefore, the only viable solution is to affirm, with the NCH [new covenant hermeneutic], that in each such prophecy the Spirit is giving us a symbolic—a typologically veiled—revelation of the final clash between the Church and the World, a clash whose true nature is fully disclosed only in the NT. This approach alone retains the divine inspiration, inerrancy, and perspicuity of Scripture.

Thirdly, there is the problem of anachronisms. Do we really want to say, for example, that in our technologically advanced age the nations of the earth will come up against ethnic Israel riding horses, camels, and donkeys; or that they will bring cattle with them to serve as food (12:4, 14:15)?

Good questions

Fourthly, there are theological problems. How is it that in the Millennium—when Christ himself is allegedly seated upon his throne in Jerusalem—that Israel and the nations will revert to observing the Mosaic Law; a Law that, according to the NT, Christ himself fulfilled and rendered obsolete (Mt. 5:17, Rom. 10:4, Heb. 8:13)? In particular, will parents really take it upon themselves to administer Mosaic sanctions by executing the false prophet who sprang from their loins (13:2-4; Deut. 18:20, 13:13)? Will the nations really go up to a physical Jerusalem to join ethnic Israel in observing the Feast of Booths (14:16)? Will they really bring animal sacrifices to a physical Temple; and will priests really lay those sacrifices upon a physical altar, or boil them in physical cooking pots (14:20-21)? The mind steeped in NT revelation simply cannot bring itself to assent to such propositions. Instead, it looks immediately and instinctively for NT antitypes; for the NT spiritual realities of which all these mysterious pictures are OT types, shadows, and symbols.

Finally, what about the bearing of the rest of the book upon the interpretation of this particular oracle? Was there ever an OT prophet whose writing more fully embodied the “apocalyptic” mode of divine revelation than Zechariah? Was there ever a prophet who more consistently edified and encouraged God’s OT people by clothing his great eschatological revelations in vision and symbol? If, as all agree, the first half of Zechariah’s book (Zech. 1-8) is completely devoted to eight mystical visions loaded with Messianic and Kingdom symbolism, is it not likely that the second half of the book (Zech. 9-14), which is devoted to two great prophetic oracles, is loaded with Messianic and Kingdom symbolism, as well? Indeed, since the first half of the book also contains a number of prophecies, and the second half also contains a number of visions, is it not clear that the whole book is apocalyptic through and through, and that we must therefore interpret it symbolically, rather than literally?

Key!!

We conclude, then, from evidence found both in the OT and the New, that premillennial interpretations of Zechariah 12-14 are fatally flawed, and that our only hope of penetrating to the deep meaning of this great oracle lies in the skillful use of the NCH. In a moment, we will attempt this very thing. First, however, I must offer one further introductory word.

Snapshots Ahead

As mentioned above, Zechariah’s final oracle is composed of a series of prophetic “snapshots.” The Reformation Study Bible explains it this way:

Our understanding of the teaching of Zechariah is greatly helped when we recognize that the prophet gives pictures of the future in snapshot fashion, in which the pictures are not placed in any particular sequence. When we read a passage, we see only what is happening in that snapshot, not how it relates to the other snapshots.

In this helpful observation, the key word is sequence. Yes, the snapshots are related, but thematically, rather than chronologically. We see this vividly in the frequent appearance of the eschatological marker “in that Day.” Through the use of this expression, the Spirit is letting us know that he is now speaking of the two-staged Kingdom of God and Christ. But through its use he is also letting us know that he is now giving us yet another cameo; yet another fresh miniature portrait of some event or characteristic of life proper to that (particular stage of the) Kingdom.

Does the oracle as a whole have any chronological drift or momentum? To be sure. Moreover, once we abandon premillennial literalism and futurism in favor of the NCH, we are able to see it clearly. Broadly speaking, it turns out that the prophecy is much like Ezekiel 36-39: It passes from the Era of Proclamation and Probation (the Kingdom of the Son), through the Last Battle and the Day of the Lord, into the World to Come (the Kingdom of the Father). Nevertheless, even as we bear this overall perspective in mind, we must recognize that each snapshot stands more or less on its own. Yes, its exact place in the total oracle will help us to interpret it; but having received that help, we must look for its essential meaning in the OT symbols themselves, and in the NT truths to which those symbols so mysteriously point.

With all this as introduction, we are ready at long last to begin our exegetical journey through Zechariah 12-14.

Strong in the LORD (12:1-9)

The opening prophecy, highly reminiscent of material found in chapters 9-10, sounds the theme of the oracle as a whole: In the eschatological conflict between “Israel” and the nations (i.e., between the Church and the World), God will be the strength of his people, leading them through much suffering to final triumph. Importantly, here the phrase “in that day” recurs five separate times. The NCH would have us receive this as a sign that we are dealing with events to occur in the eschatological era, which is the New Covenant era, the Kingdom era, and the Church era. We must, then, with the Spirit’s help, endeavor to “decode” the prophecy, so as to discern the NT meanings here embedded in OT language and imagery.

Since each of the nine verses in our snapshot is a prophetic nugget in its own right, I will briefly comment upon them one verse at a time.

In verse 1, Zechariah characterizes the entire forthcoming oracle (chapters 12-14) as “the burden of the word of the LORD concerning Israel.” It is a burden not only because it brings heavy tidings, but also because it burdens the prophet with a sense of urgency to deliver it to God’s people.

It concerns, not ethnic Israel, but eschatological “Israel:” the Church, which will be composed of Jews and Gentiles living and serving together as one family and one nation under Christ (Gal. 6:16, Eph. 2:15, Rev. 12:1f).

Good summary:

Importantly, the oracle emanates from the Creator and Sustainer of the cosmos, the One who is sovereign over all history for the sake of his people and his glory (Rom. 8:28, Eph. 1:11-12). Since Zechariah will speak of the Consummation later in his oracle, we may safely conclude that here, in the opening snapshot, his focus is largely upon the Church’s spiritual warfare throughout the entire Era of Proclamation and Probation; throughout the first stage of the Kingdom; throughout the stage that the Holy Spirit, in the Revelation, refers to as “the Great Tribulation” (Acts 14:22, Rev. 7:14).

According to verse 2, the sovereign God has purposed to make the Church—the NT City of God (Gal. 4:26, Heb. 12:22)—a cup that causes reeling to all the (hostile) peoples around her. All who reject her Gospel and attack her will become drunk with God’s judicial blindness, and will therefore stagger and fall beneath his judgments (Jer. 25:15-16, 2 Thess. 2:1ff). Such is the fate of all who would harm his (gospel) prophets; of all who would touch the apple of his eye (Psalm 105:15, Zech. 2:8, Rev. 11:5). The eschatological siege—mounted throughout the Church Era—will not only be against the capital city of the holy nation (i.e., Church leaders and public institutions), but against the tribal villages as well (i.e., the laity themselves). All who would live godly in Christ Jesus will suffer persecution (Mt. 5:10-12, 1 Thess. 3:1-4, 2 Tim. 3:12).

Very good here:

In verse 3 the imagery changes, though the message remains much the same. In the eschatological Era, God will place the Church as a stone before all peoples. Those who build their lives upon this stone—by building them upon the Christ whom the Church proclaims—will live (Mt. 7:24ff; 1 Tim. 3:15). But those who stumble over it (1 Peter 2:4-8) and thereafter seek to “lift” it out of their way via persecution, will be severely injured. Indeed, Jesus, the Head of the Church, says that all such persons will be ground to dust and scattered like powder (Mt. 21:44). Throughout the Era of Proclamation, many (unbelieving) peoples will gather against the Church; at the end of the age, all will (14:2).

In verse 4 the Spirit uses OT martial imagery to promise that throughout the Era of Proclamation God will continually watch over—and rise to the defense of—his eschatological “house of Judah,” the redeemed tribe of his Messianic Son, the Church. This calls to mind the many occasions in which God confounded the plans of the enemies of Christ’s apostles, so that they might fully proclaim the Gospel to one and all, and so finish their course victoriously, with great joy (Acts 4:1-27, 5:17ff, 12:1-19, 13:4-12, 16:16-40, 18:1-17, 19:21ff, 20:24, 2 Tim. 4:18).

Verses 5-6 depict the gladness and dynamism of the eschatological “clans of Judah”—that is, of Church leaders serving all throughout the Era of Proclamation. In verse 5 we find them reveling in the spiritual vitality, loyalty, and support of “the inhabitants of Jerusalem;” glorying in the gifts and graces of everyday Christians eager to serve the cause of Christ. Here, one thinks of the apostle Paul, effusing over the prayers, outreach, and generosity of the Gentile assemblies he had founded (2 Cor. 8, 9; Phil. 1:3-11, 4:10ff, 1 Thess. 1, 2).

Verse 6 pictures the great unction and effectiveness of these latter-day Gospel warriors: Ablaze with the Spirit, they will be led in triumph in Christ, diffusing the knowledge of the Redeemer in every place, and infallibly building up his Church (2 Cor. 2:14-17, Eph. 4:7-16). Some (i.e., those who are being saved) they will “consume on the right hand,” torching their opposition to Christ, and so transforming them into spiritual brethren and fellow-citizens of the Jerusalem above (Phil. 3:20). Others (i.e., those who are perishing), they will “consume on the left hand,” consigning them, through their own impenitence, to the fires of judgment (John 3:19-21, 20:23, Acts 13:46). At the end of the Era of Proclamation, when the battle is over and the victory complete, all the inhabitants of Jerusalem will dwell securely in their eternal home(s), with none to frighten or attack again (John 14:3).

The message of verse 7—a prophetic nugget best interpreted in isolation from verses 5-6—is that “in that Day” God will pour a new social dynamic into the eschatological nation: None of his people will glory above the rest. Special honors will no longer be accorded to a royal family, or to the inhabitants of a capital city (let Rome take note!). Instead, God will distribute the gifts of his Spirit in such a way as to preclude divisions in Christ’s Body; in such a way that the members of the Body will have the same care one for another (1 Cor. 12:22-25). Therefore, far from seeking to exalt himself, he who is greatest in that Day will be the servant of all (Mark 9:35); each will regard his brother as more important than himself (Phil. 2:3); and all will seek glory and honor, not for themselves, but for Christ (2 Cor. 10:17, Gal. 6:14).

Verse 8 uses vivid OT imagery to declare that throughout the Era of Proclamation the LORD will defend his NT warriors and make them mighty through God for the tearing down of (spiritual) strongholds (2 Cor. 10:4f). Though their bodies may indeed feed the flames, not a hair of their head (i.e., their regenerate souls) will perish (Luke 21:18, John 17:11, 15, 1 Cor. 13:3). In and of themselves they are a picture of spiritual weakness and poverty, but they can do all things through Christ who strengthens them, even to the extent of casting (spiritual) mountains into the depths of the sea (Zech. 4:6-7; Mt. 5:3, 21:21, 2 Cor. 12:9, Phil. 4:13). Through them, God’s eschatological Zerubbabel will build his Church (Zech. 4:1-10, Mt. 16:18).

While verse 9 is indeed applicable to the entire Church era, its contents and position at the end of this prophetic snapshot suggest that here the Spirit is mainly looking ahead to the Day of the LORD, a theme to be taken up in chapter 14. If so, the judgment here in view will be the one which immediately follows the Last Battle, when Christ descends from heaven to rescue his beleaguered Bride and to destroy the assembled enemies of God, once and for all (14:2f, Rev. 19:11ff).

Before Strength, Tears (12:10-14)

How is it that eschatological Jerusalem [the church] will become a cup of reeling to the nations (12:2); how is it that God will so zealously come to her aid (12:4, 9); how is it that his people will find such great strength for the battle (12:5-7)? Zechariah’s next prophetic snapshot supplies the answer: They will enjoy these blessings because “in that Day” God will grant them deep, Spirit-wrought repentance and faith in Christ (12:10-14).

This will be the key to their eschatological victory. Why? Because this kind of repentance and faith will be the earmark of their regeneration and justification; because regeneration and justification will make them members of the New Covenant nation; and because the parties to the New Covenant are destined to inherit the promise of the New Covenant: redemptive rescue from every enemy of the Domain of Darkness, and redemptive restoration to all the blessings of eternal life. Such a people—with such a covenant-keeping God on their side—cannot fail to triumph in the great eschatological clash of the kingdoms!

When will this beautiful prophecy be fulfilled? Premillennial interpreters, bound by their literalist hermeneutic, feel compelled to interpret it ethnically, and therefore futuristically. John MacArthur writes, “Israel’s repentance will come because they look to Jesus, the One whom they rejected and crucified, in faith at the Second Advent.” But this view is deeply problematic. How did the Jews described in 12:1-9 enjoy such strength and blessing from God if they were not yet converted to Christ? How shall the houses of David, Nathan, Levi, and Shimei suddenly reappear on the stage of history just prior to Christ's return? And how can Israel's national conversion be effected by the visible return of Christ, when, according to pervasive NT teaching, God's pleasure and purpose in NT times is to save sinners strictly by the "foolishness of preaching" (Mt. 28:18ff, John 17:17, Romans 10:14ff, 1 Cor. 1:21)?

No, premillennial literalism cannot uncover the meaning of this prophecy, nor can it illumine the time of its fulfillment. But the NCH can. Let us therefore bring that hermeneutic to the text for a closer look.

Zechariah's words will be fulfilled "in that Day," that is, in the eschatological era, the New Covenant era (12:11). Moreover, as the words themselves make clear, they will be fulfilled in the first stage of that Era: The Era of Proclamation and Probation. [or the age of the church - from Pentecost till Christ returns. That's the amillennialist's millennium – not a literal 1000 years but figurative one...a long period of time.]

Verse 10 gives us the theme, verses 11-14 elaborate. Each phrase of the long first verse is rich with meaning and deeply affecting.

In that Day, the sovereign God will pour out his Spirit upon the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. In other words, beginning at Pentecost and continuing right up to the Consummation, he will pour out his Spirit upon his elect, both Jew and Gentile (Acts 2:1ff). As the NT teaches, these are God's latter-day Israel (Gal. 6:16), his royal priesthood (1 Peter 2:9), and his chosen city of habitation (Gal. 4:26, Eph. 2:22, Rev. 21:1-4).

When the Spirit falls upon them, he will be to them "a Spirit of grace and supplication." That is, he will graciously make known to them the grace of God provided in Christ, and he will move them to supplicate God and Christ for a salvation they desperately need (John 1:14, Acts 2:37, Acts 11:18, 16:30, 20:24, Eph. 2:8-9, Titus 2:11-14).

In this process, the NT saints of all generations "... will look upon (him) whom they pierced." The NT explains: When Christ is lifted up through the preaching of the Cross (John 3:14-15, 12:32), the Spirit will enable God's people to look upon him (Christ), behold his deity (John 1:14, 6:40, 14:9), and see that, in a very real sense, it was they themselves who nailed him to the Tree. How so? Because the (God-ordained) death that he died, he died not for his own sins, but for theirs (Mark 10:45, Rom. 6:10, 1 Peter 3:18, Rev. 5:1ff). Moreover, the same Spirit will enable these newborn saints not only to look upon Christ as the God-Man, but also to look to Christ as their Redeemer; he will enable them to trust, obey, and believe in Christ—and Christ alone—for the salvation of their immortal souls (John 4:14-15, 6:29, 40, Heb. 12:2).

In the end, the fruit of this spiritual rebirth will be joy unspeakable and full of glory; but the birth itself will not be without mourning and tears (Luke 15:7, John 16:21, 1 Peter 1:8). This is the theme of the rest of the prophecy. Conviction of sin—and corresponding sorrow over all that sin has cost God, Christ, and man—will run deep, deep as the grieving of parents over the loss of their only son (12:10); or deep as the grieving of a whole nation over the loss of a godly and beloved king (12:11; 2 Chron. 35:20-27, Mt. 26:75, Luke 7:36-50, John 16:8-14). This sorrow will also be universal: It will touch every inhabitant of the land, every marriage, every generation of every family (e.g., David and his son, Nathan; Levi and his grandson, Shimei), and every institution (e.g., kings, priests, people), (11-14). And yet Zechariah's words are indeed glad tidings, for here, draped in OT type and shadow, is yet another proclamation of one of the great promises of the Kingdom: Through the eschatological gift of the Spirit—and the resulting gifts of repentance, faith, and a new, circumcised heart—all of God's people will be holy (Deut. 30:6, Jer. 31:31-34, Ezek. 36:24-32, 1 Peter 1:16, Phil. 3:3, Col. 2:11, Heb. 8:6-13). All of God's people will be born again (John 3:3, 7, 1 Peter 1:23).

In passing, I want to acknowledge an element of truth present in premillennial interpretations of this passage. Premillennarians say that this is an OT prophecy of the latter-day conversion of ethnic Israel. In part they are right, for whenever a Jewish man or woman is called to Christ, it is fulfilled (Rom. 11:5). It will also be fulfilled when God, at the end of the age, through the preaching of the Gospel, calls a great multitude of Jews to faith in the first of Israel's "firstborn" sons, thus grafting (much of) ethnic Israel back into the vine of Abraham, the father of all the faithful (Rom. 4:1ff, 8:29, 11:11-32, Col. 1:18, Heb. 1:6, 12:23).

We must understand, however, that these are only partial fulfillments of our text, and that Zechariah 12:10-14 is fully fulfilled, neither in Jewish converts alone, nor in Gentile converts alone, but in all converts; in the One New Man and the One New Nation that is the Spirit-filled Body of Christ, composed of believing Jews and Gentiles (Eph. 2:15, 1 Peter 2:9).

So then, our premillennarian brothers are correct when they assert that this prophecy is fulfilled among latter-day Jews. But they err when they say it is fulfilled exclusively among latter-day Jews, exclusively at the end of the age, and exclusively at the Second Coming of Christ. Thanks be to God for the NCH, which helps to see all these things clearly, and so to make our way, together, towards his amazing eschatological truth!

After Tears, Cleansing (13:1-6)

This is the third prophetic snapshot in Zechariah's oracle. Aided by the NCH, we can readily discern its essential meaning: In the New Covenant Era, and as a result of Christ's atoning sacrifice for sin, God will sanctify his Church, purging it—and ultimately the whole world—of idolatry, false religion, and the deceiving spirits that are behind them. God's people themselves will have a role in this, as they use Church discipline—wherever and whenever necessary— to maintain the spiritual purity of their assemblies. Let us look briefly at the text itself to see exactly how the Spirit conveys this encouraging message.

In verse 1 God unveils the basis, or ground, of his sanctifying work in the Church. Every phrase is rich with meaning. "In that Day," points ahead to the Era of Fulfillment, especially the Era of Proclamation. "A fountain will be opened"—at Calvary, where Christ's blood will be shed in order to make atonement for sin; in order to secure the regeneration, sanctification, and eventual glorification of God's covenant people (Mk. 14:24, Rom. 3:25, 8:29-30). "For the house of David, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem"— for the Messiah's spiritual seed, and for God's spiritual City: the Church of all ages (Luke 1:32-33, John 10:11, 15, Acts 20:28, Eph. 5:25). "For sin and impurity"—not only to forgive it, but also to wash it away; to cleanse (the souls of) God's people from all inward defilement. Again, such cleansing—such sanctification—is the focus of our text, a focus shared by the apostle when he wrote of Christ that "... (he) gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from every lawless deed and purify for himself a people for his own possession, zealous for good works" (Titus 2:14; 2 Cor. 7:1, Eph. 4:26-27, Col. 1:22, John 1:9).

Verse 2 specifies two results of the open fountain of Christ's blood. First, God will cut off the names of the idols from the land. That is, by the regenerating and sanctifying work of the Spirit, he will remove the names of every false god from the lips of his NT people, seeing that henceforth they will desire only to call upon his name and the name of his Son (Ezek. 36:25, 1 Cor. 1:2, 8:1-6, 2 Tim. 2:22). And secondly, he will remove the false prophets and the unclean spirit from the land. In other words, he will remove false prophets, false teachers, and the deceiving spirits that animate them, from the Church, a people seated in heavenly places in Christ, and therefore justly referred to here as the inhabitants of Immanuel's Land (1 Tim. 4:1-3, 2 Tim. 3:1ff, Heb. 12:22, 2 Peter 2:1f, 1 John 4:1-6).

Verse 3 intimates one way in which the cleansing will come about. Under the Law, false prophets who enticed Israel to serve other gods were punishable by death; and indeed, relatives of such prophets—including their parents—were specifically warned not to hesitate in delivering them up to that punishment (Deut. 13:6-11). In our text, God is therefore saying that "in that Day" eschatological Israel will, at long last, rise eagerly to the fulfillment of their duty under the Law. Zealous for the presence of the Holy One of Israel in their midst, they will be willing even to hand their own (spiritual) children over to death.

The NT fulfillment of this prophecy is not difficult to see: In the Era of Proclamation, Christian parents will subject even their own children—whether physical or spiritual—to Church discipline, discipline up to and including the spiritual "death penalty" of excommunication (Mt. 18:15-18, 1 Cor. 5:1-5, 1 John 2:19, 4:1-4, Rev. 2:2). However, they will do so in love and hope; love for their souls, and hope that through such discipline they (the children) will again be restored to life among the people of God (1 Cor. 5:5, 2 Cor. 2:3f). Thus shall the Holy Spirit—and the Holy People—preserve the spiritual purity of Immanuel's Land: the Church of Christ.

Verses 4-6 picture a Day when the Spirit-filled people of God will be so vigilant and so discerning that false prophets will not dare to ply their wicked trade among them. Verse 6, which alludes to the physical self-abuse practiced by the worshipers of pagan gods (Lev. 19:28, 1 Kings 18:28), is a parable of what will occur: When eschatological Israelites [the church] confront false prophets wearing the telltale marks of their idolatrous faith (e.g., error, immorality, confusion, disunity, etc.), they (the false prophets) will try, unsuccessfully, to conceal the truth with outright lies. Many NT texts—and the bloody theological battlefield of Church history—display the fulfillment of this prophecy: Always and everywhere, ravenous spiritual wolves—false brethren, false teachers, and false prophets dressed up as Christ's sheep—have sought to infiltrate the Lord's folds and win a following, only to be discovered, reprov'd, and expelled by the faithful undershepherds of the flock (Mt. 7:15, Acts 20:29, Gal. 2:1-5, 6:13, 2 Peter 2:1, Jude 1:4, Titus 1:10-16, 1 John 4:1f, Rev. 2:2).

Pg 409

At the beginning of our journey, we identified four fundamental flashpoints of controversy in the Great End Time Debate: The Kingdom of God, the proper interpretation of OTKP, the Millennium, and the Consummation. Happily, our close study of the Kingdom supplied welcome insights into the other three questions. Having learned that the Kingdom appears in two simple stages—the Kingdom of the Son (i.e., the heavenly, mediatorial reign of Christ) followed by the Kingdom of the Father (i.e., the glorified World to Come)—we realized that the thousand years of Revelation cannot be a third, intermediate stage of the Kingdom sandwiched between the other two, as premillennarians assert. Similarly, having learned that the two stages of the Kingdom are separated by a single Consummation at the Parousia of Christ, we realized that the Consummation cannot be fragmented into multiple comings, resurrections, and judgments, as premillennarians also assert. In short, our study of the Kingdom has gone far towards resolving the End Time Debate in favor of the classic amillennial view of Salvation History.

It remains, however, for us to probe Revelation 20 itself. If it does not describe a future millennial reign of Christ on earth, what exactly does it describe? If, as I have suggested along the way, it speaks of the Kingdom of the Son, is there anything in the Revelation broadly, or in Revelation 20 itself, to support this view? Our purpose in Part 4 of our journey is to find out.

Let us begin, then, by getting a feel for the Revelation as a whole. In particular, let us see if there is anything in the purpose, literary genre, and structure of the book that will help us better understand the Millennium of Revelation 20.

The Purpose of the Revelation

We begin to discern the purpose of the Revelation when we consider the circumstances in which it was given.

The year, according to most scholars, is around 95 A.D. John, in all probability the last living apostle, is now in his 80's (John 21:21-23). Because of his faithfulness in preaching the Gospel, the Roman authorities have exiled him to a penal settlement on the island of Patmos (1:9, John 21:21-23). It has been over 60 years since Christ's ascension. The Lord is tarrying, and among many believers the expectation of his Parousia is waning (2 Peter 3:1f). The demonic emperor Nero (A.D. 54-68), a vicious persecutor of the Roman Christians, has come and gone. Titus has decimated Jerusalem (70 A.D.). Under Domitian (A.D. 81-89), persecution has spread throughout the Empire and reached Asia (A.D. 81-9). More is now looming (2:3, 10, 13). And beyond this external threat, there are internal, as well. Heretical "Christian" sects have grown in size and number, whose members are seeking to penetrate the orthodox churches and draw away disciples (2:2, 6, 14-15, 20-24). Some churches are even tolerating them in their midst (2:14f, 20f). Meanwhile, others are in decline: The love of certain Christians is growing cold (2:4, 3:1-2); others, having thus far escaped the fires of persecution, are falling in love with the world, and sinking into apathy and hedonism (3:14-21). The situation is dire. The faltering Church needs a word from the Lord.

The Revelation as a Gift to the Universal Church

The Revelation—all 22 chapters of it—is that word. Notably, at the very outset it is described as a gift: a gift from God the Father—through Christ, through the Spirit,² through angelic mediation, and through the apostle John—to the seven churches of Asia (Rev. 1:1-6, 9, 22:8). Seven, however, is the biblical number of perfection or completeness (Gen. 2:2,3). The meaning is clear. God gave the Revelation, not just to the seven churches of Asia, but also to what the seven churches represent: the complete Church, the Universal Church. Likewise, the seven lampstands symbolize the one universal Church, especially in her present ministry as the Light of God and Christ to a world sunk in deep spiritual darkness (Rev. 1:13, 20)

With the benefit of hindsight, we can see that history bears out this important truth. Like the seven churches, the universal Church has always had strengths and weaknesses; like the seven churches, it has always faced persecution, deception, and temptation; and like the seven churches, it has therefore always needed the Revelation. The book is, then, a great gift from the head of the universal Church, to the universal Church, for the help of the universal Church. Note carefully an important implication of this truth: the Revelation was not meant to be a closed book—not when it was given, not now, and not ever (Rev. 22:10). The Lord desires his whole Church—past, present, and future—to understand, obey, preach, and profit from the Revelation.

And that includes chapter 20, as well!

The Revelation as a Prophecy to the Universal Church

John also describes the Revelation as a prophecy (Rev. 22:10, 18). Now according to the apostle Paul, he who prophesies speaks to men for edification, exhortation, and comfort (1 Cor. 14:3). This short definition wonderfully captures the flavor—and the purpose—of the book. Everywhere we turn, we hear the exalted Christ prophesying to his Church. Everywhere we find him teaching, warning, and encouraging her, so that she may “overcome” all opponents and safely enter the completed Kingdom at his return (2:11, 2:26, etc.).

Since this idea is so important—namely, that the Revelation is essentially an extended prophecy—let us develop it a little further by looking at the three fundamental ways in which the High King of Heaven here prophesies to his beloved Bride.

The Prophet Teaches His Church

First, Christ teaches the Church. Here I especially have in mind the way he builds up the Church Militant in her understanding of her true place in the world and in history; in other words, the way in which he gives her a biblical worldview.

In this regard, Revelation 12 is central. It begins with a vision of the Bride, God’s elect of all times and places. From the very outset, we see her as God sees her: She is a heavenly Woman with an earthly mission (12:1). In her OT embodiment, she gives birth to the promised Seed of the Woman—to Christ (12:5a; Gen. 3:15). When she does, the Dragon and his demonic minions try to kill the infant Jesus, but cannot (12:4). Indeed, even when they do succeed in killing the Lamb of God, they altogether fail in “devouring” him, for he rises from the dead and ascends to the Father’s own right hand, where he now sits as High Prophet, Priest, and King of heaven. And from that heavenly seat he shall soon come again, this time to act the part of a shepherd against the enemies of his flock, shattering them once and for all with a rod of iron (12:5b, Psalms 2:9, 23:4).

For now, however, the Woman (i.e., the Bride in her specifically NT embodiment) must remain upon the earth. Therefore, in an eschatological Exodus from the Domain of Darkness, she flees into the wilderness of this fallen evil world (12:6). There she will remain for “1260 days” (or “a time, times, and a half a time,” or “42 months,” Rev. 11:2, 12:14, 13:5). Recalling the prophet Elijah’s three and a half year exile in the wilderness, these symbolic numbers mark the entire inter-adventual era—the Era of Proclamation—as a season of exile and tribulation for the people of God (1 Kings 17:1f). They will not, however, endure it alone: The Lord will faithfully nourish and aid his people all throughout their long wilderness sojourn, even as he did Israel and Elijah in theirs (12:6, 14-16). [this era is the age of the Christian church, from Pentecost to the 2nd advent. Dean Davis calls it the Era of Proclamation.]

But what exactly will the Church in the wilderness be doing as she awaits Christ’s return? The answer is found in verses 7-12: She will be waging war. Yes, the text itself says that Michael and his angels will wage war against the Dragon and his angels. But on closer inspection, we realize that this is simply a picture of heaven’s part in a war that the saints will be waging on earth. It is not a physical war, but a spiritual (2 Cor. 10:4, Eph. 6:12). It is the fulfillment of the Great Commission; the proclamation of the Gospel; the declaration of the saving power of the blood of the Lamb; the faithful testimony of the people of God to the Person and Work of the Christ of God (12:11). As they preach and teach—and as God’s elect everywhere hear the truth and receive it—the Kingdom of Christ continually pours into the earth (12:10). As it does, the kingdom of Satan, who formerly deceived and ruled the whole world, is continually spoiled and cast to the ground (Mt. 12:29). Hence, Satan’s fury against the Woman; hence the Groom’s diligent watch-care over his beloved and persecuted Bride (12:13-17).

Very good here:

Here, then, in a prophetic vision of stupendous theological reach and power, we find Christ teaching the Church Militant who she is, what she is about, what she can expect, and upon whom she can count, as she makes her way out of eschatological Egypt, through the eschatological wilderness of Sin, and into the eschatological Promised Land. Fittingly, this rich chapter stands in the middle of the book, for in many ways it supplies us with the keys to the whole book. Thanks be to God for such a wonderful prophetic gift!

The Prophet Exhorts His Church

Secondly, the Lord exhorts the Church. In particular, he exhorts her by teaching and warning about four great enemies that she will encounter over and over again during her long journey through the wilderness of this world.

The first is the Dragon, that serpent of old who is called the devil and Satan (12:9). He—along with his host of evil angels—is the invisible spiritual ruler of the fallen world-system through which the saints must pass on their way to the Promised Land. As we have seen, this teaching pervades the NT.

However, in the Revelation the Spirit draws upon various OT texts to depict the world-system as an unholy trinity; an unholy idol that fallen, rebellious, and deceivable mankind is all too inclined to worship. It is comprised of the Beast, the False Prophet, and the Harlot. As we are about to see, these OT symbols correspond to God-given institutions, originally designed for the good of mankind, but now co-opted and corrupted by the Dragon (13:1, 4, 16:13). Ever since the Fall, he is the one enemy lurking behind the other three. Let the saints understand and beware (1 Peter. 5:8).

The second enemy is the Beast (13:1-4). This is the political or governmental face of the world-system (Daniel 7:1f). The NT teaches that civil government is a good, post-fall gift of God, designed to restrain evildoers through a faithful administration of his retributive justice (Rom. 13:1f). However, it also teaches that sin can and does corrupt human governments, sometimes to such an extent that they become unconscious instruments of the Satanic (2 Thess. 2:1f, Rev. 13:2, 4). When this occurs, deceived sinners will worship the Beast, rather than God (13:4). And when that occurs, the Beast will wage war against the people of God who, out of loyalty to their heavenly King, refuse to worship the Beast, and urge sinners to turn away from it towards Christ (11:7, 13:7, 17:14).

[Excellent comment on the mark of the beast \[code-beast\]](#) Conversely, see Watson's comment on the image or stamp of holiness upon God's people using the same search code

In the Revelation, Christ repeatedly exhorts his people concerning the Beast. Above all, he warns them not to receive his mark—his name, or the number of his name—on their right hand or on their forehead (14:9, 11, 15:2, 20:4). Here again the Spirit draws upon OT imagery to speak symbolically to God's NT people (Ezekiel 9). The saints now have the seal of the living God on their foreheads (7:3). In other words, because of their faith in Christ they now belong to the Father; they are his adopted sons and daughters, carrying his Name (Rom. 8:15, 1 Peter 1:17). How then shall they give their ultimate allegiance, whether in thought (symbolized by a mark on the forehead) or in deed (symbolized by a mark on the hand) see [code-beast], to any mere man or human institution? Note also that in Scripture six is the number of man (Gen. 1:26ff, Rev. 13:18, NIV), and three is the number of God Triune. Therefore, 666 is the number of man seeking to supplant the triune God; the number of man audaciously representing himself as the proper object of worship (13:16-18). The implications are clear: Men take the mark of the Beast whenever and wherever they worship the anti-christian, self-deifying State. And again, throughout the Revelation Christ warns his own that they must never do this evil thing.

Additionally, the heavenly Prophet exhorts his people not to succumb to the threats or actual persecutions of the Beast, even if this means the loss of work, supply, reputation, or life itself (2:10, 13:17). He buttresses this exhortation with a twofold promise: The Lord will always be at his suffering people's side, and he has already prepared a victor's wreath for each one who overcomes (2:10, 12:14-16). Note carefully that in Revelation 20, as elsewhere in the book, Christ again exhorts the whole Church concerning the Beast: Those who refuse to receive his mark (of ownership), but instead remain faithful until death, will enter heaven as disembodied spirits, there to reign in life with their High King until he comes again at the end of the age to raise them from the dead and bestow upon them the glories of the World to Come (20:4-6). More on this later.

The third enemy is the False Prophet, also called the Beast from the Earth (Rev. 13:11-18, 16:12-16, 19:20, 20:10). A careful reading of the relevant texts shows that this beast symbolizes, not simply false religion, but false religion willingly pressed into the service of the self-deifying State. Energized by Satan (13:11), and authorized by the State itself (13:12), those people who function as the False Prophet use both coercion (13:12, 16-17) and religious deception (13:14-15) to set up “an image” to the Beast. That is, they seek to organize, implement, and encourage the worship of the State and/or the person in whom the State is embodied at any given moment in history.

The False Prophet is present throughout the entire Era of Proclamation. In John’s day he was embodied in “... the emperor cult and the Commune of Asia, a council of distinguished representatives promoting loyalty to the emperor.”³ In our own day, he rears his head wherever government propagandists encourage the adulation of the Chairman, the Fuehrer, the King, or the President. Notably, Revelation 13:13-15 implies that in some instances Satan will actually empower the False Prophet(s) to deceive men with miraculous signs (Exodus 7:8-13).

Most assuredly, this will be the case at the end of the age. The Gospels and epistles warn us that when the (final) Antichrist arises to deceive the whole world, he will perform “false signs and wonders” (Mt. 24:24, 2 Thess. 2:1-2, 9-12). Not surprisingly, we receive the same warning in the Revelation: John sees three unclean spirits coming out of the mouth of the Dragon, the Beast, and the False Prophet. They are demonic spirits, performing signs and going abroad to the kings of the whole world, in order to assemble them for the battle of the Great Day of God the Almighty (16:12-16). As I will argue later, Revelation 20:7-10, in remarkably similar language, predicts this very thing one final time. Clearly, the High Prophet of Heaven very much desires his Church to be fully prepared for the last (embodiment of the) Beast, the last False Prophet, and the Last Battle.

The fourth and final enemy is the Great Harlot, also referred to as Babylon the Great and the Great City (17:1, 3, 5, 18). The relevant chapters make it clear that the Harlot represents the economic, commercial, and cultural face of the world-system. As such, she is not so much a persecutor or religious deceiver as she is a seductress (17:4). In former times, she tempted the world through such luxurious commercial centers as Babylon, Tyre, and Sidon. In John’s day, she tempted it through Rome. In our own day, she tempts it through wealthy, pleasure-mad cities now situated all over the globe, and also through omnipresent electronic wizardry wherein she bares her ample bosom and offers herself freely for a simple click.

John sees that at any given moment the entire world-system is in bed with the Harlot, spiritually speaking: Nations, kings, and merchants—all have fallen to her allurements (18:3). As a general rule, she likes to collude with the Beast and the False Prophet, doing all she can to persecute the Church (17:6) and entice saints and sinners alike with her sorceries (i.e., fake, demonic spiritualities, 18:23). Accordingly, no sooner do we begin to learn about the Harlot, than we hear the prophetic word of the Lord to his Church: “Come out of her, my people, that you may not share in her sins, and that you may not receive of her plagues” (18:4, 3:14-22). As he speaks, the saints receive both warning and promise: Satan’s woman, the Harlot, is doomed to destruction. In part, it will come at the hand of the Beast himself, who will one day turn against her (17:14-18). However, in far greater part it will come at the hand of Christ, who, in a single hour, will make her utterly desolate (18:19) and render her an eternal prison house of Satan and his demons (18:2). Meanwhile, Christ's Woman—comprised of all who hear his call, flee the Great City, and loyally cling to him in faith—is destined for final rescue and restoration; is destined to become a Holy City and a glorious Bride, forever dwelling with God and Christ under brand new heavens in a brand new earth (19:7-8, 21:2). Let all the saints be warned ... and take heart.

The Prophet Comforts His Church

Finally, the heavenly Prophet uses the Revelation to speak comfort to his Bride. Yes, as trembling Christians well know, the Revelation repeatedly issues warnings of inevitable tribulation and certain judgment. However, the more they read, the more they realize how much comfort is offered along with those warnings, and how many different forms that comfort takes.

For example, at the very outset of the book, Christ comforts his pilgrim people with a majestic vision of his own divine nature, covenant faithfulness, and Messianic glory (1:9-20).

He then comforts them with manifold assurances of his presence in, and faithful watch-care over, all his churches, even as he manifests the tough love that he feels for each one (2:1-3:22).

He comforts them with rich, symbolic representations of his heavenly, mediatorial reign, the saints share in it, and his absolute sovereignty over all remaining history (4:1-5:14).

He comforts them with scenes of the spirits of departed believers safely home in heaven, praying for divine justice, and waiting eagerly for the resurrection of their bodies at his return to the earth (6:9-11, 20:4-6).

He comforts them with portraits of his own Parousia in power and glory at the end of the age (14:14-20, 19:11-21).

In conjunction with that, he also comforts them with visions of ultimate justice: of final rewards for the faithful saints, and of final retribution against the persecuting and God-hating "inhabitants of the earth" (6:9-17, 11:11-19, 15:1-4, 16:17-21, 20:7-15).

Similarly, he comforts them with several "sneak previews" of the glorified Church surrounding the throne of God Triune, exultantly lifting up the eternal worship that will fill the World to Come (7:9-17, 14:1-5).

And, of course, he comforts them with two luminous chapters supplying mysterious, thought-provoking glimpses of the (eternal) life of the saints in the new heavens and the new earth (Rev. 21-22).

Conclusion

Summing up, we have seen that the great purpose of the Revelation is prophetic; that in it, God, through Christ, speaks to the universal Church in order to teach, warn, exhort, and comfort her, so that she might make a worthy and triumphant pilgrimage through the wilderness of this world into the eschatological Promised Land.

This is highly relevant to Part 4 of our study for the very important reason that it naturally and powerfully inclines us to an "ecclesiastical" interpretation of Revelation 20. In particular, it suggests that Revelation 20 cannot possibly be what many premillennarians claim it is: a divine afterthought, in which the Spirit suddenly shifts his focus from the Church to ethnic Israel, and from the Church era to a future Millennium. No, just like the rest of the book, chapter 20 must also focus on the Church, and on the present evil age through which the Church makes her difficult pilgrimage (Rev. 12). As we have just seen, this conclusion flows naturally from the One who gave it (the Head of the Church); from the ones to whom he gave it (the seven churches, emblematic of the universal Church); and from the purposes for which he gave it (to teach, warn, and comfort the Church). Moreover, as we shall soon see, it also flows naturally from a careful study of the structure, contents, and symbolism of Revelation 20 itself.

An Overview of Ezekiel 40-48

Good summary!

Having ruled out the premillennial approach, it appears that there is only one route open to us: We must apply the NCH so as to uncover the NT truth here embedded in OT language and imagery. In other words, we must adopt an amillennial interpretation. While limitations of space prevent me doing so in great detail, I think it only fair to my premillennarian brethren that I make an honest effort to open up this challenging text at least a little, especially since it is among the two or three most difficult OTKP's in all of Scripture.

Here, then, is my approach. In the pages ahead I will comment at some length on each of the seven sections mentioned above. Following Keil, my thesis will be that these nine chapters do indeed describe the life of God's people in the eschaton, in the new heavens and the new earth. I will argue that in giving this climactic vision to Ezekiel, the Spirit of God was using ideas and imagery drawn from the entire corpus of OT revelation (but especially from the Law) to picture the Church in the World to Come as the Israel of God, now returned to the Paradise of God, all through the Person and Work of the Christ of God.

With the Master's keys firmly in hand, we are ready to begin!

The Everlasting Mountain (40:1-4)

These verses set the stage for Ezekiel's grand tour of life in the World to Come. In a vision, the prophet is transported to the land of Israel, where he is set atop a very high Mountain. Upon its southern slopes he sees a structure like a city (1-2). Suddenly an angel appears, who takes him to the structure and urges him to listen carefully so that he (Ezekiel) may relate all he hears to God's people, thereby encouraging their hearts (3-5). The tour is about to begin.

Again, this is a vision. As such, it is only natural to expect that its contents are symbolic (cf., Daniel 2, 4, 7, 8, Zech. 1-6, Rev. 4-22). And indeed, we have already seen that the NT attaches rich symbolic meaning to each and every one of the fundamental elements of Ezekiel's vision: the Mountain, the Temple, the Service of Worship, the City, and the Promised Land. Therefore, like Ezekiel's angel, it (the NT) must be our guide.

In these introductory verses, the central symbol is the very high Mountain. Its significance is illuminated by Israel's history. As Moses received the pattern for ethnic Israel's ceremonial worship on Mt. Sinai, so Ezekiel beholds—in modified OT imagery—the pattern for eschatological Israel's ceremonial worship on this Mountain (Ex. 24-31). As Moses surveyed ethnic Israel's temporary Promised Land from the heights of Mt. Nebo, so Ezekiel surveys eschatological Israel's eternal Promised Land from the heights of this Mountain (Deut. 32:48-52). And as ethnic Israel worshiped God in his temple situated atop Mt. Zion, so—according to Ezekiel—eschatological Israel [the true church] will worship God in his Temple atop this high Mountain, this eschatological Zion (2 Chron. 5:1ff).

But what exactly does the Mountain represent? As we saw earlier, even the OT prophets used this particular symbol to represent the new heavens and the new earth; a fully transformed World from which every trace of moral and natural evil has been removed, so that the glory of God may fully dwell therein (Isaiah 11:9, 25:6-8, 57:13, 65:25, Joel 3:14-17).

This interpretation is confirmed by Revelation 21:1-11. There we learn that John, just like Ezekiel, was carried away in the Spirit to a great and high Mountain. What did he see? The Holy City—New Jerusalem—coming down out of heaven from God (21:10-11). And where, in fact, did the Holy City settle, there to remain forever? It settled upon a new earth, for the former heavens and the former earth had passed away (vv. 21:1-2). Thus, John, in accordance with the principle of Progressive Revelation, was given to see what Ezekiel could not: The Mountain of God is none other than the new earth, the glorious home of Christ's glorified Bride and God's glorified people (21:3). For the present, the Church is a light shining in the darkness of this fallen world; she is as a City upon a high Hill (Mt. 5:14, John 1:5). However, in that day—according to Ezekiel and John—she will shine like a City on a Mountain, the highest Mountain of all!

The Everlasting Temple (40:5-42:20)

This portion of the vision describes the Temple Area and its contents. Ezekiel's journey begins here because in the World to Come the Temple—or rather the worship of him who inhabits the Temple—will be of first importance. Also, as he learns later in his tour, the Temple Area will be situated at the absolute center of the Land. Thus, by speaking first of the center of life in the World to Come, the Spirit alerts us to the fact that in the eschaton the worship of God in Christ will lie at the heart of all things.

If we limit ourselves to the essentials, the plan of the Temple Area is fairly easy to describe.¹¹ It is a perfect square (42:15-20). At the exact center is the altar (43:13-17). Behind the altar, to the West, stands the Sanctuary, or the Temple itself. Elevated upon its base, it is comprised of the Most Holy Place (another perfect square), the Holy Place, and a portico. The whole structure is enclosed on the North, South, and West by three galleries containing 90 side rooms (41:5-11). The Sanctuary and the altar are enclosed by a small rectangular court (40:47). On either side of the Sanctuary, just outside this court, are buildings with more chambers for the priests (42:1-10). Behind the Sanctuary to the West are three separate buildings, two of which contain utensils for the preparation of the various sacrifices (46:19-20). On the North, East, and South sides of the Temple court there are gateways, each containing chambers for the Temple guards (40:28-38). Surrounding the entire Temple Area is a large outer court, bounded by four high walls each measuring 500 cubits in length. Thus, it too is a perfect square. In the middle of the Northern, Eastern, and Southern walls there are large gates, each with chambers for the Temple guards (40:5, 16-20). Ezekiel's tour was "outside-in" and "inside-out." He enters through the Eastern Gate of the outer court, proceeds towards the Most Holy Place of the Temple (which he does not enter), and exits again through the Eastern Gate.

While it is undoubtedly true that each element of this vision contains rich typological significance, we cannot see the trees until we behold the forest. In other words, we must first ask ourselves, “What does the Temple Area as a whole symbolize?” The NT answers in no uncertain terms. Jesus said, “Destroy this temple and I will raise it up in three days” (John 2:18). For Christ, the Temple of God was—and would be—his body. The apostle Paul elaborates, declaring that God the Father gave Christ to be head over all things to the Church, which is his Body, the fullness of him who fills all in all (Eph. 1:22-23, 5:22ff). So then, the Temple is not simply Jesus’ physical body, but rather his mystical Body, the Church, of which he is the Head. Paul states this explicitly, affirming that Christ’s ever-expanding Church is a “holy Temple in the Lord, in whom (the saints) are being built together into a dwelling place of God by the Spirit” (Eph. 2:21-21).

These NT passages reveal the true sphere of fulfillment of Ezekiel’s vision of the Temple Area. In other words, God was using OT ideas and images to give him a glimpse of the Church—the Body of Christ—as she will exist in the eschaton. John the Revelator confirms that this vision was indeed symbolic. In a vision of his own he describes the new earth. However, he sees no temple in it. Why? Because “. . . the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are its Temple” (Rev. 21:22). Thus, in the World to Come (the very theme of Ezekiel’s prophecy) there will be no Temple made of wood or stone. However, John does see a holy city, adorned as a Bride for her Husband, and declares that she herself is the tabernacle (or temple) of God, the place where He will live and be among them forever (21:1-4). In short, John tells us that Ezekiel’s vision of the eschatological Temple of God is fulfilled in the glorified Body of Christ.

We conclude, then, with Duguid, that Ezekiel’s vision of the Temple Area is “architectural theology”, that it uses OT temple imagery to set forth important theological truths about Christ and the Church. In particular, we may say that in this early portion of the vision the Spirit uses OT type and shadow to picture the completed Body of Christ, enjoying the life of Christ, because of the merits of the Work of Christ, even as it awaits the gift of the glory of God the Father at the Coming of Christ. This thesis requires further explanation. It is best, however, to offer it as we look at some of the more important details of Ezekiel’s vision of the Temple Area.

1. The Outer Walls (40:5, 16-20)

The outer walls—which are very high, thick, and strong—are “walls of salvation” (40:5, 16-20; Isaiah 60:18). They represent the mighty power of the Person and Work of Christ “to separate the holy from the common”; to deliver and preserve his Body from the presence, power, and penalty of sin (42:20). Even today, through the sanctifying work of the Spirit, the High King of Heaven has erected a legal and spiritual barrier between his Church on the one hand, and the world, the flesh, the devil, and the judgments of God on the other (Ex. 14:19-20, John 17:15, 2 Cor. 6:14-7:1, 1 Pet. 1:1-2, Rev. 18:4). In the Age to Come, that barrier will be perfect and complete. The sin and defilement that entered ethnic Israel’s former temple area will never enter spiritual Israel’s eschatological Temple Area (Ezek. 8-9, Rev. 22:15). The God who abandoned ethnic Israel’s earthly sanctuary will never abandon spiritual Israel’s heavenly sanctuary (Ezek. 10). In the words of one commentator, the World to Come will be a “Paradise with Walls”—walls of salvation that mightily keep evil out and God in. Therefore, it will be a world that can never fall again.

The Everlasting Wholeness (47:1-12)

This short but beloved portion of Ezekiel's vision might aptly be called the Restoration of All Things (Mt. 19:28, Acts 3:21). Under rich types, it depicts God, through Christ, by the Spirit, bestowing everlasting wholeness upon his creation; transforming our present sin-cursed earth into the Land of Promise; turning the former things into the new heavens and the new earth (Rom. 8:18-25, Rev. 21:1, 5).

The narrative is well worth a brief retelling. The prophet is now brought to the door of the Temple. There he sees a little stream of water welling up from beneath the threshold, flowing just south of the altar (where the Laver was situated in former times), and then out through the two East Gates of the Temple District (vv. 1-2; 1 Kings 7:23f). Mysteriously enough, the further the stream flows, the deeper and wider it becomes, until at last it is an unfordable River (vv. 3-5). Suddenly, the prophet notices a great many trees growing on the two banks of the River (vv. 6-7).

At this point, the angel explains all: The River will first go east, then south, and then through the desert, until at last it empties into (something like) the Dead Sea, whose (salty) waters will therefore be healed (v. 8). Indeed, everywhere it goes, the River will bring life, so much so that (what seems to be) the Dead Sea itself will again be filled with fish. As a result, fishermen, with nets in hand, will station themselves all along its shores, even from En Gedi to En Eglaim (v. 10); however, its swamps and marshes will be left for salt (v. 11). All kinds of trees will grow along the banks of the River, trees whose leaves will never wither, and whose fruit will never fail. The water continually flowing from the Sanctuary will give them eternal life, so that their fruit will ever serve for food, and their leaves for healing (12).

Again, I reckon this to be a vision of the Restoration of All Things. Here we have a "mysterious" OT picture of what Christ will accomplish at his Parousia, when he subjects all things to himself by the exertion of his mighty power; when he consummates his redemptive work by making all things new (Phil. 3:21, Rev. 21:5). It is important to note, however, that the vision also gives us a kind of retrospective; that it also pictures something of the works of God by which this, the final goal of Salvation History, has now been reached.

We can better understand all this by bringing NT light to bear on some of the symbols involved. The waters are, of course, the life-giving Spirit of God, long promised by his OT prophets (Psalm 46:6, Isaiah 44:3, Ezek. 39:29, Joel 2:28, 3:18, Zech. 14:8). They flow forth from the Temple of God, which typifies both the Person of Christ (John 2:19, 4:10-14, 7:37-39, Acts 2:33), and the Body of Christ, his Church (Eph. 1:23, 2:22). In the Era of Proclamation, they flowed through faithful Christians (who are fishers of men) to Jerusalem, Judea, Samaria, and the uttermost parts of the earth (Mt. 4:19, John 20:22-23, Acts 2, 10). Now, at the Parousia, they flow through Christ himself into all creation.

Other details are rich with significance. The waters pass by the altar: They are given solely on the ground of Christ's substitutionary life and death. They also pass over the site historically reserved for the laver: They provide spiritual cleansing from the guilt and stain of sin (John 13:10, 1 Cor. 6:11, Titus 3:5). Also, as they flow outward, they grow from a trickle to a mighty rushing River. Here again we have a retrospective, a picture of the infallible advance of the Kingdom of the Son, of which Jesus himself often spoke (Mt. 13:31-33). But above all, this is a picture of the mighty work of the Spirit at Christ's return, when he raises the dead, transforms the living, lifts the (salt of the) curse from nature, swallows up death in victory, and floods the whole creation with the healing, life-giving glory of God (Rom. 8:18-25, Phil. 3:21, 1 Cor. 15:51ff).

In that Day, only the swamps and marshes surrounding the Dead Sea (which covers the ruins of Sodom and Gomorrah) will be left in salt. That is to say, only those who have refused to take the water of life will eternally remain under the curse and judgment of God (Deut. 29:23; Mt. 25:46, John 4:10, 7:38, Jude 1:7, Rev. 18:2).

In passing, we should note that this particular OTKP is outstanding for taking up the biblical motif of Paradise Lost and Regained. The waters flowing from beneath the Temple threshold remind us of the great River that flowed out of Eden (Gen. 2:10-14). The trees on either side of the River—trees that nourish and heal—remind us of the Tree of Life that stood in the midst of the Garden (Gen. 2:9, 3:22, 24). As for Paradise itself, it is true that Ezekiel, like all the OT prophets, typically describes it in terms of the Promised Land. That was only natural: Since he and his contemporaries lived under the Law, the prophetic Spirit was pleased to frame the promise of the Eternal Covenant in terms drawn from the Law; in terms of an eternal restoration to life with God in the land (Deut. 30:1-10). In the Revelation, however, “true truth” comes out. There we see what Ezekiel only hints at here: When Christ returns, the River of Life will indeed transform all creation into the Promised Land. But more than this, it will transform the Promised Land into Paradise itself. There the River will ever flow; there the Tree of Life will ever nourish and heal; and there the Last Adam will ever dwell, in glory, with his beloved Bride (Rev. 21:1-2, 22:1-2, 14).

The Everlasting Homeland (47:13-48:29)

Having spoken to the prophet about the Temple at the heart of the Holy District, and the Holy District at the heart of the land, God now brings Ezekiel's grand tour to a close by unveiling the boundaries and distribution of the Promised Land itself. Here, the central theme is inheritance. This is the land that God will cause his people to inherit, and this is the place where he will cause them to inherit an everlasting life of God-centered and Christ-centered worship. Thus, as in the Revelation, so here: The Spirit is giving us a picture of the eschatological Church worshiping God in the new heavens and the new earth.

In 47:15-23, Ezekiel learns about the borders of Israel's eschatological homeland. They are patterned after the ideal given to Moses (Num. 34:1-12). The message is: In the eschaton, the LORD will bring to pass what Joshua could not, but what God's Greater Joshua could and did. At long last, his people will enter his rest; they will fully occupy the Land of Promise (Heb. 3:7-4:10). Moreover, God himself explicitly tells us that this is the land he promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; the same land that the apostles identified as the World to Come and the new heavens and the new earth (Gen. 12:7, 15:18-21, 22:17, 28:4, Psalm 37:11; Mt. 5:5, Rom. 4:13, 8:18f, 2 Peter 3:13).

And there is more. It appears, for example, that the eastern boundaries of the five northern tribes reach almost to the Euphrates River (47:15-17, 48:1-5). This recalls the glory days of the United Kingdom, days that pictured the universal dominion of Solomon's greater Son—the Lord Jesus Christ—in the Age to Come (Psalm 72, I Kings 4:20-21). Also, here there are no longer any tribes living across the Jordan. This tells us that in the Age to Come all Israel, being bound together in Immanuel himself, will gladly dwell together in Immanuel's Land (Josh. 22:19, Isaiah 8:8, John 10:16, Rom. 8:16-17, Heb. 12:22).

Finally, we learn that the right of inheritance is given not only to Israelites, but also to resident aliens (vv. 21-23). This depicts NT teaching to the effect that citizenship in God's Kingdom is not based upon physical birth or descent, but solely upon a God-given, faith-filled desire to live with Immanuel himself, and so—at his Second Coming—in his everlasting land (Isaiah 8:8). Whether Jew or Gentile, all such persons are the true sons of Abraham; therefore, along with father Abraham himself, they will inherit the Promised Land (Rom. 4:9-25, 8:12-17, Mt. 8:11, Gal. 3:28, Eph. 2:11-22).

In 48:1-29 the theme of inheritance is especially prominent. The new homeland was indeed promised in days of old, but forfeited by sin. Now, however, grace has abounded, and it is fully inherited at last.

The passage—which discusses the territorial allotments in the new Israel—displays a remarkable symmetry. In essence, God divides the Land into 13 parallel strips, the length of each one running from west to east. First, he allots the seven northern strips: the northern-most to Dan, after whom comes Asher, Naphtali, Manasseh, Ephraim, Reuben, and Judah (48:1-7). Then—at considerable length, so as to emphasize its importance—he allots the territories within the central Holy Strip (48:8-22). At its own center lies the Holy District, a perfect square which itself is divided into three strips. The topmost is the territory of the Levites; the central contains the temple and the territory of the (Zadokite) priests; the lowermost contains the City, its surrounding open spaces, and the pasturelands cultivated by City workers drawn from the several tribes of Israel. On either side of the Holy District are the territories of the Prince. Finally, God allots the territories of the five southern tribes: Benjamin (closest to the Holy Strip), followed by Simeon, Issachar, Zebulun, and Gad (48:23-29).

Here again, as Duguid puts it, we have “theology in geographical form.” The picture is loaded with theological significance, a significance that should expand the mind and rejoice the heart of believers in Jesus. Let us take a moment to explore it.

We have already seen that the Temple-centeredness of Israel's eschatological homeland depicts, under OT type and shadow, the God-centered and Christ-centered worship of the Church in the World to Come (Rev. 4-5, 7).

So too does the orientation of the tribal territories, which, like the door of the Temple itself, is towards the East. Here we glimpse the spiritual orientation of God's eschatological people, who, through all eternity, will gaze eastward, looking expectantly for fresh dawns of the glory of the LORD over the Land, and fresh entrances of his glory through the Temple Gates. According to a slightly different metaphor, the orientation of the tribal allotments pictures the Bride of Christ, who, through all eternity, will watch for fresh visitations of her Beloved; of the One who, at the close of her arduous pilgrimage upon the earth, suddenly rose like the Morning Star, and—in power and great glory—circled the Earth from east to west, gathering her to his side, so that in the end he might bring her to his everlasting home (Ezek. 43:1-5, Mt. 2:1, 24:27, 25:1f, John 14:1f, 2 Peter 1:19, Rev. 2:28, 7:2, 22:16).

According to 47:13-14, each tribe will receive an equal allotment of land for a permanent possession. This recalls Jesus' Parable of the Workers in the Vineyard, wherein we find the compassionate landowner giving each laborer a denarius, irrespective of how long he worked (Mt. 20:1-16). It also reminds us of his Parable of the Wedding Feast, where entrance to the Feast is said to depend not upon what one has done, but simply upon the possession of a proper wedding garment (Mt. 22:1-14). All three texts teach the same glorious NT truth: While the saints standing in the Kingdom may indeed be a reward for their own good works, their presence in the Kingdom is an inheritance, a gracious gift of God, bequeathed to them through the Christ who so lovingly and effectually worked on their behalf (Mt. 25:34, Gal. 3:26-4:7, Rom. 8:12-17, Rev. 21:7).

The precise arrangement of the twelve tribes also seems to convey NT truth. For example, in the new order, Benjamin will be situated south of the Holy District, while Judah will lie to its north. Under the Divided Monarchy, these two tribes constituted the entire Southern Kingdom. The message, then, is that the eschatological division of the land into northern and southern regions will in no way reflect a spiritual division rooted in sin. To the contrary, here all former divisions have been overcome, for now all the tribes are perfectly united around the central sanctuary and under the Prince. Certainly this pictures the perfect spiritual unity of the Church around her great High Priest and Sacrifice; perhaps it also pictures her spiritual unity around the Prince of Life, the High King who nevertheless reigns at all times in glad submission to his Royal Father (Acts 3:15, 5:31, 1 Cor. 15:27-28). In eschatological Israel, the blood of Christ will have broken down every dividing wall, with the result that to all eternity there will be one flock, one kingdom, and one holy nation living in the land (Ezek. 34:23, 37:24, Zech. 14:9, John 10:16, Gal. 3:28, Eph. 2:11-22, 4:1f, 1 Peter 2:9).

We observe also that the eight tribes closest to the Temple are the descendants of Jacob's wives (Leah and Rachel), while the four tribes situated at the extremities of the land are the descendants of their handmaids, Bilhah and Zilpah (Gen. 30:1-13). Since the OT prophets often represented the Gentiles as (blessed) servants of eschatological Israel, Ezekiel may have done the same here, by way of vision (Isaiah 49:22-23, 60:1-14). If so, the lesson is not that in the eschaton the Gentiles will be second-class citizens dwelling at maximal distance from Christ, but rather that God, in the last days prior to the Consummation, graciously grafted them into the vine of Israel, making them "handmaids" of the (Jewish) heirs of the Kingdom, but also co-heirs with them of the glorious covenant promises given to Abraham and his seed (John 10:16, Rom. 4:1f, 11:11-24, Gal. 3:1-14, Eph. 2:11-22).

The Everlasting City (48:30-35)

Fascinatingly, the capstone of Ezekiel's vision of the World to Come is devoted to a subject almost completely overlooked in all that has gone before: the City. For the exiles—and indeed for godly Jews of all subsequent generations—"the City" could be none other than Jerusalem, the very same Jerusalem whose eschatological restoration is sung by OT prophet after prophet. It is, then, quite understandable that the Spirit of God, having devoted 95% of Ezekiel's vision to a description of Israel's Temple-Centered life in her eschatological homeland, should bring the prophecy to a close with a few words about the future of the Holy City, Jerusalem. By so aligning Ezekiel's message with the rest of OTKP, the Spirit would only strengthen Israel’s ancient hope of eternal life in the land with their faithful, covenant-keeping God.

And yet, with the benefit of NT hindsight, we can see clearly that the City God actually had in mind was very different than the one the OT saints had in mind. This is apparent from certain curiosities within the text itself, and also from explicit NT teaching, especially as that is found in the Revelation.

Concerning the curiosities, we observe in chapters 40-48 that the word “Jerusalem” does not appear once. Also, Ezekiel’s City lies outside the Temple Area, whereas in historical times the Temple was always situated inside the walls of Jerusalem. Similarly, Ezekiel’s City is clearly subordinate to the Temple, since the Temple alone is situated in the midst of the Holy District. Note also that the tribal names of the twelve territorial allotments differ from the tribal names on the twelve gates of the City: The latter include Levi and Joseph, but exclude Ephraim and Manasseh. Finally, and most tellingly, God assigns the City a completely new name: The LORD is There. We conclude, then, that the text loudly and repeatedly hints at a great eschatological mystery: The Eternal City of God will be different from the Jerusalem of old; it will have a new nature, a new identity, and therefore a new name.

As we have seen, in the NT the mystery is finally unveiled: The true and everlasting City is not made of brick and mortar, but of living stones; the saints themselves are not only the Temple of God, but also the Jerusalem of God (John 4:21, Gal. 4:26, Heb. 12:22, 1 Peter 2:5, Rev. 3:12). Knowing this, they steadfastly persevere in their pilgrimage through this fallen world, eagerly awaiting their Lord’s return and the manifestation, in glory, of the eternal City whose Builder and Maker is God (Col. 3:1-3, Heb. 11:10, 16, 13:14).

Notably, this theme is especially prominent in the Revelation, where God’s elect hear the Spirit calling them out of the Great City (Babylon) and into the Holy City, the New Jerusalem (Rev. 11:8, 16:19, 18:1ff). Neither is a physical structure, both are spiritual populations; they are distinct realms with distinct rulers, whether Satan or Christ. As Ezekiel himself saw, just prior to the Consummation, Satan’s forces will attack the Beloved City (Ezek. 38-39, Rev. 20:9). But God—in Christ—will intervene to destroy the Great City and glorify the Holy City; a City that will be without stain or wrinkle or any such thing; a City that will be worthy to be called the Bride and the Wife of the Lamb (Eph. 5:27, Rev. 18:1f, 21:1-2, 9). This is the City that all God’s people—from Abraham on—have seen, sang, and faithfully striven to enter by the narrow gate (Luke 13:24).

6. Ezekiel and the Revelation

I want to conclude this long chapter with a few words about the usefulness of the Revelation for helping us discern the true meaning of certain OTKP’s. Its great value is rooted in two fundamental facts. On the one hand, the Revelation is very much like OTKP in that it uses OT ideas and images to convey NT truth. On the other hand, it is different from OTKP in that it goes on to incorporate specifically New Testament ideas and images, thereby pointing the way to a proper interpretation of the Old. In other words, just like the Gospels and the Epistles, the Revelation confirms the New Covenant Hermeneutic. It does so, however, by using apocalyptic rather than didactic language.

Two illustrations from the book of Ezekiel should make this important point clear, and also serve to undergird the New Covenant interpretations I have offered in this chapter.

Two Views of the Last Battle

In our study of Ezekiel 34-39, I argued that the prophet used OT ideas and images to describe the Last Battle, the final clash between Christ and Satan, the Church and the World. The Revelation positively confirms this view. The primary proof text is Rev. 20:7-10, where the Spirit identifies the eschatological opponent of God's people as Gog and Magog. Observe, however, that in the Revelation the Holy Spirit subtly departs from Ezekiel's portrait of the battle so as to encourage an ecclesiological interpretation of both texts.

For example, here in the Revelation, Gog and Magog come up upon "the breadth of the earth" (i.e., the whole world, wherever Christians are living). Here they surround "the camp of the saints" (i.e., Christians everywhere, who are "encamped," like Israel after the Exodus, in the wilderness of this fallen world-system). And here they surround "the Beloved City" (i.e., Christ's beloved Church, a City built of living stones).

That the Spirit here has the Church in view is further confirmed by 20:4-6, where we learn that it is only the followers of Jesus—many of whom were faithful unto death in the face the Beast's persecutions—who enter heaven to reign with Christ throughout the thousand years. This helps us to identify the "saints" of Rev. 20:9 who are to endure the Last Battle at the end of the thousand years: They too are the followers of Jesus (Rev. 1:9). We conclude, then, that Revelation 20—and a great many other NT texts—identifies the true contestants of the Last Battle as the Church and the World; and that here the Spirit of God is teaching us to read Ezekiel 38-39 as giving all of God's people a veiled OT revelation of this very thing (Mt. 24:15, 21, 2 Thess. 2:1f, 1 John 2:18, Rev. 11:7-10, 16:12-16, 19:17-21).

Two Views of the World to Come

This brings us to our second illustration. In the course of our study, I have argued that Ezekiel 40-48 uses OT types and shadows to describe the life of God's people in the eschaton, in the new heavens and the new earth. Revelation 21-22 confirms this view. Indeed, it is safe to say that these two chapters serve as a kind of NT commentary on Ezekiel's final vision. The many similarities tell us that John's vision is actually based on Ezekiel's. However, the many differences—the many additions and NT elucidations—tell us that John's vision is also meant to interpret Ezekiel's. In other words, here in Revelation 21-22 the Spirit of God uses apocalyptic language—signs and symbols, frequently drawn from the OT—to confirm what the more didactic Gospels and Epistles positively teach: All OTKP—including Ezekiel 40-48—is fulfilled under the New Covenant that Christ introduced, and in the twofold spiritual Kingdom that he brought into the world.

Let us take a moment to illustrate how this works.

Like Ezekiel, John is carried away in the Spirit to a great and high Mountain, upon which he sees a City (Ezek. 40:2, Rev. 21:10). Here, however, we learn what the Mountain represents: The new heavens and the new earth. For just as John sees the Holy City “coming down from heaven” to alight upon the Mountain (21:10), so too he sees it coming down from a new heaven to alight upon a new earth (21:1-2). The two are one: the Mountain and the New Earth. So then, Ezekiel’s Mountain (and the land as well) stands for the new world that Christ will create at his Parousia, a world in which there will no longer be any curse, tears, mourning, pain, or death (Rev. 21:2, 22:3).

Like Ezekiel, John sees a City (Ezek. 40:2, Rev. 21:2, 10). Or, to be more precise, Ezekiel saw “a structure like a City”—which was the Temple—while John saw a City, but no Temple, for the Lord God, the Almighty, and the Lamb are its Temple (Rev. 21:22). Already, the two visions begin to converge. And the convergence continues, for just as Ezekiel beholds the glory of God entering the Temple, so John beholds the City “having the glory of God” (Ezek. 43:1-5, Rev. 21:11). Thus, God and the Lamb are the Temple in which the City dwells, but the City is the Temple in which God and the Lamb dwell! John’s is a “Temple-City” where God “will dwell among the sons of Israel forever” (Ezek. 43:7); where “he shall dwell among them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be among them” (Rev. 21:3). In the glorified Temple-City, the promise of the Eternal Covenant is fully fulfilled (Ezek. 37:27).

Like Ezekiel, John sees the names of the twelve tribes of Israel on the gates of the City (Ezek. 48:31-34, Rev. 21:12). However, John also sees the names of the twelve apostles written on the foundation stones of the City walls (Rev. 21:14). This beautiful symbolism confirms two crucial NT truths: The City is the Church, the antitype of OT Jerusalem; and the Church—comprised of all God’s saints, both OT and New—is the one true eternal habitation of God, built upon the foundation of Christ’s holy apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus himself being the chief cornerstone (Gal. 4:26, Eph. 2:20). Ezekiel, then, beheld the Church, but he could not yet behold the foundation of the Church, God having foreseen something better, such that the OT prophet(s) could not be made complete apart from the NT saints (Heb. 11:39-40).

Like Ezekiel, John hears that no foreigners can enter God’s sanctuary (Ezek. 44:9, Rev. 21:27). In John’s case, however, the meaning of “foreigners” finally becomes clear: They are (willful) strangers to God’s Covenant of Grace, which, in NT times, was offered in Christ; having spurned it, they remain in their sins, under judgment, outside the City (Rev. 22:10-15).

Finally, like Ezekiel, John saw the River of the Water of Life flowing from the throne of God; and on either side of the River, trees bearing fruit for food and leaves for healing (Ezek. 47:1, 7, 12; Rev. 22:1-2). John, however, sees much more, and much to illumine the true meaning of Ezekiel’s vision. For example, he beholds the water flowing from the throne of God and of the Lamb (22:1). This confirms that the water does indeed represent the Holy Spirit, whom God, in both stages of the Kingdom, pours out richly upon his people (and his new creation) through Christ (Acts 2:33, Titus 3:6). Very importantly, John also identifies the trees as the Tree of Life (22:2). The message here, aptly situated at the end of the NT canon, is that through the Last Adam—the One who perfectly fulfilled the Covenant of Works in behalf of his people—the saints have returned to Paradise; indeed, they now enjoy Eternal Life in all its fullness, the same Life offered to man in Eden, but forfeited when the First Adam fell into sin. To all eternity, the twelve crops of fruit—emblematic of the divine life of Christ bestowed because of his fruitful Work—will sustain God’s people; to all eternity the leaves of the Tree—emblematic of the restorative power of Christ's life and work—will bring ever-increasing wholeness to the nations of the saints (Rev. 22:2).

We conclude, then, that the Revelation is indeed a precious resource for opening up the meaning of Ezekiel's Oracle of Good News, and of OTKP in general. However, that usefulness is useful only to those who are well established in NT eschatology and the NCH, both of which the Revelation presupposes and abundantly confirms. [NCH is the New Covenant Hermeneutic]

The Vision Interpreted (vv. 15-28)

As the vision draws to a close, Daniel inquires as to the meaning of what he has just seen, and receives a measure of further illumination from one of the angels involved. The section falls nicely into four parts. I will comment briefly on each one, highlighting aspects of special relevance for our study.

In verses 15-18 we find the prophet—grieved and troubled at the persecutions yet in store for God's people—asking for more light on the vision as a whole. One of the angels in attendance responds, identifying the four beasts as four kings/kingdoms that will arise “out of the earth.” However, the emphasis here, as elsewhere, falls upon the eternal Kingdom of God, which the Most High—the sovereign LORD of all history—will bestow upon the saints from heaven above (cf., Dan. 2:44-45). As we have seen, verses 13-14, supplemented by an abundance of NT teaching, reveal that God will accomplish the final reversal at the Parousia of the glorified Son of Man. This is the blessed hope of all the saints, both OT and New (Titus 2:13).

In verses 18-20, Daniel relates that even after this general explanation he remained curious about the details surrounding the fourth beast. As if in answer to his curiosity, the vision suddenly resumes, and he sees the little horn making war against the saints and prevailing over them (v. 21). In a moment, the angel will explain the meaning of these ominous words. But first the prophet's vision ends with yet another sighting of the coming of the Ancient of Days (who is Christ at his Parousia), vindicating the faith (and the faithfulness) of the saints, and bestowing upon them the joys of eternal kingdom life (1 Thess. 3:1-10). Now the motif of the entire vision—indeed, of the entire book—is clear: God faithfully warns of coming conflict so as to produce endurance; then he graciously promises coming triumph so as to produce courage, hope, and eager expectation.

In verses 23-27, we have the angel's (partial) explanation of the vision of the fourth beast. Several key points—much illumined by the NT—may be made.

First, the fourth beast, which is emblematic of the final earthly kingdom, will be different from all the rest, largely because it will succeed in devouring the whole earth (v. 23). Here, the global hegemony of the ancient Roman Empire is partly in view. However, that very hegemony anticipates something far greater, something eschatological, and the true burden of this verse: In the days of the fourth beast, Satan will finally achieve his age-old purpose—manifested from the very beginning at Babel—of creating a counterfeit kingdom that overspreads the entire world (Gen. 11:1-9). Later, John will foresee much the same thing, writing, “And all the world marveled and followed the beast” (Rev. 13:3; 12:9, 16:4). Only “the saints”—the true spiritual Church of all generations, but especially of the last generation—will refuse to marvel, follow, worship, and otherwise receive his mark of ownership (Rev. 13:8, 17:8, 20:4).

Secondly, the verbiage of verse 24 suggests to some commentators that the life of the fourth beast is destined to unfold in three separate stages. In the first, the beast arises from the Great Sea: This marks the advent of the ancient Roman Empire. In the second, “ten” horns (i.e., kings/kingdoms) arise from head of the Beast: This marks the totality (symbolized by the number ten) of the serial manifestations of Greco-Roman culture subsequent to the fall of ancient Rome. In the third, one final horn arises, subduing “three” of its ten predecessors. This speaks of the final eschatological embodiment of the Roman Empire, achieved by the Antichrist, who suddenly consolidates the residuum of Roman power and influence (symbolized by the number 3). This approach, advocated by E. J. Young, is quite attractive in that it allows us to see how, from the time of Christ right up to the Consummation, the territories, peoples, and culture of the ancient Roman Empire remain near the center of the drama of world history.

There are, of course, other views. For example, many of our dispensational brethren, adopting a highly futuristic interpretation of this verse, look for an end time confederacy of ten European nations, over (the remnant of) which the Antichrist will rule after subduing three of them. However, this approach seems too futuristic: Certainly the text itself does not teach it explicitly. Moreover, if the numbers ten and three are meant symbolically, then the dispensational view becomes a prescription for fruitless speculation and failed “fulfillments” based upon the ebb and flow of European politics. By my lights, Young’s approach is far preferable.

Verse 25 sketches the character and career of the Antichrist. He is arrogant and blasphemous; he will attempt to alter well-established customs and laws (including many pertaining to religious observances); and—for a brief, divinely ordained season—he will “wear out” the saints (i.e., persecute them to the point of apparent defeat). This, as we have seen, is none other than the Last Battle, which, according to the NT, will be pitched by the Man of Lawlessness and his subservient world-system against the true spiritual Church of Christ (Mt. 24:9-13, 2 Thess. 2:1f, Rev. 11:7-10, 16:14, 20:8).

In verses 26-27 the angel brings his message to a close by once again sounding a note of final triumph. The NT fully illumines his words. At Christ’s return, the Son of Man will execute final judgment, destroying not only the Antichrist and his followers, but also “the dragon” that inspired and empowered them all (Mt. 25:41, 2 Thess. 2:8, Rev. 17:14, 19:19-21, 20:10). After this, the kingdoms of the world will become the (universal) Kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ; and he—and the saints with him—will reign forever and ever, amen (v. 27, 1 Cor. 15:28, Rev. 11:5, 22:5).

Conclusion

We have seen that the NCH richly opens up this majestic but mysterious OTKP, giving us a simple, biblically coherent interpretation, thereby greatly encouraging the NT saints of all times.

Alas, premillennial views do not fare so well. Premillennarians assert, for example, that verses 9-12 do not describe the Last Judgment at all, but instead speak of a lesser judgment that will immediately precede Christ's millennial reign. Regarding verses 13-14, some among them, following Scofield, argue that Daniel is describing a special "investiture" in heaven, by which Christ, just prior to his millennial reign, will receive authority from the Father to descend to the earth and rule there. Others—such as Fausset, Walvoord, and Pentecost—contend that these verses, and verses 26-27 as well, simply describe Christ's Second Coming in order to inaugurate his millennial kingdom upon the earth.

The great difficulty with all such views—apart from the fact that they are needlessly complicated and confusing—is that they miss the thrust of the chapter as a whole. Again, the Spirit's evident purpose in giving Daniel this vision was to illumine, prepare, strengthen, and encourage all the saints of subsequent times with a revelation of the entire course of "the kingdoms of this world;" a revelation of all that must occur up to and including the Consummation, after which God's everlasting Kingdom will appear in its glorious fullness. Premillennarians, bound by their own eschatology, are forced to deny this, and to assert that Daniel 7 merely takes us to the end of the Era of Proclamation, after which there is still much more to come: the Millennium, the (last) Last Battle (i.e., at the end of the Millennium), and the (last) Last Judgment—all of which the Spirit neglected to mention, not only here, but in chapter 2 as well! The net effect of this error is to eclipse the grandeur of what God actually revealed, becloud the vision of the saints, and defer their fondest dreams for an extra thousand years!

We conclude, then, that unlike premillennarian literalism, the NCH gives us a profoundly satisfying interpretation of Daniel 7; an interpretation that richly equips Christ's Church for the dramatic closing scenes of the present evil age, even as it kindles their hopes for a glorious, everlasting, heavenly Kingdom soon to come!

Let us take a moment to examine this view in some detail. My approach will be to go through our text verse by verse, offering interpretations guided by the RTAV. The translation, with slight (and significant) modifications imported from other versions, is that of the very literal New American Standard Bible.

Daniel's 70 week Prophecy on page 372

Verse 24

Seventy sevens have been decreed over your people and over your holy city, to finish (the) transgression, to make an end of sins, and to make atonement for iniquity; to bring in everlasting righteousness, to seal up vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy.

In this verse, Daniel gives us the theme of the entire prophecy. It is, as it were, a condensed (and rather cryptic) heading, of which all that follows is a detailed elaboration.

What is that theme? Advocates of the RTAV would sum it up this way: God has decreed a set period of time in which he will fulfill all his redemptive purpose and plan; in which he will bestow all his redemptive promises upon all his redeemed people. In other words, here Gabriel declares that the prophecy to follow will give us the remainder of all Salvation History, from Daniel's day to the Parousia of Christ, the Judgment, and the advent of the World to Come. It will survey all that the LORD will do between now and the Consummation to bring his people and their world into the eternal Kingdom of God.

This soul-stirring interpretation is more than confirmed at the very outset. Gabriel declares that seventy sevens are decreed over the people of God and the Holy City. He says nothing of years, or weeks of years. Manifestly, these numbers are symbolic. But why were they chosen, and what do they mean? Doubtless they allude to the seventy years of Israel's exile and captivity, and therefore appear here by way of a grand promise: In the seventy sevens ahead, God will fully deliver his people from their exile and captivity, and fully restore them to all his covenant blessings.

The key word here is "fully." In the Bible, the numbers seven and ten symbolize fullness, perfection, and completion. Seventy sevens, being 7x7x10, mystically expresses perfect completeness (see Mt. 18:22). So then, speaking as he did, Gabriel was simply saying, "God has decreed a set period of time within which he will fulfill, perfect, and complete his redemptive purposes. I am about to tell you what will happen in it."

Leupold puts it this way: "The seventy heptads is the period in which the divine work of greatest moment is brought to perfection."⁹ If this interpretation is correct, it means that the terminus ad quem of the prophecy is indeed the Parousia of Christ at the end of the age. This in turn implies that the seventy sevens are not calendar years, and that henceforth no calculations (or 360 day years) are possible or needed. What a relief!

God's decree concerns Daniel's people and his Holy City. Who and what are they? Here, we must take care. The Jerusalem of verse 25a is indeed earthly Jerusalem, and the people who rebuilt it were indeed ethnic Jews. But as I will argue in a moment, the City of verse 25b, and the City and Sanctuary of verses 26-27, are different. They appear after the coming of Messiah the Prince (25b). They arise in NT times, under the New Covenant. Therefore, according to the NCH, they represent Christ's Church. And as we have seen, Daniel and his godly OT compatriots will be members thereof in excellent standing (John 10:16, Heb. 11:40)!

Gabriel now unveils six redemptive blessings that God will bestow upon his total "Israel" over the course of the seventy sevens (Gal. 6:16). They appear in two triads: The first three pertain to redemptive rescue from sin, the second three to redemptive restoration to eternal life. While textual peculiarities make the exact translation of some these words difficult, the basic message is clear enough, and the NCH richly helps us to uncover the meanings involved.

Good summary:

My take is as follows. By the end of the seventy sevens—and because of the total redemptive work of Christ, both in his humiliation and exaltation—God will have completely: (1) finished (or restrained) the transgression of his people (i.e., stopped their transgressing, as well as the power of their former transgressions to condemn them); (2) made an end of (or sealed up, concealed) their sins (i.e., stopped their sinning, as well as the power of their sins to condemn them); (3) made atonement through Christ for their iniquity, thereby reconciling them to God; (4) brought in everlasting righteousness (i.e., imputed and imparted Christ's righteousness to his people, so that in the end they may dwell where perfect righteousness dwells, 2 Peter 3:13); (5) sealed up vision and prophecy (i.e., fulfilled all previous canonical visions and prophecies); and, (6) anointed the Most Holy (i.e., bestowed divine glory and perfect holiness upon his eschatological Sanctuary, which is the Body and Bride of his Son, the Church, Eph. 3:21, Rev. 21:1-11).

These are all Kingdom blessings, to be introduced by the New Covenant that will create the Kingdom. Therefore, since the Kingdom comes in two stages, there is a sense in which we Christians already enjoy them; there is a sense (largely forensic) in which we have already taken possession of them. Nevertheless, the accent here definitely falls upon the end, the eschaton, the final state. Commenting on the blessings of the completed Kingdom, and indicating Gabriel's purpose in declaring them to Daniel, Leupold writes:

In these six statements we have the sum of all the good things that God promised to men perfectly realized. With this verse we stand at the ultimate goal of the history of the Kingdom of God. What follows will unfold the successive stages by which this goal is realized and present the main features to be looked for and borne in mind by the people of God. We have just seen the essentials of God's program for the ages.

So you are to know and discern that from the issuing of a decree to restore and to rebuild Jerusalem until Messiah the Prince there will be seven sevens; and for sixty-two sevens it will be built again with open square and moat (or wall), even in troubled times.

This verse spans the bulk of the remainder of Salvation History: 69 of the 70 sevens. According to the ESV, the marginal reading of the ASV, and the advocates of the RTAV, it is properly divided into two distinct parts: the first seven, and the 62 sevens that follow it. The first seven begins with a decree to restore and rebuild earthly Jerusalem. Most likely it is the decree issued by Cyrus in 538 BC, though the precise date is of little importance, since the first "seven" is not a week of years, but an era of Salvation History whose exact duration we neither know nor need to know (Ezra 1:1-4, Isaiah 44:28; cf., Dan. 9:23). The first seven ends with the coming of Messiah the Prince. This is first advent of Christ, through whose earthly work—through whose humiliation—all the blessings of v. 24 were purchased and are thereafter bestowed.

Now the 62 sevens begin. They too symbolize an era, the era in which Christ builds his Church. However, here Gabriel uses OT typological language to speak of NT realities, casting the growth of the Church in terms of the growth of the City of God. The reference to its open square (or streets) suggests expansive growth outwards. The reference to a moat or wall suggests divine protection. Pointing to the very real but also limited success of world evangelization, Leupold paraphrases, "She shall again be built extensively, yet within fixed limits."¹¹ The growth shall occur "in troubled times," a phrase echoed in the Revelation, where the Spirit refers to the Church Era (and indeed to all Salvation History) as "the great tribulation." Yes, God has decreed the rearing up of Christ's Church; but he has also decreed much trouble for the saints who will build it (Rev. 7:14; Acts 14:22, Rom. 5:3, 2 Cor. 1:4, 1 Thess. 3:4).

This division of the 69 weeks into two distinct eras (an OT and a New) is decisive for the interpretation of the prophecy as a whole, seeing that it places Christ's first advent at the end of the first seven, rather than at the end of the 69. In particular, it radically challenges the interpretation of verses 26-27 offered in the TFAV and the DTAV. However, the superiority of this approach to verse 25 is so clear that one wonders how we could have missed it for so long! Above all, it immediately helps us to understand why Gabriel did not simply refer to 69 sevens, but instead to seven sevens and 62 sevens. Moreover, as we are about to see, once we accept this framework, it sheds an abundance of fascinating—and eschatologically vital—light on the 70th seven of verses 26-27. We turn to them now.

Then after the 62 sevens the Messiah will be cut off and have nothing, and the people of the prince who is to come will destroy the city and the sanctuary. And its (or, his) end will come with a flood; even to the end there will be war; desolations are decreed.

This is the first of two verses dealing with the seventieth seven; with the third and final stage of Salvation History. Again, it is not a week of seven literal years, as repeated exposure to dispensational claims may incline us to believe. No, it is an era of brief but uncertain duration, the era in which God will bring Salvation History to a close in final conflict, final judgment, and final redemption. This interpretation buttresses the RTAV, since it finds Daniel doing here exactly what we would expect, exactly what he has done before, and exactly what he will do again: giving us nothing less than the Consummation, the dramatic closing scenes of God's plan for the ages. I say it with respect: On this score, the other two views are not worthy to be compared.

The theme of verse 26 is the end time agony of the true spiritual Church of Christ. The close of the present evil age is near. The Great Commission is nearly accomplished. Lawlessness abounds, and deep darkness covers the earth. At this point, says the angel, the Messiah will be cut off and have nothing. Obviously, this cannot refer to his atoning death, as argued by the two other views. But what does it mean? Leupold suggests that the "cutting off" is best illuminated by the "having nothing":

(The "having nothing") implies that he shall not have that which normally might be expected to fall to his lot, such as followers, influence, and the like. If that is the case, then the preceding statement must have involved his being "cut off" in the sense of losing all influence and prestige that he ever had before men. The season of the successful building of the City and the Sanctuary is at an end. As far as the world is concerned, Messiah shall be a dead issue. His cause will seem to have failed.

At that time—amidst such widespread apostasy from the law and Gospel of God—the world-system will take action: The people of the prince who is to come will destroy the City and the Sanctuary (2 Thess. 2:1ff). The prince is not Titus, but the Antichrist, the very Antichrist whom we meet over and again in Daniel's visions (7:8, 11, 21-22, 24-26, 11:36ff). His people are the eschatological seed of the serpent (Gen. 3:15), the "sons of the evil one" (Mt. 13:38), the followers of the Beast (Rev. 13:1f). As for the City and the Sanctuary, Leupold opines: “These represent the visible institution called the Church. These shall be destroyed, and with them the influence of the Christ that we now still know and feel to be abroad in the earth.”¹³ Doubtless this destruction will involve a new measure of Christian martyrdom. Nevertheless, the primary meaning is that religious freedom for Christians will be universally denied, and the institutional Church forced underground. Daniel has already seen this coming (7:21, 25). It is explicitly predicted in 2 Thessalonians 2:3-4. It appears also in Revelation 11:7-10, where the Spirit represents the end time Church under the image of two OT witnesses; witnesses whom the Beast kills and leaves for dead on the bloody streets of the City of Man, just as he did their Lord.

Regarding the final sentence of this verse, Leupold contends that it is the Antichrist whose end will come with a flood of divine judgment at Christ’s Parousia. Like Pharaoh and his obedient armies, he will be utterly swept away (2 Thess. 2: 8, Rev. 15:1-4). This could be. However, the context seems to favor the idea that here too the outward, institutional Church is in view: Her end will come with a flood of opposition and persecution (Psalm 18:4, Isaiah 59:19). To the very end of the seventieth seven, there will be war against the saints (Rev. 12:15, 17). Desolations—both of the institutional Church and her persecutors—are determined (Rev. 11:1-2).

And he will make a firm covenant with many for one week, but in the middle of the week he will put a stop to sacrifice and offering; and on the wing of abominations will come one who makes desolate, even until a complete destruction—one that is decreed—is poured out on the desolator.

Here Gabriel further instructs Daniel about the key events of the seventieth seven, this time with a concluding emphasis upon the destruction of the destroyer, the Antichrist. As the long verse opens, we learn that throughout the final seven, he (the Antichrist) will cause a strong covenant to prevail over “the many.” Leupold explains:

The idea is that as he seeks to take the place of the Christ, so he shall imitate Him in some way. As the Lord made a covenant with his own to give them strong assurances as to what he would do, so Antichrist will inaugurate a covenant that will prevail; which is to say, compel the masses to accept it and abide by it. It shall not, therefore, be a gracious covenant of love, as are the Lord’s covenants, but a covenant of terror, compulsion, and violence.

C. F. Keil, an early proponent of the RTAV, concurs. Highlighting the religious dimension of the Antichrist’s “agreement” with the world, he writes, “The ungodly prince shall impose upon the mass of the people a strong covenant that they should follow him and give themselves to him as their God” (Rev. 13:4).¹⁵ The interpretation offered by these two outstanding commentators is compelling, seeing that 2 Thessalonians 2:1f supplies a more or less identical picture of the purpose, character, and career of the Man of Lawlessness.

Very good:

How will the global rule of the Antichrist affect the Church? In a reprise of the message of verse 26, Gabriel answers by declaring that in the middle of the last seven he will put a stop to sacrifice and offering. This means that (roughly) half way through his hegemony, he will suddenly turn against the Church and suppress her public worship. At this point, he will become “one who makes desolate,” a destroyer. With destructive intent, he will now come against the saints “upon the wing of abominations.” That is, he will fly into global power and influence—and so to apparent victory over Christ’s little flock—riding upon the persuasive force of detestable idols: a counterfeit gospel (i.e., religion, ideology) and counterfeit signs and wonders that seem to validate it (Mt. 24:23-24, 2 Thess. 2:8-12).

This will indeed be the Church’s darkest hour (Mt. 24:21, Rev. 13:7). Yet it is, after all, only an hour, and one that her Redeemer himself has triumphantly passed through. Therefore, it is an hour of hope. For no sooner will the counterfeit prince launch his great war against the saints, than the glorified Christ will appear in the skies above the Earth to rescue them. Then, in the Judgment that follows, he will pour out complete destruction upon all who thought to destroy his own: Apollyon, Antichrist, and “the many” who so foolishly followed them into the Last Battle (Mt. 24:29-31, 25:31ff, 1 Thess. 4:13f, 2 Thess. 1:3-10, 2:8, 11-12, Rev. 19:20, 20:10).

Conclusion

The prophecy of Daniel’s Seventy Sevens—possibly the most difficult in the entire prophetic canon—is a case study in the indispensability of the New Covenant Hermeneutic. Without it, the vision is a maze; a labyrinth from which there is no escape. With it, the way into the open field of truth becomes clear at last.

Our survey of the three main interpretations has made this evident.

Because the advocates of the TFAV have indeed grasped the true structure of NT eschatology, as well as the importance of the NCH, they have produced a fairly viable interpretation, one that has understandably remained popular over the years. However, we have seen that upon closer inspection it fails to do justice to the nuances of the text itself, and also to the grand theme and substance of the book as a whole.

Meanwhile, advocates of the DTAV, having largely misunderstood NT eschatology and imposed an alien OT hermeneutic upon it, have given us an exotic interpretation that is exegetically untenable and theologically flawed. The widespread popularity of this view therefore reflects a serious failure on the part of the modern evangelical church to grasp the true structure of NT theology, and the NCH that naturally flows from it. Happily, it appears that Dispensationalism is now on the wane. I do not think it can be otherwise, seeing that in the end the Spirit of Truth must (and will) draw Christ’s true spiritual Church back to the NT, where alone she will receive the keys to OTKP, Daniel 9, and all the rest of the eschatological truth she will need to stand strong amidst the rigors of the last of the last days.

The NT itself promises this very thing. It tells us that the Lord loves his Bride (John 13:1); that he will prepare her for the Last Battle (John 16:13); and indeed, that one day he will cause her to attain to the unity of the faith, right down to eschatological faith (Eph. 4:11f). When he does, I believe he will draw her to the Reformed Two Advent View of Daniel 9.

Again, the reasons are many. This view includes all the strengths of the other two, while avoiding their weaknesses. It is true to the text, and true to the context: the Book of Daniel as a whole. It harmonizes perfectly with NT eschatology, and draws upon it richly for a right understanding.

But best of all—to my mind at least—is the intriguing fact that the RTAV seems to come at just the right time. Somehow, it perfectly suits the dark, difficult, and dangerous days through which the global Church is now passing. In other words, this interpretation of Daniel’s prophecy of the Seventy Sevens may well be an eschatological gift from the exalted Lord himself; a special opening of our understanding by which, even now, he is supplying his beloved Bride with just the right mix of tough realism, steadfast hope, and eager expectation, so that she will be fully prepared for the return of her beloved Husband, the High King of Heaven (Luke 24:35, John 16:13, 2 Tim. 3:1f, 1 Peter 4:1-2, 12-13).

The Stricken Shepherd, the Gathered Flock (13:7-9)

We come now to the fourth prophetic snapshot of Zechariah’s oracle. Quite fittingly, it brings the first part of the oracle—the part dealing with the Era of Proclamation—to a close (12:1-13:9), even as it transitions to the second and concluding part, the part dealing with the Consummation and the World to Come (14:1ff).

The great theme here is the God-ordained atoning death of the Good and Faithful Shepherd of God’s flock—the Lord Jesus Christ—and the subsequent gathering of the flock (the Church) that will infallibly issue from it. Accordingly, like those preceding it, this snapshot spans the entire Era of Proclamation, teaching us yet again (13:1) that through the Work of Christ (in the days of his humiliation) all the previously promised blessings of the Kingdom will flow to God’s people: strength for victorious spiritual warfare (12:1-9), tears of repentance in token of justifying faith (12:10-14), and inward spiritual cleansing, resulting in outward covenant loyalty to God (13:1-6). Let us explore these ideas by looking briefly at each of the three verses comprising our text.

As the prophecy opens (verse 7), we hear the voice of the LORD commanding a sword to awaken against his Shepherd, against the Man who is his Associate. This cryptic line anticipates whole tracts of NT theology. The sword of the LORD, emblematic of divine retribution for sin, has been asleep, seeing that in ages past God mercifully “passed over” the sins of his people (Isaiah 66:16, Jer. 50:35-37, Ezek. 21:1ff, Rom. 3:25). Now, however, by his all-controlling Providence, the God of Justice awakens it on Mt. Golgotha, so that it may fall, in mercy and grace, upon a Substitute, the very One he has appointed to be the eternal Shepherd of his people (Isaiah 53:2ff, Zech. 13:1; Mt. 27:46, Mark 10:45, John 3:14-16, 12:27-33, Acts 2:23, 4:27-28).

So that the great work of atonement may be accomplished, this Shepherd will stand before God in two ways. First, he will be “the Man,” the Last Adam, who will serve as the Head, Representative, and Substitute of his people; and who, in that capacity, will bear in his own person the just penalty for their sins (John 10:11, Rom. 3:21-26, 5:12ff, 1 Peter 2:24, 3:18). But secondly, he will also be God’s Amith: not just a man, but also a divine (and therefore a holy) Peer, Friend, and Companion to the Father. As such, he will be in perfect tune and walk in perfect step with the Father’s nature, purpose, plan, presence, and power. Therefore, he will win a perfect righteousness for his own, later to be imputed to every afflicted sheep that puts his trust in him (John 8:29, 55, Rom. 3:26, 5:1, 2 Cor. 5:21)!

When God strikes his Shepherd, the sheep will be scattered. There will be two kinds of them. First, there are “the little ones,” loyal but frightened and disoriented Jewish disciples of the Good Shepherd who are temporarily scattered but later regathered (Mt. 26:31). But secondly, there are impenitent Jews who ought to have followed their Messiah, but refused to, and who will therefore be scattered permanently, through divine judgment at the hands of Rome (Mt. 8:12, 23:36-39, Luke 21:20-22). Here Zechariah anticipates NT teaching to the effect that the Good Shepherd’s death will indeed result in judgment, but much more in mercy, seeing that, because of it, God will be able to lay his hand upon the little ones—the afflicted of the flock (11:7, 11)—for salvation. He will be able—and he will begin—to gather his eschatological flock, the spiritual Israel of God (Gal. 6:16).

Verses 8-9 speak of this very thing. Note carefully that at this juncture the prophecy enters the eschatological era, the last days; days in which the exalted Christ spearheads the thrust of the Gospel into the earth, so that he may enter into covenant with all his people (v.9). Therefore, “all the land” of verse 8 cannot refer simply to Palestine (as premillennarians claim), but rather to that which OT Palestine typified: the whole earth, the earth that in the end will become Immanuel’s Land (2:12, 3:9, 9:16, 12:12, 13:2; Rom. 4:13). Says one commentator, “This is not to be taken in a literal sense, but as representing the domain covered by the Kingdom of God.”

If this view is correct, the message of verse 8 is solemn indeed, but comforting as well: By the end of Era of Proclamation, “two parts”—i.e., the larger portion—of all who hear the Gospel will perish from “the land” through their willful disobedience to it. However, through God’s sovereign grace (v. 9), one part—i.e., a smaller portion, an elect remnant, a little flock—will be gathered safely into his Shepherd’s fold, and will therefore remain in the Land. Having safely passed through the Judgment, they will inherit eternal life in the new heavens and the new earth (Mt. 7:13-14, Luke 12:32, 1 Cor. 1:26-31, Eph. 1:6, 2:8-9, 1 Peter 2:4-10).

This line of interpretation seems thoroughly vindicated by verse 9, where we hear God making marvelous promises that resonate deeply in the heart of every NT believer. First, he will bring the Shepherd’s flock through the fire: Despite all manner of painful temptations and persecutions, God will preserve his elect in Christ until they safely enter the World to Come (John 10:29, 17:15, 1 Cor. 1:4-9, 10:13, Jude 1:1). And secondly, he will test and refine them, even as men test and refine silver and gold. This immediately calls to mind the words of the apostle Peter, who encouraged believers to understand that God uses manifold trials as a kind of holy fire by which to purify the faith and character of his people, so that at the revelation of Christ they themselves may receive praise, glory, and honor from him (1 Peter 1:6-9; Proverbs 17:3, Isaiah 43:2, John 15:2, Rom. 5:1-5, Eph. 5:25-27, Heb. 12:1ff)!

Verse 9—and the prophecy as a whole—concludes, appropriately enough, with a reiteration of the great covenant formula. God’s people will call on his Name, and he will answer them; he will say, “They are My people,” and they will say, “The LORD is my God.”

When exactly will all this happen? Doubtless it will happen throughout the entire Era of Proclamation: It will happen when, in the fires of conviction, God's people first call upon Christ for salvation (Luke 18:13, Acts 2:37f); and it will happen later, when, in the fires of temptation and persecution, they call upon him for strength and deliverance (Rom. 15:30-32, Phil. 4:13, 2 Tim. 4:18). However, to judge from its position in the text, it may well be that the Spirit especially has in view the end of the age, when the saints will have finished passing through the fires; when they will have finally entered the World to Come; when they now call upon the Name of the LORD in eternal praise, thanksgiving, and adoration. The Revelation certainly seems to confirm this: When John beholds the Holy City descending to the new earth as a Bride adorned for her Husband, he also hears these triumphant words: "Behold, the tabernacle of God is among men, and he shall dwell among them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be among them" (Rev. 21:3). Here, the days of fire are over; here the everlasting Day of glory has begun!

Many commentators, and especially premillennarians, assert that this prophecy refers exclusively to God's dealings with ethnic Israel. However, as I have tried to show in my exegesis of it, the logic of the NCH, the text itself, and the context surrounding it, all argue against it. Will Jewish disciples of Jesus be able to see themselves in this text? Yes. Will God's latter-day dealings with ethnic Israel fulfill it? To be sure. But again, this is not because Zechariah's words refer exclusively to ethnic Israel. Rather, it is because they refer comprehensively to the eschatological "Israel of God"—the Church—and because elect Jews are part of that Church; it is because they are part of the one flock that has the one Shepherd as its Head (John 10:16, Gal. 6:16). Therefore, I would concur with these comments found in the Reformation Study Bible:

These verses envision God's chosen Shepherd who suffers at the hand of God (v. 7). Out of this judgment emerges the true people of God (v. 9). No clearer picture of Jesus and his suffering Church is given in the Old Testament.⁶

The Last Battle (14:1-2)

Like the prophecies of Daniel and Ezekiel, Zechariah's oracle has eschatological momentum: It is ever moving towards the grand finale of Salvation History. Here in chapter 14, which brings both the oracle and the book to a close, Zechariah reaches his goal: a colorful mosaic of five prophetic snapshots, all dealing with the majestic events of the Consummation and with the life of the World to Come. Having already addressed many of these prophecies in earlier portions of this book, my comments here will be somewhat briefer.

I have entitled the first snapshot The Last Battle (14:1-2). Here Zechariah picks up a theme first mentioned in 12:1-9, bringing it to its logical conclusion: The age-long warfare between the Church and the World will culminate in a final, decisive clash between the two. As ever, this revelation of the Last Battle is instructive, forthright, and sobering, but also laden with comfort. Indeed, verse 1 sounds the note of final victory at the very outset, a note that resonates throughout the entire chapter: In the end, God will effect a great judicial inversion, such that the manifold "goods" maliciously taken from his people—their work, their property, their health, their honor, their right to public worship, their very lives—will be restored to them once and for all (Mt. 10:29-30, Luke 6:20-26, Heb. 10:34). Like Israel's heroes of old, Christ will plunder the plunderers, and will cause the meek who trust in him to inherit the land (Gen. 14:1ff, 1 Sam. 30:1f, Psalm 37:9, 11, Mt. 5:5).

Verse 2 gives us the Last Battle itself. As elsewhere, so here: The Spirit uses images drawn from Israel's long history of attack by hostile nations to picture the final assault of a consolidated world-system against the visible Church (Psalm 48, Ezek. 38-39; Rev. 20:9). God himself, through the secret workings of his Providence, will bring it to pass, in part to sanctify the Bride of Christ, in part to move sinners to repentance (13:9, Ezek. 38:4, Eph. 5:27, 2 Thess. 1:3f, 2:3, Rev. 13:5-10). Since, according to 1 Cor. 15:46, the "natural" (i.e., physical) events and institutions of OT history were meant to picture spiritual NT realities, we cannot assume that the specific forms of suffering mentioned here will literally come to pass. According to the NCH, the essential message of our text is simply that a Satanically controlled world government will maliciously and effectively suppress—though not completely destroy—the visible Church (2 Thess. 2:1ff, Rev. 13:5-10). Nevertheless, Zechariah 14:2, pervasive NT teaching, Church history, and current events themselves all agree in reminding us that God has indeed appointed his children to holy tribulation, and that the purifying fires of the Last Battle will be as intense as any they have ever known (Acts 14:22, 1 Thess. 3:1-5, 2 Tim. 3:12, Heb. 11:35-40, Rev. 11:7-13). Thankfully, that tribulation will be as brief as it is intense, and will be followed immediately by joy unspeakable and full of glory.

The Day of the LORD (14:3-5)

According to the NT, it is Christ himself who will bring the Last Battle to a close at his Parousia, when he arrives in power and glory in the skies above the earth to destroy his enemies and to glorify both his people and their world (Mt. 13:36-43, 24:29-31, 1 Cor. 15:20-28, 2 Thess. 1, 2, 2 Peter 3, Rev. 11:11-19, 14:14-20, 16:17-21, 19:11-21, 20:7-15). According to the NCH, the snapshot before us is a symbolic picture of that very thing. Let us see if our text—and its context—justifies this important conclusion.

Verse 3 tells us that at the time of "Jerusalem's" eschatological agony, the LORD himself will go forth and fight against her foes, even as he did on many previous occasions in Israel's history (Exodus 14:1ff, 15:1-18, Isaiah 36-37, Rev. 15:2-3). This will be the last of them, the great and notable Day of the LORD. However, from the NT we know that the Day of the LORD will in fact be the Day of the Lord Jesus Christ at his Parousia (2 Cor. 1:14, Phil. 2:16, 2 Thess. 2:2, 2 Peter 3:4, 10). Therefore, this particular snapshot is indeed fulfilled at Christ's Parousia, and must be interpreted accordingly.

Verse 4 pictures the LORD creating an unexpected way of escape for his people; verse 5 pictures them using it. This is God's way with all his people, both OT and New (1 Cor. 10:13). Quite intentionally, the imagery used here reminds us of Israel's miraculous deliverance at the Red Sea (Exodus 14:1ff). Importantly, verse 4 is not telling us that Christ will literally stand upon the Mount of Olives; or that he will literally split it apart so as to create a literal valley. Similarly, verse 5 is not predicting that literal Jews of a physical Jerusalem will flee to the tiny village of Azel. Those who take this approach fall into confusion by abandoning the NCH, which teaches us to interpret this prophecy figuratively, in terms of NT truth.⁷

The key!

What then is the real message of verses 4-5? We begin to receive our answer when we remember that a number of OT texts picture the God of judgment treading upon the high places of the earth so as to split valleys and melt mountains beneath his omnipotent feet (Psalm 97:5, Isaiah 64:1-2, Micah 1:3-4, Nahum 1:5). Similarly, we remember that in OT times the LORD was faithful not only to rescue his people from coming destruction, but also to provide them with cities—or other places—of refuge, to which they could flee (Gen. 19:20-26, Numbers 35:9f, Joshua 6:1ff, 1 Sam. 24:22). Bearing all this in mind, we can readily discern the essential character of the promise found in these verses: In the Day of the LORD, when the world itself is about to undergo final destruction, the presence and power of the covenant-keeping God of Israel will descend to the earth and draw near to his beloved, persecuted City. Then he will supernaturally open a way for his people to flee eastward towards him (for the LORD likes to come to his children from the East: Isaiah 63:1, Ezek. 43:4, Rev. 7:2), and so find safety in an appointed City of Refuge. When the last of his redeemed children have entered that City, the LORD himself will come, with all his holy ones, executing final judgment upon all of his and Israel's enemies.

It requires but a small step into the NT to see exactly how these broad theological promises will be fulfilled: In the Day of the Lord Jesus, the glorified Christ himself will descend from heaven to the skies just above the earth, circling the globe from east to west, even as the earth and its works begin to melt with intense heat (Mt. 24:27, 2 Peter 3, Rev. 7:2). By his Spirit and through the agency of his holy angels he will swiftly draw near to his people (his Beloved City) wherever they may be, and will supernaturally open a way through the air for his saints to fly to him, who is their one true City of Refuge (Mt. 13:36-43, 1 Thess. 4:13ff). When in this way he has gathered all his children safely to his side, he, they, and all the holy angels will “come” in such a way as to consign the enemies of God—both human and angelic—to the fires of God's eternal judgment (Mt. 13:42, 25:31ff, Rom. 16:20, 1 Cor. 6:2, Rev. 19:20, 20:10).

The Judgment to Come (14:12-15)

These verses, which reprise the battle imagery of 12:1-4, draw heavily upon OT Law and history to depict the eschatological defeat of the enemies of Christ's Church at his Parousia, and the eternal punishment to follow (Mt. 24:29-25:46, 1 Thess. 1, 2 Thess. 2, Rev. 11:7-13, Rev. 14:14-20, 19:11-21, 20:7-15).

Verse 12, a ghastly portrait of the eternal destruction of the wicked in hell, represents their torments in terms of the plagues that formerly befell God's enemies, whether in Egypt (Ex. 7-12), or, more aptly, at the gates of Jerusalem itself, where the Angel of the Lord struck the Assyrian army and rescued the trembling but trusting people of God (Isaiah 36-37; cf. Lev. 26:16, Deut. 28:22, 2 Thess. 1:9, Rev. 20:10,14).

Verse 13 tells us that, as in OT times, so again at the Last Battle: God will judge his enemies by confusing their thoughts, undermining their unity, and turning their hand one against another (Judges 7:22, 1 Sam. 14:20). The final destruction of Antichrist's kingdom will be heralded by the preliminary destructiveness of war within his kingdom (Dan. 11:36ff, Rev. 17:16-18). Conceivably, this verse also portrays the eternal hatred and conflict of the wicked in hell.

Very good:

Verse 14 enlarges upon 14:1, speaking of the eschatological plunder to occur after the Last Battle. The royal tribe (the Church) will fight bravely in defense of the Holy City (also the Church), teaching, preaching, and encouraging one another in such a way that they will endure to the end, and so be saved (14:14, NAS, NIV; Mt. 10:22, Acts 14:22, 1 Thess. 3:2-3, Rev. 2:10). As a reward for their faithfulness, Christ, at his return, will cause the world and its wealth, now purged of sin, to pass forever into the custody of the saints (Luke 19:15f). In that Day, all things will be theirs, they will be Christ's, and Christ will be God's (1 Cor. 3:21-23). The humble in Christ will inherit the earth (Mt. 5:5).

Verse 15 declares that the final plague will fall even upon the animals that carried God's enemies into battle. This recalls the "ban" under which God placed all living things when he sent Joshua into Canaan; into the land of the Amorite, whose iniquity had then grown full (Gen. 15:16, Deut. 20:16-18). The NT meaning is this: When the world's iniquity is finally complete, Christ, God's eschatological Joshua, will return and utterly destroy it. The former things will pass away, so that new and eternal things may spring forth (Isaiah 42:9, 1 Cor. 7:31, 1 John 2:17). God himself will make all things new, and will bestow those things upon his beloved sons and daughters, who will be heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ (Gal. 4:1-2, Rom. 8:17, Rev. 21:1-5, 7).

The Worship to Come (14:16-21)

Our final snapshot pictures worship in the World to Come. It is divided into two parts. The first speaks of the eschatological Feast of Booths (vv. 16-19), the second of the perfect holiness of eschatological Judah and Jerusalem (vv. 20-21). Earlier, we discussed the reasons why a literal, premillennial interpretation of this text is impossible. Let us therefore see what help the NCH can offer us in disclosing the deep, NT meaning of Zechariah's words.

On the surface of things, the message of verses 16-19 is quite simple: In the World to Come there will be two different kinds of nations (or families). Both of them, at one time or another prior to the Judgment, came up with hostile intent against Jerusalem (v. 16). Now, however, the first group goes up annually (and eternally), not to attack Jerusalem, but rather to worship God as their King, and also to celebrate the Feast of Booths in Jerusalem's holy precincts. Meanwhile, the other group, which apparently has Egypt as its head, consists of stiff-necked nations that persistently refuse to go up. These the LORD will punish with a plague of drought (vv. 17-19).

How can we best understand the meaning of this mysterious prophecy? To begin with, we must ponder for a moment the typological meaning of the Feast of Booths. A look at Leviticus 23:33-34 reveals that this was an especially joyful feast celebrated at harvest time, wherein Israel was to commemorate not only their great deliverance from Egypt, but also God's faithfulness in leading them through the wilderness of Sinai (where they camped in "booths" or "tabernacles") into the Promised Land. Here is the key to understanding Zechariah's prophecy, a prophecy designed to comfort devout OT saints with a picture of the eternal worship of the glorified Church, and so cast in the language and imagery of Israel's most joyful OT feast!

This background information—along with the NCH—enables us to see all things clearly. For example, now we can see that Zechariah's eschatological Feast of Booths will indeed be a harvest feast, since here, in the World to Come, all the saints will have been gathered into the barn of God's completed Kingdom (Mt. 13:30, John 4:38, Rev. 14:14-16). Formerly, they were temporary enemies of God and of his people; but Christ, at various times prior to the Judgment, harvested them through the Gospel and turned them into eternal friends (Mt. 9:37, Acts 26:17-18, Rom. 5:8, 1 Tim. 1:12-12, Titus 3:3f). Also, this will be an everlasting Feast: The saints will forever "go up" in worship, through Christ, unto God their King (1 Peter 2:5, Rev. 7:9-10, 14:1-4). Finally, this will be a joyful Feast: In his City—and as his City—Christ's people will ever rejoice, not only in the hour of their own personal deliverance from the Domain of Darkness, but also in the subsequent faithfulness of their Good Shepherd, who safely led his flock through the deadly wilderness of this present evil age, past the Judgment, and into the Promised Land (John 6:38-40, Gal. 1:4, Phil. 1:6, Rev. 12:7-17, 19:11).

But what are we to make of Egypt, and of the families of the earth that follow Egypt's lead in refusing to go up? Clearly, these typify all men and nations who refused to participate in the eschatological exodus; who refused to accept spiritual rescue from the Domain of Darkness, and spiritual transfer into the Kingdom of God's beloved Son (Col. 1:13); who refused to follow in the footsteps of Moses, who esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt (i.e., of the fallen world-system); who refused to walk with Christ through the wilderness of this world to the Promised Land (Heb. 11:26, Rev. 12:1f).

Puzzlingly, we find these rebellious nations still upon the earth, yet far from Zion and Jerusalem, where the friends of God celebrate the Feasts of God. But in Revelation 22—which also describes the World to Come—the puzzle is solved. Here again we find these nations far from Jerusalem, outside the gates of the Holy City (Rev. 22:15). Now, however, we have learned that in fact they are in the Lake of Fire (Isaiah 66:24, Rev. 19:20, 20:10, 14). It is, therefore, in death (and hell) that the impenitent enemies of God will endure the very plague of drought that they chose for themselves in life, when they refused to drink of the Rock, and to follow the Rock, that God offered them in the Gospel (Mt. 12:43 NAS, Luke 16:24, John 7:37, 1 Cor. 10:4, Rev. 21:6, 22:17).

Part two of our prophecy (vv. 20-22) celebrates the perfect, all-pervading holiness of the World to Come. In that world, the distinction between holy and common, clean and unclean, has completely disappeared (Acts 10:15). The bells on the horses are holy. The cooking pots in the LORD's house are holy—as holy as the altar itself. Yes, even the cooking pots in the houses of the people of Jerusalem and Judah are holy, so holy that men may boil their sacrifices to God in them. Here the boundary between sacred and the profane has been obliterated. Here, every act is an act of worship, every day is the Lord's Day. Here, every Canaanite—a type of unregenerate, sinful man—has been expelled (14:21, Rom. 16:17-20, 1 John 2:19, Rev. 22:15). Here, Israel itself has become the eternal house of the gracious, loving Redeemer who fought triumphantly in their behalf: the LORD of hosts (14:21, Eph. 2:22).

For this reason, in that Day the saints will weep no more, but in an eternal celebration of the Feast of Booths they will rejoice in the Lion of the Tribe of Judah; in the Holy One of Israel who, by his righteous life and atoning death, so mightily prevailed that he made both them and their world forever holy, even as he is holy (1 Peter 1:15-16, Rev. 5:5, 21:2, 22:11).

Conclusion to Part 3

Thank you for joining me in a long, challenging journey over the rough terrain of OTKP. Hopefully, you have found it well worth the time and effort involved.

Speaking for myself, in thinking and writing about these challenging texts I have been impressed over and over again with the power and fruitfulness of the NCH. By way of conclusion to Part 3 of our study, let me touch briefly on four special blessings that come to mind.

Key points:

First, the NCH wonderfully opens up OTKP. Above all, it does this by clarifying its true sphere of fulfillment, the New (and Eternal) Covenant in Christ, and the two-staged spiritual Kingdom that it creates. Once we are clear on this fundamental point, it is but a small step to mastering the typological method of OT prophetic interpretation, by which we learn to see NT spiritual realities promised and described under a type-laden veil of OT symbolism. The end result is that the NCH gives us skill, confidence, and good success in discerning the Spirit's intended meaning in all OTKP.

Secondly, the NCH properly exalts the New Testament, restoring it to its place of honor in the progress of divine revelation. For too long, huge swaths of the evangelical community have seen the glory of Christ and the Gospel eclipsed by eschatologies mired in a literal interpretation of OT prophetic texts. The sad result has been that the Old Covenant overshadows the New; the Millennium overshadows the two-staged Kingdom of Christ; and ethnic Israel overshadows spiritual Israel, the Church. The NCH heals this theological wound, disclosing Christ and the Eternal Covenant as the one true body towards which all former shadows bent; the one true goal towards which all Salvation History ran (Col. 2:17).

Thirdly, the NCH marvelously discloses and magnifies the Christ-centered unity of the Scriptures. Speaking of the OT Scriptures—and therefore of OTKP—the Lord Jesus himself said, “These are they that testify of me” (John 5:39). And they testify, not just of him, but also of the New Covenant that he introduced, and the two-staged spiritual Kingdom that it creates. Once we see this—and once we embrace the hermeneutic that it entails—then every tile in the vast mosaic of Scripture falls neatly into place, with the result that we fall down in awe before the majestic portrait of the Person and Work of Christ reflected therein.

Finally, the NCH helpfully prepares the Church for her arduous but victorious Gospel ministry at the end of the age. Henceforth, the sleek, sharply pointed shafts of OTKP—whether pre-exilic, exilic, or post-exilic—are deposited as so many arrows in her spiritual quiver. Henceforth, she can draw them out to warn the wicked, evangelize the lost, and teach, exhort, and encourage the saints. Thus shall Christ's NT scribes nourish one another with things old and new; thus shall they pass triumphantly through the Greatest Tribulation, the Last Battle, the Resurrection of the Dead, and the Last Judgment; and thus shall they enter the glorious World to Come, where they will live forever with their heavenly Husband and King, who at long last has returned for his beloved Bride and safely brought her home.

Conclusion

(Chp 19 The Revelation: Purpose and Literary Genre)

Summing up, we have seen that the great purpose of the Revelation is prophetic; that in it, God, through Christ, speaks to the universal Church in order to teach, warn, exhort, and comfort her, so that she might make a worthy and triumphant pilgrimage through the wilderness of this world into the eschatological Promised Land.

This is highly relevant to Part 4 of our study for the very important reason that it naturally and powerfully inclines us to an “ecclesiastical” interpretation of Revelation 20. In particular, it suggests that Revelation 20 cannot possibly be what many premillennarians claim it is: a divine afterthought, in which the Spirit suddenly shifts his focus from the Church to ethnic Israel, and from the Church era to a future Millennium. No, just like the rest of the book, chapter 20 must also focus on the Church, and on the present evil age through which the Church makes her difficult pilgrimage (Rev. 12). As we have just seen, this conclusion flows naturally from the One who gave it (the Head of the Church); from the ones to whom he gave it (the seven churches, emblematic of the universal Church); and from the purposes for which he gave it (to teach, warn, and comfort the Church). Moreover, as we shall soon see, it also flows naturally from a careful study of the structure, contents, and symbolism of Revelation 20 itself.

The Literary Genre of the Revelation

The Revelation is an outstanding example of a literary genre called biblical apocalyptic. The Greek word apokalypsis conveys the idea of the removal of a veil, so that something once hidden is now revealed. There is, then, a sense in which one might say that all Scripture is “apocalyptic,” since in all Scripture there is an unveiling of special God-given truths that sinful man could not otherwise know, understand, or enjoy. However, as a general rule, theologians use this word far more narrowly. That is, they use it to speak of a particular kind of Scripture. For such as these, biblical apocalyptic may be defined as predictive prophecy in which the Holy Spirit—using vision and symbol—unveils divine truth about the course, character, and consummation of Salvation History.

In our discussion of OTKP, we have run across this kind of literature more than once. For example, chapters 24-27 of Isaiah, which focus on final judgment and final redemption on the Day of the LORD, supply an outstanding example of pre-exilic apocalyptic. From the season of Israel’s exile we have Daniel 7, which is likely the single greatest OT depiction of the course and character of Salvation History. From the same era we also have Ezekiel 38-39, which is likely the single greatest OT depiction of the consummation of Salvation History; of the Last Battle and the Day of the LORD. Finally, from post-exilic times we have the visions and prophecies of Zechariah, all of which again make rich use of symbols to display both the course and conclusion of Salvation History.

In the NT, apocalyptic texts are less plentiful, seeing that in NT times there is an unveiling of all that God had previously hidden under type, shadow, and symbol. Nevertheless, the NT is not without its apocalyptic elements. Some of Jesus’ parables have an apocalyptic feel to them (Mt. 13:36-43, 47-50). His Olivet Discourse, alluding as it does to a number of OTKP’s, contains the marks of biblical apocalyptic (Mt. 24, Mark 13). Similarly, Paul’s discourse on the Consummation, written to the Thessalonian Christians, draws frequently upon OT apocalyptic texts, even as it teaches on distinctly apocalyptic themes (2 Thess. 2).

And then there is the Revelation—a book that is manifestly apocalyptic, (almost) entirely apocalyptic, and uniquely apocalyptic vis-à-vis the rest of Holy Scripture. Do we wish to understand it properly? If so, we cannot ignore its genre. Nor can we ignore the unique way in which it embodies this genre. Therefore, drawing upon the definition given above, let us take a few moments to examine the Revelation as a true but biblically unique instance of biblical apocalyptic. In what follows, I will characterize it as (1) a predictive prophecy, (2) singing the glory of the High King of heaven, (3) communicated by way of vision and symbol, and (4) serving as the Grand Finale of all Scripture.

A Predictive Prophecy

We have already discussed some of the ways in which the Revelation is a prophecy; the ways in which it teaches, warns, and comforts Christ's Church. However, in doing so it frequently incorporates predictions of historical events yet future to the reader/hearer. Therefore, this long prophecy clearly falls into the category of biblical apocalyptic.

It is, however, biblical apocalyptic of an extraordinary kind. Why? Because in making its predictions about the future, it tells us little or nothing new about the future. That is, it tells us little or nothing that was not already foretold in OTKP under type, shadow, and symbol; or it tells us little or nothing that was not already unveiled, explained, and practically applied in the Gospels, the Acts, and the Epistles.

Think for a moment about the prophetic themes we just discussed. In the Revelation, Christ gives John—and the Church—visions of the Dragon, the Beast, the False Prophet, and the Harlot. How are we to understand them? The answer is: We could not possibly understand them unless Christ, in the rest of the NT, had already given us keys by which to unlock their meaning; unless he had given us straightforward didactic teaching about all four. And the same is true of OT apocalyptic. How are we to understand the visions and prophecies of Isaiah, Daniel, Ezekiel, and Zechariah? The answer is: We cannot, apart from the revelations of the Didactic NT. The latter is the hermeneutical key to the former.

This point cannot be overemphasized. Yes, like all biblical apocalyptic, the Revelation contains predictive prophecy. But because of its unique place in the biblical canon—because it serves as the Grand Finale of all Scripture—the things it predicts in vision and symbol cannot be new. For if, in the Revelation, God meant to give us new truth about the future (e.g., new truth about a seven year Tribulation, or the career of the Antichrist, or a future millennium, etc.), he would also have had to give us more didactic revelation by which to interpret the symbols used to convey the new truth. But he did not. Instead, he simply closed the canon with the Revelation. Therefore, we may safely assume that the truth hidden beneath its symbols is old truth, and that everything we need to understand those symbols has been given to us previously in the rest of the NT. In short, the Revelation is not a puzzle to be figured out; rather—for those who know their Bibles and understand NT eschatology—it is a celebration to be enjoyed. I will have more to say on this important point below.

Singing the Glory of the High King of Heaven

Biblical apocalyptic is predictive prophecy with a particular theme. It likes to explore the course, character, and consummation of Salvation History, and to do so in ways that encourage God's suffering people with the hope of final justice and redemption: of final rescue from the powers of evil, final retribution against the agents of evil, and final restoration to the promised covenant blessings of God.

Great summary:

In our study of OTKP, we saw the manifold ways in which the Spirit developed these great themes in OT times. In prophet after prophet, he spoke of a final regathering of God's people; of their final restoration to the Promised Land; of the coming of the Messiah; of the advance of his kingdom in the Days of the Messiah; of the conversion of the Gentiles; of ongoing victory over God's enemies; of the Last Battle, the Day of the Lord, the resurrection of the dead, and the eternal World to Come. Importantly, these themes are the sum and substance of NT eschatology, as well. However, in the OT "true truth" on these themes remained largely veiled under symbolic, typological language. Moreover, because of this veiling, the exact sequence of the great eschatological events also remained obscure. For this reason, God himself pronounced OTKP in general—and OT apocalyptic in particular—a closed book; but a closed book that would indeed be opened in the last days (Jer. 23:20, Dan. 12:4, Heb. 1:1f).

When, however, we reach the NT, the wraps come off. The mysteries of the Kingdom are revealed. The heart of Salvation History (the Eternal Covenant in Christ) is disclosed. The character of Salvation History—that it consists of successive administrations of the Eternal Covenant—is manifested. And the course of the Salvation History—the stages in which it unfolds, and the key events proper to each stage—is illumined once and for all. As a result, God's people hold in their hands, at long last, the key to understanding all Salvation History, all OTKP, and all OT apocalyptic!

But if this is so, why, in the Revelation, would God revert to the use of biblical apocalyptic in order to prophesy to Christ's pilgrim Church? I have already suggested an answer to this important question: He did so because he desired not only to teach, warn, and encourage the saints one final time (just as he had in the rest of the NT), but also to give them the Grand Finale of all Scripture. That is, he desired to weave the Christ-centered history, poetry, prophecy, and doctrine of the whole Bible into the final movement of the great symphony of Scripture. In the eyes of the High Poet of Heaven, biblical apocalyptic was apparently the perfect vehicle for doing this very thing.

We must, however, look a little closer. Yes, like all biblical apocalyptic the Revelation has as its theme the course, character, and consummation of Salvation History. But here again it is unique, this time because its focus is largely on a particular portion of Salvation History: the Heavenly Mediatorial Reign of Christ. Or, to state the case more precisely, its focus is largely on the Exaltation of Christ; on all the eschatological acts and events by which the Father is pleased to honor the One who, out of love for him and his people, humbled himself even to the point of death on a cross (Phil. 2:1-11).

In a moment we will examine the structure of the Revelation, in order to see exactly how God accomplished this. Here it suffices to say that in this unique expression of biblical apocalyptic God was pleased to draw upon all previous biblical revelation in order to focus the saints' attention on the High King of Heaven: on his resurrection, ascension, and session at the right hand of the Father; on his absolute sovereignty over all the subsequent events of history; on his infallible declaration of the Gospel—through the Church Militant—to “the (sinful) inhabitants of the earth;” on his continual judgments against their enemies; on his rush to the rescue of his little flock in the days of the Last Battle; and especially on his glorious Parousia at the end of the age, when he himself will execute final judgment, administer final redemption, and bring in the new heavens and the new earth, the eternal home of God and the redeemed.

Does all of this help us to understand Revelation 20? Indeed it does! For if the theological focus of the whole book is on the High King of Heaven—on the course, character, and consummation of his heavenly, mediatorial reign—how likely is it that this one chapter suddenly takes up the theme of a future earthly reign? No, the Revelation is a predictive prophecy that sings the glory of the High King of Heaven through and through. To see this is to see the meaning of Revelation 20 as well.

This is the third element of biblical apocalyptic, namely that it uses vision and symbol to communicate prophetic truth about Salvation History. But once again we find that the Revelation does this in a unique manner, since it uses vision and symbol, not to veil truth yet to come, but simply to celebrate truth previously unveiled in the Gospels, the Acts, and the Epistles. Therefore, its language is not really “mysterious,” since in the Didactic NT we already have the keys by which to understand it. It is, however, still symbolic, with the result that we must interpret its images symbolically, rather than literally.

If there were any doubt about this, it should be quickly dispelled simply by looking at the first verse of the Revelation. There we learn that God “... sent and signified (the Revelation) by his angel to his servant John” (1:1). The Greek word for “signify” is semaino, a verb closely related to the noun semeion, meaning “sign.” So then, in choosing this particular word to describe the prophecy as a whole, the Spirit teaches and admonishes us to interpret the Revelation as a book of signs or symbols. If we will obey him, we will not go far wrong.

It is true, of course, that all interpreters, whatever their eschatological persuasion, are ready to acknowledge that the Revelation contains symbols. However, some interpreters, while agreeing that the Revelation contains symbols, refuse to acknowledge that in virtue of its literary genre it is in fact a book of symbols, a book that must therefore be interpreted symbolically from start to finish.

The result of this refusal is an inconsistent hermeneutic. For example, pressured by the obvious, the prophetic literalist will readily concede that the sword coming from Christ’s mouth is a symbol for the word of God (1:16); or that the Spirit symbolizes the exalted Christ as a Lamb with seven horns and seven eyes in order to remind us that our Sacrifice for sin is now the omnipotent and omniscient High King and High Priest of Heaven (5:6). When, however, the literalist comes to the 144,000 of all the tribes of the children of Israel (7:4); or to the Two Witnesses who prophesy and (briefly) perish on the streets of the Great City (11:8); or to Christ’s admonition to the saints against taking the mark of the Beast (13:16-18); or to the gathering of the kings of the whole world at the Mountain of Megiddo (16:14) ... then he suddenly abandons the symbolic hermeneutic for a literal, thereby abandoning a consistent method of interpretation for an inconsistent. How well I remember a certain respected prophetic literalist complain that a symbolic, typological hermeneutic will leave the prophetic interpreter “at sea,” bobbing up and down on the swells of mere subjectivity. But perhaps it is really the literalist who is at sea, bobbing back and forth at his own good pleasure between two diametrically opposed approaches to the interpretation of apocalyptic literature in general, and the Revelation in particular.

Davis’ notes on the mark of the beast (seen several pages later as well): In the Revelation, Christ repeatedly exhorts his people concerning the Beast. Above all, he warns them not to receive his mark—his name, or the number of his name—on their right hand or on their forehead (14:9, 11, 15:2, 20:4). Here again the Spirit draws upon OT imagery to speak symbolically to God’s NT people (Ezekiel 9). The saints now have the seal of the living God on their foreheads (7:3). In other words, because of their faith in Christ they now belong to the Father; they are his adopted sons and daughters, carrying his Name (Rom. 8:15, 1 Peter 1:17). How then shall they give their ultimate allegiance, whether in thought (symbolized by a mark on the forehead) or in deed (symbolized by a mark on the hand), to any mere man or human institution? Note also that in Scripture six is the number of man (Gen. 1:26ff, Rev. 13:18, NIV), and three is the number of God Triune. Therefore, 666 is the number of man seeking to supplant the triune God; the number of man audaciously representing himself as the proper object of worship (13:16-18). The implications are clear: Men take the mark of the Beast whenever and wherever they worship the anti-christian, self-deifying State. And again, throughout the Revelation Christ warns his own that they must never do this evil thing. [In other words, the mark of the beast on their forehead and hands is to be taken figuratively for what people think (signified by on the forehead) and consequently, what people do (signified by on their hands). Believers have the mind of Christ, so they think vastly differently about spiritual things, sin, worship of the true God (in spirit and truth) and consequently, what they do is pleasing to God because it’s done by faith in the Son of God – or, say it this way, our acts testify to our having saving faith as Abraham was justified by his works in the same sense described by James in Jas. 2:18. Because the unregenerate man has not this mindset, a regenerate soul, the restored image of God in him, a new creation, he is told by Christ, “I never knew you; depart from me, you workers of lawlessness.” Mt. 7:23 There’s the consequence of the unregenerate mind, his works are lawless...apart from Christ, outside of faith, having other motives than a love for God, but by motives, for instance, of self love, self preservation, to be seen by men, etc. And so, they are cast out into outer darkness. Taking this a step further, how does this unregenerate mindset get further hardened? Prosperity! John Flavel comments: “Prosperity meeting with a graceless heart, makes it wholly sensual, and entirely swallows up its thoughts and affections. Earthly things transform and molds their hearts into their own similitude and nature; the whole strength of their souls goes out to those enjoyments.” In this is seen the process of the securing this earthly image on their foreheads and hence their evil works that follow. This is heavy.

If, then, we hope to understand the Revelation—and especially chapter 20—we must recognize that it is indeed a unique instance of biblical apocalyptic; that it communicates previously revealed NT truth in vision and symbol; that it does so consistently, in all portions of the book (save for chapters 2-3, where didactic teaching predominates); and that in order to understand it, we must consistently adopt an appropriate hermeneutic. That would be the NCH, according to which we see all biblical prophecy as using types, shadows, and symbols to communicate “true truth”—NT truth—about Christ, the Eternal Covenant, and the twofold spiritual Kingdom he introduced under that covenant. When we do, we will immediately understand the 144,000, the Two Witnesses, the Mark of the Beast, the Battle of Armageddon, and the thousand year reign of Christ proclaimed in Revelation 20.

Serving as the Grand Finale of All Scripture

I have argued that the Revelation is indeed an instance of biblical apocalyptic, but also that it is a unique instance, appearing as it does at the end of the Bible, where it serves as the Grand Finale of all Scripture; of all special revelation. Since this point is so important for a proper understanding of the book as a whole, let us pause to consider it more closely.

Think for a moment of your favorite symphony. Now think of its final movement. What is it that makes the final movement a grand finale? Three simple answers come to my mind.

First, it appears at the end of the symphony: There is no more music to come.

Secondly, it reprises all the themes heard in the previous two or three movements. However, when it does, it does so very “grandly.” That is, it skillfully, artistically, and majestically weaves together all the earlier motifs, so that we not only hear them again, but also hear them afresh; hear them in new, startling, and beautiful relations with one another; hear them in such a way that the whole symphony is somehow poured into the last part of the symphony.

And thirdly, because it is a grand finale, it does not typically introduce new musical themes, but rather devotes itself more or less exclusively to a fresh, inspirational recapitulation of the old.

All three of these observations apply to the Revelation, and in a way that helps us understand the book to its very depths.

Like a grand finale, the Revelation appears at the end of the great symphony of biblical revelation. Doubtless it was the last book of Holy Scripture to be given by God. Appropriately enough, it therefore appears as the last book of our Bible. Moreover, its contents veritably scream to us that it should be the last book, since it is so thoroughly taken up with the Last Things: the character and course of the Last Days, the Last Battle, the Last Resurrection and the Last Judgment, all of which occur at the Last Coming of the Last Man, the glorified Lord Jesus Christ. The claims of Church History’s false prophets notwithstanding, Christians find it unthinkable that God, having given us a book like this, should give us any more, as indeed the Revelation itself implies (Rev. 21:18-19). The Revelation is the Book of the End, and so rightly belongs at the end of the Book; at the end of the symphony of Scripture as its final glorious movement (1:8, 2:26, 21:6, 22:13).

Great summary of proper interpretation, etc.:

Like a grand finale, the Revelation also incorporates and skillfully weaves together ideas and images from the preceding movements of Scripture, whether OT or New. Here, biblical allusions abound, whether to the Garden of Eden, Moses, the Exodus, Elijah, Mt. Zion, the Temple, the birth of Jesus, the cruelty of Herod, the preaching of the disciples two by two, Christ’s resurrection, ascension, session, heavenly reign, and Parousia. Indeed, the Revelation cites or alludes to so many biblical texts that when we delve into it we immediately find the center columns of our reference Bibles bulging at the seams! Westcott and Hort counted nearly 400 references to the OT, and many later commentators argue that they found too few. In Revelation 12 alone, there are quotes from, or allusions to, Genesis, Exodus, Deuteronomy, Psalms, Song of Solomon, Isaiah, Hosea, Micah, Daniel, Zechariah, Matthew, Luke, John, 2 Corinthians, Galatians, 1 Peter, 1 John, and Jude. All of this makes it clear that the Revelation is not historical narrative, law, poetry, gospel, or epistle. Rather, it is something unique, something completely new under the biblical sun: It is a final prophetic word to the universal Church, clothed in raiment from all that has gone before it, and so serving not only as a prophetic word, but also as the Grand Finale of all Scripture. If this is true, the implications are truly important. For if the Revelation is indeed the Grand Finale of all Scripture, then we ought not to expect it to introduce any new doctrines. It is not the purpose of a grand finale to introduce new themes, but rather to recapitulate the old. And when we closely examine the Revelation, that is precisely what we find. Here, there is nothing new; nothing other than what Christ and the apostles have already taught us in the Didactic NT; nothing new about the Holy Trinity, the creation, the Fall, the Eternal Covenant, the nature and structure of the Kingdom, or the Consummation at Christ's coming. What we do find is the Spirit speaking again—and over and over again—about all these “old” things. However, he does so in new and wondrous ways; in beautiful, powerful, and supremely inspiring visions and symbols; in a Grand Finale that incorporates and weaves together all that has gone before in Holy Scripture, even as it celebrates, one final time, the glory of the High King of Heaven.

The application to our theme in Part 4 is easy to see. If the Revelation really is the Grand Finale of all Scripture, how likely is it that just a few measures prior to its end (i.e., in chapter 20) the Lord Jesus would suddenly introduce a completely new eschatological theme (i.e., a future earthly stage of the Kingdom lasting a thousand years); a theme that would radically modify, if not completely overthrow, all he had previously taught us in the Didactic NT about the nature and structure of the Kingdom, the Consummation, the relationship of the Old Covenant to the New, and the proper interpretation of OTKP? Answer: NOT likely. Why? Because to do so would be to destroy the Grand Finale, belatedly and unexpectedly transforming the final movement of Scripture into the vehicle of a whole new movement; a new movement that must radically transform the Christian's understanding of every movement that preceded it, even as it postpones the completed Kingdom—and the Christian's completed joy—for an extra thousand years!

No, not likely at all!

Conclusion

We conclude, then, that a good understanding of the literary genre of the Revelation is most helpful for resolving the millennial controversy.

Yes, this book is an instance of biblical apocalyptic, but it is a unique instance.

Yes, it contains predictive prophecy, but it predicts nothing new.

Yes, it gives us the course, character, and consummation of Salvation History, but it tells us nothing new about them, preferring instead simply to exalt and sing the glories of the One who dwells at the center of them all.

And yes, it communicates in symbols, but in symbols whose meanings are old; symbols whose meanings have been disclosed previously in the Didactic NT, so that (for God's NT scribes) the Revelation is an open book, and not a sealed one.

For all these reasons, I conclude that Revelation 20 cannot possibly be introducing new truth about a future millennial stage of the Kingdom; new truth that would radically modify, upend, and overthrow the old. Rather, Revelation 20—and indeed the book as a whole—must simply be giving us the Grand Finale of all Scripture. It must be recapitulating and celebrating old truths, albeit in a new and breathtakingly beautiful way; a way that, fittingly enough, exalts him who is the living heart of all divine revelation: the High King of Heaven, the Lord Jesus Christ. pg 425

Revelation 17:1-6 ESV

Then one of the seven angels who had the seven bowls came and said to me, “Come, I will show you the judgment of the great prostitute who is seated on many waters, with whom the kings of the earth have committed sexual immorality, and with the wine of whose sexual immorality the dwellers on earth have become drunk.” And he carried me away in the Spirit into a wilderness, and I saw a woman sitting on a scarlet beast that was full of blasphemous names, and it had seven heads and ten horns. The woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet, and adorned with gold and jewels and pearls, holding in her hand a golden cup full of abominations and the impurities of her sexual immorality. And on her forehead was written a name of mystery: “Babylon the great, mother of prostitutes and of earth’s abominations.” And I saw the woman, drunk with the blood of the saints, the blood of the martyrs of Jesus. When I saw her, I marveled greatly.

Commentary by Dean Davis on pg 459

In verses 3-6, John describes his vision of the Great Harlot. She is seated upon the beast of revelation 13:1-10. Here is the world system as temptress, working in concert with the world system as persecuting political power. Gorgeously arrayed and holding in her hand a golden cup full of abominations, she is like the Rome of John's day, enticing men to lives of idolatry, materialism, drunkenness, and sensuality. But this is more than Rome. This is Babylon the Great, the mother of all spiritual harlots and all the abominations of the earth. This is, is as it were, the satanic prototype that begets every historical incarnation of the world's system is temptress. The saints of every generation have met and struggled with her corrupt children: Sodom, Egypt, Tyre, Sidon, Babylon, Rome, and the wealthy sin besotted cities of the world. Therefore we see that she is drunk, not only with the wine of her own immorality, but also with the blood of the saints. She cannot abide the light that emanates from them, light that pierces the darkness of her own soul. Therefore, as for Christ's, so for the saints: She seeks to extinguish their light by putting them to death.

The Revelation: Purpose and Literary Genre

Excerpt from The High King of Heaven

At the beginning of our journey, we identified four fundamental flashpoints of controversy in the Great End Time Debate: The Kingdom of God, the proper interpretation of OTKP, the Millennium, and the Consummation. Happily, our close study of the Kingdom supplied welcome insights into the other three questions. Having learned that the Kingdom appears in two simple stages—the Kingdom of the Son (i.e., the heavenly, mediatorial reign of Christ) followed by the Kingdom of the Father (i.e., the glorified World to Come)—we realized that the thousand years of Revelation cannot be a third, intermediate stage of the Kingdom sandwiched between the other two, as premillennarians assert. Similarly, having learned that the two stages of the Kingdom are separated by a single Consummation at the Parousia of Christ, we realized that the Consummation cannot be fragmented into multiple comings, resurrections, and judgments, as premillennarians also assert. In short, our study of the Kingdom has gone far towards resolving the End Time Debate in favor of the classic amillennial view of Salvation History.

It remains, however, for us to probe Revelation 20 itself. If it does not describe a future millennial reign of Christ on earth, what exactly does it describe? If, as I have suggested along the way, it speaks of the Kingdom of the Son, is there anything in the Revelation broadly, or in Revelation 20 itself, to support this view? Our purpose in Part 4 of our journey is to find out.

Let us begin, then, by getting a feel for the Revelation as a whole. In particular, let us see if there is anything in the purpose, literary genre, and structure of the book that will help us better understand the Millennium of Revelation 20.

The Purpose of the Revelation

We begin to discern the purpose of the Revelation when we consider the circumstances in which it was given.

The year, according to most scholars, is around 95 A.D. John, in all probability the last living apostle, is now in his 80's (John 21:21-23). Because of his faithfulness in preaching the Gospel, the Roman authorities have exiled him to a penal settlement on the island of Patmos (1:9, John 21:21-23). It has been over 60 years since Christ's ascension. The Lord is tarrying, and among many believers the expectation of his Parousia is waning (2 Peter 3:1f). The demonic emperor Nero (A.D. 54-68), a vicious persecutor of the Roman Christians, has come and gone. Titus has decimated Jerusalem (70 A.D.). Under Domitian (A.D. 81-89), persecution has spread throughout the Empire and reached Asia (A.D. 81-9). More is now looming (2:3, 10, 13). And beyond this external threat, there are internal, as well. Heretical "Christian" sects have grown in size and number, whose members are seeking to penetrate the orthodox churches and draw away disciples (2:2, 6, 14-15, 20-24). Some churches are even tolerating them in their midst (2:14f, 20f). Meanwhile, others are in decline: The love of certain Christians is growing cold (2:4, 3:1-2); others, having thus far escaped the fires of persecution, are falling in love with the world, and sinking into apathy and hedonism (3:14-21). The situation is dire. The faltering Church needs a word from the Lord.

The Revelation as a Gift to the Universal Church

The Revelation—all 22 chapters of it—is that word. Notably, at the very outset it is described as a gift: a gift from God the Father—through Christ, through the Spirit,² through angelic mediation, and through the apostle John—to the seven churches of Asia (Rev. 1:1-6, 9, 22:8). Seven, however, is the biblical number of perfection or completeness (Gen. 2:2,3). The meaning is clear. God gave the Revelation, not just to the seven churches of Asia, but also to what the seven churches represent: the complete Church, the Universal Church. Likewise, the seven lampstands symbolize the one universal Church, especially in her present ministry as the Light of God and Christ to a world sunk in deep spiritual darkness (Rev. 1:13, 20)

With the benefit of hindsight, we can see that history bears out this important truth. Like the seven churches, the universal Church has always had strengths and weaknesses; like the seven churches, it has always faced persecution, deception, and temptation; and like the seven churches, it has therefore always needed the Revelation. The book is, then, a great gift from the head of the universal Church, to the universal Church, for the help of the universal Church. Note carefully an important implication of this truth: the Revelation was not meant to be a closed book—not when it was given, not now, and not ever (Rev. 22:10). The Lord desires his whole Church—past, present, and future—to understand, obey, preach, and profit from the Revelation.

And that includes chapter 20, as well!

The Revelation as a Prophecy to the Universal Church

John also describes the Revelation as a prophecy (Rev. 22:10, 18). Now according to the apostle Paul, he who prophesies speaks to men for edification, exhortation, and comfort (1 Cor. 14:3). This short definition wonderfully captures the flavor—and the purpose—of the book. Everywhere we turn, we hear the exalted Christ prophesying to his Church. Everywhere we find him teaching, warning, and encouraging her, so that she may “overcome” all opponents and safely enter the completed Kingdom at his return (2:11, 2:26, etc.).

Since this idea is so important—namely, that the Revelation is essentially an extended prophecy—let us develop it a little further by looking at the three fundamental ways in which the High King of Heaven here prophesies to his beloved Bride.

The Prophet Teaches His Church

First, Christ teaches the Church. Here I especially have in mind the way he builds up the Church Militant in her understanding of her true place in the world and in history; in other words, the way in which he gives her a biblical worldview.

In this regard, Revelation 12 is central. It begins with a vision of the Bride, God’s elect of all times and places. From the very outset, we see her as God sees her: She is a heavenly Woman with an earthly mission (12:1). In her OT embodiment, she gives birth to the promised Seed of the Woman—to Christ (12:5a; Gen. 3:15). When she does, the Dragon and his demonic minions try to kill the infant Jesus, but cannot (12:4). Indeed, even when they do succeed in killing the Lamb of God, they altogether fail in “devouring” him, for he rises from the dead and ascends to the Father’s own right hand, where he now sits as High Prophet, Priest, and King of heaven. And from that heavenly seat he shall soon come again, this time to act the part of a shepherd against the enemies of his flock, shattering them once and for all with a rod of iron (12:5b, Psalms 2:9, 23:4).

For now, however, the Woman (i.e., the Bride in her specifically NT embodiment) must remain upon the earth. Therefore, in an eschatological Exodus from the Domain of Darkness, she flees into the wilderness of this fallen evil world (12:6). There she will remain for “1260 days” (or “a time, times, and a half a time,” or “42 months,” Rev. 11:2, 12:14, 13:5). Recalling the prophet Elijah’s three and a half year exile in the wilderness, these symbolic numbers mark the entire inter-adventual era—the Era of Proclamation—as a season of exile and tribulation for the people of God (1 Kings 17:1f). They will not, however, endure it alone: The Lord will faithfully nourish and aid his people all throughout their long wilderness sojourn, even as he did Israel and Elijah in theirs (12:6, 14-16). [\[this era is the age of the Christian church, from Pentecost to the 2nd advent. Dean Davis calls it the Era of Proclamation.\]](#)

But what exactly will the Church in the wilderness be doing as she awaits Christ’s return? The answer is found in verses 7-12: She will be waging war. Yes, the text itself says that Michael and his angels will wage war against the Dragon and his angels. But on closer inspection, we realize that this is simply a picture of heaven's part in a war that the saints will be waging on earth. It is not a physical war, but a spiritual (2 Cor. 10:4, Eph. 6:12). It is the fulfillment of the Great Commission; the proclamation of the Gospel; the declaration of the saving power of the blood of the Lamb; the faithful testimony of the people of God to the Person and Work of the Christ of God (12:11). As they preach and teach—and as God's elect everywhere hear the truth and receive it—the Kingdom of Christ continually pours into the earth (12:10). As it does, the kingdom of Satan, who formerly deceived and ruled the whole world, is continually spoiled and cast to the ground (Mt. 12:29). Hence, Satan's fury against the Woman; hence the Groom's diligent watch-care over his beloved and persecuted Bride (12:13-17).

Very good here:

Here, then, in a prophetic vision of stupendous theological reach and power, we find Christ teaching the Church Militant who she is, what she is about, what she can expect, and upon whom she can count, as she makes her way out of eschatological Egypt, through the eschatological wilderness of Sin, and into the eschatological Promised Land. Fittingly, this rich chapter stands in the middle of the book, for in many ways it supplies us with the keys to the whole book. Thanks be to God for such a wonderful prophetic gift!

The Prophet Exhorts His Church

Secondly, the Lord exhorts the Church. In particular, he exhorts her by teaching and warning about four great enemies that she will encounter over and over again during her long journey through the wilderness of this world.

The first is the Dragon, that serpent of old who is called the devil and Satan (12:9). He—along with his host of evil angels—is the invisible spiritual ruler of the fallen world-system through which the saints must pass on their way to the Promised Land. As we have seen, this teaching pervades the NT. However, in the Revelation the Spirit draws upon various OT texts to depict the world-system as an unholy trinity; an unholy idol that fallen, rebellious, and deceivable mankind is all too inclined to worship. It is comprised of the Beast, the False Prophet, and the Harlot. As we are about to see, these OT symbols correspond to God-given institutions, originally designed for the good of mankind, but now co-opted and corrupted by the Dragon (13:1, 4, 16:13). Ever since the Fall, he is the one enemy lurking behind the other three. Let the saints understand and beware (1 Peter. 5:8).

The second enemy is the Beast (13:1-4). This is the political or governmental face of the world-system (Daniel 7:1f). The NT teaches that civil government is a good, post-fall gift of God, designed to restrain evildoers through a faithful administration of his retributive justice (Rom. 13:1f). However, it also teaches that sin can and does corrupt human governments, sometimes to such an extent that they become unconscious instruments of the Satanic (2 Thess. 2:1f, Rev. 13:2, 4). When this occurs, deceived sinners will worship the Beast, rather than God (13:4). And when that occurs, the Beast will wage war against the people of God who, out of loyalty to their heavenly King, refuse to worship the Beast, and urge sinners to turn away from it towards Christ (11:7, 13:7, 17:14).

In the Revelation, Christ repeatedly exhorts his people concerning the Beast. Above all, he warns them not to receive his mark—his name, or the number of his name—on their right hand or on their forehead (14:9, 11, 15:2, 20:4). Here again the Spirit draws upon OT imagery to speak symbolically to God's NT people (Ezekiel 9). The saints now have the seal of the living God on their foreheads (7:3). In other words, because of their faith in Christ they now belong to the Father; they are his adopted sons and daughters, carrying his Name (Rom. 8:15, 1 Peter 1:17). How then shall they give their ultimate allegiance, whether in thought (symbolized by a mark on the forehead) or in deed (symbolized by a mark on the hand), to any mere man or human institution? Note also that in Scripture six is the number of man (Gen. 1:26ff, Rev. 13:18, NIV), and three is the number of God Triune. Therefore, 666 is the number of man seeking to supplant the triune God; the number of man audaciously representing himself as the proper object of worship (13:16-18). The implications are clear: Men take the mark of the Beast whenever and wherever they worship the anti-christian, self-deifying State. And again, throughout the Revelation Christ warns his own that they must never do this evil thing.

[In other words, the mark of the beast on their forehead and hands is to be taken figuratively for what people think (signified by on the forehead) and consequently, what people do (signified by on their hands). Believers have the mind of Christ, so they think vastly differently about spiritual things, sin, worship of the true God (in spirit and truth) and consequently, what they do is pleasing to God because it's done by faith in the Son of God – or, say it this way, our acts testify to our having saving faith as Abraham was justified by his works in the same sense described by James in Jas. 2:18. Because the unregenerate man has not this mindset, a regenerate soul, the restored image of God in him, a new creation, he is told by Christ, "I never knew you; depart from me, you workers of lawlessness." Mt. 7:23 There's the consequence of the unregenerate mind, his works are lawless...apart from Christ, outside of faith, having other motives than a love for God, but by motives, for instance, of self love, self preservation, to be seen by men, etc. And so, they are cast out into outer darkness. Taking this a step further, how does this unregenerate mindset get further hardened? Prosperity! John Flavel comments: "Prosperity meeting with a graceless heart, makes it wholly sensual, and entirely swallows up its thoughts and affections. Earthly things transform and molds their hearts into their own similitude and nature; the whole strength of their souls goes out to those enjoyments." In this is seen the process of the securing this earthly image on their foreheads and hence their evil works that follow. This is heavy.

Additionally, the heavenly Prophet exhorts his people not to succumb to the threats or actual persecutions of the Beast, even if this means the loss of work, supply, reputation, or life itself (2:10, 13:17). He buttresses this exhortation with a twofold promise: The Lord will always be at his suffering people's side, and he has already prepared a victor's wreath for each one who overcomes (2:10, 12:14-16). Note carefully that in Revelation 20, as elsewhere in the book, Christ again exhorts the whole Church concerning the Beast: Those who refuse to receive his mark (of ownership), but instead remain faithful until death, will enter heaven as disembodied spirits, there to reign in life with their High King until he comes again at the end of the age to raise them from the dead and bestow upon them the glories of the World to Come (20:4-6). More on this later.

The third enemy is the False Prophet, also called the Beast from the Earth (Rev. 13:11-18, 16:12-16, 19:20, 20:10). A careful reading of the relevant texts shows that this beast symbolizes, not simply false religion, but false religion willingly pressed into the service of the self-deifying State. Energized by Satan (13:11), and authorized by the State itself (13:12), those people who function as the False Prophet use both coercion (13:12, 16-17) and religious deception (13:14-15) to set up "an image" to the Beast. That is, they seek to organize, implement, and encourage the worship of the State and/or the person in whom the State is embodied at any given moment in history.

The False Prophet is present throughout the entire Era of Proclamation. In John's day he was embodied in "... the emperor cult and the Commune of Asia, a council of distinguished representatives promoting loyalty to the emperor."³ In our own day, he rears his head wherever government propagandists encourage the adulation of the Chairman, the Fuehrer, the King, or the President. Notably, Revelation 13:13-15 implies that in some instances Satan will actually empower the False Prophet(s) to deceive men with miraculous signs (Exodus 7:8-13).

Most assuredly, this will be the case at the end of the age. The Gospels and epistles warn us that when the (final) Antichrist arises to deceive the whole world, he will perform "false signs and wonders" (Mt. 24:24, 2 Thess. 2:1-2, 9-12). Not surprisingly, we receive the same warning in the Revelation: John sees three unclean spirits coming out of the mouth of the Dragon, the Beast, and the False Prophet. They are demonic spirits, performing signs and going abroad to the kings of the whole world, in order to assemble them for the battle of the Great Day of God the Almighty (16:12-16). As I will argue later, Revelation 20:7-10, in remarkably similar language, predicts this very thing one final time. Clearly, the High Prophet of Heaven very much desires his Church to be fully prepared for the last (embodiment of the) Beast, the last False Prophet, and the Last Battle.

The fourth and final enemy is the Great Harlot, also referred to as Babylon the Great and the Great City (17:1, 3, 5, 18). The relevant chapters make it clear that the Harlot represents the economic, commercial, and cultural face of the world-system. As such, she is not so much a persecutor or religious deceiver as she is a seductress (17:4). In former times, she tempted the world through such luxurious commercial centers as Babylon, Tyre, and Sidon. In John's day, she tempted it through Rome. In our own day, she tempts it through wealthy, pleasure-mad cities now situated all over the globe, and also through omnipresent electronic wizardry wherein she bares her ample bosom and offers herself freely for a simple click.

John sees that at any given moment the entire world-system is in bed with the Harlot, spiritually speaking: Nations, kings, and merchants—all have fallen to her allurements (18:3). As a general rule, she likes to collude with the Beast and the False Prophet, doing all she can to persecute the Church (17:6) and entice saints and sinners alike with her sorceries (i.e., fake, demonic spiritualities, 18:23). Accordingly, no sooner do we begin to learn about the Harlot, than we hear the prophetic word of the Lord to his Church: "Come out of her, my people, that you may not share in her sins, and that you may not receive of her plagues" (18:4, 3:14-22). As he speaks, the saints receive both warning and promise: Satan's woman, the Harlot, is doomed to destruction. In part, it will come at the hand of the Beast himself, who will one day turn against her (17:14-18). However, in far greater part it will come at the hand of Christ, who, in a single hour, will make her utterly desolate (18:19) and render her an eternal prison house of Satan and his demons (18:2). Meanwhile, Christ's Woman—comprised of all who hear his call, flee the Great City, and loyally cling to him in faith—is destined for final rescue and restoration; is destined to become a Holy City and a glorious Bride, forever dwelling with God and Christ under brand new heavens in a brand new earth (19:7-8, 21:2). Let all the saints be warned ... and take heart.

The Prophet Comforts His Church

Finally, the heavenly Prophet uses the Revelation to speak comfort to his Bride. Yes, as trembling Christians well know, the Revelation repeatedly issues warnings of inevitable tribulation and certain judgment. However, the more they read, the more they realize how much comfort is offered along with those warnings, and how many different forms that comfort takes.

For example, at the very outset of the book, Christ comforts his pilgrim people with a majestic vision of his own divine nature, covenant faithfulness, and Messianic glory (1:9-20).

He then comforts them with manifold assurances of his presence in, and faithful watch-care over, all his churches, even as he manifests the tough love that he feels for each one (2:1-3:22).

He comforts them with rich, symbolic representations of his heavenly, mediatorial reign, the saints share in it, and his absolute sovereignty over all remaining history (4:1-5:14).

He comforts them with scenes of the spirits of departed believers safely home in heaven, praying for divine justice, and waiting eagerly for the resurrection of their bodies at his return to the earth (6:9-11, 20:4-6).

He comforts them with portraits of his own Parousia in power and glory at the end of the age (14:14-20, 19:11-21).

In conjunction with that, he also comforts them with visions of ultimate justice: of final rewards for the faithful saints, and of final retribution against the persecuting and God-hating "inhabitants of the earth" (6:9-17, 11:11-19, 15:1-4, 16:17-21, 20:7-15).

Similarly, he comforts them with several "sneak previews" of the glorified Church surrounding the throne of God Triune, exultantly lifting up the eternal worship that will fill the World to Come (7:9-17, 14:1-5).

And, of course, he comforts them with two luminous chapters supplying mysterious, thought-provoking glimpses of the (eternal) life of the saints in the new heavens and the new earth (Rev. 21-22).

Conclusion

Summing up, we have seen that the great purpose of the Revelation is prophetic; that in it, God, through Christ, speaks to the universal Church in order to teach, warn, exhort, and comfort her, so that she might make a worthy and triumphant pilgrimage through the wilderness of this world into the eschatological Promised Land.

This is highly relevant to Part 4 of our study for the very important reason that it naturally and powerfully inclines us to an "ecclesiastical" interpretation of Revelation 20. In particular, it suggests that Revelation 20 cannot possibly be what many premillennarians claim it is: a divine afterthought, in which the Spirit suddenly shifts his focus from the Church to ethnic Israel, and from the Church era to a future Millennium. No, just like the rest of the book, chapter 20 must also focus on the Church, and on the present evil age through which the Church makes her difficult pilgrimage (Rev. 12). As we have just seen, this conclusion flows naturally from the One who gave it (the Head of the Church); from the ones to whom he gave it (the seven churches, emblematic of the universal Church); and from the purposes for which he gave it (to teach, warn, and comfort the Church). Moreover, as we shall soon see, it also flows naturally from a careful study of the structure, contents, and symbolism of Revelation 20 itself.

The following are excerpts from Van Til's work, Common Grace and the Gospel. He has described several subjects in an excellent and profound manner. Van Til uses several terms that I am unfamiliar with, but read along anyway – this is a must read!!

These subjects, and more, are addressed:

Common Grace, the knowledge of God and man's consciousness thereof, Man's total depravity, the testimony of the Spirit and revelation, restraining grace, man's suppression of the knowledge of God, epistemology, the ontological trinity, secondary and primary (first) causes, remote, proximate and ultimate causes, conception of mystery, positive and natural revelation, the two wills of God, basic interpretative concept: the doctrine of the ontological trinity, God's immutability, God's love for mankind in general, etc., the general offer of the Gospel to all - explained vis-à-vis to the elect, Original Sin, Adam's federal headship, abstractions, process of differentiation, civil righteousness, Heb. 6:4 explained, the hypocrite described, what is transgression, the nature of God, Particularism - unconditional election, sovereignty of God & Divine providence & objections raised, kicking against the pricks, Karl Barth [code498], Common Grace in Romanism, the process of differentiation, Aristotle, Descartes and Aquinas – theistic proofs of God's existence can lead to idolatry, neutral reason and Romanist natural theology; limiting or supplementative concepts, Scholasticism, the gift of logical reason, dialectical theology, reason vs. faith, non-Christian thinking, analogical thinking, the image of God, Romans 7:14-17

Notes on man's depravity:

The main point is that if man could look anywhere and not be confronted with the revelation of God then he could not sin in the biblical sense of the term. Sin is the breaking of the law of God. God confronts man everywhere. He cannot in the nature of the case confront man anywhere if he does not confront him everywhere. God is one; the law is one. If man could press one button on the radio of his experience and not hear the voice of God then he would always press that button and not the others. But man cannot even press the button of his own self-consciousness without hearing the requirement of God. Van Til, pg 177

Calvin starts off his discussion of theology in his Institutes by saying that man's consciousness of himself and his consciousness of God are involved in one another. In saying this he is only reflecting what Paul so clearly says in his first chapter of the epistle to the Romans when he speaks of man as unavoidably knowing God.

Hoeksema rightly lays great stress on the total depravity of man. But man's total depravity spells his ethical disobedience to his Creator. Man cannot become and remain apostate except in relation to the revelation of God's character and will that is everywhere and always present in him. Van Til, pg 216

3. Hepp

Hepp has offered us a well-worked out discussion of Reformed epistemology [why and how to you know what you know? Christian epistemology: the study of how one might know, or rationally believe, that Christianity is true]. His book in which he does so is called Het Testimonium Spiritus Sancti. In the first volume he deals with what he calls the general testimony of the Spirit. It is to be followed by another, in which he is to deal with the special testimony of the Spirit.

Hepp wants to build on what Bavinck and other Reformed theologians have done. In modern times Bavinck has come nearer than any one else to teaching a general testimony of the Spirit. But even he did not mention it by name. He only prepared the way for the idea. When we come to the definitely constructive portion of Hepp's work, the argument he presents runs somewhat as follows. As the special testimony of the Spirit testifies within us to the truth of Scripture, so the general testimony of the Spirit testifies within us to truth in general. The whole of the world about us is a manifestation of the truths of God. It is the Spirit's task to set forth the fulness of this revelation before the eyes of men. This may be called the testimonium Spiritus Sancti externum. This external testimony reveals to man; but to this must be added the internal testimony to assure men of the truth of this revelation. "Why? All revelation takes place by way of means. This is always true whether or not the revelation pertain to God or to created things. God never reveals Himself directly to us, but always through something that stands between Him and our ego. If not we should need to be able to look into the very essence of God, we should need to be fitted for a visio Dei per essentiam." Revelation as such cannot give us certainty. If we had nothing but revelation, says Hepp, we should be compelled to believe in the objects on their own account. We should therefore rather say that the objects are but messengers of the Holy Spirit. Absolute certainty I, as a creature, can obtain only when the Holy Spirit, quite independently of the objects themselves, makes me believe that their revelation brings the truth to me. And that takes place when I receive the testimonium generale internum. This, says Hepp, is the essence of the testimony of the Spirit. It assures but does not reveal. It assures me of the truth of the revelation about me.

This general testimony, however, does not assure me of all truth. It assures me of central truths only. These several truths do not relate to one another as members of a hierarchy. They are relatively independent of one another. There are three groups of central truths, those pertaining to God, those pertaining to man, and those pertaining to the world.

In connection with the truths pertaining to God, Hepp then discusses the value of the theistic proofs. His thought here is very similar to that of Bavinck. These proofs, he argues, put into set formulas that which comes to us from the cosmos as a whole. They press with power upon our consciousness, but cannot give us certainty. General revelation, which is, as it were, concentrated in these proofs, would lead to a guess if it were not for the testimony of the Spirit. Hepp is most insistent that we shall keep the two concepts, revelation and assurance, rigidly apart. Even in paradise Adam could not have lived by revelation as such. Without the general testimony there would have been uncertainty. Now doubt is sin, and in paradise there was no sin. We must therefore hold that even in paradise there was, in addition to general revelation, the general internal testimony of the Spirit to that revelation.

The second group of general truths centers about man. How is man to be certain of his self-existence? Only by the general internal testimony of the Spirit. How does man know that he can depend on his senses, on the axioms of his thought, and on the norms of his moral and aesthetic appreciation? Only by the general internal testimony of the Spirit.

The third group of central truths deals with the world. This world presents itself as working according to prima principia. How do I know that this is true? Only by the general internal testimony of the Spirit.

Thus the general internal testimony of the Spirit may be said to be the foundation of all science, religion, morality, and art. We come now to the most pivotal point of all. "From the marriage of the general testimony and revelation (here taken in its wide signification of God-revelation, man-revelation, and cosmos-revelation) faith is born. Wherever the internal testimony attests to the external testimony, man cannot withhold his assent. And faith always consists of giving assent by means of one's reason to some witness or other." Hepp calls this faith fides generalis. He says that modern philosophy has, quite generally, allowed for this fides generalis. Yet, he adds, there is a difference, even a great difference, between the faith of modern philosophy and the general faith as we should hold to it. For the modern philosopher, faith is, he says, after all, second to knowledge. For Christianity, on the other hand, faith offers far greater certainty than does science. "As for certainty knowledge cannot stand in the shadow of the fides generalis. For this rests on higher than subjective and objective grounds, on a direct operation of the Holy Spirit, on the testimony of God in the heart of every man."

Now it is because of this fides generalis, resulting from the marriage of revelation and the general testimony, that men accept the general truths with respect to God, man, and the world. "Taken generally mankind does not deny the central truths. By far the greater majority of men recognize a higher power above themselves and do not doubt the reality within and beyond themselves." Here we reach the climax of the whole matter. There are central truths to which the generality of mankind, because of the irresistible power of the Spirit's internal general testimony, must of necessity give their consent.

Our criticism of this position of Hepp will, quite naturally, be similar to that which we have made of Bavinck. As long as he is unwilling to argue along exclusively Christian lines, Hepp is unable to escape making concessions to a Roman type of natural theology. He makes many valuable negative criticisms against rationalism and empiricism. But he is not fully conscious, it seems, of the fact that even a negative criticism of non-Christian positions, must be undertaken from the presupposition of the Christian position. Hepp cannot effectively oppose the natural theology of Rome if he argues against it with the methods of a scholastic type of natural theology. He apparently has two methods of reasoning against false philosophies: one based on neutral premises, and, then, an additional one based on Christian premises.

When Hepp deals with the “theistic proofs” he, like Bavinck, attributes a certain value to them even when they are constructed along non-Christian lines. Hepp says that Kant underestimated the value of these arguments. In his whole discussion of the proofs Hepp allows that an argument based upon would-be neutral ground, can have a certain validity. Of these proofs, constructed on a neutral and therefore non-Christian basis, Hepp says that they cry day and night that God exists. To this we reply that they cry day and night that God does not exist. For, as they have been constructed, they cry that a finite God exists. see [Van Til's note below] Nothing more could come from the procedure on which they have been constructed. They have been constructed on the assumption that we as human beings may make our start from the finite world, as from something that is ultimate. They take for granted that we already know from our study of the phenomenal world the meaning of such words as “cause” and “being” and “purpose,” whether or not we have referred this phenomenal world to God. To avoid a natural theology of the Roman sort, we shall need to come to something like a clear consciousness of the difference between a Christian and a non-Christian mode of argument with respect to the revelation of God in nature. God is, and has been from the beginning, revealed in nature and in man's own consciousness. We cannot say that the heavens probably declare the glory of God. We cannot allow that if rational argument is carried forth on true premises, it should come to any other conclusion than that the true God exists. Nor can we allow that the certainty with respect to God's existence would be any less if acquired by a ratiocinative process rather than by intuitions, as long as man was not a sinner. The testimony of the Spirit may well be conceived as originally controlling Adam's reasoning powers as well as his intuitive powers. On the other hand, when man has become a sinner, his intuitive powers are as sinful as his reasoning powers. There may be more area for error in a sorites than in an intuition, but the corruption of sin has penetrated to every activity of man.

Van Til notes in The Defense of the Faith, pg. 163: “We accept this God upon Scriptural authority. In the Bible alone do we hear of such a God... We do not first set out without God to find out highest philosophical concept in terms of which we think we can interpret reality and then call this highest concept divine. This was, as Windelband [1848-1915, a German, neo-Kantian philosopher] tells us, the process of the Greeks. This has been the process of all non-Christian thought. It is from this process of reasoning that we have been redeemed. On such a process of reasoning only a finite god can be discovered." [Van Til, Common Grace pg. 8]

Thus the imperative necessity of introducing the distinction between the psychologically and the epistemologically interpretative, becomes again apparent. God still speaks in man's consciousness. Man's own interpretative activity, whether of the more or of the less extended type, whether in ratiocination or in intuition, is no doubt the most penetrating means by which the Holy Spirit presses the claims of God upon man. The argument for the existence of God and for the truth of Christianity is objectively valid. We should not tone down the validity of this argument to the probability level. The argument may be poorly stated, and may never be adequately stated. But in itself the argument is absolutely sound. Christianity is the only reasonable position to hold. It is not merely as reasonable as other positions, or a bit more reasonable than other positions; it alone is the natural and reasonable position for man to take. By stating the argument as clearly as we can, we may be the agents of the Spirit in pressing the claims of God upon men. If we drop to the level of the merely probable truthfulness of Christian theism, we, to that extent, lower the claims of God upon men. This is, we believe, the sense of Calvin's Institutes on the matter.

On the other hand, every man by his sinful nature seeks violently to suppress the voice of God that keeps on speaking within him through his created nature. One way sinful human nature has of suppressing the claims of God within itself, is by saying that the objective argument for the existence of God is of doubtful validity. Sinful human nature loves to speak of abstract principles of truth, goodness, and beauty. It loves to speak of a God because it hates the God.

If we take both the original human nature and the sinful human nature, and realize that everywhere both are active, we have done once for all with the natural theology of Rome. On the objective side we have done with it, inasmuch as we claim for the statement of the Christian position absolute validity. For science and philosophy, as well as for theology, we frankly take our basic presuppositions from Scripture. Scripture tells us that God, the God who has more fully revealed Himself in Scripture than in nature, is yet speaking to us in the created universe about us. Scripture says that from the beginning He has spoken there. It says that man has known this fact, and that by his efforts at perversion he has well-nigh succeeded in silencing the voice of revelation, but that deep down in his heart he is still aware of this revelation and will be held responsible for it. We must not lower these claims to the probability level. On the subjective side we have done with a Romanist type of natural theology, because we realize the sinful nature is everywhere active. There are no capita communissima, on which believers and nonbelievers can agree without a difference. There are no central truths on which all agree. The disagreement is fundamental and goes to the heart of the matter.

Thus we are no longer face to face with the dilemma with which Gilson confronts the Calvinist. As long as we seek refuge from Romanism by having less Romanism we shall not escape the sword of Gilson. To withdraw to the inner fortress of central truths, and make even these merely probable in the objective field, and to withdraw to the psychologically primitive (intuitions, beseffen) in the subjective field, helps matters not at all. Gilson will find us still. Quite rightly he asserts that the attenuations of language are of no help in this matter. If we speak of the sense of deity and of the seed of religion, and mean by that some degree of common epistemological response on the part of believer and non-believer, however small the area of agreement, and however primitive the nature of the response, Gilson has a right to confront us with his dilemma. The escape from the dilemma lies, we believe, as suggested, in doing what Kuyper and Bavinck and Hepp have all at one place or another told us to do, namely, offer an interpretation of life in its totality on the basis of the principle Scripture offer. That principle is the ontological trinity. In answer to his challenge, we would tell Gilson that, unless he is willing with us to interpret nature and all things else in terms of the ontological trinity, he can get no meaning into human experience. The interpretations of the natural reason, made by the aid of abstract principles and brute facts [codeBF, brutefactdef, code524 & codebrute]: isolated self-evident arguments, data in a void or uninterpreted raw data (Bahnsen: min-mark 27: <https://youtu.be/YmKKC70GIC4>) The unregenerate will only interpret these facts according to his [erroneous] presuppositions which is the error of natural theology (the traditional method of theistic proofs) as opposed to Rom. 1, a theology based upon revelation, where the whole of nature pictures God all at once, not by piecemeal increments of brute facts (bare facts), that in the natural mind (who naturally suppresses the knowledge of God), will only lead him to the probability of a finite God, not the God of Scripture; facts should not be isolated from the framework in which they come, that is they should be related to the plan of God to be rightly understood. Bahnsen explains this very well in that video on Natural Theology and the Proofs.] can, in the nature of the case, lead with rationalism (Parmenides) into a universal validity that is empty of content, or with empiricism (Heraclitus) to a particularism that has no universality, or to a phenomenalism that is a compromise between these two positions and shares the weaknesses of both.

B. The Positive Line Of Concrete Thinking

What has been said by way of criticism on the remnants of abstract thinking found in Kuyper, Bavinck, and Hepp has virtually suggested the direction of thought we would follow in approaching the question of common grace. The ontological trinity will be our interpretative concept everywhere. God is our concrete universal; in Him thought and being are coterminous, in Him the problem of knowledge is solved.

If we begin thus with the ontological trinity as our concrete universal, we frankly differ from every school of philosophy and from every school of science not merely in our conclusions, but in our starting-point and in our method as well. For us the facts are what they are, and the universals are what they are, because of their common dependence upon the ontological trinity. Thus, as earlier discussed, the facts are correlative to the universals. Because of this correlativity there is genuine progress in history; because of it the Moment has significance.

To make progress in our discussion we must, it seems, learn to take time more seriously than we have done. What does it mean to take time more seriously? It means, for one thing, to realize that we shall never have an exhaustive answer to the common grace problem. We have already made a good deal of the Christian concept of mystery. With all our admiration for Bavinck we yet found that he allowed himself to be influenced by the Greek ideal of the comprehension of God. This ideal works havoc with true Reformed theology. Perhaps we may here learn anew from the greatest of theologians, John Calvin.

Calvin lays great stress upon the incomprehensible will of God. This is particularly the case in his treatise on the predestination of God. In replying to Pighius and Georgius he falls back on this point again and again. In the first section of the book Calvin gives the doctrine of election “a slight touch.” But even in this “slight touch” he refers to Rom. 9.20 (Rom 9:20). Of it he says: “The apostle in this appeal adopts an axiom, or universal acknowledgment, which not only ought to be held fast by all godly minds, but deeply engraven in the breast of common sense; that the inscrutable judgment of God is deeper than can be penetrated by man.” ¹⁰² (102Calvin’s Calvinism, First Part, A Treatise on the Eternal Predestination of God, translated by Henry Cole, p. 32.) When we must answer such as argue along the lines of Pighius, says Calvin, we ask whether there be “no justice of God, but that which is conceived of by us.” When men cannot see a reason for the works of God they are immediately “prepared to appoint a day for entering into judgment with Him.” “What do you really think of God’s glorious Name? And will you vaunt that the apostle is devoid of all reason, because he does not drag God from His throne and set Him before you, to be questioned and examined.” Calvin steadfastly refuses to permit abstract universal ideas to rule God. We are to hold that the will of God, the will of the inscrutable God is “the highest rule of righteousness.” God’s will is to be set “above all other causes.” Men who follow “their own natural sense and understanding” appeal to abstract justice, “because they presume to subject the tribunal of God to their own judgment.” We should rather rest content with the Word of God. May we keep our ears open to it and shut them to the voice of strangers.

The problem Calvin is discussing is that of predestination. The objection raised against the doctrine of predestination is, of course, that it condemns secondary causes to insignificance. Pighius, says Calvin, “knows not how to make the least distinction between remote and proximate causes.” Pighius urges the full-bucket difficulty against Calvin’s insistence that God’s counsel is the ultimate cause of whatsoever comes to pass.

Calvin in turn insists that it is quite legitimate to urge man’s sin as the proximate, and God’s counsel as the ultimate, cause of man’s final perdition. Does he think he can offer an explanation of the relation between the ultimate and the proximate cause that will satisfy the demands of a logic, such as Pighius employs? Not for a moment. He calls on Pighius to forsake his logic with its phenomenal foundation. “Pighius, on the contrary, begins his building from the earth’s plain surface, without any foundation at all." Pighius would ask why God created such natures as he knew would sin. Pighius knows how to employ a well-turned syllogism. There is no escaping the force of his objection. If God is the ultimate cause back of whatsoever comes to pass, Pighius can, on his basis, rightly insist that God is the cause of sin. Calvin knew this. He attempts no answer by means of a non-Christian methodology. With Augustine he would throw man back into the consideration of what he is, and what is the capacity of his mind. "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God." This is a reason for man and "all that is due him." That was Paul's answer and Augustine's answer. It is also Calvin's answer: "Paul comparing, as he here does, man with God, shows that the counsel of God, in electing and reprobating men, is without doubt more profound and more deeply concealed than the human mind can penetrate. Wherefore, O man, consider (as the apostle adviseth thee)

We are to remember, then, that on the question of the relation of God's counsel to what takes place in time "the wisdom of Christ is too high and too deep to come within the compass of man's understanding." There is nothing "in the whole circle of spiritual doctrine which does not far surpass the capacity of man and confound its utmost reach." When such a subject as predestination is discussed "numberless unholy and absurd thoughts rush into the mind." How shall we meet these unholy thoughts and arguments in ourselves and in others? We shall not meet them by trying to defend such doctrines on the basis of a logic that assumes secondary causes to be ultimate causes. We shall not meet them on the basis of a logic that starts from brute facts see [codeBF, brutefactdef, and code524 & codebrute], and handles them according to abstract universal principles., We shall meet them rather by offering the ontological trinity as our interpretative concept. This will at once lay us open to the charge of the full-bucket difficulty. We are not to be affrighted by the charge of holding the contradictory. "But I would repeat my being perfectly aware how much absurdity and irreconcilable contradiction these deep things seem to profane persons to carry with them." We shall meet this charge of contradiction by asserting that we are the true defenders of the meaning of second causes. History has meaning just because God's counsel is back of it. Sin can be given as the reason for man's destruction just because men were "fitted for destruction," and faith can be given as a reason for man's final glory just because believers were "afore prepared unto glory." "Godly consciences" 119 need not be disturbed by the reasonings of rationalists, or irrationalists or rationalist-irrationalists. There is, in fact, a beautiful harmony between remote and proximate causes. The harmony exists—of that, faith is sure. Faith is reasonable—of that, faith is also sure. Faith alone is reasonable—of that, faith is once more sure. Faith abhors the really contradictory; to maintain the really contradictory is to deny God. Faith adores the apparently contradictory; to adore the apparently contradictory is to adore God as one's creator and final interpreter.

Says Calvin: "If, then, nothing can prevent a man from acknowledging that the first origin of his ruin was from Adam, and if each man finds the proximate cause of his ruin in himself, what can prevent our faith from acknowledging afar off, with all sobriety, and adoring, with all humility, that remote secret counsel of God by which the Fall of man was thus preordained? And what should prevent the same faith from beholding, at the same time, the proximate cause within; that the whole human race is individually bound by the guilt and desert of eternal death, as derived from the person of Adam; and that all are in themselves, therefore, subject to death and to death eternal? Pighius, therefore, has not sundered, shaken or altered (as he thought he had done) that pre-eminent and most beautiful symmetry with which these proximate and remote causes divinely harmonize!”

The “scholars of God,” those who are “gifted, not with the spirit of this world, but with His own heavenly Spirit” may know the things freely given them by God; but they know them because they have learned to know their places as creatures before the incomprehensible God.

There can be little doubt that if Calvin’s conception of mystery were more closely adhered to in our discussion of common grace, we should lose less time and energy in misunderstanding one another. The charges of rationalism and irrationalism that have been hurled back and forth would subside to a considerable extent if we all learned to think less along rationalist-irrationalist and more along Calvin’s lines. Any tendency toward either rationalism or irrationalism lowers the genuine significance of history.

The imperative necessity of maintaining a clear-cut distinction between the Christian and the non-Christian conception of mystery in connection with any problem, and in particular with the common grace problem, may now become apparent. The common grace problem deals with this question: What do entities which will one day be wholly different from one another have in common before that final stage of separation is reached? We dare not expect to approach anything like a specific answer to this problem, so long as we allow our thinking to be controlled by abstractions. But abstractions will be with us as long as we do not distinguish clearly between the Christian and the non-Christian concept of mystery.

We have already observed that the invariable concomitant of confusing the two conceptions of mystery is the lowering of the claims for the objective validity of the Christian-theistic position. The theistic proofs are said to be objectively weak. They are said to be worth something but not a great deal. Our position as Christians is merely said to be objectively at least as good as the position of our enemies. The result will naturally be that we relieve the pressure of God’s claims upon created man. We say to him that, as far as the objective evidence is concerned, he is living up to the requirements of the case if he merely arrives at the existence of a God, at a divinity überhaupt. At least he need not feel that he is falling below the mark, if he is doubtful that the true God exists. Now apply this to man’s moral attitude toward God. Both parties to the debate on common grace should be willing to agree that Adam and Eve had the requirements of God’s law written on their hearts. We need not concern ourselves here with the distinction between the “works of the law” and the “law.” We are not speaking now of man’s ethical reaction to God. We are speaking only of God’s revelational relationship to man. And on that point all should be equally anxious to maintain that God originally spoke plainly to man, both in the “book of nature” and in the “book of conscience.” Wherever man would turn he saw the living God and His requirements. Whether he reasoned about nature or whether he looked within, whether it was the starry heavens above or the moral law within, both were equally insistent and plain that God, the true God, stood before him.

It should also be recognized that man was, from the outset, confronted with positive, as well as with natural, revelation. Dr. Vos speaks of this as pre-redemptive special revelation. God walked and talked with man. Natural revelation must not be separated from this supernatural revelation. To separate the two is to deal with two abstractions instead of with one concrete situation. That is to say, natural revelation, whether objective or subjective, is in itself a limiting conception. It has never existed by itself so far as man is concerned. It cannot fairly be considered, therefore, as a fixed quantity, that can be dealt with in the same way at every stage of man's moral life. Man was originally placed before God as a covenant personality.

It is no doubt with this in mind that Calvin speaks of sinners as being covenant breakers. The phrase has come into common usage among Reformed theologians. Common as the usage of the phrase may be, however, the point we have made perhaps needs stressing. All too easily do we think of the covenant relation as quite distinct and independent of natural revelation. The two should be joined together. To speak of man's relation to God as being covenantal at every point is merely to say that man deals with the personal God everywhere. Every manipulation of any created fact is, as long as man is not a sinner, a covenant-affirming activity. Every manipulation of any fact, as soon as man is a sinner, is a covenant-breaking activity.

In this connection a word may be said about the question already touched upon as to whether any conclusions may be drawn about the attitude of God from observation of facts. In Schilder's discussion of the proof texts adduced by the Christian Reformed Church Synod of 1924, he speaks from time to time about "facts as such." From the "facts as such," he warns, we are not to conclude any such thing as an attitude of God toward the reprobate. "Beware, that you do not separate the facts from faith." The point comes up again and again. As over against a Romanizing type of natural theology this warning of Schilder is no doubt in order. And we have observed that as Reformed theologians we have not yet outgrown Rome's natural theology entirely. We have already criticized the idea of brute fact [see codeBF, brutefactdef, and code524 & codebrute]. But there is another side to the story.

If there are no brute facts, if brute facts are mute facts, it must be maintained that all facts are revelational of the true God. If facts may not be separated from faith, neither may faith be separated from facts. Every created fact must therefore be held to express, to some degree, the attitude of God to man. Not to maintain this is to fall back once again into a natural theology of a Roman Catholic sort. For it is to hold to the idea of brute fact after all. And with the idea of brute fact goes that of neutral reason. A fact not revelational of God is revelational only of itself.

Schilder tells us, further, that the attitude of God is revealed only to the extent that we know of the will of His eternal counsel. He speaks of this in connection with the story of the sons of Eli. In God's final purpose he has determined to slay the sons of Eli. Yet Eli is told to tell his sons that God desires not their death. "The father Eli may, and must say to his sons: be converted, ye children of Eli, for Jehovah desires not your death; that is the revealed will, the command, which you are to obey. He hates sin. But in addition to this we are informed afterwards, that as far as the secret will of God is concerned, Jehovah did desire their death as just punishment; in part because of this they harden themselves against warning; inasmuch as wickedness is punishment as well as pollution. And in this hidden will it is that the attitude of God appears.”

Should Schilder wish to generalize the point he makes with respect to the sons of Eli, he would end up with the notion of brute fact (search brutefactdef & codebrute) . To set the problem before us as clearly as possible, we do well to think of it in connection with Adam in paradise. Would it be possible to maintain that only by the later revelation of God’s final purpose could anything be known of His attitude toward man? Then Adam would at the beginning have known nothing of God’s attitude toward him. No revelation of God’s final purpose had yet been made. The whole future, as far as Adam’s knowledge was concerned, was conditioned by his obedience or disobedience. But if this act of obedience or disobedience was to have any significance, it had to be obedience or disobedience with respect to God, whom he knew. His moral act could not be action in a void. He knew something of God and of God’s attitude toward him without any unconditional revelation about God’s final purpose.

We must go further than this. Man was originally created good. That is to say, there was, as a matter of fact, an ethical reaction on the part of man, and this ethical action was approved by God. It may be said that. God created man with a good nature, but that the test was still to come as to whether he would voluntarily live in accord with this good nature. But surely Adam could not live for a second without acting morally. The “good nature” of Adam cannot be taken otherwise than as a limiting concept. The objective and the subjective aspects were correlative of one another. Further still, the decisive representative act was still to come. Granted that Adam’s nature was an active nature, this active nature itself must be taken as a limiting concept in relation to the decisive ethical reaction that was to take place in connection with the probationary command. This goes to prove that the representative act of obedience or disobedience presupposed for its possibility the revelational character of everything created. It goes to prove, further, that man’s good ethical reaction must be taken as an aspect of that revelatory character of everything created. To be sure, this good reaction was not the consummated good that shall be attained in the case of those that will be in glory. Yet it was a good ethical reaction. It was good not so much in a lower sense as in an earlier sense.

The importance of stressing the idea of the earlier and the later, needs to be insisted on. We know, of course, that in God’s mind there are those that are reprobate and those that are elect. This fact being revealed to us, we know that some men will be finally rejected and some men will be finally accepted. And there is no dispute as to what is the ultimate cause with respect to this difference. Both parties to the debate are with Calvin, as over against Pighius, heartily agreed that God’s counsel is the ultimately determinative factor. But the difference obtains with respect to the meaning of the historical. And here the problem is, more specifically, to what extent we should allow our notion of the earlier to be controlled by our notion of the later. We think that the notion of the earlier must be stressed more than has been done heretofore.

If we make the earlier our point of departure for the later, we begin with something that believers and unbelievers have in common. That is to say, they have something in common because they do not yet exist. Yet they do exist. They exist in Adam as their common representative. They have seen the testimony of God in common. They have given a common good ethical reaction to this testimony, the common mandate of God. They are all mandate-hearers and covenant-keepers. God's attitude to all is the same. God has a favorable attitude to all. He beheld all the works of His hands and, behold, they were good. God was pleased with them.

But this favorable attitude of God to this early common perfect nature must be taken as correlative to the representative moral act of Adam. We may and must hold that every fact was revelational. Every fact was the bearer of a requirement. But, even as such, it was expressive of a favorable attitude of God to man. Without all this the ethical act of representation would have to take place in a void. At the same time, this original situation was an historically unfinished situation. It required further ethical action as its correlative. The continuance of the situation required, on the part of man, the representative affirmation of God as God. And this correlativity implied that the situation would, in any case, be changed. Whether Adam was to obey or to disobey, the situation would be changed. And thus God's attitude would be changed.

We need at this point to be fearlessly anthropomorphic. Our basic interpretative concept, the doctrine of the ontological trinity, demands of us that we should be so. We have met the full-bucket difficulty by asserting that history has meaning, not in spite of, but because of, the counsel of God who controls whatsoever comes to pass. From the point of view of a non-Christian logic the Reformed Faith can be bowled over by means of a single syllogism. [A syllogism is a kind of logical argument that applies deductive reasoning to arrive at a conclusion based on two propositions that are asserted or assumed to be true. In its earliest form, a syllogism arises when two true premises validly imply a conclusion, or the main point that the argument aims to get across.] God has determined whatsoever comes to pass. Man's moral acts are things that come to pass. Therefore man's moral acts are determined and man is not responsible for them. So Pighius argued against Calvin. Calvin replied, in effect, that just because God has determined everything, secondary causes have genuine meaning. Applying this to the case in hand, we would say that we are entitled and compelled to use anthropomorphism not apologetically but fearlessly. We need not fear to say that God's attitude has changed with respect to mankind. We know well enough that God in himself is changeless. But we hold that we are able to affirm that our words have meaning for no other reason than that we use them analogically.

Accordingly we would not speak of God's love of creatureliness always and everywhere. Schilder uses this idea. He says that God greatly loves creatureliness everywhere, whether in the drunkard, the anti-Christ or the devil. Creatureliness is then conceived of statically, as though it were something to be found anywhere and everywhere the same and always by itself. But creatureliness should be used as a limiting concept. It is never found in moral beings, whether men or angels, except in connection with an ethical reaction, positive or negative. We cannot intelligently speak of God's love of creatureliness in the devil. God's good pleasure pertains no doubt to the devil. But that is because the devil is frustrated in his opposition to God. God once upon a time loved the devil. But that was before the devil was the devil. We shall make no progress on the common grace problem with the help of abstractions.

We need not hesitate to affirm, then, that in the beginning God loved mankind in general. That was before mankind had sinned against God. A little later God hated mankind in general. That was after mankind had sinned against God. Is there any doubt that the elect, as well as the reprobate, were under the wrath of God? Calvin says that the whole human race is "individually bound by the guilt and desert of eternal death, as derived from the person of Adam." So the elect and the reprobate are under a common wrath. If there is meaning in this—and who denies it? there may and must, with equal right, be said to be an earlier attitude of common favor. Indeed, the reality of the "common wrath" depends upon the fact of the earlier "common grace." But after the common, in each case, comes the conditional. History is a process of differentiation. Accordingly, the idea of that which is common between the elect and the reprobate is always a limiting concept. It is a commonness for the time being. There lies back of it a divine as if. One syllogism, based on non-Christian assumptions, would call this dishonesty. Pighius knew how to turn such syllogisms; but Calvin knew how to answer them. Invariably he answered them by turning to the words of Paul, "Who art thou, O man?" He answered them by rejecting the whole of the non-Christian methodology, based on the ideas of brute fact and abstract universal. see [codeBF and code524 & codebrute] Pighius cannot shake the symmetry with which the proximate and remote causes divinely harmonize, even though he can easily prove that no man can comprehend their connection. Man has sinned against the true God, whom he knew for what He is. When man first sinned he did not know God as fully as we know Him now, but he did know God for what He is, as far as he knew Him at all. And it was mankind, not some individual elect or reprobate person, that sinned against God. Thus it was mankind in general which was under the favor of God, that came under the wrath of God. We have said that after the common in each case comes the conditional. What then is meant by the conditional? This question has caused much trouble. The synod of 1924 of the Christian Reformed Church, before referred to, gave the general offer of the gospel as evidence of common grace. Hoeksema, on the other hand, denies that there may be said to be any such thing as a well-meant offer of salvation to a generality of men, including elect and non-elect. He thinks he finds clear support in Calvin's treatment of the general offer in relation to predestination.

If any progress is to be made in the discussion of this most perplexing aspect of the perplexing problem of common grace we shall need, in our humble opinion, to stress, as we have tried to do throughout, the idea of the earlier and the later, that is to say, the historical correlativity of universal and particular. All too frequently our difficulty is needlessly enhanced in that those who affirm, and those who deny, employ in the defence of their positions such arguments as are constructed out of the ideas of brute fact and abstract law. A rather typical argument employed is that expressed in the following words of Hepp: "Is there not a sort of grace in the hearing of the gospel by the non-elect? They hear that God has no pleasure in their death, but rather that they be converted and live. As time-believers the Word may bring them joy." Here Hepp inserts a paraphrase of Heb 6.4, (Heb 6:4) as proof that there may be a grace which is non-saving for the reprobate.¹²⁹ (129)Hepp offers much valuable material on the question of common grace in a series of articles in which he seeks to prove that common grace is taught in Scripture (Credo, July 1, 1940 ff.). He then adds: "Let us not look at the lot of the non-elect in the congregation from the view-point of judgment only. Truly that judgment is a reality. But the enjoyments, which they sometimes have under the preaching of the gospel also have temporary reality, as a non-saving work brought about as they are by the Spirit."

Hepp here speaks as though it were already known who are and who are not elect. He speaks as though a preacher may approach a certain individual whom he knows to be reprobate, and tell him that God has no pleasure in his death. But this is to forget the difference between the earlier and the later. The general presentation comes to a generality. It comes to "sinners," differentiated, to be sure, as elect and reprobate in the mind of God, but yet, prior to their act of acceptance or rejection, regarded as a generality. To forget this is to move the calendar of God ahead.

Arguing as Hepp argues is virtually to accept the really contradictory. It at least approaches the idea that the same ultimate will of God wills, and yet wills not, the salvation of sinners. If it does not do this, as it is obviously not intended to do, it makes for a mechanical alignment of common and special grace. All agree that common grace is not a small quantity of special grace; yet if the matter of the conditional presentation be handled as Hepp handles it, there is great difficulty in escaping the quantitative idea. It may then, to be sure, be asserted that common grace is a lower kind of grace, a grace meant for this life only, but it is difficult to see how this lower grace is the result of the presentation of the gospel which deals with the highest grace, that is, saving grace.

The difficulties at this point are, we must believe, considerably reduced if we observe the ideas of the earlier and the later. Calvin does not hesitate to say of mankind that it was originally "placed in a way of salvation." And while mankind in general was in a way of salvation, salvation was offered to all men. He recounts this as an historical fact. He argues with Pighius as to whether it was absolutely or conditionally offered, but he does not dispute the fact that it was offered to all men in Adam. "The truth of the matter is, that salvation is not offered to all men on any other ground than on the condition of their remaining in their original innocence." From this fact that God did at the earliest point in history offer eternal life to all men, Calvin takes his departure. One who argues like Pighius is easily able to raise objections to this as being quite impossible. He will say: God, according to the doctrine of election, did not mean to save all men. Then what meaning has it to offer eternal life to all men? And how dare you say that God placed man in a way of salvation? But Calvin does not allow himself to be led astray by reasoning based on non-Christian assumptions. True reasoning, he says in effect, will rather maintain that the general offer has meaning and is possible because it has actually been made by God. And while it is true that this whole question of the universal offer of salvation is one of these things that can only “be fully understood or perceived by faith,” we yet see such harmony between ultimate and proximate causes on the frankly revelational basis as cannot be seen otherwise.

It is with this background that Calvin then attacks the question of Christ’s command to preach the gospel to all men alike. Pighius drew from the universality of this command the conclusion that God must mean all men to be saved. Against this Calvin argues that the promise is not unconditional. Speaking of the promise of Jer. 31:33 to the effect that God will write His law in their hearts, he says: “Now a man must be utterly beside himself to assert that this promise is made to all men generally and indiscriminately.” It is evident that God by His counsel did not ordain all men to eternal life. Yet the fact of Christ’s command remains. “It is quite manifest that all men, without difference or distinction, are outwardly called or invited to repentance and faith.”

Pighius sees a contradiction here. And on non-Christian presuppositions there would be a contradiction here. But with the Christian distinction between ultimate and proximate causes we hold, though we cannot intellectually penetrate the question exhaustively, that, instead, there is genuine harmony here. There are, we can show Pighius, no two ultimate wills in God contradicting one another. Yet we need the idea of two wills, that of command and that of secret counsel. We harmonize the two, as far as we can harmonize that which involves the incomprehensible God, by the ideas of correlativity and conditionality as these ideas are themselves determined in their meaning by the concept of God.

The universality of the gospel presentation or invitation or promise or command— they all come to the same thing, and Calvin is not afraid to use them indiscriminately— comes to mankind in general. It comes to sinful mankind, to mankind that has once before, when “placed in a way of salvation,” been offered salvation. It comes to a generality that has once in common, in one moment, in one man, rejected the offer of eternal life through Adam. Mankind is now, to use words corresponding to the earlier stage, placed in a way of death. Meanwhile the fact of Christ’s redemptive work, in promise or in fulfilment, has come into the picture. Christ has not died for all men. He has died only for His people. But His people are not yet His people except in the mind of God. They are still members of the sinful mass of mankind. It is with them where they are that contact is to be made. The offer or presentation is not to those who believe any more than to those who disbelieve. The offer comes to those who have so far neither believed nor disbelieved. It comes before that differentiation has taken place. It comes thus generally, so that differentiation may have meaning. Christ is to be a savor of life unto life to some and a savor of death unto death to others. Those who eventually disbelieve will be the more inexcusable.

The analogy of Calvin’s argument here to his idea of original general revelation is apparent. As God’s general revelation, natural and positive, plus the probationary command, originally invited all men to eternal life, as Calvin puts it, and men, of whom God had determined from all eternity that they should not inherit eternal life, yet were rendered inexcusable by the invitation when they rejected it, so now again, a second time, while it is still as certain as ever with God that they shall be lost eventually, and while historically they have by their sin placed themselves in the way of eternal death, they are rendered the more inexcusable by the gospel invitation, and have added to their condemnation by their second rejection of God.

Pighius objects that all this is to make of God a mocker. But Calvin introduces again his distinction between primary and secondary causes. Men “untaught of God” do not understand. They, he says in effect, use syllogisms “from the earth’s plain surface, without any foundation at all.” Believers, on the other hand, use syllogisms on the foundation of the ontological trinity. They know that all men have placed themselves in the way of death. “For the nature of the whole human race was corrupted in the person of Adam.” 136 How such as are chosen by God to eternal life, who are by God’s secret counsel to be glorified, how, in short, the elect can yet, by historical representative disobedience, come under the wrath of God, they cannot understand. Must we say that the wrath of God under which they rest, according to the revealed will of God, does not tell us of the real attitude of God to them? Must we say that the real attitude of God to them is revealed only in God’s electing love? Must we say that the threat of eternal death to those that are the elect was meaningless because God willed, with His secret will, that they should finally be saved? The elect did actually disobey and they came actually under the wrath of God, while yet for all eternity they are under the favor of God. Pighius here, if he desires, can use his charge of two ultimate wills in God. He may argue that, if the doctrine of foreordination is to be carried through consistently, history is naught but a puppet dance. We hold, as we are told in Scripture to hold, that the disobedience of the elect was a real disobedience and that on account of it they came under the wrath of God. For men “taught of God” it is possible to see the harmony here between the attitude of wrath, which, in this sense, the elect share with the reprobate, and the eternal attitude of God’s favor to the elect only. They distinguish between primary and secondary causes. They hold to two wills in God. They know there is no conflict between these wills. They know this not because they have been able to penetrate intellectually the relationship between the two. They know it by faith, and they know it intellectually so far as to see that, unless we may hold that harmony rests in God, all human experience is a farce. They do not hesitate to say to those of the mind of Pighius that only Christianity is rational, though not rationally penetrable by the mind of man.

This mode of reasoning Calvin applies to the case of the reprobate. Their case is not inherently more difficult than the case of the elect. How can we understand that they were first taken into a generality with the elect and said by God to be good? Was not God’s attitude to them displayed in that instance? Of course in God’s mind there was a difference all the time. They were to him the children of wrath, even while they were pronounced good by Himself, in the earliest stage of their history. It was not some abstraction like creatureliness in them that was the object of God’s favor. As concrete beings, eventually to be haters of God but not yet in history haters of God, rather, as yet in Adam good before God, the reprobate are the objects of God’s favor. But all this was conditional. God gave them, as it were, a sample of what would be theirs if they obeyed representatively in Adam. It was, as it were, a “lend-lease” proposition. How could God offer eternal life to the reprobate in Adam, if He did not finally mean to give it to them? Pighius would urge that to say that He did would be to make of God a mocker. Calvin would answer that God did it, and that it is the exact equivalent of God’s threat of eternal death to the elect, which was involved in the same probationary command. That exactly is history. The Moment has significance, and can have significance, only against the background of the counsel of God. Threats and promises are real and genuinely revelatory of the attitude of God, just because of the counsel of God that is back of history. Thus “the calumny is washed off at once.” We should not be surprised at the generality of the invitation to salvation. We should not argue that the general invitation reveals nothing of the attitude of God, on the ground that God’s particular will is back of all. “Wherefore, God is as much said to have pleasure in, and to will, this eternal life, as to have pleasure in the repentance; and He has pleasure in the latter, because He invites all men to it by His Word. Now all this is in perfect harmony with His secret and eternal counsel, by which He decreed to convert none but His own elect. None but God’s elect, therefore, ever do turn from their wickedness. And yet, the adorable God is not, on these accounts, to be considered variable or capable of change, because, as a Law-giver, He enlightens all men with the external doctrine of conditional life. In this primary manner He calls, or invites, all men unto eternal life. But, in the latter case, He brings unto eternal life those whom He willed according to His eternal purpose, regenerating by His Spirit, as an eternal Father, His own children only.”

Next: Interesting comments on being epistemologically fully self-conscious. This explains the hardening of the heart over time to full maturity in the reprobate, coming into their own, so to speak, maturing in their open enmity against God and the knowledge of Him, similar to the sin of the Amorites that would eventually be complete, coming to fullness ripe for judgment, Gen 15:16; or the softening of the heart and maturing in humility and the graces of the Spirit over time in the elect.

We are, therefore, to steer clear of Platonic abstractions. We are not to use the general offer of the gospel as an abstract idea. Schilder holds that, as a general truth, we may say to the anti-Christ or the devil that whosoever believes will be saved. But to make such a statement to the anti-Christ or to the devil as though it could involve them personally would be wholly meaningless. The anti-Christ and the devil are historically finished products. They are such as have finally disbelieved. The general gospel offer could make no point of contact with them. The conditional for them has passed. They have finally negated God and have been, or are being, frustrated by God; in their rejection of God they are epistemologically fully self-conscious. God loved the devil when the devil was an unfallen angel; God loved the anti-Christ and offered Him eternal life when he was in Adam; now that they have become the devil and the anti-Christ, God hates them exclusively. The general offer has meaning only with respect to those who are at an earlier stage of history. It has meaning with respect to the elect and the reprobate when they are, and to the extent that they are, members of an as yet undifferentiated generality.

In a non-Christian scheme of thought abstract universals and particulars stand over against one another in an unreconcilable fashion. Such was the case in Plato's philosophy. Aristotle sought to remedy the situation by teaching that the universals are present in the particulars. But he failed to get genuine contact between them, inasmuch as for him the lowest universal (infima species), was, after all, a supposed abstraction from particulars. Hence the particulars that were presupposed were bare particulars, having no manner of contact with universality. And if they should, per impossible, have contact with universality, they would lose their individuality. Pighius reasoned on the basis of such Platonic-Aristotelian assumptions. [See Van Til on this.] He therefore concluded that a general offer of salvation must destroy all differentiation and have universalism for its natural effect. If the general is to have any meaning, he argues, it must swallow up the particular. And if the particular is to have meaning, the meaning of the general must be denied.

The whole thrust of Calvin's thought is opposed to this. For him the general and the particular are coterminous in God. That is implied in the doctrine of the ontological trinity. And with this ontological trinity and the counsel of God as the background of history, it is possible to give genuine meaning to the general without doing despite to the particular. In fact the general is a means toward the realization of the particular. The very possibility of differentiation presupposes as its concomitant a correlative generality. God as the lawgiver is working out His eternal plan. God has an attitude of favor toward the originally created good nature of man. The individual men are included in this generality. They are not contrasted with this generality as those that believe or disbelieve. It could not be said of this original promise that "the contents of this externally general message is particular and applies to the elect only." 138 Nor could we say that because this promise is conditional, "it is also particular and God in reality promises eternal life only to the elect." Such, we are persuaded, is not Calvin's intention with his stress on the conditional character of the promise.

The burden of the whole matter lies in the fact that on any Platonic, or semi-Platonic, basis, the conditional can have no meaning. Only on a Christian, and more specifically only on a consistently Christian, basis can the conditional have meaning. Certain as we are that this is true, certain as we are that Christianity is objectively valid and that it is the only rational position for man to hold, we are as certain that we cannot exhaustively explain the relation of the infinite to the finite. To do so would be to exhaust the being of God. In his article on Predestination, Warfield says that because Calvin believed in the freedom of God, he did not believe in the liberty of man to seek exhaustive knowledge of God. Mystery, says Bavinck, is the heart of Dogmatics. But it is Christian, not Platonic, mystery that constitutes this heart.

Differentiation described here:

If, then, we think along the lines suggested by Calvin, we may think of the universal offer of salvation as an evidence of common grace. It is evidence of earlier rather than of lower grace. All common grace is earlier grace. Its commonness lies in its earliness. It pertains not merely to the lower dimensions of life. It pertains to all dimensions, and to these dimensions in the same way at all stages of history. It pertains to all the dimensions of life, but to all these dimensions ever decreasingly as the time of history goes on. At the very first stage of history there is much common grace. There is a common good nature under the common favor of God. But this creation-grace requires response. It cannot remain what it is. It is conditional. Differentiation must set in and does set in. It comes first in the form of a common rejection of God. Yet common grace continues; it is on a “lower” level now; it is long-suffering that men may be led to repentance. God still continues to present Himself for what He is, both in nature and in the work of redemption. The differentiation meanwhile proceeds. [I think what he means here is that the non-elect get harder and harder of heart over time (history), hence differentiate themselves from the elect, who get softer and softer in heart over time, differentiating themselves from the non-elect. I heard it described this way: the wheat as they mature, bow down in humility and meekness, whereas the false wheat, the tares, mature un-bowed, proud, non bending, stiff necked so to speak, thus differentiating themselves from the wheat.] The elect are, generally speaking, differently conditioned from the non-elect. They are separated into a special people. In the New Testament period they have the influences of Christian surroundings brought to bear upon them. The non-elect are, generally speaking, conditioned in accordance with their desert; most of them never come within earshot of the external call of the gospel and have no Christian influence brought to bear upon them. Thus it becomes increasingly difficult to observe that which is common. We may be tempted to think of it as a merely formal something. We may, like the impatient disciples, anticipate the course of history and deal with men as though they were already that which by God’s eternal decree they one day will be. Yet God bids us bide our time and hold to the common, as correlative to the process of differentiation. Pighius would say that the universal offer of salvation must be taken as an unconditional promise that God will write His law on every heart, and we may be tempted to answer that the universal offer is formal and is, because conditional, after all only particular, but Scripture would have us use the notion of generality as a limiting concept still. Common grace will diminish still more in the further course of history. With every conditional act the remaining significance of the conditional is reduced. God allows men to follow the path of their self-chosen rejection of Him more rapidly than ever toward the final consummation. God increases His attitude of wrath upon the reprobate as time goes on, until at the end of time, at the great consummation of history, their condition has caught up with their state. On the other hand God increases His attitude of favor upon the elect, until at last, at the consummation of history, their condition has caught up with their state. While in this world, though saved and perfect in Christ, they are yet, because of their old nature, under the displeasure of God.

Excellent comment on Romans 7:14-17 here - & The process of differentiation and the concept of being epistemologically self-consciousness – hardening in sin vs. softening – next 10 pages or so: code480

Again abstractions should be avoided. To say that God loves his people but hates their sin is to avoid the issue. Believers, in this life, are, and continue to be, both under the favor and under the disfavor of God. Sin is not an abstract something. The “new man” is responsible for the sin of the “old man.” When Paul says it is no longer he but sin that dwelleth in him that performs certain actions, he does not seek to lift the “new man” from under the responsibility of the sin of the “old man.” He merely means to prove that the “new man” is a genuine reality, whatever the appearance to the contrary. The idea of the old nature as a generality, as something the elect have in common with the non-elect, is still an important factor in the present situation. So, then, the ideas of common wrath and common grace must both be kept as constitutive factors in measuring the present historical situation by the Word of God.

What has been said may also help us to some extent in an intelligent discussion of the attitude of believers toward unbelievers. That attitude should, if our general approach be at all correct, be a conditional “as if” attitude. The attitude of Christ’s followers is, as Christ has told us, to be in positive imitation of God’s attitude. Hence we are to make practical use of the concept of “mankind in general.” We are to use this notion as a limiting concept. We are not to forget for a moment that no such thing exists in any pure state. We are therefore to witness to men that in themselves they are enemies of God. We are to witness to them that this enmity appears even in such dimensions as that of counting and weighing. This is done if, among other things, we build separate Christian day schools. And we are to oppose men more definitely to the extent that they become epistemologically more self-conscious. To say to the anti-Christ that God loves sinners, and therefore may love him, is to cast pearls before swine. For all that, we still need the concept of “mankind in general.” We are to think of non-believers as members of the mass of humankind in which the process of differentiation has not yet been completed. [the wheat and the tares are not fully mature yet] It is not to the righteous and to the unrighteous as fully differentiated that God gives His rain and sunshine. It is not to unbelievers as those that have with full self-consciousness expressed their unbelief that we are to give our gifts. We are to give our “rain and sunshine” as God gives them, on the basis of the limiting concept, to the as yet undifferentiated or at least not fully differentiated mass of mankind.

By thus substituting the ideas of earlier and later for lower and higher we may get something approaching a solution to the question of territories. There is no single territory or dimension in which believers and non-believers have all things wholly in common. As noted above, even the description of facts in the lowest dimension presupposes a system of metaphysics and epistemology. So there can be no neutral territory of cooperation. Yet unbelievers are more self-conscious epistemologically in the dimension of religion than in the dimension of mathematics. The process of differentiation has not proceeded as far in the lower, as it has in the higher dimensions. Does not this fact explain to some extent our attitude in practice? We seek, on the one hand, to make men epistemologically self-conscious [how and when do we know things] all along the line. As Reformed Christians we do all we can, by building our own educational institutions and otherwise, to make men see that so-called neutral weighing and measuring is a terrible sin in the sight of God. To ignore God anywhere is to insult the God who has told us that, whether we eat or drink or do anything else, we are to do all to His glory.

But when all the reprobate are epistemologically self-conscious, the crack of doom has come. [in other words, e.g., the sin of the Amorites is now complete, it's come to its full measure, ripe for God's judgment.] The fully self-conscious reprobate will do all he can in every dimension to destroy the people of God. So while we seek with all our power to hasten the process of differentiation in every dimension we are yet thankful, on the other hand, for "the day of grace," the day of undeveloped differentiation. Such tolerance as we receive on the part of the world is due to this fact that we live in the earlier, rather than the later, stage of history. And such influence on the public situation as we can effect, whether in society or in state, presupposes this undifferentiated stage of development. [fascinating!]

And this tolerance, on the one hand, and influence, on the other hand, extends, in varying degrees, to all dimensions. Because of the fact of undifferentiation we are tolerated in our religious life as we are tolerated in the field of weighing and measuring. And we have influence in the religious life as we have influence in the lower dimensions. [undifferentiated: one has not fully developed into this sinful, fully epistemologically conscious mindset, "hardened of heart" condition where he is willfully waging war against God and knows it.] Those who have no depth of earth yet, sometimes and in some cases, receive with joy the seed of the Word. They have a temporal faith. The problem of the inner ego and the more circumferential aspect of the human person, discussed by Kuyper with the help of the copper-wire illustration, need not much concern us. It is not a question of psychology. Psychologically the whole individual is involved even to the depth of his being. When he receives the witness of the living God through nature about him, through his conscience within him, and by means of the preaching of the gospel, he is deeply engaged psychologically in an interpretative endeavor. But this deep psychological interpretative endeavor, by which he joins to himself all the multitudinous forms of the voice of God, is still, itself, merely the revelational voice of God. The question of his ethical response has not yet been broached. The real question is one of epistemology and therewith of man's ethical attitude toward God. If men were fully self-conscious epistemologically they would violently suppress the psychologically interpretative voice within them. But to the extent that they are not self-conscious epistemologically, they may even taste of the heavenly gift, be made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and taste the good word of God and the powers of the world to come, and not rebel. [incredible insight here!! this explains why it is too hard to discern false brethren and how many can be self-deceived.] They allow themselves to be affected by it to some extent. It is the nostalgia of the prodigal who has left the father's home but sometimes has misgivings. On his way to the far country he may halt, he may even turn back for a distance, thinking that after all it was good and natural for a son to be in the father's home. Soon he will crucify unto himself the Son of God afresh, but for the moment the voice of God drowns out his own. He is at the moment not at all himself; he is not yet fully himself.

It is thus that we finally come to some fruitful insight into the problem of civil righteousness or the works of non-regenerate men. It is not that in some lower dimension no differentiation, epistemological or psychological, needs to be made by believers. It is not that there is even a square foot of neutral territory. It is not that in the field of civics or justice, any more than in any other particular dimension, men, to the extent that they are epistemologically self-conscious, show any righteousness. The problem, as already suggested, faces us in every dimension. There are non-believers who go to church, there are those who give to the cause of missions. [codehypo1] Nor are they hypocrites, properly speaking. The hypocrite is a person who is epistemologically self-conscious to a large degree. He “joins the church” for the sake of reward. He may very well do the works of the law externally. Dillinger often walked well-dressed in fashionable society. May not a criminal give many and fine Christmas presents today to those whom he plans to murder tomorrow? He does the works of the law. Schilder makes much of the fact that the works of the law may be thus externally performed. But the problem cannot be settled in this fashion. The very existence of the hypocrite requires us to go back of the hypocrite. To be able to act the hypocrite he must know the requirements of proper society thoroughly. How does he know the requirements of society? Because he has mingled in society and has had its requirements inscribed upon him as a demand. The very possibility of self-conscious hypocrisy presupposes an earlier undifferentiated state. It is from that undifferentiated stage that we must make our beginning.

Schilder insists that we are not to interpret Paul’s words in Rom 2:14 as though they meant that the heathen do the works of the law by their own nature. This is in itself true enough. Yet it is equally true that the question of general revelation is of basic importance for an understanding of Paul’s words. The fact of general revelation may, and must, always be presupposed. Schilder himself allows for this possibility. When seeking to explain the passage, he employs the idea of the remnants of the image of God and the idea of God’s general providence. Yet he holds that the first reason for the performance of the works of the law, on the part of the reprobate, must be found in their sinful nature. The sinner, says Schilder, does the works of the law hypocritically. That is to say, Schilder would have us make a large degree of epistemological self-consciousness on the part of the non-believer the chief and primary point of departure. We shall get further in stating Paul’s meaning if we make a low stage of epistemological self-consciousness our starting point. Paul is not saying that we deal with a group of people that are master simulators, having been in contact with the highest requirements of the law of God, and a group that is able to “dress as well as the best.” On the contrary he is arguing that even those who have not had the special revelation of the oracles of God given to the Jews must yet be said to be sinners, that is, covenant-breakers. All men need the justice of God, for all are sinners. Yet there is no sin unless there be transgression and there is no transgression unless there be knowledge of the law.

Sidebar comment: And not only is there transgression from the knowledge of the law, but their witness of the miracles that Jesus did acerbates their judgment for their transgressions, John 15: 24-25, ²⁴ If I had not done among them the works which no one else did, they would not have ^[a]sin; but now they have both seen and hated Me and My Father as well. ²⁵ But they have done this to fulfill the word that is written in their Law, 'They hated Me without a cause.'

Having not the externally promulgated law, the heathen yet have enough knowledge of the law or will of God to render them without excuse. Do some think that the wrath of God is revealed upon the heathen unjustly on the ground that they have no knowledge of the will of God? Let them realize, says Paul in effect, that the revelation of God is present with all men everywhere. Let them know that even from the beginning of history this knowledge has been about all men everywhere. All men are responsible for the original positive revelation of God to mankind, as well as for the natural revelation that still surrounds them. Do some wonder whether that revelation of God has been persistent and insistent? Let them realize that that revelation is so close to all men as to be psychologically one with them. It is so close to them that, in spite of all their efforts to bury it, it speaks through their own moral consciousness. The law of God as a demand of God is written on their very hearts. The Westminster Confession does not hesitate to say that the law, not merely the works of the law but the law itself, was originally written on man's heart. And the reference given for that statement is Rom 2.14–15. To this is then added the fact that man originally had a true epistemological reaction to this revelation of God. Man was created in "knowledge, righteousness and true holiness." This original, true, epistemological reaction in paradise is in turn revelational and therefore further requisite for the sinner.

Sin has not been able to efface all this requisitional material from the consciousness of man. The very activity of his consciousness is a daily reminder to him of the will of God. Though he has tried over and over again to choke the voice of God he has not been able to do so. His evil nature would fain subdue the voice of the creation nature, but it cannot wholly do so. Involuntarily men think back, with the prodigal, to the father's home. And when the prodigal turns his face momentarily toward the father's house there comes to him the voice of approval. He may "with joy" receive the gospel though he have no depth of earth. On the other hand, when he reasserts his true self, his self that is on the way to the swine-trough, there is still a voice pursuing him, this time the voice of disapproval. So he wavers as an unfinished product. He does the works of the law not as the devil or as the anti-Christ does them. They do them as arch-simulators of Christ and His people. The devil appears as an angel of light. Hypocrites imitate him. It is not thus that the average non-believer does them. If such were the case, the end of time would be here. If all non-believers did the works of the law primarily from their self-consciously developed evil nature they would, by force of their principle, seek to wipe all believers off the face of the earth. But "the man of sin," the "son of perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God," is restrained (2 Thes 2:3–4). When no longer restrained he will attempt to make hypocrites of all unbelievers. He will work "with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they receive not the love of the truth that they might be saved" (2 Thes. 2:10). In punishment for their sin "God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness” (2 Thes. 2:11–12). Till such time as the “son of perdition” has not been given free power, and till such time as God has not in that connection sent a strong spirit of delusion, mankind in general is not fully self-conscious of its inherent opposition to God. The pressure of God’s revelation upon men is so great that they are, from their own point of view, in a sort of stupor. With the prodigal they are on the way to the swine-trough, but with the prodigal they have misgivings in leaving the father’s house. The heathen have such misgivings; those that hear the gospel may have such misgivings in a greater measure, as they taste the powers of the age to come.

In this manner the ideas of God’s general providence, his general revelation, the remnants of the image of God in man, the general external call of the gospel, and man’s evil nature may be brought into something of a harmonious unity. All things happen according to God’s providence. That is basic. There is, according to this providence, to be a development in the direction of evil and a development in the direction of the good. These two developments grow in conjunction, in correlativity, with one another. Therefore all factors must be taken into consideration in all the problems with which we have to deal. The general development of history, of which the two developments mentioned are subdivisions, comes about through God’s presentation of Himself as He is, in varying degrees of self-revelation, to man, plus man’s reaction to this presentation. God always presents Himself as He is. His attributes face man as man faces God. The revelation of God is always objectively valid. The greatest obscuration the sin of man can cast over the face of nature and his own consciousness, cannot destroy the validity of revelation. Vanity and corruption are, to be sure, seen in nature. But men ought, argues Calvin, to see even this as evidence of God’s presence, of God’s presence in judgment. Evil is found in man’s heart. Again, even this is evidence of God’s presence; man is pursued by the voice of accusing conscience. When the accusing conscience challenges the wisdom of his choice against God, the voice of God is heard again. The prodigal turns about for a moment, stands still, takes a few steps back, his conscience approving, his emotional life responding with joy; the remnants of the image of God appear even while he is on his general downward path. In some cases the gospel call is heard. This tends to make some of those that hear it walk back a little farther still. But underneath it all the evil nature is operative. That nature accounts for the fact that all this turning and yearning is temporary and has not arisen from true faith in God. That nature accounts for the fact that the sinner will soon turn with more determination than ever toward the swine-trough. Even if he continues to do the works of the law, as well he may, he will do them more and more self-consciously for the sake of reward. Finally, he may become a worthy disciple of Satan who may appear as an angel of light to deceive, if it were possible, the very elect of God.

Good comments on Total Depravity and in reference to the image of God in man:

In this way, too, we may perhaps be on the way to seeing a bit more clearly the relation between common grace and total depravity. If we stress the fact that common grace is earlier grace, it appears that it is something in connection with which total depravity shines forth in the fulness of its significance. Negatively, there is no possible toning down of the doctrine of total depravity; the attitude of favor spoken of is in no sense directed toward man's evil nature as such. It is directed toward the individual in so far as he is, epistemologically speaking, unconscious of the real significance of the path he is treading. [hence the term, epistemologically self-consciousness, used above] And he is such an individual because he is a member of the mass of mankind which, in the providence of God, has not come to the climax of the process of differentiation. [I think a good example of this is Pharaoh of Egypt who hardened his own heart over time...] Positively, common grace is the necessary correlative to the doctrine of total depravity. Total depravity has two aspects, one of principle and one of degree. The first representative act of man was an act that resulted historically in the total depravity of the race. This act was performed against a mandate of God that involved mankind as a whole; without that "common mandate" it could not have been done; without that common mandate the "negative instance" would have been an operation in a void. Thus mankind came under the common wrath of God. But the process of differentiation was not complete. This common wrath, too, was a stepping-stone to something further. The elect were to choose for God and the reprobate were each for himself to reaffirm their choice for Satan. The reprobate were to show historically the exceeding sinfulness of sin. Totally depraved in principle, they were to become more and more conformed in fact to the principle that controlled their hearts. They do this by way of rejecting the common call, the common grace of God. That is to say, they do it by way of rejecting God to whatever extent God reveals Himself to them. In the case of some this includes the gospel call, while in the case of most it does not. In every case, however, there is growth in wickedness on the part of those who have seen more of the common grace of God. So it appears that in every case of the historical process common grace is the correlative to total depravity.

Sidebar comment: So those who saw Jesus' miracles, though they may have not heard the gospel, their not repenting of their sin was acerbated all the more, John 15: 24-25, ²⁴ If I had not done among them the works which no one else did, they would not have sin; but now they have both seen and hated Me and My Father as well. ²⁵ But they have done this to fulfill the word that is written in their Law, 'They hated Me without a cause.'

Thus we have the "relative good" in the "absolutely evil" and the "relatively evil" in the "absolutely good." Neither the "absolutely evil" nor the "absolutely good" are epistemologically as self-conscious as they will be in the future. God's favor rests upon the reprobate and God's disfavor rests upon the elect to the extent that each lacks epistemological self-consciousness. In neither case is it God's ultimate or final attitude, but in both cases it is a real attitude. As there is an "old man" in the believer, so there is an "old man" in the unbeliever. As there are the remnants of sin in the believer, so there are the remnants of the image of God in the unbeliever. And as the "old man" in the believer does not, in the least, detract from his status as believer, so the "old man" in the unbeliever does not, in the least, detract from his status as unbeliever. Each man is on the move. He is, to use a phrase of Barth with a Reformed meaning, an Entscheidungswesen.

Another parallel suggests itself. We are to regard the natural man as we regard nature. Or rather, we are to regard nature as we regard man. There is a parallelism between the two. They go through a similar history; they go together through the same history. They are aspects of the one course of events reaching toward the great climax at the end of the age. Both were originally created good. But it was a good that was on the move. Through the fall of man both came under the wrath of God. Nature as well as man is subject to vanity and corruption. Rom 8.19, Rom 8.22 But the vanity and corruption, which rest on man and nature by the curse of God, are also on the move. We must observe the “tendency” in both if we would describe either for what it is. Men ought, says Calvin, to be able to see the Creator’s munificence in creation. 143 Men ought, in the second place, to see God’s wrath upon nature. “For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness” (Rom 1:18). “The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now” (Rom 8:22). Thus there is a downward tendency in creation. Men ought to conclude, argues Calvin, that history will end in judgment. When they do not see their own sins punished as they deserve to be punished, men ought to conclude that punishment is deferred, not that it is not coming. Thus there is a tendency toward a climax of wrath and a deferment of this climax in order that the climax may truly be a climax, the end of a process. On the other hand, there is a tendency toward glory. The “earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God” (Rom 8:19). In the “regeneration of all things” the vanity and the corruption will be swallowed up in victory. He that would describe nature for what it actually is, must describe it as thus on the move. And so he that would describe man for what he actually is, must describe him as on the move. Applying this to the unbeliever, who lives under earshot of the gospel call, we have the following. He must be looked at (a) as having been a member of an original generality that was good, (b) as having become a member of a second generality which is wholly corrupt in principle and is on the way to a grand climax of destruction, (c) as having become a member of that generality in the midst of which the supernatural redemptive process is operative, and as a member of a generality that lives under the long-suffering of God, which would lead it to repentance, (d) as a member of a generality that is, in some cases, crucifying to itself the Son of God afresh, (e) as a member of a generality in which that process of crucifixion is still incomplete. All these generalities are presupposed in the meaning of each individual confrontation of the non-believer with the gospel; they are the correlative of the meaning of the conditional with which each one who hears the gospel is faced. All these generalities must be presupposed as still genuinely operative factors in any individual man. Not till all history is done may we drop any one of them. A fearless anthropomorphism based on the doctrine of the ontological trinity, rather than abstract reasoning on the basis of a metaphysical and epistemological correlativism, should control our concepts all along the line. [deep] A fearless anthropomorphism need not hesitate to say that the prodigal sometimes yearns for the father’s house even when on the way to the swine-trough, and that the father still yearns for his son, the son that has broken “the law of his being.”

Summing up what has been said in this section, we would stress the fact that we tend so easily in our common grace discussion, as in all our theological effort, to fall back into scholastic ways of thinking. If we can learn more and more to outgrow scholasticism in our notions about natural theology and natural ethics, we shall be perhaps a bit more careful both in our affirmations and in our negations with respect to common grace. We shall learn to think less statically and more historically. We shall not fear to be boldly anthropomorphic because, to begin with, we have, in our doctrines of the ontological trinity and temporal creation, cut ourselves loose once and for all from correlativism between God and man. We shall dare to give genuine significance to historical conditional action just because we have, back of history, the counsel of God. Accordingly we need not fear to assert that there is a certain attitude of favor on the part of God toward a generality of mankind, and a certain good before God in the life of the historically undeveloped unbeliever. These assertions are not depreciatory of, but rather conditional to, a full assertion of the total depravity of the sinner. If we can say of one who is elect that he was at one point in his history totally depraved, we can, with equal justice, say of a reprobate that he was at one point in his history in some sense good.

Summing up our discussion as a whole we would stress the importance of looking at the common grace question as an aspect of our whole philosophy of history. And this requires for our day, it is our humble judgment, something of a reorientation on the question of Apologetics. Perhaps we may speak of a return to Calvin on this point. At least we hold it to be in line with his Institutes to stress, more than has recently been done, the objective validity of the Christian reading of nature and history. Certainly no one would have hit upon the interpretation of nature and history that we as Christians have, if it had not been revealed by special grace. But this is primarily due to the fact that the natural man is blind. We dare not say that nature and history lend themselves quite as well to the non-Christian as to the Christian interpretation. That the non-Christian may present a plausible view of nature is quite true. That it is impossible to convince any non-Christian of the truth of the Christian position, as long as he reasons on non-Christian assumptions, is also true. All looks yellow to the jaundiced eye. But for all this we would still maintain, and this, we believe, is essentially Calvin’s view, that he who reads nature aright reads it as the Christian reads it.

It is only when we thus press the objective validity of the Christian claim at every point, that we can easily afford to be “generous” with respect to the natural man and his accomplishments. It is when we ourselves are fully self-conscious that we can cooperate with those to whose building we own the title. God’s rain and sunshine comes, we know, to His creatures made in His image. It comes upon a sinful human race that they might be saved. It comes to the believers as mercies from a Father’s hand. It comes upon the nonbeliever that he might crucify to himself the Son of God afresh. The facts of rain and sunshine, so far from being no evidence of anything in themselves, are evidences of all these things, simultaneously and progressively. Then why not cooperate with those with whom we are in this world but with whom we are not of this world? Our cooperation will be just so far as and so far forth. It will be a cooperation so far as the historical situation warrants.

We realize that the practical difficulties will always be great enough. We realize, too, that, theoretically, the question is exceedingly complicated. And we realize that we have a long way to go. But the direction in which we ought to work is, in our humble opinion, reasonably clear.

Part 2

Chapter Four

Particularism And Common Grace

Pg 99-125

In the first lecture of this series Dr. Robert K. Rudolph set forth for us the Reformed doctrine of God. He expounded the Westminster Shorter Catechism definition of God as the One who is infinite, eternal and unchangeable in His being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth. This self-contained and self-sufficient Being by the sovereign act of His will created the world. And since their creation by God all things whatsoever in this world are being controlled by His providence. God controls “whatsoever comes to pass.”

This sovereign God gave man a task to perform. It was to till the ground, to bring out its powers, to act as prophet, priest, and king in the midst of the world that God had made. He was to engage in scientific, artistic, and philosophical enterprises of every conceivable sort. Such was man’s cultural mandate. It was given to mankind as a whole. It was therefore a task that all men would have in common. Mankind was instructed with respect to this, its task, through its first representative, Adam. There was to be a reward for the faithful performance of it. He was to be given eternal life. And as his life when first given him was a life of perfection in a universe of perfection, so it may be thought that the eternal life that he would receive would be fulness of life with the rewards of his cultural labors all about him.

So far then we have (a) the sovereign God, (b) the universe created and controlled by God, (c) the representative of mankind confronted with the cultural mandate for all men, (d) with a reward of eternal life awaiting him on condition of love and obedience to God.

In the second lecture Professor John W. Sanderson told us how Adam sinned for all mankind. He broke the covenant that God had made with him for them. “Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men for that all have sinned” (Rom 5:12). Thus all men come into the world as covenant breakers. And they are as such under the common curse of God.

In the third lecture the Reverend Mr. George S. Christian addressed us on the covenant of grace. He spoke of the immeasurable love of God, of God who so loved the world, the world of sinful, fallen mankind, that He sent His only Son into the world that whosoever should believe in Him might be saved. Again there was the note of commonness. First it was mankind as a unit that was given the common task of subduing the earth. Then mankind broke the covenant and God put all men under the curse, a common curse. After that it was Christ who came to save the world. And it is said that whosoever believeth on Him may be saved.

Particularism

Yet it was the sovereignty of God and the particularism of the gospel that was stressed in all three lectures. The sovereign God has not seen fit to save all men. The gospel is not universally offered to all men everywhere. Millions have never heard of it. And though it is true that whosoever believeth on Christ shall be saved it is also true that of themselves men cannot believe. They love darkness rather than light. They are dead in trespasses and sins. If they are to believe they must be made alive by the Spirit of God who takes the things of Christ and gives them to His people. It is they for whom and for whom alone Christ died. It is they and only they who were from all eternity ordained unto eternal life. This gospel of particularism goes right back to the original plan of God. When God through Adam assigned to mankind its common task, He did so with the ultimate purpose in mind of saving a people for His own possession. God approached all mankind through one man, Adam, and by this means was effecting His purpose with respect to particular men in the future. In this intricate manner the particular and the universal are from the outset of history intertwined with one another. God approaches the mass of mankind through one man as their representative and He approaches each individual human being throughout history through the mass of mankind that has been thus approached through one man. When John Brown is born he may find himself in Africa or in Europe; he may look into the mirror and find himself to be black or white. He may be unable to play ball with other children because of infantile paralysis or he may be a better ball player than his fellows. All the factors of his inheritance and environment are mediated through, and are expressive of, the covenant relationship that God from the beginning established with mankind. All the facts of life about him speak of the mandate of God upon mankind, and therefore upon him. And all these facts also speak of the fact that mankind has, through Adam, broken the covenant with God. Thus self-consciousness for John Brown is identical with covenant-consciousness. John Brown knows he is a covenant breaker to the extent that he knows anything truly at all.

Objections Raised

It is to this scheme of things that men constantly raise their objections. Listen to what the objector has to say. "So then," he explains in triumph, "all that is done by John Brown is a farce, is it? He would have been saved or doomed no matter what he would have done. Adam had to fall or there would have been no people for your Christ to save. You want your Christ to save a special people. It was this special people that He had in mind from the beginning. He did not care for the rest of mankind. In fact your God must have hated the rest of mankind from all eternity. When you spoke of a common gift of life and a common mandate with the prospect of a common eternal life in glory, all that too was a farce and worse than a farce, was it not? God never meant to give the reprobate of whom you speak eternal life. He intended from the beginning to send them to hell for His own pleasure, regardless of what they might do.”

“And as for the elect of whom you speak did not God plan to save them from all eternity? Then all their deeds are also a meaningless performance. These elect of yours would get to heaven no matter what they did. Christ would die to take away any sins they might perform. And the sins they would perform would not really be sins, for they would be done of necessity. Then why speak of these elect as being under a common curse with the reprobate? Or why speak of any curse upon any man since all men sin by necessity? And why has your Christ come into the world at all, since the elect will be saved of necessity and the reprobate will be condemned of necessity. The whole of man’s moral standards are, on your basis, destroyed. Your God has no connection with anything that is moral according to the standards of civilized men.”

It is apparent from these words of the objector that he wants a “gospel” that is universal, that is favorable to all men. If he is to believe in a God it must be such a God as will do His best to save all men. He wants a God of love, a good God, One who is the cause of “good” and not of “evil.” But then, it will be observed that the objector is bound also to follow Plato when he says: “Then God, if he be good, is not the author of all things, but he is the cause of a few things only, and not of most things that occur to men; for few are the goods of human life, and many are the evils, and the good only is to be attributed to him: Of the evil, other causes are to be discovered.” [\[excellent analysis\]](#)

The “objector” then has a finite god. It is this god that he substitutes for the sovereign God of Scripture. His god does not control whatsoever comes to pass, but is himself surrounded by Chance. According to the Scriptures that, and that alone, is possible which is in accord with the plan of God; according to the objector anything is possible because possibility is beyond and above God. But to say that anything is possible, is to start with Chance. The objector has not been able to avoid assuming or presupposing something about the nature of all reality. He had to have something on which to stand in order to remove the scriptural doctrine of God, and that something on which he stands is the idea of Chance. And to interpret human experience in terms of Chance is wholly devoid of meaning.

But all this has been neatly kept under cover. The objector himself is usually not fully aware of the fact that his own position involves the idea of Chance. In that case what he appeals to when he raises his objections to the gospel is “experience” and “logic.” He says he experiences freedom. He asserts that this freedom enables him to initiate that which is wholly new in the world; and if this is so, it is illogical or contradictory to say that God controls “whatsoever comes to pass.” The Christian, the objector asserts, holds that God is all glorious. God is full of glory in some such way as a bucket may be said to be full of water. At the same time, man, by his deed in history, by the exertions that proceed from his own choice, must seek to glorify God. That is as though he must add water to the bucket which he has himself said to be already full of water.

What is the Christian answer to such a charge as that? Perhaps he feels the need of help. And does not the objection voiced above concern all Christians, and therefore the entire Christian church? Surely all Christians want to do justice to human freedom and responsibility; none therefore want to be determinists. It seems as though the objector is right when he says that if one is to do justice to experience and logic then one must preach a gospel which includes all men. Then the gospel cannot in any sense be particularistic. Then God must not merely offer salvation to all men everywhere, but He must have the intention of saving all men. If then all men are not saved this is, in the last analysis, due to their freedom to do that which is against the best intention and efforts of God. God's efforts are common without difference, and the differentiation among men comes in because of the ultimate choice of man. But would not this lead to indeterminism?

A Conference Of All Christian Theologians

Let us call a conference of all Christian theologians, Roman Catholic and Protestant, orthodox Protestant and modern Protestant, traditional Protestant and dialectical Protestant, and ask this conference what reply must be given to the objector. Among others present we note in particular those who speak for Thomas Aquinas, for Luther, for Calvin, for Arminius, for Schleiermacher, for Ritschl, and for Barth.

The First Session

What marvelous agreement there seems to be among these Christian theologians. They agree negatively against the objector that it will not do to subject God to the universe of Chance. "How terrible!" they shout. They agree positively that we must hold to God as man's Creator and Lord and that it is only through Christ that man can be saved. They also agree that human experience and human logic must be interpreted in terms of God and Christ rather than that God and Christ must be interpreted in terms of human experience and logic.

What unison, what harmony!

But here we see that Socrates was right again. Men and gods agree so long as they talk of general principles. "But they join issue about particulars." On the generalities mentioned even the objector might agree. Even he would be glad to say, as Plato said, that we must posit a Good that is above all the distinctions of good and evil that men make. But then it is to be understood, the objector would add, that this Good is “above all that men can say about it.” It is above good and evil. It is indeterminate. It is a subjective ideal even when, as in the case of Plato, it is hypostatized and thus made “real.”

Kant would also agree that men must posit the idea of God as Creator and Ruler of the world, so long as it is made clear that it is impossible for the theoretical reason to say anything about Him. Such a God, Kant would argue, must be an ideal of the practical reason, but cannot be known by means of the concepts of the theoretical or scientific reason. With such a God we can do justice to human experience and to logic too. For then the human mind is assumed to be a law unto itself, and therefore its “experience” of freedom is taken to be ultimate. And logic we then assume to be resting on this supposedly ultimate human experience. It therefore never pretends to make any assertions about anything that is beyond itself, Kant would say, and to talk of God as eternal is meaningless since man is temporal and has no experience of eternity. Any God that exists must be subject to the same limitations to which man is subject. If He is not, Kant would argue, then He is unknown and unknowable to man, and devoid of significance for man.

The Second Session

When thus challenged, as it were, by the objector to leave the formal introductory atmosphere of generalities and come to a discussion of particulars, the representative of Thomas Aquinas was given the floor first of all. As senior member of the fraternity he was entitled to this priority.

Surely, Aquinas argued, a synthesis must be possible between the objector and ourselves as representatives of the Christian church, for God has created man in His image. Do we not all agree on this? Therefore the reason of man, given by God Himself, must be honored as able to speak the truth in its own field. Let us listen then to Aristotle, the greatest representative of reason that has ever lived. He did not find it contradictory to believe in God. In fact he said that it is reasonable to believe in a first unmoved mover as the cause of the universe. And yet he started from experience as autonomous when engaged in his philosophical research. But Aristotle could not deal otherwise than with “essences.” And theology deals with the personal God as One who is. So Moses must be added to Aristotle. Theology must teach man that the Christian religion is only above, not against, human experience and logic.

The whole problem of the relation between the supernatural truths of faith and the natural truths of reason can be solved with Aristotle’s idea of the analogy of being. Aristotle says there is one being, but God expresses the fulness of this being, and man expresses in a lower degree this same being. This idea of gradation or of potentiality developing into actuality solves all difficulties between God and man. It provides for the unity that reason requires (univocism) and it also provides for the diversity that the experience of freedom requires (equivocism).

How marvelously authority and reason seem to have been brought together here. Here the authority of the living voice of Christ and the reason of Aristotle seem to be in perfect unison with one another.

The objector was much pleased with this representative of the Christian church. He knew, if the sentiment expressed in this first speech of our conference of Christian theologians would prevail, that then the gospel would be made common to men.

Why should the objector object to singing the praise of being in general?

To sing the praise of being in general would be to sing the praise of man as well as the praise of God. It would be to substitute the idea of man's participation in God and God's participation in man for the idea of creation of man by God. Thus man would not need to live by the instruction of God except as God gave him advice about the laws of the universe. Thus the idea of authority—that of good advice, not that of absolute authority—would be extolled. Thus all grace would be common because God would also need the grace or good fortune of the world of Chance about Him. Here was the universalism the objector was looking for from the beginning. What was left of grace after the representative of Aquinas got through was nothing but the idea of the possibility of salvation, which possibility on Aquinas' scheme was not dependent exclusively on God after all, but also on Chance.

The Protestants agreed among themselves that it was somehow not right to join with the representative of Thomas Aquinas in his answer to the objector. With one accord they said that they must go to the Bible and not to the pope to get their instructions about the nature of the gospel and about answering the objector. Did not Protestantism recover the Bible, they asked. Are not all Protestants in agreement on this? Is not the Bible and what it teaches the end of all controversy?

The Conference Of All Protestant Theologians

It is disappointing indeed that no general Christian answer could be found to give to the objector. But such was the sad situation. There was such a basic difference between the Protestants and Roman Catholics as to the source of Christian doctrine that they could not tell the objector clearly what, in the light of Christianity, was the basic error of the objector's position.

Roman Catholicism has sought to combine the word of God and the word of man in the form of tradition as the rule of faith, said the Protestant theologians. How then can it indicate clearly what is wrong in the position of the objector, who took the word of man alone as the rule of faith, they asked.

So they met together in order to draw up an answer to the objector, and to show him that he needed the grace of God.

Again by the reason of seniority, the representative of Luther was first given the floor. He spoke in eloquent terms of the Scriptures as the word of God. "In terms of it alone, no matter what it teaches," he said, "we must interpret human experience. In it there is set forth, once for all, the system of truth by which men are to live."

In broad general lines he spoke of the contents of that system. He spoke of the triune God, sufficient to Himself from all eternity, causing the world to come into existence by an act of His will. He spoke of Adam and Eve in paradise and of how they were driven forth from the presence of God because they sinned against His express commandment. He spoke of men as sinners subject to the eternal wrath of God and headed for eternal doom because of their breaking of the law of God. He spoke of Christ who came into the world, who lived and died and rose from the dead. He said that those who believe in Christ should escape the wrath to come, and live forever in heaven in the presence of God and of their Savior.

At this point the representatives of Schleiermacher, Ritschl, and Barth simultaneously raised their hands asking for the floor. And when each of them in turn had spoken it appeared that there were two basically opposed conceptions of Scripture in the midst of this group of "Protestants."

They had agreed on the general statement that Scripture is the formal principle of Protestantism. But on the particulars as to how it is they disagreed. The three men mentioned stood over against the other three, the representatives of Luther, Calvin, and Arminius. The latter three said that the Bible is the direct revelation of God to man and as such contains a system of truth given once for all to men. The former three rebelled against this idea: they said that to hold such a position was worse than Romanism.

The idea of the Bible as a direct revelation of God to man and as therefore containing a system of truth by which man must live, they contended, was to reduce the personal relation between God and man to the impersonal system of law. It is, they argued, to explain the world deterministically in terms of causes, rather than personalistically in terms of reasons. The idea of cause is a mechanical idea. To be sure, science needs such ideas as cause. But then science deals, in the nature of the case, with the relations of things within the world. It cannot say anything about the relation of the world as a whole to God.

If men wish to speak of the relation of the world as a whole, or of man, to God they must give up using the concepts of the theoretical reason. For if they use these concepts dualism always results. Men must then, as Plato did, attribute what they call "good" to a good God back of the world, and what they call "evil" to an evil God back of the world. To avoid such dualism we must use the ideals of the practical reason and posit a God who is good, in whom the “good” and the “evil” of the theoretical reason are “somehow” united.

And, above all, to think of the Bible as containing a system of conceptually stated truth is to think of the atonement along legalistic lines. It is to think of God as giving men laws and of men as breaking these laws and being in consequence liable to eternal punishment. It is to think of the sufferings of Christ and His merits mechanically. Men are then said to have the merits of Christ attributed to them in some such way as money may be transferred legally from one person to another.

True Protestantism, the representatives of Schleiermacher, Ritschl, and Barth argued, must start with faith in Scripture as the revelation of God. But the God of this Scripture must Himself be a faith-construct. He must be conceived independently of the systems of thought devised by man’s philosophy, science, or even theology. He must be conceived as above the relative distinctions and differentiations of the human reason. He must therefore not be conceived as in any wise existing or as in any wise known otherwise than through Christ.

There must be no God in Himself, and no counsel of such a God according to which the course of the world is brought into existence and controlled.

There was therefore no original man, called Adam, who knew God and who broke the covenant that this God had made with him. Man, apart from his relationship to Christ, hovers on the verge of non-being. His reality consists in the fact that he is related to the Christ of whom the first Adam is but a sort of shadow.

Two things in particular these three men, the representatives of Schleiermacher, Ritschl, and Barth, wanted to stress as over against the position of Luther, Calvin, and Arminius. Both have to do with the centrality, and therefore the uniqueness, of the person and work of Christ. By enmeshing Jesus Christ in the realm of history as open to systematic interpretation by science, philosophy, or theology, the view of Luther, Calvin, and Arminius, they contended, virtually denied the very uniqueness of Christ that they were so anxious to maintain. The uniqueness and authority of Jesus Christ can be maintained, they argued, only if you introduce the notion of holy or primal history as over against secular or ordinary history. In holy history God is God for man and man is man for God through Jesus Christ. In holy history God is truly free, free to turn into the opposite of Himself, free to become identical with man. In holy history man is truly free for God, free to partake of the very attributes of God. Thus there is nothing that keeps God from freely choosing man, for the man He then chooses is Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ is the electing God and also the elected man. The object of the grace of God is God Himself in man.

In the second place these three men claimed that in stressing the centrality of the person of Jesus Christ they had released the full and all-encompassing love of God for all mankind. If one holds to the idea of the Bible as the direct revelation of God, containing a system of doctrine, they said, then one cannot escape the hard and fast dualism of some that are ultimately saved and of others that are ultimately lost. For on such a basis the love of God is not more ultimate than is the righteousness or justice of God. Therefore, on such a basis, there are those who are only the objects of the punishment of God and others who are only the objects of the love of God.

On the other hand, on the truly Christological basis of Schleiermacher, Ritschl, and Barth, they contended, the reprobation of men is always reprobation in Christ. Men cannot reject Christ unless they are in Christ. They cannot sin unless they are aware of their sins as forgiven in Christ. This point of view, they argued, and this alone, can furnish the foundation for the truly Protestant doctrine of eternal security. For here is security that lies deeply imbedded in the eternal love of God. In that love all men have been saved from all eternity. They participate from all eternity in the saving work of Christ. Every idea of God as arbitrarily choosing some to eternal life and of casting others into everlasting doom is thus done away. All men, to be men, must have been men in Christ from eternity. They must have partaken in the act of revelation of God which is identical with Christ. The subject dispensing the grace of God is man himself in God and with God.

In some such way as this the representatives of Schleiermacher, Ritschl, and Barth argued that they conceived of true Protestantism. They said that they had differences among themselves, and that they thought of these differences as important too. But they owned that their internal differences were as nothing in comparison with the great cleavage that separated them from Luther, Calvin, and Arminius.

For them Protestantism meant personal confrontation with God through Jesus Christ. And as long as one holds to the legalistic idea of the Bible as containing a system of truth one cannot meet God personally. Even the Romanist conception of the analogy of being, they contended, was not so impersonalistic as the orthodox Protestant doctrine of Scripture. If the representatives of Luther, Calvin, and Arminius really meant to be Protestants then why not join them in substituting the fully personal notion of the analogy of faith for the idea of a system of truth. Then they would be free from every attack on the part of science and they would have a fully personal relationship to God. They would then be able to answer the objector and yet hold to grace, even universal grace.

The Objector Again Rejoices

After the speeches of these representatives of Schleiermacher, Ritschl, and Barth, the objector was even more pleased than he had been when the representative of Thomas Aquinas had spoken. For he knew that this analogy of faith which these men were proposing as a substitute for the Romanist notion of the analogy of being was altogether in his favor. He knew that the philosophy of Kant, from which this purely “theological” idea of the analogy of faith had been taken, was even more hostile, if possible, to the Christian religion than was the philosophy of Aristotle on which the analogy of being was built. For it is of the essence of the analogy of faith, as proposed by these three men, the objector knew, that the ideas of God and man be thought of as correlative to one another. God is then nothing but what He is in relation to man through Christ, and man is nothing but what he is in relation to God through Christ. If the idea of correlativity between God and man was already involved in the analogy of being, it came to its full and final expression in the idea of the analogy of faith.

According to the analogy of faith, thought the objector to himself, God apart from Christ is wholly indeterminate. How could He then have any control over man? How could He mean anything to man? Man could make God in his own image. And according to it man, apart from Christ, is wholly indeterminate. How could he sin against God except he be already forgiven in Christ? In this way man can project for himself a God who regards all men, however much they may violate His supposed commandments, as His children still. Man would, in short, project a God who would save all men if He could (save them and Himself, that is) from the unfortunate circumstances of a somehow hostile universe.

The objector laughed to himself as he thought of this conference of all Protestant theologians. He saw in this conference the means by which the gospel of the grace of a sovereign God might be most effectively destroyed from the world. If he could only get the representatives of Luther, of Calvin, and of Arminius to agree with the other three, then the church of Christ itself, the very agency that alone was preaching the gospel of particularism, would have sold itself out to the idea of common grace, grace common to all men everywhere, grace for God as well as grace for man, grace for all gods and for all men in a universe of Chance.

A Conference Of All Orthodox Protestant Theologians

The representatives of Luther, of Calvin, and of Arminius realized that they could not go along with the other three in answering the objector. They began gradually to sense the fact that the other three would preach only such a grace as is common grace, such a grace as the natural man himself is quite willing to accept, a grace that involves no repentance from sin. If God and man are made interdependent or commonly dependent upon a common universe then there can be no grace of God for man.

It was to point out this fact that the representative of Calvin spoke. He intimated simply that so long as one holds to the idea of interdependence between God and man in any form there could be no mention of grace. We have to come back to the system of Scripture according to which man is wholly dependent upon God because he is a creature of God, and to the idea that whatever comes to pass is controlled by God, he said.

Good comments on the philosophy of chance & the law of contradiction:

The very idea of Scripture, he continued, would be meaningless unless it was the voice of such a God. How could we think of Scripture as the infallible and sovereign word of God if God Himself were no sovereign? How could the Scripture foretell the plan and purposes of God if He Himself were partly dependent upon forces outside Himself? It would be wholly devoid of meaning to say that God can predict what will happen if the universe is run by Chance.

“In particular,” he said, “we shall have to stress that the will of man and all of its actions are genuinely significant within and only within the plan of God. And this shows,” he said, “that our system of theology is a system based upon Scripture which is presupposed as being the word of God, and upon God who is presupposed as being the God of Scripture.” For we cannot “prove,” either deductively or inductively, or by the principle of coherence in the way that the objector would require, that man’s will is genuinely significant within the plan of God. For if we did try thus to prove it, then this will of man would have to be woven into the being of God. And therewith we should be back to the analogy of being of Romanism or to the analogy of faith of the modern Protestantism of the three gentlemen who have just left us. On the other hand, we cannot show by an appeal to experience that the will of man has genuine significance only in relation to the plan of God in the way that would satisfy the objector. For if we tried thus to satisfy the objector we would have to show that the plan of God is itself dependent upon the will of man and then there would be no plan of God in the biblical sense of the term. We need therefore to maintain that our system of truth which we set over against the idea of the analogy of being and over against the idea of analogy of faith is frankly based upon Scripture as the word of that God who controls whatsoever comes to pass.

“Yet we can show negatively that unless the objector will drop his objections and stand with us upon the Scriptures of God and hold with us to the God of the Scriptures there is no meaning to his experience. Thus the law of contradiction may be used negatively as a means by which the two mutually exclusive views of life may be set apart from-one another. Thus it may be shown that if this law is to be used in the way that the objector would use it, then this very law would have no application to anything. On the assumption of the ultimacy of human experience, as involved in the position of the objector, the universe is a universe of Chance. And in the universe of Chance, the law of contradiction has no fulcrum. It is then like a revolving door resting upon chance moving nothing into nothing except for the fact that it then cannot move.”

“When this has been shown to the objector, then it will appear objectively (whether he will accept it or not) that his own environment and his own heredity has all the while actually been controlled by the God of the Scriptures. Otherwise there wouldn’t be any world. That is to say, it then appears that all the facts of this world, including the facts of man’s own consciousness as well as the facts of his environment, must be seen in the covenantal perspective in which, as was pointed out, the Scriptures put them in order to exist at all. All the facts therefore speak to all men everywhere of the fact that God once spoke to mankind in general about their common creation and confrontation by God. All the facts speak of the one event that took place at the beginning of history and therefore of the fact that God was favorably disposed toward mankind and that He offered them eternal life on condition of love and obedience to Him with their whole hearts.”

“Operating in a vacuum” – good analogy:

It is thus, he argued, that the genuinely biblical idea of common grace to all mankind has its foundation at the beginning of history. It is thus also, he argued, that the genuine significance of the choice of the human individuals has its true foundation at the beginning of history. The two are interdependent. The choice of the individual man, Adam, was so overwhelmingly important that the eternal weal and woe of all men depended upon it. Such importance is nowhere else ascribed to the will of man. But such importance could be ascribed to the will of man only against the background of the fact that the sovereign God controlled whatsoever comes to pass. Without that background the will of man would have operated in a vacuum. It could have had no significance even for the individual himself, let alone for the whole of the human race.

“And how, without the all-controlling counsel of God,” he added, “could the consciousness of sin as it is found in every man, the consciousness of having broken the law of God, be seen for what it is? This consciousness can be seen for what it is, for what the Scriptures describe as being, only if seen in the light of the fact that God was originally favorable to mankind and that all mankind in Adam have turned against this favor of God given and offered to them.”

“And how could the fact that the environment of man is anything short of what corresponds with the internal deserts of man, as utterly wicked, be explained except for the fact that God still extends favor even upon those who deserve nothing but to be cast into eternal separation from Him? How could even the punishments of God by which men are kept from breaking forth into utter violence be fully seen for what they are except as evidence of the favor of God?”

“To be sure,” he continued, “this general or common grace is not common in every sense. God’s dealings with those who are to be in His presence and those who are to be finally driven forth from His presence is never wholly common, common without difference. From the beginning God’s favor was common only for the purpose of setting before man his task and his responsibility. Commonness was from the outset correlative to difference in one common plan of God. How much more then shall common grace to sinners imply the fact that it is for the purpose of placing men before a significant choice?”

Rain And Sunshine

“When God therefore gives His gifts to men, the gifts of rain and sunshine in season, these gifts are the means by which God’s challenge to man speaks forth. God’s challenge means that men are asked to love God their Creator and to repent of sin and ask Him for His forgiveness. In long-suffering patience God calls men to Himself through these gifts. If they are not so conceived, then these gifts are not conceived according to their function in the plan of God. To say that the facts of rain and sunshine in themselves do not tell us anything of God's grace is to say in effect that the world and what is therein does not speak forth the revelation of God. But how can any fact in this world be a fact and be the kind of fact it is, except as revelational of the will of God to man? A fact in this world is what it is according to the function that it has to perform in the plan of God. Every fact is its function. And therefore every fact contains, in conjunction with all other facts, the covenantal claims of God upon man. It is when seen as a part of this covenantal claim that the idea of common grace is seen for what it is. When the sinner does not turn to God because of the challenge that comes to him through all the facts of the universe, his punishment is thereby greatly increased.

Sidebar comment: So those who saw Jesus' miracles, though they may have not heard the gospel, their sin of not repenting was acerbated all the more, John 15: 24-25, ²⁴ If I had not done among them the works which no one else did, they would not have sin; but now they have both seen and hated Me and My Father as well. ²⁵ But they have done this to fulfill the word that is written in their Law, 'They hated Me without a cause.'

The fact that the unbeliever who eventually turns out to have been a reprobate adds to his punishment because of his misuse of the gifts of rain and sunshine about him is not a proof against the idea that these facts are the gift of God's favor to him. On the contrary it were impossible that his punishment should be increased by his manipulation of the facts about him unless these facts were evidence of the undeserved favor of God in relation to him. From the beginning all the facts surrounding any man in the entire course of history were set in the framework of the covenant that God made with man. If they are in any wise separated from the framework then they become subject to the manipulation of the false logical and experiential requirements of the apostate man."

Christ For The World

"By thus placing all the facts of man's environment in covenantal perspective, the meaning of God's so loving the world that He gave His only begotten Son that whosoever should believe in Him should not perish but have everlasting life, will be seen for its breadth of sweep and for its sovereign particularity. Christ is sent to the world of sinful men. He is sent to save sinners. These sinners will ultimately show themselves to have been either elect or reprobate. They will show themselves with clarity to have been either elect or reprobate in the fact of their acceptance or rejection of Christ if confronted by Him."

"Sinners are challenged as a class to accept Christ. They are challenged through Him to undertake the cultural task that all mankind was originally given to do through Adam. Not all sinners are thus challenged. There is a delimitation as to the area where Christ comes to men. There are many to whom this second challenge and call does not come. This delimitation is due to the sovereign pleasure of God. All men were confronted with the cultural task and with the promise of eternal life with God at the beginning of history. When all men rejected God and broke the covenant then God did not owe any of them a second call. To be sure, He kept calling all men to repentance through all the facts about and within men. But He did not put the way of life positively before all men a second time. Many were left in the misery into which they had cast themselves through their first disobedience and fall in Adam. Yet Christ came to sinners as a class. He did not come to those who were already designated by Him as reprobate or as elect. To this class of sinners to whom He speaks through the preaching of the gospel, God says that He would have them turn unto Him and after repentance undertake the task of making all things subservient to the coming of the kingdom of God in Christ.”

“The Apostle Paul tells us what God has in mind through the coming of Christ. Christ, he says, is the first born of every creature. By Him all things were created. By Him all things consist. It pleased the Father that in Him as the head of the body which is the church, all things in heaven and on earth should be reconciled to God.”

“It is in this program of God, it is in connection with this work of Christ by which the world that was cursed of God should be reconciled unto Him for the greater glory of God, that common grace must have a part. All things in history must serve this glorious consummation. Even Satan and all his hosts must through his defeat by Christ serve the purpose of glorifying God. If men do not accept the Christ but reject Him, if perhaps they crucify the Son of God afresh, they have thereby shown sin to be exceeding sinful. Twice over, once in Adam and again in direct relation to Christ, they have refused to undertake under God, and for God, the performance of their cultural task. Twice over they have joined Satan in seeking to ruin the ultimate plan of God. Twice over they will be shown to have been defeated in their purpose. God will attain His purpose in spite of their rejection of Him both in relation to the first and in relation to the second Adam.”

Man’s Response To The Gifts Of God

“However, God not only gives good gifts to men in general, He not only calls men with the good news of the gospel to a renewed acceptance of their original task, He also restrains the wrath of man. He keeps the negative, and therefore destructive, force of sin from breaking out in the fulness of its powers. All men everywhere are kept from working out self-consciously their own adopted principle as covenant-breakers and as the children of wrath. But none of them have reached maturity in sinning. If they had there would be no opportunity left for them to be frustrated in their evil efforts.”

“For those who reject the Christ and those who have never heard of Christ, but who have sinned in Adam, are still laborers, even though unwillingly, in the cultural task of man. Being slaves to sin they are also partners in the defeat of Satan, unwilling slaves of God and His Christ. In spite of Satan’s best efforts his followers are found to be contributors to the great edifice that is built by God through Him who is the first born of every creature. All the skills of those who are artificers in iron and brass, all the artistry of painters and sculptors and poets, are at the service of those who, under Christ, are anew undertaking the cultural task that God in the beginning gave to man.”

The Recipients Of Saving Grace

“In contrast with those who are slaves of sin and Satan, but who have to be unwilling workers in the performance of the cultural task of mankind, there are those who by the regenerating power of the Holy Spirit have been made alive from the dead. They are those who have by the power of God believed in Christ as their substitute. They are now through Him no longer subject to the wrath to come. They are now through Him the heirs of eternal life. To them the promise that God had made to mankind, the promise of eternal life in fulness of a glorified earth and heaven, shall be fulfilled. With great enthusiasm they therefore undertake the cultural task of mankind. It is they who build the temple of the Lord in accord with the vision showed to them on the mount. The gifts of rain and sunshine they use in self-conscious subordination to their one great plan of accomplishing the cultural task that God has given to man. The master plan of their lives is therefore radically diverse from the master plan of those that are still covenant breakers. There is no common enterprise between covenant keepers and covenant breakers. That is to say there is no community project in which there is no difference of purpose. The covenant keepers are in control of the situation. They are in control of the situation because they are servants of Christ. This is true even when their enemies may for the moment seem to be the lords of creation. It is the meek who shall inherit the earth. The earth and the fulness thereof belong to the Lord and to those to whom in His sovereign grace He gives it. To them therefore belong all the common gifts of God to mankind. Yet that it may be the earth and the fulness thereof that is developed, the covenant keepers will make use of the works of the covenant breakers which these have been able and compelled to perform in spite of themselves. As Solomon used the cedars of Lebanon, the products of the rain and the sunshine that had come to the covenant breakers, and as he used the skill of these very covenant breakers for the building of the temple of God, so also those who through the Spirit of God have believed in Christ may and must use all the gifts of all men everywhere in order by means of them to perform the cultural task of mankind.

“How beautifully,” the representative of Calvin said, “all things thus fit together according to the plan of God. Though the system that we thus construct is still, as noted before, only an analogical system, and it is therefore true only to the extent that it actually re-expresses the revelation of the word of God, yet we can see something of the symmetry of the truth of God. And we can see how radically different the system of Scripture is from the system of the objector. Both systems have in them an aspect of particularity and an aspect of universality. The system of the objector, and of the modern Protestant, has such universality as involves the identity of God and man. It has common grace which is common, but which is not grace. At the same time this system has such particularity as to destroy the very idea of unity or systematic coherence altogether. It has common grace which comes to such as have nothing in common because they live in total isolation.”

“In contrast with such a system we as believers in the word of God and in the God of the word presuppose this word and this God. We therefore presuppose the internal and eternal harmony between unity and diversity which lives within this internally self-complete God. It is on the basis of the presupposition of this God and of this word of God that there is both genuine individuality and genuine universality in the created world. Only on the basis of this presupposition can unity and individuality stand in relationship with one another without destroying one another. When we stress the commonness of the cultural task given to man, when we stress the commonness of the curse of God on man, the commonness of the non-saving grace of God to man, the commonness of the offer of the gospel to men, the commonness of all those who by birth are in the covenant of saving grace that God has made with believers and their seed, this commonness does not in the least tend to reduce the genuine significance of the particular. On the contrary, this commonness is required in order that the process of particularization may be accomplished.”

“The commonness is one of the two indispensable factors of the covenant which God has made with mankind. The other factor is the genuineness of the choice of man. And through the two factors operating in dependence upon one another God accomplishes His one great purpose of glorifying Himself through the deeds of men. It is His all-encompassing plan in relationship to which and within which the course of history in its process of differentiation takes place. The choices of men therefore take place and have their significance in relation to the task that God has assigned to mankind as a whole. These choices are either an acceptance or a rejection of the responsibility of performing this task. But both the acceptance and the rejection take place in relation to the same task. And there would be no such thing as a common task in relationship to which the choices of men could have their genuine meaning unless there were one plan of God according to which all things come to pass. On the objector’s basis there would be no true commonness in history.

“On the other hand there would be no truly significant choices of men, either by way of accepting or by way of rejecting the common task of mankind unless these choices are themselves subordinate to the one plan of God. There would be nothing in relationship to which human choice could take place if it were not for the common plan of God back of all things, and if it were not for the common task that God according to this one plan has set for men. Without this all things would be indeterminate. There would be and could be no culture, no civilization, no history.” [all this requires deep thought on this subject of man’s free will, vs. man being just a puppet on a string. Man’s will is creaturely, not as free as he thinks; it is not autonomous; it is derivative! Arminians assign some degree of autonomy to the will of man.]

“Thus then we return to the particularism of the gospel, that was so greatly stressed in the other lectures. It is not to tone down this particularism but rather to support it and to show it in the breadth of its significance and in the depth of its foundation that we dealt with common grace.”

“There is first the self-contained, eternally self-sufficient God. By His sovereign will this God created one world and through His providence He controls and leads this world to the end for which He has created it. At the beginning of the history of this world He created one human pair from whom all men were to spring. And through the first man, Adam, He dealt conditionally with the whole human race. Through Adam He confronted the entire human race with one cultural task. It was in relationship to this one task that Adam, representing all men, made his choice. His choice was therefore significant not in spite of, but because of, the fact that it took place in precisely such a situation and in such circumstances. What seemed to the objector to be determinism thus turns out to be the very condition for freedom and significant choice. If there was to be determinate experience for man it could not take place in a vacuum. It could take place only in relationship to the principle of unity back of all history, namely, the counsel of God, and in relation to the principle of unity within history, namely, the common cultural task set before man.”

“And so down through the ages each time the will of man is asked to function it functions in relation to the original cultural task that was given to mankind as a whole. For that cultural task continues to speak through every fact of man’s environment. It speaks always to all men. It speaks more narrowly and more intensely to those to whom the gospel of saving grace is offered. It speaks still more narrowly and still more intensely to those who are born within the sphere of the covenant of saving grace. And as man’s response to the original challenge was ultimately in the hands of the sovereign God and plan, so the acceptance or rejection of this task by men still rests upon the sovereign will of God. It is God that wills man to will and to do what is required of him.”

“Thus the common task, the common curse, the common grace, the common call to the gospel, and a common participation in the promises of the covenant of grace are the background in relationship to which man’s original disobedience, his continued rejection of God in the face of the facts within and about him, his rejection of Christ when called to Christ, and his breaking of the covenant have their significance. And thus a true biblical commonness is seen to be involved in a true particularism of the gospel of God.”

The Lutheran And The Arminian Leave

At this point in the long address of the representative of Calvin those who stood for the views of Lutheranism and Arminianism raised their voices in protest. For a while it had seemed to them that things were not going so badly. But then when it appeared that only such a commonness was to be allowed as would fit within ultimate particularism of the gospel, they could keep silent no longer.

Even though it was clearly shown to them that unless one held to such a concept of commonness as is correlative to, and therefore necessarily implied in, particularism, he will be carried on to commonness without difference and to difference without commonness: they were not satisfied. Said the representative of Luther: "Calvinism emphasizes the sovereignty of God in such a one-sided manner that the countenance of grace is virtually obliterated." Modern Calvinists teach with Calvin that "the purpose of the written Word is not to lead all men to faith and salvation, but to harden the hearts of the majority of the hearers." "But over against the idea of the sovereignty of God, in which we too believe, we must place the counterbalancing notion of man's freedom. We must therefore say that God intends to save all men through Christ and that Christ died for the purpose of saving all men. Particularism, in whatever form it appears, is founded not on the Word of God, but on human speculation as to the will and work of God." "But we know that though God in Christ intends to save all men, God's purpose is not accomplished in a part of mankind (Jn 3.18: 'He that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God')."

The representative of Arminius agreed with this position. He spoke of it as a balanced position, a position in which justice was done to both God and man. Both the Lutheran and the Arminian were sure that when such a position was presented to the objector it might be expected that he would drop his objections and accept Christianity for himself. For the objector, they argued, was after all a reasonable person, and a "reasonable person" cannot refuse to admit that the Scriptures are the word of God, and that what they teach is true.

Meanwhile, the objector was again rejoicing. He had been very sad when the representative of Calvin had spoken. He realized much better than the Lutheran and the Arminian did that grace is no more grace if God who must give the grace must Himself be dependent on man, and that the freedom of man is no longer freedom when it is cut loose from the plan of God as the only atmosphere in which it can function. The Lutheran and the Arminian did not want particularism. For it they substituted a common grace by which Christ died for all men with the intention of saving them all. But on this basis God's purpose may be and is foiled by men.

On this basis God Himself is involved in the realm of possibility: how then can He even make salvation possible for any one man, let alone making it possible for all men? If God is not the source of possibility then He cannot make salvation possible for men: and if He is the source of possibility then He is the source because He is in control of all actuality.

The objector was glad when he saw that the Lutheran and the Arminian were once more following the road of the analogy of being of Romanism and of the analogy of faith idea of modern Protestantism. To be sure, he realized that they were doing it inadvertently. He realized that they meant to hold to the grace of God. He realized that they did not want to obliterate the difference between the being of God and the being of man as is done in part in the Romanist and completely in the modern positions. None the less he rejoiced when he saw that the Arminian and the Lutheran were willing to introduce such a notion of common grace as tended to turn into the same destruction of grace as is involved in the Romanist and especially in the modernist Protestant views. The Lutheran and Arminian types of universalism, according to which a finite God does the best He can to save men, by making it possible, so far as He can, that they should be saved has in it a tendency toward the identification of God and man. And having in it this tendency toward the identification of God and man it at the same time has in it a tendency that leads to the destruction of the significance of the will of man.

The objector realized all this. And so at last he was left alone with the representative of Calvin.

Only in the Reformed faith is there true commonness and true particularism. The particularism of Calvin's view cannot possibly be supplemented with the universalism of the Lutheran and Arminian view. Each system has its own particularism and its own universalism. The particularism of the Reformed faith requires a universalism that is based upon the Creator-creature distinction. [see codeCC1] The particularism of the system of the objector requires a universalism in which there is no difference between God and man. The same must be said of the particularism of the modern Protestantism of Schleiermacher, Ritschl, and Barth. Romanist theology seeks to occupy middle ground between Christianity and paganism. Then as to orthodox Protestant theology it is in the Lutheran and in the Arminian systems that there is some measure of non-Christian universalism or commonness, in the idea of Christ dying for all men and making salvation possible for all men. Here God is supposed to have the same attitude toward all men without difference. But the price the Lutheran and the Arminian pay for this identity of attitude is that of God's almighty and all-comprehensive control of all things. If the particularism of the Lutheran and the Arminian view is to be maintained, then God has to limit Himself when He creates man with a full will of his own. And so when God gave His commandments to men He was not asking them to react to a situation over which He had full control. He was really only able to give them good advice as to how best to get along in the universe. So man's will, in disobeying the law, was not really disobeying the law of God but making an exception to the orderly course of the universe. Therefore God could not make possible the salvation of man; He did not control the universe; He could do His best in the situation, but the situation was not fully under His control.

Realizing all this the objector was finally compelled to face the choice between his own position and that of Scripture and the God of Scripture. Neither the Lutheran nor the Arminian was willing or able, according to his adopted principles, squarely to challenge the unbeliever and give him a reason why he should change his position. The difference between the Christian and the non-Christian position could not be and was not clearly and fully made out except by Calvin. But at last it appeared that if there is to be true challenge of the natural man by the gospel of the sovereign God then the particularism of this gospel must be supported by a commonness of the call of God to all men everywhere. Common grace must support special or saving grace; saving or special grace cannot be adequately presented except in relationship to and in connection with common grace. Together they form the covenant framework in which the sovereign God deals with man.

Chapter Five Common Grace And Witness-Bearing

Pg 126 –

“Ye are my witnesses,” said Jehovah God to Israel through the mouth of His prophet Isaiah. “This people have I formed for myself; they shall show forth my praise” (Is 43.21). In those words is summed up the whole task of the people of God in this world.

The New Testament through Peter tells us the same: “But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light” (1 Pt 2.9).

We Witness To The Unbeliever

If God’s people must bear witness of God, how did they come to be equipped for this task.’? The answer is that they have been “formed” by God for this purpose. They have not chosen this task. They have been chosen for it. They were not of themselves ready to obey when called to this task. Their hearts too were “deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked ... ” They were of a piece with those who walk “in the vanity of their mind, having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart; who being past feeling have given themselves over to lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness” (Eph 4:17–19).

From this vain conversation received by tradition from their fathers, they have been redeemed “with the precious blood of Christ.” And this Christ was Himself “foreordained before the foundation of the world” for this task of redeeming His people (1 Pt 1:20). So they are “chosen in him before the foundation of the world.”

The Unbeliever Challenges Our Witness

The Christ chosen to redeem them and they chosen to be redeemed by Christ! “What a neat little circle,” someone will say. Your Christ Came to save only you, your own little group of Calvinists, or at best your own group of Fundamentalists. Is that to the praise of the glory of His grace? Your Christ died for the elect only; is your witnessing for God limited to telling the world this fact? Why should the world be interested in such news as that? Have you no message of salvation for the world? Will you simply tell men that they are reprobate? Will you tell them that God intends to send them to perdition regardless of what they do? A “peculiar people!” Indeed you are. You have a God who “appoints” men to eternal death or “elects” them to eternal life irrespective of their good or evil deeds. I dare you to preach on Jn 3.16 (Jn 3:16). You are morally a Pharisee if you say that “whosoever will” may come. You have no love for men in your hearts. Or if you have, then you flatly contradict yourself. You say that whosoever will may come but you know that they cannot will to come. You ought to try preaching in a cemetery and see what results you have.

Notes on the image of God:

Seeking to satisfy this objector you assure him that God does not deal with men as with sticks and stones. According to our doctrine, you tell him: Man has lost, through Adam the first man, true knowledge, righteousness, and holiness which he originally had. He has lost what we call the image of God in the narrower sense. But he has not lost his rationality, his sense of moral responsibility and ability to will freely according to his nature. Man’s freedom and the contingency of second causes, you tell him, are not taken away by the idea of election.

But the objector is not satisfied. He asks: “Do you not hold that even Adam, though created with this true knowledge, righteousness, and holiness, had to sin? Was not the idea of his fall a part of the plan of God? Was not the Christ who should redeem your sinners chosen for that very purpose before the foundation of the world? And yet your Christ came only because of sin did He not? So in order that you might be redeemed in Him from sin unto good works, your God must have planned that you should be sinners. Is that not true?”

...Perhaps you will hesitate for a moment here. You know that sinners are dead and unable to come to life. You know that according to Scripture man is ethically bound to sin. He has no ethical free will by which, of himself, to accept the gospel offered him. So you say that the case of Adam was different? Adam was free not to sin and free to sin? Is it not because of his abusing this freedom that the slavery of sin has come upon all men? Yet you know that it was in accord with God’s counsel that Adam should sin.

Try as you may, you soon discover that you cannot present your position without seeming to the man to whom you are speaking to be contradicting yourself. And try as you may to avoid it, you find that in answering the seemingly limited objection of your inquirer with respect to the matter of salvation in Christ, you must bring into the picture the whole idea of the plan of God controlling all things of history and the place of man as a moral and rational creature in this plan. If you do not see this yourself, your questioner will soon force you to see it. He will push you back, from the question of Christ dying for the elect only and yet being preached to all men, to the idea of this Christ as the Son of God, and the Logos, the Creator of the world, and the sustainer of it. He will say that if Christ is Himself

God and if, with the Father and the Holy Spirit, He has from all eternity determined whatsoever comes to pass (thus determining that only some men shall be saved), then His weeping over Jerusalem, and His bidding all that are weary and heavy laden to come to Him, is but a farce and a sham. [\[all apparent contradictions to unbelievers, but all made harmonious by a due knowledge of God and by eyes of faith in due exercise.\]](#) It is ethically reprehensible for Jesus to call man to Himself, if from all eternity He has determined that they shall reject Him. He may perform miracles before them in order to prove His divinity and in order to have them believe His message and yet He is also responsible for the words: “But though he had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on him: That the saying of Esaias the prophet might be fulfilled, which he spake, Lord, who hath believed our report? and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed? Therefore they could not believe, because that Esaias said again, He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart; that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them” (Jn 12:37–40). Christ performs miracles before their eyes so that they might believe, and yet He hath blinded their eyes and hardened their hearts so that they cannot believe. Is not that the plainest contradiction? the objector will say.

And then there is the point of the cosmic significance of Christ. Christ died to save only the elect, and yet Christ died “that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth” (Eph 1:10). “For it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell; and, having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things on earth, or things in heaven” (Col 1:19–20). So your Christ came to save the “world” yet not to save us. Do we not count for anything? Are we not part of the world? Or are you better than we?

Such then is the nature of the objection to the message of Christianity that, as Christians, holding to the Reformed faith, we are bound to meet. Your Christianity, the objector says, insults the intrinsic value and right of human personality. Your Christianity reduces man to the level of the machine. The God of Christianity is an arbitrary being, electing or rejecting men as He pleases apart from the actual merits of men. Even the Christ you offer, men say, contradicts Himself when He offers Himself to all sinners, since He as God intends to save only some of them.

Humility In Our Reply

Now what shall we say by way of response to this charge? In the first place we shall, of course, remember that all that we have received has been by grace. And if those who hold the Reformed faith do greater justice to the idea of God’s grace in the salvation of sinners, then they ought to be the humblest of all men. They ought to enter most sympathetically into the mind and heart of him who makes this objection. Did they not themselves kick against the pricks and rebel against the overtures of God’s grace?

And this attitude of humility holds over against those who with him name the name of Christ, as well as over against the unbeliever. With Bavinck let us say that all true Christians are at heart Augustinian and with Warfield let us say that every Christian who calls out unto God in anguish of heart is really a Calvinist.

Nay But—O Man

But if we must follow the examples of Augustine and Calvin on the point of humility, shall we not also follow them when, in answer to the objector, they quoted Paul saying: “Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus” (Rom 9:20)? Submit yourself to God. Then you shall be saved and your works shall follow after you. If not, you will be lost and the profit of your labor will be given to the meek who shall inherit the earth.

That is the central point of our witness unto men. In the pride of their hearts, they worship and serve the creature, that is, themselves, more than the Creator. The natural man must be challenged in this, his assumed autonomy. He must be compelled to look into the face of God.

General Revelation—All Know God

Men must be told that the revelation of God round about them and the revelation of God within their own constitution is clear and plain, rendering them without excuse. “For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse, because that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened” (Rom 1:20–21).

All men know God. Every fact of the universe has God’s stamp of ownership indelibly and with large letters engraved upon it.

All men know not merely that a God exists, but they know that God, the true God, the only God, exists. They cannot be conscious of themselves, says Calvin, except they be at the same time conscious of God as their creator. This general revelation of God stays with man whatever his attitude toward God may be. When he sins against God, he must sin against this God whom he knows. Otherwise sin would be sin in a vacuum. Even in the hereafter, the lost and the evil angels still know God.

Sidebar comment regarding the reference to a vacuum: *So those who saw Jesus’ miracles, though they may have not heard the gospel, yet they knowing there is a God, etc., Romans 1, their not repenting of their sin was acerbated all the more, John 15: 24-25, ²⁴ If I had not done among them the works which no one else did, they would not have sin; but now they have both seen and hated Me and My Father as well. ²⁵ But they have done this to fulfill the word that is* written in their Law, 'They hated Me without a cause.' There has to be a point of reference from which man strays, hence he sins. That point of reference is God's law or a non-conformity to God, hence, the presupposition that there is a God to whom we must give account. Without that, all is relative.

None Know God

Yet these same men to whom we must testify that they know God, must also be told that they do not know God. They walk in the midst of this world which is an exhibition house of the glories and splendors of God, full as it is of the works of his hands, and they ask, mind you, whether God exists. They profess to be open-minded on the question. They say that they will follow the facts wherever these may lead them. But invariably they refuse to follow these facts. They constantly conclude that God does not exist. Even when they conclude that a god exists and that with great probability, they are virtually saying that God does not exist. For the true God is not surrounded by, but is the source of possibility. He could not possibly not exist. We cannot intelligently think away God's existence.

When working in the laboratory as scientists, men act as though they are not dealing with materials that belong to God. They are like a thief who, entering into your home and exploring all kinds of things within it, claims that the question of the ownership of the house is of no concern to him. They are like those who go hunting in a woods clearly marked "No Gunning," without a permit from the owner.

How absurd, says the objector. Do you mean to say that men really know that they are creatures of God, and that there is punishment awaiting them if they are not thankful and obedient to Him and yet pretend to be looking for Him if haply they may find Him? Do they know God and yet not know Him? How contradictory, how utterly absurd is this religion which you are asking me to believe. Your Bible is full of contradiction. It says that man is made in the image of God, with freedom to choose for or against God. Yet you say that man has no freedom; he simply must do what his God has determined shall be done. You say that by virtue of man's creation in the image of God, he knows God, and at the same time you say that these image bearers interpret all things amiss since they do not know God. The answer is again: "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?" If you do not accept this God, you are like a man swinging his arms in a vacuum.

God's Attitude

Once more: Not only do all facts reveal God but they, in revealing Him, manifest His attitude toward men. God is love. He loves Himself above all else. He loved Himself from all eternity when He had as yet made no creatures to love. But when He made creatures, He made them lovable like Himself. He loved them because in loving them, He loved Himself above all else. He made man perfect. And loving mankind, He offered them eternal life. It was seriously meant. It was no farce. All men disobeyed God.

All came under His wrath and curse. God continued to love Himself; He therefore had to punish every insult to His holiness.

The Common Curse

To be sure, He had from all eternity chosen for Himself a people in Christ and He had from all eternity chosen Christ to redeem a people for Himself. Yet when those who are the elect of God, together with all men, were disobedient to God, they were under His wrath. So real was this wrath and so serious the threat of eternal punishment, that, if they were to be saved Christ had to be punished in their stead.

Those then whom God loved with an everlasting love, He at the same time regards as objects of wrath because of their sin.

How absurd, says the objector! How contradictory! Your witness for Christianity makes no sense to a self-respecting, intelligent person.

The objector has the same objection all the time. It is to the effect that we are insulting the dignity of human personality. We are running roughshod over his moral sensibilities and over the legitimate claims of his power of reason. Is he to be asked to believe that human personality is thus absolutely determined by the creation and the all controlling providence of God?

Law Written In Hearts (Rom 2.14–15) (Rom 2:14–15)

To add insult to injury, the Bible tells us that all men as they know God, in that knowledge know the difference between good and evil. The requirement of God comes clearly home to the consciousness of man. In this sense the law of God is written in his heart. For every fact in revealing God requires man to use it to the glory of God. If the world is the Lord's and the fulness thereof then God wants man to own His sovereign sway over all things. He wants him not to act at any point as though he did not need to recognize God's ownership.

Law Not Written

At the same time the Bible says to these men that they do not have the law of God written in their hearts. According to the promise of God to Jeremiah (Jer 31:31) He will write His law upon the hearts of His people. Then they will be able to say: "O, how love I thy law." Man the sinner is told that he cannot know the truth and cannot love righteousness. Sinners are said to have their understanding darkened and to be enemies of God at the same time that they are told that they do know God and that they have the knowledge of right and wrong. And each time, the natural man is challenged to forsake his own judgment and submit to the judgment of God as He speaks in Scripture.

Common Grace

But what, you ask, does the question of Common Grace have to do with all this? Most of you will anticipate the reply. In the question of common grace there confronts us the same sort of situation that we have with respect to all other teaching of Scripture. Common grace presents us with a teaching that seems to contradict other teaching of Scripture.

Let us take the first and main point of the pronouncement made by the Synod of the Christian Reformed Church in 1924. In this first point mention is made of a favorable attitude of God to mankind as a whole, without distinction between elect and reprobate. As God was favorably disposed to the human race before the fall and offered the race as a whole eternal life, so even after the fall God gives His good gifts to men everywhere, thereby calling them to repentance and to performance of their task. The Christian view of God in relation to man must always begin, as Berkhouwer has emphasized, from this idea that God at the beginning of history was favorably disposed to mankind. And then in amazement we note that even after the fall, when mankind as a whole has become the object of His wrath, God still continues to give good gifts unto men, and by these gifts He calls them to repentance. "Or despiseth thou the riches of his goodness and forbearance and long-suffering; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee, (that is, is calculated to lead thee) to repentance" (Rom 2:4)?

Now how can this universal call to repentance be harmonized logically with the doctrine of election? God did not intend that all men should repent. Instead He intended from all eternity that some should not repent. How could they repent unless they heard the gospel of salvation through Christ? And to many millions of men this gospel was never offered. Many never heard of that only name by which they must be saved; and that is surely God's doing. The church is, no doubt, at fault if it is not zealous in its missionary enterprise. Ultimately, however, it was God's doing that millions of men lived in the darkness of heathendom and never heard the word of life.

But you say: "Paul does not assert that they were called to repentance in the sense that those who are confronted with the gospel are called to repentance unto eternal life." Even so the problem remains: How can God have an attitude of favor unto those men whom He so obviously has not included in the number that could possibly be saved through the gospel of the blood of Jesus Christ?

Well, the answer is that we cannot comprehend how it is possible, but the Scriptures reveal it to be true. [And that's where the mystery is understood and by faith, adored, but not comprehended!] And so we must learn to say to ourselves and to take seriously the words that, in following Paul, we say to the unbelievers: "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?"

And what does this mean for us as Christians of the Reformed faith?

Not What It Means To Barth

In the first place it means that we cannot join Karl Barth in reducing God as He is in Himself to a relation that He sustains to His people in the world. Barth virtually seeks to meet the objector's charge that Christianity involves a basic contradiction by rejecting the idea of God as He is in Himself and of God's counsel as controlling all things in the world. He says that Calvin's doctrine of God's counsel must be completely rejected. Only when it is rejected, is the grace of God permitted to flow freely upon mankind. And that means that God's love envelops all men. To be sure, for Barth there is reprobation but it is reprobation in Christ. The final word of God for all men, says Barth, is Yes. It matters not that men have not heard of the gospel of Jesus of Nazareth. For Jesus of Nazareth is not, as such, the Christ. All men are as men, of necessity in Christ. All grace is universal or common grace. From the historic Christian point of view this is simply to say that the concept of grace is so widened as no longer to be grace at all. How truly Herman Bavinck anticipated, as it were, this most heretical of heresies of our day when he pointed out that in the last analysis one must make his choice between Pelagius and Augustine. The grace of God as Barth presents it is no longer distinguishable from the natural powers of man. All men to be men, says Barth, must have been saved and glorified from all eternity in Christ.

This is how Barth would meet the objection against the idea of the sovereign grace of God. There is no longer any sovereign God and therefore there is no longer any grace.

Common Grace According To Romanism

This is key to understanding how heresy comes about

In the second place there are the Roman Catholics. To be sure, they have not gone to the extremes of Barth or modern liberal Protestantism. They have not wholly reduced the being of God to a relationship to mankind. They have not, in modern Kantian style, made of God a projection into the void. Even so, they have no sovereign God. Their God does not control whatsoever comes to pass. For in their view man has ultimate freedom to set at naught the purposes of God. God, therefore, cannot reach the individual directly and determine his will and destiny. God can only reach toward the individual by means of classes.

God cannot, on the Romanist view, unmistakably make His imprint of ownership upon man. The image of God in man does not reach down into the penetralium of the consciousness of the individual. If it did, the Romanist holds, man would lose his freedom. For freedom, in the Romanist sense of the term, means a bit of ultimacy or autonomy; a sharing in the freedom of God. The idea of man's participation in the being of God or his participation with God in a common being, precludes the idea of man's being truly made in the image of God.

It follows from this that Romanist theology speaks of Adam as being originally in need of grace. Man then needs grace because he is finite. Accordingly, after man fell into sin he needed the same grace, but still only the same grace. Thus, the concept of nature and grace takes the place of sin and grace. And the meaning of both sin and grace is thereby changed.

Thus, once more the attempt is made to satisfy the objection against the sovereign grace of God and His electing sovereign power, by reducing the difference between special and common grace.

It is then not necessary to say: “Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?” For the idea of grace is largely made over to his taste. And though very vague on the subject Romanist theology therefore, like Barthianism and liberal Protestantism, holds that man’s being lost is ultimately determined by man himself. Man is lost, Roman Catholic theologians often say, because he has not lived up to the light of nature that God has given him. And so the light that God gave unto the heathen for their conversion was really meant for their eternal salvation. And it is only because by their sins they live out of accord with that light, that God gives them over to eternal death. Thus it is again man, not God, who ultimately decides his eternal destiny. And thus the problem of “contradiction” is solved by removing one of the horns of the dilemma.

Common Grace According To The Remonstrants

Then thirdly come the Remonstrants or Arminians, who teach that “there are various kinds of election of God unto eternal life: the one general and indefinite, the other particular and definite; and that the latter in turn is either incomplete, revocable, non-decisive, and conditional, or complete, irrevocable, decisive, and absolute. Likewise: there is one election unto faith and another unto salvation, so that election can be unto justifying faith, without being a decisive election unto salvation.”

The central point of these words and similar ones from the Five Articles Against the Remonstrants is that the final determination of the destiny of individual men is still left in the hands of men instead of in the hands of God. [again, man tends to defend his autonomy] Again God cannot reach the individual except through a general invitation. God may begin the process of salvation by offering general grace to all. But this must mean that God in a general way intends to save all. No answer is given to the question that if God intends to save all men, why did He not make salvation known to all through the spreading of the gospel news? There is reference to the idea that they have not used the light of nature aright and thus have made themselves unworthy of the better news of the gospel.

But again, on this basis, the answer to the objector against the sovereign grace of God is not voiced in the words: “Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?”

It is not till we assert that the ultimate destiny of all men everywhere, and therefore of each man individually is, in the last analysis, determined by God, that the problem of common grace comes clearly before us. For only when it is seen that according to Scripture God controls all of history and all the deeds of all men, evil deeds as well as good deeds, that the question is squarely before us as to how then God can have any attitude of favor to those whom He has from all eternity intended not to redeem.

Reprobation Must Rest On The Will Of God

We, therefore, cannot avoid taking note of a point of view sometimes advocated by those who are committed to the Reformed faith. I refer to the idea that reprobation rests ultimately upon the sin of man as the final cause. Reprobation is then said to be an act of punishment of God upon sin as committed by man. In this respect reprobation is said to differ from election. Election is said to proceed from God's eternal plan directly. But reprobation is not thus directly an act of the eternal plan of God. Reprobation is thus said not to be equally ultimate with election.

But surely, it is apparent that such a point of view leads us off the highway of the Reformed faith and tones down our witness to the world. The world needs the sovereign God of Scripture. Hence we must say that reprobation is not ultimately an act of justice with respect to the sin of man. It is rather an act of the sovereign will of God. The fully Biblical, and therefore fully Reformed, position is not reached till God in His sovereign decree is made the ultimate cause of all that comes to pass in this world through the deeds of men, whether these deeds lead to their final destruction or by God's grace to their final glory. Hence, too, we dare not say that Adam could, in the last analysis, have chosen to be obedient just as well as disobedient. The fall of man is the proximate cause of reprobation (propinqua reprobationis causa). But, says Bavinck, and again: "For that reason the fall of Adam, sin in general and all evil, is not only seen in advance but also in a sense willed and directed by God. There must therefore be, though hidden from us, a reason why God willed the fall: There is an altius Dei consilium which precedes the fall." Once more: There is but one and that an all-comprehensive plan of God.

Quite properly Bavinck refers in this connection to the reply that Calvin gave to Pighius when the latter objected to the counsel of God as the final source of the determination of the destinies of all men. In dealing with the 9th chapter of Romans and, therefore, with the difference between Esau and Jacob, Calvin says:

"Now if this 'afore prepared unto glory' is peculiar and special to the elect, it evidently follows that the rest, the non-elect, were equally 'fitted to destruction' because, being left to their own nature, they were thereby devoted already to certain destruction. That they were 'fitted to destruction' by their own wickedness is an idea so silly that it needs no notice. It is indeed true that the wicked procure to themselves the Wrath of God, and that they daily hasten on the falling of its own weight upon their heads. But it must be confessed by all, that the apostle is here treating of the difference made between the elect and the reprobate, which proceeds from the alone secret will and counsel of God."

Then Calvin goes on to treat of the passage from Isaiah already quoted, in which he speaks of the blinding of man's eyes. He points out how utterly destructive of the idea of the sovereign grace of God it would be if anything that is done by men is made the ultimate or final cause of their destiny. All men were corrupted in their nature by the fall of Adam. If this their corruption were the ultimate cause of their reprobation then God Himself would be confounded when seeking to save men. For all would then be bound to be reprobate. "If the wickedness of man be still urged as the cause of the difference between the elect and the non-elect, this wickedness might indeed be made to appear more powerful than the grace of God which He shows toward His elect, if that solemn truth did not stand in the way of such an argument: 'I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy.' "

Of the words of John, who also quotes the passage from Isaiah, Calvin says: "Now, most certainly, John does not here give us to understand that the Jews were prevented from believing by their sinfulness. For though this be quite true in one sense, yet the cause of their not believing must be traced to a far higher source. The secret and eternal counsel of God must be viewed as the original cause of their blindness and unbelief." 6

Proximate And Ultimate Cause

In answer to all objections made by those who seek the ultimate issues of life and death in man, Calvin distinguishes between proximate and ultimate causes. Man is the proximate and responsible cause of his eternal punishment. Men must be told that they will be eternally lost if they persist in their rebellion against God. They must be called to repentance. Even so, back of their belief or unbelief is the sovereign will of God. It is of that God that we must witness. If men object and disbelieve we yet reply: "Shall not the Judge of the whole earth do right?"

Quite in accord with Calvin, Bavinck asserts that the difference between the Reformed and other approaches to the doctrine of grace is that they—following Augustine—did not stop with secondary causes but dared to climb up to God as the first and ultimate cause and therein found rest for their thought.

But in finding rest for their thought did they think that they could logically penetrate the mystery of the relation of this ultimate will of God to the will of man as the secondary cause either of obedience or of disobedience? Not at all. With Calvin they would say: "Here let human reasonings of every kind that possibly can present themselves to our minds cease forever."

Shall we not say this to ourselves, and mean it, with respect to the problem of common grace? How can God have an attitude of favor unto those who are according to His own ultimate will to be separated from Him forever? The first and basic answer is that Scripture teaches it. But then we can see that in order to be disobedient and, therefore, to be punished for their own sin, they must be confronted with God in all that they do. Historical causes have genuine meaning just because of God's ultimate plan. God reaches down into the self-consciousness of each individual. If the heathen are adding to their sins and to their punishment, and if for additional sin they are, as Paul tells us, given over unto still further sin by God, we can see that they must have the fact of God, as long-suffering and as calling them to repentance, before them. And we can also see that, therefore, the restraint of God by which men are kept back from greater sin and from greater punishment is something that is an unmerited favor unto them.

We have not come into full sight of this problem till with Calvin and Bavinck we trace all things back to the sovereign will of God. Only then does the problem appear of how such a god, who ultimately has fixed the destinies of men, yet promises or threatens what appears to be opposed to this destiny. And the problem is as acute in the case of the elect as it is in the case of the reprobate. How are good deeds of men called their good deeds if they are gifts of God?

Moreover, when I add with Bavinck that though sin and its eternal punishment for some men is a part of the plan of God and, therefore, in a sense willed by God, yet they are not willed in the same sense and in the same manner as are the grace and salvation of the elect—I have not thereby met the objection of him who charges the Christian religion with contradiction. We shall need simply to hold both to the genuine meaning of historical causes and to the all inclusiveness of God’s will as the ultimate cause.

On the other hand, I cannot meet the objector by trying to show him that God is quite consistent with Himself since He, by His will, has determined to elect some and not elect others. If I say that God’s work in the direction of reprobation and in the direction of election differs not at all, then I am merely saying to the objector, in effect, that I would solve his problem by denying the meaning of secondary causes altogether. I must then wipe out the distinction between the revealed and the secret will of God. And I must say therefore that God’s eternal election of men implies that He had no attitude of disfavor unto them even for their sins. Thus I would wipe out the necessity for their atonement in history through the redemptive work of Christ. Says Calvin: “Let no one deceive himself by vain self-flattery. Those who come to Christ were before sons of God in His divine heart, while they were, in themselves, His enemies.”

Let us, rather than try to meet the objector’s desires for supposed consistency in logic, not deny the fact of God’s revelation of His general favor to mankind or the fact of God’s wrath resting upon the elect. To meet the objector and satisfy him we should have to deny the meaning of all history and of all secondary causes. We should need to wipe out the difference between God and man. To the objector it is contradictory to say that God controls whatsoever comes to pass and also to say that human choices have significance. [again, we come to a mystery understood by the faithful, but not comprehended all of which leads to adoration, worship, praise, and reverential fear of God. To the unbeliever, foolishness. The mysteries are hidden to them, Matt. 13:11]

All Teaching Of Scripture Is Apparently Contradictory

Rather let us say with Calvin: “And most certainly there is nothing in the whole circle of spiritual doctrine which does not far surpass the capacity of man and confound its utmost reach.” 10 If we are really to witness to men for God, then it must be the God of Scripture, the sovereign God of whom we testify. This God demands that we submit our whole man, with all its powers, to Him. This God, therefore, wants us to tell men that they have really met Him; that they are really confronted with Him; that they really know Him; that their deeds of obedience or disobedience have genuine meaning in His sight; that if they believe they will be saved and that if they do not believe they will be lost. They must be shown that they are kicking against the pricks always and everywhere, since they do not submit their thoughts captive to the obedience of God or of Christ. And we do not thus witness if we ourselves reduce history to something that is meaningless.

Natural Theology And Common Grace

But there is another side to the story. If we are to witness to the God of Scripture we cannot afford to deny common grace. For, as noted, common grace is an element of the general responsibility of man, a part of the picture in which God, the God of unmerited favor, meets man everywhere. But neither can we afford to construct a theory in which it is implicitly allowed that the natural man, in terms of his adopted principles, can truly interpret any aspect of history. For the natural man seeks to interpret all the facts of this world immanentistically. He seeks for meaning in the facts of this world without regarding these facts as carrying in them the revelation and therewith the claims of God. He seeks to determine what can and cannot be, what is or is not possible, by the reach of human logic resting on man himself as its foundation.

Now surely, you say, no Reformed person would have any commerce with any such view as that. Well, I do not think that any Reformed person purposely adopts such a view. But we know how the Roman Catholic conception of natural theology did creep into the thinking of Reformed theologians in the past. And the essence of this natural theology is that it attributes to the natural man the power of interpreting some aspect of the world without basic error. Even though men do not recognize God as the Creator and controller of the facts of this world, they are assumed to be able to give as true an interpretation of the laws of nature as it is possible for finite man to give. It is admitted that man as a religious being needs additional information besides what he learns by means of his own research. But this fact itself indicates that on this basis the knowledge of God about salvation has no bearing upon the realm of nature. The realm of nature is said to be correctly interpreted by the natural man.

On this basis it is quite possible for Christians to join with non-Christians in the scientific enterprise without witnessing to them of God. The Christians and non-Christians have, on this basis, a certain area of interpretation in common. They have common ideas in the sense that they agree on certain meanings without any difference. It is not merely that they are together confronted with the natural revelation of God. It is not merely that men are, all of them together, made in the image of God. It is not merely that they have in them the ineradicable sense of deity so that God speaks to them by means of their own constitution. It is not merely that, as Kuyper stressed, all men have to think according to the rules of logic according to which alone the human mind can function. It is not merely that all men can weigh and make many scientific discoveries.

Witness-Bearing In The Laboratory

All these things are true and important to maintain. But it is when in addition to these it is said that there are common notions, common reactions, about God and man and the world to all this speech of God, on which there is no basic difference between Christians and non-Christians, that natural theology is confused with natural revelation. And it is allowed that those who assume that the facts of this world are come from chance and those who presuppose that the facts of this world are created and controlled by God, have essentially the same interpretation of these facts. Thus the Christian and the non-Christian scientist could work together in the laboratory for days, for weeks and years and the Christian would have no other witness to give to his friend than to invite him to the prayer meeting or the Sunday service.

The Christian would on such a basis only reap the reward of his little faith were his friend to refuse to be interested in his religion. This friend, more consistently than the Christian, gives witness to his own faith. He will insist that he cannot believe in such a God as the Christians want him to bow unto since this God has created and determined all things. This God, he will say, does not allow men to experiment freely in the laboratory. The non-Christian may give witness to his faith in such words as these: "Your God hampers me in the making of my hypotheses. If I believe in Him I may make only such hypotheses as are in accord with the doctrines of creation and providence. I could not then think of evolution as a legitimate hypothesis with respect to the origin of man. Does not your God say in your Bible that man has not come from animal ancestry but is directly created in the image of God? Moreover your God, besides taking away from me the idea that any hypothesis may be taken as on a par with any other at the outset of an investigation, insists that I shall accept the contradictory position that supernatural things may happen and influence the order of the natural. That," he says, "makes the realm of natural law itself something that can be arbitrarily interfered with at will."

Thus the Christian working in the laboratory is confronted with the necessity of leaving the laboratory, giving it over entirely to the unbeliever or witnessing to the fact that only if Christianity is true is science possible and meaningful.

Are we then to fail to witness for our God in the field of science? Is it only because the unbeliever has never been confronted with the full implication of Christianity for the field of science that he tolerates us in his presence still? And are we to have a theory of common grace that prohibits us from setting forth the witness of God before all men everywhere? Is not the Christ to be set forth in His cosmic significance by us after all? Is it not true that there could be no science if the world and all that is therein is controlled by chance? Is it not true that the non-Christian does his work by the common grace of God? A theory of common grace based on a natural theology is destructive of all grace, common or special.

Surely the witness to the God of the Scriptures must be presented everywhere. It must be, to be sure, presented with wisdom and with tact. But it must be presented. It is not presented, however, if we grant that God the Holy Spirit in a general testimony to all men approves of interpretations of this world or of aspects of this world which ignore Him and set Him at naught.

The non-Christian scientist must be told that he is dealing with facts that belong to God. He must be told this, not merely in the interest of religion in the narrower sense of the term. He must be told this in the interest of science too, and of culture in general. He must be told that there would be no facts distinguishable from one another unless God had made them and made them thus. He must be told that no hypothesis would have any relevance or bearing on these same facts, except for the providence of God. He must be told that his own mind, with its principles of order, depends upon his being made in the image of God.

And then he must be told that if it were not for God's common grace he would go the full length of the principle of evil within him. He would finish iniquity and produce only war. His very acts of courtesy and kindness, his deeds of generosity, all his moral good is not to be explained, therefore, in terms of himself and the goodness of his nature but from God's enabling him to do these things in spite of his sinful nature. "Will you not then repent in order to serve and worship the Creator more than the creature?"

Infra- And Supralapsarianism

Our conclusion then on the problem of common grace may, I hope, be along the lines marked out by Bavinck on the issue of infra- and supralapsarianism. Bavinck sought to avoid extremes in either direction. And how avoid extremes? How attain a balanced view? By not allowing our logic to dominate over the teachings of Scripture.

Supralapsarianism, when held without full regard for all scriptural data, led to a stressing of the final destiny of men through election and reprobation to such an extent as to render the means by which that end is attained of little value. It led to a virtual denial of second or historical causes.

Infralapsarianism, when held without full regard for all scriptural data, so stressed the significance of the historical fact of sin as the cause of the lost condition of men, as to endanger the basic importance of the fact that back of all the historical choices of men is the one all-controlling plan of the sovereign God. It led, sometimes, to a virtual denial of God's plan as the first or last ultimate cause as controlling all finite causes.

We shall not thus, argues Bavinck, permit our reason to legislate with respect to scriptural data. Ours is a sovereign God. His glory is the end of all things. But we cannot say that this glory, in the case of the reprobate, is manifested only and exclusively in the righteousness of their punishment. There is while they are in this world, proceeding from them that which cannot be explained exclusively in terms of their reprobation. So also we cannot say that God's glory, in the case of the elect, is accomplished exclusively in God's grace to them in Christ. There is much of sin in them that displeases God. That which proceeds from their "old man" is not from, but against the grace of God. So in the case of the reprobate; their doings are better than their principle of evil, if not governed by God's common grace, would lead one to expect.

Supra- or infralapsarianism, taken as some advocates of these views have taken them, were faulty in their imposing of the reach of human logic upon the data of revelation.

Is it not thus with us who love the Reformed faith today? Do we not need to come to an "agonizing re-appraisal" with respect to the whole matter? Our witness must come clearly before the world. We all love to honor God for the work of the Reformers. That work found its climax in the idea of the sovereign grace of God freely proclaimed unto men.

Shall we, the sons of that Reformation, bedim its challenge to men by going off on tangents in order to satisfy the illegitimate objections of sinful men?

A Balanced View Of Common Grace

There lies before us the highway of the Christian faith. May we ever drive upon it, without veering either to the left or to the right. If the wheels of an automobile are out of line the car will gradually tend to run off the pavement. You cannot drive an automobile effectively with one wheel on the pavement and the other on the soft shoulder next to the road. Let us, in all kindness, warn one another not to go off the highway either to the left or to the right.

Going off to the right by denying common grace or going off to the left by affirming a theory of common grace patterned after the natural theology of Rome is to fail, to this extent, to challenge the wisdom of the world.

In neither case is the call of God to man made truly universal. In denying common grace we say, in effect, that God does not really call some men to repentance at all. In affirming a natural theology type of common grace, we fail to show that God calls all men everywhere and in all dimensions of life.

In neither case do we show man the full glory of the gospel and of the Christ, the Savior of the world.

Ye are my witnesses!

Chapter 6

A Letter On Common Grace

(10 pages into the chapter)

Pg 158-208

I may now add a few words about my view of the nature of facts and of the unbeliever's knowledge of them.

1. I hold that all the facts of the universe are exhaustively revelational of God.
 - a. This is true of the facts of man's environment in nature and history.
 - b. This is also true of man's own constitution as a rational and moral being.

2. In consequence of these two points I hold that all men unavoidably know God and themselves as creatures of God. Rom 1

A brief explication of each point may be in order. Dr. Masselink contends that according to my view the natural man has no knowledge of either God or morality. The reverse is true. I have greatly stressed the fact that all men know God. Following Dr. Machen I hold that Christianity is capable of scholarly defense. And this is so, I believe, because the facts of the universe clearly and unmistakably show forth the existence of God and of His truth.

Speaking of my view of man's natural knowledge of God, Dr. Masselink says:

The denial of "natural knowledge of God" and sense of morality is, to our mind, in conflict with Synod's declaration. P. 96

The reference is to the declarations of the Synod of the Christian Reformed Church relative to the matter of Common Grace (1924). But I do not deny the "natural knowledge of God" or the "sense of morality." To be sure I do deny that this natural knowledge of God and of morality is the result of common grace. I think it is the presupposition of common grace. It is the presupposition also of saving grace.

First then, if there is to be a natural knowledge of God all the facts must clearly speak of God. Calvin maintains that they do and I have closely followed him. The following quotations and references are from the syllabus to which Dr. Masselink makes reference: An Introduction to Systematic Theology.

After quoting from Calvin's exposition on Romans chapter 1.20 (Rom 1:20) these words appear:

What Scripture therefore emphasizes is that even apart from special revelation, men ought to see that God is the Creator of the world. (Masselink, Introduction to Systematic Theology p 78)

Again, men ought to see the munificence of God. (ibid. p79) Even the result of sin in no wise reduces the perspicuity of God's revelation. "We would think of a man in the midst of heathendom and remember the elements in the revelation at his disposal in order to see then what logical conclusions he ought to draw if he reasoned correctly. In the first place, he ought to think of God as the creator of this world. In the second place, he ought to believe in the providence of God. In the third place, he ought to think of the presence of a certain non-saving grace of God.” 31 Then the revelation through the facts of nature is brought into close relation with the original supernatural revelation that God gave to the human race through Adam. 32 At the beginning of history man was in direct contact with the living God through supernatural revelation and “man remains responsible for these facts.” (ibid. 84)

The facts of man’s constitution no less than the facts of his environment reveal God to man. Calvin says:

For, in the first place, no man can survey himself without forthwith turning his thoughts toward God in whom he lives and moves because it is perfectly obvious, that the endowments which we possess cannot possibly be from ourselves, nay, that our very being is nothing else than subsistence in God alone. (ibid. p 90)

Sin has not effaced this natural knowledge of God. A sense of deity is “indelibly engraven on the human heart.” Try as men will they cannot suppress this knowledge of God; “for the worm of conscience, keener than burning steel, is gnawing within them.” 35 So also the seed of religion is divinely sown in all. Men should have recognized God; the revelation from without and from within is a daily challenge to them to turn to God. 36 God’s power and divinity “are still displayed in man as well as about him, in the fact of the self-conscious activity of his person, in his own negative moral reaction to the revelation about and within him, in his sense of dissatisfaction with all non-theistic interpretations, and in a measure of involuntary recognition of the truth of the theistic interpretation as the true interpretation of the origin of the world.” (ibid. p97)

It is therefore utterly impossible for any man not to know God and morality.

The natural man has knowledge, true knowledge of God, in the sense that God through nature and man’s own consciousness impresses his presence on man’s attention. So definitely and inescapably has he done this, that try as he may, man cannot escape knowing God. It is this point that Paul stresses in the first two chapters of Romans. Man has the sense of deity indelibly engraven upon him. He knows God and he knows himself and the world as God’s creation. This is objective revelation to him. Even to the extent that this revelation is within man, i.e., in his own constitution, and as such may be called “subjective,” it is none the less objective to him as an ethically responsive creature, and he is bound to react as an ethical person to this objective revelation. – (ibid. p 27).

Or again:

The actual situation is therefore always a mixture of truth with error. Being “without God in the world” the natural man yet knows God, and, in spite of himself, to some extent recognizes God. By virtue of their creation in God’s image, by virtue of the ineradicable sense of deity within them, and by virtue of God’s restraining grace, those who hate God, yet in a restricted sense know God, and do good. (ibid. p 28).

If this be kept in mind, it will be seen that if, as Reformed theology has contended, both the doctrines of the absolute ethical antithesis of the natural man to God and of his relatively true knowledge and relatively good deeds must be maintained, we are not led into any inconsistency or self-contradiction. (ibid.).

In an essay on "Nature and Scripture" published in The Infallible Word the same sort of stress is found on the clarity of God's revelation to man in his environment and within himself. This is done over against the Roman Catholic concept of analogia entis. "God is light and in him is no darkness at all. As such he cannot deny himself. This God naturally has an all-inclusive plan for the created universe. He has planned all the relationships between all the aspects of created being. All created reality therefore displays this plan. It is, in consequence, inherently rational." (p 269)

Or again,

By the idea of revelation, then, we are to mean not merely what comes to man through the facts surrounding him in his environment, but also that which comes to him by means of his own constitution as a covenant personality. The revelation that comes to man by way of his own rational and moral nature is no less objective to him than that which comes to him through the voice of trees and animals. Man's own psychological activity is no less revelational than the laws of physics about him. All created reality is inherently revelational of the nature and will of God. Even man's ethical reaction to God's revelation is still revelational. And as revelational of God, it is authoritative. The meaning of the Confessions' doctrine of the authority of Scripture does not become clear to us till we see it against the background of the original and basically authoritative character of God's revelation in nature. Scripture speaks authoritatively to such as must naturally live by authority. God speaks with authority wherever and whenever he speaks.

At this point a word may be said about the revelation of God through conscience and its relation to Scripture. Conscience is man's consciousness speaking on matters of directly moral import. Every act of man's consciousness is moral in the most comprehensive sense of that term. Yet there is a difference between questions of right and wrong in a restricted sense and general questions of interpretation. Now if man's whole consciousness was originally created perfect, and as such authoritatively expressive of the will of God, that same consciousness is still revelational and authoritative after the entrance of sin to the extent that its voice is still the voice of God. The sinner's efforts, so far as they are done self-consciously from his point of view, seek to destroy or bury the voice of God that comes to him through nature, which includes his own consciousness. But this effort cannot be wholly successful at any point in history. The most depraved of men cannot wholly escape the voice of God. Their greatest wickedness is meaningless except upon the assumption that they have sinned against the authority of God. Thoughts and deeds of utmost perversity are themselves revelational, revelational, that is, in their very abnormality. The natural man accuses or else excuses himself only because his own utterly depraved consciousness continues to point back to the original natural state of affairs. The prodigal son can never forget the father's voice. It is the albatross forever about his neck. (Infallible Word, pp. 265-267)

In the pamphlet The Intellectual Challenge of the Gospel the same procedure is followed as in the foregoing. The revelation of God to man in the created universe is said to be clear. Men therefore cannot help but know God. Man's own consciousness is part of the revelation of God to himself as an ethical reactor.

Paul makes bold to claim that all men know deep down in their hearts that they are creatures of God and have sinned against God their Creator and their judge. (p 5)

Paul knows that those who cling to the “wisdom” of the world do so against their better judgment and with an evil conscience. Every fact of “theism” and every fact of “Christianity” points with an accusing finger at the sinner, saying: “You are a covenant-breaker; repent and be saved!” (ibid.)

It is only against the background of this stress on the perspicuity of the natural revelation of God about and within man, and these as related to the original supernatural revelation vouchsafed to Adam in paradise, that the meaning of the statement that the natural man and the regenerated man have nothing in common epistemologically must be taken. It is constantly put in that context. The point is that when and to the extent that the natural man is engaged in interpreting life in terms of his adopted principles then, and only then, he has nothing in common with the believer. But man can never completely suppress the truth. On necessity he therefore knows that it is wrong to break the law of God. This point will receive further discussion under our second head dealing with,

2. Man As The Subject Of Knowledge

It is well to hear what Dr. Masselink has to say on my view of the natural man as the subject of knowledge. Something of this has already appeared in the preceding section; we now turn to the matter explicitly.

Says Dr. Masselink:

Our great difficulty with Van Til’s philosophy of Common Grace is his premise or starting point, namely, the absolute ethical antithesis between God and man. This premise controls his whole system of thinking. All of the objections which follow are immediately related to this primary premise, which Van Til himself declares is his starting point.

Van Til says: “We must begin by emphasizing the absolute ethical antithesis in which the ‘natural’ man stands to God.” (Introduction to Systematic Theology, p. 25). All Reformed Theology, of course, asserts that there is an ethical antithesis between God and fallen man. The question is whether it is absolute. According to Webster’s dictionary the term absolute means without qualification, limitation or restriction. The question is whether the term absolute is not too sweeping and far-reaching here. (Common Grace and Christian Education, pg 73)

Good comments on man’s total depravity & common grace in the next several pages:

Dr. Masselink assumes that by the idea of the “absolute ethical antithesis” I must mean that man is as bad as he can be. “The absolute ethical antithesis of God is the devil. If we place man ethically, in the same category with the devil, then what becomes of the image of God in man?” (ibid., p. 74)

“Reformed theology distinguishes between total and absolute depravity. By total depravity we mean that human depravity extends to every function of the soul, intellect, will and emotions.... By absolute depravity we mean that man is as bad as he can be. With absolute depravity there can no longer be any curbing of sin through Common Grace.... The Devil and the Lost in Hell are absolutely depraved, because there is no Common Grace in Hell. The absolute ethical antithesis between God and ‘natural man,' as Van Til says, must imply absolute depravity. By affirming the absolute ethical antithesis we fail to see how there can be any room left for Common Grace." 49

On this analysis of my view the following remarks are in order:

1. If Dr. Masselink had consulted my usage of the expression "absolute ethical antithesis" instead of going to the dictionary he would have found: (a) that I usually imply the expression total depravity. Apparently, Dr. Masselink has been unable to find the expression absolute depravity in my booklet on Common Grace. The expression total depravity is there constantly used. (b) For me the idea of total or absolute depravity means that the sinner is dead in trespasses and sins (Eph 2:1). In principle man is therefore blind. If he is to see the truth about God and himself he must be born again. He must be born again unto knowledge. (Cf. the discussion of Charles Hodge on this point in his Systematic Theology.) But in spite of the fact that man is spiritually dead, dead in principle, absolutely dead, not half or partly dead in principle, he may know and do much that is relatively good.

Here we should again bring in the fact of the non-saving grace of God. In the case of Satan, the folly of his interpretation appears very clear. In the case of the sinner, however, we have a mixed situation. Through God's non-saving grace, the wrath of God on the sinner has been mitigated in this life. This appears along the whole line of man's interests. It appears along the line of man's physical life. Man is given an abundance of food and drink. It is shown in the fact that man's body, though weakened, is even so, particularly in some instances, a usable tool for the soul of man. It is shown in the fact that man's mind is not fully and exclusively bent upon evil. Though basically man is at enmity against God so that he is prone to hate God and his neighbor, this enmity against God does not come to full expression in this life. He is not a finished product. (Introduction to Systematic Theology, p. 98)

(c) The burden of the entire discussion in Common Grace is to the effect that it is fully consistent with the fact of total depravity to maintain that there is a genuine commonness between believer and unbeliever. There are those who have denied common grace. They have argued that God cannot have any attitude of favor at any stage in history to such as are the "vessels of wrath." But to reason thus is to make logic rule over Scripture. Against both Hoeksema and Schilder I have contended that we must think more concretely and analogically than they did, allowing ourselves to be led only by scriptural exegesis. All the truths of the Christian religion have of necessity the appearance of being contradictory. But since we build our thinking on the ontological trinity and therefore on the revelation of this triune God as given in Scripture, we think analogically. We do not fear to accept that which has the appearance of being contradictory. We know that what appears to be so to us is not really so. So also in the case of the question of common grace. We are not to say that God cannot have any attitude of favor to a generality of mankind, including both reprobate and elect, because our logic seems to require us to do so. In the case of common grace, as in the case of every other biblical doctrine, we should seek to take all the factors of Scripture teaching and bind them together into systematic relations with one another as far as we can. But we do not expect to have a logically deducible relationship between one doctrine and another. We expect to have only an analogical system.

Very good reasoning:

For this reason then we must not hesitate to say that God has a common attitude of favor to all mankind as a generality. We must not fear to assert that though the ultimate end of God for the elect is their salvation, they yet are under God's displeasure when they do not fully live up to His requirement for men. Similarly we must not fear to assert in the case of the reprobate that though they are ultimately vessels of wrath they yet can be in history, in a sense, the objects of the favor of God.

The case is similar with respect to the knowledge of unbelievers and their ability to do that which is relatively good. The fact that they are in principle opposed to God and would destroy the very foundation of knowledge and ethics, yet, in spite of this, because of God's common grace they can discover much truth and do much good.

We say that this is one factor of the whole situation. We do not say that it is the only factor. God loves the works of his hands, and the progress that they make to their final fulfillment. So we may and should rejoice with God in the unfolding of the history of the race, even in the unfolding of the wickedness of man in order that the righteousness of God may be most fully displayed. But if God tells us that, in spite of the wickedness of men, and in spite of the fact that they misuse his gifts for their own greater condemnation, he is long suffering with them, we need not conclude that there is no sense in which God has a favor to the unbeliever. There is a sense in which God has a disfavor to the believer because, in spite of the new life within him, he sins in the sight of God. So God may have favor to the unbeliever because of the "relative good" that God himself gives him in spite of the principle of sin within him. If we were to think of God and his relation to the world in a univocal or abstract fashion, we might agree with those who maintain that there is no qualitative difference between the favor of God toward the saved and toward the unsaved. Arminians and Barthians virtually do this. Or, we might agree with those who maintain that there is no sense in which God can show favor to the reprobate. On the other hand, if we reason concretely about God and his relation to the world, we simply listen to what God has told us in his Word on the matter. It may even then be exceedingly difficult to construct a theory of "common grace" which will do justice to what Scripture says. We make Scripture the standard of our thinking, and not our thinking the standard of Scripture. All of man's activity, whether intellectual or moral, is analogical; and for this reason it is quite possible for the unsaved sinner to do what is "good" in a sense, and for the believer to do what is "evil" in a sense.

With respect to the question, then, as to whether Scripture actually teaches an attitude of favor, up to a point, on the part of God toward the non-believer, we can only intimate that we believe it does. Even when we take full cognizance of the fact that the unbeliever abuses every gift of God and uses it for the greater manifestation of his wickedness, there seems to be evidence in Scripture that God, for this life, has a certain attitude of favor to unbelievers. We may point to such passages as the following: In Ps 145.9, we are told, "The Lord is good to all; and his tender mercies are over all his works." In seeking the meaning of such a passage, we must be careful. In the first place, it is to be remembered that God is constantly setting his own people in the center of the outflow of his goodness to the children of men. So, in Exodus 34.6, 7, we read: "And the Lord God passed before him, and proclaimed, The Lord, The Lord God, merciful and gracious, long suffering and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty; visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children, unto the third and fourth generation." In this passage we are, as it were, warned to think concretely on the question before us. God's mercy and grace is primarily extended to those whose sins are forgiven. If in any sense it is given to those whose sins are not forgiven, it must always be remembered that God does not overlook iniquity. We may therefore expect that in Ps 145 the Psalmist teaches nothing that is out of accord with what has been taught in Exodus 34. Thus, the primary meaning of Ps 145 is again that God's great favor is toward his people. Even when God gives great gifts to non-believers, they are, in a more basic sense, gifts to believers. Gifts of God to unbelievers help to make the life of believers possible, and in a measure, pleasant. But this does not detract from the fact that the unbeliever himself is, in a measure, the recipient of God's favor. There is a certain joy in the gift of life and its natural blessings for the unbeliever. And we may well think that Ps 145 has this in mind. Such joy as there is in the life of the unbeliever cannot be found in him after this life is over. Even in the hereafter, the lost will belong to the works of God's hands. And God no doubt has joy that through the works of evil men and angels, he is establishing his glory. Yet that is not what the Psalmist seems to mean. There seems to be certain satisfaction on the part of God even in the temporary joy of the unbeliever as a creature of himself, a joy which will in the end turn to bitterness, but which, nonetheless, is joy while it lasts.

Another passage to which we briefly refer is Matthew 5.44, 45. "But I say unto you, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you, and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good." In this passage, the disciples of Jesus are told to deny themselves the selfish joy of expressing enmity against those that hate them. They are not to express their attitude of hostility. But this is not all they are to do. They are to replace the attitude of hatred with an attitude of love. He does not know but that this one who now hates him may one day become a believer. This is one factor in the total situation. Yet this is not to be made the only factor. It is not even the expressed reason for loving his enemy. The one guide for the believer's action with respect to the enemy is God's attitude toward that enemy. And the believer is told definitely to love his enemy in imitation of God's attitude toward that enemy. God's attitude toward that enemy must therefore in some sense be one of love. It is no doubt the love of an enemy, and, therefore, in God's case, never the same sort of love as the love toward his children. And to the extent that we know men to be enemies of the Lord, we too cannot love them in the same sense in which we are told to love fellow-believers. God no doubt lets the wheat and the tares grow together till the day of judgment, but even so, though God's ultimate purpose with unbelievers is their destruction and the promotion of his glory through their destruction, he loves them, in a sense, while they are still kept by himself, through his own free gifts, from fully expressing the wicked principle that is in them. (Introduction to Systematic Theology, pg 246-248).

(d) It is not in accordance with fact to say that the absolute ethical antithesis, even when taken as being such in principle only, is for me the starting point when dealing with the relation of the believer and the non-believer. As the preceding quotations imply, my starting point is always the fact that God originally made man in His image and that He placed him in an exhaustively revelational context.

More on total depravity:

To be sure, we cannot agree with the Roman Catholic position. According to this position there is an area of knowledge, an area of interpretation, which believers and unbelievers have in common without difference. Similarly, the Arminian position calls for such a common or neutral territory of interpretation. 53 Over against this we must take into consideration the fact that the natural man is ethically depraved, “... wholly defiled in all the parts and faculties of soul and body.”

We need to recognize this complexity, and to see the problem it involves. It will not do to ignore the difference between Christians and non-Christians and speak of reason in general. Such a thing does not exist in practice. As dangerous as it is to speak of method in general without distinguishing clearly between the Christian theistic and the non-theistic method, so dangerous is it to speak of reason in general or of a “common consciousness” in general. We must therefore begin with:

(a) The Adamic consciousness, or, the reason of man as it existed before the fall of man. This reason was derivative. Its knowledge was, in the nature of the case, true, though not exhaustive. This reason was in covenant with God, instead of at enmity against God. It recognized the fact that its function was that of the interpretation of God’s revelation. In paradise Adam had a true conception of the relation of the particulars to the universals of knowledge with respect to the created universe. He named the animals “according to their nature,” that is, in accordance with the place God had given them in His universe. Then, too, Adam could converse truly about the meaning of the universe in general and about their own life in particular with Eve. Thus the subject-object and the subject-subject relationship was normal. In paradise man’s knowledge was self-consciously analogical; man wanted to know the facts of the universe in order to fulfill his task as a covenant-keeper.

(b) Then, secondly, we must think of the sinful consciousness, i.e., of the human reason as it became after the entrance of sin. Looked at from the point of view of its unredeemed character, we may speak of it as the unregenerate consciousness. This is the “natural man,” “dead in trespasses and sin.” The natural man wants to be something that he cannot be. He wants to be “as God,” himself the judge of good and evil, himself the standard of truth. He sets himself as the ideal of comprehensive knowledge. When he sees that he will never reach this ideal he concludes that all reality is surrounded by darkness. As a child would say, “If I cannot do this, no one else can,” so the “natural man” today says in effect that, since he cannot grasp knowledge comprehensively, God cannot either. The non-regenerate man takes for granted that the meaning of the space-time world is imminent in itself, and that man is the ultimate interpreter of this world, instead of its humble re-interpreter. The natural man wants to be creatively constructive instead of reconstructive. (Introduction to Systematic Theology, pg 25, 26)

It is only after we have dealt with what men have in common that we turn to that which separates them as sinners saved and sinners not saved. The fallen consciousness wants in principle to be creatively constructive. The regenerated consciousness wants, in principle, to be receptively reconstructive. So we might expect that two such mutually exclusive principles of interpretation could have nothing in common. But we cannot take such an absolutist position.

We are well aware of the fact that non-Christians have a great deal of knowledge about this world which is true as far as it goes.... That is, there is a sense in which we can and must allow for the value of knowledge of non-Christians. (ibid. p 26)

We do not make this point as a concession but rather as a fact taught directly by Scripture itself and as such observed in daily experience.

The question how those who are totally depraved in principle can yet do the natural good and have true knowledge “has always been a difficult point.” But no more or less difficult than all other Christian teaching. Pighius argues against Calvin that commonness must always be commonness without qualification. He contends that therefore the attitude of God to all men must be the same without difference. Hoeksema argues that since God has determined some men to be elect and others to be reprobate there must be nothing but difference between them. But the truly Reformed position does not go off on a tangent toward Arminianism, nor does it go off on a tangent with Hoeksema. Both types of thinking are univocal instead of analogical, abstract instead of concrete.

We therefore do not expect to be able to settle this difficult point, or any other difficult point, to the full satisfaction of either Hoeksema or the Arminians. We would do with this problem as we must do with all other theological problems. We would take all factors into consideration simultaneously and thus “hem in the question.” That is all that the fathers did when at Chalcedon they established the relation of the two natures of Christ to one another. They were not able to satisfy and neither did they desire to satisfy the “logical” demands of either the Eutychians who wanted a confusion of natures lest there be no identity between them, nor of the Nestorians who wanted two persons lest there be no difference between God and man.

Now, “In order to hem in our question we are persuaded that we must begin by emphasizing the absolute ethical antithesis in which the ‘natural man’ stands to God.”

From the point of view that man, as dead in trespasses and sins, seeks to interpret life in terms of himself instead of in terms of God, he is wholly mistaken. “From this ultimate point of view the ‘natural man’ knows nothing truly. He has chains about his neck and see shadows only.” (ibid.)

Dr. Masselink quoted this passage as though it controlled the whole discussion of the relation of the knowledge of believers and unbelievers. Nothing could be further from what is actually said. The very idea of man’s ethical depravity as absolute in principle presupposes that men are inherently and originally in possession of the truth about God and themselves.

We must therefore distinguish between natural man’s knowledge of God by virtue of the revelational character of all created reality, himself included, and the natural man’s being without God in the world and blind because of sin. “The natural man has knowledge, true knowledge of God, in the sense that God through nature and man’s own consciousness impresses his presence on man’s attention.” (ibid. p27) But man seeks to suppress this revelation of God about and within him. “Having made alliance with Satan, man makes a grand monistic assumption.

Note: “The monistic view makes no basic difference between Creator and creature, but rather presents being as uniform, though with gradations between lower and higher forms.” Wm Edgar, editor of Van Til’s book, Christian Apologetics, pg 31, footnote 3 [Van Til refers to this as “scale of being” in his writings.]

Not merely in his conclusion but as well in his method and starting point he takes for granted his own ultimacy.” (ibid.) He needs therefore, as Warfield put it, new light and new power of sight. The natural man has cemented colored glasses to his face. And all things are yellow to the jaundiced eye. So then “to the extent that he works according to this monistic assumption he misinterprets all things, flowers, no less than God.” (ibid.) However, lest someone should draw absolutistic conclusions, conclusions dictated by a supposed logic rather than by Scripture from what has been said, we hasten to add:

Fortunately the natural man is never fully consistent while in this life. As the Christian sins against his will, so the natural man “sins against” his own essentially Satanic principle. As the Christian has the incubus of his “old man” weighing him down and therefore keeping him from realizing the “life of Christ” within him, so the natural man has the incubus of the sense of Deity weighing him down and keeping him from realizing the life of Satan within him. The actual situation is therefore always a mixture of truth with error. Being “without God in the world” the natural man yet knows God, and, in spite of himself, to some extent recognizes God. By virtue of their creation in God’s image, by virtue of the ineradicable sense of deity within them and by virtue of God’s restraining general grace, those who hated God, yet in a restricted sense know God, and do good. (ibid.)

It appears then that the section in which I did use the expression “absolute ethical antithesis” is mainly directed against those who would interpret the idea of the antithesis to mean that man is as bad as he can be. The whole burden of the argument is that to hold to the idea of absolute or total ethical depravity does not need to, and must not lead to, the idea that man is now satanic. Since the antithesis is ethical and not metaphysical, God’s restraining grace keeps man from being as bad as he can be.

From the preceding discussion it will also be clear what reply I would make to another charge made by Dr. Masselink. He says: “The absolute ethical antithesis is in conflict with our conception of the Divine image in ‘natural man.’ ” And again, he adds: “If we assert that there is an absolute ethical antithesis between God and fallen man, then how can we speak of fallen man as bearing the image of God, unless with Hoeksema we restrict this to the strictly formal sense, meaning thereby that man is merely ‘capable of bearing God’s image.’ ” (Masselink, op. cit., p 74)

This is good:

But I have argued at length, particularly against Barth, that the image of God in man consists of actual knowledge content. Man does not start on the course of history merely with a capacity for knowing God. On the contrary, he begins his course with actual knowledge of God. Moreover, he cannot even eradicate this knowledge of God. It is this fact that makes sin to be sin “against better knowledge.” In this I think I am in line with Reformed theology in general and with Calvin in particular.

At this point there no doubt emerges a difference between Dr. Masselink and me on the question of the function of common grace. I do not think it is the function of common grace to maintain the metaphysical status quo. Roman Catholic theology thinks of the creature as beginning as it were from the borders of non-being. There is, according to Roman theology, in man, as in created reality generally, an inherent tendency to sink back into non-existence. Hence the need of supernatural aid from the outset of man's being. There is in Roman theology a confusion between the metaphysical and the ethical aspects of man's being. If there is any one thing on which Bavinck has laid great stress throughout the four volumes of his Gereformeerde Dogmatiek, it is that true Protestantism is a matter of restoring man, the creature of God, to his true ethical relationship with God. The destructive tendency of sin is not to be seen in a gradual diminution of man's rationality and morality. Man is not less a creature, a rational moral creature of God when he turns his back to God and hates his maker than he was before. Therefore when God gives to man His grace, His saving grace, this does not reinstate his rationality and morality. It reinstates his true knowledge, righteousness, and holiness. Col 3.10, Eph 4.24 It restores man ethically, not metaphysically. So too, if we take common grace to be that which has to do with the restraint of sin, then it is an ethical not a metaphysical function that it performs. It does not maintain, as Dr. Masselink seems to contend, the creatural characteristics of man. It does not sustain the image of God in "the wider sense," consisting of man's rationality and morality. It keeps the man who will be rational anyway, by virtue of his creation in the image of God, from expressing his hostility to God in the field of knowledge to such an extent as to make it impossible for himself to destroy knowledge. And in restraining him in his ethical hostility to God, God releases his creatural powers so that he can make positive contributions to the field of knowledge and art. Similarly, in restraining him from expressing his ethical hostility to God there is a release within him of his moral powers so that they can perform that which is "morally" though not spiritually good. The rationality and morality of man had not diminished through sin. Man cannot be amoral. But by sin man fell ethically; he became hostile to God. And common grace is the means by which God keeps man from expressing the principle of hostility to its full extent, thus enabling man to do the "relatively good."*

True, we have to speak of sin as, in principle, destructive of the work of God. We have to speak "as if" sin might prevent God's plan for the universe from being realized. And this would seem to indicate that the world, metaphysically speaking, would have been destroyed by sin. And it might seem to indicate that common grace keeps the metaphysical situation intact. At the same time we know that sin and Satan were bound to be defeated. God planned this defeat before the foundation of the world. These two notions are limiting or supplementative concepts. They modify one another. We cannot make linear deductions from one of these principles taken by itself. Therefore we cannot say that the world was on the way to being destroyed by sin except for the fact that common grace came in and saved it from destruction. We must rather reason from the fact of God's all-comprehensive plan and make relative distinctions within it. Then we conclude that common grace, by restraining sin, influences the condition of the universe as planned by God. According to Dr. Masselink the created powers of the universe themselves tended to disappear into nothingness and have to be kept in existence through common grace. On this, then, there is disagreement between Dr. Masselink and me; I would think of common grace as an ethical attitude on the part of God to mankind and an ethical response which is otherwise than this response would be if sin were allowed to go unchecked.

The Conscience

Dr. Masselink also criticizes me for thinking of conscience as revelational of God. “Van Til speaks of consciences as a means of general revelation. We cannot at all agree with this. There is a vast difference between God’s general revelation and human conscience. God’s general revelation is objective, whereas conscience is subjective; God’s general revelation is divine, whereas conscience is human; God’s general revelation is infallible, whereas conscience is fallible. Conscience is man’s answer to God’s general revelation. The Holy Spirit witnesses within man’s heart that God is holy and an avenger of evil, and conscience is man’s response to this internal witness. If there is an absolute ethical antithesis between God and man all functions of human conscience become impossible.”

This criticism is the same in intent as that made with respect to Machen in Dr. Masselink’s dissertation. “In the fifth place we do not like the way in which Prof. Machen speaks of conscience as a means of revelation.” In criticizing Machen’s view Dr. Masselink deals with Rom 2.14, 15, and concludes by saying: “Also here God’s general revelation namely, the work of the law, and conscience are distinguished.” He quotes Hepp as follows with approval: “To be sure the Holy Spirit is active in all of this, yet only in a mediate way. So there is a difference in principle between conscience and the General testimony which is directly a testimony of the Holy Spirit.”

The main charge against Machen and me is therefore that we have confused the divine and the human; but neither Machen nor I has done such a thing. Leaving out Machen’s views, I may point out that, as has appeared even in the quotations given, I take conscience to be an aspect of the created consciousness of man. And everything created is revelational of God. In this broad sense even the sinful reaction of man to the revelation of God in the narrow sense is still revelational of God’s general purpose. It is only by thus thinking of all created reality as revelational that the ethical actions of man can be properly focused. Without thus making all created reality revelational of God the ethical reaction of man would take place in a vacuum.

To be sure, the revelation of God in the consciousness of man is psychologically subjective. It is the human subject which, in its very constitution and function, speaks of God. Calvin wonders at the marvelous working of the human mind and heart as revelational evidence of the work of God. And Dr. Masselink admits that “also ‘conscience’ was often conceived as a means of revelation by the old Reformed theologians, but that ‘conscience’ was conceived of in a very broad way.” Well, it is in a broad way that I am taking it.

Nor was it only the “old Reformed theologians” who spoke of conscience as revelational in this broad way. Bavinck himself does so not once but repeatedly. Speaking of the comprehensiveness of God’s general revelation, he says: “He reveals himself also in the heart and conscience of every man, Job 34.8; 33.4; Prv 20.27; Jn 1.3– 5, 9, 10; Rom 2.14.15; 8.16. This revelation of God is general, in itself observable and intelligible to every man.” Discussing the principles of religion, Bavinck speaks as follows: “Thus there is not only an external, objective, but also an internal, subjective revelation.” Elsewhere he signifies the testimony of the Holy Spirit by which man accepts the truth of Scripture as revelational. “Objective revelation is therefore not sufficient; it must in a sense be continued and completed in subjective revelation.” Other passages of similar import could be cited. The main point is that if man could look anywhere and not be confronted with the revelation of God then he could not sin in the biblical sense of the term. [hence, I think what Van Til means when he says to sin in a vacuum, what Paul intimated in Romans 4:15, where there is no law, there is no transgression.] Sin is the breaking of the law of God. God confronts man everywhere. He cannot in the nature of the case confront man anywhere if he does not confront him everywhere. God is one; the law is one. If man could press one button on the radio of his experience and not hear the voice of God then he would always press that button and not the others. But man cannot even press the button of his own self-consciousness without hearing the requirement of God.

pg177-194

The question of the theistic proofs also involves the idea of the all-comprehensiveness and the perspicuity of general revelation in man’s consciousness as well as in the facts about him. Dr. Masselink rejects Machen’s view of conscience as revelatory of God. That is the question of revelation in and through the human subject. So he also rejects Machen’s acceptance of the “theistic proofs” as foundational to the truth of Christianity. That is the question of revelation in and through the facts of the universe in general. Following Hepp’s line of reasoning Dr. Masselink says that in the former case we would be making our certainty to rest upon the human subject, and in the latter case we would be making our certainty to rest upon the created object. In both cases we would be depending upon a creature. And certainty rests in God alone. With Hepp we must speak of the general internal testimony of the Holy Spirit as witnessing to general revelation. Then by this general testimony of the Spirit we have certainty.

Even the general external testimony of the Spirit, says Dr. Masselink, cannot by itself give certainty to man.

It is a revelation which comes to us as a witness. A revelation is a disclosure of the thoughts of God. The whole creation is full of God’s thoughts and they come to us in the General External Testimony of the Spirit. This general External Testimony of the Spirit can reveal God’s thoughts to us, but cannot give us certainty with regard to them. Why not? you ask. This is because all revelation takes place through means. We cannot know the essence of things except through the things themselves. If this revelation, therefore, would have to give us certainty in regard to these matters, it would have to do it through the things themselves. These would then in turn become the basis of our certainty. This we have already observed cannot be, as then the certainty is in the creation itself and not in the Creator. The absolute certainty I receive only then, when the Holy Spirit gives me this assurance that these things are so apart from the external revelation.

The point of importance here is again the question of revelation, especially of general revelation. This revelation discloses the thoughts of God. These thoughts come through the general external testimony of the Holy Spirit. But though the general external testimony reveals God to us this testimony cannot give us certainty. The reason is that this revelation or testimony takes place through means, and the means are created facts, objective or subjective. So, since they are not God Himself, they cannot give us certainty with respect to God. Hence the need of a direct internal witness added to the external witness of the Spirit.

On this construction of Hepp's the following remarks are apposite:

1. It is not found in Kuyper and Bavinck or in the "Old Princeton theology." Hepp himself says that Bavinck came near to his idea of a general testimony of the Spirit, but that he did not quite attain unto it.

2. It is out of analogy with the relation of Scripture and the special internal testimony of the Holy Spirit witnessing to the truth of Scripture; this in spite of the fact that Hepp seeks to carry through the analogy. Calvin's doctrine of the internal testimony of the Spirit does not presuppose the lack of certainty in the revelation given in Scripture. On the contrary, for Calvin all revelation is objectively true and certainly true. But the sinner does not want to believe that which is in itself certain and clear as day. So the Holy Spirit in regenerating and converting man enables him to accept that which as unregenerate and unconverted he could not accept. It brings him back, in principle, to the normal state of affairs. The testimony of the Spirit within man is to the objective and certain truth of that which comes to man through external revelation.

3. Even the "immediate testimony" of the Holy Spirit has, at last, to terminate upon man. It has to be mediated to man through man's own consciousness. Otherwise it has no content. The human mind must think upon and reconstruct for itself the objective revelation given to it whether through Scripture or through "nature." But to think upon it is a psychological activity. It is an activity of the human mind. It is to the thinking subject that the internal testimony of the Spirit comes. It terminates upon this subject. It is unavoidably mediated to the ethically responsible subject through this very subject itself. Without mediation through both object and subject there is no revelation and no reception of revelation. Subjectivity in the objectionable sense of the term does not come into the picture of Christian thinking by the insistence that both the created object and the created subject are nothing but what they could not help but be, namely, revelational, exclusively revelational of God. Subjectivity of the objectionable sort comes into the Christian's thinking only if he tones down this objective certainty. For if he does and then tries to make up for it by the idea of an internal testimony of the Spirit, then the directness of this testimony unavoidably partakes of the nature of identification of the creature with God. It leads to the position that only God can know God to be God with certainty.

Dr. Masselink's criticism of my evaluation of the theistic proofs is quite different from his criticism of Machen's acceptance of these proofs. But the unity of these two criticisms lies in the fact that both Machen and I are out of agreement with Hepp's evaluation of them. And this evaluation of them by Hepp rests upon his doctrine of the external and internal general testimony of the Holy Spirit. Dr. Masselink's criticism of my view will be given first, then the views of Hepp stated; and after that an analysis made of the idea of the general testimony of the Spirit.

1. Dr. Masselink asserts that I deny any truth value to the theistic proofs. (Masselink, op. cit. pg 83) "According to Van Til, Bavinck's 'Theistic Proofs' have no value whatsoever. This too is a logical consequence of his major premise of the absolute between God and natural man." 73

This is again simply contrary to fact.

The argument for the existence of God and for the truth of Christianity is objectively valid. We should not tone down the validity of this argument to the probability level. The argument may be poorly stated, and may never be adequately stated. But in itself the argument is absolutely sound. Christianity is the only reasonable position to hold. It is not merely as reasonable as other positions, or a bit more reasonable than other positions; it alone is the natural and reasonable position for man to take. By stating the argument as clearly as we can, we may be the agents of the Spirit in pressing the claims of God upon men. If we drop to the level of the merely probable truthfulness of Christian theism, we, to that extent, lower the claims of God upon men. This is, we believe, the sense of Calvin's Institutes on the matter. (Common Grace, pg 62)

Very good arguments here:

To say that the argument for Christianity and for the existence of God is absolutely valid I am merely applying the idea that God's revelation without and within man is perspicuous. If then man rightly interprets this revelation he has an absolutely valid argument for the truth. But the sinner, so far as he works from his adopted principle which rests in himself as autonomous, does not interpret the facts of the universe rightly. How could he? He assumes himself to be ultimate. He therefore assumes also that the facts of the universe are not created but exist in themselves. He also assumes that man's reasoning powers are ultimate and that they must therefore be determinative of what is possible and what is impossible in the realm of being.

Now in principle, the natural man interprets human experience upon these false assumptions. In principle he interprets all things in terms of man as the final reference point. And so he comes to the conclusion that god is some abstract principle beyond the cosmos, is some unifying principle within the cosmos, or is identical with the cosmos.

But the facts of the universe about him testify against such a distortion of them. Men ought to know, and know they ought to know and see God as their Creator and benefactor. They ought to see God as manifesting His wrath upon men when they behold the evils of nature. Similarly, they ought to see God as the Creator and benefactor when they behold themselves as image bearers of Him. They ought to see God as their judge when their conscience witnesses in approval or in disapproval of their deeds.

Man's depravity seen here again!

In order to receive knowledge we must also have God's general revelation and God's general internal revelation. (Common Grace and Christian Education, p 129)

So the interpretative effort, so far as it is self-conscious, is a means by which the natural man seeks to suppress the truth about God and the World that he has both about and within himself. But he cannot ever completely suppress the knowledge of God and of morality within himself. Dr. Masselink at one point expresses himself in a similar vein:

Can this disposition to receive knowledge ever be lost by sin? The answer is no, as it belongs to the image of God. The disposition through which we receive knowledge, however, is now corrupt. In the state of integrity before the Fall, the three means by which knowledge was received—disposition, natural revelation, and historical revelation—were all pure but now there is corruption. In Hell these three means continue too. The consciousness of the “I” is unchanged by sin, but the nature of “I” is changed. (ibid. 130)

This general revelation is basis for Common Grace, and not vice versa—Common Grace is basis for general revelation,—since general revelation is before the fall, and therefore existed before Common Grace. The image of God cannot be removed for two reasons: First, because it belongs to the essence of man, and, second, because man receives internal and external revelation. (ibid.)

Therefore prior to Common Grace, as its presupposition, we presuppose that man is of necessity confronted with the truth about himself as the creature of God. This objective truth about man himself, this ineradicable truth, this inescapable confrontation by God, man, so far as he thinks from his sinful principle, seeks to suppress. But he cannot suppress it. It comes to him with the pressure of God, the inescapable One. God’s revelation is everywhere, and everywhere perspicuous. Hence the theistic proofs are absolutely valid. They are but the restatement of the revelation of God, which, as Dr. Masselink says, is infallible. God the Holy Spirit presses the revelation of God, external and internal, upon man. I have not denied the general testimony of the Spirit any more than I have denied the validity of the theistic proofs. God the Holy Spirit presses upon men the revelation of God as being infallible, not as inherently unable to give certainty.

Even so, it is imperative that a distinction be made between what is the objective revelation of God, both external and internal, and what is our interpretation of that revelation. In preaching, the Reformed minister of the gospel seeks to bring the system of truth as given him in Scripture. But he does not claim that any sermon of his infallibly mediates the revelation of God to man. His sermons are true so far as they reflect the revelation of God. So too with the formulation of the theistic proofs, these are true so far as they reflect the revelation of God. They are true when they reflect scriptural procedure. And scriptural procedure involves making the ontological trinity the foundation of all predication.

But these arguments have often been stated otherwise. In the first place men have often formulated them and have built them upon the assumption of man as autonomous. This is, for instance, the case with Aristotle, with Descartes, with the British empiricists, with the rationalists, etc.

When the theistic proofs are thus constructed they do not convey the revelation of God; they then become the means of suppressing that revelation in terms of the monistic assumption of the natural man. How could “the theistic proofs” then be sound, for if they “prove” that the God of Aristotle exists, then they disprove that the God of Christianity exists.

Side note on natural theology, brute facts and traditional theism by Greg Bahnsen
My paraphrase from Greg Bahnsen’s teaching on problem with natural theology, the traditional theistic proofs:

[codeBF, brutefactdef, code524 & codebrute : isolated self-evident arguments, data in a void or uninterpreted raw data (Bahnsen: min-mark 27: <https://youtu.be/YmKKC70GIC4>) The unregenerate will only interpret these facts according to his [erroneous] presuppositions which is the error of natural theology (the traditional method of theistic proofs) as opposed to Rom. 1, a theology based upon revelation, where the whole of nature pictures God all at once, not by piecemeal increments of brute facts (bare facts), that in the natural mind (who naturally suppresses the knowledge of God), will only lead him to the probability of a finite God, not the God of Scripture; facts should not be isolated from the framework in which they come, that is they should be related to the plan of God to be rightly understood. Bahnsen explains this very well in that video on Natural Theology and the Proofs.]

Now it is the difference between theistic proofs when rightly and when wrongly constructed that I have been anxious to stress. It is this that I think has not been adequately stressed even in Bavinck. And this in spite of the fact that he has given us, perhaps better than other Reformed theologians, the means by which to distinguish between the right and the wrong way of reasoning about God. He has rejected the scholastic idea of natural theology. It was this scholastic natural theology that took into the Christian camp the false way of reasoning about God. It took over to a large extent the method of Aristotle. Bavinck himself has signalized the proofs as formulated wrongly as being invalid. Kuyper did the same thing. He assigned a subordinate place to apologetics just because he assumed that it sought to prove to “reason” that of which “reason” cannot be the judge.

In this criticism of the validity of the theistic proofs Kuyper too had a different position from that of “Old Princeton apologetics.” When I arrived at Princeton Seminary as a student, Professor William Benton Greene was the professor of apologetics. The method of apologetics that he taught was to a large extent based on Bishop Butler’s Analogy. It was based on the idea, as expressed by Butler, that there is an area or territory of interpretation on which Christians and non-Christians agree. To ask men to believe Christianity we must ask them only to apply the same principle of interpretation to Christianity and its phenomena that they have already applied to the realm of nature. Then they would have to admit that Christianity is very probably true as they had already admitted that God very probably exists.

In this method it is assumed that the reason of the natural man quite properly takes itself to be the judge of what is possible or impossible. Says Charles Hodge, Christians concede to reason the judicium contradictionis, that is, the prerogative of deciding whether a thing is possible or impossible. If it is seen to be impossible, no authority and no amount or kind of evidence can impose the obligation to receive it as true. (Systematic Theology, vol. 1 p 51)

Now I have criticized this Old Princeton apologetics in the way that Kuyper and Bavinck and Hepp have criticized positions similar to it. Dr. Samuel Volbeda says that this method of apologetics does not do justice to the Pauline statement that the natural man cannot receive the things of the Spirit since they are spiritually discerned.

Methodologically the Warfieldian scheme of Apologetics does not fit in with Reformed Hamartology and Soteriology. With you I believe that Apologetics should be so defined as not to carry with it implications contradictory of 1 Cor 2.14. 79

The Princeton method, so far as it worked by this method of appeal to the reason of man as such as the judge of the possible and the impossible, was flatly opposed to Old Princeton theology, according to which only that is possible which God in His sovereign will determines shall come to pass. Princeton apologetics did not live up to its own teaching in theology to the effect that the natural man must be born again unto knowledge. Princeton apologetics started with the non-believer from an abstract idea of possibility, based upon its calculations of what might probably happen, and then concluded that Christianity is very probably true.

But David Hume has long since shown the invalidity of such an argument. Abstract possibility presupposes the idea of Chance. And in Chance there are no probabilities, no tendencies one way or the other. And a Christianity that is probably true is not the Christianity of the Scripture.

So far as choice had to be made between the two positions, I took my position with Kuyper rather than with Hodge and Warfield. But there were two considerations that compelled me finally to seek a combination of some of the elements of each position. Negatively Kuyper was surely right in stressing that the natural man does not, on his principles, have any knowledge of the truth. But Hodge and Warfield taught the same thing in their theology. It was only in their apologetics that they did not lay full emphasis upon this teaching. Positively Hodge and Warfield were quite right in stressing the fact that Christianity meets every legitimate demand of reason. Surely Christianity is not irrational. To be sure, it must be accepted on faith, but surely it must not be taken on blind faith. Christianity is capable of rational defense. And what the Princeton theologians were really after when they said that Christianity is in accord with reason, is that it is in accord with the reason that recognizes its creatureliness and its sinfulness. It is only that the difference between the Christian and the non-Christian concepts of possibility and probability has not been adequately brought out by them.

The reason why these differences do not appear on the surface is that, as a matter of fact, all men are human beings who were created in the image of God. Even the non-regenerate therefore have in their sense of deity, though repressed by them, some remnant of the knowledge of God, and consequently of the true source and meaning of possibility and probability. It is to this remnant of a truly theistic interpretation of experience that Hodge really appeals when he speaks of the laws of belief that God has implanted in human nature. It is, of course, not only quite legitimate, but absolutely imperative to appeal to the "common consciousness" in this sense. But in order really to appeal to this "common consciousness" that is repressed by the sinner we must refuse to speak of a "common consciousness" that is not suppressed by the sinner.

The non-regenerate man seeks by all means to "keep under" this remnant of a true theistic interpretation that lingers in his mind. His real interpretative principle, now that he is a covenant breaker, is that of himself as ultimate and of impersonal laws as ultimate. It is he himself as ultimate, by means of laws of logic that operate independently of God, who determines what is possible and probable. To the extent, then, that he proceeds self-consciously from his own principle of interpretation, he holds the very existence of God, and, of the creation of the universe, to be not merely improbable, but impossible. In doing so he sins, to be sure, against his better knowledge. He sins against that which is hidden deep down in his own consciousness. And it is well that we should appeal to this fact. But in order to appeal to this fact we must use all caution not to obscure this fact. And obscure it we do if we speak of the “common consciousness” of man without distinguishing clearly between what is hidden deep down in the mind of natural man as the revelation and knowledge of God within him, and what, in rejecting God, he has virtually adopted as being his final interpretative principle. (Introduction to Systematic Theology, pg 39, 40)

Again in the case of Kuyper and Bavinck, is it not to the common consciousness of mankind as involved in Calvin’s idea of the sense of deity, as involved in the very idea of the image of God that they can and do allow as a legitimate point to which we may appeal with the gospel? In spite of their rejection of apologetics as that discipline which must establish the foundation of the truth of Christianity, and in spite of their insistence that the natural man has no affinity for the truth of Christianity, they yet themselves appeal to that which lives in the consciousness of every man but which every man as a sinner seeks to suppress. Further, through criticizing the sort of method that was used at Old Princeton, Kuyper and Bavinck often used that very same method themselves. They, too, often appealed to a common consciousness of man as containing a body of truth on which there is not much disagreement between Christians and non-Christians.

Of course it was with great diffidence and hesitation that I sought a solution for the apologetic problem and for the problem of common grace by the means of thus sorting out, rejecting the weaknesses in both positions, and building upon the solid foundation in both, derived from Calvin and ultimately from St. Paul. But it was impossible to ignore the differences between the two positions. It was also impossible to agree with the Old Princeton position to the effect that appeal must be made to reason without differentiating between a reason conceived of as autonomous and reason conceived of as created.

Finally, it was impossible to agree with what seemed to be a lowering of the claim for Christianity by Kuyper and Bavinck when they concluded from the fact that sinful man cannot of himself accept the truth to the idea that there is no objectively valid reason to be given for the truth.

Here then is, so far as I am now able to see, the direction in which we ought as Reformed Christians to travel.

1. The foundation of the thinking of both the Amsterdam and the Old Princeton men was that which both derived via Calvin from Paul, namely, the fact that God has unavoidably and clearly revealed Himself in general and in special revelation. The whole triune God is involved in this revelation. The whole triune God testifies to man in this revelation. This is the general testimony of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. It is nothing more than the Reformed philosophy of history. God controls and therefore manifests His plan in “whatsoever comes to pass.” It is His will of decree that comes to expression in a measure, in nature and in history. In this decree lies the basis, the unity, and the guarantee of the success of “science.”

2. Both the men of Amsterdam and the men of Old Princeton agree that God has promulgated to mankind in Adam His will of command. He set before mankind the task of subduing the earth. Here lies the command for all men to engage in the scientific enterprise. Here also lies the expression of the generally benevolent attitude of God to mankind. This is not grace, for grace presupposes sin. But it presupposes God’s favorable attitude toward man. All men are responsible for proper reaction to this assignment of task.

In His will of command God deals with man as a created person; He deals with him conditionally. God wants self-conscious covenant reaction to His will of command and promise. But the entire covenantal transaction takes place according to the counsel of God.

3. Amsterdam and Old Princeton agree that the relation between the will of decree and will of command cannot be exhaustively understood by man. Therefore every point of doctrine is a “difficult problem.” As men we must think analogically. God is the original and man is derivative. We must not determine what can or cannot be by argument that starts from the will of decree apart from its relation to the will of command. In particular we must not say that God cannot display any attitude of favor to the generality of mankind because we know that He intends that ultimately some are “vessels of wrath.” On the other hand we must not argue from the revealed will of God with respect to man’s responsibility to the denial of man’s ultimate determination by the will of decree. We need therefore at this point, which is all-inclusive, to be “fearlessly anthropomorphic.”

Applying this to the case in hand, we would say that we are entitled and compelled to use anthropomorphism not apologetically but fearlessly. (Common Grace, pg 73)

And to think analogically, to be fearlessly anthropomorphic, is to think concretely, for it is to take all the factors of revelation into consideration simultaneously. It is to admit that no theological problem can be fully solved exhaustively. The Council of Chalcedon excluded logical deductions based on anything short of a combination of all the factors of revelation with respect to the God-man. So in the problem of common grace we must not argue for differences without qualification or for identities without qualification. The former is done by Hoeksema; the latter is done if we insist that there must be a neutral territory between believers and unbelievers.

More on Total Depravity:

4. Amsterdam and Old Princeton agree on the doctrine of sin. Both teach total depravity. Total depravity for both means that sin has affected man in all his functions. But it does not merely mean that. It also indicates how deeply sin has affected all his functions. Man is “wholly defiled,” not partly defiled in all his functions. He hates God and his neighbor. He therefore seeks to suppress the truth within him. He worships and serves the creature more than the Creator. He cannot but sin.

5. Amsterdam and Old Princeton agree on the doctrine of election. Both teach that God from all eternity planned to redeem a people unto Himself. Disregarding the differences between infra- and supralapsarianism, all Reformed theologians, in accord with the Reformed confessions, teach that God is redeeming a people unto Himself. Those who are God's people are totally saved. They are saved in their every function. They are absolutely saved in principle. Paul calls them righteous and holy without qualification. John says they cannot sin.

6. Amsterdam and Old Princeton agree on the genuine significance of human responsibility. Their position has been called absolutist and determinist. It has been charged that with their doctrines of election and reprobation the "free offer of the gospel" would be meaningless. But Scripture teaches both the ultimate determination of the destiny of men by God and the fact that men die because of their sin. So both Amsterdam and Old Princeton, following Calvin, argued that the conditional is meaningful not in spite of, but because of, the plan of God in relation to which human responsibility takes place.

Hence both preached with conviction the universal or general offer of salvation to men as a class. They were not deterred by those who would impose "logic" upon Scripture either by way of rejecting election in favor of the sincerity of the general offer of the gospel, or by way of rejecting the sincerity of the offer of the gospel in favor of election. They thought concretely and scripturally rather than abstractively and deductively from one aspect of revelation.

7. Both Amsterdam and Old Princeton therefore taught common grace as well as the common offer of the gospel to the generality of mankind. From the beginning God had in mind His ultimate plan with respect to the final differentiations between men. Both infra and supralapsarians agree on this. But this did not reduce the favorable attitude toward mankind at the beginning of history. Why then should God's general favor not continue upon man even after the fall? Only if sin were taken to be the act of a being that is itself ultimate would that be the case. From eternity God rejected men because of the sin that they would do as historical beings. So He elected others because of the work that Christ would do for them and the Spirit would do within them in history. It is as true and as important thus to assert the significance of the historical whether as contemplated by God or as realized in fact as it is to say that history is what God intends by His plan that it shall be.

Thus the general favorable attitude toward mankind at the beginning of history becomes the sincere offer of the gospel and common grace to those who have sinned. All men were, because of sin, in the way of death (Calvin). To man as a class God comes with the sincere offer of the way of life (Rom 2). That is the general witness of the triune God to men.

Therefore God's good gifts to men, rain and sunshine in season, are genuinely expressive of God's favor unto them. At the same time they are a general testimony by which the Spirit of God labors with men to call them to repentance, and therefore to the fulfilment of the task originally assigned to mankind in Adam.

Therefore, also through common grace the natural man is enabled to do "good works."

Total depravity has two aspects, one of principle and one of degree. The first representative act of man was an act that resulted historically in the total depravity of the race. This act was performed against a mandate of God that involved mankind as a whole; without that “common mandate” it could not have been done; without that common mandate the “negative instance” would have been an operation in a void. Thus mankind came under the common wrath of God. But the process of differentiation was not complete. This common wrath, too, was a steppingstone to something further. The elect were to choose for God and the reprobate were each for himself to reaffirm their choice for Satan. The reprobate were to show historically the exceeding sinfulness of sin. Totally depraved in principle, they were to become more and more conformed in fact to the principle that controlled their hearts. (Common Grace, pg 91)

It will now be apparent why I have found it impossible to agree with Hepp in his evaluation of the theistic proofs. There are two ways of constructing a proof for the existence of God. These two ways are mutually exclusive. The one is in accord with the basic construction of Reformed theology; the other is destructive of it. The one begins with the presupposition of the existence of the triune God of the Scriptures. The other begins with the presupposition of man as ultimate.

The nature of sin: suppressing the knowledge of God... and misleading presuppositions of philosophy:

The true theistic proofs undertake to show that the ideas of existence (ontological proof), of cause (cosmological proof), and purpose (teleological proof) are meaningless unless they presuppose the existence of God. This involves interpreting human reason itself in terms of God. It involves saying that unless human reason regards itself as being what Scripture says it is, created in the image of God, that then it has no internal coherence. To this must be added that it involves the fact of sin as darkening the understanding and hardening the will. Yet no one but a Christian will admit these two truths about himself. By nature all men seek to suppress the facts of their sinfulness and creaturehood. They cannot succeed in fully suppressing this truth. As you cannot mop the figure off the surface of an indelible linoleum so man cannot erase his creatureliness and sinfulness, try as he may.

One of the most subtle and apparently effective ways by which the natural man seeks to cover his guilt is by “proving the existence of God” to himself. By that means he makes an idol for himself. Worshiping his idol, his god, he seeks to make himself believe that he has done all that may be expected of him.

That the gods produced by the “theistic proofs” are frequently nothing but idols is plain to any one familiar with the history of philosophy. Aristotle proved the existence of a god; there must, he reasoned, be an unmoved Mover back of all movement. Thomas Aquinas used essentially the same method that Aristotle did in proving the existence of God. Yet the god of Aristotle did not create the world, does not control it, is not even a person. Aquinas wanted to prove to those whose standard of judgment is reason rather than revelation that it is proper to believe in God. But the only god that he can rightfully hold to on this basis is such a god as no Christian should call God.

In modern times Descartes used the ontological argument. But he started from the idea that he knew his own nature as man without first or at the same time knowing that God exists. This assumption is the exact opposite of that from which Calvin starts. Calvin argues that not a word can truthfully be said about man himself unless it be presupposed that he is a creature of God. Accordingly

Descartes, as well as Aristotle, had at best a finite god. And a finite god is, from the Christian point of view, an idol.

It is therefore quite impossible to speak intelligently of the theistic proofs without distinguishing between the method by which a Christian believer and the method by which a non-Christian uses them.

It is therefore the essence of Protestantism, and in particular of the Reformed theology to reject the “natural theology” of Rome. Kuyper and Bavinck have done so in no uncertain terms. And so has Hepp. And the whole genius of “Old Princeton” was against it.

A truly Reformed apologetic cannot be worked out unless one follows closely in Calvin’s wake. Men ought to see God’s being as the being who is self-sufficient and self-contained. Men ought to see themselves as creatures, as beneficiaries of their Creator’s bounties. They ought to see themselves as under the law of God. And men cannot but see themselves as such. Yet such is the folly of sin, that men hold down the truth in unrighteousness. They do this by assuming that they participate in the being of God, or that God’s being is of a piece with theirs. So their systems of philosophy, based as they are on this monistic assumption, are means by which men seek to suppress the truth about themselves. The result is folly and ruin to themselves.

Note: “The monistic view makes no basic difference between Creator and creature, but rather presents being as uniform, though with gradations between lower and higher forms.” Wm Edgar, editor of Van Til’s book, Christian Apologetics, pg 31, footnote 3 [Van Til refers to this as “scale of being” in his writings.]

Either presuppose God and live, or presuppose yourself as ultimate and die. That is the alternative with which the Christian must challenge his fellow man.

If the Christian thus challenges his fellow man then he may be an instrument of the Spirit of God. The proofs of God then become witnesses of God; and witnesses of God are God witnessing to men. The theistic proofs therefore reduce to one proof, the proof which argues that unless this God, the God of the Bible, the ultimate being, the Creator, the controller of the universe, be presupposed as the foundation of human experience, this experience operates in a void. This one proof is absolutely convincing. To be sure, in so far as it is an interpretation of biblical and general revelation it cannot be assumed to be infallible. Only revelation to man (which includes revelation through man as a psychological being) is infallible. When man, even redeemed man, reinterprets this revelation, it cannot be said to be infallible in detail. Reformed theology does not attribute infallibility to its confessions. Yet the main points of doctrine of these confessions are, by Reformed men, assumed to be, for all practical purposes, a faithful reproduction of the truths of revelation.

It will now be apparent why I cannot agree with Hepp’s estimate of the proofs. Hepp does not distinguish between such proofs as are constructed upon true and such as are constructed upon false presuppositions. He simply speaks of the theistic proofs. He assumes that the non-believer can and does correctly interpret the revelation of God. After warning us against overestimating the value of the proofs Hepp says:

The so-called proofs for the existence of God are not at all without value. They teach us that nature within us and round about us witnesses of God. They convey in set formulas, the speech which comes to us from the cosmos as a whole (cosmological proof), from the world of ideas (ontological proof), from the moral world (moral proof), from history (historical proof), from the purposiveness nature of things (teleological proof) and testify to us constantly that God reigns and that He is the Creator of the ends of the earth who does not faint or grow weary. They press powerfully upon our consciousness. But—they cannot give us the last ground of certainty. (Testimonies Spiritus Sancti, p 152)

Against the type of argument developed by the Old Princeton apologetics Hepp therefore objects because it claims certainty for the proofs. But certainty, says Hepp, cannot be derived from revelation, since revelation comes through media, whether subjective or objective. Certainty, he contends, comes from the testimony of the Spirit only.

In this objection of Hepp's against too great a reliance on the theistic proofs he leaves untouched what constitutes, we believe, the one great fault in them. Hepp ignores the basic difference between a theistic proof that presupposes God and one that presupposes man as ultimate. And this is not an oversight. Hepp's whole doctrine of the general testimony of the Spirit is constructed with the purpose of showing that there are certain central truths on which all men agree. Non-Christians as well as Christians can, he argues, correctly interpret God's general revelation. They can together put this revelation in set formulas, as they do in the case of the theistic proofs. Thus they can and do, together believe in certain central truths.

Here then the Christian and the non-Christian together interpret God's general revelation and together come to the same conclusion, namely, that God exists. But they are not certain of this truth, for revelation cannot give certainty. So the Holy Spirit testifies within them, so as to bring certainty within them with respect to the conclusion of their process of reasoning.

All this is in effect to have lapsed into the natural theology of Romanism. The doctrine of the general testimony of the Holy Spirit as developed by Hepp is in itself no cure for natural theology. Hepp assumes that the natural man can and does, even on his own interpretative principle, correctly interpret the revelation of God on central questions. There is then an area of fact, of revelation which non-Christians and Christians together interpret correctly. There is then a neutral territory, a "territory between," where men can positively build together on the house of science.

In this area the Holy Spirit does not testify to the non-believer through the believer to the effect that he must turn from idols to the service of the living God. On the contrary, in this area the Spirit testifies to both believer and unbeliever that they are right in believing God. The Spirit, as it were, testifies to Calvin that he is right in thinking of God as his Creator and Judge, and also testifies to Spinoza that he is right in believing in the existence of God as identical with all reality. Or, if this be not so, then the Spirit must testify to the contentless form of God, it must testify to the fact that God exists without any indication as to what is the nature of that God.

Now either idea, the idea that the Spirit should testify to the existence of a finite god, or to the existence of a mere form, devoid of content, is directly contrary to Scripture. Nature within man and through the facts about man testifies that God as Creator, as controller of all things, and as judge, exists. It is to this that the Spirit testifies. And testifying to the existence of this God it testifies against the existence of such gods as men have made for themselves, often by means of the “theistic proofs.”

It is in this conception of the theistic proofs and of the general testimony of the Spirit witnessing to what they express, to this idea of central truths on which Christians and non-Christians are in agreement, that I have rejected. I have rejected it for the same reason for which I have rejected the method of the Old Princeton apologetics. And I have rejected both in view of my close adherence to the Old Princeton and the Amsterdam theology. It is, in short, because I hold the appeal to reason as autonomous to be both illegitimate and destructive from the point of view of Reformed faith that I am bound to reject Hepp’s position as well as that of Old Princeton apologetics. But happily I can do so in view of the theology that I have learned from Old Princeton and Amsterdam.

In this connection I may explain to you a remark I made recently on the occasion when Dr. Masselink and I debated the question of common grace. I argued that on the basis of such an apologetics as Old Princeton furnished us we were still on an essentially Romanist rather than on a Reformed basis. For it is of the essence of Romanism to argue with the non-believer on the ground of a supposedly neutral reason. No Reformed person could espouse such a position and then honestly claim that his position was uniquely Calvinistic and as such calculated to save science.

In this Context I contended that a doctrine of common grace that is constructed so as to appeal once more to a neutral territory between believers and non-believers is, precisely like Old Princeton apologetics, in line with a Romanist type of natural theology. Why should we then pretend to have anything unique? And why then should we pretend to have a sound basis for science? Nothing short of the Calvinistic doctrine of the all controlling providence of God, and the indelibly revelational character of every fact of the created universe, can furnish a true foundation for science. And how can we pretend to be able to make good use of the results of the scientific efforts of non-Christian scientists, if, standing on an essentially Roman basis, we cannot even make good use of our own efforts?

Why live in a dream world, deceiving ourselves and making false pretense before the world? The non-Christian view of science:

- (a) presupposes the autonomy of man;
- (b) presupposes the non-created character, i.e., the chance-controlled character, of facts; and,
- (c) presupposes that laws rest not in God but somewhere in the universe.

Now if we develop a doctrine of common grace in line with the teachings of Hepp with respect to the general testimony of the Spirit, we are incorporating into our scientific edifice the very forces of destruction against which that testimony is bound to go forth. Then “we might as well blow up the science building with an atom bomb.” I have apologized for that statement. But to the meaning intended then I subscribe today. We should as Reformed Christians be able to present a wellarticulated philosophy of knowledge in general and of science in particular in order to justify our independent educational institutions.

Chapter Seven
A Reply to Criticism
Common Grace and the Gospel
 Pgs. 196-208

In his syllabus Common Grace and Christian Education, Dr. William Masselink charged me with beginning my whole system of thought with the idea of the Absolute Ethical Antithesis. I made reply to this charge in A Letter on Common Grace. There I made it clear that I begin rather with the creation of man as made in the image of God. Following Calvin, I then speak of all men as unavoidably knowing God (Rom 1:19). All men, even after the fall, know, deep down in their hearts, that they are creatures of God; that they should therefore obey, but that they have actually broken, the law of God.

Human Depravity: [codeHD]

After the fall, therefore, all men seek to suppress this truth, fixed in their being, about themselves. They are opposed to God. This is the biblical teaching on human depravity. If we are to present the truth of the Christian religion to men we must take them where they are. They are: (a) creatures made in God's image, surrounded by a world that reveals in its every fact God's power and divinity. Their antithesis to God can never be metaphysical. They can never be anything but image bearers of God. They can never escape facing God in the universe about them and in their own constitution. Their antithesis to God is therefore an ethical one. (b) Because of God's common grace, this ethical antithesis to God on the part of the sinner is restrained, and thereby the creative forces of man receive the opportunity of constructive effort. In this world the sinner does many "good" things. He is honest. He helps to alleviate the sufferings of his fellow men. He "keeps" the moral law. Therefore the "antithesis," besides being ethical rather than metaphysical, is limited in a second way. It is one of principle, not one of full expression. If the natural man fully expressed himself as he is in terms of the principle of ethical hostility to God that dwells within his soul, he would then be a veritable devil. Obviously he is often nothing of the sort. He is not at all as "bad as he may be."

All of this is found in my various writings. It was pointed out especially in A Letter on Common Grace. Yet Dr. Masselink keeps repeating the idea that I start my whole system of thought from the idea of the Absolute Ethical Antithesis, and insists that I mean by this that man "at present is as bad as he can be." Torch and Trumpet, vol. 3, no. 6, p. 15; cf. also an article, "New Views Regarding Common Grace," in The Calvin Forum, April, 1954. 2 Calvin Forum, p. 174. 3 Torch and Trumpet, p. 15. Masselink says that according to Reformed theology the antithesis is "principlial," not absolute. "I do not believe that Reformed Theology ever speaks of an 'absolute ethical antithesis.' By 'Principial Antithesis' is meant that natural man in principle is dead in sin and completely depraved." (Calvin forum p 174). "Natural man, however, is absolutely depraved in principle." (Torch and Trumpet, p 15).

Masselink therefore also uses the term absolute with respect to the total depravity of man. And I have repeatedly used the qualification that the depravity is absolute only in principle. The only difference at this point seems to be that I add one more qualification than does Masselink. I am careful to note that the antithesis is ethical, and not metaphysical. I do not discover this distinction in Masselink. Perhaps this failure accounts for the fact that at other points he reasons as though the antithesis is not absolute in principle, even when this antithesis is conceived of ethically. I refer to the fact that he follows Dr. Valentine Hepp in his idea that there are general ideas of God, of man and the universe on which Christians and non-Christians have no principle difference. (cf. Letter on Common Grace).

In passing it may be noted that the usage of the phrase “absolute antithesis” is not so unheard of as Masselink surmises. So, for instance, Dr. Herman Kuyper uses it, and ties it in closely with the absoluteness of Christianity. He says: “In this connection it is in place to note that Calvin’s conception of common grace can help us in upholding the absoluteness of Christianity. Especially in recent years many who profess Christianity are unwilling to subscribe to the orthodox conception of Christianity as the only true religion. Instead of maintaining that there is an absolute antithesis between Christianity and all non-Christian religions, they prefer to look upon Christianity as the highest development of the seed of religion which is implanted in the heart of every man.”

The influence of sin:

A second point of criticism made on my views by Masselink and others pertains to the laws of logic. Says Masselink: “In his recent publication, ‘A Letter on Common Grace,’ Van Til says of reason in general that ‘such a thing does not exist in practice.’ The issue between us and Van Til does not at all concern a degree of difference in knowledge between the Christian and the non-Christian, but rather whether we with Kuyper can say that the laws of logic in natural man have not been completely destroyed by sin.”⁶ The reader will at once observe that it is wholly counter to the approach taken in this book to say that the laws of logic have been destroyed in the sinner. The whole point of the distinction between the antithesis as being ethical rather than metaphysical is that as a creature made in God’s image, man’s constitution as a rational and moral being has not been destroyed. The separation from God on the part of the sinner is ethical. How could it be metaphysical? Even the lost in the hereafter have not lost the power of rational and moral determination. They must have this image in order to be aware of their lost condition.

And this has a bearing on Masselink’s point that in my view the sinner’s consciousness would be entirely “devoid of ethical content.” “If this ‘God-consciousness and moral consciousness’ were entirely devoid of ethical content our Confession would be untrue when it speaks of ‘civil righteousness.’ ” (Torch and Trumpet, p15) But the distinction between a metaphysical and an ethical antithesis is made for the specific purpose of avoiding the idea that there could ever be a stage in which man can be entirely devoid of moral consciousness. It is because on the Romanist position this distinction cannot be made that the effect of sin is thought of in terms of the scale of being. Under the Aristotelian idea of the analogy of being, man, when “in puris naturalibus,” is well nigh devoid of ethical consciousness. It takes the donum superadditum, a metaphysical notion, in order to give him such a moral consciousness, even in paradise. [see Van Til @ code490 & code530] Then after the entrance of sin, when this donum superadditum is removed, man sinks down close to the bottom of being and almost loses his ability to discern good and evil.

It will be difficult for Masselink to keep from falling into this line of thinking. He seems to operate with the idea of the scale of being in the sentence following the one quoted. "In hell the antithesis between God and natural man is absolute. There is no common grace nor civil righteousness in perdition." Now it is true that there is no common grace in the estate of the lost. But are the lost "devoid of ethical content?" Does not their conscience smite them forever for having offended the holiness of God? Masselink makes the very idea of "ethical content" to depend upon the presence of common grace. He thereby shows that on his view common grace, in restraining the principle of sin, keeps men from falling into a state where they are no longer able to have moral awareness. This is in line with the Romanist idea of sin as having a deleterious metaphysical effect on man; it is out of line with Reformed thinking.

The whole question of the influence of sin, whether it is ethical or metaphysical, is centrally expressed in the idea that except for the entrance of common grace, the whole world, including man, would have fallen to pieces. Herman Kuyper quite rightly rejects this notion when he says: "We also refuse to subscribe to Calvin's teaching in 2, 2, 17 to the effect that the fall of man would have resulted in the destruction of our whole nature, including our reasoning power, if God had not spared us. Calvin here seems to forget that the revolt in the world of angels did not have for its result that the devils have lost all reasoning ability, and he also leaves out of consideration the fact that the lost souls who will one day inhabit the place of torment will remain men and will retain a certain measure of intellectual power."

In A Letter on Common Grace, I expressed the idea that we need to use the ideas of "metaphysical" and "ethical" in connection with the fall of man as limiting or supplementative notions. We have to speak as if sin would have destroyed the work of God. That was certainly its ethical intent. But we know that this is not an ultimate metaphysical possibility, for it was already, from all eternity, a part of the plan of God that sin should be defeated through the work of the Christ. Genuine advance in Reformed thinking has come about in the last generation by means of the use of Christian supplementative, or limiting concepts. This use has enabled G. C. Berkouwer and others to avoid some of the scholasticism that must otherwise obtain. Scholasticism appears when, on the ground of the idea of election, we deduce that God cannot in any sense whatever have any attitude of favor to mankind as a group. It also obtains when, because we hold to the idea of responsibility, we hold also that there can therefore be no election. It obtains too when we say there can be no equal ultimacy of the idea of election and reprobation in God, or when we say that Adam's choice for obedience was equally ultimate with his choice for disobedience. In short, without thinking of our theological concepts as being supplementative of one another, we fall into logicism. We reduce the significance of the stream of history to the static categories of logic.

The gift of logical reason was originally given by God to man in order that he might order the revelation of God in nature for himself. It was not given him that he might by means of it legislate as to what is possible and what is actual. When man makes a "system" for himself of the content of revelation given him in Scripture, this system is subject to, not independent of, Scripture. Thus the idea of system employed by the Christian is quite different from the idea of system as employed in modern philosophy.

Non-Christian thinking:

It is therefore pointless for Christians to tell non-Christians that Christianity is “in accord with the law of contradiction” unless they explain what they mean by this. For the non-Christian will take this statement to mean something entirely different from what the Christian ought to mean by it. The non-Christian does not believe in creation. Therefore, for him the law of contradiction is, like all other laws, something that does not find its ultimate source in the creative activity of God. Accordingly, the non-Christian will seek to do by means of the law of contradiction what the Christian has done for him by God. For the Christian, God legislates as to what is possible and what is impossible for man. For the non-Christian, man determines this for himself. Either positively or negatively the non-Christian will determine the field of possibility and therewith the stream of history by means of the law of contradiction.

This means that for the non-Christian the concepts that he employs while using the law of contradiction are taken to be exhaustive of the “essence of the thing” they seek to express. By taking each concept as wholly expressing the essence of a thing, non-Christian thought seeks to express the whole of reality, even of temporal reality, in terms of concepts that are static. Even when it is admitted, as it generally is in modern thought, that reality is exhaustively temporal and therefore not at all, or not fully, expressible in terms of concepts, still it is maintained or assumed that what is expressed by means of concepts is all that man can know. Men may then speak of revelation as another means of knowing reality. They may even say that this other reality is more basic than the reality that is known through conceptual manipulation. They will then posit a dualism between the idea of faith by which this wholly other reality is “known” and reason by which the world of phenomena is known. In any case the genuine significance of the facts of history is destroyed.

This is most clearly illustrated in the case of dialectical theology, In order to maintain the uniqueness of the facts of history this theology thinks it necessary to speak of primal history (Geschichte) in distinction from ordinary history (Historie). Ordinary history cannot, say Barth and Brunner, manifest anything unique. Ordinary history is history as the secular mind thinks of it. That is to say, history must be interpreted by means of concepts, and these concepts, in their view, kill all individuality. Concepts, we are told, can deal only with abstract essences. The individual is by means of these concepts reduced to an instance of a class. In fact, the individual is wholly lost in the concepts that describe it.

It is only in Reformed theology that the means are available to oppose this modern approach. That is not because Reformed theology has access to some means of manipulation of reality not open to other men. It is rather because only in Reformed theology is full justice done to the idea of God as man’s creator. If God is really man’s creator then man’s thinking must be thought of as being analogical. Therefore his concepts cannot rightly be employed as the instruments of a deductive system. These concepts must be employed as means by which to display the richness of God’s revelation. When the apparently contradictory appears, as it always must when man seeks to know the relation of God to himself, there will be no denial of concepts such as election or human responsibility in the name of the law of contradiction. Applied to the general problem of common grace, the idea of limiting or supplementative concepts means that we shall not deny common grace nor, on the other hand, hold to a common grace that creates a neutral territory between believers and unbelievers.

The Image Of God In Man

Van Til

Code479

The necessity for the use of the idea of the limiting or supplementative concept may be illustrated further by observing what happens if it is not used with respect to the idea of man as the image-bearer of God.

It is customary in Reformed circles to distinguish between the image of God in the wider and the image of God in the narrower sense. But difficulty develops if we do not clearly stress that this distinction is not to be carried through deductively. This difficulty may be indicated by a brief summary of the work on The Image of God (Het Beeld Gods) by Abraham Kuyper, Jr. The image of God in the wider sense, Kuyper says, must be found in the essence of man. And this essence of man remains unchanged in fallen man. "Man has been permitted to keep much, and is, in spite of his deep fall, capable of much, because he has kept the image of God in its essence and because Common Grace came to his assistance." "This image of God cannot be lost since, if man could lose it, he would at the moment of losing it, cease to be a human being. The image of God in the wider sense (sensu latiore) has reference to the human in man, to that whereby man, in distinction from all other creatures, is man and not an angel or an animal or a plant."

Summarizing his own discussion of the image in the wider sense as being the unchangeable essence of man, Kuyper says that it must be sought in the first place in the "I through which man is a person, and then further in the two capacities which this marvelous 'I' controls, the capacity to know and the capacity to will ..." The image of God in the narrower sense is said to consist of true knowledge, righteousness and holiness. As usual, Eph 4.23–24 and Col 3.10 Eph 4.23–24, Col 3.10 are quoted in support of this. Kuyper also speaks of immortality as part of the image of God. But we need not, for our purpose, follow his analysis in detail. Our interest turns to the fact that this image in the narrower sense is said to be lost. "Thus the image of God in the narrower sense consisted of true knowledge, righteousness and holiness. This image was lost, and in its place there came blindness, guilt, and sinfulness." This image is lost, it disappears.

Common grace's effect on the image of God:

What, we are tempted to ask, is the effect of the disappearance of this image in the narrower sense upon the image in the wider sense? The latter, it will be remembered, cannot, according to Kuyper, Jr., be lost. It is therefore called "the image as such" (als zoodanig). And the knowledge of this image as such is called knowledge as such. Yet through sin the reason which belongs to the unchangeable essence of man is said to be darkened. His immortality that he possessed in paradise is lost. There is no longer any righteousness in his will. Can we then continue to say that the essence of man, his person, his reason and will, have in no wise been affected by the true righteousness, true knowledge, and true holiness? Or if we continue to say that the essence of man remains unchanged while his nature changes, does anything then remain to be said about this essence at all? Has it not become an entirely featureless entity?

Similar problems confront us with respect to the image of God in the narrower sense. Is it so loosely, so “accidentally” related to the essence of man that it can be lost without affecting that essence at all? Is the essence of man, the human personality, the image as such, with knowledge as such, completely devoid of ethical content? If so, is the ethical content to be a gift of pre-redemptive common grace after the fashion of the Romanist donum superadditum? [see Van Til @ code490 & code530] Then special grace after the fall would be greater grace, but grace of the same sort that man was given before the fall. Thus the initial antithetical distinction between a changeless essence and a changing nature turns into its opposite. Since the essence cannot in every sense be maintained to be unaffected by the loss of the perfect nature, sin has a damaging effect on the essence of man after all. Common grace is then required to save the metaphysical situation intact. “God the Lord intervened with Common Grace, a grace given to man as man, through which sin was restrained, the curse was checked, and natural life on earth, however drastically changed, was maintained. A human race could develop itself, and history could begin its course. Without the entrance of Common Grace this would have been altogether impossible.”

On the other hand the remnants of the image of God that remain in the sinner are said to be remnants of the image in the narrower sense. “The image of God does not consist only in true knowledge and service of God, and in righteousness and holiness, of which remnants are preserved in the religious feeling and in the moral life of the natural man, but also in the kingly control over the earth by man.” It is in line with this that the author says: “Without the entrance of Common Grace man would have lost the image of God, and would have come to the full expression of bitter hostility to God and to a life explosive with sin and unrighteousness. The life of his soul would have become like that of a devil, with respect to whom we cannot speak of common grace at all.” 23

Thus common grace is interchangeably said to be that which preserves some remnants of the image of God in the wider sense, and some of the remnants of the image of God in the narrower sense. In the former case common grace is required to save the metaphysical situation intact. Thus we are virtually back with the Romanist concept of the donum superadditum (see code530). In the latter case common grace seems to be a means of toning down the doctrine of total depravity. The “remnants” of the image of God in the natural man then appear to be little specks of true knowledge, true righteousness, and true holiness. The difference between the believer and the unbeliever then becomes one of degree. [a key distinction!]

It appears then that if we do use such concepts as “essence” and “nature” without stipulating that they are limitative and supplementative of one another, we not only get into confusion and contradiction, but we are inadvertently led into positions which we were trying to avoid.

All this is not surprising. In a non-Christian methodology such as Romanism took over from Aristotle, man is the final point of reference in predication. On this basis man is not regarded as the creature of God. His intellect is therefore not thought of as being dependent upon God. To be sure, the word analogy is used to describe the relation of human to divine thought. But on the Aristotelian basis this idea of analogy is based upon the idea of participation rather than upon the idea of creation. [\[Search for 'proofs' in Van Til on this further on at codeproofs\]](#) Man is thought of as participating in the being of divinity by means of his intellect. By means of his concepts he is supposed to discover the essence of reality as something that is wholly changeless. Change in the created universe is then taken to be the same as Chance. Individual facts of the created world are taken to be characterized by Chance. Or if they have any reality at all it must be because they somehow participate in the eternity of the divine being. The result is that when man seeks to order the facts of the temporal world he must find their reality in a world of essences that are non-temporal. To thus explain the facts of history is, therefore, on this basis, to explain away the individuality that was to be explained. In using this Aristotelian scheme and applying it to the idea of the image of God in man, Romanist theology was driven to the idea of the scale of being. Near to non-being is man in puris naturalibus. He is there practically without ethical content. The ethical content must be placed upon him artificially by means of the idea of potential participation in divinity.

Hard to understand here:

Surely it is of the greatest importance for Reformed theology to use the concept of the image of God in man in truly analogical fashion, that is, with the definite intent to think as creatures who are called upon to give order to the revelation of God. Using human concepts analogically means to be deeply conscious, moment by moment, that each concept employed must constantly be subject to the whole of the revelation of God. And this implies the setting of such concepts as the essence of man and the nature of man in a definite relationship of correlativity to one another. The idea of the essence of man simply cannot be taken as standing for something wholly unchangeable. And the idea of nature cannot stand for something that can wholly change. So we find that in actual practice modifications are constantly being used. The essence is said to be affected by the change the nature undergoes. And the nature is itself in need of a "nature" within itself that is not wholly subject to change. When, therefore, the two notions are taken as beings self-consciously in supplementation of one another, better justice is done to the content of the revelation that one intends to express. Then the man who is created perfect, who falls into sin, who is the recipient of common and in some cases special grace, is seen in his historical development.

Then too, the doctrine of common grace can do better justice to the historical development of man. The scholastic view is in the nature of the case bound to do injustice to the significance of history. One of two things always takes place. Either an absolute and artificial separation is made between the essence and the nature of man, or, if the separation is overcome, it is overcome by reducing the distinction to one of degree. The metaphysical and the ethical are either wholly separated or they are reduced to differences of degree. [\[that's interesting\]](#)

Looking to the past, this appears in the following manner. The idea of grace, whether special or common, is said to be wholly inapplicable to pre-redemptive man because it is exclusively applicable to man who has become a sinner. This might seem to be in the interest of stressing the significance of the historical, that is, the significance of the fact of the fall of man. In reality this would lead to the destruction of the historical by reducing it to the non-rational or irrational. It is the sort of thing that one finds when it is asserted that Adam's choice in paradise for good was equally ultimate with his choice for evil. This is the essentially Arminian idea that God does not control whatsoever comes to pass but that man's deeds are ultimate. On the other hand, when, on this scholastic basis, a continuation is sought between God's attitude toward man before and after the fall, this is sought along metaphysical rather than along ethical lines. That man is not wholly a demon (an ethical notion) is reduced to, or at least commingled with, the idea that man has the power of distinguishing good and evil, which Satan and the lost hereafter also have. Then common grace becomes interchangeably that which maintains the remnants of the image of God in the wider or the image of God in the narrower sense of the term. In order to avoid the idea that man should be wholly devoid of ethical content it is thought necessary that he have remnants of the "true knowledge" and true morality such as Adam had.

With singular sagacity Calvin avoided this scholastic approach when he spoke of the revelation of God as penetrating into the penetralia of man's psychological being. The sense of deity is the principle of continuity which he presupposes as that in relation to which the ethical reaction of man takes place. And this means that man is always reacting ethically to this revelation of God. He first lives under the general favor of God and reacts favorably. Then he reacts unfavorably and comes under the curse of God. So far as his ethical attitude is concerned this is in principle entirely hostile to God. Then grace comes upon the scene, both saving and non-saving grace. It does not preserve some remnants either of the image of God in the wider or in the narrower sense, if these should be taken in scholastic form. How can common grace keep sin from being principal hostility to God? There are no degrees in the principle of depravity. In this narrower sense the image of God has been lost. On the other hand, common grace does not preserve remnants of the image in the wider sense, if this image is thought of as that which is unchangeable. How can remnants be saved of that which was never subject to change?

Nor is it adequate to say, "By Common Grace He curbs sin, by Special Grace He purges from sin." (After criticizing me for not doing justice to the "positive operations" of common grace, Masselink continues to define common grace in purely negative terms.) Special grace restrains sin as well as does common grace. In fact, if it were not for the restraining activity of saving grace in the world there would be no restraining activity of common grace. On the other hand, not only saving grace acts positively; common grace does too. It enables man to do many positive things which he would otherwise not be able to do. And the principle of continuity presupposed in all this is the idea of the image of God as itself revelational of God. The Holy Spirit testifies to man through his own constitution as well as through the facts of the universe around him, that he is God's offspring and should act as such. The sinner seeks to suppress this revelation within himself and around him. He cannot do so fully. He continues to be an image bearer of God; even the lost hereafter will be image bearers of God. They will continue to receive the revelation of God within their own constitution; they cannot be devoid of ethical reaction. So the remnants of which the confession speaks cannot refer to the fact of man's religiosity or to the fact that he knows the difference between good and evil. His knowing this difference is the presupposition of his sinning against God, and therefore also of his being in any wise the recipient of God's grace, either saving or non-saving. Common grace is therefore a favor to sinners by which they are kept from working out to the full the principle of sin within them and thereby are enabled to show some measure of involuntary respect and appreciation for the law of God that speaks to them even through their own constitution as well as through the facts of the world outside.

Christian Apologetics (Authority and Reason)

Important subjects: Rome's theology about man's supposed autonomy, autonomous reason and feelings, and the subject of "mystery," brute fact, God's sovereignty over man, Rome's "expert" view idea, and the concept of "chance," etc. And then a good discussion on Arminianism's view of election in view of man's responsibility.

Note on Brute facts: my paraphrase from Greg Bahnsen's teaching on Natural Theology and the Proofs:

[codeBF, brutefactdef, and code524 & codebrute : Brute facts are isolated self-evident arguments, data in a void or uninterpreted raw data (Bahnsen: min-mark 27: <https://youtu.be/YmKKC70GIC4>) The unregenerate will only interpret these facts according to his [erroneous] presuppositions which is the error of natural theology (the traditional method of theistic proofs) as opposed to Rom. 1, a theology based upon revelation, where the whole of nature pictures God all at once, not by piecemeal increments of brute facts (bare facts), that in the natural mind (who naturally suppresses the knowledge of God), will only lead him to the probability of a finite God, not the God of Scripture; facts should not be isolated from the framework in which they come, that is they should be related to the plan of God to be rightly understood. Bahnsen explains this very well in that video on Natural Theology and the Proofs.]

The general principles of methodology that have been discussed in the preceding chapter must now be applied more fully to the problem of authority. Here, if anywhere, the difference between the Protestant and the Roman Catholic methodology becomes clearly apparent. For Rome the authority of the church, in particular that of the Pope, speaking ex cathedra is ultimate; for Protestantism the Scripture stands above every statement of the church and its teachers.

The question that now requires fuller discussion is as to how the Roman Catholic and how the Protestant approaches the non-believer on the question authority.

I

Non-Christian Views

To answer this question, it is well that we begin by asking what place the non-believer himself attributes to authority. And in order to discover the place allowed to authority by the natural man it is imperative to note what he means by authority.

There are those, of course, who deny that they need any form of authority. They are the popular atheists and agnostics. Such men say that they must be shown by "reason" whatever they are to accept as true. But the great thinkers among non-Christian men have taken no such position. They know that they cannot cover the whole area of reality with their knowledge. They are therefore willing to admit that there may be others who have information that they themselves do not possess. In everyday life this sort of thinking is illustrated in the idea of the expert. A medical doctor knows much about the human body that the rest of us do not know. Then among medical men there are those who, because of natural ability, industry and opportunity, make such discoveries as their fellows do not make. So everywhere and in all respects the lesser minds are bound to submit to the authority of greater minds.

In putting the matter in this way the nature of the authority that can be allowed by the natural man is already indicated. The natural man will gladly allow for the idea of authority if only it be the authority of the expert in the use of reason. Such a conception of authority is quite consistent with the assumption of the sinner's autonomy. [I think John 5:43 has direct bearing on Van Til's conclusion on the expert idea: "I have come in my Father's name, and you do not receive me. If another comes in his own name, you will receive him." i.e., they do not receive Christ's authority, but only that of men, they receive them because they are like themselves, seemingly autonomous!]

On the other hand, the conception of authority as something that stands "above reason" is unacceptable to the natural man. But it is not easy to distinguish in every instance when authority is considered to be "above reason." There are some forms of authority that might seem, at first sight, to be "above reason" while in reality they are not. Some discussion of this matter must therefore precede our analysis of the difference between the Roman Catholic and the Protestant methods of presenting the authority of Christianity to the natural man. Let us note then some of the forms of authority that are quite acceptable to the natural man because, in his mind, they do not violate the principle of autonomy.

First there is the need for authority that grows out of the existence of the endless multiplicity of factual material. Time rolls it ceaseless course. It pours out upon us an endless stream of facts. And the stream is really endless on the non-Christian basis. For those who do not believe that all that happens in time happens because of the plan of God, the activity of time like to that, or rather is identical with that of Chance. Thus, the ocean of facts has no bottom and no shore. It is this conception of the ultimacy of time and of pure factuality on which modern philosophy, particularly since the days of Kant, has laid such great stress. And it is because of the general recognition of the ultimacy of chance that rationalism of the sort that Descartes³, Spinoza, and Leibnitz represented, is out of date. It has become customary to speak of post-Kantian philosophy as irrationalistic. It has been said that Kant limited reason so as to make room for faith.⁴ Hence there are those who are willing to grant that man's emotions or his will can get in touch with such aspects of reality as are not accessible to the intellect. The intellect, it is said, is not the only, and in religious matters not even the primary instrument with which men come into contact with what is ultimate inhuman experience. There is the world of the moral imperative, of aesthetic appreciation, of the religious a priori as well as the world of science. There is in short the world of "mystery" into which the prophet or genius of feeling or of will may lead us.

It is of the greatest import to note that the natural man need not in the least object to the kind of authority that is involved in the idea of irrationalism. And that chiefly for two reasons. In the first place the irrationalism of our day is the direct lineal descendant of the rationalism of previous days. The idea of pure chance has been inherent in every form of non-Christian thought in the past. It is the only logical alternative to the position of Christianity according to which the plan of God is back of all. Both Plato and Aristotle were compelled to make room for it in their maturest thought. The pure "non-being" of the earliest rationalism of Greece was but the suppressed "otherness" of the final philosophy of Plato. So too the idea of pure factuality or pure chance as ultimate is but the idea of “otherness” made explicit. Given the non-Christian assumption with respect to man’s autonomy the idea of chance has equal rights with the idea of logic.

In the second place modern irrationalism has not in the least encroached upon the domain of the intellect as the natural man thinks of it. Irrationalism has merely taken possession of that which the intellect, by its own admission, cannot in any case control. Irrationalism has a secret treaty with rationalism by which the former cedes to the latter so much of its territory as the latter can at any given time find the forces to control. Kant’s realm of the noumenal has, as it were, agreed to yield so much of its area to the phenomenal, as the intellect by its newest weapon can manage to keep in control. Moreover, by the same treaty irrationalism has promised to keep out of its own territory any form of authority that might be objectionable to the autonomous intellect. The very idea of pure factuality or chance is the best guarantee that no true authority, such as that of God as the Creator and Judge of men, will ever confront man. [Key point! Man knows God, but is suppressing him at every corner. Romans 1] If we compare the realm of the phenomenal as it has been ordered by the autonomous intellect to a clearing in a large forest we may compare the realm of the noumenal to that part of the same forest which has not yet been laid under cultivation by the intellect.

Side note: The phenomenal world is the world we are aware of; this is the world we construct out of the sensations that are present to our consciousness. The noumenal world consists of things we seem compelled to believe in, but which we can never know (because we lack sense-evidence of it).

Van Til speaks on chance: Now it is this basically and exclusively revelatory character of all the facts of the universe that is either openly or covertly denied by both rationalist and irrationalist forms of heresy. Both hold to a non-Christian view of possibility. Both hold that it is at least possible that the facts of the universe can be something other than revelatory of God. And this is, in effect, to posit chance as equally ultimate with God. And positing chance as equally ultimate with God is virtually the same as denying the existence of God. To say that the evidence, when fully and fairly considered, merely shows that God probably exists is tantamount to saying that he does not at all exist. The God of Christianity is the God whose counsel or plan is the source of possibility. The word possibility has no possible meaning excerpt upon the presupposition of the existence of the self-contained ontological Trinity as the source of it.

It should be noted, too, that in presupposing chance, rationalism is as irrationalistic as is irrationalism. Rationalism is secretly, while irrationalism is frankly and openly, addicted to a philosophy of chance. Both rationalism and irrationalism are therefore committed to a form of empiricism that is utterly out of accord with Christian theism [an orthodox study of God]. Though both are committed to a supposedly neutral attitude, an attitude that is willing to find in the facts whatsoever there is to be found, it is a foregone conclusion that they will never find Christian theism there. Having presupposed chance back of the facts, they can find chance and nothing but chance in the facts.²¹ An Introduction to Systematic Theology, pg 197-198

²¹Rationalism is irrationalist because it claims chance. Irrationalism is rationalist because it is committed to neutrality.

My Side note on natural theology, brute facts and traditional theism by Greg Bahnsen
My paraphrase from Greg Bahnsen's teaching on problem with natural theology, the traditional theistic proofs:

Brute facts are isolated assumed self-evident arguments, data in a void or uninterpreted raw data (Bahnsen: min-mark 27: <https://youtu.be/YmKKC70GIC4>) The unregenerate will only interpret these facts according to his [erroneous] presuppositions which is the error of natural theology (the traditional method of theistic proofs) as opposed to Rom. 1, a theology based upon revelation, where the whole of nature pictures God all at once, not by piecemeal increments of brute facts, that, in the natural mind (who naturally suppresses the knowledge of God), will only lead him to the probability of a finite God, not the God of Scripture; facts should not be isolated from the framework in which they come. Bahnsen explains this very well in that video on Natural Theology and the Proofs.] see also codebrute

The realm of mystery is on this basis simply the realm of that which is not yet known. And the service of irrationalism to rationalism may be compared to that of some bold huntsman in the woods who keeps all lions and tigers away from the clearing. This bold huntsman covers the whole of the infinitely extended forest, ever keeping away all danger from the clearing. This irrationalistic Robin Hood is so much of a rationalist that he virtually makes a universal negative statement about what can happen in all future time. In the secret treaty spoken of he has assured the intellect of the autonomous man that the God of Christianity cannot possibly exist and that no man therefore needs to fear the coming of a judgment. If the whole course of history is, at least in part, controlled by chance, then there is no danger that the autonomous man will ever meet with the claims of authority as the Protestant believes in it. For the notion of authority is but the expression of the idea that God by his counsel controls all things that happen in the course of history.

There is a second kind of authority that the natural man is quite ready to accept. It does not spring, as did the first, from the fact that the intellect can by definition not control the whole realm of chance. It springs from the fact that even that which the intellect does assert about the objects of knowledge is, of necessity, involved in contradiction. F. H. Bradley's great book, Appearance and Reality, has brought out this point with the greatest possible detail. The point is not that the many philosophers who have speculated on the nature of reality have actually contradicted each other and themselves. The point is rather that in the nature of the case all logical assertion with respect to the world of temporal existence must needs be, it is said, self-contradictory in character.

On this assumptions of the natural man logic is a timeless impersonal principle, and facts are controlled by chance. It is by means of universal timeless principle of logic that the natural man must, on his assumptions, seek to make intelligible assertions about the world of reality or chance. But this cannot be done without falling into self-contradictions. About chance, no manner of assertion can be made. In its very idea it is the irrational. And how are rational assertions to be made about the irrational? If they are to be made, then it must be because the irrational is itself wholly reduced to the rational. That is to say if the natural man is to make any intelligible assertions about the world of “reality” or “fact” which, according to him is what it is for no rational reason at all, then he must make the virtual claim of rationalizing the irrational. To be able to distinguish one fact from another fact he must reduce all time existence, all factuality to immovable timeless being. But when he had done so he has killed all individuality and factuality as conceived of on his basis. Thus, the natural man must on the one hand assert that all reality is not-structural in nature and on the other hand that all reality is structural in nature. He must even assert on the one hand that all reality is non-structurable in nature and on the other hand that he himself has virtually structured all of it. Thus, all his predication is in the nature of the case self-contradictory.

Realizing this dilemma, many modern philosophers have argued that any intellectual system of interpretation is therefore no more than a perspective.⁶ No system, these men assert, should pretend to be more than a system “for us.” We have to deal with reality as if it will always behave as we have found it behaving in the past. The world of appearance formed by means of the exercise of the intellect must be taken as “somehow” similar to the world of Reality. And thus we seem to have come again upon the idea of mystery, the world of “faith” and of “authority” where prophets and seers may suggest to us the visions they have seen in night.

Such then seems to be the present situation. Modern philosophy in practically all of its schools admits that all its speculations end in mystery. Speaking generally, modern philosophy (and science) is phenomenalistic [by senses only, what we are conscious of]. It admits that ultimate reality is unknowable to man. All systems of interpretation are said to be necessarily relative to the mind of man. And so it seems at first sight that modern philosophy ought, on its own principles, to admit that there is a dimension of reality that is beyond its reach and about which it ought therefore to be ready to listen by the avenue of authority. Modern philosophy would seem to be ready therefore to listen to the vice of “religion.” So far instance Dorothy Emmet⁷ views the matter.

“The heart of religion, as far as I can see it, seems to be an intuitive response to something which evokes our worship. Let me first explain what I here understand by ‘intuitive.’ I am using the word to mean a kind of apprehension which is reached by methods other than those of critical reflection. It is the kind of apprehension we use when we grasp the character of a person, or the demands of a situation, without being aware of the steps by which we have arrived at our judgment.”

⁷Dorothy M. Emmet (1904-2000) was a British political philosopher whose interests included metaphysics and social theory. For more than twenty years she was professor of philosophy at the university of Manchester.

On such a view it might seem that one should be able to accept the authority of Jesus. And Miss Emmet can allow for the authority of Jesus. But it is still no more than the authority of the expert. For those who think as she does, Jesus is nothing more than the kind of person they would like to be and could be if only they lived up to their own ideals.

The natural man then assumes that he has the final criterion of truth within himself. [Key point!] Every form of authority that comes to him must justify itself by standards inherent in man and operative apart from the authority that speaks. But what has been said has dealt only with modern philosophy. A word must be added about modern theology. Surely we shall find here a more ready recognition of the need of authority! More than that we shall expect to find here the advocates of authority! But in this we are disappointed. Modern theology is, to be sure, ready to defend the need and place of authority. But it will defend no authority that is not acceptable to modern philosophy and science. It too advocates the authority of the expert only.

II Modern Theological Views

It needs no argument to prove this contention true with respect to Schleiermacher,⁹ the father of modern theology. His great work The Christian Faith is largely controlled in its epistemology by the principle of Kant's Critique of Pure Reason. He speaks, to be sure, of the religious man and of his absolute dependence upon God. He seems to limit the claims of the human intellect. He says that by means of it we cannot reach God. It is by our feeling of dependence that we have contact with God. But in all this he is simply setting forth a religious phenomenalism. [one based on feelings/senses] It is no virtue to decry the autonomous intellect if one sets up in its stead an autonomous feeling. And that is precisely what Schleiermacher does. In his theology it is still the human personality as such that has the final criterion of truth within itself.

⁹Friedrich D. E. Schleiermacher (1768-1834) is sometimes called the "father of modern theology," in part, because he is the first well-known theologian to incorporate Kant's philosophy into his theology.

For a contemporary discussion of the relation between authority and reason on the part of a great churchman and a great philosopher we may turn to the work of A. E. Taylor, The Faith of a Moralist. Taylor pleads for a place for authority in human thought. But no authority, he says, can be absolute. An absolute authority could not be transmitted through history and if it could be transmitted it could not be received. The mind of man contributes to all that it receives. Kant has taught us this once for all and we cannot depart from it. Hence no orthodox doctrine of authority can ever be accepted. Such is the burden of Taylor's argument and it is typical of what one hears in varying forms.

The late archbishop William Temple also asks for no higher authority than that of the expert in his work, Nature, Man and God, London, 1925. The spiritual authority of revelation, he contends, "depends wholly upon the spiritual quality of what is revealed." And whether what is revealed be spiritual, of that, argues Temple in effect, man himself must ever be the final judge.

But what of Karl Barth and Emil Brunner?¹³ Have they not bravely contended for the "absolutely other" God? Are not they the "theologians of the Word"? Look at the lashing Barth gives the "consciousness theologians," the followers of Schleiermacher and Ritschl, just because they have been virtual ventriloquists, speaking in the name of God that which in reality proceeds only from themselves. (Dogmatik, 1927). Note too with what increasing consistency through the periods of his development Barth has set his theology over against that of "modern Protestantism." A true theology, argues Barth, has its chief canon in the first commandment, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me" instead of in the logic of Aristotle or Kant. A true theology must break with all systems of philosophy, with all Promethean constructions of the human intellect and reach man in the depth of his being with the voice of God's authority speaking in its own name. Here then it would seem that among all the "types of modern theology" we have found one that stands up like a Daniel against modern philosophy and science with the voice of the living God.

Sad to say, however, the "absolutely other" God of Barth is absolutely other only in the way that a sky-rocket is "absolutely other" to the mind of the child. Barth's god has first been cast up into the heights by the projective activity of the world-be auton-escape it, [?] still controlled by some form of modern critical philosophy. And this means that the mind of man is always thought of as contributing something ultimate to all the information it receives. Accordingly, the "absolutely other" god of Barth remains absolute just so long as he is absolutely unknown. In that case he is identical with the realm of mystery which the autonomous man admits of as existing beyond the reach of his thought. It then has no more content and significance than the vaguest conception of something indeterminate. There is no more meaning in the idea of God as Barth holds it than there was in the idea of the apeiron, the indefinite, of Anaximander the Greek philosopher. On the other hand, when the god of Barth does reveal himself he reveals himself wholly. For Barth God is exhaustively known if he is known at all. That is to say to the extent that this god is known he is nothing distinct from the principles that are operative in the universe. He is then wholly identical with man and his world, it appears then that when the god of Barth is wholly mysterious and as such should manifest himself by revelation only, he remains wholly mysterious and does not reveal himself. On the other hand, when this god does reveal himself his revelation is identical with what man can know apart from such a revelation. Thus, there is absolute authority which either says nothing or when it says something has lost its character as authority. And the fact that Barth thinks of revelation dialectically means in this connection only that his god is both absolutely hidden and absolutely revealed simultaneously. And this can be maintained only if the very idea of authority as orthodox Christianity conceives of it on the basis of the Creator- creature distinction has first been discarded.^A If this distinction is maintained there can be no such dialectical relationship between the hidden and the revealed character of God. In that case God cannot, to be sure, ever reveal himself exhaustively. The mind of man is finite and knows only by thinking God's thoughts after him. But what it knows it then knows truly. It has at its disposal the revelation of God. This revelation does not hide God while it reveals him; it reveals him truly, though not exhaustively.

^AcodeCC1 Van Til states: The distinction between the approach of the "ancient" mind and the "modern" mind is not fundamental. The "objectivism" of the ancient mind is only gradationally distinct from the "subjectivism" of the modern mind. There is not true transcendence in Platonism, Aristotelianism, or Stoicism, any more than there is in modern existentialism and dialecticism.

The only distinction that will set off the Christian Approach to knowledge and reality and therefore also the Christian doctrine of revelation from the non-Christian views is that between the fully Protestant or Reformed view that does, and the general non-Christian view, whether ancient or modern, whether rationalist or irrationalist, that does not make the Creator-creature distinction basic to its thought. There are those who serve and worship God, and those who serve and worship man. Calvin most adequately represents the former, and modern existentialism and pragmatism most adequately represent the latter. Thomas Aquinas seeks to combine the two positions. P 202 Into to Systematic Theology

What has been said about Barth holds, with minor changes, also for Emil Brunner and for such other theologians as Reinhold Niebuhr and John A. Mackay. In their theology, as in that of Barth, it is the autonomous religious consciousness that divides itself into two sections after the style of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. The higher aspect of addresses itself to the lower aspect and insists upon obedience to its voice. Thus, men tell themselves that they have listened to and obeyed the voice of Jesus or of God, while they have only obeyed themselves.

¹⁴ To try to understand Van Til's critique of Barth would take us beyond the present work. Two points, however, of explanation: For Barth, revelation is historical, but history is not revelational. Barth was concerned to emphasize the absolute freedom of God. The incarnation, therefore, while being a historical fact, was not itself revelational of God in the sense that God did not bind himself by taking on human flesh. Barth's notion of Geschichte is employed in order to explain how God can be both revealed in history, while not himself revelational. What takes place in history (Historie), cannot be identified with what takes place in Geschichte: So, says, Van Til, "God's revelation in Christ is and remains God's revelation. . . . At the same time this revelation reveals God wholly. . . . Both of these aspects are expressed in the idea of Jesus Christ as Geschichte." Cornelius Van Til, Christianity and Barthianism (Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1962), 15. This topic will present itself again in chapter 14.

¹⁵ Reinhold Niebuhr (1892-1971), known more for his social action and ethics developed ideas coincident with neo-orthodoxy, particularly its dialecticism. Among his most significant works is The Nature and Destiny of Man.

¹⁶ H. Richard Niebuhr (1894-1962) taught at Yale Divinity School from 1931 until his death. With his brother Reinhold, he developed what has been called a "Christian realism," which was akin to neo-orthodoxy. Among his best-known works is Christ and Culture.

¹⁸ John A. Mackay (1889-1983) is best known as professor and president of Princeton Theological Seminary (1936-59) and as the founder, in 1944, of Theology Today. Among his works are A Preface to Christian Theology and Protestantism.

It appears then that, in Protestant circles at least, there seems in our day to be general agreement as to the nature of authority and the relation it is to sustain to reason. There is a quite general acceptance of authority but it is merely the authority of the expert. And this authority presupposes that, in the last analysis, man is dealing with an ultimately mysterious environment. It takes for granted that God, no less than man, is surrounded by mystery. It is no wonder that those who work on the principle of the autonomy of reason have no difficulty in accepting such a concept of authority. The followers of the autonomous reason have, in modern times, themselves asserted the need of the idea of the ultimately mysterious. The Mysterious Universe, the universe in which facts are what they are for no rational reason, is the presupposition both of modern science and of modern philosophy. And this position is not challenged by modern theology.

III The Roman Catholic View

Is it then to the church of Rome that we must go in order to find a challenge to the modern concept of reason as autonomous and of authority as merely that of those who have probed the realm of utter darkness a little more deeply than others? At first sight this might seem to be the case. A. E. Taylor relates a little story that might seem to point in that direction. "It relates," he says, "that a Roman Catholic theologian was in conversation with an outsider, who remarked that there seemed to be no real difference between the position of Rome and that of a well-known and highly respected 'Anglo-Catholic.'" 'Pardon me,' replied the theologian, 'we are at the opposite pole from X. He holds every doctrine we hold, but holds them all for the entirely irrelevant reason that he thinks them true.'" But this story in and by itself would not give an adequate notion of the Roman Catholic position either on the meaning of authority or on its relation to reason. A brief word must therefore be said on this subject.

To ascertain the Romish concept of reason, we may start from the fact that by Roman Catholic theologians Aristotle is taken to be the “philosopher par excellence, as St. Thomas is the theologian.” Now theology, says Maritain, presupposes certain truths of the “natural order.” These truths are naturally known to all men and are worked out scientifically by the philosophers and particularly by Aristotle. “The premises of philosophy are self-supported and are not derived from those of theology.” Etienne Gilson²⁴ expresses the same thought when he says:

“The heritage of Greek thought, even when cut to the minimum and judged most critically, is still worthy of admiration. So true is this that a number of the Fathers were convinced that the pagan thinkers had access to the Bible without admitting to it. One first being, the supreme principle and cause of nature, source of all intelligibility, of all order, and of all beauty, who eternally leads a life of happiness, because, being thought itself, it is an eternal contemplation of its own thought, all that was taught by Aristotle; and if we compare his theology to the ancient mythologies we will see at a glance what immense progress human reason had made since the era of Chronos and Jupiter without the aid of Christian Revelation. Doubtless there were many lacunae, and numberless errors mingled with these truths. But they were still truths. Discovered by the natural reason of the Greeks, they owed nothing to faith; still discoverable today, with even greater ease, by the same natural reason, why should they owe more to faith in our own reason than in Aristotle’s?”

²⁴Etienne Gilson (18184-1978) was a French philosopher and theologian, and was one of the founders of the neo-Thomist movement. He helped the Pontifical Institute of Medical Studies in Toronto, Canada in 1929. Among his works is The Philosophy of Thomas Aquinas.

He's workin' it here...

Besides this “natural order” which can be discovered by reason apart from faith, there is the order of faith. And as the assertions by reason in the natural order do not depend for their validity upon faith, so those in the order of faith do not depend for their validity upon the assertions of reason. “The affirmations of Catholic faith [I think he means - not in the Roman Catholic sense] ultimately depend on no reasoning, fallible or otherwise, but on the Word of God. For indeed whatever reason is able to know about God with a perfect knowledge, precisely because it is thus knowable, cannot essentially belong in the order of faith. [I have to assume because faith is imperfect in this life]

The order of nature as set forth by autonomous reason and the order of faith accepted exclusively on authority both deal with God and his relation to man. The question that at once appears is as to how it may be known that the God of reason and the God of faith are the same God. [Now we are getting somewhere!] There is the more reason for asking this question inasmuch as it is admitted that the reason which discovers the truths of the natural order is “wounded.” “The true Catholic position consists in maintaining that nature was created good, that it has been wounded, but that it can be at least partially healed by grace if God so wishes.” It might seem that grace must first restore the powers of reason at least to the extent of healing its wounds before reason can function normally. And Gilson does in fact speak of a Christian philosophy which is the product of a reason [I think he meant “product of reason”] that is restored by grace. Such a philosophy, he argues, is the best philosophy. It is the best philosophy because in it reason best comes to its own. But even so the problem remains the same. Here it is Aristotle who has by means of this wounded reason constructed the truths of the natural order as noted. Is then the God whom Aristotle discovers the same God of whom Christian theology speaks?

Gilson himself confronts us with the seriousness of the problem when he says in pointed fashion that reason or philosophy can deal only with essences and not with existence. Yet it is of the existence of God that it is supposed to speak.

“When, for instance Aristotle was positing his first self-thinking Thought as the supreme being, he certainly conceived it as a pure Act and as an infinitely powerful energy; still, his god was but the pure Act of a Thought. This infinitely powerful actuality of a self-thinking principle most certainly deserves to be called a pure Act, but it was a pure Act in the order of knowing, not in that of existence. Now nothing can give what it has not. Because the supreme Thought of Aristotle was not ‘He who is,’ it could not give existence: hence the world of Aristotle was not a created world. [That is a KEY point! and is why Paul when disputing with the Greeks in Rome referred to God who is the Creator in distinction from creatures.] Because the supreme Thought of Aristotle was not the pure Act of existing, its self-knowledge did not entail the knowledge of all being, both actual and possible: the god of Aristotle was not a providence; he did not even know a world which he did not make and which he could not possibly have made because he was thought of as a Thought, nor did he know the self-awareness of “Him who is.”²⁹

²⁹ Etienne Gilson, God and Philosophy (London: Oxford University Press, 1941), 66. As we have noted, for Aristotle, the highest possible thing was “thought thinking itself.” This thought could think nothing else, because to think anything else would mean that the highest thought would be dependent on something else to be what it is, and thus it would not be the highest. For Gilson and for Gilson’s Thomism, a distinction must always be made between existence (being) and essence (attributes of being). Because Aristotle argued that the highest thing is thought, he could not account for existence itself, only for thought itself. Thus, there could be no actuality of existence, and thus no accounting for that which is.

Taking over this philosophy of Aristotle, St. Thomas was bound, in comparison, to “translate all the problems concerning being from the language of essences into that of existences.” But could he do so without suppressing reason? Was it St. Thomas the theologian who, because of his faith, was able to make this transposition from the realm of abstract essences to that of existence? If it was, then no progress has been made in solving the problem of the relation of authority and reason. In fact, the problem then seems to be more difficult than ever. For the god of Aristotle has then begun to appear to be quite different from the God of the Christian faith. Aristotle’s god, it is admitted, has not created the world, and does not know the world. If such a god is the natural outcome of the activity of reason when it is not enlightened by faith does it not seem as though faith will have to reverse the doctrine of reason with respect to God? A philosophy that deals with essences only would seem to resemble a merry-go-round hovering above reality but never touching it.³⁰ Yet according to Rome, St. Thomas (Aquinas) the Christian theologian need not at all ask St. Thomas the autonomous philosopher to reverse his decisions on the fundamental question about the existence of God.”

My Comment: The Aristotelian proof and the Thomistic proof of the existence of God is quite fascinating and makes sense; but then, for an unbeliever, has this not just confirmed his own belief of a god of his own making? Yep. Because, again, human philosophy is still blind to the truth of God’s true nature and being and the implications of him being the Sovereign Creator.

It would appear then that St. Thomas the theologian might appear with the God of Moses, the “he who is,” in order to present him for acceptance to St. Thomas the philosopher. If the God of Moses, the Creator and controller of the world, is the one to be accepted by St., Thomas the philosopher, he must first be reduced from an existent God to a pure essence, from the “He who is” to the “it that is not.” St. Thoams the philosopher is bound, by the principles of his beliefs about reality in general. And this involves the rejection of the existence of God whose existence and knowledge cannot be thus related.³¹ There would seem to be no escape from the conclusion that if we start with autonomous reason and contend that it deals with essence only, the being which comes to expression through these essences is a being whose very existence is that of correlativity to the human mind. Kant and his followers were not illogical when they drew this conclusion. We cannot start with Aristotle without eventually falling prey to Kant.

³¹ In other words, the attempt to synthesize Christianity with Greek philosophy will end in futility.

Gilson seeks desperately to escape this conclusion. Like all Roman Catholic apologists he must at some time or other face this question as to how the “He who is” of Moses and the “it that is not” of Aristotle are related. He does so by arguing as follows: “Beyond a world wherein ‘to be’ is everywhere at hand, and where every nature can account for what other natures are but not for their common existence, there must be some cause whose very essence is pure Act of existing, that is, whose essence is not to be this and that, but ‘to be,’ is also to posit the Christian God as the supreme cause of the universe.” But this argument does not escape the dilemma just mentioned. The logical implication of the method of Aristotle is his “god,” the “it that is not.” That has been asserted by Gilson himself and it is clearly correct. That is the only god that is accessible to reason alone. Yet Gilson constantly speaks as though “the existence of one God, the sole Creator of the world” is also accessible to reason. And this God is supposed to be accessible to reason in the way that is shown in the quotation just given. But how can a god who is not and a God who is the Creator of the world both be the logical implication of the one true method of philosophy?

Yet it might seem that we have reached a position which involves the idea of absolute authority for at least one dimension of life. The order of faith and all that it contains is to be accepted purely on authority. Here then we seem to have reached the idea of absolute rather than expert authority.

Before we have finished with the Roman Catholic view of the relation of authority to reason, however, there are further matters to be considered.

In the first place it has been noted how valiantly Gilson seeks to defend the dia of the autonomy of reason. If then the dimensions of reason and of faith are finally to be brought together into union with one another there will have to be a compromise. If there is on thing on which Roman Catholics insist, it is that only on their position is it possible to do justice to the statement of St. Paul that every man naturally knows something of God, without compromising the uniqueness of the Christian faith. In other words, they maintain that it is in their system as a whole that there is a true union of the natural and the supernatural. But it is not difficult to see that if the autonomy of reason is to be maintained and the absolute authority of faith as well, any union between them must be one of compromise.

In the second place we may discover the nature of the compromise if we go back to the Roman Catholic conception of the nature of man, and especially of man's freedom in relation to God. According to Roman Catholic theology man has a measure of autonomy over against the plan of God. God has to await man's decisions on many points. Thus, God does not really control whatsoever comes to pass.³⁴ And this means that man's ultimate environment is only partly under God's direction. All of this implies, in effect, that on the basis of Roman Catholic theology there is mystery for God as well as for man. God himself is therefore on this basis surrounded by brute fact. [isolated uninterpreted data or data in a void; fact should not be isolated from the framework in which they come. See codeBF and code524 & codebrute] It is no wonder then that, holding this doctrine of the ultimacy of the mind and will of man in its theology, Romish theology should recognize the legitimacy of the idea of autonomy in the field of philosophy. Even when it speaks of the Christian philosophy, as Gilson does, it must still base this philosophy upon the idea of autonomy. And even when it speaks of the original perfection of man when his reason was not "wounded" Rome still holds to the idea of autonomy for the mind and will of man to some extent. In all stage and in all respects of its thinking it is committed to this idea. In all stages and in all respects it is therefore also committed to the idea of brute fact as a part of man's ultimate environment.

Now it is this fact that Rome is always and everywhere committed to the idea of brute fact as such, to eventuation apart from the counsel of god, that is all determinative on the question of its conception of the relation of reason to authority. A truly Christian concept of authority presupposes that in all hie does man is face to face with the requirement of God.³⁵ But how could man be face to face with the requirement of God if God does not control all things? How could God face man with this requirement there where he has no power to rule? It is only on the idea of the comprehensiveness of the plan of God [God's eternal decree] that a true concept of authority can be based. And this is to say, in effect, that only on the idea of the covenant as all comprehensive with respect to every phase of human life can the idea of authority find a footing.³⁶

³⁴This follows from a libertarian notion of free will in which God may know what man will do, but he may not in any way control his decisions.

³⁵See again Romans 1:18, 2:16, esp. 1:32

Our conclusion then is that while the Roman Catholic notion of authority seems at first sight to be very absolute – in fact even more absolute than that of Protestantism – it is in reality not absolute at all. Its idea of autonomy wins out in every case. And so it comes to pass that the Roman Catholic doctrines of faith are in every instance adjusted to the idea of human autonomy. To be sure, the natural man is said to be fallen, but he has fallen but a little way; even in the state of rectitude he justly insisted on autonomy. Does the fallen character of man consist in his using this autonomy unwisely? To be sure, the Christian man is healed by grace; but even when he is healed, he is still advised to exercise his autonomous will to some extent over against the plan of God. The concept of covenant obedience does not fit in anywhere in Roman Catholic theology or philosophy. Our conclusion must therefore be that even Rome offers nothing in the way of authority that is clearly different from the idea of the expert as this is willingly granted by the natural man. [expert: man will listen to the wisdom of man and submit to that as opposed to the authority of Scripture. Van Til: “One such a view it might seem that one should be able to accept the authority of Jesus.”]

The Roman Catholic concept of tradition only corroborates what has been said. In its “Devree concerning the canonical Scriptures” the Council of Trent speaks of the “unwritten traditions” which are as it were transmitted from hand to hand. These unwritten traditions are accorded the same authority as Scripture. Christian truth, it is said, has come to us by way of two distinct streams, one of which is found in Scripture and the second of which is found in tradition. To be sure this tradition may, to some extent at least, be itself reduced to writing. Yet there is no body of writings which the church officially accepts as containing the written statement of what it accepts as tradition. It is the living voice of the Church speaking in its official ministers, and especially the Pope, that is the final guardian of this tradition. Tradition is therefore finally that which the church propounds from time to time.

The bearing of this conception of tradition on the questions of authority and its relation to reason must now be drawn. The hierarchy of the church in general, and of the Pope in particular, is not to be thought of as itself subject to the final and comprehensive revelation of God. There is not place anywhere in the whole of Roman Catholic thought for the idea that any human being should be wholly subject to God. On the contrary, the position of Rome requires the rejection of the counsel of God as all-determinative. Hence the Pope himself, as he makes up his mind with respect to the infallible pronouncement that this office requires or permits him to make from time to time, must seek as an expert to interpret the meaning of brute fact, of being in general. What the Bible teaches him he will be required to relate to what his autonomous reason teaches him with respect to being in general. The result is that the voice of God as the controller and governor of man and the universe can never speak through the voice of the Pope. Those who listen to the voice of the Pope are listening to the voice of an expert [as opposed to sola scriptura!] who is supposed, for some wholly non-rational reason, to be able to peer more deeply into the realm of “Being” than other men.

It appears then, that so far from being the defender of the true Christian concept of authority and of reason, Rome offers a compromise on both ideas and therefore on the relation between them. Holding to a concept of reason that is not itself interpreted in terms of the doctrine of God as self-contained it can offer no concept of authority that really stands above reason. Its authority therefore is the falling authority of one man dealing with “being in general” and guessing about it, over another man also dealing with “being in general” and guessing about it. It is the authority that brings men into bondage.

The entire position of Rome then with respect to authority and its relations to reason illustrates the weakness of Roman Catholic apologetics in general. It has no clear-cut position that can be contrasted with that of the natural man. [Key point!] It cannot therefore challenge the position of the natural man with any effectiveness at any point. Assuming the correctness of the starting point and the method of the natural man in the natural sphere it cannot logically ask men to accept the authority of God even in the spiritual sphere. [And that is the man problem with Rome and Arminianism.]

The Arminian View (codeArm)

It will appear to many as a very strange thinking to say that Arminian theology is similar to that of Romanism on the question of authority. Yet this is really the case. Of course, it is true that evangelical Arminians reject the ritualism and the hierarchy of Rome. It is also true that individual Arminians are much better in their practical attitude toward Scripture than their system of theology permits them to be. [for example, they insist of man’s will as free, not to be influence by God or anything outside themselves that would sway their will one way or the other, then they pray “O God, change that man’s heart, etc.” a clear contradiction to their own creed, that the will is self-directed, autonomous, etc.] It is only of this system of theology that we speak.³⁷ And of it – there is not escape from it – the assertion must be made that its conception of reason is similar to that of Rome and therefore its conception of authority cannot be very different from that of Rome.

³⁷ It is difficult to overstate the importance of this statement. We must keep in mind that Van Til is critical of faulty systems of theology and where those systems will take those who follow them consistently, not that individuals who hold those systems will necessarily go that far.

There is nothing on which Arminian theology is more insistent than that the Reformed doctrine of election does injustice to man’s responsibility. Yet the Reformed doctrine of election is but the consistent expression in the field of man’s relation to God of the general teaching of Scripture that all things in history happen by the plan of God. The Arminian doctrine of responsibility therefore presupposes the rejection of the idea of the plan of God as all-inclusive. And this means that the idea of brute fact [chance; see codebrute] is one of the basic ingredients of the Arminian position. Man is therefore once again partly related to God and partly to some form of “being in general.” And this in term means that God himself is confronted with that which determines his powers and actions. He is limited by the facts of Reality about him and his knowledge is accordingly surrounded by mystery.

Thus we are back at the arch foe of Christianity, namely, the idea of human ultimacy or autonomy. This idea of autonomy expresses itself in modern times by holding that in all that comes to man he gives as well as takes. Modern philosophy has, particularly since the day of Kant, boldly asserted that only that is real for man which he has, in part at least, constructed for himself.

This is very good here:

Nor is this modern form of manifestation of the would-be autonomous man illogical. In every non-Christian concept of reality brute facts [isolated self-evident, uninterpreted arguments or data in a void; fact should not be isolated from the framework in which they come.] or chance plays a basic role. This is so because anyone who does not hold to God's counsel as being man's ultimate environment, has no alternative but to assume or assert that chance is ultimate. Chance is simply the metaphysical correlative of the idea of the autonomous man. The autonomous man will not allow that reality is already structural in nature by virtue of the structural activity of God's eternal plan. [that's why Arminians despise God's decreeing anything especially election] But if reality is non-structural in nature, then man is the one who for the first time, and therefore in an absolutely original fashion, is supposed to bring structure into reality. But all this amounts only to saying that modern philosophy is quite consistent with its own principles when it contends that in all that man knows he gives as well as takes. It is merely the non-rational that is given to him; he himself rationalizes it for the first time. [man placing himself into the room of God.] And so that which appears to him as rationally related reality is so related primarily because he himself has rationalized it.

The modern form of autonomy expresses itself then both in a negative and in a positive fashion. Negatively it assumes or asserts that that which is "out there," that is, that which has not yet come into contact with the human mind, is wholly non-structural or non-rational in character. We are not now concerned so much to point out that this assumption is itself not very reasonable to make for one who claims to limit his assertions to what human experience can control. Human experience can hardly establish the universal negative assertion about the whole of reality and therefore about all future eventuality that is implied in the assumption of the average modern philosopher or scientist. What it is our main concern, however. To point out now is that the Arminian theologian is not in a good position to challenge this modern man in his attitude toward the authority of Scripture.

What is the attitude toward the idea of Scripture that we would expect to find on the part of modern man? Will he readily accept the idea? Will he be open-minded with respect to the "evidence" for the Scriptural teaching with respect to such doctrines as creation, providence, and miracles? Will he be open-minded with respect to revelation given about future eventuation? That is to say, will he be ready to accept information about that which happens in a realm totally beyond human experience or what has happened, does happen and will happen by way of influence from that realm that is totally beyond human experience upon the realm of human experience? The answer is obvious. The entire idea of inscripturated supernatural revelation is not merely foreign to but would be destruction of the idea of autonomy on which the modern man builds his thought. If modern man is right in his assumption with respect to his own autonomy then he cannot even for a moment logically consider evidence for the fact of the supernatural in any form as appearing to man. The very idea of such a God, says the modern follower of Kant, is fine as a limiting notion. Taken as a limiting notion it is quite innocent and even useful.³⁸ For then it stands merely for the ideal of exhaustive rationality. And science requires such an ideal. But the idea of such a God as taken by orthodox Christians, that is as a constitutive rather than as a limiting concept, is meaningless; it would kill the idea of pure facts as the correlative to pure rationality. And the idea of pure fact as a limiting concept is as necessary to modern science as is the idea of pure rationality. [deep]

It is therefore logically quite impossible for the natural man, holding as he does to the idea of autonomy, even to consider the "evidence" for the Scripture as the final and absolutely authoritative revelation of the God of Christianity. The God of Christianity is for him logically irrelevant to human experience. It would therefore be as sensible to talk about his revealing himself either in nature or in Scripture as it would be to ascribe to the man in the moon the perpetration of some murder in one's neighborhood.

This way of putting the matter may seem to some to be extreme. Yet we believe it to be strictly in accord with the facts. There are, to be sure, some among modern philosophers, particularly those of the theistic and personalist schools, who seem to be favorably disposed to what they call a positive religion. And among the positive religious they will pick out Christianity as the most acceptable. Mention may again be made of A. E. Taylor in his recent book Does God Exist? Taylor argues for "the existence of God" but since he works on the assumption of the autonomy of man, the kind of god he believes in is, after all, a finite deity. When he deals with the tenets of historic Christianity Taylor makes perfectly clear that, on this principle, one could not accept them as being what they are presented as being in Scripture. Speaking of the resurrection of Jesus he says: "That St. Paul and the other Apostles believed this is as certain as any fact of past history can be; it is quite another question whether that belief was not a mistaken interpretation of their experiences. Since it is a familiar fact that men do sometimes misinterpret their experience, there is nothing in the principle irrational in the suggesting that St. Paul and the other Apostles did this, and no man can prove 'beyond all shadow of doubt' that they did not." Taylor simply assumes that every human mind, that of an apostle no less than that of any other man, contributes in an original sense to what it receives. The result is that even if he could believe in a self-contained God- which on his premises he cannot - Taylor cannot believe that any man could receive any revelation from such a God without to some extent, in the very act of reception, confusing it with his own experiences that operate independently of this God.

The whole attitude of the modern man with respect to the idea of authoritative revelation such as is given in Scripture may therefore be summed up in the following points. Such a God as Scripture speaks of simply does not exist. This idea of the non-existence of God is involved, as has been noted, in the assumption of brute factuality. In the second place, if such a God did exist, he could not manifest himself in the world that we know. For that world is known to be something other than the revelation of God; it is known to be a combination of brute factuality and the rationalizing activity of autonomous man with respect to them. In the third place, even if such a God did reveal himself in such a world as is known to be something other than a manifestation of him, no man could receive such a revelation without falsifying it. In the fourth place, if in spite of these three points a revelation had been received in the past it could not be transmitted to men of the present time without their again falsifying it. In the fifth place, if in spite of everything such a revelation of such a God as the Bible speaks of came to man today, he in turn could not receive it without falsifying it.

This is good on Arminianism:

Now, Arminianism has no valid argument for the idea of Biblical authority with which to challenge the position of modern man. Its own concept of man, as acting independently of the plan of God to some extent, and therefore its own view of the human mind as being ultimate in some respects, paralyzes its apologetical efforts. Like the Roman Catholic, the Arminian apologist is bound to start with his opponent on a supposedly common basis. The Arminian must grant that his opponent has rightly interpreted much of human experience in terms of the autonomy of the human mind and the ultimacy of chance. But if the natural man who works with the idea of autonomy can correctly interpret the phenomenal world aright without God, why should he be ready to turn about suddenly and interpret spiritual things in terms of God? If he is consistent with himself he will not do so.

Key point here on atomism and different meanings behind the same words. This confusion of word meanings is critical in talking with Mormons, Roman Catholics, etc. We must define our terms, otherwise, it's like two ships passing each other in the night.

As has been noted earlier, the Arminian is bound to present the Christian position in atomistic fashion. He will therefore first speak to the non-believer about the possibility of supernatural revelation as though the word possibility meant the same thing for the natural man and for the believer. But it does not. For the natural man the idea of possibility is on the one hand identical with chance and on the other hand with that which the natural man himself can rationalize. For him only that is practically possible which man can himself order by his logical faculties. But the word possibility means for the Christian that which may happen in accord with the plan of God.

Secondly the Arminian may speak to the natural man of the probability of supernatural revelation as though the word probability meant the same thing for the believer and for the non-believer. But it does not. For the non-believer, the meaning of the word probability is involved in his concept of the idea of possibility as just before discussed. Therefore, as Hume⁴⁰ has effectively shown in his criticism of the empirical probability argument for Christianity, there can be no presumption at all for the eventuation of certain things rather than of others, once one allows the idea of chance in this system at all. There can be no probability that God will supernaturally reveal himself to man unless it is certain that without the presupposition of such a revelation, man's experience, even of the realm of natural things is meaningless.

In the third place the Arminian will speak to the natural man about the historical fact of revelation as recorded in Scripture. He will stress the fact that Christianity is a historical religion. To that he will add that therefore it is simply a matter of evidence whether or not, say, the resurrection of Christ, is a fact. On this question, he will insist, anybody who is able to use the canons of historical study is as good a judge as any other. The proof for the resurrection is then said to be just the sort of proof that men demand everywhere in questions of history.

But this argument about the facts of supernatural revelation again forgets that the natural man's entire attitude with respect to the facts that are presented to him will naturally be controlled by his notions of possibility and probability as already discussed. He may therefore grant that a man named Jesus of Nazareth arose from the dead. He need not hesitate, on his principles, to accept the fact of the resurrection at all. But for him that fact is a different sort of fact from what it is for the Christian. It is not the same fact at all. It is in vain to speak about the fact without speaking of the meaning of the fact. For the factness of the fact is to any mind that deals with it that which he takes it to mean. It is his meaning that is virtually the fact to him. And it is impossible even to present the fact for what it really is, namely, that which is according to its interpretation as given in Scripture, to the natural man, if one does not challenge his notions of possibility and probability that underlie his views of the facts of history. To talk about presenting to him the fact of the resurrection without presenting its meaning is to talk about an abstraction. The resurrection either is what the Christian says it is, or it is not. If it is, then it is as such that it actually appears in history.

Yet the Arminian position is committed to the necessity of presenting the facts of Christianity as being something other than he himself as a Christian knows they are. He knows that it is the Son of God who died in his human nature and rose again from the dead. But the fact of the resurrection about which he speaks to unbelievers is some nondescript something or other about which believers and non-believers are supposed to be able to agree.

In the fourth place, then, the Arminian will speak to the unbeliever about the Bible as the inspired and infallible revelation of God. He will argue that it is the most wonderful book, that it is the beset seller, that all other books lose their charm while the Bible does not. All of these things the unbeliever may readily grant without doing any violence to his own position and without feeling challenged to obey its voice. It means to him merely that some experts in religion have somehow brought to expression some of the deep fellow feeling with Reality that they have experienced. Their position allows for sacred books and even for a superior book. But the one thing it does not allow for is an absolutely authoritative book. Such a book presupposes the existence and knowability of the self-contained God of Christianity. But such a God, and the revelation of such a God in the universe and to man, are notions that, as has already been observed, the natural man must resist. So, he will naturally also reject that which is simply the logical implicate, of the idea of such a God and of such a revelation. The very idea of sin, because of which the idea of an externally promulgated supernatural revelation of grace became imperative, is meaningless for him. For him sin or evil is a metaphysical action that is inherent in the concept of Chance.

Van Til can be difficult to understand because he assumes you understand all the terms and "isms" he refers to, such as Arminianism. Arminianism (from Jacobus Arminius, Europe in the late 1500s) assumes that a natural man [someone who is unsaved] can believe in Christ by his own assumed power or will, that God does not determine the will in conversion but leaves it to the creature to determine the outcome of the conflict, that is, to believe or not to believe...and that natural man can frustrate or resist God's saving grace. It goes like this to the Arminian: God is for you, Satan is against you and you cast the deciding vote. Arminians have a wrong view of man's depravity due to Adam's sin, that man still has in himself some degree of virtue or love for God and knowledge of God that will enable him to believe, apart from the determining or regenerating power of the Holy Spirit (e.g., see John 3:8 and Titus 3:5). But if natural man is "dead in sin, blinded by Satan, at enmity with God, how can he be interested in something that he knows nothing about nor have a heart for it?? So man in an unregenerate condition cannot and will not believe unless the Spirit works it. (see Romans 8:7-8, John 3, etc.). In an unregenerate condition (natural man's condition = unsaved, unconverted) the natural man sees himself as "ultimate," vigorously defending his assumed autonomy, his independence from God, the same sin that Eve was guilty of...I will decide what is good or evil, I am ultimate, not God, not God's word or his will. It is this mindset that all mankind with which man is cursed coming into this world. They all have an ax to grind. There is no neutrality in the unregenerate man.

I was very brief here; this is a huge subject. Nevertheless, read this below; hopefully my explanation will shed light on Van Til's comments. Van Til (1895-1987)

Enough has now been said to indicate that the Roman Catholic and the Arminian methods, proceeding as they do by way of accepting the starting point and the method of the natural man with respect to a supposedly known area of experience, are self-refuting on the most important question of the Bible and its authority. We repeat that many Arminians are much better than their position. We also stress the fact that many of the things that they say about points of detail are indeed excellent. In other words, our aim is not to depreciate the work that has been done by believing scholars in the Arminian Camp. Our aim is rather to make better use of their materials than they have done by placing underneath it an epistemology and metaphysics which make these materials truly fruitful in discussion with non-believers.

Such a foundation it is that is furnished in the Reformed position. But it is furnished by the Reformed position simply because this position seeks to be consistently Christian in its start-point and methodology. And here it must be confessed that those of us who hold this position are all too often worse than our position. Those who hold the Reformed position have no reason for boasting. What they have received they have received by grace.

The Reformed position seeks to avoid the weaknesses of the Roman Catholic and Arminian positions. Since these positions have now been discussed at length it will be immediately apparent what is meant. Since the natural man assumes the idea of brute fact [chance] in metaphysics and the idea of autonomy of the human mind in epistemology [knowledge: how you know what you know], the Reformed apologist realizes that he should first challenge these notions. He must challenge these notions in everything that he says about anything. It is these notions that determine the construction that the natural man puts upon everything that is presented to him. They are the colored glasses through which he sees all the facts. Now Romanism and Arminianism also seek to present to the unbeliever the facts of Christianity. We have seen that in reality their own false interpretations of the facts of Christianity mean that they do not really present the facts fully for what they are. But to the extent that they do present the facts as they are, they still do not challenge the natural man to take off his colored glasses. And it is precisely this that the Reformed apologist seeks to do. He will first present the facts for what they really are and then he will challenge the natural man by arguing that unless they are accepted for what they are according to the Christian interpretation of them, no facts mean anything at all.

Here then are the facts, or some of the main facts that the Reformed apologist presents to the natural man. There is first the fact of God's self-contained existence. Second, the fact of creation in general and of man as made in God's image in particular. Third, there is the fact of the comprehensive plan and providence of God with respect to all that takes place in the universe. Then there is the fact of the fall of man and his subsequent sin. It is in relation to these facts and only in relation to these facts that the other facts pertaining to the redemptive work of Christ, are what they are. They would not be what they are unless the facts just mentioned are what they are. Thus, there is one system of reality of which all that exists forms a part. And any individual fact of this system is what it is in this system. It is therefore a contradiction in terms to speak of presenting certain facts to men unless one presents them as parts of this system. The very factness of any individual fact on history is precisely what it is because God is what he is. It is God's counsel that is the principle of individuation for the Christian man. God makes the facts to be what they are.⁴¹

⁴¹Note that what is presented in this approach is theology in its depth and richness. Van Til begins with who God is and who we are in order to explain who Christ is and what he has done.

To be sure, man's actions have their place in this system. But they are not ultimately determinative; they are subordinately and derivatively important. [key terms here] Hence, the idea of human autonomy can find no place in the truly Christian system anymore than can the idea of chance. The human being is analogical rather than original in all the aspects of his activity. And as such its activity is truly significant.

It is natural that only the supernatural revelation of God can inform man about such a system as that. For this system is of a nature quite different from the systems of which the natural man speaks. For the latter system is that which man, assumed to be ultimate, has ordered by his original structural activity.

The natural man virtually attributes to himself that which a true Christian theology attributes to the self-contained God. The battle is therefore between the absolutely self-contained God of Christianity and the would-be wholly self-contained mind of the natural man. Between them there can be no compromise.

The idea of supernatural revelation is inherent in the very idea of this system of Christianity which we are seeking to present to the natural man. But if this is so then the idea of a supernatural, infallibly inscripturated revelation is also inherent in this system. Man as the creature of God needs supernatural revelation and man, become a sinner, needs supernatural redemptive revelation. He needs this revelation in infallibly inscripturated form lest he himself destroy it. As a hater of God, he does not want to hear about God. The natural man seeks to suppress the pressure of God's revelation in nature that is about him. He seeks to suppress the pressure of conscience within him. So, he also seeks to suppress the idea of the revelation of grace that speaks in Scripture. In every case it is God as his Creator and as his judge that asks of him to listen and be obedient. How can the autonomous man be obedient on his own assumptions? He cannot be obedient unless he reverses his entire position, and this he cannot do of himself. It takes the regenerating power of the Spirit to do that.

Having reached this point the Roman Catholic and the Arminian may argue that it was in the interest of avoiding this very impasse that they sought to make their point of contact with the natural man on a neutral basis. The reply of the Reformed apologist is as follows. Good preaching, he will say, will recognize the truth of Scripture that man has been blinded by sin, and that his will is perverted toward seeking self instead of God. But how can deaf ears hear, and blind eyes see? That is to say preaching is confronted with the same dilemma as is apologetical reasoning.⁴² In both cases the Roman Catholic and the Arminian tone down the facts of the gospel in order to gain acceptance for them on the part of the natural man. [very common] In neither case will the Reformed apologist do so. In both cases he will challenge the natural man at the outset. Both in preaching and in reasoning – and every approach to the natural man should be both – the Reformed theologian will ask the sinner to do what he knows the sinner of himself cannot do. The Reformed Christian is often Reformed in preaching and Arminian in reasoning. But when he is at all self-conscious in his reasoning, he will seek to do in apologetics what he does in preaching. He knows that man is responsible not in spite of but just because he is not autonomous but created. [A vital distinction: In other words, because we are created, i.e., creatures, we are wholly dependent upon God for all, i.e., we are not autonomous beings, self-sufficient, etc! See Edwards on this absolute dependence on God] He knows that the idea of analogical or covenant personality is that which alone preserves genuine significance for the thoughts and deeds of man. [as opposed to existentialism where significance is sought through self seeking.] So he also knows that he who is dead in trespasses and sins is none the less responsible for his deadness. He knows also that the sinner in the depth of his heart knows that what is thus held before him is true. He knows he is a creature of God; he has been simply seeking to cover up this fact to himself. He knows that he has broken the law of God; he has again covered up this fact to himself. He knows that he is therefore guilty and is subject to punishment forever; this fact too he will not look in the face.

⁴²This point is crucial to Van Til's approach. We should think of apologetics as we think of preaching – it is a confrontation of the gospel of God with the sinfulness of man. For an excellent exposition of this importance of preaching to Van Til's approach, see Edmund P.

Clowney, "Preaching the Word of The Lord: Cornelius Van Til, V.D.M.," Westminster Theological Journal 46, no. 2 (1984): 233-53.

Very important conclusion here:

And it is precisely Reformed preaching and Reformed apologetic that tears the mask off the sinner's face and compels him to look at himself and the world for what they really are. Like a mole, the natural man seeks to scurry under ground every time the facts as they really are come to his attention. He loves the darkness rather than the light. [John 3:19] The light exposes him to himself. And precisely this, neither Roman Catholic or Arminian preaching or reasoning are able to do.

As to the possibility and likelihood of the sinner's accepting the Christian position, it must be said that this is a matter of the grace of God. As the creature of God, made in the image of God, he is always accessible to God. As a rational creature he can understand that one must either accept the whole of the system of truth or reject the whole of it. He cannot understand why a position such as that of Roman Catholicism or of Arminians should challenge him. He knows right well as a rational being that only the Reformed statement of Christianity is consistent with itself and therefore challenges the non-Christian position at every point. He can understand therefore why the Reformed theologian should accept the doctrine of Scripture as the infallible Word of God. He can understand the idea of its necessity, its perspicuity, its sufficiency and its authority⁴⁴ as being involved in the Christian position as a whole.

Key point here:

But while understanding them as being involved in the position of Christianity as a whole, it is precisely Christianity as a whole, and therefore each of these doctrines as part of Christianity, that are meaningless to him as long as he is not willing to drop his own assumptions of autonomy and chance.

It follows that on the question of Scripture, as on every other question, the only possible way for the Christian to reason with the non-believer is by way of presupposition. He must say to the unbeliever that unless he will accept the presuppositions and with them the interpretations of Christianity, there is no coherence in human experience. That is to say, the argument must be such as to show that unless one accepts the Bible for what true Protestantism says it is, the authoritative interpretation of human life and experience as a whole, it will be impossible to find meaning in anything. It is only when this presupposition is constantly kept in mind that a fruitful discussion of problems pertaining to the phenomenon of Scripture and what it teaches about God in relation to man can be discussed.

Van Til on The Doctrine of Sin And Redemption

Romanist vs The Reformed View

For Calvin sin is self-conscious rebellion on the part of the creature against his Creator and Benefactor. Even those who have sinned in Adam but not after the similitude of Adam are covenant breakers. They are responsible with Adam for the pre-redemptive supernatural revelation as it was conjoined to original natural revelation. For Romanism sin is only partly disobedience to God; it is also slipping back into non-being. With Calvin the idea of sin is exclusively ethical; with Rome sin as ethical is in large part reduced to a metaphysical lack. It is of the utmost importance to lay great stress on the ethical character of Reformation theology as over against Romanist theology. Reformed theology differs from Evangelicalism in the fact that it holds tenaciously to this ethical character of Christianity, while evangelicalism tends to veer to the idea of sin as a metaphysical defect. With its conception of the human will as partly autonomous, evangelicalism naturally tends to the idea of Romanism.

For Calvin redemption is exclusively ethical. Sin did not lower man in the scale of being. Sin did not take away from man any of the natural powers that God had given him. Sin did not tend to destroy the metaphysical situation. To be sure, sin had physical effects. It brought disease and death into the world. But the idea that the created world would have been destroyed by sin is an abstraction. It was not God's intention that it should. Hence it was from the beginning ultimately impossible that it should. The created world has not tendency to slip back into non-being. The fact that it needs each moment to be sustained by God does not prove that it has such a tendency. This fact only shows its actually dependent character. God intended from the beginning to uphold the universe as dependent upon himself.

In particular sin did not destroy any of the powers that God gave man at the beginning when he endowed him with his image. To be sure, here too there have been weakening results. But man still has eyes with which to observe and logical ability with which to order and arrange the things that he observes. So far from sin being inherently destructive of the metaphysical situation, it is rather true that the continuation of this situation is the presupposition of sin's ethical character.

For Romanism redemption is therefore at least in part metaphysical. For Romanism the natural tended even at the outset, before the fall, toward non-being. It therefore needed the supernatural [supernaturalism – that defines the image of God as a supernatural addition to nature. – see Bavinck @ code294a] that in order to draw it upward away from non-being. The supernatural must from the beginning remedy a defect inherent in the natural. The supernatural is therefore something that lifts man up in the scale of being. The tendency to slip into non-being is, on the Romanist view, a real possibility. It is an ultimate possibility. Romanism uses the notion of abstract possibility as an aspect of its theory of being. So then the redemptive is still largely what the original supernatural was, namely, a counteracting agent against the tendency of finite being to slip into non-being. Redemption thus is not “accidental,” [in the philosophical sense, like the white of snow is the accident of snow.] it is not primarily ethical. The distinction between nature and grace as used in Romanist thinking and the distinction between nature and grace as used in Reformation thinking are therefore quite different in meaning.

To set the doctrine of common grace in the proper perspective therefore requires setting off Reformed theology as a whole from Romanist and also from evangelical thinking. On a Romanist basis, even special grace is largely thought of along the lines of lifting man in the scale of being. On its basis common grace would therefore be only gradationally different from special or saving grace. No other than gradational differences are possible once one holds to the human will as in some measure autonomous, and once one holds to the idea of man as participant in the same being with God. The idea of saving grace is then the offering to all men or at least to groups of men the real or ultimate possibility of salvation along with the equally ultimate possibility of destruction. In no case can God overcome completely the tendency of finite being to slip into non-being.

What holds for Romanism on this point also holds to some extent for evangelicalism. Here too saving grace is limited by abstract possibility and therefore by man's ultimate ability to resist the will or pleading of the Spirit of God. The idea of grace is in part reduced from its high ethical concept to one of metaphysical gradation.

On the basis of the Reformed view, however, saving grace is conceived of on wholly ethical lines. The metaphysical presupposition of conceiving the idea of grace thus exclusively along ethical lines is the fact that God controls whatsoever comes to pass. This rules out all abstract possibilities. It involves that man is always confronted with the revelation of God's will. It means that when he sinned, man sinned against this known revelation of God. Man is responsible for sin, and he alone is responsible for sin. When man sins, he is therefore wholly depraved. There was no excuse for his sinning in the fact that his being, as finite, was inherently defective, or in the fact that God's will for him was not wholly clear. On the other hand, it was God's will that sin should come into the world. He wished to enhance his glory by means of its punishment and removal.

But to hold strictly to man's utter responsibility for sin and yet to the fact that it was God's ultimate intention that it should come into the world through man, requires that one think analogically. And thinking analogically is thinking concretely. [ectypal as opposed to archetypal knowledge; God lowers himself to our level of understanding when he communicates knowledge to us via scripture. Ectypal knowledge tells us what God is like not what he actually is.] It means thinking from the analogical system of truth revealed in Scripture. It involves accepting that which is apparently, though not really, contradictory. All the concepts offered in Scripture therefore are supplemental of one another. It is not possible to begin with one doctrine, and deduce from that one doctrine certain other doctrines that must "logically follow from it," except one at the same time keep in mind that there are other doctrines that are, of necessity, in apparent contradiction to the first doctrine from which the beginning was made.

Romanism does not believe in the doctrine of total depravity. It therefore thinks that the sinner, though wounded through sin, still is naturally able to know God.

On the other hand, Reformed theology does believe in total depravity. In consequence, Reformed theology teaches that man by nature has not knowledge of God or of morality at all. For Romanism natural knowledge of God springs from a human situation which is not totally despoiled by sin.

If in spite of this, according to the Scriptures and the Confession there are remnants of a true knowledge of God to be seen in man, then this must be explained in terms of common grace, through which God has restrained human depravity.

If we speak exactly, he adds, we should therefore place quotation marks about the phrase, “natural knowledge of God.” It might better be call “common grace knowledge.”

In addition to this qualitative distinction between the Reformed position and that of Romanism there is, says Ridderbos, a quantitative one. The Reformed Confessions speak of small remnants of the knowledge of God and o morality possessed by the natural man. And these small remnants must be upheld by common grace. Not holding to total depravity and not holding to common grace, Romanism works out a natural theology of full proportions.

Of these two points, the qualitative and the quantitative difference between the Reformed Faith and Romanism, the former is certainly for Ridderbos the more important. The difference in quantity is due to the difference in quality.

The question now is whether Ridderbos succeeds in signaling the qualitative difference between Romanism and the Reformed faith by simply inserting the ideas of total depravity and of common grace into a complex of doctrines assume to be essentially the same for both. Can Romanist theology and philosophy be repaired by thus inserting a block of material here and there into an edifice that is otherwise left unmolested? Can the ideas of total depravity and common grace be woven into the main motif of Romanism, that of analogia entis? [\[according to IV Lateran a relationship between divine being and creaturely being in which God is “ever greater” \(semper maior\), and \(2\), following Augustine, a relationship between divine immanence and divine transcendence.\]](#) It is that which must be done if one refuses to accept and answer the challenge of Gilson referred to above. Protestants, and especially followers of Calvin, can scarcely afford to allow the legitimacy of the idea that finite being has a tendency to slip back into non-being. Yet it is this which Ridderbos virtually does when he asserts that, were it not for common grace, every last bit of natural knowledge of God and of morality would have disappeared. He argues that except for the restraining force of common grace, God’s voice even in general revelation would have been silence altogether.

But how could the voice of God’s revelation in man be silence altogether unless man himself were destroyed? Will not men in the abode of the lost have knowledge of God and of morality? Is it not precisely because they then have all too clear a knowledge of God and of morality that they suffer before the face of God? To say so is fully in line with Calvin’s views. It is even of the essence of his view that men are what they are as inherently knowers of God. Yet evil spirits and the lost receive no common grace. Common grace is an attitude of favor of God toward men as men, as creatures made by himself in his own image. Common grace is the giving of good gifts to men though they have sinned against him, that they might repent and mend their evil ways. Common grace provides for the doing of relatively good deeds by sinful men who are kept from working out to its full fruition the principle of total depravity within them. Common grace thus is a means by which God accomplishes through men his purpose in displaying his glory in the created world, in history, before the judgment day. So there is no common grace in hell.

Of course, Ridderbos knows all this very well. He asserts I plainly. Yet he insists that the whole of general revelation must be suspended from common grace. And he insists that the whole of general revelation would disappear except for common grace. When he then faces the fact that Satan and the lost cannot be thought of as recipients of common grace, he avers that even in their case there is a restraining force of God that keeps them confronted with the general revelation of God.

It is this last point that shows conclusively that Ridderbos thinks of the idea of finite, rational creatures as slipping back into the realm of non-being as a serious possibility. Man needs a restraining force, in addition to ordinary providence, in order to keep from falling into non-being. This restraining force is, in the nature of the case, not ethical in character. It does not intend to restrain the working of the sinful principle in man. It is not the means by which the potentialities of creation are to be brought to light. It is simply and purely metaphysical in character. Without this restraining force Satan and the lost would escape the punishment of God; they would escape him because they would be no more. Sin is therefore a force which, unless restrained, would lead to the destruction of finite rational creatures themselves. Sin is no longer an exclusively ethical opposition on the part of creatures of God against the will of God. For sin then presupposes a measure of autonomy in man by which he can destroy his own being and with it the revelation of God. Why else should it be necessary for God to introduce a force after the entrance of sin for the maintenance of created reality?

Now for Ridderbos common grace does in the course of human history what this metaphysical restraining force does in hell. To be sure common grace also does more than that. It also gives good gifts to men, makes them love the truth in a sense, cause them to produce civil righteousness. But the point now of importance is that for Ridderbos, common grace in history and the restraining force in hell both maintain the general revelation of God to man. In history this force is gracious in character; after history is finished this is no longer the case.

Thus, both the doctrine of total depravity and the doctrine of common grace are in some measure unintentionally adjusted to the Romanis idea of the analogy of being. There is no escaping this so long as one thinks of Protestantism, and especially of the Reformed Faith, as merely adding some building blocks to the edifice which is in part constructed along Romanists lines. Then there is no maintaining of the exclusively ethnic character of Reformation theology. To maintain this ethical character one needs, with Calvin, to presuppose the idea that man is inherently and inescapably, in history and after the consummation of history, in the realm of the blest and in the realm of the damned, in his very being revelational of the will of God. It is only thus that sin retains its ethical nature. It is only thus that sin can be total depravity both in extension and in intention. It is only thus that the fruition of sin can be tasted in the realm of the lost, for only thus is sin seen to be sin against the original gracious revelation of God to mankind.

Only by presupposing this utterly revelational character of man is it possible to maintain the exclusively ethical character of saving or special grace. Christ came to save men from sin. Did he come in part, at least, to maintain the metaphysical status quo? Surely not. Sin is exclusively ethical hostility to God. It is this ethical hostility to God that Christ came to remove. To be sure, sin must be spoken of as in intent destructive of the work of God. And since the work of Christ is indispensable as the only means by which the work of God through man in history could be accomplished, this work of Christ is itself a part of the providence of God. In this respect the work of Christ may be said to be "essential" to the plan of God. At the same time this work is "accidental" in Kuyper's use of the term. For it is only because of sin as ethical hostility to God that the work of Christ "became" "essential." These two notions are supplementary of one another. They limit one another.

Roman Catholicism

It is of the utmost importance to stress the point just made. If a Protestant finds it necessary to dispute with the Roman Catholic on the nature of Christianity itself he will find it equally necessary to dispute with him on the problems of the point of contact. A Protestant theology requires a Protestant apologetic.⁷

⁷We repeat here what has been said previously; this point cannot be overemphasized. One's theology, to the extent one is consistent, will dictate one's apologetic approach.

The difference between a Protestant and a Roman Catholic conception of the point of contact will naturally have to be formulated in a way similar to that in which we state the difference between a Protestant and a Roman Catholic theology. There are two ways of stating this difference. One very common way is to indicate first an area of doctrine that the two types of theology have in common, in order afterwards to enumerate the differences between them. This is the course followed in B.B. Warfield's justly famous little book, The Plan of Salvation. Between those holding to a plan of salvation, says Warfield, there are those who think of this plan along naturalist and there are others who think of this plan along supernaturalist lines. As against the Pelagians who hold to a naturalist view "...the entire organized Church -Orthodox Greek, Roman Catholic, Latin, and Protestant in all its great historical forms, Lutheran and Reformed, Calvinistic and Arminian – bears its consentient, firm and emphatic testimony to the supernaturalistic conception of salvation." (Warfield, Plan of Salvation p.111)

Continuing from this point Warfield then divides the supernaturalists into sacerdotalists⁹ and evangelicals. The issue between them concerns "the immediacy of the saving operations of God." The Church of Rome, holding the sacerdotal point of view, teaches that “grace is communicated by and through the ministrations of the church, otherwise not” (p. 18). On the other hand, Evangelicalism “seeking to conserve what it conceives to be the only consistent supernaturalism, sweeps away every intermediary between the soul and its God, and leaves the soul dependent for its salvation on God alone, operating upon it by this immediate grace.” (p. 19). Now Protestantism and Evangelicalism are “coterminous, if not exactly synonymous designations.” (pg. 20)

⁹Sacerdotalism implies the necessity of some human mediator between God and man.

At this point Warfield goes on to mark the main variations within Protestantism. Among Protestants or evangelicals there are those who hold to a universalistic and there are those who hold to a particularistic conception of the plan of salvation. At this point Warfield goes on to mark the main variations within Protestantism. Among Protestants or evangelicals there are those who hold to a universalistic and there are those who hold to a particularistic conception of the plan of salvation. “All evangelicals agree that all the power exerted in the saving the soul is from God and that this saving power is exerted immediately upon the soul. But they differ as to whether God exerts this saving power equally, or at least indiscriminately, upon all men, be they actually saved or not, or rather only upon particular men, namely upon those who are actually saved” (p. 22). Signaling the difference between universalistic and particularistic evangelicals again, Warfield uses these words, “The precise issue which divides the universalists and the particularists is, accordingly, just whether the saving grace of God, in which alone is salvation, actually saves (pg 24).

It is not germane to our purpose to follow Warfield further as he differentiates once more between various forms of particularists. The “differences of large moment” (pg. 27) are now before us. Warfield defends particularism or Calvinism. And it has become customary to use the term evangelical with reference to non-Calvinistic Protestants.

What interests us now is the fact that, though beginning from the common denominator point of view, Warfield is compelled, each time he signals a new difference, to indicate that it is made in the interest of consistence. Protestants and Protestants in the interest of being more consistently supernaturalist than are the Roman Catholics. Calvinists are particularists in the interest of being more consistently evangelical than are the other Protestants. Calvinists aim at holding a position, according to Warfield, that shall be “uncolored by intruding elements from without” (pg. 21). Accordingly, the several conceptions of salvation “do not stand simply side by side as varying conceptions of that plan, each making its appeal in opposition to all the rest. They are related to one another rather as a progressive series of corrections of a primal error, attaining ever more and more consistency in the embodiment of the one fundamental idea of salvation (pg. 31).

It appears then that Warfield himself really suggests a better way of expressing such differences as obtain between Romanism and Protestantism, or between universalistic and particularistic Protestantism than he has himself employed. That better way is pointed out by Professor John Murray when he says, “It would appear, therefore, that the truer, more effective and, on all accounts, more secure defense of Christianity and exposition of its essential content is not to take our starting point from those terms that will express the essential creedal confession of some of its most widely known historical deformations but rather from those terms that most fully express and give character to that redemptive religion which Christianity is. In other words, Christianity cannot receive proper understanding or its exposition proper orientation unless it is viewed as that which issues from, and is consummated in the accomplishment of, the covenant counsel and purpose of Father, Son and Holy Spirit.” We are not to define the essence of Christianity in terms of its lowest but rather in terms of its highest forms. Calvinism is “Christianity come to its own.”¹¹ Beginning from Calvinism we should descend to universalistic Protestantism and thence to Romanism as deviations from the true view of Christianity.

¹¹Van Til here is paraphrasing Warfield in Calvin and Calvinism, ed. Ethelbert Dudley Warfield (New York and London: Oxford University Press, 1931), 355. To quote: “In Calvinism, then, objectively speaking, theism comes to its rights; theism comes to its rights only in a teleological conception of the universe, which perceives in the entire course of events the orderly outworking of the plan of God, who is the author, preserver, and governor of all things, whose will is consequently the ultimate cause of all.”

It is Romanism with which we are now primarily concerned. Romanism should be regarded as deformation of Christianity, in fact as its lowest deformation. And this deformation expresses itself not merely at some but at every point of doctrine. The differences between Protestantism and Romanism are not adequately indicated if we say that Luther restored to the church the true doctrines of the Bible, of justification by faith and of the priesthood of all believers. The difference is rather that Protestantism is more consistently and Rome is less consistently Christian at every point of doctrine. It could not well be otherwise. Having inconsistency at one point of doctrine is bound to result in inconsistency at all points of doctrine. Rome has been consistently inconsistent in the confusion of non-Christian with Christian elements of teaching along the entire gamut of doctrinal expression.

The bearing of all this on the question of starting point may now be briefly suggested. In the question of starting point it is all-important that we have a truly Christian doctrine of man. But this Rome does not have. Without going into details, it may be asserted that Rome has a defective doctrine (a) with respect to the nature of man as he was created and (b) with respect to the effect of the entrance of sin upon the nature of man. “The important point of difference is,” says Charles Hodge, “that Protestants hold that original righteousness, so far as it consisted in the moral excellence of Adam, was natural, while the Romanists maintain that it was supernatural. According to their theory, God created man soul and body. These two constituents of his nature are naturally in conflict. To preserve the harmony between them, and the due subjection of the flesh to the spirit, God gave man the supernatural gift of original righteousness. It was this gift that man lost by the fall; so that since the apostasy he is in the state in which Adam was before he was invested with this supernatural endowment. In opposition to this doctrine, Protestants maintain that original righteousness was concreated and natural.” The objections to this view, as Hodge enumerates them, are (1) “That it supposes a degrading view of the original constitution of or nature. According to this doctrine the seeds of evil were implanted in the nature of man as it came from the hands of God. It was disordered or diseased, there was about it what Bellarmine calls a morbus or languor, which needed a remedy...” (2) “This doctrine as to original righteousness arose out of the Semi-Pelagianism of the Church of Rome, and was designed to sustain it.”

Suppose then that a Romanist approaches and unbeliever and asks him to accept Christianity. The unbeliever, in his eyes, is merely such a one as has lost original righteousness. The image of God in him which, according to Romanism consists as Hodge says, “only of the rational, and especially the voluntary nature of man, or the freedom of the will.” (p. 103) is thought of as still intact. That is to say, the unbeliever, is, perhaps barring extremes, correct in what he himself thinks of the powers of his intellect and will. There is not necessarily any sin involved in what the unbeliever, or natural man, does by way of exercising his capacities for knowledge and action. On this view the natural man does not need the light of Christianity to enable him to understand the world and himself aright. He does not need the revelation of Scripture or the illumination of the Holy Spirit in order that by means of them he may learn what his own true nature is. [all this is massively important.]

Christianity therefore needs, on this basis, to be presented to the natural man as something that is merely information additional to what he already possesses. The knowledge of Christianity is to be related to the knowledge derived from the exercise of man’s powers of reason and observation in a way similar to that in which at the beginning original righteousness was added to the image of God in man.

But without the light of Christianity, it is as little possible for man to have the correct view about himself and the world as it is to have the true view about God. On account of the fact of sin man is blind with respect to the truth wherever the truth appears. And truth is one. Man cannot truly know himself unless he truly knows God.¹⁴ Not recognizing the fact of the fall, the philosophers, says Calvin, throw everything into confusion. They do not reckon with the fact that “at first every part of the soul was formed to rectitude” But that after the fall man is equally corrupt in all aspects of his being. “They tell,” says Calvin, “there is great repugnance between the organic movements and the rational part of the soul. As if reason also were not at variance with herself, and here counsels sometimes conflicting with each other like hostile armies. But since this disorder results from the depravity of nature, it is erroneous to infer that there are two souls, because the faculties do not accord harmoniously as they ought.”

¹⁴That is, unless man truly knows God in a saving way. Men do know God according to the sensus divinitatis.

It appears then that there is a fundamental difference of opinion between Romanism and Calvin on the origin and nature of the “disturbance” in human nature. The view of Rome is essentially the same as that of the Greek philosophers: in particular, that of Aristotle. According to this view the disturbance is endemic to human nature because man is made up, in part, of non-rational elements.¹⁷ To the extent that man consists of intellect he does not and cannot sin. The “disturbance” in man’s make-up is not due primarily to any fault of his own. It is basically due to “God” who “made” him. On the other hand, according to Calvin, there is no “disturbance” in the nature of man as he comes forth from the hands of God. The “disturbance” has come in as the result of sin. Accordingly, every one of fallen man’s functions operates wrongly. The set of the whole human personality has changed. The intellect of fallen man may, as such, be keen enough. It can therefore formally understand the Christian position. It may be compared to a buzz-saw that is sharp and shining, ready to cut the boards that come to it. Let us say that a carpenter wishes to cut fifty boards for the purpose of laying the floor of a house. He has marked his boards. He has set his saw. He begins at one end of the mark on the board. But he does not know that his seven-year-old son has tampered with the saw and changed its set. The result is that every board he saws is cut slantwise and thus unusable because too short except at the point where the saw first made is contact with the wood. As long as the set of the saw is not changed the result will always be the same.¹⁸ So also whenever the teaching of Christianity are presented to the natural man they will be cut according to the set of sinful human personality. The keener the intellect the more consistently will the truths of Christianity be cut according to an exclusively immanentistic pattern.¹⁹ The result is that however much they may formally understand the truth of Christianity, men still worship “the dream and figment of their own heart.”²⁰ They have what Hodge calls “mere cognition,” but no true knowledge of God.²¹

¹⁷This refers, in general, to Aristotle’s view that matter is inherently evil. Thus, to the extent that man is made up of nonrational, or material, elements, he is in need of repair.

¹⁸This is a very helpful metaphor for understanding the Reformed idea of the noetic effects of sin. The saw (analogous to our reasoning faculty) does indeed work; it is the same saw that was previously set correctly. Because of its faulty setting, however, even though it works, it always cuts the wrong slant.

¹⁹An “immanentistic pattern” is any pattern that attempts to work on the basis of this world alone (immanence) without reference to God and his creating and controlling the world.

²⁰Calvin, Institutes, 1.15.1

²¹Again, this “mere cognition” should be distinguished from the true knowledge of God that all people have by virtue of the sensus divinitatis. Mere cognition includes an understanding of the worlds and concepts, without an acknowledgment of the truth therein.

Still further as the “philosophers” and Calvin differ on the source and nature of the “disturbance” in human nature so they also differ on the remedy to be employed for the removal of that disturbance. According to the philosophers, man does not need supernatural help for the removal of the disturbance within his being. According to the Greek view, so largely followed by Rome, man’s intellect has within itself the proper set. [similar to the view held by Pelagians and Arminians] The fall has not disturbed the set of the saw and therefore there is no need of the supernatural power of the Holy Spirit to reset it. [That is KEY!!] The nature of the intellect and its activity is almost unaffected by what happens to man in the course of history.

In opposition to this view, Hodge, following the lead of Calvin, stresses the fact that the whole set of sinful man needs to be renewed by the power of the Holy Spirit. The natural man must be “renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him.” (Col. 3:10) “New man,” νέον, says Hodge, in exposition of St. Paul, “agreeably to the ordinary distinction between νέον and παλαιός means recent, newly made, as opposed to (παλαιός) old. The moral quality or excellence of this recently formed man is expressed in the word ἀνακαινονμενον; as in Scriptural usage what is παλαιός is pure. This renovation is said to be εἰς ἐπίγνωσιν, not in knowledge, much less by knowledge, but unto knowledge, so that he knows. Knowledge is the effect of the renovation spoken of." A little further Hodge adds: "The knowledge here intended is not mere cognition. It is full, accurate, living, or practical knowledge; such knowledge as is eternal life, so that this word here includes what in Eph. 4:24 is expressed by righteousness and holiness."

²⁴ and to put on the new self, created after the likeness of God in true righteousness and holiness.

Hodge also exegetes Ephesians 4:24, "Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness." "These words," says Hodge, "when used in combination are intended to be exhaustive, i.e., to include all moral excellence. Either term may be used in this comprehensive sense, but, when distinguished, δικαιοσύνη means rectitude, the being and doing right, what justice demand; ὁσιότης, purity, holiness, the state of mind produced with the soul is full of God. Instead of true holiness, the worlds of the Apostle should be rendered 'righteousness and holiness of the truth'; that is, the righteousness and holiness which are the effects or manifestations of the truth. By truth here as opposed to the deceit (ἀπάτη) mentioned in the twenty-second verse, is meant what in Col. 3:10 is called knowledge. It is the divine light in the understanding of which the Spirit of truth is the author, and from which, as their proximate cause, all right affections and holy acts proceed." Repeatedly Hodge stresses the fact that according to Scripture the natural man is incapable of himself to understand and accept the truth of Christianity." "The natural man, man as he is by nature, is destitute of the life of God, i.e., of spiritual life. His understanding is darkness, so that he does not know or receive the things of God. [see Rom. 8:6-8 and 1Cor2:14, Matt. 6:23] He is not susceptible of impression from the realities of the spiritual world. He is as insensible to them as a dead man to the things of the world."

My comment:

[Due to his hard heart of stone that cannot receive impressions from a seal until it is made soft like wax, by the Spirit's power in regeneration, Ezek. 36:26, "And I will give you a new heart, and a new spirit I will put within you. And I will remove the heart of stone from your flesh and give you a heart of flesh."]

This following part of this paragraph is awesome!

In discussing regeneration Hodge asserts,

The Bible makes eternal life to consist in knowledge¹, sinfulness is blindness, or darkness; the transition from a state of sin to a state of holiness is a translation from darkness to light; men are said to be renewed unto knowledge, i.e., knowledge is the effect of regeneration, conversion is said to be effected by the revelation of Christ; the rejection of Him as the Son of God and Saviour of men is referred to the fact that the eyes of those who believe not are blinded by the god of this world.

Or again,

The heart in Scripture is that which thing, feels, wills, and acts. It is the soul, the self. A new heart is, therefore, a new self, a new man. It implies a change of the whole character. It is a new nature. Out of the heart proceed all conscious, voluntary, moral exercises. A change of heart, there, is a change which precedes these exercises and determines their character.

¹My Comment: Hence, faith is denominated not only by believing but also knowledge! Isaiah 53:11, “by his knowledge shall the righteous one, my servant, make many to be accounted righteous, and he shall bear their iniquities.” This knowledge is a saving knowledge of Christ. G Clark

According to the evangelical doctrine the whole soul is the subject of regeneration. It is neither the intellect to the exclusion of the feelings, nor the feelings to the exclusion of the intellect; nor is it the will alone, either in its wider or in its more limited sense, that is the subject of the change in question...

Regeneration secures right knowledge as well as right feeling; and right feeling is not the effect of right knowledge, nor is right knowledge the effect of right feeling. The two are the inseparable effects of a work which affects the whole soul.”

We conclude then that it is natural and consistent for Roman Catholic apologetics to seek its point of contact with the unbeliever in a “common area” of knowledge. Roman Catholic theology agrees with the essential contention of those it seeks to win to the Christian faith that man’s consciousness of himself and of the objects of the world is intelligible without reference to God.

But herein precisely lies the fundamental point of difference between Romanism and Protestantism. According to the principle of Protestantism, man’s consciousness of self and of objects presuppose for their intelligibility the self-consciousness of God. In asserting this we are not thinking of psychological and temporal priority. We are thinking only of the question as to what is the final reference point in interpretation. The Protestant principle finds this in the self-contained ontological trinity. By his counsel the triune God controls whatsoever come to pass. If then the human consciousness must, in the nature of the case, always be the proximate starting-point, it remains true that God is always the most basic and therefore the ultimate or final reference point in human interpretation.³¹ [It has to be since all things were made for Him, Col. 1:16; and, “For from him and through him and to him are all things.” Rom. 11:36, and it is in him that we live and move and have our being, Acts 17:28. All things are subordinate to his will, his self-glorification.]

³¹This point needs to be emphasized. Van Til affirms that the proximate starting point for all our thinking is, of necessity, the self. The apologetic point, however, is that the ultimate reference point with respect to predication is the triune God.

This is, in the last analysis, the question as to what are one’s ultimate presuppositions. When man became a sinner, he made of himself instead of god the ultimate or final reference point. And it is precisely this presupposition, as it controls without exception all forms of non-Christian philosophy, that must be brought into question. If this presupposition is left unquestioned in any field all the facts and arguments presented to the unbeliever will be made over by him according to his pattern. The sinner has cemented colored glasses to his eyes which he cannot remove. [He is dead in sin; captive of Satan, sin having complete dominion over him. When the Son sets you free, then you will be free, free from your blindness.] And all is yellow to the jaundiced eye.³² There can be no intelligible reasoning unless those who reason together understand what they mean by their words.

³²Again, the metaphor here is helpful. The blindness of sin does not mean that we cannot see; it means rather that everything that we see is colored by our condition of depravity. What we see, therefore, we inevitably twist according to our own sinful desires.

[codeproofs]

In not challenging this basic presupposition with respect to himself as the final reference point in predication the natural man may accept the “theistic proofs” as fully valid. He may construct such proof. He has constructed such proofs. But the god whose existence he proves to himself in this way is always a god who is something other than the self-contained ontological trinity of Scripture. The Roman Catholic apologete does not want to prove the existence of this sort of God. He wants to prove the existence of such a God as will leave intact the autonomy of man to at least some extent. [that is key! Fallen man vigorously defends his supposed autonomy, so Rome and BTW many [Arminian] Christians do not want to offend, so they compromise here (unwittingly maybe) on God’s true sovereign nature.] Rome’s theology dose not want a God whose counsel controls whatsoever comes to pass.

It is natural then that Rome’s view of the point of contact with the unbeliever is what it is.

II Evangelicalism

This next part is very important:

We have spoken of the basic difference between Romanism and Protestantism on this question of the point of contact. But not all Protestantism has been fully true to the Protestant principle. Warfield has pointed this out admirably in the book discussed. It was only in Calvinism that the Protestant principle that salvation is of God alone has come to its consistent expression. Non-Calvinistic Protestants, frequently spoken of as Evangelicals, have conceived of “the operations of God looking to salvation universalistically” in order to leave room for an ultimate decision on the part of the individual human being. God, as it were, through Christ deposits a large sum of money in a bank and announces this fact in the daily papers, offering to each one who comes sufficient for all his needs. It is then, in the last analysis, up to the individual whether he wants to be and remain in the class of those who live by the generosity of this bank. God approaches man by means of universals. There are differences among evangelicals, but, in the last analysis, these differences are merely as to whether God approaches the individuals by means of a wider or a narrower species. The final issue is always left up to the individual. [In other words, God is for you, Satan is against you; you cast the deciding vote.] “Particularism in the process of salvation becomes thus the mark of Calvinism.” Warfield speaks therefore of Calvinism as being the only form of Protestantism “uncolored by intruding elements from without.” God’s action is the ultimate source of all determinate being.

For our purposes then the point of importance is that Evangelicalism has retained something of Roman Catholicism both in its view of man and in its view of God. Like Romanism, Evangelicalism thinks of human self-consciousness and consciousness of objects as to some extent intelligible without the consciousness of God. It is to be expected that Evangelicalism will be in agreement with Rome on the question of the point of contact. Both forms of theology are colored by elements of an underlying naturalism.³⁵ Both are therefore unwilling to challenge the natural man's basic presupposition with respect to himself as the ultimate reference point in interpretation. Both are unwilling to prove the existence of such a God as controls whatever come to pass. [Arminians and many others despise God's sovereign and eternal decrees, especially of unconditional election. They see it as doing violence to their supposed liberty of their free will – that nothing outside of themselves can influence them one way or the other, which nothing but man putting himself in the room of God.]

³⁵ Van Til uses "naturalism" here in a generic sense, in which it is thought that there are aspects of "nature," including in this case the nature of man, that are thought to be self-evident.

The great textbook of Evangelical apologetics is Bishop Butler's famous Analogy.³⁶ It is not our purpose here to deal with its argument fully. Suffice it to point out that its argument is closely similar to that which is found, for instance, in the Summa Contra Gentiles of Thomas Aquinas. Butler holds to an Arminian view in theology. He therefore assumes that the natural man by "a reasonable use of reason" can interpret aright "the course and constitution of nature." If only the natural man will continue to employ the same "reasonable use of reason" with respect to the facts presented to him in Scripture about Christ and his work, there is every likelihood that he will become a Christian." [In other words, Arminians hold that man can come to God without being effectually called! But it is the Shepherd who calls his sheep; not the sheep calling the Shepherd!]

³⁶ Bishop Joseph Butler (1692-1752) was the most influential Protestant apologist of the eighteenth century. The book to which Van Til refers, The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature (1736), was a defense of Christianity against the prevalent deism of the day. Butler used a double negative argument to attempt to argue from the natural religion of the deists to the probability of revealed religion as well (given X in natural religion, it is not so irrational to believe Y in revealed religion). The basic thrust of Butler's argument is this: this (observed) life and the (unobserved) afterlife, taken together exhibit features that resemble known features of this life taken alone. For example, we can infer that this life is a training-ground which the early years of this life reader should note that they are term a training-ground for the next life from the way in which the early years of this life are a training-ground for the later ones. Parenthetically, the reader should note that the term "analogy" is not used in this same way by Butler, Aquinas, and Van Til, which is one reason why confusion remains with respect to the term itself in apologetics.

III

Less Consistent Calvinism

The question of starting-point then is largely determined by one's theology. In the first chapters it has been our aim to set forth the salient features of Christianity according to the principles of the Reformed faith. In particular it has been the aim to indicate the main features of Christianity after the fashion indicated by the great Reformed theologians of recent times. It is on the basis of the work of such men as Charles Hodge, Herman Bavinck, and B.B. Warfield, to mention no others, that have formulated the broad outline of the Reformed life and world view. It is only by the help of such men that we have been enabled to attain to anything like a consistent Protestantism.

It is only to follow out their suggestion then if we follow their principles in apologetics as well as in theology proper. We are to defend, as Warfield himself so well expresses it, not some minimal essence of Christianity, nor every detail included in the doctrines of Christianity, but “just Christianity itself...including all its ‘details’ and involving its ‘essence’ – in its unexplicated and uncompromised entirety...”

And this Christianity we must bring to those who are dead in trespasses and sins. “It is,” says Warfield, “upon a field of the dead that the Sun of righteousness has risen, and the shouts that announce His advent fall on deaf ears; yea, even though the morning stars should again sing for joy and the air be palpitant with the echo of the great proclamation, their voice could not penetrate the ears of the dead. As we sweep our eyes over the world lying in its wickedness, it is the valley of the prophet’s vision which we see before us; a valley that is filled with bones, and lo! They are very dry. What benefit is there in proclaiming to dry bones even the greatest redemptions? How shall we stand and cry, O, ye dry bones, hear ye the word of the Lord? In vain the redemption, in vain its proclamation, unless there come a breath from heaven to breathe upon these slain that they may live.” “The Christian lives by virtue of the life that has been given him, and prior to the inception of that life, of course, he has no power of action; and it is of the utmost importance that as Christian men we should not lower our testimony to this supernaturalness of our salvation.” Regeneration, we have seen Hodge argue, is unto knowledge, righteousness and holiness.

It would seem that we have dropped from this high plane to the level of evangelicalism when Hodge speaks of the office of reason in matters of religion. About this point there can be little cause for dispute. “Revelations cannot be made to brutes or to idiots.” Second, Hodge argues that “Reason must judge of the credibility of a revelation.” And “the credible is that which can be believed. Nothing is incredible but the impossible. What may be, may be rationally (i.e., on adequate grounds) believed.” What then is impossible? Hodge replies: “(1) That is impossible which involves a contradiction; as, that a thing is and is not; that right is wrong and wrong is right. (2) It is impossible that God should do, approve, or command what is morally wrong. (3) It is impossible that He should require us to believe what contradicts any of the laws of belief which He has impressed upon our nature. (4) It impossible that one truth should contradict another. It is impossible, therefore, that God should reveal anything as true which contradicts any well authenticated truth, whether of intuition, experience, or previous revelation.” Third, Hodge continues, “Reason must judge of the evidence of a revelation.” As “faith involves assent, and assent is conviction produced by evidence, it follows that faith without evidence is either irrational or impossible.” The second and third prerogatives of reason, says Hodge, are approved by Scripture itself. Paul “recognized the paramount authority of the intuitive judgments of the mind” and “Jesus appealed to his works as evidence of the truth of his claims.”

It is not our purpose here to deal fully with the question of reason and revelation. Suffice it to note the ambiguity that underlies this approach to the question of the point of contact. When Hodge speaks of reason he means “those laws of belief which God has implanted in our nature.” Now it is true, of course, that God has planted such laws of belief into our very being. It is this point on which Calvin lays such great stress when he says that all men have a sense of deity. But the unbeliever does not accept the doctrine of his creation in the image of God. It is therefore impossible to appeal to the intellectual and moral nature of men, as men themselves interpret this nature, and say that it must judge of the credibility and evidence of revelation. For it this is done, we are virtually telling the natural man to accept just so much and no more of Christianity as, with his perverted concept of human nature, he cares to accept.⁴⁵

⁴⁵ It is crucial to understand, in light of Van Til's critique of Hodge here, that Hodge seems to have departed from the Reformed tradition before him at this particular point. (It should also be noted that Van Til follows Hodge on virtually every other point.) Just why this is the case cannot be discussed here. It should be noted, however, that Turretin whose Institutes Hodge and Old Princeton would have followed until the appearance of Hodge's Systematic Theology, says this: "The question is not whether reason has any use in theology. For we confess that its use is manifold both for illustration; for comparison; for inference . . . ; and for argumentation. . . . But the question is simply whether it bears the relation of a principle and rule in whose scale the greatest mysteries of religion should be weighed, so that nothing should be held which is not agreeable to it, which is not founded upon and cannot be elicited from reason. This we deny against the Socinians who ... contend that reason is the rule of religion of things to be believed, and that those things are not to be believed which seem to the mind to be impossible." Francis Turretin, Institutes of Elenctic Theology, vol. I, ed. James T. Dennison Jr., trans. George Musgrave Giger (Phillipsburg, N.J. P&R, 1994), 1:24.

And later Turretin notes: "Thus Scripture, which is the first principle in the supernatural order, is known by itself and has no need of arguments derived from without to prove and make itself known to us. If God has stamped such marks upon all first principles that they can be known at once by all men, we cannot doubt that he has placed them upon this sacred first principle (in the highest degree necessary to our salvation)." Institutes Elenctic Theology, 1:89

Good comments on Arminianism in this paragraph:

To use once again the illustration of the saw: the saw ins in itself but a tool. Whether it will move at all and whether it will cut in the right direction depends upon the man operating it. So also reason, or intellect, is always the instrument of a person. And the person employing it is always either a believer or an unbeliever. If he is a believer, his reason has already been changed in its set, as Hodge has told us, by regeneration. It cannot then be the judge; it is now a part of the regenerated person, gladly subject to the authority of God. It has by God's grace permitted itself to be interpreted by God's revelation. If, on the other hand, the person using his reason is an unbeliever, then this person, using his reason, will certainly assume the position of judge with respect to the credibility and evidence of revelation, but he will also certainly find the Christian religion incredible because impossible and the evidence for it is always inadequate.

Hodge's own teaching on the blindness and hardness of the natural man corroborates this fact. To attribute to the natural man the right to judge by means of his reason of what is possible or impossible, or to judge by means of his moral nature of what is good or evil, is virtually to deny the "particularism" which, as Hodge no less than Warfield, believes to be the very hall-mark of a truly Biblical theology. In such a case Christianity would not claim to interpret the reasoner himself. That reasoner would be taken as already having within himself, previous to his acceptance of Christianity, the ability rightly to interpret and rightly to employ the powers of his own nature. And this is the exact equivalent of the Arminian position when it claims that God made salvation objectively possible but did not actually save individual men.

The main difficulty with the position of Hodge on this matter of the point of contact, then, is that it does not clearly distinguish between the original and the fallen nature of man. Basically, of course, it is Hodge's intention to appeal to the original nature of man as it came forth from the hands of its Creator. But he frequently argues as though that original nature can still be found as active in the "common consciousness" of men. Now there is a large element of truth in the contention that the common sense of man has not strayed so far from the truth as have the sophistications of the philosophers. Outspoken, blasphemous atheism is not usually found among the masses of men. But this does not take away the fact that all men are sinful in all the manifestations of their personality.

Good comments on Romans 7

A comparison may tend to clarify this point. In the seventh chapter of Romans, Paul speaks of himself, though a believer, as having a law of sin within members which often controls him against his will.⁴⁶ His "new man" is the real man, the man in Christ Jesus. But his "old man" is the remnant of his sinful nature that has not been fully destroyed. Applying this analogy to the natural man we have the following. The sinner is the one whose "new man" is the man in alliance with Satan But his "old man" is that which wars within his members against his will; it is his nature as he came forth from the hand of his Creator. When the prodigal has left his father's house he is on the way to the swine-trough. But while on this way he has his misgivings. He seeks to make himself believe that his true nature consists in his self-assertion away from the father's house. But he kicks against the pricks. He sins against his better knowledge. It is quite in accord with the genius of Hodge's theology to appeal to the "old man" in the sinner and altogether out of accord with his theology to appeal to the "new man" in the sinner as though he would form a basically proper judgment on any question. Yet Hodge has failed to distinguish clearly between these two. Accordingly he does not clearly distinguish the Reformed from the Evangelical and Roman Catholic views of the point of contact. Accordingly he also speaks about "reason" as something that seems to operate rightly wherever it is found. But the "reason" of sinful men will invariably act wrongly. Particularly is this true when they are confronted with the specific contents of Scripture. The natural man will invariably employ the tool of his reason to reduce these contents to a naturalistic level. He must do so even in the interest of the principle of contradiction. For his own ultimacy is the most basic presupposition of his entire philosophy. It is upon this presupposition as its fulcrum that he uses the law of contradiction. If he is asked to use his reason as the judge of the credibility of the Christian revelation without at the same time being asked to renounce his view of himself as ultimate, then he is virtually asked to believe and to disbelieve in his own ultimacy at the same time and in the same sense. [Wow!]

⁴⁶Though Romans 7 is a contested passage, Van Til is following, at least, John Murray here in his understanding that Paul is writing about the conflict of a Christian.

Moreover, this same man, in addition to rejecting Christianity in the name of the law of contradiction, will also reject it in the name of what he calls his intuition of freedom. By this he means virtually the same thing as his ultimacy. Speaking of the “philosophers” Calvin says, “The principle they set out with was that man could not be a rational animal unless he had a free choice of good and evil... They also imagined that that distinction between virtue and vice was destroyed, if man did not of his own counsel arrange his life.” [Textbook Arminianism] If such a one is asked to accept the position of Christianity, according to which his destiny is ultimately determined by the counsel of God, he is asked to accept what to him makes right wrong and wrong right. [hence the darkness that is in unregenerate men.]

It is only to follow out the lead which Hodge in his theology, following Calvin, has given, if we seek our point of contact not in any abstraction whatsoever, whether it be reason or intuition. No such abstraction exists in the universe of men. We always deal with concrete individual men. These men are sinners. They have “an axe to grind.” They want to suppress the truth in unrighteousness. They will employ their reason for that purpose. And they are not formally illogical if, granted the assumption of man’s ultimacy, they reject the teachings of Christianity. On the contrary, to be logically consistent they are bound to do so.⁴⁸ This point will engage us more fully in the sequel. For the moment it must suffice to have shown how the apologist is not only untrue to his own doctrine of man as the creature of God, but also defeats his own purpose if he appeals to some form of the “common consciousness of man.”

⁴⁸Van Til will argue also that the unbeliever, like the believer, cannot be logically consistent. If he were, however, he would be able completely to eradicate his creatureliness from his thinking and his living.

Before going on to discuss what appears to us to be a more truly Biblical view of the problem of the point of contact, we would call attention to one other form of inconsistent Calvinism on this matter. In his book, Het Testimonium Spiritus Sancti, D. Valentine Hepp speaks about prima principia with respect to God, man and the world which, he says, men in general accept.³³

With respect to the central truths which speak to us from creation as such, there is little doubt among men. A few mistaken scientists, who insist on maintaining their mistaken starting-point, insist that they doubt whether God or man or world exist. They owe such statements, not to experience, but to their systems. But their number, though we hear much of them, is very small. Taken as a whole mankind does not deny the central truths. The great majority of men recognize a higher power above them, and do not hesitate to accept the reality of the world and of man.

The position of Hepp, as appears even from this one quotation, is similar to that of Hodge. Like Hodge, Hepp wants to appeal to a general faith in “central truths” that all men, when not too sophisticated, accept. There seems to be for Hepp, as for Hodge, something in the way of a commonsense philosophy which the natural man has and which, because intuitive or spontaneous, is, so far forth, not tainted by sin. It appears, however, even from the brief quotation given, that the “common notions” of men are sinful notions. For man to reflect on this own awareness of meaning and then merely to say that a higher power, a God, exists, is in effect to say that God does not exist. It is as though a child, reflecting upon his home environment would conclude that a father or a mother exist. And to “recognize the reality of the world and of man” is in itself not even to recognize the elemental truths of creation and providence. It is not enough to appeal from the more highly articulated systems of non-Christian thinkers to the philosophy of the common consciousness, of common sense, of intuition, that is to something that is more immediately related to the revelational pressure that rest upon men.

Both Hepp and Hodge seem to be desirous of doing no more than Calvin does when he appeals to the sense of deity present in all men. But this notion, seeking to set froth as it does the teaching of Paul, that God’s revelation is present to every man, must be carefully distinguished from the reaction that sinful men make to this revelation. The revelation of God, not of a god, is so immediately present to every man, that, as Warfield, following Calvin, says: “The conviction of the existence of God bears the marks of an intuitive truth in so far as it is the universal and unavoidable belief of men, and is given in the very same act with the idea of self, which is known at once as dependent and responsible and thus implies one on whom it depends and to whom it is responsible.” It is to this sense of deity, even this knowledge of God, which, Paul tells us (tom 1:19-20) every man has, but which, as Paul also tells us, every sinner seeks to suppress, that the Christian apologetic must appeal.

What has been said up this point may seem to be discouraging in the extreme. It would seem that the argument up to this point has driven us to a denial of any point of contact whatsoever with the unbeliever. Is it not true that men must have some contact with the truth if they are to receive further knowledge of it? If men are totally ignorant of the truth, how can they even become interesting in it? If men are totally blind why display before them the colors of the spectrum? If they are deaf why take them to the academy of music?

Moreover, is not reason itself a gift of God? And does not the scientist, though not a Christian, know much about the universe? Does one need to be a Christian to know that two times two are four? And besides all this, does Christianity, while telling us of much that is above reason, require of us to accept anything that is against reason?

Our answer to this type of query is that it is precisely in the Reformed conception of the point of contact, and in it alone, that the historically so famous dilemma about the wholly ignorant, or the wholly omniscient, can be avoided. But before showing this positively it is necessary to indicate that in the Roman Catholic view this dilemma is insoluble.

If a man is wholly ignorant of the truth he cannot be interested in the truth. On the other hand if he is really interested in the truth it must be that he already possesses the main elements of the truth. It is in the interest of escaping the horns of this dilemma that Rome and evangelical Protestantism seek a point of contact in some area of “common knowledge” between believers and unbelievers. Their argument is that in teaching the total depravity of man in the way he does the Calvinist is in the unfortunate position of having to speak to deaf men when he preaches the gospel. We believe, on the contrary, that it is only the Calvinist who is not in this position.

Plato's famous allegory of the cave may illustrate the Roman Catholic position. The dwellers of this cave had chains about their necks and on their legs. They saw nothing but shadows and attributed echoes to these shadows. Yet they supposed that "they were naming what was actually before them." If one of them should be released, says Plato, he would need to get accustomed to the light of the sun. But he would pity those who were still in the cave. And "if he had to compete in measuring the shadows with the prisoners who have never moved out of the den...would he not be ridiculous in their view? "Men would say of him that up he went and down he comes without his eyes; and that there is no use in even thinking of ascending; and if anyone tried to loose another and lead him up to the light, let them only catch the offender in the act, and they would put him to death."

Plato himself interprets this allegory in relation to man's capacity for and knowledge of the truth. The prisoners have eyes with which to see the truth; all they need is to have their heads turned about so they may face the truth.

It is in some such fashion that Rome thinks of the natural man. Following Aristotle's general method of reasoning, Thomas Aquinas argues that the natural man can, by the ordinary use of his reason, do justice to the natural revelation that surrounds him. He merely needs some assistance [i.e., prevenient grace] in order that he may also see and react properly to the supernatural revelation that is found in Christianity.⁵³

⁵³ Aquinas says, for example: "There is a two-fold mode of truth in what we profess about God. Some truths about God exceed all the abilities of the human reason. Such is the truth that God is triune. But there are some truths which the natural reason is also able to reach. Such are that God exists, that He is one, and the like. In fact, such truths about God have been proved demonstratively by the philosophers, guided by the light of natural reason." Thomas Aquinas, Summa contra Gentiles, trans. Anton C. Pegis (Notre Dame and London: Notre Dame University Press, 1957), 1.63.

According to the Roman view then, the natural man is already in possession of the truth in terms of a true interpretation of natural revelation. And he interprets natural revelation aright because he participates in the being of God. To be sure, he is said to be in possession of the truth only with respect to natural revelation. But if the natural man can and does interpret natural revelation in a way that is essentially correct there is no reason why he should need supernatural aid in order to interpret Christianity truly. At most he would need the information that Christ and his Spirit have come into the world. Hearing this news, he would not fail, as a rational being, to make the proper reaction to it. If the natural man's eyes (reason)_ enable him to see correctly in one dimension, there is no good reason to think that the same eyes will not enable him, without further assistance from without, to see correctly in all dimensions. There would be no reason why all of the prisoners of the cave could not break their chains and walk in the light of day. In fact, Plato gives no reason why those, who did not escape could not have escaped as well as the one who did.

On the other hand, it may be said that according to the Roman Catholic view the natural man does not give a fully correct interpretation of natural revelation. Does not Thomas Aquinas correct the interpretations that "the philosopher" has given of the things of nature? And does not the Roman Catholic view of the image of God in man itself imply that even originally, before the fall, man was unable, without the donum superadditum [see Van Til @ code490 & code530] to know anything in a perfect way?

We reply that though Aquinas does correct some of the conclusions of Aristotle, he accepts the method of Aristotle as essentially sound. But, ignoring this, and granting for the sake of the argument that according to Rome the natural man's view of natural revelation is not fully correct, it should be noted that the only reason Rome can adduce for this fact is a defect in revelation itself. The prisoners of Plato's cave are not to be blamed for the fact that they see shadows only. They are doing full justice by the position in which they find themselves. If their heads are bound so that they see shadows only, this is due to no fault of theirs. It is due to the constitution and course of nature. According to this view the human mind is not originally and naturally in contact with the truth. The idea of freedom, as entertained by Roman theology, is based upon man's being metaphysically distinct from "god." And this is tantamount to saying that man is free to the extent that he has not "being." There is on this basis no genuine point of contact with the mind of the natural man at all. The ideas that man is out of contact with God and that he participates in the being of God are correlative to one another.

We do not object to the idea that the mind of man is said to be always in need of supernatural revelation. On the contrary we would stress the fact that even in paradise the mind of man needed and enjoyed a supernatural revelation. What we object to is the reason given for the need that man had of supernatural revelation even in paradise. The reason for this need, according to the Roman Catholic view, is virtually a defect in the original constitution of man. This implies that man is naturally, according to his original constitution, prone to error as well as to truth. The reason for this is that the god of Roman Catholicism does not control "whatsoever come to pass." Man is, accordingly, not exclusively confronted with that which reveals God. Man is also confronted with the ultimately non-rational.⁵⁸ On such a conception of reality in general it is natural that man's constitution should be thought of, on the one hand, as of itself possessing the truth and, on the other hand, as never able, by its natural action, to come into possession of the truth.

⁵⁶ Van Til's reasoning here includes the notion that, in Romanist philosophical man participates in the being of God, yet that participation cannot include man's choice since it must be free of any outside constraint. So, if we "are" in God, but are "free" outside of his influence, we "are not" in God with respect to our choices. This is one way in which Van Til works out a rational/irrational dialectic with respect to elements of unbelief.

⁵⁷ That is, God spoke to Adam and Eve (Gen. 2:16-17), and specified to them how they were to act in obedience before him.

⁵⁸The “ultimately nonrational,” in Romanist theology, includes the fact that man as created could not please God; man was also in need of an added righteousness. [the donum superadditum. See code530]

On such a basis too, the addition of supernatural to natural revelation would not remedy matters. It would be as true of supernatural as of natural revelation that either it would not reach man or else if it did reach man, he would not be in need of it.

If natural revelation does not so envelope man as to make it impossible for him to look at anything that does not speak of God, then supernatural revelation will not do this either. If natural revelation does not of such a God as by his counsel surrounds man completely, then neither can supernatural revelation speak of such a God. But if it did, per impossible, speak of such a God, it could mean nothing to the mind of man as Rom conceives of it. The revelation of a self-sufficient God can have no meaning for a mind that thinks of itself as ultimately autonomous. The possibility for a point of contact has disappeared. The whole idea of the revelation of the self-sufficient God of Scripture drops to the ground if man himself is autonomous or self-sufficient. If man is not himself revelational in the internal structure of his being, he can receive no revelation that comes to him from without.⁵⁹ [The natural man will defend his supposed autonomy to the death. He must be confronted with this.] ⁵⁹Masselink’s position follows that of Hepp and, with it, that of Thomas Aquinas. See William Masselink, “New Views of Common Grace in Light of Historic Reformed Theology.” The Calvin Forum 19, no. 10 (May 1954): 1971.

On the other hand, if man is in any sense autonomous, he is not in need of revelation. If he is then said to possess the truth he possesses it as the product of the ultimately legislative powers of his intellect. It is only if he can virtually control by means of the application of the law of non-contradiction all the facts of reality that surround him, that he can know any truth at all. And thus, if he knows any truth in this way, he, in effect, knows all truth.

On the Roman Catholic position, then, man is, with the cave dwellers of Plato, by virtue of his own constitution, adapted to semi-darkness. Revelation would not do him any good, even though we might think of him as in need of it. If revelation is to come to him, it must com to him as the truth came to one of Plato’s cave-dwellers, in an accidental fashion. Or else man is, with the accidentally liberated cave-dweller of Plato, not in need of supernatural revelation; potentially he has all truth within his reach.

IV The Reformed Position

The fully Biblical conception of the point of contact, it ought now to be clear, is the only one that can escape the dilemma of absolute ignorance or absolute omniscience.

The one great defect of the Roman Catholic and the Arminian view is, as noted, that it ascribes ultimacy or self-sufficiency to the mind of man. [Massively important! Is this not what Eve was tempted with??] Romanism and Arminianism do this in their views of man as stated in their works on systematic theology. It is consistent for them, therefore, not to challenge the assumption of ultimacy as this is made by the non-believer. But Reformed theology, as worked out by Calvin and his recent exponents such as Hodge, Warfield, Kuyper, and Bavinck, holds that man's mind is derivative.¹ [i.e., it is wholly dependent upon God – we receive our all from God which argues absolute, perfect and universal derivation and dependence. – paraphrase from Jonathan Edwards] As such it is naturally in contact with God's revelation. It is surrounded by nothing but revelation. It is itself inherently revelational. It cannot naturally be conscious of itself without being conscious of its creatureliness. For man self-consciousness presupposes God-consciousness. Calvin speaks of this as man's inescapable sense of deity.

Cornelius Van Til again states from his book, Introduction to Systematic Theology: p128-9: In Paradise, man made his self-consciousness the immediate but wholly derivative starting point while he made the self-consciousness of God the remote but wholly ultimate starting point of all his knowledge. Hence he saw that his knowledge was, though finite, yet true. Hence he did not set before himself the false ideal of absolute comprehension. Hence, too, he did not despair and conclude to irrationalism simply because he himself could not fully comprehend the whole of reality.

In opposition to this, the non-Christian interpretation of the human mind is based upon the presupposition that it is the ultimate and not merely the derivative starting point for man. Hence it has set before itself the ideal of comprehension knowledge. This was done especially in the earlier stages of human thought. The Greek thinkers were as children who thought they could do everything. Even in modern times we have, in such systems as that of Leibniz, a striking manifestation of the pride, "hubris," of the sinner who wishes to be as God.³⁵ In more recent times, however, men have become more sophisticated. There have given up the quest of certainty and the quest for comprehension, except as a limiting concept. In modern irrationalism, the prodigal has recognized that he is at the swine trough, but still refuses to return to the father's house. His "hubris" never forsakes him.

³⁵ Van Til uses the strong language of hubris here about Leibniz's project. Leibniz had hoped to unify many disciplines and churches through his system, which is ultimately built on a very few general principles.

For Adam in paradise God-consciousness could not come in at the end of the syllogistic process of reasoning. God-consciousness was for him the presupposition of the significance of his reasoning on anything.

To the doctrine of creation must be added the conception of the covenant.⁶⁰ Man was created as a historical being. God place upon him from the outset of history the responsibility and task of reinterpreting the counsel of God as expressed in creation to himself individually and collectively. Man's creature-consciousness may therefore be more particularly signaled as covenant-consciousness. But the revelation of the covenant to man in paradise was supernaturally mediated. This was naturally the case inasmuch as it pertained to man's historical task. Thus, the sense of obedience or disobedience was immediately involved in Adam's consciousness of himself. [Why is this covenant awareness important. Because when natural man suppresses this truth and the knowledge of God and has a world view that things happen not by God's eternal controlling decree, but by chance (brute fact, See CodeBF, brutefactdef, and code524 & codebrute), this, in the mind of natural man, excuses him from obedience to God and therefore thinks he is not guilty of being a covenant breaker. Of course, this is all a wicked presumption.] Covenant-consciousness envelops creature-consciousness. In paradise Adam knew that as a creature of God it was natural and proper that he should keep the covenant that God had made with him. In this way it appears that man's proper self-consciousness depend, even in paradise, upon his being in contact with both supernatural and natural revelation. God's natural revelation was within man as well as about him. Man's very constitution as a rational and moral being is itself revelational to man as the ethically responsible reactor to revelation. And natural revelation is itself incomplete. It needed from the outset to be supplemented with supernatural revelation about man's future. Thus, the very idea of supernatural revelation is correlatively embodied in the idea of man's proper self-consciousness.

⁶⁰Van Til has in mind here the Westminster Confession of Faith, 7.1. Beginning generally, the confession state, "The distance between God and the creature is so great, that although reasonable creatures do owe obedience unto Him as their Creator, yet they could never have any fruition of him as their blessedness and reward but by some voluntary condescension of God's part, which He hath been please do express by way of covenant." From this general notion, the Reformed have delineated the covenant of works and the covenant of grace.

It is in this way that man may be said to be by his original constitution in contact with the truth while yet not in possession of all the truth. Man is not in Plato's cave. He is not in the anomalous position of having eyes with which to see while yet he dwells in darkness. He has not, as was the case with the cave-dwellers of Plato, some mere capacity for the truth that might never come to fruition.

Man had originally not merely a capacity for receiving the truth; he was in actual possession of the truth. The world of truth was not found in some realm far distant from him; it was right before him. That which spoke to his sense no less than that which spoke to his intellect was the voice of God. Even when he close his eyes upon the external world his internal sense would manifest God to him in his own constitution. The matter of his experience was in no sense in need of a mere form with which he might organize the raw material. On the contrary the matter of his experience was lit up through and through. Yet it was lit up for him by the voluntary activity of God whose counsel made things to be what they are. Man could not be aware of himself without also being aware of his responsibility to manage himself and all things for the glory of God. Man's consciousness of objects and of self was not static. It was consciousness in time. Moreover, consciousness of objects and of self in time meant consciousness of history in relationship to the plan of God back of history. Man's first sense of self-awareness implied the awareness of the presence of God as the one for whom he had a great task to accomplish.

It is only when we begin our approach to the question of the point of contact by thus analyzing the situation as it obtained in paradise before the fall of man that we can attain to a true conception of the natural man and his capacities with respect to the truth. The apostle Paul speaks of the natural man as actually possessing the knowledge of God (Romans 1:19-20). The greatness of his sin lies precisely in the fact that "when they knew God, they glorified him not as God." No man can escape knowing God. It is indelibly involved in his awareness of anything whatsoever. Man ought, therefore, as Calvin puts it, to recognize God. There is no excuse for him if he does not. The reason for his failure to recognize God lies exclusively in him. It is due to his willful transgression of the very law of his being.

Neither Romanism nor Protestant evangelicalism can do full justice to this teaching of Paul. In effect, both of them fail to surround man exclusively with God's revelation. Not holding to the counsel of God as all-controlling they cannot teach that man's self-awareness always presupposes awareness of God. According to both Rome and evangelicalism man may have some measure of awareness of objects about him and of himself in relation to them without being aware at the same time of his responsibility to manipulate both of them in relation to God. Thus, man's consciousness of objects, of self, of time and of history are not from the outset brought into an exclusive relationship of dependence upon God, Hinc illae lacrimae! [Literally translated, "Hence those tears," this means something like "that is the real offense or the underlying reason for the problem." The saying is from the Roman poet, Terence (fl. 170-160 B.C.) Andria 126. Footnote info from Dr. Scott Oliphant, editor of the 4th edition of Van Til's book.]

Of course, when we thus stress Paul's teaching that all men do not have a mere capacity for but are in actual possession of the knowledge of God, we have at once to add Paul's further instruction to the effect that all men, due to the sin within them, always and in all relationships seek to "suppress" this knowledge on God (Rom. 1:18, ASV). The natural man is such a one as constantly throws water on a fire he cannot quench. He has yielded to the temptation of Satan, and has become his bondservant. When Satan tempted Adam and Eve in paradise, he sought to make them believe that man's self-consciousness was ultimate rather than derivative and God-dependent. He argued, as it were, that it was of the nature of self-consciousness to make itself the final reference point of all predication. He argued, as it were, that God had not control over all that might come forth in the process of time. This is to say, he argued, in effect, that as any form of self-consciousness must assume its own ultimacy, so it must also admit of its own limitation in the fact that much that happens is under no control at all. Thus, Satan argued, as it were, that man's consciousness of time and of the time's products in history, is, if intelligible at all, intelligible in some measure independently of God.

Romanism and Evangelicalism, however, do not attribute this assumption of autonomy or ultimacy on the part of man as due to sin. They hold that man should quite properly think of himself and of his relation to objects in time in this way. Hence, they do injustice to Paul's teaching with respect to the effect of sin on the interpretative activity of man. As they virtually deny that originally man not merely had a capacity for the truth but was in actual possession of the truth, so also, they virtually deny that the natural man suppresses the truth.

It is not to be wondered at that neither Romanism nor Evangelicalism are little interested in challenging the "philosophers" when these, as Calvin says, interpret man's consciousness without being aware of the tremendous difference in man's attitude toward the truth before and after the fall. Accordingly, they do not distinguish carefully between the natural man's own conception of himself and the Biblical conception of him. Yet for the question of the point of contact, this is all-important. If we make our appeal to the natural man without being aware of this distinction, we virtually admit that the natural man's estimate of himself is correct. [that is key!] We may, to be sure, even then, maintain that he is in need of information. We may even admit that he is morally corrupt. But the one thing which, on this basis, we cannot admit, is that his claim to be able to interpret at least some area of experience in a way that is essentially correct, is mistaken. We cannot then challenge his most basic epistemological assumption to the effect that his self-consciousness and time-consciousness are self-explanatory. We cannot challenge his right to interpret all his experience in exclusively immanentistic categories. And on this everything hinges. For if we first allow the legitimacy of the natural man's assumption about himself as the ultimate reference point in interpretation in any dimension, we cannot deny his right to interpret Christianity itself in naturalistic terms. [and so not the evangelist is at an impasse with him.]

The point of contact for the gospel, then, must be sought within the natural man. Deep down in his mind every man knows that he is the creature of God and responsible to God. Every man, at bottom, knows that he is a covenant breaker. But every man acts and talks as though this were not so. It is the one point that cannot bear mentioning in his presence. A man may have internal cancer. Yet it may be one point he will not have one speak of in his presence. He will grant that he is not feeling well. He will accept any sort of medication so long as it does not pretend to be given in answer to a cancer diagnosis. Will a good doctor cater to him on this matter? Certainly no. He will tell his patient that he has promise of life, but promise of life on one condition, that is, of an immediate internal operation. So it is with the sinner. He is alive but alive as a covenant-breaker. But his own interpretative activity with respect to all things proceeds on the assumption that such is not the case. Romanism and evangelicalism, by failing to appeal exclusively to that which is within man but is also suppressed by every man, virtually allow the legitimacy of the natural man's view of himself. They do not seek to explode the last stronghold to which the natural man always flees and where he always makes his final stand. The cut off the weeds at the surface but do not dig up the roots of these weeds for fear that crops will not grow.

The truly biblical view, on the other hand, applies atomic power and flame-throwers to the very presupposition of the natural man's ideas with respect to himself. It does not fear to lose a point of contact by uprooting the weeds rather than by cutting them off at the very surface. It is assured of a point of contact in the fact that every man is made in the image of God and has impressed upon him the law of God. In that fact alone he may rest secure with respect to the point of contact problem. For that fact makes men always accessible to God. That fact assures us that everyman, to be a man at all, must already be in contact with the truth. He is so much in contact with the truth that much of his energy is spent in the vain effort to hide this fact from himself. His efforts to hide this fact from himself are bound to be self-frustrative.

Only by thus finding the point of contact in man's sense of deity that lies underneath his own conception of self-consciousness as ultimate can we be both true to Scripture and effective in reasoning with the natural man. Man, knowing God, refuses to keep God in remembrance (Rom. 1:28).

CHAPTER VI

CHRISTIAN APOLOGETICS (THE PROBLEM OF METHOD)

A discussion of the problem of methodology naturally follows upon that of the problem of the point of contact. If we have discovered what we shall think of the person to whom we are to make our address in the interest of winning him to an acceptance of Christianity, we must next inquire as to the way by which we shall lead him to a knowledge of the truth.

The Christian view of man and the Christian view of method are alike aspects of the Christian position as a whole. So also the non-Christian view of man and the non-Christian view of method are alike aspects of the non-Christian position as a whole. That such is indeed the case will appear as we proceed. For the moment the point is dogmatically asserted in order to indicate the plan of procedure for this chapter.

Our concern throughout is to indicate the nature of a truly Protestant, that is a Reformed, apologetic. A Reformed method of apologetics must seek to vindicate the Reformed life and world view as Christianity come to its own. It has already become plain that this implies a refusal to grant that any area or aspect of reality, any fact or any law of nature or of history can be correctly interpreted except it be seen in the light of the main doctrines of Christianity. But if this be true, it becomes quite impossible for the apologist to do what Roman Catholics and Arminians must do on the basis of their view of Christianity, namely, agree with the non-Christian in his principles of methodology to see whether or not Christian theism be true. From the Roman Catholic and the Arminian point of view the question of methodology, like that of starting-point, is a neutral matter. According to these positions the Christian apologist can legitimately join the non-Christian scientist or philosopher as he, by his recognized methods, investigates certain dimensions of reality. Neither the follower of Thomas Aquinas nor the follower of the "judicious Butler" would need, on his principles, to object when, for instance, A. E. Taylor² says:

“Natural science, let me say again, is exclusively concerned with the detection of laws of nature, uniformities of sequence in the course of events. The typical form of such a law is the statement that whenever certain definitely measurable events occur some other measurable event will also be found to occur. Any enquiry thus delimited obviously can throw no light on the question...whether God exists or not, the question whether the whole course of events among which the man of science discovers these uniformities of sequence is or is not guided by a supreme intelligence to the production of an intrinsically good result.”³

²A. E. Taylor (1869-1945), was a philosophical theist and is perhaps best known for his translation of a number of Greek philosophical texts. He was educated at Oxford and later became a fellow of Merton College there from 1891 to 1898. After teaching at Manchester and in Canada, he spent most of his career at the University of St. Andrews as professor of moral philosophy (1908-24), and then at the University of Edinburgh as the chair of moral philosophy from 1924 until his retirement in 1941.

³ A. E. Taylor, Does God Exist? (London: Macmillan, 1947), 13, 14.

The Reformed apologist, on the other hand, would compromise what he holds to be of the essence of Christianity if he agreed with Taylor. For him the whole of created reality, including therefore the fields of research with which the various sciences deal, reveals the same God of which Scripture speaks. The very essence of created reality is its revelational character. Scientists deal with that which has the imprint of God's face upon it. Created reality may be compared to a great estate. The owner has his name plainly and indelibly written at unavoidable places. How then would it be possible for some stranger to enter this estate, make researches in it, and then fairly say that in these researches he need not and cannot be confronted with the question of ownership? To change the figure, compare the facts of nature and history, the facts with which the sciences are concerned, to a linoleum that has its figure indelibly imprinted in it. The pattern of such a linoleum cannot be effaced till the linoleum itself is worn away. Thus inescapably does the scientist meet the pattern of Christian theism in each fact with which he deals. The apostle Paul lays great stress upon the fact that man is without excuse if he does not discover God in nature. Following Paul's example Calvin argues that men ought to see God, not a god, not some supernatural power, but the only God, in nature. They have not done justice by the facts they see displayed before and within them if they say that a god exists or that God probably exists. The Calvinist holds to the essential perspicuity of natural as well as Biblical revelation. This does not imply that a non-Christian and non-theistic interpretation of reality cannot be made to appear plausible. But it does mean that no non-Christian position can be made to appear more than merely plausible.

Roman Catholic apologists can, therefore, to the extent that their own theology does not teach the perspicuity of natural revelation, with consistency use the method of the natural man. Just as Rome, having a semi-pagan conception of the nature of man, can agree with the natural man's conception of the starting-point in knowledge, so also, having a semi-pagan concept of the nature of the objects man must know, can, to a large extent, agree with the natural man's conception of the method of knowledge.

Arminian apologists also, to the extent that their theology is faulty, can consistently agree with the non-believer on the question of methodology. Believing to some extent in the autonomy and ultimacy of human personality, Arminianism can, in a measure, agree on the question of starting-point with those who make men the final reference point in all human predication. [what they attribute to man's nature, depraved or not so much] So also, believing to some extent in the existence of facts that are not wholly under the control and direction of the counsel of God, Arminianism can agree on the question of method with those for whom the object of knowledge has nothing at all to do with the plan of God. [Arminians are not big fans of God's determined counsel of his will, his eternal decree, e.g., election, predestination, etc. because of their stance on human autonomy, self-reliance, and their idea of the liberty of their will independent of God's determination. It is man placing himself in the room of God. Nothing new. Read Owen's book, A Display of Arminianism]

In contradistinction from both Roman Catholics and Arminians, however, the Reformed apologist cannot agree at all with the methodology of the natural man. Disagreeing with the natural man's interpretation of himself as the ultimate reference-point, the Reformed apologist must seek his point of contact with the natural man in that which is beneath the threshold of his working consciousness, in the sense of deity which he seeks to suppress. And to do this the Reformed apologist must also seek a point of contact with the systems constructed by the natural man. But this point of contact must be in the nature of a head on collision.⁴ If there is no head-on collision with the systems of the natural man there will be no point of contact with the sense of deity in the natural man. So also, disagreeing with the natural man on the nature of the object of knowledge, the Reformed apologist must disagree with him on the method to be employed in acquiring knowledge. According to the doctrine of the Reformed faith all the facts of nature and of history are what they are, do what they do and undergo what they undergo, in accord with the one comprehensive counsel of God. [i.e., his eternal decrees] All that may be known by man is already known by God. And it is already known by God because it is controlled by God.

⁴Van Til's point here is that a point of contact is not a place on which believer and unbeliever stand together, but rather, because it is the foundation for the suppression of the true knowledge of God, the point of contact will express itself, in the unbeliever, in the form of self-deceptive suppression, not in the form of agreement with Christianity.

The significance of this for the question of method will be pointed out soon. For the moment this simple fact must be signaled as the reason which precludes the possibility of agreement on methodology between the Reformed theologian and the non-Christian philosopher or scientist. We may mention one point that brings out the difference in methodology between the two positions. It is the point with reference to the relevancy of hypotheses. For the non-Christian any sort of hypothesis may, at the outset of an investigation, be as relevant as any other. This is so because on a non-Christian basis facts are not what they are because of the systematic relation they sustain to God. On a non-Christian basis facts are "rationalized" for the first time when interpreted by man. But for one who holds that the facts are already part of an ultimately rational system by virtue of the plan of God it is clear that such hypotheses as presuppose the non-existence of such a plan must, even from the outset of his investigation, be considered irrelevant. [key point; man's effort to rationalize the irrational. So if

God is not the grand designer of the universe, that all is irrational, unrelated facts and chance, then the non-believer tries to put things together that fits his natural or carnal understanding, thus converting the irrational by rationalizing it. And I gather that this is the foundation behind evolutionary theory, man assigning his meaning to what appears as a massive series of chance happenings to try to make rational sense out of it, explaining it all apart from God's plan and design. Van Til goes into this idea of rationalizing the irrational later.]

Good notes on proper apologetics

I—REASONING BY PRESUPPOSITION

These things being as they are it will be our first task in this chapter to show that a consistently Christian method of apologetic argument, in agreement with its own basic conception of the starting point, must be by presupposition.⁵ To argue by pre-supposition is to indicate what are the epistemological and metaphysical principles that underlie and control one's method. The Reformed apologist will frankly admit that his own methodology presupposes the truth of Christian theism. Basic to all the doctrines of Christian theism is that of the self-contained God, or, if we wish, that of the ontological trinity. It is this notion of the ontological trinity that ultimately controls a truly Christian methodology. Based upon this notion of the ontological trinity and consistent with it, is the concept of the counsel of God according to which all things in the created world are regulated.

Christian methodology is therefore based upon presuppositions that are quite the opposite of those of the non-Christian. It is claimed to be of the very essence of any non-Christian form of methodology that it cannot be determined in advance to what conclusions it must lead. To assert, as the Christian apologist is bound to do if he is not to deny the very thing he is seeking to establish, that the conclusion of a true method is the truth of Christian theism is, from the point of view of the non-Christian, the clearest evidence of authoritarianism. In spite of this claim to neutrality on the part of the non-Christian the Reformed apologist must point out that every method, the supposedly neutral one no less than any other, presupposes either the truth or the falsity of Christian theism.

The method of reasoning by presupposition may be said to be indirect rather than direct. The issue between believers and non-believers in Christian theism cannot be settled by a direct appeal to “facts” or “laws” whose nature and significance is already agreed upon by both parties to the debate. The question is rather as to what is the final reference-point required to make the “facts” and “laws” intelligible. The question is as to what the “facts” and “laws” really are. Are they what the non-Christian methodology assumes that they are? Are they what the Christian theistic methodology presupposes they are?⁶

⁶ A "direct" appeal to facts and laws would include an acceptance of the facts and laws as themselves not revelatory of the Christian God. An "indirect" appeal would ask as to the presuppositions behind the facts and laws, which are presumed to make them possible. This is at the core of what Van Til (earlier in his career) called the transcendental approach. Without explicating the details of the concept itself, we could say that it refers, generally, to the preconditions that must obtain if anything else is to obtain as well. For an analysis of Van Til's method, see K. Scott Oliphint, "The Consistency of Van Til's Methodology," Westminster Theological Journal 52, no. 1 (1990): 27-49.

The answer to this question cannot be finally settled by any direct discussion of “facts.” It must, in the last analysis, be settled indirectly. The Christian apologist must place himself upon the position of his opponent, assuming the correctness of his method merely for argument’s sake, in order to show him that on such a position the “facts” are not facts and the “laws” are not laws. He must also ask the non-Christian to place himself upon the Christian position for argument’s sake in order that he may be shown that only upon such a basis do “facts” and “laws” appear intelligible.⁷

To admit one’s own presuppositions and to point out the presuppositions of others is therefore to maintain that all reasoning is, in the nature of the case, circular reasoning.⁸ The starting-point, the method, and the conclusion are always involved in one another.

⁷ What is described in this paragraph is the basic sum and substance of how one engages the unbeliever apologetically. It is a two step approach: (1) Move to the unbeliever's position in order to show that it cannot consistently be lived or thought, and (2) ask the unbeliever to move to the Christian position in order to show how it alone can answer questions posed in the unbeliever's position. Of course, life is not as clean and wooden as that, so there will always be contours and complexities to the conversation that cannot be predicted in detail. These two general steps, however, should be a part of one's apologetic method.

a strict argument form. For example, in William Alston, The Reliability of Sense Perception (Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1993), Alston argues that it is impossible to establish knowledge in that knowledge area without at the same time presupposing some knowledge in that area. His example is an argument for the reliability of sense perception. Any argument for such reliability presupposes that reliability. And it does so because of the epistemic situation in which human beings exist. Alston is right here, it seems. Not only so, but, to go deeper, the epistemic and metaphysical situation in which human beings exist is one in which the source of and rationale for all that we are and think is, ultimately, in the triune God of Scripture, circularity in this sense is inevitable. We will never be outside the circular reasoning pinoy be seen in the context of the point he made above containing about context of image of God as we think and live - not in this life or the next. (2) Van Til's affirmation of "indirect" arguments. Any petitio principii is, by definition, a direct argument premises and a conclusion. Van Til's indirect method moves one out of the context of a direct argument and into the context of the rationale of any fact or law assumed to be, or to be true. Thus, circularity is inextricably linked to the transcendental approach and is not meant to be in reference, strictly speaking, to direct argumentation.

Good points here

Let us say that the Christian apologist has placed the position of Christian theism before his opponent. Let us say further that he has pointed out that his own method of investigation of reality presupposes the truth of his position. This will appear to his friend whom he is seeking to win to an acceptance of the Christian position as highly authoritarian and out of accord with the proper use of human reason. What will the apologist do next? If he is a Roman Catholic or an Arminian, he will tone down the nature of Christianity to some extent in order to make it appear that the consistent application of his friend's neutral method will lead to an acceptance of Christian theism after all. But if he is a Calvinist this way is not open to him. He will point out that the more consistently his friend applies his supposedly neutral method the more certainly he will come to the conclusion that Christian theism is not true. Roman Catholics and Arminians, appealing to the "reason of the natural man" as the natural man himself interprets his reason, namely as autonomous, are bound to use the direct method of approach to the natural man, the method that assumes the essential correctness of a non-Christian and non-theistic conception of reality. The Reformed apologist, on the other hand, appealing to that knowledge of the true God in the natural man which the natural man suppresses by means of his assumption of ultimacy, will also appeal to the knowledge of the true method which the natural man knows but suppresses. The natural man at bottom knows that he is the creature of God. He knows also that he is responsible to God. He knows that he should live to the glory of God. He knows that in all that he does he should stress that the field of reality which he investigates has the stamp of God's ownership upon it. But he suppresses his knowledge of himself as he truly is. He is the man with the iron mask. A true method of apologetics must seek to tear off that iron mask. The Roman Catholic and the Arminian make no attempt to do so. They even flatter its wearer about his fine appearance. In the introductions of their books on apologetics Arminian as well as Roman Catholic apologists frequently seek to set their "opponents" at ease by assuring them that their method, in its field, is all that any Christian could desire. In contradistinction from this, the Reformed apologist will point out again and again that the only method that will lead to the truth in any field is that method which recognizes the fact that man is a creature of God, that he must therefore seek to think God's thoughts after him.

It is not as though the Reformed apologist should not interest himself in the nature of the non-Christian's method. On the contrary he should make a critical analysis of it. He should, as it were, join his "friend" in the use of it. But he should do so self-consciously with the purpose of showing that its most consistent application not merely leads away from Christian theism but in leading away from Christian theism leads to destruction of reason and science as well.

An illustration may indicate more clearly what is meant. Suppose we think of a man made of water in an infinitely extended and bottomless ocean of water. Desiring to get out of water, he makes a ladder of water. He sets this ladder upon the water and against the water and then attempts to climb out of the water. So hopeless and senseless a picture must be drawn of the natural man's methodology based as it is upon the assumption that time or chance is ultimate. On his assumption his own rationality is a product of chance. On his assumption even the laws of logic which he employs are products of chance. The rationality and purpose that he may be searching for are still bound to be products of chance. So then the Christian apologist, whose position requires him to hold that Christian theism is really true and as such must be taken as the presupposition which alone makes the acquisition of knowledge in any field intelligible, must join his "friend" in his hopeless gyrations so as to point out to him that his efforts are always in vain.

It will then appear that Christian theism, which was first rejected because of its supposed authoritarian character, [the authority is wrapped up in God's Word not man] is the only position which gives human reason a field for successful operation and a method of true progress in knowledge.¹⁰

¹⁰This is another aspect of a transcendental approach. Vanb Til calls it the "impossibility of the opposite."

Two remarks may here be made by way of meeting the most obvious objections that will be raised to this method of the Reformed apologist. The first objection that suggests itself may be expressed in the rhetorical question "Do you mean to assert that non-Christians do not discover truth by the methods they employ?" The reply is that we mean nothing so absurd as that. The implication of the method here advocated is simply that non-Christians are never able and therefore never do employ their own methods consistently. Says A. E. Taylor in discussing the question of the uniformity of nature, "The fundamental thought of modern science, at any rate until yesterday, was that there is a 'universal reign of law' throughout nature. Nature is rational in the sense that it has everywhere a coherent pattern which we can progressively detect by the steady application of our own intelligence to the scrutiny of natural processes. Science has been built up all along on the basis of this principle of the 'uniformity of nature,' and the principle is one which science itself has no means of demonstrating. No one could possibly prove its truth to an opponent who seriously disputed it. For all attempts to produce 'evidence' for the 'uniformity of nature' themselves presuppose the very principle they are intended to prove."¹⁴¹ Our argument as over against this would be that the existence of the God of Christian theism and the conception of his counsel as controlling all things in the universe is the only presupposition which can account for the uniformity of nature which the scientist needs. But the best and only possible proof for the existence of such a God is that his existence is required for the uniformity of nature and for the coherence of all things in the world. We cannot prove the existence of beams underneath a floor if by proof we mean that they must be ascertainable in the way that we can see the chairs and tables of the room. But the very idea of a floor as the support of tables and chairs requires the idea of beams that are underneath. But there would be no floor if no beams were underneath. Thus there is absolutely certain proof for the existence of God and the truth of Christian theism. Even non-Christians presuppose its truth while they verbally reject it.¹² They need to presuppose the truth of Christian theism in order to account for their own accomplishments.

The second objection may be voiced in the following words; “While a Christian can prove that his Christian position is fully as reasonable as the opponent’s view, there is no such thing as an absolutely compelling proof that God exists, or that the Bible is the word of God, just as little as anyone can prove its opposite.” In this way of putting the matter there is a confusion between what is objectively valid and what is subjectively acceptable to the natural man. It is true that no method of argument for Christianity will be acceptable to the natural man. Moreover, it is true that the more consistently Christian our methodology, the less acceptable it will be to the natural man. We find something similar in the field of theology. It is precisely the Reformed faith which, among other things, teaches the total depravity of the natural man, which is most loathsome to that natural man. But this does not prove that the Reformed faith is not true. A patient may like a doctor who tells him that his disease can be cured by means of external applications and dislike the doctor who tells him that he needs a major internal operation. Yet the latter doctor may be right in his diagnosis. It is the weakness of the Roman Catholic and the Arminian methods that they virtually identify objective validity with subjective acceptability to the natural man. Distinguishing carefully between these two, the Reformed apologist maintains that there is an absolutely valid argument for the existence of God and for the truth of Christian theism.¹³ He cannot do less without virtually admitting that God’s revelation to man is not clear. It is fatal for the Reformed apologist to admit that man has done justice to the objective evidence if he comes to any other conclusion than that of the truth of Christian theism.

¹³ Note here that the problem with argumentation is not with validity. A valid argument is one in which, if the premises are true, the conclusion must necessarily follow. It is the truth of the premises, however, that is always at issue and needs discussion in terms of the presuppositions behind the premises employed. One's subjective acceptance or rejection of an argument is not a criterion of its validity. The argument can be both valid and true, and yet rejected by a hard heart.

Great points here!

As for the question whether the natural man will accept the truth of such an argument, we answer that he will if God pleases by his Spirit to take the scales from his eyes and the mask from his face. It is upon the power of the Holy Spirit that the Reformed preacher relies when he tells men that they are lost in sin and in need of a Savior. The Reformed preacher does not tone down his message in order that it may find acceptance with the natural man. He does not say that his message is less certainly true because of its non-acceptance by the natural man. The natural man is, by virtue of his creation in the image of God, always accessible to the truth; accessible to the penetration of the truth by the Spirit of God. Apologetics, like systematics, is valuable to the precise extent that it presses the truth upon the attention of the natural man. The natural man must be blasted out of his hideouts, his caves, his last lurking places. Neither Roman Catholic nor Arminian methodologies have the flamethrowers with which to reach him. In the all-out war between the Christian and the natural man as he appears in modern garb it is only the atomic energy of a truly Reformed methodology that will explode the last Festung [fortress] to which the Roman Catholic and the Arminian always permit him to retreat and to dwell in safety.{142}

II—SCRIPTURE

It has been pointed out that the difference between a Roman Catholic-Arminian and a Reformed type of argument lies in the fact that the former is direct and the latter is indirect. The former grants the essential truthfulness of the non-Christian theory of man and of method, while the latter challenges both. This difference will appear again and appear in its fundamental importance still more strikingly if the question of the place of Scripture in apologetics is brought up for consideration. A few remarks on this subject must suffice.

For better or for worse the Protestant apologist is committed to the doctrine of Scripture as the infallibly inspired final revelation of God to man. This being the case, he is committed to the defense of Christian theism as a unit. For him theism is not really theism unless it is Christian theism. The Protestant apologist cannot be concerned to prove the existence of any other God than the one who has spoken to man authoritatively and finally through Scripture.

The entire debate about theism will be purely formal unless theism be taken as the foundation of Christianity. But if it is so taken it is no longer theism as such but Christian theism that is in debate. Pantheist, deists and theists, that is bare theists, may formally agree that God exists. Socrates, in arguing about the nature of piety within Euthyphro says that men “join issue about particulars.” So if the whole debate in apologetics is to be more than a meaningless discussion about the that of God’s existence and is to consider what kind of God exists, then the question of God’s revelation to man must be brought into the picture. Even before the entrance of sin, as already noted, man required supernatural positive revelation as a supplement to revelation in the created universe around and within him.¹⁷ To understand God’s general revelation in the universe aright it was imperative for man that he see this revelation in relationship to a higher revelation with respect to the final destiny of man and the universe. If then even man in paradise could read nature aright only in connection with and in the light of supernatural positive revelation, how much the more is this true of man after the fall. In paradise the supernatural revelation of God to man told him that if he would eat of the forbidden tree he would surely die. Having eaten of this fruit he could therefore expect nothing but eternal separation from God as his final destiny. Of God’s intention to save a people for his own precious possession he could learn nothing from nature. Nor was this involved in the pre-redemptive supernatural revelation that had been vouchsafed to him in paradise. It had to come by way of post-lapsarian [post-fall] supernatural revelation. Covenant-breakers could expect nothing but covenant wrath. That God meant to bring covenant-breakers back into covenant communion with himself through the covenant of grace could in no wise be discovered other than by supernatural redemptive revelation. B. B. Warfield brings out this point when he says that in addition to believing the supernatural fact, that is, God as a transcendent, self-existent being and in the supernatural act exemplified in creation and providence, the Christian must also believe in supernatural redemption. “As certainly as the recognition of the great fact of sin is an element in the Christian’s world-conception, the need and therefore the actuality of the direct corrective act of God—of miracle, in a word—enters ineradicably into his belief.”

¹⁷That is, God spoke to Adam and Eve in order to tell them what they must do to obey him, and what constitutes disobedience.

But supernatural redemption in itself would not be of any avail. “For how should we be advantaged by a supernatural redemption of which we know nothing? Who is competent to uncover to us the meaning of this great series of redemptive acts but God himself?...Two thousand years ago a child was born in Bethlehem, who thrived and grew up nobly, lived a life of poverty and beneficence, was cruelly slain and rose from the dead. What is that to us? After a little, as his followers sat waiting in Jerusalem, there was a rush as of a mighty wind, and an appearance of tongues of fire descending upon their heads. Strange: but what concern have we in it all? We require the revealing Word to tell us who and what this goodly child was, why he lived and what he wrought by his death, what it meant that he could not beholden of the grave and what those cloven tongues of fire signified—before they can avail as redemptive facts to us.”{144} Going a bit beyond this it may be asserted that sinful man would naturally want to destroy a supernatural revelation that portrays his sin and shame and tells him that he is helpless and undone. This is out of accord with the pride that is a prime mark of the sinner. Hence the necessity for the inscripturization of the God-given post-lapsarian supernatural revelation of God to man.

Thus the Bible, as the infallibly inspired revelation of God to sinful man, stands before us as that light in terms of which all the facts of the created universe must be interpreted. All of finite existence, natural and redemptive, functions in relation to one all-inclusive plan that is in the mind of God. Whatever insight man is to have into this pattern of the activity of God he must attain by looking at all his objects of research in the light of Scripture. “If true religion is to beam upon us, our principle must be, that it is necessary to begin with heavenly teaching, and that it is impossible for any man to obtain even the minutest portion of right and sound doctrine without being a disciple of Scripture.”{145}

What has been said so far on the subject of Scripture has dealt primarily with its place in Protestant doctrine. What bearing does this fact have upon the place of Scripture in Christian apologetics? And what bearing does it have upon the method of apologetics in general?

In the first place it must be affirmed that a Protestant accepts Scripture to be that which Scripture itself says it is on its own authority. Scripture presents itself as being the only light in terms of which the truth about facts and their relations can be discovered. Perhaps the relationship of the sun to our earth and the objects that constitute it, may make this clear. We do not use candles, or electric lights in order to discover whether the light and the energy of the sun exist. The reverse is the case. We have light in candles and electric light bulbs because of the light and energy of the sun. So we cannot subject the authoritative pronouncements of Scripture about reality to the scrutiny of reason because it is reason itself that learns of its proper function from Scripture. ["light" is knowledge in Scripture.]

There are, no doubt, objections that occur to one at once when he hears the matter presented so baldly. We cannot deal with these fully here. For the moment it is of the greatest importance that this simple but basic point be considered apart from all subsidiary matters. All the objections that are brought against such a position spring, in the last analysis, from the assumption that the human person is ultimate and as such should properly act as judge of all claims to authority that are made by any one. But if man is not autonomous, if he is rather what Scripture says he is, namely, a creature of God and a sinner before his face, then man should subordinate his reason to the Scriptures and seek in the light of it to interpret his experience.

The proper attitude of reason to the authority of Scripture, then, is but typical of the proper attitude of reason to the whole of the revelation of God. The objects man must seek to know are always of such a nature as God asserts they are. God's revelation is always authoritarian. This is true of his revelation in nature no less than of his revelation in Scripture. The truly scientific method, the method which alone can expect to make true progress in learning, is therefore such a method as seeks simply to think God's thoughts after him.

When these matters are kept in mind, it will be seen clearly that the true method for any Protestant with respect to the Scripture (Christianity) and with respect to the existence of God (theism) must be the indirect method of reasoning by presupposition. In fact, it then appears that the argument for the Scripture as the infallible revelation of God is, to all intents and purposes, the same as the argument for the existence of God. Protestants are required by the most basic principles of their system to vindicate the existence of no other God than the one who has spoken in Scripture. But this God cannot be proved to exist by any other method than the indirect one of presupposition. No proof for this God and for the truth of his revelation in Scripture can be offered by an appeal to anything in human experience that has not itself received its light from the God whose existence and whose revelation it is supposed to prove. One cannot prove the usefulness of the light of the sun for the purposes of seeing by turning to the darkness of a cave. The darkness of the cave must itself be lit up by the shining of the sun. When the cave is thus lit up each of the objects that are in it "proves" the existence and character of the sun by receiving their light and intelligibility from it. [phenomenal reasoning; reminds my of Edwards!]

Great illustration here:

Now the Roman Catholic is not committed to any such doctrine of Scripture as has been expressed above. He can therefore build up his apologetics by the direct method. He can, as has already been shown, to a large extent agree with the natural man in his conception of both the starting point and the method of human knowledge. He can therefore join the non-Christian in his search for the existence or non-existence of God by the use of reason without any reference to Scripture. That is, he and the natural man can seek to build up theism quite independently of Christianity. Then when the Romanist has, together with his friend the natural man, built the first story of the house to the satisfaction of both, he will ask his friend to help in building the second story, the story of Christianity. He will assure his friend that he will use the same principles of construction for the second story that they have together employed in their common construction of the first story. The second story is, according to Rome, to be sure, the realm of faith and of authority. But then this authority is but that of the expert. Rome knows of no absolute authority such as Protestantism has in its doctrine of Scripture, Rome's authority is the authority of those who are experts in what they say are reported to be the oracles of God. These oracles receive their authoritative illumination from the expert interpreters of them, from the Pope first of all. [i.e., papal infallibility] But such a concept of authority resembles that which Socrates referred to in The Symposium when he spoke of Diotima the inspired. When the effort at rational interpretation failed him, Socrates took refuge in mythology as a second best. The “hunch” of the wise is the best that is available to man with respect to that which he cannot reach by the methods of autonomous reason. No “wise man” ought to object to such a conception of the “supernatural.” It merely involves the recognition that he has not yet discovered the truth about all of reality by means of reason. So then the natural man need not really object, even from his own point of view, to the presentation of supernatural revelation as it is offered to him by the Roman Catholic apologist.

If the Roman Catholic method of apologetic for Christianity is followed then Christianity itself must be so reduced as to make it acceptable to the natural man. Since Rome is more than willing to grant the essential correctness of the starting point and method of the natural man in the “realm of nature” he cannot logically object to the conclusion of the natural man with respect to supernatural reality. The natural man need only to reason consistently along the lines of his starting point and method in order to reduce each of the Christian doctrines that are presented to him to naturalistic proportions.

As for the Arminian way of reasoning, it is, as already noted, essentially the same as that of Rome. The method followed by Bishop Butler follows closely that of Thomas Aquinas. According to Butler some of those who have no belief in or knowledge of Christianity at all have, none the less, quite rightly interpreted the “course and constitution of nature.” The cave has already been lit up by means of light that was not derived from the sun. By the use of the empirical method those who make no pretense of listening to Scripture are said or assumed to have interpreted nature for what it really is. It is no wonder then that the contents of Scripture too must be adjusted to the likes of the natural man. He will not accept them otherwise. And Butler is anxious to win him. So he says to him:

“Reason can, and it ought to judge, not only of the meaning, but also of the morality and the evidence, of revelation. First, it is the province of reason to judge of the morality of Scripture; i.e., not whether it contains things different from what we should have expected from a wise, just, and good Being; for objections from hence have now been obviated; but whether it contains things plainly contradictory to wisdom, justice, or goodness—to what the light of nature teaches us of God.” The Works of Joseph Butler

Since even in the interpretation of “nature” the natural man must and does himself admit that he cannot know everything, he can certainly, without compromising himself in the least, allow that what Scripture claims about “supernatural” things may probably be true. Already accustomed to allowing for a measure of discontinuity even in his interpretation of the “course and constitution of nature” why should he not allow for a little more of this same sort of discontinuity in realms about which he admits that he still may learn? Such a concession will not break the principle of continuity that he has employed in all his interpretations of things that he knows; his principle of continuity needs merely to be stretched. The natural man does not object to stretching his principle of continuity if he is compelled to do so by virtue of the irrationality of reality; the only thing to which he strenuously objects is the submission of his own principles of continuity and of discontinuity to the counsel of God.²⁵

²⁵As we will see below, Van Til utilizes the notions of the principle of continuity/discontinuity in order to show the inconsistency of unbelieving thought. These notions are aspects of Van Til's overall critique of unbelieving thought as inherently dialectical. The dialectic, generally, is one of rationalism/irrationalism. For Van Til, the non-Christian principle of continuity is best exemplified in Parmenides' monism. For Parmenides, all that is, is being. Anything else would be nonbeing and thus would not "be." The non-Christian principle of discontinuity is best exemplified in Heraclitus. Heraclitus taught that everything is in flux, and thus one never steps into the same river twice. So, the principle of continuity is focused on unity, and the principle of discontinuity is focused on diversity. Van Til was not abundantly clear in his many delineations of the Christian principles of continuity and discontinuity. At one place, for example, he says, "The true Christian apologist has his principle of discontinuity; it is expressed in his appeal to the mind of God as all-comprehensive in knowledge because all-controlling in power." In another place he says: "This involves the idea that God himself is wholly known to himself and that the created universe is also wholly known to him because wholly controlled by him. This is the Christian principle of continuity." From these quotes, it looks as though the principle of continuity and discontinuity are the same. It is best perhaps to remember that the Christian principle of continuity, for Van Til, because of its focus on unity, is related to God's all-comprehensive knowledge and his all-comprehensive plan for history. The Christian principle of discontinuity, given its focus on diversity, is related to God's control of every aspect of his creation, thus his control and determination of every fact of history.

It appears then that as Arminianism together with Roman Catholicism is willing to join the natural man in his supposedly neutral starting point and method, so also Arminianism is forced to pay for these concessions by having the natural man to some extent dictate to him what sort of Christianity he may or may not believe. If the natural man is given permission to draw the floor-plan for a house and is allowed to build the first story of the house in accordance with his own blueprint, the Christian cannot escape being controlled in a large measure by the same blueprint when he wants to take over the building of the second story of the house. Arminianism begins by offering to the natural man a Christian theology that has foreign elements in it. As over against the Reformed faith the Arminian has fought for the idea of man's ultimate ability to accept or reject salvation. His argument on this score amounts to saying that God's presentation of his claims upon mankind cannot reach down to the individual man; it can only reach to the infima species.²⁶ God has to await the election returns to see whether he is chosen as God or is set aside. God's knowledge therefore stands over against and depends to some extent upon a temporal reality which he does not wholly control. When the Arminian has thus, as he thinks, established and defended human responsibility against the Calvinist he turns about to defend the Christian position against the natural man. But then he soon finds himself at the mercy of the natural man. The natural man is mercilessly consistent. He simply tells the Arminian that a little autonomy involves absolute autonomy, and a little reality set free from the plan of God involves all reality set free from the plan of God. After that the reduction process is simply a matter of time. Each time the Arminian presents to the natural man one of the doctrines of Christianity, the natural man gladly accepts it and then “naturalizes” it.

²⁶ That is, "the lowest species.

It is no valid objection against this contention to say that certainly many Arminians do not hold to any naturalistic conception of Christianity. For the question is not so much now what individual Arminians believe. Their belief at best involves a compromise with naturalism.

Naturalism: They urged that reality is exhausted by nature, containing nothing “supernatural”, and that the scientific method should be used to investigate all areas of reality, including the “human spirit” (Krikorian 1944, Kim 2003). Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy

But the point we are making now is about the method of apologetics that fits in with Arminian theology. And on that score we must, in simple honesty, assert that this method is essentially the same as the method of Roman Catholicism and is essentially reductionistic and therefore self-frustrative. It appears then that the first enemy of Arminianism, namely Calvinism, is its best friend. Only in the Reformed Faith is there an uncompromising statement of the main tenets of Christianity. All other statements are deformations. It is but to be expected that only in the Reformed Faith will we find an uncompromising method of apologetics. Calvinism makes no compromise with the natural man either on his views of the autonomy of the human mind or on his views of the nature of existence as not controlled by the plan of God. Therefore, Calvinism cannot find a direct point of contact in any of the accepted concepts of the natural man. He disagrees with every individual doctrine of the natural man because he disagrees with the outlook of the natural man as a whole. He disagrees with the basic immanentistic assumption of the natural man. For it is this basic assumption that colors all his statements about individual teachings. It is therefore this basic assumption of the natural man that meets its first major challenge when it is confronted by the statement of a full-fledged Christianity.

Another good illustration:

The Reformed apologist throws down the gauntlet and challenges his opponent to a duel of life and death from the start. He does not first travel in the same direction and in the same automobile with the natural man for some distance in order then mildly to suggest to the driver that they ought perhaps to change their course somewhat and follow a road that goes at a different slant from the one they are on. The Reformed apologist knows that there is but one way to the truth and that the natural man is travelling it, but in the wrong direction. The service stations along the highway will service cars going in either direction. And as there are seemingly more cars going in the wrong direction than there are going in the right direction, the upkeep of the road will be supplied largely by those going in the wrong direction. Speaking together at one of these service stations, two travelers going in opposite directions may be in perfect agreement when they eulogize the turnpike on which they are travelling and the premium quality of gasoline which they are getting. But like Bunyan’s Christian the Reformed apologist will tell his friend that the way he is going leads to the precipice. He points to the signs made by the builder of the road which all point the opposite way from that which his friend, the natural man, is going. And when the reply is made by the natural man that he has been very successful in his trip so far, and that he too has been following signs, signs which point in the direction in which he is moving, the Reformed apologist will wipe out such of these signs as are near at hand and will challenge his friend to wipe out any of the signs he has ignored.

The Roman Catholic and the Arminian apologist would not be in a position to wipe out any of the signs that point in the wrong direction. An Arminian apologist meeting the natural man as both stop at one of the service stations is in a strange predicament. Since he is a Christian he should really speak to the natural man about the fact that he is following the wrong signs. His belief in creation demands of him that he warn his new acquaintance against following the wrong signs. But since he himself holds to a measure of autonomy for man and since this undermines his own belief in creation, he can at best say to his friend that it is doubtful which signs are right. Then as far as his “neutral” apologetic method is concerned, the Arminian, in the interest of getting his friend to go in the right direction, admits that the signs that point in the wrong direction are right. He himself goes in the wrong direction for some distance too with the natural man. He fully agrees with the natural man when together they start on their wrong course and he still fully agrees on the way to the city of destruction. Then suddenly he puts on the brakes and turns around, expecting that his friend will do the same. Thus, in the whole business he has dishonored his God (a) by practically admitting that his revelation is not plain and (b) by himself running away from God in his interpretation of natural revelation and in his subjection of supernatural revelation to the illegitimate requirements of the natural man. Meanwhile he has failed in his purpose of persuading the natural man to go in the right direction. The Roman Catholic and Arminian views of theology are compromising; in consequence the Roman Catholic and the Arminian method of apologetics is both compromising and self-frustrative.

Man's Knowledge of God

Man's absolute dependence on God, knowledge of God is analogical; our knowledge of God and things cannot be comprehensive.

MAN'S KNOWLEDGE OF THE WORLD UNIVERSE

What we have said about man's knowledge of God is really determinative for what we have to say about man's knowledge of the universe. By the term universe we now mean the whole of the created world including man himself and his environment.

The first question we must ask with respect to the relation of our knowledge of God to our knowledge of the universe is, which of these two is prior?

Man cannot help but know himself at once in relation to his environment. The subject of knowledge must know itself in relation to and in contrast with the object of knowledge.

This contention that man must know himself in relation to his environment is not merely a general consideration obtained by observation of experience. It is implied in the very bedrock of Christian-theism. This may be seen by again referring to our idea of God and of God's relation to the created universe. Man exists by virtue of God's existence. Man's environment precedes man. God is man's ultimate environment, and this environment is completely interpretative of man who is to know himself.

In other words man's environment is not impersonal. It is, moreover, not merely personal in the sense that simultaneous with his own appearance there are also other finite persons in relation to which he knows himself to be a person. Back of this relationship of finite persons to other finite persons and to other finite but impersonal things is the absolute personality of God. Back of the question as to whether man needs other finite persons or needs a finite non-personal environment is the question of the environment of man's immediate environment. God is man's ultimate environment and this ultimate environment controls the whole of man's immediate environment as well as man himself. The whole of man's own immediate environment as well as man himself is already interpreted by God. Even the denotation of the whole universe exists by virtue of the connotation or plan of God. Thus, we have answered our question about temporal priority by answering the question of logical priority. Because man's knowledge of God is logically more fundamental than man's knowledge of the universe, we may be indifferent to the question of temporal priority. Even if in our psychological experience we know ourselves and the universe about us before we speak self-consciously of God, we have all the while known God if we have truly known anything else.

We have constantly emphasized the concept of God as being basic to everything else which a Christian believes. This is so because God exists, as he exists, necessarily. For that reason, we cannot know ourselves in any true sense unless we know God. He is our most ultimate and therefore absolutely indispensable environment. For that reason if we know him we know him truly though not comprehensively.

It follows from all this that we know the world truly though not comprehensively.

Our argument for the objectivity of knowledge with respect to the universe can never be complete and satisfactory unless we bring in the relation of both the object and the subject of knowledge to God. We may debate endlessly about psychological problems without fruitage if we refuse to bring in the metaphysical question of the nature of reality.^{85} If the Christian position with respect to creation, that is, with respect to the idea of the origin of both the subject and the object of human knowledge is true, there is and must be objective knowledge. In that case the world of objects was made in order that the subject of knowledge, namely man, should interpret it under God. Without the interpretation of the universe by man to the glory of God the whole world would be meaningless. The subject and the object are therefore adapted to one another. On the other hand, if the Christian theory of creation by God is not true then we hold that there cannot be objective knowledge of anything. In that case all things in this universe are unrelated and cannot be in fruitful contact with one another. This we believe to be the simple alternative on the question of the objectivity of knowledge as far as the things of this universe are concerned.

One of the points about which there has been much confusion when we speak of the objectivity of human knowledge is whether human knowledge of the world must be comprehensive to be true. Sometimes it is said that though we cannot hope to obtain comprehensive knowledge of God we may hope eventually if not now to have comprehensive knowledge of the things of this universe. But we believe that just for the reason that we cannot hope to obtain comprehensive knowledge of God we cannot hope to obtain comprehensive knowledge of anything in this world. Not as though anything in this world is infinite as God is infinite and for that reason not fully comprehensible, for it is not the infinity of things in themselves but once more the infinity of God that makes it impossible for us comprehensively to understand things in the created universe. The reason for this is not far to seek.

The things of this universe must be interpreted in relation to God. The object of knowledge is not interpreted truly if though brought into relation with the human mind, it is not also brought into relation with the divine mind. God is the ultimate category of interpretation. Now we cannot fully understand God's plan for created things and so we cannot fully understand things.

We see then that our knowledge of the universe must be true since we are creatures of God who has made both us and the universe. Then too our knowledge of the universe cannot be comprehensive because our knowledge of God cannot be comprehensive.

A word must here be said about the question of antinomies. It will readily be inferred what as Christians we mean by antinomies.^{86} They are involved in the fact that human knowledge can never be completely comprehensive knowledge. Every knowledge transaction has in its somewhere a reference point to God. Now since God is not fully comprehensible to us we are bound to come into what seems to be contradiction in all our knowledge. Our knowledge is analogical and therefore must be paradoxical. We say that if there is to be any true knowledge at all there must be in God an absolute system of knowledge. We therefore insist that everything must be related to that absolute system of God. Yet we ourselves cannot fully understand that system.

We may, in order to illustrate our meaning here, take one of the outstanding paradoxes of the Christian interpretation of things, namely, that of the relation of the counsel of God to our prayers. To put it pointedly: We say on the one hand that prayer changes things and on the other hand we say that everything happens in accordance with God's plan and God's plan is immutable.

The thing we are concerned about here is to point out that in the nature of the case there would have to be such a paradox or seeming contradiction in human knowledge. God exists as self-complete apart from us; he is all-glorious. Yet he created the universe that it might glorify him. This point lies at the bottom of every paradox or antinomy. We were in the nature of the case completely interpreted before we came into existence; the universal plan of God needed not to be supplemented by historical particulars and could not be supplemented in this way. The historical could not produce anything wholly new. This much we see clearly. God being what he is, it must be his counsel which acts as the indispensable and self-complete unity back of the finite one and many. The only alternative to saying this is to say that the historical produces the wholly new, and this would be to give up the basic idea of the Christian-theistic scheme, namely, the idea of God and of his creation and control of the universe. On the other hand, the historical must have genuine significance. Or else why should God have created it? Prayer must be answered, or God would not be God. The universe must really glorify God; that is the purpose of its existence. So we seem to have on the one hand a bucket that is full of water and on the other hand we seem to add water to this bucket which we claim to be already full.

It appears that there must seem to be contradiction in human knowledge. To this we must now add that the contradiction that seems to be there can in the nature of the case be no more than a seeming contradiction. If we said that there is real contradiction in our knowledge we would once more be denying the basic concept of Christian-theism, i.e., the concept of the self-complete universal in God. We should then not merely be saying that there is no complete coherence in our thinking, but we should also be saying that there is no complete coherence in God's thinking. And this would be the same as saying that there is no coherence or truth in our thinking at all. If we say that the idea of paradox or antinomy is that of real contradiction, we have destroyed all human and all divine knowledge; if we say that the idea of paradox or antinomy is that of seeming contradiction, we have saved God's knowledge and therewith also our own.

We must note here again how impossible it is in an apologetic argument to close one's eyes to differences between various theological schools.{87} That fact comes out here more strikingly than anywhere else. Arminianism has not been true to its own belief in creation. With belief in creation, it stands committed to that view of God and of God's counsel and that view of man's relation to that counsel which we have outlined. Yet it has been untrue to all this in its insistence that the historical does produce the absolutely new. For that reason, it has to think of the relation of God's counsel to man's activity as one of real contradiction. In order to avoid this "contradiction" it has simply thrown overboard the idea of the counsel of God, as controlling all things. Therewith it has in effect sought to destroy both divine and human knowledge and therewith it has destroyed the very meaning of history which it was so anxious to preserve. God cannot answer our prayers for the salvation of people if those people can reject that salvation when they wish.

Chapter IV I

ETHICS AND THE CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY OF KNOWLEDGE

In order to deal with the Christian summum bonum, the Christian standard and Christian motivation, we may first intimate how directly the whole of Christian ethics is related to the Christian view of knowledge. I quote from the syllabus on Christian Ethics.

God, as absolute personality, is the ultimate category of interpretation for man in every aspect of his being. Every attribute of God will, in the nature of the case, be reflected primarily in every other attribute of God. There will be mutual and complete exhaustiveness in the relationship of the three persons of the trinity. Consequently no one of the persons of the trinity can be said to be correlative in its being, to anything that exists beyond the Godhead. If then man is created it must be that he is absolutely dependent upon his relationship to God for the meaning of his existence in its every aspect. If this is true it means that the good is good for man because it has been set as good for man by God. This is usually expressed by saying that the good is good because God says it is good. As such it is contrasted with non-Christian thought which says that the good exists in its own right and that God strives for that which is good in itself. We do not artificially separate the will of God from the nature of God. It is the nature as well as the will of God that is ultimately good. Yet since this nature of God is personal there is no sense in which we can say that the good exists in its own right.

a. Man as Made in God's Image

With these considerations as a background, we can think of man as he first appeared on the face of the earth. It follows logically that he appeared upon the earth as a perfect though finite replica of the Godhead. The original perfection of man in every respect, and in particular in the moral respect, is implied in the conception of God which lies at the foundation of the whole structure of Christian thought.

Now if there cannot be any evil in God it would be quite impossible to think that he should create man as evil. Again, this is true not only because we abhor the idea of attributing such a deed to God but because it would be a contradiction of his being so to do. Thus, we hold that man appeared originally with a perfect moral consciousness. It is this that the Genesis narrative tells us.{90}

The difference between Christian ethics and non-Christian ethics has not been made perfectly clear at this point unless we dwell on the fact that even in its original perfect condition the moral consciousness of man was derivative¹ and not the ultimate source of information as to what is good. Man was in the nature of the case finite. Hence his moral consciousness too was finite and as such had to live by revelation. Man's moral thought as well as the other aspects of his thought had to be receptively reconstructive.

¹Van Til states on page 157 of his book Introduction to Systematic Theology, pg 157: Calvin never did start a chain of reasoning about man's nature and destiny by taking man by himself. He did not start with man as with an ultimate starting point. Calvin did not start with a general a priori position. His position is as radically apposed to that of Descartes as it is to that of Hume. Most apologetic writers who have come after Calvin have allowed themselves to be influenced unduly by Cartesian philosophy on this matter. Calvin recognized fully that if man is to have true knowledge of himself, he must regard God as original and himself as derivative. He did not place God and man as correlatives next to one another, but he recognized from the outset two levels of existence and two levels of interpretation: on the one hand, the divine and eternal and, on the other hand, the human or temporal. To him it is perfectly obvious that the endowments that we possess are not of ourselves, but of God. Hence he says that "not a particle of light, or wisdom, or justice, or power, or rectitude, or genuine truth, will anywhere be found, which does not flow from him: and of which he is not the cause. [Calvin, Institutes 1.2.2)

Cornelius Van Til again states from his book, Introduction to Systematic Theology: p128-9: In Paradise, man made his self-consciousness the immediate but wholly derivative starting point while he made the self-consciousness of God the remote but wholly ultimate starting point of all his knowledge. Hence he saw that his knowledge was, though finite, yet true. Hence he did not set before himself the false ideal of absolute comprehension. Hence, too, he did not despair and conclude to irrationalism simply because he himself could not fully comprehend the whole of reality.

In opposition to this, the non-Christian interpretation of the human mind is based upon the presupposition that it is the ultimate and not merely the derivative starting point for man. Hence it has set before itself the ideal of comprehension knowledge. This was done especially in the earlier stages of human thought. The Greek thinkers were as children who thought they could do everything. Even in modern times we have, in such systems as that of Leibniz, a striking manifestation of the pride, “hubris,” of the sinner who wishes to be as God.³⁵ In more recent times, however, men have become more sophisticated. There have given up the quest of certainty and the quest for comprehension, except as a limiting concept. In modern irrationalism, the prodigal has recognized that he is at the swine trough, but still refuses to return to the father’s house. His “hubris” never forsakes him.

This then is the most basic and fundamental difference between Christian and non-Christian epistemology, as far as it has a direct bearing upon questions of ethics, that in the case of non-Christian thought man’s moral activity is thought of as creatively constructive while in Christian thought man’s moral activity is thought of as being receptively reconstructive. According to non-Christian thought, there is no absolute moral personality to whom man is responsible and from whom he has received his conception of the good, while according to Christian thought God is the infinite moral personality who reveals to man the true nature of morality.

It is necessary, however, to think of this revelation of God to man as originally internal as well as external. Man found in his own makeup, in his own moral nature, an understanding of and a love for that which is good. His own nature was revelational of the will of God. But while thus revelational of the will of God, man’s nature, even in paradise, was never meant to function by itself. It was at once supplemented by the supernatural, external and positive expression of God’s will as its correlative. Only thus can we see how basic is the difference between the Christian and the non-Christian view of the moral nature of man in relation to ethical questions.

b. Sin and Its Curse

The second point of difference that must be included in our general antithesis stated above concerns the question of the influence of sin on the moral consciousness of man. We cannot begin to give a survey here of all the Biblical material that bears on this question. Nor is this necessary. The main point is clear enough. Just as sin has blinded the intellect of man, so it has corrupted the will of man. This is often spoken of as the hardening of man’s heart. Paul says that the natural man is at enmity against God. The natural man cannot will to do God’s will. He cannot even know what the good is. The sinner worships the creature rather than the Creator. He has set all the moral standards topsy-turvy.

This doctrine of the total depravity of man makes it plain that the moral consciousness of man as he is today cannot be the source of information about what is ideal good or about what is the standard of the good or about what is the true nature of the will which is to strive for the good. It would seem plain enough that men have to choose on this point between the Christian and the non-Christian position.

It is this point particularly that makes it necessary for the Christian to maintain without any apology and without any concession that it is Scripture, and Scripture alone, in the light of which all moral questions must be answered. Scripture as an external revelation became necessary because of the sin of man. No man living can even put the moral problem as he ought to put it, or ask the moral questions as he ought to ask them, unless he does so in the light of Scripture. Man cannot of himself truly face the moral question, let alone answer it.{91}

Man's moral consciousness then as it is today, is (a) finite and (b) sinful. If it were only finite and not sinful we could go to the moral consciousness of man for our information. Even then, however, we should have to remember that we could go there not because the moral consciousness would be able either to ask or to answer the moral question correctly in its own power alone, but because its own activity would be in fruitful contact with God from whom the questions and the answers would ultimately come.

It is true that the non-regenerate consciousness of man cannot entirely keep under the requirements of God that speak to it through its own constitution. Thus, God's will is heard through it, in spite of it. Hence the natural man excuses or accuses himself for his ethical action. But for the main point now under consideration this point may be ignored. For to the extent that man is not restrained by God's common grace from living out his sinful principle, the natural man [the unbeliever, the unregenerate] makes his own moral consciousness the ultimate standard of moral action.

c. The Regenerated Consciousness

But what then of the regenerated moral consciousness? In the first place the regenerated consciousness is once more in principle restated to its former place. This implies that we can go to it because we could originally go to it for our answers. This is of basic importance for it furnishes the point of contact between Christian and non-Christian ethics. As Christians we do not maintain that man's moral consciousness cannot under any circumstances and in any sense serve as a point of reference. But man's moral consciousness must be regenerated in order to serve as a reference point. Moreover, the regenerated consciousness is still finite. It must still live by revelation as it originally lived by revelation. It can never become an ultimate information bureau. Finally, the regenerated moral consciousness is changed in principle only, and therefore often errs. Consequently, it must constantly seek to test itself by Scripture. More than that, the regenerated consciousness does not in itself fabricate any answers to the moral questions. It receives them and reworks them. Now if this receiving, in so far as it implies an activity of the mind, be called the function of the moral consciousness, we may speak of it as a source of information. The regenerated moral consciousness which constantly nourishes itself upon the Scripture is as the plenipotentiary who knows fairly well what his authority desires.

So then we have before us the Christian and the non-Christian conception of the moral consciousness of man. Summing up the matter we may say (a) that there once was a moral consciousness that was perfect and could act as a source, but only as a proximate source, of information on moral questions; (b) that there now are two types of moral consciousness which to the extent that they work from their respective principles agree on no ethical answer and on no ethical question, namely the non-regenerate and the regenerate consciousness; (c) that the non-regenerate consciousness denies while the regenerate consciousness affirms that the moral verdict of any man must be tested by Scripture because of the sin of man.

d. Roman Catholicism

On the question discussed in this chapter Roman Catholicism takes a position halfway between that of Christianity and that of paganism. The notion of the human consciousness set forth in the works of Thomas Aquinas is worked out, to a great extent, by the form-matter scheme of Aristotle. In consequence a large measure of autonomy is assigned to the human consciousness as over against the consciousness of God. This is true in the field of knowledge, and it is no less true in the field of ethics.

In the field of ethics this means that even in paradise, before the fall, man is not thought of as being receptively constructive in his attitude toward God. In order to maintain man's autonomy—or, as Thomas thinks, his very manhood as a self-conscious and responsible being—man must, from one point of view at least, be wholly independent of the counsel of God. This is implied in the so-called “free-will” idea. Thomas cannot think of man as responsible and free if all his actions have their ultimate and final reference point exclusively in God and his will. Thus, there is no really Scriptural idea of authority in Romanism. [hugely important to see]

It follows that Rome has too high a notion of the moral consciousness of fallen man. According to Thomas, fallen man is not very dissimilar from Adam in paradise. He says that while the sinner needs grace for more things than did Adam he does not need grace more.{92} Putting the matter somewhat differently, Thomas says, “And thus in the state of perfect nature man needs a gratuitous strength superadded to natural strength for one reason, viz., in order to do and wish supernatural good; but for two reasons, in the state of corrupt nature, viz., in order to be healed, and furthermore in order to carry out works of supernatural virtue, which are meritorious. Beyond this, in both states man needs the Divine help, that he may be moved to act well.”{93} In any case, for Thomas the ethical problem for man is as much one of finitude as it is one of ethical obedience. Man is naturally finite. As such he tends naturally to evil. He needs grace because he is a creature even though he is not a sinner. Hence God really owes grace to man at least to some extent. And man does not become totally depraved when he does not make such use of the grace given him as to keep himself from sin entirely. For in any case the act of his free will puts him naturally in grave danger. Fallen man is therefore only partly guilty and only partly blame. And he retains much of the same ethical power that man had in paradise. For ethical ability is virtually said to be implied in metaphysical ability or free will.

It follows still further than even the regenerate consciousness need not and cannot subject itself fully to Scripture. Thomas is unable to do justice to St. Paul's position that whatever is not of faith is sin. The entire discussion by Thomas of the cardinal virtues and their relation to the theological virtues proves this point. He distinguishes sharply between them. “Now the object of the theological virtues is God Himself, Who is the last end of all, as surpassing the knowledge of our reason. On the other hand, the object of the intellectual and moral virtues is something comprehensible to human reason. Wherefore the theological virtues are specifically distinct from the moral and intellectual virtues.”{94} In respect to the things that are said to be knowable by reason apart from supernatural revelation, then, the Christian acts, and should act, from what amounts to the same motive as the non-Christian. Faith is not required for a Christian to act virtuously in the natural relationships of life. Or if the theological virtues do have some influence over the daily activities of the Christian, this influence is of an accidental and subsidiary nature.

All in all, then it is clear that Romanism cannot ask its adherents to submit its moral consciousness to Scripture in any thorough way. And accordingly, Rome cannot challenge the non-Christian position in any thorough way.

Subjects: First (remote or ultimate) & second (proximate) causes, Arminianism's error on not distinguishing both causes, and their error of being against determinism and hence, saving grace. Is God the author of sin? answered by the two kinds of causes. God's decree seen in his will – secret, permissive and will of command.

God's Decree Controls All Things

I further hold that the self-sufficient triune God “from all eternity did, by the most wise and holy counsel of his own will, freely and unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass—.” This is what I mean when I say that God is the ultimate cause back of all things. In this terminology I am merely reproducing Calvin's argument against Pighius in The Eternal Predestination of God. (See Henry Cole, Calvin's Calvinism.) Calvin speaks of remote and proximate causes. I simply use the word ultimate instead of remote. I do not think there is any essential difference between Calvin's usage of the word remote and my usage of the word ultimate.

In various works Calvin had maintained the all-inclusiveness of the decree of God. This, Pighius had argued, was in effect to make God the author of sin. Calvin denies vigorously that he makes God the author of sin. "I have with equal constancy, asserted that the eternal death to which man rendered himself subject so proceeded from his own fault that God cannot, in any way, be considered the author of it" (Calvin's Calvinism, p. 127). Here Calvin makes the distinction between remote and proximate causes. As the proximate cause of sin man is guilty before God. "But now, removing as I do from God all the proximate cause of the act in the Fall of man, I thereby remove from him also all the blame of the act leaving man alone under the sin and the guilt" (Idem, p. 128). But Pighius argues that if man is the responsible cause of his sin, then God's eternal reprobation must logically be denied. He identifies Calvin's conception of proximate cause with the cause, that is the only cause. To this Calvin replies again by means of his distinction between remote and proximate causes. There could be no responsible proximate cause unless there were also an all-comprehensive remote cause. He clinches his point by indicating that the doctrine of free grace cannot be maintained except upon the presupposition of a remote or ultimate cause back of the proximate cause. "If the wickedness of man be still urged as the cause of the difference between the elect and the non-elect, this wickedness might indeed be made to appear more powerful than the grace of God which he shows toward the elect, if that solemn truth did not stand in the way of such an argument: 'I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy'" (Idem, p. 80). Dealing with the blindness of sinners referred to in Acts 28:25, 26, Calvin says: "Some persons will here erroneously and ignorantly conclude that the cause and beginning of this obduracy in the Jews was their malicious wickedness. Just as if there were no deeper and more occult cause of the wickedness itself, namely, the original corruption of nature! And as if they did not remain sunk in this corruption because, being reprobated by the secret counsel of God before they were born, they were left undelivered!" (Idem, p. 81). Speaking still further of the cause of the sinner's blindness and of the Evangelist John's exposition of the famous Isaiah passage on this subject Calvin says: "Now, most certainly John does not here give us to understand that the Jews were prevented from believing by their sinfulness. For though this be quite true in one sense, yet the cause of their not believing must be traced to a far higher source. The secret and eternal purpose and counsel of God must be viewed as the original cause of their blindness and unbelief" (Idem, p. 81). Again, he adds: "The unbelief of the world, therefore, ought not to astonish us, if even the wisest and most acute of men fail to believe. Hence, unless we would elude the plain and confessed meaning of the Evangelist, that few receive the gospel, we must fully conclude that the cause is the will of God; and that the outward sound of that gospel strikes the ear in vain until God is pleased to touch them by the heart within" (Idem, p. 82).

When therefore you object to my saying that "God is the ultimate cause back of whatsoever comes to pass" you will also need to reject Calvin's distinction between proximate and remote causes. I was simply reproducing Calvin's argument against Pighius. With Pighius you will have to say that man's deeds of wickedness are the cause, the only or final cause of his eternal state. And therewith you have, as Calvin points out, virtually denied the doctrine of the sovereign grace of God in the case of the elect. I do not think that you can show how Ephesians 1:11 which says that God "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will” is a “very different statement” from saying that God is the ultimate or remote cause back of all things, without falling into Arminianism.

I was much surprised when you objected to my simple reproduction of Calvin’s argument. I could not imagine that as a Calvinist you would hold with Pighius against Calvin. So, I looked up your own discussion of freedom in your book, “Sin and Atonement.” In your argument against determinism, you assert: “We hold that there is genuine and absolute freedom within certain areas of human life, a freedom for which God himself in his infinite foreknowledge holds man absolutely responsible” (pg 49). Then, speaking of our own choice of becoming a violinist or a missionary you add: “There was a period of time when the decision though foreknown of God was still indeterminate-“ (Idem, p. 50). In opposing determinism, you do not carefully distinguish between fatalism and Calvinism. You do not mention foreordination but only foreknowledge. You speak of man having “absolute freedom” in certain areas, and of the result as being “indeterminate” without saying that it was indeterminate only in the sense that you as a man did not know the outcome. Add all this to your peremptory rejection of my reproduction of Calvin’s argument and the question cannot be repressed to what extent you would hold to Calvin’s position rather than to that of Pighius.

Do you think Charles Hodge’s “great chapter distinguishing between necessity and certainty, showing that complete certainty is not dependent upon the idea of necessity” is out of agreement with Calvin’s doctrine of God as the remote cause of all things? If you can show it to be such it will surely be “anathema” to me; if you cannot show it to be such, why should you object to my statement that God’s decree is the ultimate though not the immediate cause of all things? Hodge says: “It may, however, be remarked that there is no difficulty attending the doctrine of foreordination which does not attach to that of foreknowledge. The latter supposes the certainty of free acts, and the former secures their certainty” (Systematic Theology, II, p. 301). Or again, being the cause of all things God knows everything by knowing himself; all things possible, by the knowledge of his power, and all things actual by the knowledge of his own purposes” (Idem I, pg 398). Again, “The futuration of events, according to the Scriptures, depends on the foreordination of God who foreordains whatever comes to pass” (Idem I, pg 400).

Your readers must certainly have been amazed at hearing that I unequivocally teach that God is the author of sin. You assert: “To say that Calvin knew that his opponent could ‘rightly insist that God is the cause of sin,’ is a direct contradiction of the statement, based upon many scores of Scripture passages, that ‘neither is God the author of sin’” (p. 78). What did I actually say? “If God is the ultimate cause back of whatsoever comes to pass, Pighius can, on his basis, rightly insist that God is the author of sin” (Common Grace, p. 66). First you misquote me. You quote me as saying: on this basis while I say on his basis. Then in your reproduction of my argument you omit this all-important phrase on this basis. Omitting that phrase makes me say the exact opposite of what I actually said. Pighius denies the validity of distinction between remote and proximate causes. Accordingly, he holds that a proximate cause in Calvin’s sense of the term is no real cause and that the only real cause of sin on Calvin’s basis must be God. Is he logically inconsistent with his own assumption when he reasoned thus? He is not. Calvin does not say that he is. He points to no flaw in Pighius’ reasoning. Instead, he points to the necessity of introducing the distinction between remote and proximate causes. Then and then only, Calvin argues, is it really possible to establish the exclusive responsibility of man for sin. For then, and then only , is the freedom of man really established and are secondary cause given a true foundation.

In this connection you further assert: "It is of course characteristic of the school of thought to which Dr. Van Til belongs to deny the possibility of any distinction between God's permissive decrees and his compelling decrees" (p. 48). Was there any necessity of thus lumping me with a "school of thought" and asserting or suggesting that as a member of such a school I must hold so and so when as a matter of fact I do speak of the permission of god with respect to sin? (See the Syllabus on Introduction to Theology, Vo. II, p. 217.) But I am anxious that what God permits be not set in contrast over against that which God foreordains. In that case the will of man would again be thought of as the final or ultimate cause of its own acts and therewith God's grace be denied. [Arminians believe that their wills are self-directed, that all that they decide or will to do originates from them and not from anything or influence outside themselves; otherwise, violence is done to their supposed liberty, a liberty of the will that they strongly defend.] (The reader may find Calvin's evaluation of the idea of God's permission a of sin in Calvin's Calvinism, p. 244.) Are your "permissive decrees" in no sense "compelling decrees"? Would you deny the ultimate efficiency of God in order to make room for the entrance of sin? If you are not to make your distinction between permissive and compelling decrees to fall into a virtual argument for an Arminian conception of the freedom of the will, how can you avoid saying with Calvin that "whatsoever men do, they do according to the eternal will and secret purpose of God"?

The same school of thought to which I am supposed to belong is accustomed, you say, "to stop in the ninth chapter of Romans with the great and profound truth of the twentieth verse, O man, who art thou that repliest against God" without going on to the twenty-second verse in which Paul "so simply explains" why God brought Pharaoh into existence (pg. 46). Well, I am not in the habit of stopping with the twentieth verse any more than was Calvin. But neither do I think that the twentieth verse gives a merely arbitrary statement about God while the twenty-second verse gives a more profound reason for God's dealings with Pharaoh. In complete contrast with Calvin's approach (see Calvin's Calvinism, p. 246) you assert, while speaking of the passages of Romas 9:20, 21 and 9:22,23: "I do wish to emphasize very forcefully that the Apostle Paul does not stop with the first merely arbitrary answer. He goes forward to suggest a further and a much more profound analysis of God's plan of redemption" What is God, p. 53). I do not think the will of God is an arbitrary reason. I believe with Calvin that God's will "is and must be, the highest rule of all equity" (Op cit., p. 190). I do not think that the explanation given in the twenty-second verse is offered as more profound or more ultimate than the point made in verse twenty. "Taking, then, an honest and sober review of the whole of this high and Divine matter," says Calvin, "the plain and indubitable conclusion will be that the will of God is the one principal and all-high cause of all things in heaven and earth" (Idem, p. 246). Or again, "But as the will of God is the surest rule of all righteousness, that will ought ever to be to us the principal reason, yea – if I may so speak – the reason of all reasons!" (Idem, p. 247). But Calvin desires that his distinction between proximate and remote cause be always observed. It is because his adversaries have failed to make this distinction which he considers so essential that they have done him grave injustice. "Our adversaries load us with illiberal and disgraceful calumny, when they cast it in our teeth that we make God the author of sin, by maintaining that his will is the cause of all things that are done" (Idem, p. 251). Making the distinction between proximate and remote causes enable Calvin to do full justice to the longsuffering of God without giving up the decree of God as basic to whatsoever comes to pass.

God's secret will, his divine decrees, are compatible with man's creaturely freedom, proper second causes in the doctrine of compatibilism. This is a wonderful mystery. God does no violence to man's liberty as Arminians assume, when the Spirit is said to convert the soul from unwilling to being willing, from unbelieving to believing. If this is not the case, as Arminians argue, then why does God say, greater is he that is in you than he that is in the world, if the man's free will is left to determine the point in the conflict? As Edwards points out below:

§ 53. If God is not the disposing author of virtue, then he is not the giver of it. The very notion of a giver implies a disposing cause of the possession of the benefit. 1 John iv. 4. "Ye are of God, little children, and have overcome them, (i. e. have overcome your spiritual enemies,) because greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world;" that is, plainly, he is stronger, and his strength overcomes. But how can this be a reason, if God does not put forth an overcoming, effectual strength in the case, but leaves it to free will to get the victory, to determine the point in the conflict? – Jonathan Edwards

SIN AND ITS CURSE

What we have said thus far in this chapter about man's knowledge has not taken sin into consideration. We have spoken only of the normal situation as it existed when man was first created perfect by God. We must now ask what happened to the knowledge situation when sin entered into the heart of man.

We know that sin is an attempt on the part of man to cut himself loose from God. But this breaking loose from God could, in the nature of the case, not be metaphysical; if it were, man himself would be destroyed and God's purpose with man would be frustrated. Sin is therefore a breaking loose from God ethically and not metaphysically. Sin is the creature's enmity and rebellion against God but is not an escape from creaturehood.

When we say that sin is ethical we do not mean, however, that sin involved only the will of man and not also his intellect. Sin involved every aspect of man's personality. [hence the meaning of "every" is the "total" in the title of the doctrine, Total Depravity] All of man's reactions in every relation in which God had set him were ethical and not merely intellectual; the intellectual itself is ethical.

What then was the result as far as the question of knowledge is concerned of man's rebellion against God? The result was that man tried to interpret everything with which he came into contact without reference to God. The assumption of all his future interpretation was the self-sufficiency of intra-cosmical relationships. This does not signify that man would immediately and openly deny that there is a God. Nor does it mean that man would always and everywhere deny that God is in some sense transcendent. [see notes on transcendence, etc., at the bottom] What he would always deny, by implication at least, would be that God is self-sufficient or self-complete. At best he would allow that God is a correlative to man. He might say that we need God to interpret man, but he would at the same time say that in the same sense we need man to interpret God. He might say that the temporal cannot be interpreted without reference to the eternal, but he would at the same time say that the eternal cannot be interpreted without reference to the temporal. He might say that we need God in order to obtain unity in our experience, but he would at the same time say that God needs the historical many in order to get diversity into his experience. All these forms of correlativity amount in the end to the same thing as saying that the finite categories are self-sufficient. For that reason, we can make a very simple and all comprehensive antithesis between the knowledge concept of all non-Christian philosophies and the Christian view. Scripture says that some men worship and serve the Creator; they are the Christians. All other men worship and serve the creature rather than the Creator.

Christian-theism says that there are two levels of thought, the absolute and the derivative. Christian theism says that there are two levels of interpreters, God who interprets absolutely and man who must be the re-interpreter of God's interpretation. Christian-theism says that human thought is therefore analogical of God's thought. In opposition to all this, non-Christian thought holds in effect that the distinction between absolute and derivative¹ thought must be wiped out. To be sure, God's thoughts may be more comprehensive than ours, but it is not self-complete without ours. This means that as all being was thought of as equally ultimate, so now all thought is thought of as equally ultimate. There is only one level of interpreters; if God comes into the picture at all, it is as a collaborator with man. We do not think Gods thoughts after him, but together with God we think our thoughts that have never been thought either by God or by man. Non-Christian philosophies hold that human thought is univocal instead of analogical. [see the explanation of these terms in the article below]

He did not start with man as with an ultimate starting point. Calvin did not start with a general a priori position. His position is as radically apposed to that of Descartes as it is to that of Hume. Most apologetic writers who have come after Calvin have allowed themselves to be influenced unduly by Cartesian philosophy on this matter. Calvin recognized fully that if man is to have true knowledge of himself, he must regard God as original and himself as derivative. He did not place God and man as correlatives next to one another, but he recognized from the outset two levels of existence and two levels of interpretation: on the one hand, the divine and eternal and, on the other hand, the human or temporal. To him it is perfectly obvious that the endowments that we possess are not of ourselves, but of God. Hence he says that “not a particle of light, or wisdom, or justice, or power, or rectitude, or genuine truth, will anywhere be found, which does not flow from him: and of which he is not the cause. [Calvin, Institutes 1.2.2)

Cornelius Van Til again states from his book, Introduction to Systematic Theology: p128-9: In Paradise, man made his self-consciousness the immediate but wholly derivative starting point while he made the self-consciousness of God the remote but wholly ultimate starting point of all his knowledge. Hence he saw that his knowledge was, though finite, yet true. Hence he did not set before himself the false ideal of absolute comprehension. Hence, too, he did not despair and conclude to irrationalism simply because he himself could not fully comprehend the whole of reality.

In opposition to this, the non-Christian interpretation of the human mind is based upon the presupposition that it is the ultimate and not merely the derivative starting point for man. Hence it has set before itself the ideal of comprehension knowledge. This was done especially in the earlier stages of human thought. The Greek thinkers were as children who thought they could do everything. Even in modern times we have, in such systems as that of Leibniz, a striking manifestation of the pride, “hubris,” of the sinner who wishes to be as God.³⁵ In more recent times, however, men have become more sophisticated. There have given up the quest of certainty and the quest for comprehension, except as a limiting concept. In modern irrationalism, the prodigal has recognized that he is at the swine trough, but still refuses to return to the father’s house. His “hubris” never forsakes him.

³⁵ Van Til uses the strong language of hubris here about Leibniz’s project. Leibniz had hoped to unify many disciplines and churches through his system, which is ultimately built on a very few general principles.

Thus, the Christian concept of analogical thought and the non-Christian concept of univocal thought stand over against one another as diametrical opposites.

Non-Christian thought holds to the ultimacy of the created universe. It holds therefore to the ultimacy of the mind of man itself and must in consequence deny the necessity of analogical thought. It holds to the normalcy of the human mind as well as to its ultimacy. It holds to the normalcy of the human mind as it holds to the normalcy of everything else in the world.

Naturally this conception of the normalcy of the human mind does not imply that the human mind never makes mistakes. It only means that mistakes are thought of as natural and to be expected and have nothing to do with sin.

We can readily see from this that the non-theistic mind must set for itself the ideal of absolutely comprehensive knowledge as long as it has not become fully conscious of the implications of its own thought. However, it will maintain that it is unnecessary for man to have any comprehensive universal in order to live. As long as non-theistic thought still thinks it necessary for man to have an absolute universal it naturally has to set for itself the task of finding this universal, inasmuch as God has been put out of the picture. Then when it appears impossible for man ever to find a universal, inasmuch as the particulars of the time are by definition always ahead of any time-generated universal, man says that he does not need any absolute universal anyway except as a limiting concept.

It may be useful in this connection to point out that in the whole situation we have therefore to deal with three types of consciousness.

In the first place there is the Adamic consciousness. When man was first created, he was perfect. He recognized the fact that he was a creature; he was actually normal. He wanted to be nothing but a re-interpretor of the interpretation of God. He was receptive to God's revelation which appeared within him and round about him; he would reconstruct this revelation. He was receptively reconstructive. For that reason he had real though not comprehensive unity in his experience.{88}

In the second place we deal with the fallen or non-regenerate consciousness. It builds upon the non-theistic assumption. It in effect denies its creaturehood. It claims to be normal. It will not be receptive of God's interpretation; it wants to create its own interpretation without reference to God. It will not reconstruct God's interpretation. It will construct only its own interpretation. It seeks to be creatively constructive. It thus tries to do the impossible with the result that self-frustration is written over all its efforts. There is no unity and never will be unity in non-theistic thought; it has cut itself loose from the only existing source of unity. Yet since it could not cut itself loose from God metaphysically and since God, for the purpose of realizing his plan of redemption, rudera or scintillae of the knowledge of God and of the universe remain in man. Non-Christians know after a fashion, as Paul tells us in Romans. Thus, also there is a relative good in those who are ethically totally evil. The unity that they have in experience is a shadow unity, a unity that prevents them from falling into complete disintegration in this world. Hereafter complete disintegration will follow, though even hereafter the disintegration can only be ethical and not metaphysical; there must be a kingdom or mock-unity even in hell.

Notes on the meaning of univocal, etc.

Thinking About God: Univocally or Analogically?

One of the realities that should govern your life is that there is a God and you are not him. That is, there is a Creator and there are creatures. We should not confuse the two. Christians have understood this in the past and have spoken, with a fair bit of consistency, accordingly.

To maintain this Creator/creature distinction, theologians have used the terms univocal, analogical, and equivocal when speaking about how we know God. Those who argue for some type of univocal understanding (e.g. John Duns Scotus in the 13th century) seem to believe “some predicates applied to God and humans must be univocal (i.e., mean exactly the same thing)” (Horton, Justification, vol. 1, 139). Others, like Thomas Aquinas (12th century), argued for an analogical view.

What’s the difference? Michael Horton offers a careful explanation.

Neither being nor knowledge is ever shared univocally (i.e., identically) between God and creatures. As God’s being is qualitatively and not just quantitatively distinct from ours, so too is God’s knowledge. God’s knowledge is archetypal (the original), while ours is ectypal (a copy), revealed by God and therefore accommodated to our finite capacities. Our imperfect and incomplete knowledge is always dependent on God’s perfect and complete knowledge.

A covenantal ontology requires a covenantal epistemology. We were created as God’s analogy (image bearers) rather than as self-existent sparks of divinity; therefore, our knowledge is also dependent rather than autonomous. So there is indeed such a thing as absolute, perfect, exhaustive, and eternal truth, but this knowledge is possessed by God, not by us. Rather, we have revealed truth, which God has accommodated to our capacity.

Following Thomas Aquinas (1225–74), our older theologians therefore argued that human knowledge is analogical rather than either univocal or equivocal (two terms are related analogically when they are similar, univocally when they are identical, and equivocally when they have nothing in common). Take the word ball. There is no obvious connection between a formal dance and an object that I bounce. Thus, the use of the word “ball” in these different contexts is equivocal. However, in sports, “ball” is used analogically. Football and baseball are not the same games; even the balls they use are qualitatively different. Nevertheless, they are similar enough for them both to be called ball games. Only when I am comparing one baseball game to another is ball used univocally—referring to exactly the same thing.

When we say that God is good, we assume we know what good means from our ordinary experience with fellow human beings. However, God is not only quantitatively better than we are; his goodness is qualitatively different from creaturely goodness. Nevertheless, because we are created in God’s image, we share this predicate with God analogically. Goodness, attributed to God and Sally, is similar but always with greater dissimilarity. At no point is goodness exactly the same for God as it is for Sally. The difference is qualitative, not just quantitative; yet there is enough similarity to communicate the point.

God reveals himself as a person, a king, a shepherd, a substitutionary lamb, and so forth. These analogies are not arbitrary (i.e., equivocal), but they are also not exact correspondence (i.e., univocal). Even when we attribute love to God and Mary, love cannot mean exactly the same thing for a self-existent Trinity and a finite person. In every analogy, there is always greater dissimilarity than similarity between God and creatures. Nevertheless, God judges that the analogy is appropriate for his self-revelation. We do not know exactly what divine goodness is like, but since God selects this analogy, there must be a sufficient similarity to our concept of goodness to justify the comparison.

This doctrine of analogy is the hinge on which a Christian affirmation of God's transcendence and immanence turns. A univocal view threatens God's transcendence, while an equivocal view threatens God's immanence.—Michael Horton, The Christian Faith: A Systematic Theology for Pilgrims Along the Way (Zondervan Academic. Kindle Edition), 53–55. [again, see below, the note on transcendence, and how this can help you see the application to understanding deism and pantheism. Pantheism is "Van Til's term for mutualism" – Dr. Lane Tipton. And Theistic Mutualism and Correlativism are the same thing.]

Van Til states on page 11, The Defense of the Faith:

It is not a sufficient description of Christian theism when we say that as Christians, we believe in both the transcendence and the immanence of God while pantheistic systems believe only in the immanence of God and deistic systems believe only in the transcendence of God. The transcendence we believe in is not the transcendence of deism and the immanence we believe in is not the immanence of pantheism. In the case of deism transcendence virtually means separation while in the case of pantheism immanence virtually means identification. And if we add separation to identification we do not have theism as a result. As we mean a certain kind of God when as theists we speak of God, so also we mean a certain kind of transcendence and a certain kind of immanence when we use these terms. The Christian doctrine of God implies a definite conception of the relation of God to the created universe. So also the Christian doctrine of God implies a definite conception of everything in the created universe (p. 6-7).

Side note on pantheism:

Van Til's mentor, Abraham Kuyper was particularly concerned about the intrusion of pantheism into the church and the West. His principle concern was that by identifying God with ideals like progress, the boundaries between God and the world are blurred, and God becomes severely limited. See his "Pantheism's Destruction of Boundaries," in Methodist Review 75 (1893): 520-37; 762-78. – An Introduction to Systematic Theology, Van Til, pg 320 note 4

Van Til states on page 369:

In saying that God is a Spirit we do not think of some vague generic concept of spirituality of which God is one particular instance and man another. God is the absolute Spirit. He is the self-contained Spirit. He does not need materiality over against himself in order to individuate himself. He is the self-individuated Spirit. [In other words, I think was Van Til is saying here, that God is not in an act of becoming via a correlative relationship with his creation – i.e., a pantheistic view. He is entirely distinct from his creation and he already is! and that by or of himself, a se. He is not becoming more conscious of himself nor coming into his own so to speak (becoming individuated), through a correlative relationship by being one with creation in the ongoing changes characteristic of all creatures. For one thing, God is immutable.]

Van Til, on pgs. 188-189 on man's creatureliness vs uncreatedness. What's the significance of this distinction? He explains this in his response to misplaced criticism by another theologian:

"As a matter of fact, I have frequently explained that by the term "autonomous man" I mean the idea of a man who virtually denies his createdness. As created in paradise man was a distinct ontological entity over against God. As made perfect he recognized that God his creator was also his lawgiver. Of his own accord, according to the law of his own being as God had made him, he was therefore a covenant keeper. But with the entrance of sin man was no longer willing to obey the law of his maker. He became a covenant breaker. He sought to be a law unto himself, that is, he sought to be autonomous. Speaking of my meaning of the word autonomous you say: "I do not think he means eternal or uncreated." But why can I not mean "uncreated" when I assert that I do? I do not say that all men openly assert that they are non-created. What I have asserted time and again is that men virtually assume or presuppose that they are non-created. If they do not assume or presuppose that they are created then what else are they doing than assuming or presupposing that they are not created and therefore are not responsible to their creator? Is this too broad and sweeping a statement to make about all sinners? The daily newspaper is unintelligible on any other basis. There are those who worship and serve the creature and there are those who worship and serve the Creator. This is the simple differentiation with which I am concerned. I try to call men back to the recognition of the fact that they are creatures of God by challenging their false assumption of their non-createdness, their autonomy or ultimacy."

Edwards' comments on our dependence upon God is clear!

As to the first of these, I think the following things appear to be the dictates of reason:

1. That no notion of God's last end in the creation of the world, is agreeable to reason, which would truly imply any indigence, insufficiency, and mutability in God; or any dependence of the Creator on the creature, for any part of his perfection or happiness. Because it is evident, by both Scripture and reason, that God is infinitely, eternally, unchangeably, and independently glorious and happy: that he cannot be profited by, or receive anything from, the creature; or be the subject of any sufferings, or diminution of his glory and felicity, from any other being. The notion of God creating the world, in order to receive any thing properly from the creature, is not only contrary to the nature of God, but inconsistent with the notion of creation; which implies a being receiving its existence, and all that belongs to it, out of nothing. And this implies the most perfect, absolute, and universal derivation and dependence. Now, if the creature receives its ALL from God, entirely and perfectly, how is it possible that it should have anything to add to God, to make him in any respect more than he was before, and so the Creator become dependent on the creature? pg 97 The End For Which God Created the World

Notes on Epistemologically Self-consciousness & Temporary Faith

Excerpt from

Common Grace and the Gospel

By Cornelius Van Til

Code489

What has been said may also help us to some extent in an intelligent discussion of the attitude of believers toward unbelievers. That attitude should, if our general approach be at all correct, be a conditional “as if” attitude. The attitude of Christ’s followers is, as Christ has told us, to be in positive imitation of God’s attitude. Hence, we are to make practical use of the concept of “mankind in general.” We are to use this notion as a limiting concept. We are not to forget for a moment that no such thing exists in any pure state. We are therefore to witness to men that in themselves they are enemies of God. We are to witness to them that this enmity appears even in such dimensions as that of counting and weighing. This is done if, among other things, we build separate Christian day schools. And we are to oppose men more definitely to the extent that they become epistemologically more self-conscious. To say to the anti-Christ that God loves sinners, and therefore may love him, is to cast pearls before swine. For all that, we still need the concept of “mankind in general.” We are to think of non-believers as members of the mass of humankind in which the process of differentiation has not yet been completed. [the wheat and the tares are not fully mature yet] It is not to the righteous and to the unrighteous as fully differentiated that God gives His rain and sunshine. It is not to unbelievers as those that have with full self-consciousness expressed their unbelief that we are to give our gifts. We are to give our “rain and sunshine” as God gives them, on the basis of the limiting concept, to the as yet undifferentiated or at least not fully differentiated mass of mankind.

By thus substituting the ideas of earlier and later for lower and higher we may get something approaching a solution to the question of territories. There is no single territory or dimension in which believers and non-believers have all things wholly in common. As noted above, even the description of facts in the lowest dimension presupposes a system of metaphysics and epistemology. So there can be no neutral territory of cooperation. Yet unbelievers are more self-conscious epistemologically in the dimension of religion than in the dimension of mathematics. The process of differentiation has not proceeded as far in the lower, as it has in the higher dimensions. Does not this fact explain to some extent our attitude in practice? We seek, on the one hand, to make men epistemologically self-conscious [one knows why he knows] all along the line. As Reformed Christians we do all we can, by building our own educational institutions and otherwise, to make men see that so-called neutral weighing and measuring is a terrible sin in the sight of God. To ignore God anywhere is to insult the God who has told us that, whether we eat or drink or do anything else, we are to do all to His glory. But when all the reprobate are epistemologically self-conscious, the crack of doom has come. [in other words, e.g., the sin of the Amorites is now complete, it's come to its full measure, ripe for God's judgment.] The fully self-conscious reprobate will do all he can in every dimension to destroy the people of God. So while we seek with all our power to hasten the process of differentiation in every dimension we are yet thankful, on the other hand, for “the day of grace,” the day of undeveloped differentiation. Such tolerance as we receive on the part of the world is due to this fact that we live in the earlier, rather than the later, stage of history. And such influence on the public situation as we can effect, whether in society or in state, presupposes this undifferentiated stage of development. [fascinating!]

excellent insight here on the hypocrite:

And this tolerance, on the one hand, and influence, on the other hand, extends, in varying degrees, to all dimensions. Because of the fact of undifferentiation we are tolerated in our religious life as we are tolerated in the field of weighing and measuring. And we have influence in the religious life as we have influence in the lower dimensions. [undifferentiated: one has not fully developed into this sinful, fully epistemologically conscious mindset, “hardened of heart” condition where he is willfully waging war against God and knows it.] Those who have no depth of earth yet, sometimes and in some cases, receive with joy the seed of the Word. They have a temporal faith. The problem of the inner ego and the more circumferential aspect of the human person, discussed by Kuyper with the help of the copper-wire illustration, need not much concern us. It is not a question of psychology. Psychologically the whole individual is involved even to the depth of his being. When he receives the witness of the living God through nature about him, through his conscience within him, and by means of the preaching of the gospel, he is deeply engaged psychologically in an interpretative endeavor. But this deep psychological interpretative endeavor, by which he joins to himself all the multitudinous forms of the voice of God, is still, itself, merely the revelational voice of God. The question of his ethical response has not yet been broached. The real question is one of epistemology and therewith of man’s ethical attitude toward God. If men were fully self-conscious epistemologically they would violently suppress the psychologically interpretative voice within them. But to the extent that they are not self-conscious epistemologically, they may even taste of the heavenly gift, be made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and taste the good word of God and the powers of the world to come, and not rebel. [incredible insight here!! this explains why it is too hard to discern false brethren and how many can be self-deceived.] They allow themselves to be affected by it to some extent. It is the nostalgia of the prodigal who has left the father’s home but sometimes has misgivings. On his way to the far country he may halt, he may even turn back for a distance, thinking that after all it was good and natural for a son to be in the father’s home. Soon he will crucify unto himself the Son of God afresh, but for the moment the voice of God drowns out his own. He is at the moment not at all himself; he is not yet fully himself.

It is thus that we finally come to some fruitful insight into the problem of civil righteousness or the works of non-regenerate men. It is not that in some lower dimension no differentiation, epistemological or psychological, needs to be made by believers. It is not that there is even a square foot of neutral territory. It is not that in the field of civics or justice, any more than in any other particular dimension, men, to the extent that they are epistemologically self-conscious, show any righteousness. The problem, as already suggested, faces us in every dimension. There are non-believers who go to church, there are those who give to the cause of missions. Nor are they hypocrites, properly speaking. The hypocrite is a person who is epistemologically self-conscious to a large degree. He “joins the church” for the sake of reward. He may very well do the works of the law externally. Dillinger often walked well-dressed in fashionable society. May not a criminal give many and fine Christmas presents today to those whom he plans to murder tomorrow? He does the works of the law. Schilder makes much of the fact that the works of the law may be thus externally performed. But the problem cannot be settled in this fashion. The very existence of the hypocrite requires us to go back of the hypocrite. To be able to act the hypocrite he must know the requirements of proper society thoroughly. How does he know the requirements of society? Because he has mingled in society and has had its requirements inscribed upon him as a demand. The very possibility of self-conscious hypocrisy presupposes an earlier undifferentiated state. It is from that undifferentiated stage that we must make our beginning.

Schilder insists that we are not to interpret Paul's words in Rom 2.14 as though they meant that the heathen do the works of the law by their own nature. This is in itself true enough. Yet it is equally true that the question of general revelation is of basic importance for an understanding of Paul's words. The fact of general revelation may, and must, always be presupposed. Schilder himself allows for this possibility. When seeking to explain the passage, he employs the idea of the remnants of the image of God and the idea of God's general providence. Yet he holds that the first reason for the performance of the works of the law, on the part of the reprobate, must be found in their sinful nature. The sinner, says Schilder, does the works of the law hypocritically. That is to say, Schilder would have us make a large degree of epistemological self-consciousness on the part of the non-believer the chief and primary point of departure. We shall get further in stating Paul's meaning if we make a low stage of epistemological self-consciousness our starting point. Paul is not saying that we deal with a group of people that are master simulators, having been in contact with the highest requirements of the law of God, and a group that is able to "dress as well as the best." On the contrary he is arguing that even those who have not had the special revelation of the oracles of God given to the Jews must yet be said to be sinners, that is, covenant-breakers. All men need the justice of God, for all are sinners. Yet there is no sin unless there be transgression and there is no transgression unless there be knowledge of the law.

Sidebar comment: And not only is there transgression from the knowledge of the law, but their witness of the miracles that Jesus did acerbates their judgment for their transgressions, John 15: 24-25, ²⁴ If I had not done among them the works which no one else did, they would not have sin; but now they have both seen and hated Me and My Father as well. ²⁵ But they have done this to fulfill the word that is written in their Law, 'They hated Me without a cause.'

Having not the externally promulgated law, the heathen yet have enough knowledge of the law or will of God to render them without excuse. Do some think that the wrath of God is revealed upon the heathen unjustly on the ground that they have no knowledge of the will of God? Let them realize, says Paul in effect, that the revelation of God is present with all men everywhere. Let them know that even from the beginning of history this knowledge has been about all men everywhere. All men are responsible for the original positive revelation of God to mankind, as well as for the natural revelation that still surrounds them. Do some wonder whether that revelation of God has been persistent and insistent? Let them realize that that revelation is so close to all men as to be psychologically one with them. It is so close to them that, in spite of all their efforts to bury it, it speaks through their own moral consciousness. The law of God as a demand of God is written on their very hearts. The Westminster Confession does not hesitate to say that the law, not merely the works of the law but the law itself, was originally written on man's heart. And the reference given for that statement is Rom 2.14–15. To this is then added the fact that man originally had a true epistemological reaction to this revelation of God. Man was created in “knowledge, righteousness and true holiness.” This original, true, epistemological reaction in paradise is in turn revelational and therefore further requisite for the sinner.

Sin has not been able to efface all this requisitional material from the consciousness of man. The very activity of his consciousness is a daily reminder to him of the will of God. Though he has tried over and over again to choke the voice of God he has not been able to do so. His evil nature would fain subdue the voice of the creation nature, but it cannot wholly do so. Involuntarily men think back, with the prodigal, to the father’s home. And when the prodigal turns his face momentarily toward the father’s house there comes to him the voice of approval. He may “with joy” receive the gospel though he have no depth of earth. On the other hand, when he reasserts his true self, his self that is on the way to the swine-trough, there is still a voice pursuing him, this time the voice of disapproval. So he wavers as an unfinished product. He does the works of the law not as the devil or as the anti-Christ does them. They do them as arch-simulators of Christ and His people. The devil appears as an angel of light. Hypocrites imitate him. It is not thus that the average non-believer does them. If such were the case, the end of time would be here. If all non-believers did the works of the law primarily from their self-consciously developed evil nature they would, by force of their principle, seek to wipe all believers off the face of the earth. But “the man of sin,” the “son of perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God,” is restrained (2 Thes. 2:3–4). When no longer restrained he will attempt to make hypocrites of all unbelievers. He will work “with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they receive not the love of the truth that they might be saved” (2 Thes. 2:10). In punishment for their sin “God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness” (2 Thes. 2:11–12). Till such time as the “son of perdition” has not been given free power, and till such time as God has not in that connection sent a strong spirit of delusion, mankind in general is not fully self-conscious of its inherent opposition to God. The pressure of God’s revelation upon men is so great that they are, from their own point of view, in a sort of stupor. With the prodigal they are on the way to the swine-trough, but with the prodigal they have misgivings in leaving the father’s house. The heathen have such misgivings; those that hear the gospel may have such misgivings in a greater measure, as they taste the powers of the age to come.

In this manner the ideas of God’s general providence, his general revelation, the remnants of the image of God in man, the general external call of the gospel, and man’s evil nature may be brought into something of a harmonious unity. All things happen according to God’s providence. That is basic. There is, according to this providence, to be a development in the direction of evil and a development in the direction of the good. These two developments grow in conjunction, in correlativity, with one another. Therefore, all factors must be taken into consideration in all the problems with which we have to deal. The general development of history, of which the two developments mentioned are subdivisions, comes about through God’s presentation of Himself as He is, in varying degrees of self-revelation, to man, plus man's reaction to this presentation. God always presents Himself as He is. His attributes face man as man faces God. The revelation of God is always objectively valid. The greatest obscuration the sin of man can cast over the face of nature and his own consciousness, cannot destroy the validity of revelation. Vanity and corruption are, to be sure, seen in nature. But men ought, argues Calvin, to see even this as evidence of God's presence, of God's presence in judgment. Evil is found in man's heart. Again, even this is evidence of God's presence; man is pursued by the voice of accusing conscience. When the accusing conscience challenges the wisdom of his choice against God, the voice of God is heard again. The prodigal turns about for a moment, stands still, takes a few steps back, his conscience approving, his emotional life responding with joy; the remnants of the image of God appear even while he is on his general downward path. In some cases the gospel call is heard. This tends to make some of those that hear it walk back a little farther still. But underneath it all the evil nature is operative. That nature accounts for the fact that all this turning and yearning is temporary and has not arisen from true faith in God. That nature accounts for the fact that the sinner will soon turn with more determination than ever toward the swine-trough. Even if he continues to do the works of the law, as well he may, he will do them more and more self-consciously for the sake of reward. Finally, he may become a worthy disciple of Satan who may appear as an angel of light to deceive, if it were possible, the very elect of God.

Excerpts from Lane Tipton's book,
The Trinitarian Theology of Cornelius Van Til

Preface

This volume expounds the doctrine of the Trinity in Cornelius Van Til's system of thought. Van Til developed classical Reformed Trinitarianism and federalism with what he termed "the representational principle,” providing an account of God’s intra-Trinitarian life in contrast to all forms of subordinationism and offering a vision of God’s relation to the world that opposes all forms of correlativism (a mutually interdependent relationship) and mutualism (i.e., the notion that God, as Creator, participates in the change of the creature or that the creature participates in the essence of the Creator)...

The Self-Contained Trinity

An Orientation to Van Til’s Doctrine of God

Cornelius Van Til’s Trinitarian theology stands out uniquely in the twentieth century as a robust and self-conscious integration of the English Puritan and Continental Dutch confessional traditions. His application of confessional, Reformed Trinitarian theology to the development of classical federalism in dialogue with modern philosophy and theology constitutes a pioneering development in the history of Reformed theology. His penetrating engagement with Roman Catholic and Modernist theology offers great reward to those who are willing to read him with the patience and care needed to understand and appreciate one of the most profound theological minds of the past century.

A responsible reading of Van Til will turn up a distinctively Reformed conception of the triune God in covenantal relation to image-bearing creatures that does not appear in traditional Roman Catholic or Modernist (e.g., Barthian) alternatives. The integration of confessionally Reformed Trinitarian theology and classically Reformed federalism left a discernable impression on Van Til’s theology, which was indebted to John Calvin, the Westminster Confession of Faith, Herman Bavinck, Geerhardus Vos, Charles Hodge, and A. A. Hodge.

Under these theological influences, Van Til offered definite conceptions of the self-contained triune God in his covenantal relation to image-bearing creatures. He believed that every error in Trinitarian theology stems from either conceiving of God as a participant in the becoming of the image-bearing creature or conceiving of the image-bearing creature as a partaker of the substance of the Godhead. The former error appears in various forms of Modernism as expressed by Schleiermacher or Barth; the latter error occurs in traditional Roman Catholicism as found in Thomas Aquinas and Robert Bellarmine.

In contrast to both forms of error, Van Til strongly defended the confessional truths that God remains “most absolute” and “immutable” in his relation to image-bearing creatures (WCF 2.1) and that image-bearing creatures are not “in any wise partakers of the substance of his Godhead” (WCF 26.3). God does not partake of the contingency and change that characterize the creature any more than the creature partakes of the simplicity and immutability that characterize the Creator. The Creator-creature distinction is maintained at every point in the Creator-creature relation. [see codeCC1 and see code482 on chance]

In the language that permeates Van Til’s published corpus, he sought to avoid every form of correlativism, whether it be the doctrine that God and man exist together in a mutual relation of dynamic change (the Modernist and Barthian error) or that man is reproportioned above his human nature to partake of the substance of God (the Roman Catholic error). Van Til was concerned that such mutualizing conceptions would eviscerate the catholic and Reformed doctrine of the immutable and absolute triune God in his covenantal relation to image-bearing creatures.

In his 1955 work, The Defense of the Faith, Van Til asserts that his “doctrine of God”¹ has been “self-consciously set in opposition to all forms of non-Christian thought which compromise or deny the self-contained character [of God] by thinking of him (or it) as correlative to the universe.”² Over against all forms of correlativism that teach that God changes in relation to creation, ranging from Absolute Idealism to Process Theism, Van Til maintains that “we speak of the immutability of God. Naturally God does not and cannot change since there is nothing besides his own eternal Being on which he depends (Mal. 3:6; James 1:17).”³ Van Til therefore insists that “the attributes of God are not to be thought of otherwise than as aspects of the one simple original being; the attributes of God are not characteristics that God has developed gradually; they are fundamental to his being.”⁴ Van Til is quick to add that each Trinitarian person subsists distinctly as the undivided essence of God, and this entails that “no one of the persons of the trinity can be said to be correlative in its being to anything that exists beyond the Godhead.”⁵ The self-contained triune God does not exist in a correlative relation to the universe, with each side of the relation characterized by mutual change.⁶

This means that the immutability of God is not a lifeless or inert conception. [a very important point that Thomas Weinandy makes; go to code422 & codeinert] The immutable triune God is characterized by a fullness of self-determined and self-contained activity. Van Til observes, “God is life in himself.”⁷ He elaborates: “Thinking of the infinity of God in relation to time in this manner, we therefore think of that fulness of internal activity of which the movement in the temporally conditioned universe is a created replica.”⁸ The self-contained triune God relates to the creature as the absolute and living tripersonal God. The Trinitarian persons of the Godhead possess a self-contained and fully actualized dynamism that admits of no change or modification in relation to creation (Jas. 1:17). This self-contained Trinitarian life supplies the archetype after which God patterns the being and activity of the image-bearing creature.

Van Til’s concern to avoid correlativism moves one step further. Van Til not only maintains that the absolute and condescended triune Creator does not participate in the becoming of the creature (see WCF 2.1), but also insists that the creature does not partake in any way of the substance of the Godhead (see WCF 26.3). The former we could term front-door mutualism; the latter we could term back-door mutualism. In front-door mutualism, the triune God is claimed to participate in the temporal becoming of the creature by sharing in some third thing along with the creature (see Barth’s concept of God’s “third time” for us in the Christ-event).⁹ In back-door mutualism, the creature is claimed to participate in the being of God by way of an ontological reportioning supplied by the infused grace of the donum superadditum.¹⁰

Van Til reasons that while “man is the created image-bearer of God, God communicates to man a being similar to his own.”¹¹ Yet he immediately adds that “that communication is then not a participation in the eternal being of God, but is the finite replication of the divine being.”¹² As Van Til wrote in a letter to Carl F. H. Henry, seeking to avoid both front-door and back-door mutualism, we must “think of eternity as exclusively a characteristic of God and of time as exclusively a characteristic of the created world.” Any commingling of the two proves “fatal” to true religion.¹³ The triune God no more partakes of man’s temporal becoming in his work of creation than man by nature and infused grace partakes of the eternal substance of the Godhead.

This leads Van Til to oppose both ancient and modern species of front-door and back-door mutualism. Whether it be the analogia temporis of Barth or the analogia entis of Roman Catholicism,¹⁴ he says, “the idea of identifying man’s being with his participation in the act of God’s saving him is really only the modern equivalent of the Greek notion of identifying man with his participation in the changeless being of God.”¹⁵ Whether it be the front-door mutualism that makes God a participant in change and time, or the back-door mutualism that makes man a partaker of the substance of the Godhead,¹⁶ Van Til stands out as perhaps the staunchest critic in the twentieth century of all species of correlativism and mutualism.¹⁷

This book supplies a sustained account of the classical Reformed Trinitarianism and federalism that Van Til presents as the comprehensive alternative to all forms of correlativism and mutualism. The theological foundations of the confessional Trinitarianism summarized by A. A. Hodge, the conception of the absolute personality of the triune God set forth by Herman Bavinck, the autothean¹⁸ doctrine of absolute Trinitarian persons developed by John Calvin, the living Trinitarian persons who exhaustively indwell one another in relations of coinherence as set forth by Francis Turretin and Charles Hodge, and “the deeper Protestant conception”¹⁹ of the image of God and the doctrine of the covenant of works expounded by Geerhardus Vos all converge to forge what Van Til termed the “representational principle.” Van Til’s representational principle is the programmatic response of confessional Reformed Trinitarianism and federalism to various expressions of correlativism and mutualism. The representational principle necessitates Van Til’s distinctive apologetical method of defending the truth of Reformed Trinitarianism and federalism as a unit.

Dr. Lane Tipton comments on Theistic Mutualism:

One way to try to describe what theistic mutualism is saying is this: typically mutualists will affirm that when you talk about the Creator-creature distinction initially, just God in himself, that God is immutable, self-contained, simple and um all of the classical attributes are affirmed – typically. Even Karl Barth will go so far as to affirm them. But the problem with mutualism is that when God relates to the creation, God, in that relation enters into a process of development along with the creation so that both God and creation are in a common mutual process of self-actualization of actualizing unactualized potential together in a common process of mutual evolution and development. And um, It’s become I think particularly problematic since the Enlightenment – it’s not an exclusively enlightenment problem by any stretch of the imagination; all ancient heresies at the end of the day are mutualistic in character I think, in one way or another. Ah, but particularly in the 19th and 20th century, in the shadow of Kant and Hegel and others – that what is affirmed in the creator-creature distinction, is denied in essence in the creator-creature relation; and um, and in so doing that, the divine and the human, the divine and the creaturely are commingled in various ways.

Notes on Pantheism by Van Til

Van Til states from his book, An Introduction to Systematic Theology p 204: In Paradise God walked and talked with man. Man needs God near to him. Even in the state of sin man has realized something of the need of a God who is near him. In fact, the sinner has brought God too near to him; he has identified the Creature with the creature. In idolatry we have an expression on the part of the sinner that points to his need of a God who is near.

Side note on pantheism:

Van Til's mentor, Abraham Kuyper was particularly concerned about the intrusion of pantheism into the church and the West. His principle concern was that by identifying God with ideals like progress, the boundaries between God and the world are blurred, and God becomes severely limited. See his "Pantheism's Destruction of Boundaries," in Methodist Review 75 (1893): 520-37; 762-78. – An Introduction to Systematic Theology, Van Til, pg 320 note 4

Van Til states on page 369:

In saying that God is a Spirit we do not think of some vague generic concept of spirituality of which God is one particular instance and man another. God is the absolute Spirit. He is the self-contained Spirit. He does not need materiality over against himself in order to individuate himself. He is the self-individuated Spirit. [In other words, I think Van Til is saying here, that God is not in an act of becoming via a correlative relationship with his creation – i.e., a pantheistic view. He is entirely distinct from his creation and he already is! and that by or of himself, a se. He is not becoming more conscious of himself nor coming into his own so to speak (becoming individuated), through a correlative relationship by being one with creation in the ongoing changes characteristic of all creatures. For one thing, God is immutable.]

The Immutable Triune Creator

The Deeper Protestant Conception of the Creator-Creature Relation

pg21-29

The basic structure and theological content of Van Til's notion of the Creator-creature relation are indebted to what Vos in his Reformed Dogmatics terms the "deeper Protestant conception."²⁰ From the divine side, Vos teaches that the triune God remains absolute and immutable in his sovereignly willed relation to creation. From the human side, Vos argues that image-bearing Adam was created in natural religious fellowship with God and was constituted by covenant the federal head of the race. It is worth sketching this deeper Protestant conception from both the divine and the human sides in order then to outline Van Til's appropriation and enrichment of it.

The Deeper Protestant Conception from the Divine Side:

Vos and Van Til on the Creator-Creature Relation

Writing on the topic of creation in the first volume of his Reformed Dogmatics, Vos argues that creation was a “transitive act” that occurred “in time,” even though that transitive act was the work of the absolute triune Creator, in whom “no time distinction exists.”²¹ For this reason, creation did not and does not involve any change in God. Rather, the work of creation expressed the willing agency of the absolute and unchanging triune God. The triune God remains absolute as the Creator in his sovereignly willed relation to the world.

Vos quotes Voetius and follows the classical Reformed tradition on this matter. He argues:

Creation, actively considered, is not a real change because by it God is not changed by that act; it only requires a new relationship of the Creator to what is created. And this new relation, which is not real in God, can therefore not effect a real change in Him.²²

The absolute God remains unchanged both behind (ad intra) and in (ad extra) the relation wrought in the work of creation. The relation changes. Creatures in the relation change. But the simple and immutable triune Creator does not change. The mystery therefore resides in the fact that the Creator freely wills a “new relation” to creation that introduces no change in God, even as he actively relates to creation.

Good notes on pantheism:

Vos defines immutability as “that perfection in God whereby He is exalted above all becoming and development, as well as above all diminution, and remains the same eternally.”²³ And in answer to the question of why it is “necessary” to emphasize God’s immutability in his relation to creation, Vos explains that it is necessary “because pantheism teaches that within God there is development, indeed, that the development of the world is nothing other than the process whereby God comes to self-consciousness.”²⁴ The doctrine of divine immutability, the notion that the triune Creator remains essentially and personally unchanged in relation to creation, provides a safeguard against all species of pantheism. Pantheism is not merely the crass notion that all created things are indistinguishable from God. According to Vos, pantheism encompasses any view that God and the creation are submerged in a common time and engaged in mutual change. Pantheism, as Vos defines it, could easily function as a virtual synonym for correlativism as Van Til defines it.

Having rejected every permutation of pantheism, Vos asks the following question: “How are the creation of the world and God’s actions in time to be brought into agreement with His immutability?” He answers, “We must believe that all these deeds do not effect any change in God, since they do not require time in Him, although naturally their realization falls within time.”²⁵ This is precisely the locus of the mystery of the God-world relation from the standpoint of the deeper Protestant conception. The mystery is not that God takes mutable properties to himself as Creator in order to facilitate a give-and-take relationship between a mutable deity and mutable creatures. Rather, the mystery is that the self-contained triune God wills a bona fide relation to mutable creatures in time without himself participating in time and without himself undergoing change of any sort over time (Mal. 3:6; Jas. 1:17).

Van Til, following Vos, insists that the self-contained and immutable triune God related to Adam in creation and covenant without any modification within himself. In the work of creation, Van Til emphasizes, the triune God does not participate in man’s temporal becoming in a Christ-event (Barth)—nor does man, through the ontologically reportioning grace of the donum superadditum, participate in God’s eternal being (Roman Catholicism).²⁶ This means that God remains absolute at every point in his relationship with Adam, and Adam remains the creature at every point in his relationship with God. God does not undergo some sovereignly willed internal permutation or take to himself extrinsic properties of a temporal and mutable sort to relate to Adam as the created image of God. Neither does Adam receive infused deifying grace that enables a progressively ascending participation in the divine essence and eternal processions of the Godhead.

Van Til makes this point trenchantly in a letter to Carl F. H. Henry:

Starting with the Creator-creature distinction as basic to one's thought one need not and in fact cannot after that discuss such concepts as time and eternity by themselves. . . . As then it is fatal to fail to introduce the Creator creature distinction at the outset of one's thought so it is also fatal to fail to think of eternity as exclusively a characteristic of God and of time as exclusively a characteristic of the created world. It would be to make God subject to the conditions of his creatures, subject to change etc.²⁷

Notes on Pantheism by Van Til

Van Til states from his book, An Introduction to Systematic Theology p 204: In Paradise God walked and talked with man. Man needs God near to him. Even in the state of sin man has realized something of the need of a God who is near him. In fact, the sinner has brought God too near to him; he has identified the Creator with the creature. In idolatry we have an expression on the part of the sinner that points to his need of a God who is near.

codeCC1 Van Til states: The distinction between the approach of the "ancient" mind and the "modern" mind is not fundamental. The "objectivism" of the ancient mind is only gradationally distinct from the "subjectivism" of the modern mind. There is not true transcendence in Platonism, Aristotelianism, or Stoicism, any more than there is in modern existentialism and dialecticism.

The only distinction that will set off the Christian Approach to knowledge and reality and therefore also the Christian doctrine of revelation from the non-Christian views is that between the fully Protestant or Reformed view that does, and the general non-Christian view, whether ancient or modern, whether rationalist or irrationalist, that does not make the Creator-creature distinction basic to its thought. There are those who serve and worship God, and those who serve and worship man. Calvin most adequately represents the former, and modern existentialism and pragmatism most adequately represent the latter. Thomas Aquinas seeks to combine the two positions. Pg 202 Into to Systematic Theology

Side note on pantheism:

Van Til's mentor, Abraham Kuyper was particularly concerned about the intrusion of pantheism into the church and the West. His principle concern was that by identifying God with ideals like progress, the boundaries between God and the world are blurred, and God becomes severely limited. See his "Pantheism's Destruction of Boundaries," in Methodist Review 75 (1893): 520-37; 762-78. – An Introduction to Systematic Theology, Van Til, pg 320 note 4

Van Til states on page 369:

In saying that God is a Spirit we do not think of some vague generic concept of spirituality of which God is one particular instance and man another. God is the absolute Spirit. He is the self-contained Spirit. He does not need materiality over against himself in order to individuate himself. He is the self-individuated Spirit. [In other words, I think was Van Til is saying here, that God is not in an act of becoming via a correlative relationship with his creation – i.e., a pantheistic view. He is entirely distinct from his creation and he already is! and that by or of himself, a se. He is not becoming more conscious of himself nor coming into his own so to speak (becoming individuated), through a correlative relationship by being one with creation in the ongoing changes characteristic of all creatures. For one thing, God is immutable.]

Van Til insists that we must never at any point commingle the eternal Creator and the temporal creature in the Creator-creature relation. God is not at any point in his relation to creation subject to the conditions of time and change. God does not in creation participate in Adam’s becoming—any more than Adam, by infused deifying grace, participates in God’s being. The Creator-creature distinction must be maintained at every point in the Creator-creature relation. The immutability that characterizes God in distinction from the creature continues without qualification to characterize God in his relation to the creature (Mal. 3:6; Jas. 1:17).

Van Til’s understanding of anthropomorphic language comports with his understanding of the Creator-creature relation. The Scriptures express the actions of the immutable and self-contained triune God in conceptual categories borrowed from creaturely activity. For instance, the Scriptures teach that God “hovers” over creation (Gen. 1:2) or “walks” in the garden of Eden (Gen. 3:8). God’s actions are presented in finite and temporal avian and human terms, even though God is neither finite nor temporal. Anthropomorphic language, therefore, expresses the agency of the eternal and immutable triune God in temporal and mutable categories borrowed from the realm of creation.

Van Til follows Herman Bavinck’s treatment of anthropomorphic language. Bavinck explains it thoroughly, and we quote him at some length, in order to highlight its nature and function in classical Reformed theology:

Scripture necessarily speaks of God in anthropomorphic language. Yet, however anthropomorphic its language, it at the same time prohibits us from positing any change in God himself. There is change around, about, and outside of him, and there is change in people’s relations to him, but there is no change in God himself. . . . There is nothing intermediate between these two classes of categories: a deep chasm separates God’s being from that of all creatures. It is a mark of God’s greatness that he can condescend to the level of his creatures and that, though transcendent, he can dwell immanently in all created beings. Without losing himself, God can give himself, and, while absolutely maintaining his immutability, he can enter into an infinite number of relations to his creatures. . . . We should not picture God as putting himself in any relation to any creature of his as though it could even in any way exist without him. Rather, he himself puts all things in those relations to himself, which he eternally and immutably wills—precisely in the way in which and at the time at which these relations occur. There is absolutely no “before” or “after” in God; these words apply only to things that did not exist before, but do exist afterward.²⁸

Bavinck’s work supplies the backdrop for Van Til’s conception of “fearless anthropomorphism” as he expounds the logic of the Creator-creature relation. Let us highlight three features of Bavinck’s presentation in this regard that are worthy of our attention.

First, Bavinck makes it clear that “anthropomorphic language . . . prohibits us from positing any change in God himself.”²⁹ There is “change around, about, and outside of him, and there is change in people’s relations to him, but there is no change in God himself.”³⁰ Anthropomorphic language staunchly defends the absolute immutability of God and prohibits ascribing change to him as he relates to creation and acts in time. There is change in the creature; there is change in the relation; but there is no change in any sense in God himself.

Anthropomorphic language ascribes the qualities of the creature to God's acts in time. But such language is never intended by Reformed theologians to be taken in a univocal way, as though God literally possesses creaturely qualities. God's acts in time do not require him to be temporal. God acts in the contingent and historical order of creation do not require him to be contingent and historical. God's acts in relation to mutable and passible creatures do not require that he be mutable and passible like the creature. There is no point of univocity between the Creator and the creature—no mutual sharing in mutability and temporality. Thus, anthropomorphic language analogically depicts the actions of the immutable and impassible triune God in language and concepts borrowed from the creature. Such an analogical conception of anthropomorphic language prohibits ascribing to God in his works ad extra the change and development resident in the creature.

Second, anthropomorphic language demands that there be “nothing intermediate” between these two categories. There is the Creator, and there is the creature. There is no tertium quid that we must posit in order somehow to relate them to one another. God, as the Creator, relates to man, as the creature, precisely in the sovereignly willed relation established by creation (image of God) and in special providence (covenant). In that relation, God's self-contained and underived being and independent activity is at every point distinguished from the derived being and dependent activity of man.

Skip to pg 31

Van Til invokes in his work the logic of Vos's deeper Protestant conception of God's personal absoluteness and immutability expressed in the work of creation and in the event of the incarnation. The divine person of the Son cannot be eradicated or changed as he relates to creation or assumes a human nature. Van Til also follows Bavinck in the way he uses anthropomorphic language to express the mystery that characterizes the personal immutability of the triune Creator. These influences lead Van Til to advocate a “fearless anthropomorphism” as he sets forth the theology of the relation of the “changeless” triune God to the changing created world.³⁷

Along these lines, Van Til says that “the immanent relations within the three persons of the holy trinity are the foundation of the relations which the triune God sustains to the world.”³⁸ The immanent relations are foundational in the sense that the self-contained triune persons relate without modification to creation. He continues, “Unless we maintain the basic importance of the ontological trinity, God becomes involved in a dynamism of chance.”³⁹ The key premise Van Til maintains is that the self-contained and living persons of the Godhead remain such in the new relation to creation. Anthropomorphic language, then, is self-consciously designed in Reformed theology proper to oppose the notion that the persons of the Trinity undergo transmutation of any sort in the works of God ad extra.⁴⁰ To be “fearlessly anthropomorphic,” as Van Til advocates, involves giving full expression to the absolute and living Trinitarian persons, who relate as such to creation without undergoing any change of any kind.

Van Til's insistence that God remains immutable in relation to creation is rooted in divine aseity. [God is of himself] In The Defense of the Faith, he strongly maintains “the independence or aseity of God.”⁴¹ Van Til is explicit that “by this is meant that God is in no sense correlative to or dependent upon anything beside his own being. God is the source of his own being, or rather the term source cannot be applied to God. God is absolute. He is sufficient unto himself.”⁴² Van Til insists that God a se relates to creation without himself changing, so that “we speak of the immutability of God. Naturally God does not and cannot change since there is nothing besides his own eternal Being on which he depends (Mal 3:6; Jas. 1:17).”⁴³ God's aseity supplies the interior logic for his immutability in relation to creation. God, in his covenantal relation to his people, remains “absolute” and “cannot change” precisely because in his new relation of creation “there is nothing besides his own eternal Being on which he depends (Mal. 3:6; Jas. 1:17).”⁴⁴ The Scripture proof texts cited by Van Til bring into view (1) God's redemptive covenantal relation to his people in Malachi 3:6 and (2) the Father's personal relation to creation as the giver of every good and perfect gift in James 1:17. The triune God “is in no sense correlative to or dependent on anything beside his own being” in the sovereignly willed “new relation” to the created world.

Footnotes:

37. Van Til observes that “we are entitled and compelled to use anthropomorphism not apologetically but fearlessly. We need not fear to say that God’s attitude has changed with respect to mankind. We know well enough that God in himself is changeless. But we hold that we are able to affirm that our words have meaning for no other reason than that we use them analogically.” Cornelius Van Til, Common Grace and the Gospel (Nutley, NJ: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1972), 73. It is not an analogical use of anthropomorphic language to say that God’s attitude changes if we mean by that univocal or literal change as found in the fluctuating attitudes of creatures. Van Til denies that God takes on accidental attributes that develop over time by which his attitude might change. When we say that God’s attitude has changed, or that he “now knows” Abraham believes him (Gen. 22:18), or is “grieved” over the wickedness of man (Gen. 6:6), or “hovers” over the formless void (Gen. 1:2), or “walks” with Adam and Eve in Eden (Gen. 3:8), we are speaking analogically regarding the relation of the immutable and living triune God to the changing creature. Anthropomorphism, as defined by Bavinck and Van Til, prohibits the notion that God literally changes in any way in his relation to creation before or after the fall (Mal. 3:6; Jas. 1:17). Anthropomorphic language describes the activity of the self-contained triune God in his relation to creation in terms and concepts borrowed from the creation. Mutable creaturely activity replicates on a creaturely level the immutable fullness of the triune God’s activity in relation to creation. It would be a supreme instance of category confusion to attribute to God the mutable qualities of the creature and call that fearless anthropomorphism. 38. Cornelius Van Til, The Theology of James Daane (Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1959), 35. 39. Van Til, The Theology of James Daane, 35.

40. John Frame advocates for a species of theistic mutualism when he posits two modes of existence in God. The former mode denotes God’s timelessness and immutability apart from creation, and the latter denotes God’s temporality and mutability in relation to creation. He is explicit that “there are two modes of existence in God.” John M. Frame, The Doctrine of God, A Theology of Lordship (Phillipsburg, NJ: P&R Publishing, 2002), 572. The first is an “atemporal” mode of existence, and the second is the “historical” mode of existence (p. 571). Frame’s central claim is that the historical mode of existence in God “begins with creation itself” (p. 571). Frame is explicit that “history involves constant change, and so, as an agent in history, God himself changes” (p. 571). God’s relation to creation involves a sovereign transmutation into the interiority of time and change—a true participation in the temporal order of creation. James Dolezal, in his useful critique of Frame’s species of theistic mutualism, observes: “God’s act of creating is where Frame locates the origin of His temporality.” James E. Dolezal, All That Is in God: Evangelical Theology and the Challenge of Classical Christian Theism (Grand Rapids: Reformation Heritage Books, 2017), 94.

The Deeper Protestant Conception from the Human Side: Image of God and Covenant or Image of God and Donum?

Pg 36-45

Matching the deeper Protestant conception from the divine side, Vos speaks of the deeper Protestant conception from the human side. By virtue of the work of creation, Adam was formed from the dust of the earth and given the breath of life as the created image of God (Gen. 1:27; 2:7). By virtue of God's voluntary condescension in an act of special providence that the Reformed call "covenant" (Gen. 2:8–17), God offered Adam advancement beyond his natural religious fellowship in Eden into a confirmed and unbreakable fellowship with God beyond probation in Sabbath rest (Gen. 2:2). Adam's ultimate "blessedness and reward" under the covenant of works would be the immutable and condescended triune God himself (WCF 7.1). Adam could realize the eschatological potency inherent in the natural religious fellowship with God in which he was created through perfect obedience to God under the covenant of works. Confirmed fellowship with the triune God in heavenly Sabbath rest would comprise Adam's blessedness and reward beyond probation in earthly Eden (Gen. 2:2; Heb. 4:4; Rom. 8:17; Ps. 73:25–26).

Vos penetrates to the creational core of the "new relation" from the human side of the deeper Protestant conception. He begins by observing that "in the idea that one forms of the image is reflected one's idea of the religious state of man and of the essence of religion itself."⁴⁸ What precisely is "the essence of religion itself" or "the religious state of man" on which true religion depends? Adam was endowed in the work of creation with "life in communion with God."⁴⁹ The image of God means that, for pre-fall Adam, "above all that he is disposed for communion with God, that all the capacities of his soul can act in a way that corresponds to their destiny only if they rest in God."⁵⁰

To clarify this "deeper Protestant conception"⁵¹ regarding the religious essence of man as the image of God, Vos contrasts it with the deeper Catholic conception. Vos argues that Rome's deficient understanding of the image of God, coupled with its defective doctrine of original sin, conspire to render Roman Catholic theology incapable of affirming that the created image of God includes natural religious fellowship with God.⁵²

Classical Roman Catholic theology denies that Adam was created in natural religious fellowship with God. Vos said that, for the deeper Catholic conception, it is "only by something that raises him above his created nature," that is, by a supernatural endowment, that Adam is enabled to "become a religious being, able to love, to enjoy his God, and to live in Him."⁵³ For classical Roman Catholic theology, the imago Dei does not itself include natural religious fellowship with God. The deeper Catholic conception therefore posits a supernatural gift, a donum superadditum*, which elevates Adam above his human nature and enables a supernatural fellowship with God. The donum superadditum infuses an ontological and ethical supplement into Adam that inaugurates a supernatural participation in the being of God and begins the process of a graced fellowship with the persons of the Godhead.

Roman Catholic theology accordingly contains an "externalist" religious principle. The externalism rests in the fact that fellowship with God requires a supernatural gift that enables fellowship with God. That supernatural gift raises Adam above his created nature and is in that sense entirely external to him as the natural image of God. Vos says,

Out of this follows entirely the externalist character of Roman Catholic religion. It becomes something added to man, that he has but is not identified with him, does not enter into his essence. That man is like God in this natural sense is a purely deistic relationship.⁵⁴

Fellowship with God in the deeper Catholic conception comes to Adam from a supernatural gift of infused grace and not from a natural creational image endowment. That pinpoints the “externalist character” of the Roman Catholic conception of Adam’s religious relation to God. The religious relation is a graced relation, not a natural relation. The religious relation is superadded to Adam and not natural to him as the image of God.

This nature-grace externalism leads to the defective conception of sin in the deeper Catholic conception. The defect expresses itself in a denial of total depravity. The root problem resides in a “weakened conception of original sin.”⁵⁵ Vos says that according to the classical Roman Catholic theology, man can only lose what was not essential to him, namely the supernaturally added gifts, the dona superaddita. Because of his fall, these are lost. The essence of man, the imago, consisting in formal existence as spirit, in the liberum arbitrium* [freedom of the will], remained. Because, however, there was no inner connection between the similitudo and the imago, the removal of the former cannot essentially change the latter. The liberum arbitrium might be weakened a little; in reality it is unharmed. In other words, by loosening the moral powers from the will, from the capacity of the will, and by denying that the former are natural in man, Rome has in principle appropriated the Pelagian conception of the will as *liberum arbitrium. That is KEY!!! Go to [codefreewill1 for more on this] That capacity of free will has remained, and with that the possibility that man, even after the fall, can do something good.⁵⁶

Vos claims that the deeper Catholic conception draws its doctrine of original sin from Pelagianism and not from Augustinianism. Original sin, on the Roman Catholic view, amounts only to the loss of the supernatural gifts and does not involve the loss of original righteousness or the corruption of the whole nature (see WCF 9.2–3). In Vos’s estimation, the chief errors of the deeper Catholic conception consist in its denial that original righteousness inheres in Adam as the created image of God and in its severing of original righteousness from the operation of image-bearing Adam’s will. Thus, Rome has “in principle” appropriated the Pelagian conception of the will as liberum arbitrium.

In sharp contrast to the deeper Catholic conception, Vos observes that the deeper Protestant conception has maintained that “the image of God and original righteousness are to be identified,” and this means that “life in communion with God belongs to the nature of man and can nowhere be excluded.”⁵⁷ For the deeper Protestant conception, Adam was wholly inclined to God in righteousness before the fall and entirely opposed to God in rebellion after the fall. Thus, Vos summarizes:

According to our conception, our entire nature should not be free from God at any point; the nature of man must be worship from beginning to end. According to the deeper Protestant conception, the image does not exist only in correspondence with God but in being disposed toward God.⁵⁸

Adam was created as the image of God and entirely disposed toward God before the fall, but has lost the moral excellence of original righteousness that was given in the work of creational image endowment. As a result, he hath wholly lost all ability of will to any spiritual good accompanying salvation; so as, a natural man, being altogether averse from that good, and dead in sin,” cannot please God in any way (WCF 9.2; Rom. 8:8). Vos therefore sets the deeper Protestant conception antithetically over against the deeper Catholic conception of the image of God and original sin.

*Robert Strimple on the Image of God and the Donum Superadditum

Robert Strimple's presentation of the Reformed conception of the image of God, together with his critique of the Roman Catholic view, matches Vos's presentation in stunning ways, even though there is no evidence that Strimple read Vos's Reformed Dogmatics and ingested his presentation of the deeper Protestant conception. In his course on "God's Created Image," Strimple details the deeper Catholic conception of the image of God and offers penetrating criticisms.

This is a very good summary by Strimple:

According to Strimple's presentation of the Roman Catholic view of the image of God, Adam was created as the natural image of God, and as such possessed an intrinsic defect that needed an ontological and ethical supplement of supernatural grace in the form of the *donum superadditum—a point that sets the Roman Catholic doctrine of the image of God in the sharpest contrast to the Reformed view.

Regarding the ontological supplement that the donum supplies, Strimple quotes the Roman Catholic Robert Bellarmine, the finest of the Counter-Reformation theologians of the sixteenth century, who argues that by the grace of the donum superadditum Adam was originally "exalted above human nature and made participant in the nature of God."⁵⁹ Creation began an exitus that put Adam as the natural image of God "outside of God" and in need of supernatural grace to inaugurate a reditus to God. The grace given to Adam in the donum superadditum ontologically reportioned him above his created nature to participate in the substance of the Godhead.⁶⁰ The donum superadditum was therefore an ontological supplement that was necessary before the fall to reportion human nature to participate in the divine nature.⁶¹

Footnotes 60, 61 are important: Very interesting conclusions about Aquinas' doctrine! [codeaquinas1]

60. Lawrence Feingold makes the nature of the donum superadditum crystal clear. He says: "Another way to present the relation between the two orders of nature and grace is by using the analogy of the exitus and reditus [Everything comes from God (exitus) and, in a certain way, everything returns to God (reditus).] Creation puts the creature outside of God, giving it a place in the hierarchy of being. Man's natural end maintains the creaturely proportionality even while centering him on God as his end. The natural end thus effects a return to God according to the measure of the creature, as man loves, praises, and glorifies God according to the proportion of his nature. The return accomplished by the supernatural introduces the creature into the sphere of the divine through charity. The supernatural end liberates man and angel from the limits of their creaturely proportionality, and brings them into mystical marriage with God." Lawrence Feingold, The Natural Desire to See God according to St. Thomas Aquinas and His Interpreters, 2010.

61. Dareia Spezzano comments that "Thomas (following Albert the Great) posits that the intellect itself is reportioned by the gift of supernatural intrinsic disposition in the soul, by which God can be seen immediately: the light of glory...the essence of God itself becomes for the intellect the medium of the beatific vision (playing the role of species by informing the intellect)...The re-proportioning of the created intellect by the light of glory disposes it for union with the divine essence, making it perfectible by the divine essence as form by giving it a higher potency suitable for such a higher actualization.” Daria Spezzano, The Glory of God’s Grace: Deification according to St. Aquinas (Ave Maria, FL.....2015)

But Adam also needed an ethical supplement to address a moral defect in him as the image of God. Strimple says regarding the image of God that, “in the Roman Catholic view, moral agency was concreated and natural and the divine image consists in this and was not lost. Moral excellence, however, was superadded and supernatural—a donum superadditum.”⁶² The nature-grace dualism inherent in classical Roman Catholic theology finds crisp expression in the distinction between Adam’s natural endowments as created and the supernatural gifts that were added to him by the grace of the donum.

Strimple asks why this distinction between the natural image and a superadded gift of original righteousness (moral excellence) should be made.⁶³ He then quotes Bellarmine again:

Man naturally consists of flesh and bones. He therefore has community of nature partly with the beasts and partly with the angels. By reason of the body he has sensual desires and appetites. By reason of the soul he has propensity to spiritual good. But between these two propensities, there exists a certain battle. And from that inherent battle there arises a difficulty in doing good.⁶⁴

Strimple explains that “this is spoken of in Roman Catholic traditional circles using the term concupiscence—a natural effect of man’s dual nature, of his having two kinds of appetites.”⁶⁵ Supernatural grace was thus gifted to Adam above and beyond the natural image endowment in order to maintain harmony within him. Natural concupiscence required a supernatural gift of righteousness, a donum superadditum designed to ameliorate the inherent conflict in Adam as the natural image of God. [and amazing concoction!]

The antithesis to the deeper Protestant conception is obvious. Strimple comments on the objections advocates of the deeper Protestant conception would raise against this deeper Catholic conception. He says,

The first objection being that the Roman Catholic position presents a degrading view of man’s original state as created by his holy God. Bellarmine speaks of a “disease,” a “languor” in man’s natural state which needed a “remedy.” And then the other side of it, point two, is that the Roman Catholic position presents a falsely optimistic view of man’s fallen state. Bellarmine wrote this: “The state of man after the fall differs no more from the state of man in natural purity than a man originally naked differs from a man who was once clothed but has been stripped of his clothing. Nor is human nature in any lower state, leaving out of account the original fault. Nor does it labor under greater ignorance or infirmity than it was and labored under as created in natural purity.”⁶⁶

In Bellarmino's classical Roman Catholic view, Adam's conflicted psychosomatic constitution required a remedy to address an inherent "disease" or "languor." Adam as the created image of God needed an ethical supplement to address an intrinsic moral defect due to concupiscence. Such ethical supplementation was necessary before the fall.

Strimple offers several penetrating criticisms of the Roman Catholic position. On the one hand, "the Scripture sees any conflict within the being of man as the result of sin."⁶⁷ But "Roman Catholicism, like Gnostic or Manichean dualism, sees the situation in exactly reverse terms, finding the origin of sin in a natural incompatibility between the elements of man's nature."⁶⁸ Contrary to the deeper Protestant conception of the image of God,

Rome sees sin as arising from the sensual appetites of the lower nature. . . . The only way in which Rome can avoid the conclusion that man was sinful as originally created is by adopting the Pelagian definition of sin . . . the Pelagian definition that says that sin is "voluntary transgression of known law." . . . And so Rome says the lower impulses are sinful when knowingly and willingly indulged. But not until then. And so the fact that man was created with lower, sensual appetites, that would be sinful when they were knowingly, willingly given into—that doesn't mean that he was created a sinner. . . . That goes along with the Pelagian principle that only acts of the will, or their subjective consequences, are truly sinful.⁶⁹

Strimple concludes:

The Roman Catholic position is infected by the virus, shall we say, of pagan, by which we mean Greek, dualism, on the one hand, . . . and is infected by the virus of naturalistic voluntarism, on the other hand. . . . As a result, Rome's doctrines of sin, of regeneration, of sanctification, as well as the entire Roman Catholic ethic, are controlled by principles that have their roots in the pagan view of human nature and not at all in that which is specifically Christian.⁷⁰

Strimple's work stands out along with that of Vos as one of the finest critical expositions and critiques of the Roman Catholic theology of the image of God and its bearing on Rome's Pelagianized conception of sin.

Van Til on the Image of God and the Covenant of Works

Van Til sets the deeper Protestant conception in stark contrast to the deeper Catholic conception regarding the doctrines of the image of God and original sin. In An Introduction to Systematic Theology, he makes a programmatic contrast focuses on Rome's doctrine of participation in the essence of God.

Van Til not only rejects the Roman Catholic conception of participation in the being of God by creation and the supernatural grace of the donum superadditum, but he also sets forth a positive Reformed alternative along lines similar to what we have already surveyed in Vos. He argues:

Man is the created image-bearer of God. God communicates to man a being similar to his own. That communication is then not a participation in the eternal being of God, but is the finite replication of the divine being. It is only before the background of the fullness of the being of God as so far discussed that we can do justice to the communicable attributes. (Intro to Systematic Theology, 232)

While Bavinck affirms wholeheartedly that the being of God provides the efficient and exemplary causality of Adam's created being, he strenuously denies the classical Roman Catholic doctrine of human participation in the being of God. He rejects the Roman Catholic doctrine of special creation, which teaches that the natural image of God before the fall needed ontologically reportioning grace to infuse extrinsic supernatural qualities, introduce the natural creature into a supernatural order, elevate the image-bearer above human nature to partake in the divine nature, and translate the creature into the supernatural and divine order of being. In its place, Bavinck sets forth the notion of image-bearing Adam as able to realize his concreated eschatological potential through covenantal obedience without the need of the ontological supplementation of the donum superadditum. In so doing, Bavinck self-consciously affirms the being of God as the efficient and exemplary cause of human being, while repudiating the classical Roman Catholic doctrine of participation in the substance of the Godhead.

Van Til on the image of God:

Man is the created image-bearer of God. God communicates to man a being similar to his own. That communication is then not a participation in the eternal being of God but is the finite replica of the divine being. It is only before the background of the fullness of the being of God as so far discussed that we can do justice to the communicable attributes. Pg 45 Def of Faith

Skip to pg 50; more on the image of God from a Van Til's view \(Reformed\) compared to Rome's view on the subject of original righteousness concreated in Adam.

Van Til extends his critique of the deeper Catholic conception beyond the ontological supplement contained in the donum superadditum. He also insists that Rome's doctrine proves deficient when it deals with the ethical aspect of the image of God and its related doctrine of original sin. Van Til declares, "It is all-important that we have a truly Christian doctrine of man. But this Rome does not have."⁷⁶ Van Til observes that "Rome has a defective doctrine (a) with respect to the nature of man as he was created and (b) with respect to the effect of the entrance of sin upon the nature of man."⁷⁷ This means, then, that "'the important point of difference is,' says Charles Hodge, 'that Protestants hold that original righteousness, so far as it consisted in the moral excellence of Adam, was natural, while the Romanists maintain that it was supernatural.'"⁷⁸ Van Til's use of Hodge anticipates almost verbatim the exposition provided by Strimple:

According to their [Roman Catholic] theory, God created man soul and body. These two constituents of his nature are naturally in conflict. To preserve the harmony between them, and the due subjection of the flesh to the spirit, God gave man the supernature gift of original righteousness. It was this gift that man lost by his fall; so that since the apostasy he is in the state in which Adam was before he was invested with this supernatural endowment. In opposition to this doctrine, Protestants maintain that original righteousness was concreated and natural.

The critique that Van Til enlists from Hodge illustrates the classical Reformed critique of Rome surveyed earlier from Vos and Strimple:

The objections to this view, as Hodge enumerates them are, (1) “That is supposes a degrading view of the original constitution of our nature. According to this doctrine the seeds of evil were implanted in the nature of man as it came from the hands of God. It was disordered or diseased, there was about it what Bellarmine calls a morbus or languor, which needed a remedy.” (2) This doctrine as to original righteousness arose out of the Semi-Pelagianism of the Church of Rome, and was designed to sustain it.”⁶¹

Key footnote!!!

⁶¹Van Til, 41. See also Hodge, Systematic Theology, 2:105. With characteristic insight, Van Til notes the apologetical implication of the Roman Catholic conception of the image of God and the *donum superadditum, when he says, “Suppose then that a Romanist approaches an unbeliever and asks him to accept Christianity. The unbeliever, in his eyes, is merely such a one as has lost original righteousness. The image of God in him which, according to Romanism consists as Hodge says, ‘only of the rational, and especially the voluntary nature of man, or the freedom of the will,’ is thought of as still intact. That is to say, the unbeliever is, perhaps barring extremes, correct in what he himself thinks of the powers of his intellect and will. There is not necessarily any sin involved in what the unbeliever, or natural man, does by way of exercising his capacities for knowledge and action. On this view the natural man does not need the light of Christianity to enable him to understand the world and himself aright. He does not need the revelation of Scripture or the illumination of the Holy Spirit in order that my means of them he may learn what his own true nature is. Christianity therefore needs, on this basis, to be presented to the natural man as something that is merely information additional to what he already possesses. The knowledge of Christianity is to be related to the knowledge derived from the exercise of man’s powers of reason and observation in a way similar to that in which at the beginning original righteousness was added to the image of God in man.” Van Til, Christian Apologetics, 42. Rome’s blockhouse apologetical method is a direct entailment of the deeper Catholic conception of the nature-grace (imago Dei, donum superadditum) dualism. Van Til’s point is that the deeper Catholic conception of man demands a blockhouse apologetical method.

Van Til’s advocacy of the deeper Protestant conception of the image of God over against the deeper Catholic conception could not be clearer. He elaborates:

Adam and Eve had the requirements of God's law written on their hearts... We are speaking only of God's revelational relationship to man. And on that point all should be equally anxious to maintain that God originally spoke plainly to man, both in the "book of nature" and in the book of conscience."

Van Til has a much more robust conception of natural revelation than Rome can achieve, precisely because Adam and Eve are by nature in religious fellowship with God as his law is written on their hearts. Thus, as a pre-fall image bearer, Wherever man would turn he saw the living God and His requirements. Whether he reasoned about nature or whether he looked within, whether it was the starry heavens above or the moral law within, both were equally insistent and plain that God, the true God, stood before them.

This is the substantial outworking of the "new relation" and the natural religious fellowship in which Adam and Eve were created, in light of the deeper Protestant conception.

Coming now to a brief statement of the method of defense that I use for the propagation of what I believe and how it differs from the traditional method I may note first that you have not, for all the length of your article, anywhere given a connected picture of my argument. Yet you at once characterize it in contrast with your own as being "negative and universal." Without the least bit of qualification, I am said to deny "that there is common ground of reasoning between those who accept Christian presuppositions and engage in the spread of the gospel, and those who do not accept Christian presuppositions and reject the gospel." (p. 41) The facts are far otherwise.

I am, to be sure, opposed to the traditional method of apologetics as this has found its most fundamental expression in the Summae of Thomas Aquinas the Roman Catholic and in Bishop Butler the Arminian. I seek to oppose Roman Catholicism and Arminianism in Apologetics as I seek to oppose it in theology. Does that make my main thesis universally negative? I think there is a better and more truly Biblical way of reasoning with and winning unbelievers than the Romanist Arminian method permits.

To begin with then I take what the Bible says about God and his relation to the universe as unquestionably true on its own authority. The Bible requires men to believe that he exists apart from and above the world and that he by his plan controls whatsoever takes place in the world. Everything in the created universe therefore displays the fact that it is controlled by God, that it is what it is by virtue of the place that it occupies in the plan of God. The objective evidence for the existence of God and of the comprehensive governance of the world by God is therefore so plain that he who runs may read. Men cannot get away from this evidence. They see it round about them. They see it within them. Their own constitution so clearly evinces the facts of God's creation of them and control over them that there is no man who can possible escape observing it. If he is self-conscious at all he is also God-conscious. No matter how men may try they cannot hide from themselves the fact of their own createdness. Whether men engage in inductive study with respect to the facts of nature about them or engage in analysis of their own self-consciousness they are always face to face with God their maker. Calvin stresses these matters greatly on the basis of Paul's teachings in Romans.

In maintaining the essential clarity of all of the created universe as revelational of God's existence and his plan Calvin is nothing daunted even by the fat of sin and its consequences. If there has been any "obscuration" in the revelation situation on account of sin this sin is in any case the fault of man. If in Adam, the first man, who acted for me representatively, I have scratched the mirror of God's general revelation round about and within me, I know at bottom that it is I who have scratched it. Men ought, therefore, says Calvin, to conclude that when some individual sin is not punished immediately it will be punished later. Their consciences operate on this basis.

One thing should be particularly stressed in this connection. It is the fact that man today is sinful because of what happened at the beginning of history.

"We are told that man could never have had a fruition of God through the revelation that came to him through nature as operating by itself. There was superadded to God's revelation in nature another revelation, a supernaturally communicated positive revelation. Natural revelation, we are virtually told, was from the outset incorporated into the idea of a covenant relationship of God with man. [God always operates by covenant when dealing with man. See Owen's comments on covenants.] Thus, every dimension of created existence, even the lowest, was enveloped in a form of exhaustively personal relationship between God and man. The "ateleological" not less than the 'teleological,' the 'mechanical' no less than the 'spiritual,' was covenantal in character" (The Infallible Word, p. 259) [ateleological: not showing evidence of design or purpose]

Even in paradise, therefore, supernatural revelation was immediately conjoined with natural revelation. Revelation in and about man was therefore never meant to function by itself. "It was from the beginning insufficient without its supernatural concomitant. It was inherently a limiting notion." (Idem, p. 267)

Having taken these two, revelation in the created universe, both within and about man, and revelation by way of supernatural positive communication as aspects of revelation as originally given to man, we can see that natural revelation is even after the fall perspicuous in character. "The perspicuity of God's revelation in nature depends for is very meaning upon the fact that it is an aspect of the total and totally voluntary revelation of God who is self-contained." (Idem, p. 269) God has an all-comprehensive plan for the universe. "He has planned all the relationships between all the aspects of created being. He has planned the end from the beginning. All created reality therefore actually displays this plan. It is, in consequence, inherently rational." (Idem, p. 269)

At this point we may add the fact of Scriptural revelation. God has condescended to reveal himself and his plan in it to sinners. It is the same God who speaks in Scripture and in nature. But in Scripture he speaks of his grace to such as have broken his covenant, to such as have set aside his original revelation to the. And as the original revelation of God to man was clear so is the revelation of grace in Scripture. "The Scriptures as the finished product of God's supernatural and saving revelation to man have their own evidence in themselves. (Idem, p. 271)

In all of this there is one thing that stands out. It is that man has no excuse whatsoever for not accepting the revelation of God whether in nature, including man and his surroundings, or in Scripture. God's revelation is always clear.

The first and most basic point on which my approach differs from the traditional one is therefore that: (a) I start more frankly from the Bible as the source form which as an absolutely authoritative revelation I take my whole interpretation of life. Roman Catholicism also appeals to Scripture but in practice makes its authority void. Its final appeal is to the church and that is, in effect, to human experience. Even Arminianism rejects certain Scripture doctrines (e.g., election) because it cannot logically harmonize them with the general offer of salvation. (b) I stress the objective clarity of God's revelation of himself wherever it appears. Both Thomas Aquinas and Butler contend that men have done justice by the evidence if they conclude that God probably exists. (I have discussed the views of Aquinas in The Infallible Word and those of Butler in the Syllabus on Evidences.) I consider this a compromise of simple and fundamental Biblical truth. It is an insult to the living God to say that his revelation of himself so lacks in clarity that man, himself through and through revelation of God, does justice by it when he says that God probably exists.

"The argument for the existence of God and for the truth of Christianity is objectively valid. We should not tone down the validity of this argument to the probability level. The argument may be poorly stated, and may never be adequately stated. But in itself the argument is absolutely sound. Christianity is the only reasonable position to hold. It is not merely as reasonable as other positions, or a bit more reasonable than other positions; it alone is the natural and reasonable position for man to take. By stating the argument as clearly as we can, we may be the agents of the Holy Spirit in pressing the claims of God upon men. If we drop to the level of the merely probable truthfulness of Christian theism, we, to that extent, lower the claims of God upon men." (Common Grace, p. 62) [codeproofs]

Accordingly I do not reject "the theistic proofs" but merely insist on formulating them in such a way as not to compromise the doctrines of Scripture. "The is to say, if the theistic proof is constructed as it ought to be constructed, it is objectively valid, whatever the attitude of those to whom it comes may be." (Idem, p49) (c) With Calvin I find the point of contact for the presentation of the gospel to non-Christians in the fact that they are made in the image of God and as such have the ineradicable sense of deity within them. Their own consciousness is inherently and exclusively revelational of God to themselves. No man can help knowing God for in knowing himself he knows God. His self-consciousness is totally devoid of content unless, as Calvin puts it at the beginning of his Institutes, man knows himself as a creature before God. There are "no atheistic men because no man can deny the revelational activity of the true God within him." (Common Grace, p 55) Man's own interpretative activity, whether of the more or less extended type, whether in ratiocination [reasoning] or intuition, is no doubt the most penetrating means by which the Holy Spirit presses the claims of God upon man? (Idem, pg 62) Even man's negative ethical reaction to God's revelation within his own psychological constitution is revelational of God. His conscience troubles him when he disobeys; he knows deep down in his heart that he is disobeying his creator. There is no escape from God for any human being. Every human being is by virtue of his being made in the image of God accessible to God. And as such he is accessible to one who without compromise presses upon him the claims of God. Every man has capacity to reason logically. He can intellectually understand what the Christian position claims to be. Conjoined with this is the moral sense that he knows he is doing wrong when he interprets human experience without reference to his creator. I am therefore in the fullest agreement with Professor Murray when, in the quotation you give of him, he speaks of the natural man as having an "apprehension of the truth of the gospel that is prior to faith and repentance." But I could not thus speak with assurance that the natural man could have any such apprehension of the truth of the gospel that is prior to faith and repentance if I held with the traditional view of Apologetics that man's self-consciousness is something that is intelligible without reference to God-consciousness. If man's self-consciousness did not actually depend upon his God-consciousness there would be no meaning to Romans 1:20. [For since the creation of the world His invisible attributes are clearly seen...so that they are without excuse.] Each man would live in a world by himself. No man could even have that intellectual cognition of the gospel which is the prerequisite of saving faith. In short, if the universe were not what the Calvinist, following Paul, says it is, it would not be a universe. There would be no system of truth. And if the mind of man were not what Calvin, following Paul, says it is, it could not even intellectually follow an argument for the idea that the universe is a universe. All arguments for such a universe we would come to him as outside that universe.

Yet it is the very essence of the positions of Aquinas and Butler that human self-consciousness is intelligible without God-consciousness. Both make it their point of departure in reasoning with the non-believers that we must, at least in the area of things natural, stand on the ground of neutrality with them. And it is of the essence of all non-believing philosophy that self-consciousness is taken as intelligible by itself without reference to God. Moreover the very theology of both Romanism and Arminianism, as already noted, requires a measure of subtraction of the self-consciousness of men from its creaturely place. (d) Implied in the previous points is the fact that I do not artificially separate induction from deduction, or reasoning about the facts of nature from reasoning in a priori analytical fashion about the nature of human-consciousness. I do not artificially abstract or separate them from one another. On the contrary I see induction and analytical reasoning as part of one process of interpretation. I would therefore engage in historical apologetics. (I do not personally do a great deal of this because my colleagues in the other departments of the Seminary in which I teach are doing it better than I could do it.) Every bit of historical investigation, whether it be in the directly Biblical field, archaeology, or in general history, is bound to confirm the truth on the claims of the Christian position. But I would not talk endlessly about facts and more facts without ever challenging the non-believer's philosophy of fact. A really fruitful historical apologetic argues that every fact is and must be such as proves the truth of the Christian theistic position.

A fair presentation of my method of approach should certainly have included these basic elements that underlie everything else.

This paragraph in excellent:

It is only in the light of this positive approach that my statements to the effect that, epistemologically, believers and non-believers have nothing in common, can be seen for what it is. Even in Common Grace it is evident that by the sinner's epistemological reaction, I mean his reaction as an ethically responsible creature of God. Does the sinner react properly to the revelation of God that surrounds him, that is within him and that comes to him from Scripture? As I have followed Calvin closely in stressing the fact that men ought to believe in God inasmuch as the evidence for his existence is abundantly plain, so I have also closely followed Calvin in saying that no sinner reacts properly to God's revelation. Is this too sweeping a statement? It is simply the doctrine of total depravity. All sinners are covenant breakers. They have an axe to grind. They do not want to keep God in remembrance. They keep under the knowledge of God that is within them. That is, they try as best they can to keep under this knowledge for fear they should look into the face of their judge. And since God's face appears in every fact of the universe, they oppose God's revelation everywhere. They do not want to see the facts of nature for what they are; they do not want to see themselves for what they are. Therefore, they assume the non-createdness of themselves and of the facts and the laws of nature round about them. [now you see why Evolution took hold and why it's wrong.] Even though they make great protestations of serving God they yet serve and worship the creature more than the Creator. They try to make themselves believe that God and man are aspects of one universe. They interpret all things immanentistically. [Hence many drift into pantheistic thinking ignoring God's transcendence. See the section on Pantheism by Van Til.]

Notes on immanence:

What is the difference between immanent and transcendent?

The words transcendent and immanent often are seen together in theological language. The transcendence of God means that God is outside of humanity's full experience, perception or grasp. The immanence of God means that he is knowable, perceivable or graspable. -Encyclopedia.com Shall we in the interest of a point of contact admit that man can interpret anything correctly if he virtually leaves God out of the picture? [point of contact: A baseline of agreement from where a discussion can proceed – I think that what Van Til means by this term - an agreed upon presupposition.] Shall we who wish to prove that nothing can be explained without God first admit some things at least can be explained without him? On the contrary we shall show that all explanations without God are futile. Only when we do this do we appeal to that knowledge of God within men which they seek to suppress. This is what I mean by presupposing God for the possibility of intelligent predication.

You ask what person is consistent with his own principle. Well, I have consistently argued that no one is and that least of all the non-Christian is. I have even argued in the very booklets that you review that if men were consistent, they would be end products and that then there would be no more reasoning with them. However, since sinners are not consistent, and have what is from their point of view an old man within them, they can engage in science and in the general interpretation of the created universe and bring to light much truth. It is because the prodigal is not yet at the swine trough and therefore still has of the substance of the Father in his pockets that he can do that and discover that, which for the matter of it, is true and usable for the Christian. Why did you omit that all important element in what I teach? In a booklet largely written in the defense of the idea of “commonness” as between believers and unbelievers against those who deny it you find nothing but the opposite. If your contention is that I have said precisely the opposite of what I wanted to say you should in fairness at least have discussed the points just now discussed.

What then more particularly do I mean by saying that epistemologically the believer and the non-believer have nothing in common? I mean that every sinner looks through colored glasses. And these colored glasses are cemented to his face. He assumes that self-consciousness is intelligible without God-consciousness. He assumes that consciousness of facts is intelligible without consciousness of God. He assumes that consciousness of laws is intelligible without God. And he interprets all the facts and all the laws that are presented to him in terms of these assumptions. This is not to forget that he also, according to the old man within him, knows that God exists. But as a covenant breaker he seeks to suppress this. And I am now speaking of him as the covenant breaker. Neither do I forget that no man is actually fully consistent in working according to these assumptions. The non-believer does not fully live up to the new man within him which in his case is the man who worships the creature above all else, any more than does the Christian fully live up to the new man within him, which in his case is the man who worships the Creator above all else. But as it is my duty as a Christian to ask my fellow Christians as well as myself to suppress the old man within them, so it is my duty to ask non-believers to suppress not the old man but the new man within them.

The necessity for this can be observed every time there is some popular article on religion in one of the magazines. There was a questionnaire sent out recently by one of them asking a certain number of people whether they believed in God. By far the greater number of them said that they did. But from further questions asked it appeared that only a very small number believed in the God of the Bible, the Creator and Judge of men. Yet they said that they believed in God. From such an article it is apparent that every sinner has the sense of deity and therefore knows God as his Creator and Judge. But from such an article it is also apparent that every sinner seeks in one way or another to deny this. They are therefore without God in the world. They must, as Charles Hodge so well points out, be renewed unto knowledge (Col. 3:10) as well as unto righteousness and holiness. (Eph. 4:24)

Now neither Aquinas nor Butler makes any such distinctions as I have made. And in that they are but consistent. They do not make the Creator-creature distinction absolutely fundamental in their own thinking. How then could they consistently ask others to do so? It is of the essence of their theology to maintain that God has made man so that he has such freedom as to be able to initiate something that is beyond the counsel of God. For them the human self therefore is supposed to be able to think of itself as intelligible and of the facts and laws of the world as manipulable and therefore intelligible apart from their relationship to God. I have already pointed out that for this reason the traditional view of apologetics has no universe and has no real point of contact in the unbeliever. If either Romanism or Arminianism were right in their view of the self-consciousness of man, there could be no apologetic for Christianity at all. There would be no all-comprehensive plan of God. This much being clear it can be seen that the Romanist and the Arminian will, in consistence with their own theology, not be able to challenge the natural man's false assumptions. The traditional apologist must somehow seek for a point of contact within the thinking of the natural man as this thinking has been carried on upon false assumptions. He cannot seek to stir up the old man in opposition against the new man in the non-Christian. He makes no use of such a distinction. He will allow for gradational differences within the natural man. He will even make a great deal of these. To him therefore the passages of Paul to the effect that every man knows God and that man is made in the image of God are interpreted so as to do injustice to other equally important teaching of Scripture to the effect that the natural man knoweth not God. All this is compromising theology. It is no wonder that the Romanist and the Arminian will also follow a compromising apologetics.

The basic falseness of this apologetics appears in the virtual if not actual denial of the fact that the natural man makes false assumptions. Aquinas and Butler hold that the natural man, whom the Calvinist knows to be a covenant breaker and as such one who interprets God himself in terms of the universe, has some correct notions about God. I mean correct notions as to content, not merely as to form. Anyone who says, "I believe in God," is formally correct in his statement, but the question is what does he mean by the word God? The traditional view assumes that the natural man has a certain measure of correct thought content when he uses the word God. In reality the natural man's "God" is always a finite God. It is his most effective tool for suppressing the sense of the true God that he cannot fully efface from the fibres of his heart.

The natural man's god is always enveloped within a Reality that is greater than his god and himself. He always makes Reality, inclusive of all that exists, the All the final subject of which he speaks. With Thales he will say All is water, with Anaximenes All is air. With others he may be a dualist or a pluralist or an atomist, a realist or a pragmatist. From the Christian point of view, he still has a monistic assumption in that he makes Reality to be inclusive of God and himself.

Note: "The monistic view makes no basic difference between Creator and creature, but rather presents being as uniform, though with gradations between lower and higher forms." Wm Edgar, editor of Van Til's book, Christian Apologetics, pg 31, footnote 3 [Van Til refers to this as "scale of being" in his writings.]

And there is not much that the traditional apologist can do about this. He has bound himself to confusion in apologetics as he has bound himself to error in theology. He must tie on to some small area of thought content that the believer and the unbeliever have in common without qualification when both are self-conscious with respect to their principle. This is tantamount to saying that those who interpret a fact as dependent upon God and those who interpret that same fact as not dependent upon God have yet said something identical about that fact.

All this is bound to lead to self-frustration on the part of the traditional apologist. Let us watch him for a moment. Think of him first as an inductivist. As such he will engage in “historical apologetics” and in the study of archaeology. In general, he will deal with the “facts” of the universe in order to prove the existence of God. He cannot on his position challenge the assumption of the man he is trying to win. That man is ready for him. Think of the traditional apologist as throwing facts to his non-Christian friend as he might throw a ball. His friend receives each fact as he might a ball and throws it behind him in a bottomless pit. The apologist is exceedingly industrious. He shows the unbelieving friend all the evidence for theism. He shows all the evidence for Christianity, for instance, for the virgin birth and the resurrection of Christ. Let us think of his friend as absolutely tireless and increasingly polite. He will then receive all these facts and toss them behind him in the bottomless pit of pure possibility. “is it not wonderful? He will say, “what strange things do happen in Reality. You seem to be a collector of oddities. As for my self I am more interested in the things that happen regularly. But I shall certainly try hard to explain the facts you mention in accord with the laws that I have found working so far. Perhaps we should say that laws are merely statistical averages and that nothing can therefore be said about any particular event ahead of its appearance. Perhaps there are very unusual things in reality. But what does this prove for the truth of your view?”

You see that the unbeliever who does not work on the presupposition of creation and providence is perfectly consistent with himself when he sees nothing to challenge his unbelief even in the fact of the resurrection of Christ. He may be surprised for a moment as a child that grows up is surprised at the strange things of life but then when he has grown up, he realizes that “such is life.” Sad to say the traditional Christian apologist has not even asked his unbelieving friend to see the facts for what they really are. He has not presented the facts at all. That is, he has not presented the facts as they are according to the Christian way of looking at them and the Christian way of looking at them is the true way of looking at them. Every fact in the universe is what it is by virtue of the place that it has in the plan of God. Man cannot comprehensively know that plan. But he does know that there is such a plan. He must therefore present the facts of theism and of Christianity, of Christian theism, as proving Christian theism because they are intelligible as facts in terms of it and in terms of it alone.

But this is also in effect to say that the Christian apologist should never seek to be an inductivist only. He should present his philosophy of fact with his facts. He does not need to handle less facts in doing so. He will handle the same facts, but he will handle them as they ought to be handled.

Now look at the traditional apologist when he is not an inductivist but an a priori reasoner. He will first show his fellow worker, the inductivist, that he defeats his own purposes. He will show that he who does not challenge the assumptions of his non-Christian friends has placed himself on a decline which inevitably leads down from Locke through Berkeley to Hume, the skeptic. Then for his own foundation he will appeal to some internal ineffable principles, to some a priori like that of Plato or of Descartes. He will appeal to the law of contradiction either positively or negatively and boldly challenge the facts to meet the requirements of logic. Then he will add that the facts of Christianity pass the examination summa cum laude. Well, they do. And in passing the examination they invariably pass out of existence too. He can only prove the immortality of the soul if with Plato he is willing to prove also that man is divine. He can only prove the universe to have order if with the Stoics he is also willing to say that God is merely its principle of order. With the Hegelian idealists such as Bradley and Bosanquet or Royce he will prove all the facts of the Bible to be true by weaving them into aspects of a Universe that allows for them as well as for their opposites.

But usually, the traditional apologist is neither a pure inductivist nor a pure a priorist. Of necessity he has to be both. When engaged in inductive argument about facts he will therefore talk about these facts as proving the existence of God. If anything exists at all, he will say, something absolute must exist. But when he thus talks about what must exist and when he refuses even to admit that non-believers have false assumptions about their musts, let alone being willing to challenge them on the subject, he has in reality granted that the non-believer's conception about the relation of human logic to facts is correct. It does not occur to him that on any but the Christian theistic basis there is no possible connection of logic with facts at all. When the non-Christian, not working on the foundation of creation and providence [that's key], talks about musts in relation to facts he is beating the air. His logic is merely the exercise of a revolving door in a void, moving nothing from nowhere into the void. But instead of pointing out this fact to the unbeliever the traditional apologist appeals to this non-believer as though by his immanentistic method he could very well interpret many things correctly.

That this traditionalist type of apologetics is particularly important in our day I have shown in my review of Dr. Richardson's and Dr. Canell's books on Apologetics. Dr. Richardson is a modernist. But he says he folds to the uniqueness of the facts of Christianity. At the same time, he holds that this holding to the uniqueness of Christianity and its facts is not inconsistent with hold to a form of coherence that is place upon human experience as its foundation. Dr. Carnell is an orthodox believer. To an extent he has even tried to escape from the weaknesses of the traditional method of apologetic argument. But he merely rejects its inductivist form. By and large he falls back into traditional methodology. And just to that extent he has no valid argument against Richardson. To the extent that he admits the type of coherence which Richardson holds to be valid he has to give up the uniqueness of the events of Christianity as he himself holds them. On the other hand, to the extent that he holds to the uniqueness of events the way Richardson holds to them, that extent he has to give up the coherence to which he himself as an orthodox Christian should hold. (See Westminster Theological Journal, Nov. 1948)

Good discussion on God's immutability that is addressed elsewhere in Lane Tipton's excellent commentary, The Trinitarian Theology of Cornelius Van Til dealing with the theistic mutualism promoted by John Frame and others.

Your own handling of the question of the immutability of God exhibits exactly the same difficulty. You speak of the dynamical self-consistency of God as a concept that will make it quite easy to see how God's immutability can be consistent with the genuine significance of facts in the course of history. But to the extent that you explain how the immutability of God can be consistent with the actuality of historical change you explain it away. You go so far as to define that very immutability in terms of God's constancy of relationship to the created temporal universe. "God's immutability consists in his perfectly unified plan in dealing with the world, which he created, God's absoluteness is in his perfectly consistent relatedness" (What is God? p. 32) Now if God's immutability is not first to be spoken of as an attribute that pertains to the character of God as he is in himself apart from his relation to the universe, then there is no problem anymore because one of the factors of the problem has been denied. To the extent that you have explained you have also destroyed the fact to be explained. And to speak of self-consistency after first reducing the self to a relationship is meaningless. On the other hand, you do not really hold to the identity of the being of God in himself with his relationship to the world. That is also plain from your general discussion of God. But then if you are to speak to an unbeliever with respect to the God who is really self-contained and ask him to think of this God along the lines of his own procedure, without challenging the assumptions that underlie that procedure, then he will simply say that such as God is so wholly beyond his experience that he can make nothing of him and that such a God is therefore meaningless to him. To this you can on your method offer him no adequate answer. [Theistic Mutualism basically says that God adapts or changes his nature, his properties, in order to relate to the changeableness of the creature.]

The general conclusion then is that on the traditional method it is impossible to set one position clearly over against the other so that the two may be compared for what they are. Certainly, there can be no confrontation of two opposing positions if it cannot be pointed out on what they oppose each other. On the traditional basis of reasoning the unbeliever is not so much as given an opportunity of seeing with any adequacy how the position he is asked to accept differ from his own.

But all this comes from following the Roman Catholic, Thomas Aquinas, or the Arminian Butler. If one follows Calvin, there are no such troubles. Then one begins with the fact that the world is what the Bible says it is. One then makes the claims of God upon men without apologies though always suaviter in modo [pleasantly in manner, powerfully in deed.] One knows that there is hidden underneath the surface display of every man a sense of deity. One therefore gives that sense of deity an opportunity to rise in rebellion against the oppression under which it suffers by the new man of the covenant breaker. One makes no deal with this new man. One shows that on his assumptions all things are meaningless. Science would be impossible; knowledge of anything in any field would be impossible. No fact could be distinguished from any other fact. No law could be said to be law with respect to facts. This whole manipulation of factual experience would be like the idling of a motor that is not in gear. Thus, every fact – not some facts – every fact clearly and not probably proves the truth of Christian theism. If Christian theism is not true, then nothing is true. Is the God of the Bible satisfied if his servants say anything less?

And have I, following such a method, departed radically from the tradition of Kuyper and Bavinck? On the contrary I have learned all this primarily from them. It is Kuyper's Encyclopedia that has, more than any other work in modern times, brought out the fact of the difference between the approach of the believer and of the unbeliever. It is Bavinck's monumental work which set a natural theology frankly oriented to Scripture squarely over against that of Romanism which is based on neutral reason. [codeproofs] It is Bavinck who taught me that the proofs for God as usually formulated on the traditional method prove a finite God. I have indeed had the temerity to maintain that these great Reformed theologians have in some points not been quite true to their own principles. But when I have done so, I have usually tried to point out that when they did so and to the extent that they did so they had departed from Calvin.

Chapter X

The Defense of Christianity

Pgs. 209-216

Everything that has been said so far has bearing upon the question of apologetics. How shall Christians win unbelievers to an acceptance of Christian truth? Kuyper speaks much of the fact that, since the entrance of sin, truth must be set over against error. Satan is the prince of darkness. He instigated Adam to make alliance with him over against God. But God in his grace sent his Son to establish the kingdom of righteousness and truth.

There is a global war on between Christ and Satan. All men are participants in this war. They all wear uniforms; they are all for or against God. There are, that is, two principles opposed to one another. But those who fight for truth must fight with spiritual weapons only. Their opposition to Satan is in the interest of winning converts to the love of God in Christ.

There are those who do not like such martial terminology. But how can we avoid martial terminology and be true to the Bible? Is not Modernism and new-Modernism preaching a gospel of love that makes no ultimate distinction between truth and falsehood? Did not Paul warn us to put on the whole armor of God in order to be able to stand against the wiles of the devil? Was Christ's assertion that he came not to bring peace but a sword out of accord with his love for sinners?

These next few paragraphs are really good

Christians must present the truth in terms of God the Creator, of man his creature and also of this man's rebellion against God. Romanism and Evangelicalism do not want to think of the fall of man as having immediate significance for an argument between a Christian and a non-Christian. The Reformed view of theology alone takes the Bible story of Adam's representation seriously. Hence the Reformed view alone appreciates fully the significance of the fall of man for Apologetics.

The Reformed apologetic, therefore, does not take for granted, as does the Romanist and the Evangelical, that because men have "common notions" about God by virtue of their creation in God's image, that sinners and saints also have common notions when they are epistemologically self-conscious. The Reformed apologetic, following Calvin, will distinguish between what was true for Adam, then what is true for the sinner, the natural man, and after that what is true for the saint, the regenerated man.

After we have begun with the Adamic Consciousness, and then turned to the unregenerate consciousness, we must next consider the regenerate consciousness. The regenerate consciousness is the Adamic consciousness restored and supplemented, but restored and supplemented in principle or standing only.

In the first place, the regenerated consciousness is the Adamic consciousness restored. It recognizes afresh its own derivative¹ character. [that its dependence on God is absolute.] It is able to do so only because God has regenerated it and thus made it confess its ethical depravity. God has quickened what was the natural man so that he now lives. The regenerate man can discern and do that which is spiritually good because it is God who works in him both to will and to do. In the second place, the regenerated consciousness is the Adamic consciousness supplemented. Adam was in the position of posse peccare, while the restored are in the position of non posse peccare. "Whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin, because his seed abideth in him; and he cannot sin because he is begotten of God" (1 John 3:9)

¹Van Til states on page 157 of his book Introduction to Systematic Theology, pg 157: Calvin never did start a chain of reasoning about man's nature and destiny by taking man by himself. He did not start with man as with an ultimate starting point. Calvin did not start with a general a priori position. His position is as radically apposed to that of Descartes as it is to that of Hume. Most apologetic writers who have come after Calvin have allowed themselves to be influenced unduly by Cartesian philosophy on this matter. Calvin recognized fully that if man is to have true knowledge of himself, he must regard God as original and himself as derivative. He did not place God and man as correlatives next to one another, but he recognized from the outset two levels of existence and two levels of interpretation: on the one hand, the divine and eternal and, on the other hand, the human or temporal. To him it is perfectly obvious that the endowments that we possess are not of ourselves, but of God. Hence he says that "not a particle of light, or wisdom, or justice, or power, or rectitude, or genuine truth, will anywhere be found, which does not flow from him: and of which he is not the cause. [Calvin, Institutes 1.2.2)

Cornelius Van Til again states from his book, Introduction to Systematic Theology: p128-9: In Paradise, man made his self-consciousness the immediate but wholly derivative starting point while he made the self-consciousness of God the remote but wholly ultimate starting point of all his knowledge. Hence he saw that his knowledge was, though finite, yet true. Hence he did not set before himself the false ideal of absolute comprehension. Hence, too, he did not despair and conclude to irrationalism simply because he himself could not fully comprehend the whole of reality.

In opposition to this, the non-Christian interpretation of the human mind is based upon the presupposition that it is the ultimate and not merely the derivative starting point for man. Hence it has set before itself the ideal of comprehension knowledge. This was done especially in the earlier stages of human thought. The Greek thinkers were as children who thought they could do everything. Even in modern times we have, in such systems as that of Leibniz, a striking manifestation of the pride, "hubris," of the sinner who wishes to be as God.³⁵ In more recent times, however, men have become more sophisticated. There have given up the quest of certainty and the quest for comprehension, except as a limiting concept. In modern irrationalism, the prodigal has recognized that he is at the swine trough, but still refuses to return to the father's house. His "hubris" never forsakes him.

³⁵ Van Til uses the strong language of hubris here about Leibniz's project. Leibniz had hoped to unify many disciplines and churches through his system, which is ultimately built on a very few general principles.

In the third place the regenerate consciousness is restored in principle but not in degree. The struggle of Romans VII remains the struggle of every Christian till the day of his death. "If we say that we have no sin we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." (1 John 1:8)

I

The Place of Reason In Theology

Pg 211

In the first place, we can no longer figure with the Adamic consciousness as actually existing at the present time. We deal only with the non-regenerate and the regenerate consciousness. But the true meaning of the fallen and the regenerate consciousness cannot be maintained unless back of both lies the history of Adam and his fall. This does not mean that it is a matter of indifference whether or not we take the Genesis narrative with respect to Adam as historical. It is only if we do take this narrative as historical that a sound theology can be maintained. Adam's sin was the willful transgression of man to the known revelation of God. If we deny the historicity of the Genesis narrative, we shall be compelled to reduce man's responsibility for "sinfulness" is then virtually identical with "fate." Accordingly, such theologians as Otto Piper and Nels F.S. Ferre who virtually reduce the Genesis narrative to the status of myth, find themselves compelled to deny also the historic Christian Views of sin, of Christ, and of the atonement.

In the second place, we cannot speak of human reason in general, or of the human consciousness in general, except in the objective sense explained above. And as such we may call it a limiting concept in the Christian sense of the term. In other words, it is a concept that should never be employed to do duty by itself. All men have a sense of deity, but there is no man who has not at the same time also something else that at once colors his sense of deity. All men are either in covenant with Satan or in covenant with God. The former invariably seek to suppress and therefore always misinterpret the general sense of deity within them. The latter invariably seek to relate that general sense of deity to the revelation of God in Christ.

While therefore it is of the utmost consequence to recognize the fact of a "common consciousness" of god as the revelational pressure of God on man, it is of no less importance to note that, in so far as men are aware of their most basic alliances, there are wholly for or wholly against God at every point of interest to man.

In the third place, when we deal with the non-regenerate consciousness, we must think of it as it is according to its adopted monistic assumption. Hence, we cannot grant that it has any right to judge in matters of theology, or, for the matter of that, in anything else. The Scriptures nowhere appeal to the unregenerated reason as to a qualified judge. On the contrary, Scripture says over and over that the unregenerate reason is entirely unqualified to judge. When Scripture says: “Come, let us reason together,” it often speaks to the people of God, and, if it does speak to others, it never regards them as equal with God or as really competent to judge. The unregenerate man has knowledge of God, that is of the revelation of God within him, the sense of deity which he seeks to suppress. Scripture does appeal to this sense of deity in man, but it does so and can do so only by denying that man, when acting on his adopted monistic assumption, has any ability or right to judge of what is true or false, right or wrong.

In the fourth place, though Scripture does not appeal to the natural man as to a competent judge and though it considers the natural man as blind to spiritual things, the Scriptures continue to hold man responsible for his blindness.

In the fifth place, Scripture teaches us to speak and preach to, as well as to reason with blind men, because God, in whose name we speak and reason, can cause the blind to see. Jesus told Lazarus while dead to arise and come forth from the grave. The prophet preached to the dead bones in the valley till they took on flesh. So our reasoning and our preaching is not in vain inasmuch as God in Christ reasons and preaches through us. Once we were blind; God reasoned with us, perhaps through some human agency, and we saw.

I shall quote part of a summary of the type of argument I have constantly used. It appeared in His (April, 1948) magazine of the Inter-Varsity Fellowship, as an answer to Professor William Pepperell Monague’s article, “Does the Universe Have a Mind?” in the Saturday Review of the Literature of September 6, 1947.

“Does the universe show any evidence in its behavior of being created and benign?” (S.R.L. p. 31) “To this time-honored theological question the answer must be a flat negative. Nature is tooth and claw, and life so constituted that each creature can preserve its existence only by devouring other creatures. If there is a God, he is either not omnipotent or not good, in any sensed of the world ‘good’ that the human conscience can sanction.”

That the position taken by Montague is fairly typical of the attitude of many modern philosophers and scientists needs no proof. Even when men do not express themselves as vigorously as does Montague, their attitude toward Christianity and its claims is frequently the same as his. It is therefore imperative that Christians investigate their own attitude toward such a criticism carefully.

When Christians look at evil and suffering, they say that it is the result of the sin of man. (Romans 5:12) They add that the nature of sin is therefore lack of conformity to and transgression of the will of God. They assert further that God “hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead.” (Acts 17:31) Christians interpret the “fact” of evil, therefore, in the light of a story. And the story they get from the Bible, which they claim to be the Word of God. Moreover, what is true of the fact of evil is true of every other fact. Christians interpret every fact in the light of the same story. For them the nature of every fact in this world is determined by the place in occupancies in the story. The story they cannot get from any other source than supernatural revelation.

Great conclusion here!

The Christian finds that his conscience agrees to the truth of the story. He holds that those who deny the truth of the story have an axe to grind. They do not want the story to be true; they do not want to facts to be what they story says they are. They “protest too much.” And by protesting too much they testify, in spite of themselves, that their conscience does not tell them that the story is untrue. Their conscience tells them the reverse of what they say it does.

The Christian finds, further, that logic agrees with the story. Human logic agrees with the story, because it derives its meaning from the story. The facts of the world are what they story says they are; if logic would deal with facts rather than fancies it must itself, together with the facts, be a part of the story. By logic man must seek for coherence in his experience of the story. The story tells him that “seed time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease.” Hence scientific predictions can be made. But the story also tells him that the final judgement will come in God’s time. Accordingly, these scientific predictions are contingent upon the maintenance of the course and constitution of nature by God.

Consider now what Montague has to say. He observes the “facts” of nature and says they are not what the Christian says they are. Involved in this mere looking at the facts is the assertion that they cannot be what the Christian says they are. Merely by looking at the facts Montague virtually claims to know what did not happen in the past and what cannot happen in the future. By mere observation of facts, he knows that there has been no creation or fall and that there will be no judgment. The merest statement of fact about any fact of nature, as Montague sees it, involves and is virtually identical with an a priori* universal negative judgment about all possibility.

Great conclusion here:

On Montague’s position then the observation of facts is virtually identical with exhaustive insight into their nature. It is only on the basis of exhaustive insight into the nature of facts that one can determine just what they can or cannot be. And exhaustive insight presupposes control. In other words, on Montague’s scheme of things the mind of man must, for all practical purposes, take the place of God in the Christian scheme of things. To talk about what can or cannot exist according to logic is but to swing a sword in the sky unless it is first determined at what point logic meets reality. According to the Christian story, logic meets reality. According to the Christian story, logic and reality meet first of all in the mind and being of God. God’s being is exhaustively rational. Then God creates and rules the universe according to this plan. Even the evil of this world happens according to this plan. The only substitute for this Christian scheme of things is to assert or assume that logic and reality meet originally in the mind of man. The final point of reference in all predication must ultimately rest in some mind, divine or human. It is either the self-contained God of Christianity or the would-be autonomous man that must be and is presupposed as the final reference point in every sentence that any man utters.

Good!

We would therefore ask Montague how it is that he, as a mere man claims what is tantamount to absolute a priori or analytical knowledge of all possibility. But if we should ask him this, he would, of course, disclaim any such thing. He would disown the attempt of Parmenides to equate all being with what can without contradiction be said about it by man. Neither has he any place for a first cause. "It seems rather that the thing or principle responsible for the origin of nature as we find it was a power of fecundity [fertility], self-repetition or increase and that the only hope of ascribing to it mind or life would depend on showing that those categories are interpretable as later phases, "emergent" yet inevitable developments of the principle of development itself."

Good reasoning:

But how then, we now inquire of Montague, is it that you can make universal negative propositions about all possibility if for you, according to your own assertions, possibility and even reality is something that exists prior to any mind and any logical assertion about it? If we hear a motor roar in a new Buick car while the car does not move, we assume that the driver merely does not want the car to move. He could pout the motor in gear at any time and the car would go. But when we see him take the motor out of the car and drop it in the middle of the Pacific Ocean with the avowed intention of making things move, we are not impressed. [Good argument against evolution...]

The Christian and the non-Christian may then be compared to one another in some such way as follows:

1. Both make presuppositions about the nature of reality:
 - a. The Christian presupposes the self-contained God and his plan for the universe
 - b. The non-Christian presupposes "Chaos and Old Night."
2. Neither can, as finite beings, by means of logic legislate what reality should be.
 - a. Knowing this the Christian observes facts and arranges them logically in self-conscious subjection to the plan of god revealed in Scripture.
 - b. Knowing this the non-Christian none the less constantly attempts the impossible.
 1. Negatively he says in effect that reality is not rationally constituted at all and that the Christian story therefore cannot be true. This is involved in his idea of "facts" as springing from "Chaos and Old Night."
 2. Positively he assumes that reality is after all rationally constituted and answers exhaustively to his logical manipulations. This is involved in his idea that any "cosmic mind" or God that is to be tolerated must be manipulable by categories devised by man without reference to "him" or "it."
3. Each claims that his position is "in accordance with the facts of experience."

- a. The Christian claims this because he interprets the facts and his experience of them in terms of his presupposition. The “uniformity of nature” and his knowledge of that uniformity both rest for him upon the plan of God.
- b. The non-Christian also interprets the facts in terms of his presuppositions. One of these presuppositions is that of ultimate non-rationality. On such a basis any fact would have a nature that is different in all respects from all other facts. Here is “Chaos and Old Night” with a vengeance. The second of these presuppositions is the rationality of all reality in terms of the reach of logic as manipulated by man. On such a basis the nature of any fact would be identical with the nature of every other fact. In practice the procedure of the non-Christian is that of keeping in careful balance the utter equivocism [open to interpretation, ambiguous] involved in his first and the utter univocism involved in his second presupposition. In any case the non-Christian can never so much as discover any fact. On his principles he knows nothing of its nature. But when he has discovered what he cannot discover he can tell us everything about it. On his principles he knows everything if he knows anything.

Notes on Equivocism and univocism:

Univocal (also, univocity): the view that there is only one kind of reality or existence; in epistemology, that the knowledge of God and creatures are identical

Comments by Kevin Deyoung on Dolezal’s book, All that is in God:

Dolezal’s response is that Scripture speaks of God anthropomorphically and anthropathically. Dolezal rejects a univocist approach to theology in which we presume that our language about God—in its propositional claims and in its forms and modes—literally describes God’s intrinsic act of being (as opposed to the view that says our language about God is true but must not be understood in the same way we might use the same language with reference to human beings). This response is right and salutary, so long as we don’t flatten the contours of Scripture and grow uncomfortable talking about God the way the Bible talks about God.

Equivocal (also, equivocity): the epistemological position that God’s knowledge and creaturely knowledge have nothing in common

4. Each claims that his position is “in accord with the demands of logic.”

- a. The Christian claims this because he interprets the reach of logic as manipulated by man in terms of his story and therefore in terms of his presupposition of God. The story tells him that nature is made subject to man and both subject to God and his purpose. Thus his logic is in gear with reality but it does not claim to control the possible.

- b. The non-Christian claims this, but cannot put any intelligible meaning into the claim. If he works according to his presupposition about the ultimate non-rationality of facts, there is no such thing as validity to logic. All logic is then de facto and therewith void. If he works according to his presupposition about the ultimate legislative character of logic as manipulated by man, then there are no facts that can be related to one another by logic. All facts are then reduced to logic; logic has validity but a validity that is purely formal.
5. Each claims that with respect to the problem of evil his position is in accord with conscience.
- a. The Christian claims this because he interprets his moral consciousness, as an aspect of his total experience, in terms of his presuppositions. He knows that the judge of the whole earth must do right. All the facts and problems of evil and ins take their meaning from and find their solution in terms of the story of Scripture. The approvals and disapprovals of this conscience take their meaning from its story and from this story alone.
- b. The non-Christian claims this because he takes this conscience to be its own ultimate point of reference. Evil has not come into the world because of man's disobedience; it is therefore metaphysically ultimate. Evil cannot be distinguished from good; what is, ought to be. Assuming that good could be distinguished from evil, there is no right to expect that the one will ever be victorious over the other. If those who think they are good succeed in making what they think is "good" to prevail upon earth, it can only be the suppression of the "good" of others who also think they are "good." Thus, power politics would forever replace all ethical distinctions.

The sort of argument outlined above differs from the traditional method of apologetics, the apologetics of "old Princeton." This apologetics was derived via Butler's famous Analogy from the scholastic position.

I shall indicate this in a general way by quoting a part of a series of articles on "Defending the Faith" which appeared in the Torch and Trumpet. (see pg. 219, pg. 306 in the 4th ed. See Reformed Apologetics below, immediately following here code492)

Defending the Faith

By Cornelius Van Til

Footnotes from Scott Oliphant are added from the 4th edition of The Defense of the Faith

In this series of articles our concern will be to discover some of the main features of the Reformed approach in Christian Apologetics.

While seeking light on this question, let us turn first to the inaugural address of the late Dr. Valentine Hepp of the Free University of Amsterdam. The title of this address is Reformed Apologetic. Hepp says that a Reformed Christian must naturally be Reformed in his approach to the problem of Apologetics. Men and women do not walk about first as human beings and afterward as men and women. No more can a Reformed Christian first appear as a Christian and later as a Reformed Christian. A Reformed Christian is a Reformed Christian from the outset. If Hepp is right, then the Reformed Christian will have a distinctively Reformed approach when he is trying to win "Mr. Black" to become at once a Reformed Christian, not first a Christian and then a Reformed Christian. "Mr. Black" must become a Reformed Christian not in two but in one transaction.

The late Dr. Benjamin Breckinridge Warfield once said that Calvinism or the Reformed Faith is Christianity come to its own. Warfield did not like to identify Calvinism with the so-called "five points of Calvinism": total depravity, unconditional election, limited atonement, irresistible grace, and perseverance of the saints. Historically at least, Warfield asserts, these five points were but the "theological obverse" of the "five points of Arminianism." The "five points of Calvinism" are but so many branches of the tree of Calvinism.

Looked at as a unit, Calvinism represents the "vision of God in his majesty." Regarded a little more particularly, Calvinism implies three things. "In it, objectively speaking, theism comes to its rights; subjectively speaking, the religious relation attains its purity; soteriologically speaking, evangelical religion finds at length its full expression and its secure stability." Amplifying this statement Warfield says: "I think it is important to insist that Calvinism is not a specific variety of theistic thought, religious experience, evangelical faith, but just the perfect manifestation of these things." There is but one kind of theism, religion, evangelicalism; and if there are several constructions laying claim to these names they differ from one another not as correlative species of a more inclusive genus, but only as more or less good or bad specimens of the same thing differ from one another."

If Warfield is right, then our conclusion must be the same as that based on Hepp's remarks. The Reformed Faith is theism come to its own. If there be other theisms, they are not true theisms. How could they be? Are there several true Gods? There is but one true God; there is therefore but one true theism, namely, Christian theism, the theism of the Bible. There is but one God, the God triune of the Scriptures. And it is the vision of this God "in his majesty" that constitutes the essence of the Reformed Faith. It is to the recognition of this God as wholly sovereign that the Reformed Christian would win "Mr. Black." [Mr. Black is the unbeliever.]

Two Negative Conclusions

Two general conclusions of a negative nature may now be drawn. First, the Reformed apologist cannot cooperate with the Romanist in the establishment of the existence of God. The theism of the Roman Catholic theology is not "theism come to its own"; it is a vague, general sort of theism. It is a theism in which the God of Christianity and the God of Greek philosophy, particularly the Unmoved Mover of Aristotle, are ground together into a common mixture. The theism of Romanist theology is a theism heavily freighted with pagan elements of thought. If such a theism were proved to be true, then the Christian theism of the Reformed Christian would be proved to be untrue. If with the Romanist we "prove" the existence of a god, then we have disproved the existence of the God of Christianity.¹⁶ It is only a perverted type of Christianity, such as constitutes Romanism, which fits onto the perverted type of theism which is "proved" by Romanist theologians.

The second major negative conclusion to be drawn from the remarks of Hepp and Warfield is that the Reformed apologist cannot co-operate with the "evangelical" in providing the truth of evangelicalism. By evangelicalism we mean what Warfield meant when he spoke of it as identical with the general non-Reformed Protestantism.¹⁷

¹⁶ The reason Van Til contends that proving the God of Romanism disproves the true God is, in part, that the attributes of the former conflict with the attributes of the latter. In the context of Romanist apologetics, God has not clearly revealed himself in nature is not sovereign over all the affairs of men, and is demonstrated on the basis of a mutual commitment to neutral principles. Such things do not comport with the triune God of Scripture.

Given Warfield's discussion, the relationship of evangelicalism to Reformed theology can be seen from at least two different perspectives. If one views Christianity from a "lowest common denominator" perspective, then Reformed theology is a species of the more general evangelical religion. Warfield, however, prefers to view Christianity from the perspective of Calvinism which, he argues is the most consistent expression, and thus in that sense, the "highest" expression of theology compared to other, lesser consistent theologies including evangelicalism. Viewing theology in this latter way places the emphasis not on what unifies Christians doctrinally but on what (theologically, at least) purifies them. Van Til prefers Warfield's categories.

One should not think Warfield's view to be one of arrogance. We Christians responsible under God to be as biblical as we can be in our thinking and in our living. If we believe that the theology we hold is biblical, and is the most consistently biblical, then we will believe that it is the "highest" expression of biblical truth. If we do not believe that the theology we hold is the most consistently biblical, then we are foolish to hold it.

This second negative conclusion follows directly from the first. The evangelical does want to co-operate with the Romanist in proving the truth of theism. He argues that Protestants have many doctrines in common with Romanists, and that the existence of God is the most basic of them. Why then he asks in amazement, cannot Protestants co-operate with Romanists in proving the truth of theism? Why not have the Romanist help us build the first story of the house of Christian theism? After they have helped us build the first story of our house, we can dismiss them with thanks for their services and proceed to build the second story, the story of Protestantism, ourselves.

The answer to this is that if Romanists have helped us in building the first story of our house, then the whole house will tumble into ruins. It has already been noted that when they build the first story of their house the Romanists mix a great deal of the clay of paganism with the iron of Christianity. The concrete blocks may be those of Christianity, but the cement is nothing other than the sand of paganism. Woe to the Protestant who seeks to build his Protestantism as a second story upon a supposedly theistic foundation, and a first story built by Romanism or by Protestants in conjunction with Romanists. Only a defective Protestantism can be built upon the perverted theism of the Romanist type. For, as Warfield puts it, the precise characterization of evangelicalism is that which describes it as a defective Protestantism. Warfield's point is that evangelicalism is inconsistent Protestantism. It has carried into its system certain foreign elements - elements ultimately derived by way of Romanism from paganism.

Are We Extremists?

"But" some one will exclaim, "look where you have brought us! To what extremes you have gone! Not to speak of Romanists, are we not even to co-operate with evangelicals? I know many evangelicals who are much better Christians than are many Calvinists." But this is not the issue. The question is not as to who Christians are and who are going to heaven. We are not judging men's hearts. Many evangelicals are no doubt better Calvinists in practice than other men who are officially known as Calvinists.

The point is that we are now speaking of theological systems. When Warfield makes the high claim that Calvinism is "nothing more or less than the hope of the world,"⁵ he is speaking of the Reformed system of theology and of the Reformed point of view in general. Other types of theology are super-naturalistic in patches. To some extent they yield to the idea of autosoterism, to the idea that man to some degree is saved by his own effort. Therefore, argues Warfield, "Calvinism is just Christianity."⁶ But then, by precisely the same reasoning, Reformed apologetics is the hope of the world.¹⁸

¹⁸ The point to be made again: If Reformed theology is the hope of the world, then Reformed apologetics is the hope of the world. Reformed apologetics exists and subsists on the basis of Reformed theology.

A further objection may be met here: Have not certain Reformed theologians been willing in some measure to co-operate with Romanists in defending theism and with evangelicals in defending evangelicalism, in order, after that, to defend the specific doctrines of Calvinism. Are they all wrong and are you alone, right?

The answer to this objection is not easy. It would require separate and extensive discussion to do it justice. There is, no doubt, some measure of truth in the contention that at least some Reformed theologians have been willing to follow the method of co-operation first and distinctiveness afterward. Over against this stands the fact that other Reformed theologians, seeing, as they thought, the compromising result of such a method, have argued that the very idea of apologetics as a positive theological discipline is out of accord with the principles of the Reformed Faith. Or again, some have argued that apologetics must at most be given a very small task in the way of warding off the attacks of the enemy. The difference between Warfield and Kuyper on the question of apologetics is well known. Are we to be reprimanded in advance for not agreeing with Kuyper? Or for not agreeing with Warfield? Let us rather seek to listen to both Warfield and Kuyper and also to Calvin, and then do the best we can as well ask just what the genius of the Reformed Faith requires of us, is there anything else that anyone today can do?

A third party is anxious to ask a question here. Are all the efforts of evangelical apologists then to no avail? Are we to make no use whatsoever of the research done by them in such fields as biblical history and archaeology, to mention nothing more?

Let us reply to these questions with other questions. Reformed theologians do not co-operate with Arminian theologians in the preaching of the gospel. Do they therefore conclude that all Arminian preaching is to no avail? God uses even defective preaching to accomplish his purposes; so, God also uses defective reasoning to bring men to himself. And as for the results of evangelical scholarship, the Reformed apologist should gratefully employ all that is true and good in it. What is true and good in it derives from the measure of Calvinism any form of Christianity contains. But when it comes to the master plan of procedure, the Reformed apologist must go his own way; and it is only of the master plan that we speak when we deal with the question of apologetics in general. Solomon made use even of the Sidonians when building the temple of the Lord, but he did not give them membership on his building committee.

The Basic Difference

A fourth party now asks: "Granting all this for the sake of argument, can you tell us in a few words wherein you think the main difference consists between a Reformed and a Romanist of evangelical apologists?"

Here, indeed, is the heart of the matter. It is not easy to answer this question. But let us try to deal with it as best we can in a general way before going on to further specific points.

The basic difference between the two types of apologetics is to be found, we believe, in the primary assumption that each party makes. The Romanist-evangelical type of apologetics assumes that man can first know much about himself and the universe and afterward ask whether God exists, and Christianity is true. The Reformed apologist assumes that nothing can be known by man about himself or the universe unless God exists, and Christianity is true.¹⁹

¹⁹Note here that Van Til does not say that nothing can be known by man about himself or the universe unless the first believes. Nothing can be known unless Christianity is true. All true Christians believe this, because they believe that the universe is created and sustained by God. If that is true, then unbelievers know what know because of what Scripture says, i.e., because God created and sustains them. They cannot, however, account for their knowing and doing unless they trust in Christ and come to understand such things.

It will be observed that it is this very difference that exists between the two types of theology, the Romanist-evangelical and the Reformed. The former type of theology assumes that it first knows what human freedom is from "experience." It then adjusts the doctrines of Scripture concerning God and Christianity to its notion of freedom derived from experience. The Reformed type of theology begins with Scriptures and defines human freedom in terms of its principles alone.

It is natural that this difference which is basic in the two types of theology should also be basic in the two types of apologetics. Thomas Aquinas, the Roman Catholic, and Bishop Butler, the Arminian, both talk a great deal about the nature of man and of reality as a whole before they approach the question of the existence of God or of the truth of Christianity. At least, they assume much about the nature of man and of reality as a whole while they are speaking about the possibility of the existence of God or of the truth of Christianity. Over against them stands Calvin. He will not say one word about man or about the universe except in the light of the revelation of God as given in Scripture. The very first page of The Institutes is eloquent testimony to this fact.

Otherwise expressed, it may be said that the Reformed apologist does while the Romanist-evangelical apologist does not make the Creator-creature distinction basic in all that he says about anything. His argument is that unless this distinction is made basic to all that man says about anything, then whatever man says is fundamentally untrue. The natural man, who assumes that he himself and the facts about him are not created, therefore assumes what is basically false. Everything he says about himself, and the universe will be colored by this assumption. It is therefore impossible to grant that he is right, basically right, in what he says about any fact. If he says what is right in detail about any fact, this is in spite of, not because of his basically false assumption.

Since the Romanist-evangelical apologist does not make the Creator-creature distinction basic to the very first thing that he says about man or the universe, he is willing to join hands with the natural man, and together with him "discover" many "truths" about man and the universe. He will make common ground with the unbeliever as in science or in philosophy they investigate together the nature of Reality as a whole. He will agree with the natural man as he speaks about "being in general," and only afterward argue against the unbeliever for the necessity of introducing the Creator-creature distinction. So, Butler [an Arminian apologist] agrees with the deists on their view of the "course and constitution" of nature, and afterward tries to persuade them that they ought also to believe in Christ.

Of course, the reason why the one type of apologetics does and the other does not wish to make the Creator-creature distinction basic at the outset of all predications is to be found in the differing conceptions of sin. The natural man does not want to make the Creator-Creature distinction basic in his thought. The sinner does not want to recognize the fact that he is a creature of God, as such responsible to God, and because of his sin under the judgment of God. This is to be expected. But why should Christians who have confessed their sins to God, who have therefore recognized him as Creator and Lord, and especially why should evangelicals who confess that they hold to the Bible as their only infallible rule of authority, not wish to bring their every thought captive to the obedience of Christ? In other words, how do you account for the fact that evangelicals carry into their theology and into their apologetics so much foreign material? It is, of course, because of their defective view of sin. In fact, their defective view of sin is itself of foreign origin. More must be said about this subject later.

For the moment: let us be keenly aware of the fact that we who seek to escape the defective views of sin and of creation involved in evangelical theology and apologetics are always defective in practice. Precisely the same tendency toward the acceptance of a low view of and of creation that we deprecate in our brethren is found in ourselves. We should therefore seek to win ourselves in practice as well as our brethren in theory to an acceptance of the implications of a fully biblical view of sin and creation in the field of apologetics. Of these implications it will be our concern to speak in what follows.

The Believer Meets the Unbeliever²⁰

Vol. Issue 2 pgs. 17ff

Pg 225 in the book – this is a good role-play with and unbeliever, Mr. Black, an Arminian/traditional Evangelical, Mr. Grey, and a Calvinist/Reformed believer, Mr. White in their apologetic approach.

²⁰ It should be noted here, as Van Til begins his hypothetical dialogue between Mr. Black, Mr. Grey, and Mr. White, that the discussion proceeds on the basis of the principles of the three men, not necessarily on the basis of their practice. Van Til is using this dialogue to highlight the differences in principle between the three positions. So, Mr. Black is not as black as he can be; neither do Mr. White and Mr. Grey fully display their "theological colors" in practice. The dialogue is for pedagogical, not practical, purposes.

In the first article of this series the contention was made that one who holds to the Reformed Faith in theology should, to be consistent, also hold to a Reformed method in Apologetics. In practice this means that we should try to win Mr. Black, the non-Christian, to an acceptance of Christianity as it is to be identified with the Reformed Faith, which is Christianity come to its own. We should not try to win men to acceptance first of Christianity in general and afterwards to "the five points of Calvinism." The transition from non-Christianity or paganism to the Reformed Faith as full-fledged Christianity must be made in one transaction.

To see clearly what is meant think of a dentist. You go to him with a "bad tooth." Does he take care of your tooth in two operations? To be sure, you may have to come back to have him finish the job. But it is one job he is doing. He takes all the decayed matter out before he fills the cavity. Well, Mr. Black is the man with the toothache, and you, as a Reformed Christian, are the dentist. Would you first convert him to Evangelicalism and then to the Reformed Faith? Then you would be like a dentist who would today take half the decayed matter out and fill the cavity, and tomorrow or next week take out the rest of the decayed matter and fill the cavity again. Or, rather, you would be like the dentist who takes part of the decayed matter out, fills the cavity, and then lets the patient go until a long time later he returns complaining again of a toothache.

Indeed, it is no fun to have the dentist drill deep into your tooth. And it is the last and deepest drilling that hurts most. So, Mr. Black is likely to feel more at home in the office of the "evangelical" dentist than in the office of the "Reformed" dentist. Will the latter have any customers? He is likely to fear that he will not. He is ever tempted, therefore, to advertise that he is cooperating with all good "conservatives" in all good dentistry, but that he has a specialty which it would be very nice for people to see him about.

The X-ray Machine

Let us now ask by what means we may diagnose Mr. Black. For that purpose, we use the X-ray machine. Whence do you know your misery? Out of the law, the revealed will of God, answers the Reformed Christian. Let us call him Mr. White. It is by means of the Bible, not by personal experience, that he turns the light on himself, as well as on Mr. Black. He does not appeal to "experience" or to "reason" or to "history" or to anything else as his source of information in the way that he appeals to the Bible.²¹ He may appeal to experience, but his appeal will be to experience as seen in the light of the Bible. So, he may appeal to reason or to history, but, again, only as they are to be seen in the light of the bible. He does not even look for corroboration for the teachings of Scripture from experience, reason or history except insofar as these are themselves first seen in the light of the Bible. For him the Bible, and therefore the God of the Bible, is like the sun from which the light that is given by oil lamps, gas lamps and electrical light is derived.

²¹ Note: "He does not appeal to experience, or to reason, or to history ...in the way that he appeals to the Bible." Van Til is not saying that such things cannot be used in apologetics, but that they cannot take the authoritative place reserved for Scripture alone.

Quite different is the attitude of the "evangelical" or "conservative." Let us call him Mr. Grey. Mr. Grey uses the Bible, experience, reason or logic as equally independent sources of information about his own and therefore about Mr. Black's predicament. I do not say that for Mr. Grey the Bible, experience and reason are equally important. Indeed, they are not. He knows that the Bible is by far the most important. But he none the less constantly appeals to "the facts of experience" and to "logic" without first dealing with the very idea of fact and with the idea of logic in terms of the Scripture.

The difference is basic. When Mr. White diagnoses Mr. Black's case he takes as his X-ray machine the Bible only. When Mr. Grey diagnoses Mr. Black's case he first takes the X-ray machine of experience, then the X-ray machine of logic, and finally his biggest X-ray machine, the Bible. In fact, he may take these in any order. Each of them is an independent source of information for him.

Mr. Grey Analyzes Mr. Black

Let us first look briefly at a typical sample of procedure generally followed in conservative or evangelical circles today. Let us, in other words, note how Mr. Grey proceeds with an analysis of Mr. Black. And let us at the same time see how Mr. Grey would win Mr. Black to an acceptance of Christianity. We take for this purpose a series of articles which appeared in the January, February and March 1950, issues of Moody Monthly, published by the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago. Edward John Carnell, Ph. D, author of An Introduction to Christian Apologetics and professor of Apologetics at Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, wrote this series. Carnell's writings are among the best that appear in evangelical circles. In fact, in his book Carnell frequently argues as we would expect a Reformed apologist to argue. By and large, however, he represents the evangelical rather than the Reformed method in Apologetics.

When Mr. Carnell instructs his readers "How Every Christian Can Defend His Faith," he first appeals to facts and to logic as independent sources of information about the truth of Christianity. Of course, he must bring in the Bible even at this point. But the Bible is brought in only as a book of information about the fact of what has historically been called Christianity. It is not from the beginning brought in as God's Word. It must be shown to Mr. Black to be the Word of God by means of "facts" and "logic." Carnell would thus avoid at all costs the charge of reasoning in a circle. He does not want Mr. Black to point the finger at him and say: "You prove that the Bible is true by an appeal to the Bible itself. That is circular reasoning. How can any person with any respect for logic accept such a method of proof?"

Carnell would escape such a charge by showing that the facts of experience, such as all men recognize, and logic, such as all men must use, point to the truth of Scripture. This is what he says: "If you are of a philosophic turn, you can point to the remarkable way in which Christianity fits in with the moral sense inherent in every human being, or the influence of Christ on our ethics, customs, literature, art and music. Finally, you can draw upon your own experience in speaking of the reality of answered prayer and the witness of the Spirit in your own heart. . . . If the person is impressed with this evidence, turn at once to the gospel. Read crucial passages and permit the Spirit to work on the inner recesses of the heart. Remember that apologetics is merely a preparation. After the ground has been broken, proceed immediately with sowing and watering."⁷

It is assumed in this argument that Mr. Black agrees with the "evangelical," Mr. Grey, on the character of the "moral sense" of man. This may be true, but then it is true because Mr. Grey has himself not taken his information about the moral sense of man exclusively from Scripture. If with Mr. White he had taken his conception of the moral nature of man from the Bible, then he would hold that Mr. Black, as totally depraved, will, of course, misinterpret his own moral nature. True, Christianity is in accord with the moral nature of man. But this is so only because the moral nature of man is first in accord with what the Bible says it is, that is, originally created perfect, but now wholly corrupted in its desires through the fall of man.

The Boy or the Rock

If you are reasoning with a naturalist, Carnell advises his readers, ask him why when a child throws a rock through his window, he chases the child and not the rock. Presumably even a naturalist knows that the child, not the rock, is free and therefore responsible. "A bottle of water cannot ought; it must. When once the free spirit of man is proved, the moral argument - the existence of a God who imposes moral obligations - can form the bridge from man to God."

Here the fundamental difference between Mr. Grey's and Mr. White's approach to Mr. Black appears. The difference lies in the different notions of the free will of man. Or, it may be said, the difference is with respect to the nature of man as such. Mr. White would define man, and therefore his freedom, in terms of Scripture alone. He would therefore begin with the fact that man is the creature of God. And this implies that man's freedom is a derivative freedom. It is a freedom that is not and can not be wholly ultimate, that is, self-dependent. Mr. White knows that Mr. Black would not agree with him in this analysis of man and of his freedom. He knows that Mr. Black would not agree with him on this any more than he would agree on the biblical idea of total depravity.

Mr. Grey, on the other hand, must at all costs have "a point of contact" in the system of thought of Mr. Black, who is typical of the natural man. Just as Mr. Grey is afraid of being charged with circular reasoning, so he is also afraid of being charged with talking about something that is "outside of experience." And so, he is driven to talk in general about the "free spirit of man." Of course, Mr. Black need have no objections from his point of view in allowing for the "free spirit of man." That is at bottom what he holds even when he is a naturalist. His whole position is based upon the idea of man as a free spirit, that is, a spirit that is not subject to the law of his Creator God. And Carnell does not distinguish between the biblical doctrine of freedom, as based upon and involved in the fact of man's creation, and the doctrine of freedom, in the sense of autonomy, which makes man a law unto himself.

Of course, Mr. Black will be greatly impressed with such an argument as Mr. Grey has presented to him for the truth of Christianity. In fact, if Christianity is thus shown to be in accord with the moral nature of man, as Mr. Black himself sees that moral nature, then Mr. Black does not need to be converted at all to accept Christianity. He only needs to accept something additional to what he has always believed. He has been shown how nice it would be to have a second story built on top of the house which he has already built according to his own plans. [hence, the danger of starting with unbiblical presuppositions.]

To be sure, the evangelical intends no such thing. Least of all does Carnell intend such a thing. But why then does not the "Evangelical" see that by presenting the non-Christian with Evangelicalism rather than with the Reformed Faith he must compromise the Christian religion? And why does he not also see that in doing what he does the non-Christian is not really challenged either by fact or by logic? For facts and logic which are not themselves first seen in the light of Christianity have, in the nature of the case, no power in them to challenge the unbeliever to change his position. Facts and logic, not based upon the creation doctrine and not placed in the context of the doctrine of God's all-embracing Providence, are without relation to one another and therefore wholly meaningless.²⁴

²⁴ One of the main reasons that Van Til says that facts and logic, apart from the doctrines of creation and providence, "are without relation to one another" is that facts, on a non-Christian construal, are such that they arise from chance, have no interpretation, and cannot be truly known. [hence, are brute facts - codebrute] Logic, on the other hand, is assumed to be a "law" whereby its principles are true universally. How can it be, then, that chance-produced and controlled facts can have any relationship to something meant to be as immutable and universal as logic? On a non-Christian basis, therefore, the facts and laws cannot be shown to be related to each other, though such a relationship is taken for granted at almost every point.

It is this fact which must be shown to Mr. Black. The folly of holding to any view of life except that which is frankly based upon the Bible as the absolute authority for man must be pointed out to him. Only then are we doing what Paul did when he said: "Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of the world" (1 Cor 1:20)?

Mr. White Analyzes Mr. Black

As a Reformed Christian Mr. White therefore cannot cooperate with Mr. Grey in his analysis of Mr. Black. This fact may appear more clearly if we turn to see how Mr. Black appears when he is analyzed by Mr. White in terms of the Bible alone.

Now, according to Mr. White's analysis, Mr. Black is not a murderer. He is not necessarily a drunkard or a dope addict. He lives in one of the suburbs. He is every whit a gentleman. He gives to the Red Cross and to the Red Feather campaigns. He was a boy scout; he is a member of a lodge; he is very much civic minded; now and then his name is mentioned in the papers as an asset to the community. But we know that he is spiritually dead. He is filled with the spirit of error. Perhaps he is a member of a "fine church" in the community, but nevertheless he is one of a "people that do err in their heart" (Ps 95:10). He lives in a stupor (Rom 11:8). To him the wisdom of God is foolishness. The truth about God, and about himself in relation to God, is obnoxious to him. He does not want to hear of it. He seeks to close eyes and ears to those who give witness of the truth. He is, in short, utterly self-deceived.

Actually, Mr. Black is certain that he looks at life in the only proper way. Even if he has doubts as to the truth of what he believes, he does not see how any sensible or rational man could believe or do otherwise. If he has doubts it is because no one can be fully sure of himself. If he has fears, it is because fear is to be expected in the hazardous situation in which modern man lives. If he sees men's minds break down, he thinks this is to be expected under current conditions of stress and strain. If he sees grown men act like children, he says that they, after all, were once children; if he sees them act like beasts, he says that they were once beasts. Everything, including the "abnormal" is to him "normal." In all this Mr. Black has obviously taken for granted that what the Bible says about the world and himself is not true. He has taken this for granted. He may never have argued the point. He has cemented yellow spectacles to his own eyes. He cannot remove them because he will not remove them. He is blind and loves to be blind.

Do not think that Mr. Black has an easy time of it. He is the man who always "kicks against the pricks." His conscience troubles him all the time. Deep down in his heart he knows that what the Bible says about him and about the world is true. Even if he has never heard of the Bible, he knows that he is a creature of God and that he has broken the law of God (Rom 1.19-20; Rom 2:14-15). When the prodigal son left his father's house, he could not immediately efface from his memory the look and the voice of his father. How that look and that voice came back to him when he was at the swine trough! How hard he had tried to live as though the money with which he so freely entertained his "friends" had not come from his father! When asked where he came from, he would answer that he came "from the other side." He did not want to be reminded of his past. Yet he could not forget it. It required a constant act of suppression to forget the past. But that very act of suppression itself keeps alive the memory of the past.

So also, with Mr. Black. He daily changes the truth of God into a lie. He daily worships and serves the creature more than the Creator. He daily holds the truth in unrighteousness (Rom. 1:18). But what a time he has with himself! He may try to sear his conscience as with a hot iron. He may seek to escape the influence of all those who witness to the truth. But he can never escape himself as witness-bearer to the truth.

His conscience keeps telling him: "Mr. Black, you are a fugitive from justice. You have run away from home, from your father's bountiful love. You are an ingrate, a sneak, a rascal! You shall not escape meeting justice at last. The father still feeds you. Yet you despise the riches of his goodness and forbearance and long-suffering; not recognizing that the goodness of God is calculated to lead you to repentance (Rom 2:4). Why do you kick against the pricks? Why do you stifle the voice of your conscience? Why do you use the wonderful intellect that God has given you as a tool for the suppression of the voice of God which speaks to you through yourself and through your environment? Why do you build your house on sand instead of on rock? Can you be sure that no storm is ever coming? Are you omniscient? Are you omnipotent? You say that nobody knows whether God exists or whether Christianity is true. You say that nobody knows this because man is finite. Yet you assume that God cannot exist, and that Christianity cannot be true. You assume that no judgment will ever come. You must be omniscient to know that. And yet you have just said that all man declares about 'the beyond' must be based upon his brief span of existence in this world of time and chance. How, then, if you have taken for granted that chance is one of the basic ingredients of all human experience, can you at the same time say what can or cannot be in all time to come? You certainly have made a fool of yourself, Mr. Black," says Mr. Black to himself. "You reject the claims of truth which you know to be the truth, and you do that in terms of the lie which really you know to be the lie."

It is not always that Mr. Black is thus aware of the fact that he lives like the prodigal who would eat of the things the swine did eat, but who knows he cannot because he is a human being. He is not always thus aware of his folly - in part at least, because of the failure of evangelicals, and particularly because of the failure of Reformed Christians to stir him up to a realization of his folly. The evangelical does not want to stir him up thus. It is in the nature of his own theology not to stir him up to a realization of this basic depth of folly. But the Reformed Christian should, on his basis, want to stir up Mr. Black to an appreciation of the folly of his ways.

However, when the Reformed Christian, Mr. White, is to any extent aware of the richness of his own position and actually has the courage to challenge Mr. Black by presenting to him the picture of himself as taken through the X-ray machine called the Bible, he faces the charge of "circular reasoning" and of finding no "point of contact" with experience. And he will also be subject to the criticism of the evangelical for speaking as if Christianity were irrational and for failing to reach the man in the street.

Thus, we seem to be in a bad predicament. There is a basic difference of policy between Mr. White and Mr. Grey as to how to deal with Mr. Black. Mr. Grey thinks that Mr. Black is not really such a bad fellow. It is possible, he thinks to live with Mr. Black in the same world. And he is pretty strong. So, it is best to make a compromise peace with him. That seems to be the way of the wise and practical politician. On the other hand, Mr. White thinks that it is impossible permanently to live in the same world with Mr. Black. Mr. Black, he says, must therefore be placed before the requirement of absolute and unconditional surrender. And surely it would be out of the question for Mr. White first to make a compromise peace with Mr. Black and then, after all, to require unconditional surrender. But what then about this charge of circular reasoning and about this charge of having no point of contact with the unbeliever?

Volume 1, Issue 3. Pages 16ff

The one main question to which we are addressing ourselves in this series of articles is whether Christians holding to the Reformed faith should also hold to a specifically Reformed method when they are engaged in the defense of the faith.

This broad question does not pertain merely to the "five points of Calvinism." When Lutherans or Arminians attack these great doctrines (total depravity, unconditional election, limited atonement, irresistible grace, perseverance of the saints) we, as Calvinists, are quick to defend them. We believe that these five points are directly based upon Scripture. But the question now under discussion is whether, in the defense of any Christian doctrine, Reformed Christians should use a method all their own.

The Negative Answer

People easily give a negative reply to this question. Do we not have many doctrines in common with all evangelicals? Don't all orthodox Protestants hold to the substitutionary atonement of Christ? More particularly, what about the simple statements of fact recorded in Scripture? How could anyone, if he believes such statements at all, take them otherwise than as simple statements of fact? How could anyone have a specifically Reformed doctrine of such a fact as the resurrection of Christ? If together with evangelicals we accept certain simple truths and facts of Scripture at face value, how then can we be said to have a separate method of defense of such doctrines?

The Positive Answer

Yet it can readily be shown that this negative answer cannot be maintained. Take, for example, the doctrine of the atonement. The Arminian doctrine of the atonement is not the same as the Reformed doctrine of the atonement. Both the Arminian and the Calvinist assert that they believe in the substitutionary atonement. But the Arminian conception of the substitutionary atonement is colored, and as Calvinists we believe discolored, by his view of "free will." According to the Arminian view, man has absolute or ultimate power to accept or to reject the salvation offered him. This implies that the salvation offered to man is merely the possibility of salvation.²⁶

To illustrate: suppose I deposit one million dollars to your account in your bank. It is still altogether up to you to believe that such wealth is yours, and to use it to cover the floor of your house with Persian rugs in place of the old threadbare rugs now there.²⁷ Thus, in the Arminian scheme, the very possibility of things no longer depends exclusively upon God, but, in some areas at least, upon man. What Christ did for us is made to depend for its effectiveness upon what is done by us. It is no longer right to say that with God all things are possible.

²⁷ This illustration may be confusing. It might be better to suppose that I open a bank account, and promise to put one million dollars there, but only if you will believe that the million dollars is yours.

It is obvious, therefore, that Arminians have taken into their Protestantism a good bit of the leaven of Roman Catholicism. Arminianism is less radical, less consistent in its Protestantism than it should be. And what is true of Arminianism is true also, though in a lesser degree, of orthodox Lutheranism.

Mr. Grey On the Atonement

Now Mr. Grey, the evangelical, seems to have a relatively easy time of it when he seeks to win Mr. Black, the unbeliever, to an acceptance of "the substitutionary atonement." He can stand on "common ground" with Mr. Black on this matter of what is possible and what is impossible. Listen to Mr. Grey as he talks with Mr. Black.

"Mr. Black, have you accepted Christ as your personal Savior? Do you believe that he died on the cross your substitute? If you do not, you will surely be lost forever."

The Classic Arminian complaint against God's sovereignty and the Reformed view of man's free will:

"Well now," replies Mr. Black, "I've just had a visit from Mr. White on the same subject. You two seem to have a 'common witness' on this matter. Both of you believe that God exists, that he has created the world, that the first man, Adam, sinned, and that we are all to be sent to hell because of what that first man did, and so forth. All this is too fatalistic for me. If I am a creature, as you say I am, then I have no ultimate power of my own and therefore am not free. And if I am not free, then I am not responsible. So, if I am going to hell, it will be simply because your 'god' has determined that I should. You orthodox Christians kill morality and all humanitarian progress. I will have none of it. Good-by!"

"But wait a second," says Mr. Grey, in great haste. "I do not have a common witness with the Calvinist. I have a common witness with you against the Calvinist when it comes to all that determinism that you mention. Of course, you are free. You are absolutely free to accept or to reject the atonement that is offered to you. I offer the atonement through Christ only as a possibility. You yourself must make it an actuality for yourself. I agree with you over against the Calvinist in saying that 'possibility' is wider than the will of God. I would not for a moment say with the Calvinist that God's counsel determines 'whatsoever comes to pass.'"

"Besides, even extreme Calvinists like J. Oliver Buswell, Jr., virtually agree with both of us. Listen to what Buswell says: 'Nevertheless, my moral choices, are choices in which we are ourselves ultimate causes.' Buswell himself wants to go beyond the 'merely arbitrary answer' in Romans 9:20-21, which speaks of the potter and the clay, to the 'much more profound analysis of God's plan of redemption' in Romans 9:22-24, in which Paul pictures Pharaoh as 'one who, according to the foreknowledge of God, would rebel against God.'"⁹

Mr. Black On the Atonement

"Do I understand then," replies Mr. Black, "that you evangelicals and even the more moderate Calvinists are opposed to the determinism of the regular, old-style Calvinists of the historic Reformed Confessions? I am glad to hear that. To say that all things have been fixed from all eternity by God is terrible! It makes me shudder! What would happen to all morality and decency if all men believed such a teaching? But now you evangelicals have joined us in holding that 'possibility' is independent of the will of God. You have thus with all good people and with all modern and neo-modern theologians, like Barth, made possible the salvation of all men."

"That means, of course, that salvation is possible too for those who have never heard of Jesus of Nazareth. Salvation is therefore possible without an acceptance of your substitutionary atonement through this Jesus, of whom you speak. You certainly would not want to say with the Calvinists that God has determined the bounds of all nations and individuals and has thus, after all, determined that some men, millions of them, in fact, should never hear this gospel." [A major complaint by unbelievers and Arminians, etc.]

"Besides, if possibility is independent of God as you evangelicals and moderate Calvinists teach, then I need not be afraid of hell. It is then quite possible that there is no hell.²⁹ Hell, you will then agree, is that torture of a man's conscience which he experiences when he fails to live up to his own moral ideals. So, I do not think that I shall bother just yet about accepting Christ as my personal Savior. There is plenty of time."

²⁹ The point Van Til is making here is that, if God himself were subject to possibility such that one's decision were the ultimate determiner of what one does, then it would also be possible that what God has said about hell, or anything else, is not true. If it weren't true, it would not be God's fault, since he himself would be subject to the possible and the impossible, rather than the One who controls such things.

Mr. Grey's First Failure

Poor Mr. Grey. He really wanted to say something about having a common testimony with the Calvinists after all. At the bottom of his heart, he knew that Mr. White, the Calvinist, and not Mr. Black, the unbeliever, was his real friend. But he had made a common witness with Mr. Black against the supposed determinism of the Calvinist. Still, it was difficult for him to turn about face and also make a common testimony with Mr. White against Mr. Black. He had nothing intelligible to say. His method of defending his faith had forced him to admit that Mr. Black was basically right. He had given Mr. Black an opportunity of knowing what he was supposed to accept, but his testimony had confirmed Mr. Black in his belief that there was no need of his accepting Christ at all.

It is true, of course, that in practice Mr. Grey is much better in his theology and in his method of representing the gospel than he is here said to be. But that is because in practice every evangelical who really loves his Lord is a Calvinist at heart. How could he really pray to God for help if he believed that there was a possibility that God could not help? In their hearts all true Christians believe that God controls "whatsoever comes to pass." But the Calvinist cannot have a common witness for the substitutionary atonement with "evangelicals" who first make a common witness with the unbeliever against him on the all-determining question whether God controls all things that happen.

Requirements For Effective Witness

It must always be remembered that the first requirement for effective witnessing is that the position to which witness is given be intelligible. Evangelicalism, when consistently carried out, destroys this intelligibility.

The second requirement for effective witnessing is that he to whom the witness is given must be shown why he should forsake his own position and accept that which has offered him. Evangelicalism, when consistently carried out, also destroys the reason why the unbeliever should accept the gospel. Why should the unbeliever change his position if he is not shown that it is wrong? And, in particular, why should he change if the one who asks him to change is actually encouraging him in thinking that he is right? The Calvinist will need to have a better method of defending the doctrine of the atonement, for example, than that of the evangelical.

The Resurrection of Christ

We have dealt with the doctrine of the atonement. That led us into the involved question whether God is the source of possibility, or whether possibility is the source of God. It has been shown that the "evangelical" or Arminian fundamentalist holds to a position which requires him to make both of these contradictory assertions at once. But how about the realm of fact? Do you also hold, I am asked, that we need to seek for a specifically Reformed method of defending the facts of Christianity? Take the resurrection of Christ as an example why can there be no common witness on the part of the evangelical and the Calvinist to such a fact as that?

Mr. Grey On the Resurrection

Once more Mr. Grey, the evangelical punches the doorbell at Mr. Black's home. Mr. Black answers and admits him.

"I am here again, Mr. Black," begins Grey, "because I am still anxious to have you accept Christ as your personal Savior. When I spoke to you the other time about the atonement you got me into deep water. We got all tangled up on the question of 'possibility.'"

"But now I have something far simpler. I want to deal with simple facts. I want to show you that the resurrection of Jesus from the dead is as truly a fact as any that you can mention. To use the words of Wilbur Smith, himself a Calvinist but opposed to the idea of a distinctively Reformed method for the defense of the faith: 'The meaning of the resurrection is a theological matter, but the fact of the resurrection is a historical matter; the nature of the resurrection body of Jesus may be a mystery, but the fact that the body disappeared from the tomb is a matter to be decided upon by historical evidence.'¹⁰ And the historical evidence for the resurrection is the kind of evidence that you as a scientist would desire."

"Smith writes in the same book: 'About a year ago, after studying over a long period of time this entire problem of our Lord's resurrection, and having written some hundreds of pages upon it at different times, I was suddenly arrested by the thought that the very kind of evidence which modern science, and even psychologists, are so insistent upon for determining the reality of any object under consideration is the kind of evidence that we have presented to us in the Gospels regarding the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, namely, the things that are seen with the human eye, touched with the human hand, and heard by the human ear. This is what we call empirical evidence. It would almost seem as if parts of the Gospel records of the resurrection were actually written for such a day as ours when empiricism so dominates men's thinking.'"

"Now I think that Smith is quite right in thus distinguishing sharply between the fact and the meaning of the resurrection. And I am now only asking you to accept the fact of the resurrection. There is the clearest possible empirical evidence for this fact. The living Jesus was touched with human hands and seen with human eyes of sensible men after he had been crucified and put into the tomb. Surely you ought to believe in the resurrection of Christ as a historical fact. And to believe in the resurrected Christ is to be saved."

"But hold on a second," says Mr. Black. "Your friend the Calvinist, Mr. White, has been ahead of you again. He was here last night and spoke of the same thing. However, he did not thus distinguish between the fact and the meaning of the resurrection. At least, he did not for a moment want to separate the fact of the resurrection from the system of Christianity in terms of which it gets its meaning. The spoke of Jesus Christ the Son of God, as rising from the dead. The spoke of the Son of God through whom the world was made and through whom the world is sustained as having risen from the dead. And when I asked him how this God could die and rise from the dead, he said that God did not die and rise from the dead but that the second person of the trinity had taken to himself a human nature, and that it was in this human nature that he died and rose again. In short, in accepting the fact of the resurrection he wanted me also to take all this abracadabra into the bargain. And I have a suspicion that you are secretly trying to have me do something similar."

"No, no," replies Mr. Grey. "I am in complete agreement with you over against the Calvinist. I have a common witness with you against him. I, too, would separate fact and system. Did I not agree with you against the Calvinist, in holding that possibility is independent of God? Well then, by the same token I hold that all kinds of facts happen apart from the plan of God. So, we evangelicals are in a position, as the Calvinists are not, of speaking with you on neutral ground. With you, we would simply talk about the facts of Christianity without bringing into the picture anything about the meaning or the significance of those facts."

"It makes me smile," continues Mr. Grey, "when I think of Mr. White coming over here trying to convert you. That poor fellow is always reasoning in circles. I suppose that such reasoning in circles goes with his determinism. [That God determines the outcome, not man, not man's will.] He is always talking about his self-contained God. He says that all facts are what they are because of the plan of this God. Then each fact would of necessity, to be a fact at all, prove the truth of the Christian system of things and, in turn, would be proved as existing by virtue of this self-same Christian system of things. I realize full well that you, as a modern scientist and philosopher, can have no truck with such horrible, circular reasoning as that."

"It is for this reason that, as evangelicals, we have now separated sharply between the resurrection as a historical fact and the meaning of the resurrection. I'm merely asking you to accept the fact of the resurrection. I am not asking you to do anything that you cannot do in full consistency with your freedom and with the 'scientific method.'"

Mr. Black Replies on the Resurrection

"Well, that is delightful," replies Mr. Black. "I always felt that the Calvinists were our real foes. But I read something in the paper the other day to the effect that some Calvinist churches or individuals were proposing to make a common witness with evangelicals for the gospel. Now I was under the impression that the gospel had something to do with being saved from hell and going to heaven. I knew that the modernists and the 'new modernists,' like Barth, do not believe in tying up the facts of history with such wild speculations. It was my opinion that 'fundamentalists' did tie up belief in historical facts, such as the death and the resurrection of Jesus, with going to heaven or to hell. So, I am delighted that you, though a fundamentalist, are willing to join with the modernist and the neo-modernist in separating historical facts from such a rationalistic system as I knew Christianity was."

"Now as for accepting the resurrection of Jesus," continued Mr. Black, "as thus properly separated from the traditional system of theology. I do not in the least mind doing that. To tell you the truth, I have accepted the resurrection as a fact now for some time. The evidence for it is overwhelming. This is a strange universe. All kinds of 'miracles' happen in it. The universe is 'open.' So why should there not be some resurrections here and there? The resurrection of Jesus would be a fine item for Ripley's Believe It or Not. Why not send it in?"

Mr. Grey wanted to continue at this point. He wanted to speak of the common witness that he had, after all, with the Calvinist for the gospel. But it was too late. He had no "common" witness left of any sort. He had again tried to gallop off in opposite directions at the same time. He had again taken away all intelligibility from the witness that he meant to bring. He had again established Mr. Black in thinking that his own unbelieving reason was right. For it was as clear as crystal to Mr. Black, as it should have been to Mr. Grey, that belief in the fact of the resurrection, apart from the system of Christianity, amounts to belief that the Christian system is not true, is belief in the universe as run by Chance, is belief that it was not Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who rose from the dead.

To be sure, in practice the "evangelical" is much better in his witness for the resurrection of Christ than he has been presented here. But that is because every evangelical, as a sincere Christian, is at heart a Calvinist.³² But witnessing is a matter of the head as well as of the heart. If the world is to hear a consistent testimony for the Christian faith, it is the Calvinist who must give it. If there is not a distinctively Reformed method for the defense of every article of the Christian faith, then there is no way of clearly telling an unbeliever just how Christianity differs from his own position and why he should accept the Lord Jesus Christ as his personal Savior. We are happy and thankful, of course, for the work of witnessing done by evangelicals. We are happy because of the fact that, in spite of their inconsistency in presenting the Christian testimony, something, often much, of the truth of the gospel shines through unto men, and they are saved.

³² That is, every evangelical believes that one cannot separate the fact of the resurrection from its meaning; and every evangelical believes that God is sovereign over his creation, and his salvation.

 The Authority of Scripture

 Vol. 1, Issue 4, pgs. 16ff
 (Pg 241)

The difference between a Reformed and an Evangelical method of approach to unbelievers is our main concern in these articles. Our contention has been that the very nature of Reformed theology requires a distinct approach in the matter of its defense. Let us again discuss this question, this time in relation to the central problem of biblical authority. How will the Evangelical or Conservative urge upon the unbeliever the idea of accepting the Bible as the Word of God? He will, of course, tell the unbeliever that his eternal weal or woe is involved. "Christ died for your sins, and you must accept him as your Savior or you will be eternally lost," says Mr. Grey, the Conservative, to Mr. Black, the unbeliever.

Rational Probability

"But how can anyone know anything about the 'Beyond'?" asks Mr. Black.

"Well, of course," replies Mr. Grey, "if you want absolute certainty such as one gets in geometry, Christianity does not offer it. We offer you only 'rational probability.' Christianity, as I said in effect a moment ago when I spoke of the death of Christ, is founded on historical facts, which, by their very nature, cannot be demonstrated with geometric certainty. All judgments of historical particulars are at the mercy of the complexity of the time-space universe. . . . If the scientist cannot rise above rational probability in his empirical investigation, why should the Christian claim more?"¹² "And what is true of the death of Christ," adds Mr. Grey, "is, of course, also true of his resurrection. But this only shows that 'the Christian is in possession of a world-view which is making a sincere effort to come to grips with actual history.'"¹³

Gobble-de-Gook

By speaking thus, Mr. Grey seeks for a point of contact with Mr. Black. For Mr. Black, history is something that floats on an infinitely extended and bottomless ocean of Chance. Therefore, he can say that anything may happen. Who knows but the death and resurrection of Jesus as the Son of God might issue from this womb of Chance? Such events would have an equal chance of happening with "snarks, boojums, splinth, and gobble-de-gook." God himself may live in this realm of Chance. He is then "wholly other" than us. And his revelation in history would then be wholly unique.

Now the Evangelical does not challenge this underlying philosophy of Chance as it controls the unbeliever's conception of history. He is so anxious to have the unbeliever accept the possibility of God's existence and the fact of the resurrection of Christ that, if necessary, he will exchange his own philosophy of fact for that of the unbeliever. Anxious to be genuinely "empirical" like the unbeliever, he will throw all the facts of Christianity into the bottomless pit of Chance. Or, rather, he will throw all these facts at the unbeliever, and the unbeliever throws them over his back into the bottomless pit of Chance.

Of course, this is the last thing that such men as Wilbur Smith, Edward J. Carnell, and L Oliver Buswell, Jr., want to do. But in failing to challenge the philosophy of Chance that underlies the unbeliever's notion of "fact," they are in effect accepting it. [Either God is the master planner or chance rules history, etc., hence, why you have evolutionary thought, which is based on chance and un-creation, swallowed whole. Creation and evolution are incompatible.]

This approach of Mr. Grey is unavoidable if one holds to an Arminian theology. The Arminian view of man's free will implies that "possibility" is above God. But a "possibility" that is above God is the same thing as Chance. A God surrounded by Chance cannot speak with authority. He would be speaking into a vacuum. His voice could not be heard. And if God were surrounded by Chance, then human beings would be too. They would live in a vacuum, unable to hear either their own voices or those of others. Thus, the whole of history, including all of its facts, would be without meaning.

It is this that the Reformed Christian, Mr. White, would tell Mr. Black. In the very act of presenting the resurrection of Christ, or in the very act of presenting any other fact of historic Christianity, Mr. White would be presenting it as authoritatively interpreted in the Bible. He would argue that unless

Mr. Black is willing to set the facts of history in the framework of the meaning authoritatively ascribed to them in the Bible, he will make gobble-de-gook of history.

Nobody Knows

If history were what Mr. Black assumes that it is, then anything might happen and then nobody would know what may happen. No one thing would then be more likely to happen than any other thing. David Hume, the great skeptic, has effectively argued that if you allow any room for Chance in your thought, then you no longer have the right to speak of probabilities. Whirl would be king. No one hypothesis would have any more relevance to facts than any other hypothesis. Did God raise Christ from the dead? Perchance he did. Did Jupiter, do it? Perchance he did. What is Truth? Nobody knows. Such would be the picture of the universe if Mr. Black were right.

No comfort can be taken from the assurance of the Conservative that, since Christianity makes no higher claim than that of rational probability, "the system of Christianity can be refuted only by probability. Perhaps our loss is gain."¹⁴ How could one ever argue that there is a greater probability for the truth of Christianity than for the truth of its opposite if the very meaning of the word probability rests upon the idea of Chance? On this basis nature and history would be no more than a series of pointer readings pointing into the blank.

But You Are Wrong pg 243

In assuming his philosophy of Chance and thus virtually saying that nobody knows what is back of the common objects of daily observation, Mr. Black also virtually says that the Christian view of things is wrong.

If I assert that there is a black cat in the closet, and you assert that nobody knows what is in the closet, you have virtually told me that I am wrong in my hypothesis. So, when I tell Mr. Black that God exists, and he responds very graciously by saying that perhaps I am right since nobody knows what is in the "Beyond," he is virtually saying that I am wrong in my "hypothesis." He is obviously thinking of such a God as could comfortably live in the realm of Chance. But the God of Scripture cannot live in the realm of Chance.

Mr. Black's response when confronted with the claims of God and his Christ, is essentially this: Nobody knows, but nevertheless your hypothesis is certainly wrong and mine is certainly right. Nobody knows whether God exists, but God certainly does not exist, and Chance certainly does exist.

When Mr. Black thus virtually makes his universal negative assertion, saying in effect that God cannot possibly exist and that Christianity cannot possibly be true, he must surely be standing on something very solid. Is it on solid rock that he stands? No, he stands on water! He stands on his own "experience." But this experience, by his own assumption, rests again on Chance. Thus, standing on Chance, he swings the "logician's postulate" and modestly asserts what cannot be in the "Beyond," of which he said before that nothing can be said.

The Law of Noncontradiction

Of course, what Mr. Black is doing appears very reasonable to himself. "Surely," he says, if questioned at all on the subject, "a rational man must have systematic coherence in his experience. Therefore, he cannot accept as true anything that is not in accord with the law of noncontradiction. So long as you leave your God in the realm of the 'Beyond,' in the realm of the indeterminate, you may worship him by yourself alone. But so soon as you claim that your God has revealed himself in creation, in providence, or in your Scripture, so soon I shall put that revelation to a test by the principle of rational coherence."

"And by that test none of your doctrines are acceptable. All of them are contradictory. No rational man can accept any of them. If your God is eternal, then he falls outside of my experience and lives in the realm of the 'Beyond,' of the unknowable. But if he is to have anything to do with the world, then he must himself be wholly within the world. I must understand your God throughout if I am to speak intelligently of any relationship that he sustains to my world and to myself. Your idea that God is both eternal and unchangeable and yet sustains such relationships to the world as are involved in your doctrine of creation and providence, is flatly contradictory."

"For me to accept your God," continues Mr. Black, "you must do to him what Karl Barth has done to him, namely, strip him of all the attributes that orthodox theology has assigned to him, and thus enable him to turn into the opposite of himself. With that sort of God, I have a principle of unity that brings all my experience into harmony. And that God is wholly within the universe. If you offer me such a God and offer him as the simplest hypothesis with which I may, as a goal, seek to order my experience as it comes to me from the womb of Chance, then the law of noncontradiction will be satisfied. As a rational man I can settle for nothing less."

Rational Probability

"But how can anyone know anything about the 'Beyond'?" asks Mr. Black.

"Well, of course," replies Mr. Grey, "if you want absolute certainty such as one gets in geometry, Christianity does not offer it. We offer you only 'rational probability.' Christianity, as I said in effect a moment ago when I spoke of the death of Christ, is founded on historical facts, which, by their very nature, cannot be demonstrated with geometric certainty. All judgments of historical particulars are at the mercy of the complexity of the time-space universe. . . . If the scientist cannot rise above -

Rationalism and Determinism

All this amounts to saying that Mr. Black, the lover of a Chance philosophy, the indeterminist, is at the same time an out-and-out determinist or fatalist. It is to say that Mr. Black, the irrationalist, who said that nobody knows what is in the "Beyond," is at the same time a flaming rationalist.³⁴ For him only that which - so he thinks - he can exhaustively determine by logic must be. He may at first grant that anything may exist, but when he says this, he at the same time says in effect that nothing can exist and have meaning for man but that which man himself can exhaustively know. Therefore, for Mr. Black, the God of Christianity cannot exist. For him the doctrine of creation cannot be true. There could be no revelation of God to man through nature and history. There can be no such thing as the resurrection of Christ.

³⁴ Note again Van Til's analysis that unbelieving thought is, at root, dialectical; it is driven by a rationalist/irrationalist dialectic.

Strangely enough, when Mr. Black thus says that God cannot exist and that the resurrection of Christ cannot be a fact, and when he also says that God may very well exist and that the resurrection of Christ may very well be a fact, he is not inconsistent with himself. For he must, to be true to his method, contradict himself in every statement that he makes about any fact whatsoever. If he does not, then he would deny either his philosophy of Chance or his philosophy of Fate. According to him, every fact that he meets has in it the two ingredients: that of Chance and that of Fate, that of the wholly unknown and that of the wholly known. Thus, man makes the tools of thought, which the Creator has given him in order therewith to think God's thoughts after him on a created level, into the means by which he makes sure that God cannot exist, and therefore certainly cannot reveal himself.

When Mr. White meets Mr. Black, he will make this issue plain. He will tell Mr. Black that his methodology cannot make any fact or any group of facts intelligible to himself. Hear him as he speaks to the unbeliever:

"On your basis, Mr. Black, no fact can be identified by distinguishing it from any other fact. For all facts would be changing into their opposites all the time.³⁵ All would be gobble-de-gook. At the same time, nothing could change at all; all would be one block of ice.³⁶ Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?³⁷ He clearly has. I know you cannot see this even though it is perfectly clear. I know you have taken out your own eyes. Hence your inability to see is at the same time unwillingness to see. Pray God for forgiveness and repent."

³⁵ If the notion of ultimate chance were true, then the identification of any fact at any time would be subject to essential change the moment it was identified, since the world would be chaotic at root. On this basis, facts simply could not be identified in any meaningful way. Given that facts are identified, the notion of ultimate chance is shown to be absurd; the Christian position is alone defensible.

³⁷ 1 Corinthians 1:20

Mr. Grey On Logic

But what will be the approach of the Conservative, Mr. Grey, on this question of logic? He will do the same sort of thing that we saw him do with respect to the question of facts. Mr. Grey will again try to please Mr. Black by saying that, of course, he will justify his appeal to the authority of the Bible by showing that the very idea of such an appeal, as well as the content of the Bible, are fully in accord with the demands of logic.

"You are quite right in holding that nothing meaningful can be said without presupposing the validity of the law of noncontradiction," says Mr. Grey. "The conservative ardently defends a system of authority." But "without reason to canvass the evidence of a given authority, how can one segregate a right authority from a wrong one? . . . Without systematic consistency to aid us, it appears that all we can do is to draw straws, count noses, flip coins to choose an authority. Once we do apply the law of contradiction, we are no longer appealing to ipse dixit authority,⁴⁰ but to coherent truth."⁴¹ The Scriptures tell us to test the spirits (1 Jn 4:1). This can be done by applying the canons of truth. God cannot lie. His authority, therefore, and coherent truth are coincident at every point. Truth, not blind authority, saves us from being blind followers of the blind."

⁴⁰ Ipse dixit authority is authority that has its foundation in the assertion itself; it is self attesting.

⁴¹ Carnell, An Introduction to Christian Apologetics, 71

⁴² Ibid, 72.

"Bring on your revelations," continues Mr. Grey. "Let them make peace with the law of contradiction and the facts of history, and they will deserve a rational man's assent.⁴⁴ Any theology which rejects Aristotle's fourth book of the Metaphysics is big with the elements of its own destruction."²⁰ "If Paul were teaching that the crucified Christ were objectively foolish, in the sense that he cannot be rationally categorized, then he would have pointed to the insane and the demented as incarnations of truth."²¹

Mr. Black's Reaction

"Well," says Mr. Black, "this is great news indeed. I knew that the modernists were willing with us to start from human experience as the final reference point in all research. I knew that they were willing with us to start with Chance as the source of facts, in order then to manufacture such facts of nature and of history as the law of noncontradiction, based on Chance, will allow. I also knew that the new modernist, Karl Barth, is willing to make over his God so that he can change into the opposite of himself, in order that thus he may satisfy both our irrationalist philosophy of Chance and our rationalist philosophy of logic. But I did not know that there were any orthodox people who were willing to do such a thing. But you have surprised me before. You were willing to throw your resurrection into the realm of Chance in order to have me accept it. So, I really should have expected that you would also be willing to make the law of noncontradiction rest upon man himself instead of God." "And I am extremely happy that not only the Arminian Fundamentalists but also you less extreme or moderate Calvinists, like Buswell and Carnell, are now willing to test your own revelation by a principle that is wholly independent of that revelation. It is now only a matter of time, and you will see that you have to come over on our side altogether."

"I do not like the regular Calvinists. But they are certainly quite right from their own point of view. Mr. White claims that I am a creature of God. He says that all facts are made by God and controlled by the providence of God. He says that all men have sinned against God in Adam their representative. He adds that therefore I am spiritually blind and morally perverse. He says all this and more on the basis of the absolute authority of Scripture. He would interpret me, my facts, and my logic in terms of the authority of that Scripture. He says I need this authority. He says I need nothing but this authority. His Scripture, he claims, is sufficient and final. And the whole thing, he claims, is clear."

"Now all this looks like plain historic Protestantism to me. I can intellectually understand the Calvinist on this matter of authority. I cannot understand you. You seem to me to want to have your cake and eat it. If you believe in scriptural authority, then why not explain all things, man, fact, and logic in terms of it? If you want with us to live by your own authority, by the experience of the human race, then why not have done with the Bible as absolute authority? It then, at best, gives you the authority of the expert."

"In your idea of the rational man who tests all things by the facts of history and by the law of noncontradiction, you have certainly made a point of contact with us. If you carry this through, you will indeed succeed in achieving complete coincidence between your ideas and ours. And, with us, you will have achieved complete coincidence between the ideas of man and the ideas of God. But the reason for this coincidence of your ideas with ours, and for the coincidence of man's ideas with God's, is that you then have a God and a Christ who are identical with man." [Brings Christ down to man's level – dangerous.]

"Do you not think, Mr. Grey, that this is too great a price for you to pay? I am sure that you do not thus mean to drag down your God into the universe. I am sure that you do not thus mean to crucify your Christ afresh. But why then halt between two opinions? I do not believe Christianity, but, if I did, I think I would stand with Mr. White."⁴⁷

More on man's supposed autonomy and role-play with Mr. White, Black, etc.

We are concerned in this series of articles with the problem of Reformed apologetics. In the first three articles we discussed the general nature of Reformed apologetics. Its method, we saw, is radically different from that of Romanist-evangelical apologetics. The latter starts from the presupposition that man has a measure of ultimacy or autonomy. This method assumes therefore that man can correctly interpret an area of life without referring to the God of the Bible. Over against this Reformed apologetics contends that man himself must first be interpreted in terms of the Bible before he can, without falsification, interpret any area of life.

The Bible

In the fourth and fifth articles we dealt with the Bible itself. Reformed theology holds that Scripture speaks for itself. The sort of God of which the Bible speaks cannot speak otherwise than with absolute authority. The biblical notion of God as self-contained or self-sufficient and the notion that the Bible is self-authenticating are involved in one another.

This simple foundation truth of Protestantism is virtually rejected by evangelical Protestants.

Evangelicals make a two-fold charge against the Reformed doctrine of Scripture. On the one hand they say that it is irrationalistic. We saw how Carnell sets up the autonomous or "rational man" as a judge before whom the Bible must prove its right to speak with authority. This is as though a child were sitting in judgment on its parents, graciously permitting these parents to speak to it with authority.

On the other hand, evangelicals say that the Reformed doctrine of Scripture is rationalistic. We saw how Pieper, the Lutheran, sets up the autonomous man as judge over the contents of the Bible. He insists that inasmuch as the Bible teaches the "freedom" of man it can and must also teach the doctrine of a changing God who adjusts himself to the ultimate decisions of man.

The Autonomous Man

On the surface it seems strange that the Reformed doctrine of Scripture should be charged both with irrationalism and with rationalism. And on the surface, it also seems strange that the two seemingly exclusive charges spring from the same source, namely, from evangelicalism. Yet there is really nothing else that we could expect from evangelicalism. The root error of evangelicalism, as noted earlier, is its ascription of a measure of ultimacy to man. This partly ultimate man only claims its "rights" when it charges the idea of the absolute, self-authenticating authority of Scripture with irrationalism, and when it charges the idea of the absolute, self-consistent God with rationalism.

Evangelical Compromise

Of course, the evangelical, Mr. Grey, has the best of intentions in all this. He wants to win Mr. Black, the non-believer, to an acceptance of the Bible as God's Word and to an acceptance of the God of the Bible as his God. But Mr. Black has his conditions. Hard-pressed though he is, he none the less is not ready, he says, to consider the idea of an unconditional surrender, such as Mr. White, the Reformed apologist, has placed before him. Accordingly, Mr. Grey offers Mr. Black a compromise proposal. The principle of human autonomy and ultimacy is to be combined with that of biblical authority. Yet Mr. Black does not readily accept this compromise proposal.

Why not? Because he cannot clearly see, from Mr. Grey's reasoning, why he should exchange his position for that of Christianity at all. He is not shown by Mr. Grey how utterly desperate his own situation is. Nor is he shown how completely the Christian position solves the problems that are wholly baffling on his own position. Mr. Black is left in confusion. The witness of the gospel has not really been placed before him as a challenge!

Unconditional Surrender!

Meanwhile the Reformed apologist, Mr. White, has pressed upon Mr. Black the ultimatum of unconditional surrender to the authority of Scripture. He has shown that unless one presupposes this authority as absolute and not merely as that of an expert [man trusting in the wisdom of other men, John 5:44, ...you receive the glory from one another and do not seek the glory that comes from the only

God?], then man's experience operates in a vacuum. He has made plain to Mr. Black that all discussion about Christianity as being "in accord with the law of contradiction" is worse than pointless unless it first be asked on what fulcrum the law of contradiction itself rests. What sort of answer does Mr. Black give to this question? He prefers not to discuss this problem. He assumes that it rests on man's thought of as ultimate or autonomous. But on what does man then rest. Man, rests on a vacuum. And so, Mr. Black presents the picture of man resting on "nothing," using the law of contradiction as a revolving door in order by means of it to move "nothing" into "nothing." His whole procedure is that of an "encounter with nothing."

Mr. White has also made plain to Mr. Black that all discussion about Christianity being "in accord with the facts of experience" is worse than pointless unless one first has shown that he has a philosophy of fact that enables him at least to distinguish one fact from another. Can Mr. Black, on his assumed principle, distinguish one fact from another fact? No, his philosophy of fact is the philosophy of chance. His "principle of individuation," that is, the principle by which any fact is supposed to be different from any other fact, is that of chance. On this basis one cannot even count! No fact has any identity of its own. The procedure at the "tower of Babel" would be as orderly as the strictest military discipline in comparison with a scientific methodology based on such a philosophy of fact.

"So then," says Mr. White to Mr. Black, "you see that unless you are willing to presuppose the Bible as absolutely authoritative, your 'law of contradiction' could not get into gear with 'facts' and your 'facts' would not be amenable to the operation of the law of contradiction. Only on the presupposition of the absolute authority of Scripture as the Word of that God who controls 'whatsoever comes to pass' do you have a philosophy of 'reason,' a philosophy of 'the law of contradiction' and a philosophy of 'facts' that enables you to make sense out of life. Unconditional surrender to the absolute authority of Scripture is your only hope. It is your only hope for eternity. It is also the only hope for your scientific and philosophic endeavor in this life."

It appears then that the Reformed doctrine of Scripture is the only truly Protestant doctrine of Scripture. It also appears that unless we are willing to begin from this fully Protestant doctrine of Scripture, we cannot with Paul challenge the wisdom of this world, showing that it has been made foolishness with God.

General Revelation

It is to be expected that with a specifically Reformed concept of Scripture there goes a specifically Reformed concept of revelation through nature and history. And it is also to be expected that this specifically Reformed doctrine of revelation in nature and history will be charged with being both irrationalistic and rationalistic by Romanists and non-Reformed Protestants or evangelicals.

Calvinistic Rationalism

Let us look first at that aspect of the Reformed teaching on revelation in nature and history that is frequently charged with being rationalistic. The Reformed faith stresses the fact that it is God's plan that is being realized in and through what man does as well as in and through man's environment. Whatsoever comes to pass comes to pass in accordance with the one all comprehensive plan or counsel of God.

All the facts that confront man as he looks about himself and as he looks within himself are therefore revelational of God. The human mind as knowing no less than the trees that are known is revelational of God. For what happens according to the plan of God happens in accordance with the nature of God's being. Nothing could exist, either as directly made by God or as made by man, the creature of God. The subject of knowledge and the object of knowledge alike are revelational of God.

The apostle Paul says in the first chapter of Romans that all men know God. They cannot help but know God. Therefore, they cannot help but know that they themselves are creatures of God. Human self-consciousness involves God-consciousness. Human self-consciousness would be self-consciousness in a vacuum unless it implied consciousness of God. Calvin speaks of this when he says that man has the sense of deity ineradicably impressed upon him. Therefore, his freedom is the freedom of God's creature. It is freedom to do that which is in accord with or to do that which is against the revealed will of God, but in either case that which is in accord with the plan of God.

Evil

Special emphasis should be placed upon the fact that even the evil that man does by virtue of his sinful will is still in accord with the plan of God and as such is revelatory of God. Man, not God, is the responsible author of sin. But man could not sin if his sinning were not, in spite of himself, revelatory of God. Man does not sin in a vacuum. He could not sin in a vacuum. The possibility of sin presupposes the all-comprehensive plan of God. God reveals his holiness in his wrath upon the sinner. God is angry with the wicked every day. "For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold down truth in unrighteousness" (Rom 1:18). Paul tells us that the sinner's conscience excuses or accuses him according as he obeys or disobeys the revealed will of God (Rom 2:14-15). Man's self-consciousness is moral self-consciousness. And as self-consciousness in general involves consciousness of God, so man's moral self-consciousness involves consciousness of covenant relationship to God. To know himself at all, man must know himself to be a covenant being. He knows he is either keeping or breaking the covenant.

Calvin greatly stresses the fact that all things that happen in history are revelational of God. Men ought to see God everywhere, he says. God is clearly to be seen by men whether they look round about them or within them, whether they look to the past or look to the future. The whole scene of history in all of its aspects reveals God to man. Men ought to see God as their Creator. They ought to see him as their bountiful benefactor. They ought to see him as their judge. He is everywhere clearly to be seen. Men cannot look in any direction without seeing the face and therewith the claims of God. Every man walks under the brilliant spotlight of the revelational claims of God.

The Foundation of Science

When modern Calvinists present their views on the foundation and unity of human knowledge in the fields of science, philosophy, and theology they constantly refer to this basic, inescapable revelational character of all created reality. The essence of false science, false philosophy and false theology consists therefore in the suppression and rejection of this revelational foundation of human effort and enterprise. And the very purpose of squarely opposing those who reject this revelational foundation of man's work is to the intent that this work might be placed upon its proper foundation again. The antithetical effect of the Christian's effort is not an end in itself. The idea of the antithesis is based upon and is correlative to the positive idea of the all-comprehensive revelational character of the universe.

The Point of Contact

It is the basically revelational character of all created being that constitutes the foundation of truth for man. Man is inherently enveloped in and by truth. But truth is not an abstraction. Truth is truth about God and the universe. Thus, man is naturally confronted by truth. When he speaks untruth, he speaks that which, at bottom, he knows to be untruth. When philosophers think out systems of philosophy that are not based upon the Creator-creature distinction they know, in the depth of their hearts, that they are doing this in order to suppress the truth about themselves. Knowing God to be their Creator they glorify him not as such.

When Mr. White, the Reformed apologist, approaches Mr. Black, the unbeliever, with the claims of God and of Christ, he knows in advance that the victory is his. He knows that no man can successfully seek for truth if first he has cut himself off from truth. And he knows that those who try to cut themselves off from truth cannot really succeed in doing so. Accordingly, Mr. Black, the man who starts from himself without owning his own creatureliness is like the man who, standing in the light of the sun, takes out his eyes and then wonders whether the sun exists.

In talking to Mr. Black, Mr. White will be courteous and kind. But he will not fail to point out that on his assumptions, Mr. Black cannot find the truth because he cannot even seek for it. He cannot on his basis ask a single intelligent question. When Mr. Black hears of this he turns to Mr. Grey for sympathy. He knows that Mr. White is right but, unless the Holy Spirit quickens him, he will continue to suppress the truth.

Negotiated Peace

Mr. Grey, the evangelical, hastens to assure Mr. Black that Mr. White is an extremist. "As for myself," says he, "I do not hold to the determinism and rationalism of Mr. White." He would rather say that God limited himself when he created man. To give man true freedom, true personality, God was willing to forego his absolute control over him. [typical Arminian view] God gave man a bit of the same sort of being that he himself possesses. Man's freedom is, like God's freedom, ability to initiate something wholly new in the world. And so, man is not exclusively revelatory of God, the controller of all things. Rather God and man are together participant of the same sort of being. Suppose says Mr. Grey, that you and I need a dollar for a bit of breakfast. You, as the man of means, contribute ninety-eight cents. I, representing the poorer class, contribute two cents. I feel rather dependent on you. Even so, my two cents are worth exactly as much as any two cents that you have contributed. I can, if I wish, buy two cents worth of pretzels and make them do for breakfast. Even if you had given me the two cents that I possess, now that I have them, I have a measure of absolute independence over against you.

In thus asserting his idea of "freedom" Mr. Grey has compromised the revelational character of the constitution of man. He has approved of Mr. Black's basic assumption to the effect that man must begin by thinking of himself as knowing himself apart from God. Mr. Grey has sided with the Romanist idea of the analogy of being as over against the Protestant principle of the exhaustively revelational character of all created being.

Having thus taken over - in part at least - Mr. Black's conception of man, Mr. Grey, naturally also takes over - in part at least - Mr. Black's conception of man's environment.

For Mr. Grey history is partly revelational of God and partly revelational of man. God as the father, carries ninety pounds and man, as the child, carries only ten pounds. But the ten pounds carried by man is in no wise carried by God. Mr. Grey feels that if one says with Mr. White, the "whatsoever come to pass" comes to pass by virtue of the ultimate plan of God, that then one must make God to be the author of sin and kill all human responsibility. He therefore joins Mr. Black in rejecting the "rationalism" of Mr. White.

Mr. Grey And Non-Christian Irrationalism

The foundation on which Mr. Grey stands when he rejects the "rationalism" of Mr. White is the foundation on which Mr. Black also stands. It is that of non-Christian irrationalism. It is the assumption that man is not created but is ultimate and therefore autonomous.

From this point forward Mr. Grey is at the mercy of Mr. Black. Mr. Grey has now to accept all the false problematics of Mr. Black as though they were genuine. In particular Mr. Grey must assume with Mr. Black that the facts of man's environment are not exclusively revelational of God. When he argues with Mr. Black about the existence of God, he can only claim that a limited God probably exists. And he must prove his point by first cutting both himself and Mr. Black loose from the truth of the revelational character of all created being.

It should be noted that Mr. Grey's attitude toward general revelation is the same as that of Mr. Pieper, the Lutheran, toward Scriptural revelation. Mr. Pieper also argued in effect that the God of the Bible must be limited in order to make room for the freedom of man. In both cases the attitude toward the revelation of God is determined by the assumption of human freedom as a measure of independence from God. In both cases there is no real ground for saying that the revelation of God is really ultimately the revelation of God, the self-contained and self-sufficient God of which the Bible speaks.

Calvinistic Irrationalism

So far, we have dealt with the Reformed conception of general revelation from the point of view of its supposed rationalism. To this we must now add a few words about the Reformed conception of general revelation from the point of view of its supposed rationalism. To this we must now add a few words about the Reformed conception of general revelation from the point of view of its supposed "irrationalism."

Here too the point is very simple and taken directly from Scripture. It is to the effect that from the beginning of history, even before the entrance of sin, supernatural thought-communication on the part of God to man was added to God's revelation to man in his own constitution and in the universe about him. The two forms of revelation, revelation in the facts of the created universe whether within or about man, and revelation by way of God's directly speaking to man, are mutually involved in one another. Just as two rafters of a house need to support one another, so these two forms of revelation need to support one another.

Mr. Grey's Rationalism

The significance of this basically simple point cannot well be overestimated. The entire Reformed philosophy of history is colored by it. Think for a moment of some one living where the gospel call has not penetrated. What are the responsibilities of such a person? Is he responsible only for the revelation that speaks to him through his own constitution and through his environment? Mr. Grey would answer yes but Mr. White would answer no. Mr. Grey has no eye for the supplemental character of the two forms of revelation. And that too was the fault of Adam and Eve when they sinned against God. Adam and Eve thought that they could interpret themselves and nature about them independently of the supernatural thought-communication of God. And Mr. Grey does not see that this was a grievous sin. He still thinks that Mr. Black, the non-believer, is not wrong when he interprets at least some areas of life without reference to the supernatural thought-communication of God to man in Scripture. When Paul says that "from the creation of the world" God has clearly manifested himself to man (Rom 1:20) and that at the beginning of the history of the world every man in Adam sinned against God, (Rom 5:12) Mr. Grey rejects all this as so much irrationalism. How could men in far off Africa be held responsible for what happened in paradise thousands of years ago? When Mr. Black ridicules this simple biblical teaching, Mr. Grey joins in with him in saying that surely Mr. White is being an extremist again. This time Mr. White is said to be an irrationalist as before he was said to be a rationalist!

In doing so Mr. Grey again does not realize that he has accepted the basic assumption of Mr. Black about man's independence of God. Little does he realize that he has again accepted the basically false problematics of Mr. Black as though they were sound. And little does he realize that after this he can, if consistent, only ask Mr. Black to accept a God who is a supplement to nature and to man, a finite god who probably exists - and probably does not exist!

In particular it should be noted that this form of argument which fails to see the interdependence of supernatural and natural revelation springs from the non-Christian rationalism of Mr. Black. It is the sort of position maintained by Carnell when he says that Mr. Black must not be asked to accept any sort of authority which he as a "rational man" is not able to approve by a standard that he used prior to his meeting of the demands of the revelation in question.

The Sum of The Matter

In conclusion we may sum up the matter as follows: there is a distinctly Reformed doctrine of Scripture. This is for Mr. White always "the first book." This distinctly Reformed doctrine of Scripture is rejected by Mr. Grey, the evangelical, because he thinks that it is both rationalistic and irrationalistic. It is rationalistic he says, because it insists that whatsoever happens, happens in accord with the plan of God. It is irrationalistic, he says, because it holds that human reason itself in all its cultural effort must be made subservient to the self-authenticating authority of God.

Similarly, there is a distinctly Reformed doctrine of general revelation. This is the "second book" of Mr. White. This distinctly Reformed doctrine of general revelation is implied in the distinctly Reformed doctrine of Scripture. One must, to be consistent, either take both or neither. One cannot read the book of nature aright without the book of Scripture. This Reformed doctrine of general revelation is again rejected by Mr. Grey, the evangelical, because he thinks it is both rationalistic and irrationalistic. He says this doctrine is rationalistic in that it holds that all the facts of the universe, including those done by the will of man, whether good or bad, are revelational of the plan and therefore of the nature of God. He says this doctrine is irrationalistic because it asserts that all men everywhere are responsible for what happened at the beginning of history when Adam disobeyed the supernatural revelation of God.

Yet in making the double charge of rationalism and irrationalism against the only consistently Reformed doctrine of revelation, inclusive of the two "books" of Scripture and nature, the evangelical is basing himself upon the assumption of Mr. Black. It is to be expected that Mr. Black would call the biblical position rationalistic. It goes against his idea of "freedom" to say that whatever he does is within the plan of God.

It is also to be expected that he will call the biblical position irrationalistic. It goes against his idea of the ultimacy of his reason to say that reason itself, from the beginning of history, was meant to function in self-conscious subordination to the authoritative thought-communication of God.

But what shall we say of Mr. Grey? Is not he supposed to be winning Mr. Black over to the truly biblical position? Why then does he join Mr. Black in charging the simple teaching of Scripture with respect to itself and with respect to general revelation with being both rationalistic and irrationalistic? And when will he realize that by his method, he cannot show Mr. Black just how Christianity differs from its opposite and just why Mr. Black should become a Christian? Only Mr. White can really challenge Mr. Black to forsake his idols and serve the living God. His witness must be heard throughout the world. Let him then not be high-minded but rather strengthen his heart in the Lord his God.

Proofs for the Existence of God

Torch & Trumpet

1952

Vol. 2, Issue 5 Pgs. 18ff

In preceding articles, we have sought to indicate something of the difference between a Reformed and "evangelical" apologetics. Both Mr. White, the Reformed apologete, and Mr. Grey, the evangelical apologete, seek to defend the truth of Christianity. Both seek to get Mr. Black, the non-believer, to accept the truth about God and his creation. To both this is a matter of the greatest importance; they want to see Mr. Black redeemed from the "wrath of God" that rests upon him.

However, Mr. White and Mr. Grey have their internal disagreement about how best to win Mr. Black. And the reason for this disagreement is the fact that they disagree on the nature of that to which they would win Mr. Black. Their difference with respect to the method of apologetics is based on their difference with respect to theology. Mr. White holds to an unqualified while Mr. Grey holds to a qualified recognition of the sovereignty of God on condition that his own sovereignty be not altogether abolished.

Naturally there will be a difference between them on the requirement they will place before Mr. Black. Mr. White will require absolute surrender to God; Mr. Grey will be satisfied with a negotiated peace. Mr. White will require that Mr. Black henceforth interpret the whole of his life in terms of God; Mr. Grey will advise Mr. Black to interpret most of his life in terms of God.

1. Authority in Scripture

When Mr. Black objects against Mr. White that unconditional surrender to the authority of Scripture is irrational, then Mr. Grey nods approval and says that, of course, the "rational man" has a perfect right to test the credibility of Scripture by logic. When the Bible speaks of God's sovereign election of some men to salvation this must mean something that fits in with his "rational nature." When Mr. Black objects to Mr. White that unconditional surrender to Scripture is rationalistic, then Mr. Grey again nods approval and says that, of course, genuine human personality has a perfect right to test the content of Scripture by experience. When the Bible speaks of God by his counsel controlling whatsoever comes to pass, this must mean something that fits in with man's freedom. God created man and gave man a share in his own freedom; men therefore participate in his being.

2. Authority In "General Revelation"

But what of natural or general revelation? Here surely there can be no difference, you say, between the requirements of Mr. White and Mr. Grey. Here there is no law and no promise; here there is only fact. How then can you speak of requirements at all? Here surely Mr. White can forge his "five points of Calvinism" and join Mr. Grey in taking Mr. Black through the picture gallery of this world, pointing out its beauties to him so that with them he will spontaneously exclaim, "The whole chorus of nature raises one hymn to the praises of its Creator."

3. Mr. White's Silence

Let us think of Mr. White as trying hard to forget his "five points." "Surely," he says to himself, "there can be nothing wrong with joining Mr. Grey in showing Mr. Black the wonders of God's creation. We believe in the same God, do we not? Both of us want to show Mr. Black the facts of Creation so that he will believe in God. When Mr. Black says: 'I catch no meaning from all I have seen, and I pass on, quite as I came, confused and dismayed' Mr. Grey and I can together take him by plane to the Mt. Wilson observatory so he may see the starry heavens above. Surely the source of knowledge for the natural sciences is the Book of Nature, which is given to everyone. Do not the Scriptures themselves teach that there is a light in nature, per se, which cannot be, and is not, transmitted through the spectacles of the Word? If this were not so, how could the Scriptures say of those who have only the light of nature that they are without excuse?"

4. Mr. Grey's Eloquence

So, the three men, Mr. White, Mr. Grey and Mr. Black, go here and there and everywhere. Mr. White and Mr. Grey agree to pay each half of the expense. Mr. Black is their guest.

They go first to the Mt. Wilson observatory to see the starry skies above. "How wonderful, how grand!" exclaims Mr. Grey. To the marvels of the telescope, they add those of the microscope. They circle the globe to see "the wonders of the world." There is no end to the "exhibits" and Mr. Black shows signs of weariness. So, they sit down on the beach. Will not Mr. Black now sign on the dotted line?

As they wait for the answer, Mr. Grey spies a watch someone has lost. Holding it in his hand he says to Mr. Black: "Look round the world: contemplate the whole and every part of it: you will find it to be nothing but one great machine, subdivided into an infinite number of lesser machines, which again admit of subdivisions, to a degree beyond that which human senses and faculties can trace and explain. All these various machines, and even their minute parts, are adjusted to each other with an accuracy, which ravishes into admiration all men, who have ever contemplated them. The curious adapting of means to ends, throughout all nature, resembles exactly, though it much exceeds, the productions of human contrivance; of human designs, thought, wisdom and intelligence. Since, therefore, the effects resemble each other, we are led to infer, by all the rules of analogy, that the causes also resemble; and that the Author of Nature is somewhat similar to the mind of man; though possessed of much larger faculties, proportioned to the grandeur of the work, which he has executed."

"Now, Mr. Black, I don't want to put undue pressure on you. You know your own needs in your own business. But I think that as a rational being, you owe it to yourself to join the theistic party. Isn't it highly probable that there is a God?"

"I'm not now asking you to become a Christian. We take things one step at a time. I'm only speaking of the Book of Nature. Of course, if there is a God and if this God should have a Son and if this Son should also reveal himself, it is not likely to be more difficult for you to believe in him than it is now to believe in the Father. But just now I am only asking you to admit that there is a great accumulation of evidence of the sort that any scientists or philosopher must admit being valid for the existence of a God back of and above this world. You see this watch. Isn't it highly probable that a power higher than itself has made it? You know the purpose of a watch. Isn't it highly probable that the wonderful contrivances of nature serve the purpose of a God? Looking back, we are naturally led to a God who is the cause of this world; looking forward we think of a God who has a purpose with this world. So far as we can observe the course and constitution of the universe there is, I think, no difficulty on your own adopted principles, against belief in a God. Why not become a theist? You do want to be on the winning side, don't you? Well, the Gallup poll of the universe indicates a tendency toward the final victory of theism."

5. Mr. Black Politely Declines

When Mr. Grey had finished his obviously serious and eloquent plea, Mr. Black looked very thoughtful. He was clearly a gentleman. He disliked disappointing his two friends after all the generosity they had shown him. But he could not honestly see any basic difference between his own position and theirs. So, he declined politely but resolutely to sign on the dotted line. He refused to be "converted" to theism. In substance he spoke as follows: "You speak of evidence of rationality and purpose in the universe. You would trace this rationality or purpose back to a rational being back of the universe who, you think, is likely to have a purpose with the universe. But who is back of your God to explain him in turn? By your own definition your God is not absolute or self-sufficient. You say that he probably exists, which means that you admit that probably he does not exist. But probability rests upon possibility. Now I think that any scientific person should come with an open mind to the observation of the facts of the universe. He ought to begin by assuming that any sort of fact may exist. And I was glad to observe that on this all-important point you agree with me. Hence the only kind of God that either of us can believe in is one who may not exist. In other words, neither of us do or can believe in a God who cannot not exist. And it was just this sort of God, a God who is self-sufficient, and as such necessarily existent, that I thought your Christian theists believed in."

By this time Mr. White was beginning to squirm. He was beginning to realize that he had sold out the God of his theology, the sovereign God of Scripture by his silent consent to the argument of Mr. Grey. Mr. Black was right, he felt at once. Either one presupposes God back of the ideas of possibility or one presupposes that the idea of possibility is back of God. Either one says with historic Reformed theology on the basis of Scripture that what God determines and only what God determines is possible, or one says with all non-Christian forms of thought that possibility surrounds God. But for the moment Mr. White was stupefied. He could say nothing. So, Mr. Black simply drew the conclusion from what he had said in the following words:

"Since you in your effort to please me have accepted my basic assumption with respect to possibility and probability it follows that your God, granted that he exists, is of no use whatsoever in explaining the universe. He himself needs in turn to be explained. Let us remember the story of the Indian philosopher and his elephant. It was never more applicable than to the present subject. If the material world rests upon a similar ideal world, this ideal world must rest upon some other; and so on, without end. It was better, therefore, never to look beyond the present material world. In short, gentlemen, much as I dislike not to please you, what you offer is nothing better than what I already possess. Your God is himself surrounded by pure possibility or Chance; in what way can he help me? And how could I be responsible to him? For you, as for me, all things ultimately end in the irrational."

6. Mr. Grey Appeals to Logic

At this point Mr. Grey grew pale. In his desperation he searched his arsenal for another argument that might convince Mr. Black. There was one that he had not used for some time. The arguments for God that he had so far used he labeled a posteriori argument. They ought, he had thought, to appeal to the "empirical" temper of the times. They started from human experience with causation and purpose and by analogy argued to the idea of a cause of and a purpose with the world as a whole. But Mr. Black had pointed out that if you start with the ideas of cause and purpose as intelligible to man without God when these concepts apply to relations within the universe, then you cannot consistently say that you need God for the idea of cause or purpose when these concepts apply to the universe as a whole. So now Mr. Grey drew out the drawer marked a priori argument. In public he called this the argument from finite to absolute being. "As finite creatures," he said to Mr. Black, "we have the idea of absolute being. The idea of a finite being involves of necessity the idea of an absolute being. We have the notion of an absolute being surely there must be a reality corresponding to our idea of such a being, if not all our ideas may be false. Surely, we must hold that reality is ultimately rational and coherent and that our ideas participate in this rationality. If not, how would science be possible?"

7. Mr. Black Again Declines

When Mr. Grey had thus delivered himself of this appeal to logic rather than to fact then Mr. White for a moment seemed to take courage. Was not this at least to get away from the idea of a God who probably exists? Surely the "incommunicable attributes of God," of which he had been taught in his catechism classes, were all based upon and expressive of the idea of God as necessarily existing. But Mr. Black soon disillusioned him for the second time. Said he in answer to the argument from Mr. Grey, "Again I cannot see any basic difference between your position and mine. Of course, we must believe that reality is ultimately rational. And of course, we must hold that our minds participate in this rationality. But when you thus speak you thereby virtually assert that we must not believe in a God whose existence is independent of our human existence. A God whom we are to know must with us be a part of a rational system that is mutually accessible to and expressive of both. If God is necessary to you then you are also necessary to God. That is the only sort of God that is involved in your argument."

8. Mr. Grey Testifies

"But Mr. Black, this is terrible, this is unbearable! We do want you to believe in God. I bear witness to his existence. I will give you a Bible. Please read it! It tells you of Jesus Christ and how you may be saved by his blood. I am born again, and you can be born again too if you will only believe. Please do believe in God and be saved."

9. Mr. White Hopes for The Best!

Meanwhile Mr. White took new courage. He realized that he had so far made a great mistake in keeping silent during the time that Mr. Grey had presented his arguments. The arguments for the existence of God taken from the ideas of cause and purpose as set forth by Mr. Grey had led to pure irrationalism and Chance. The argument about an absolute being as set forth by Mr. Grey had led to pure rationalism and determinism. In both cases, Mr. Black had been quite right in saying that a God whose existence is problematic or a God who exists by the same necessity as does the universe is still an aspect of or simply the whole of the universe. But now he felt that perhaps Mr. Grey was right in simply witnessing to the existence of God. He thought that if the arguments used are not logically coercive, they may at least be used as means with which to witness to unbelievers. And surely witnessing to God's existence was always in order. But poor Mr. White was to be disillusioned again. For the witness bearing done by Mr. Grey was based on the assumption that the belief in God is a purely non-rational or even irrational matter.

10. Mr. Black Asks Some Pertinent Questions

Mr. Black's reply to the words of Mr. Grey indicated this fact all too clearly. Said Mr. Black to Mr. Grey: "I greatly appreciate your evident concern for my eternal welfare. But there are two or three questions that I would like to have you answer. In the first place I would ask whether in thus witnessing to me you thereby admit that the arguments for the existence of God have no validity? Or rather do you not thereby admit that these arguments, if they prove anything, prove that God is finite and correlative to man and therefore that your position is not basically different from mine?"

Mr. Grey did not answer because he could not answer this question otherwise than by agreeing with Mr. Black.

"In the second place," asked Mr. Black, "you are now witnessing to Christ as well as to God, to Christianity as well as to theism. I suppose your argument for Christianity would be similar in nature to your argument for theism would it not? You would argue that the Jesus of the New Testament is probably the Son of God and he quite probably died for the sins of men. But now you witness to me about your Christ. And by witnessing instead of reasoning you seem to admit that there is no objective claim for the truth of what you hold with respect to Christ. Am I right in all this?"

Again Mr. Grey made no answer. The only answer he could consistently have given would be to agree with Mr. Black.

"In the third place," asked Mr. Black, "you are now witnessing not only to God the Father, to Jesus Christ the Son, but also to the Holy Spirit. You say you are born again, that you know you are saved and that at present I am lost. Now if you have had an experience of some sort, it would be unscientific for me to deny it. But if you want to witness to me about your experience, you must make plain to me the nature of that experience. And to do that you must do so in terms of principles that I understand. Such principles must needs be accessible to all. Now if you make plain your experience to me in terms of principles that are plain to me as unregenerate then wherein is your regeneration unique? On the other hand, if you still maintain that your experience of regeneration is unique then can you say anything about it to me so that I may understand? And does not then your witness bearing appear to be wholly unintelligible and devoid of meaning? Thus, again you cannot make any claim to the objective truth of your position."

"Summing up the whole matter, I would say in the first place that your arguments for the existence of God have rightfully established me in my unbelief. They have shown that nothing can be said for the existence of a God who is actually the Creator and controller of the world. I would say in the second place that using such arguments as you have used for the existence of God commits you to using similar arguments for the truth of Christianity with similar fatal results for your position. In both cases you first use intellectual argument upon principles that presuppose the justice of my unbelieving position. Then when it is pointed out to you that such is the case you turn to witnessing. But then your witnessing is in the nature of the case an activity that you yourself have virtually admitted being wholly irrational and unintelligible."

11. Mr. White Sees the Richness of His Faith

When Mr. Black had finished Mr. White was in a great distress. But it was this very distress that at last he saw the richness of his own faith. He made no pretense to having greater intellectual power than Mr. Grey. He greatly admired the real faith and courage of Mr. Grey. But he dared keep silence no longer. His silence had been sin, he knew. Mr. Black had completely discomfited Mr. Grey so that he had not another word to say. Mr. Black was about to leave them established rather than challenged in his unbelief. And all of that in spite of the best intentions and efforts of Mr. Grey, speaking for both of them. A sense of urgent responsibility to make known the claims of the sovereign God pressed upon him. He now saw clearly first that the arguments for the existence of God as conducted by Mr. Grey, are based on the assumption that the unbeliever is right with respect to the principles in terms of which he explains all things. These principles are: (a) that man is not a creature of God but rather is ultimate and as such must properly consider himself instead of God the final reference point in explaining all things; (b) that all other things beside himself are non-created but controlled by Chance; and (c) that the power of logic that he possesses is the means by which he must determine what is possible or impossible in the universe of Chance.

At last, it dawned upon Mr. White that first to admit that the principles of Mr. Black, the unbeliever, are right and then to seek to win him to the acceptance of the existence of God the Creator and judge of all men is like first admitting that the United States had historically been a province of the Soviet Union but ought at the same time be recognized as an independent and all-controlling political power.

In the second place, Mr. White now saw clearly that a false type of reasoning for the truth of God's existence and for the truth of Christianity involves a false kind of witnessing for the existence of God and for the truth of Christianity. If one reasons for the existence of God and for the truth of Christianity on the assumption that Mr. Black's principles of explanation are valid, then one must witness on the same assumption. One must then make plain to Mr. Black, in terms of principles which Mr. Black accepts, what it means to be born again. Mr. Black will then apply the principles of modern psychology of religion to Mr. Grey's "testimony" with respect to his regeneration and show that it is something that naturally comes in the period of adolescence.

In the third place Mr. White now saw clearly that it was quite "proper" for Mr. Grey to use a method of reasoning and a method of witness bearing that is based upon the truth of the anti-Christian and anti-theistic assumptions. Mr. Grey's theology is Arminian or Lutheran. It is therefore based upon the idea that God is not wholly sovereign over man. It assumes that man's responsibility implies a measure of autonomy of the sort that is the essence and foundation of the whole of Mr. Black's thinking. It is therefore to be expected that Mr. Grey will assume that Mr. Black needs not to be challenged on his basic assumption with respect to his own assumed ultimacy or autonomy.

From now on Mr. White decided that, much as he enjoyed the company of Mr. Grey and much as he trusted his evident sincerity and basic devotion to the truth of God, yet he must go his own way in apologetics as he had, since the Reformation, gone his own way in theology. He made an appointment with Mr. Black to see him soon. He expressed to Mr. Grey his great love for him as a fellow believer, his great admiration for his fearless and persistent efforts to win men to an acceptance of truth as it is in Jesus. Then he confessed to Mr. Grey that his conscience had troubled him during the entire time of their troubles with Mr. Black. He had started in good faith thinking that Mr. Grey's efforts at argument and witnessing might win Mr. Black. He had therefore been quite willing, especially since Mr. Grey was through his constant efforts much more conversant with such things than he was, to be represented by Mr. Grey. But now he had at last come to realize that not only had the effort been utterly fruitless and self-frustrating but more than that it had been terribly dishonoring to God. How could the eternal I Am be pleased with being presented as being a god and as probably existing, as necessary for the explanation of some things but not of all things, as one who will be glad to recognize the ultimacy of his own creatures. Would the God who had in Paradise required of men implicit obedience now be satisfied with a claims and counter claims arrangement with his creatures? End of article.

Summary comments from Van Til

From the quotations given above, the reader can for himself discern why I have advocated what seems to me to be a Reformed as over against the traditional method of Apologetics. The traditional method was constructed by Roman Catholics and Arminians. It was, so to speak, made to fit Romanist or Evangelical theology. And since Roman Catholic and Evangelical theology compromises the Protestant doctrines of Scripture, of God, of man, of sin and of redemption so the traditional method of Apologetics compromises Christianity in order to win men to an acceptance of it.

The traditional method compromises the Biblical doctrine of God in not clearly distinguishing his self-existence from his relation to the world. The traditional method compromises the Biblical doctrine of God and his relation to his revelation to man by not clearly insisting that man must not seek to determine the nature of God, otherwise than from revelation.

The traditional method compromises the Biblical doctrine of the counsel of God by not taking it as the only all-inclusive ultimate cause of whatsoever comes to pass.

The traditional method therefore compromises the clarity of God's revelation to man, whether this revelation comes through general or through special revelation. Created facts are not taken to be clearly revelational of God; all the facts of nature and of man are said to indicate no more than that a god probably exists.

The traditional method compromises the Biblical doctrine the necessity of supernatural revelation in relation to natural revelation. It does so in failing to do justice to the fact that even in paradise man had to interpret natural revelation in the light of the covenantal obligations placed upon him by God through supernatural communication. In consequence the traditional method fails to recognize the necessity of redemptive supernatural revelation as concomitant to natural revelation after the fall of man.

The traditional method compromises the sufficiency of redemptive supernatural revelation in scripture inasmuch as it allows for wholly new facts to appear in Reality, new for God as well as for man.

The traditional method compromises the authority of Scripture by not taking it as self-attesting in the full sense of the term.

The traditional method compromises the Biblical doctrine of man's creation in the image of God by thinking of him as being "free" or ultimate rather than analogical.

The traditional method compromises the Biblical doctrine of the covenant by not making Adam's representative action determinative for the future.

The traditional method compromises the Biblical doctrine of sin, in not thinking of it as an ethical break with God which is complete in principle even though not in practice.

In spite of these things, this traditional method has been employed by Reformed theologians and this fact has stood in the way of the development of a distinctly Reformed apologetic.

[An analysis of]
 Floyd E. Hamilton

(On the inadequacy of neutral reasoning with unbelievers, with solid arguments against Existentialism and Romanism/Arminianism)

In the second Chapter Hamilton invites us to advance with him “over the bridge of cause which we have erected” from ourselves to the external world. In the third he leads us even beyond the world by the same bridge to God. We know “that we must have been caused by someone other than ourselves who must have had sufficient power to produce our souls, which are the observed effect” . This gives us “our first link in the chain of proof for the evidence of God. One by one the other links are forged and soldered to the first. There is order in the universe. There is design. In man himself there is will. Will there not be a Will back of the universe? Man has a conscience. It is a “certain characteristic innate in the mind which enables a person who has reached the age of reasoning ability, to make a judgement as to the rightness or wrongness of any course of action which may be presented to the mind.” “Shall we not then conclude with Bordon P. Bowne that man has a moral creator?”

The preceding arguments are so plain that the conclusion is inescapable. There is no alternative for thinking man in the face of such evidence but to all upon his face before the wonderful Being who has created him, and to worship him. Let it be borne in mind that the arguments cited above are cumulative. Each adds proof to the others, and their force is only felt when they are taken together.

Thus, theism is supposed to have been established by a neutral process of reasoning. As has earlier been indicated, such a theism is not the theism of Scripture. Calvin’s procedure is quite the reverse of Hamilton’s. following Descartes and others, Hamilton thinks that man can identify himself in terms of himself. [a strong argument against Existentialism] Calvin says the knowledge of self immediately presupposes the relation of the self to God as its creator. No identification of the human self is possible in the realm of open chance. And not bridge of cause can be made from that which cannot be identified (the self) to something else that cannot be identified (the external world). The idea of causation cannot be taken as intelligible by itself in order by means of it to show that God has created the world. If God has created the world the idea of cause in the world must be determined from this its derivative nature. If it is first assumed to be working without God, it cannot after that be shown to be working only in dependence upon God.

The same point is to be made about the ideas of order, purpose and morality. If any of them can function independently of God at the beginning, why do they need God at all?

Moreover, how shall these several autonomous entities be forged into a chain? How shall there be cumulative force in the series of arguments if each argument is itself without force?

The whole procedure followed is out of line with the basic principle of the Reformed Faith. Only in God's light is there any light. The Psalmist (Ps. 94) teaches us to begin from above with God instead of from the bottom with man. If even a creature, who is derivative, knows, how much more shall the original know? That is the method of the Psalmist. Descartes assumes that man as the original knows, and that then God also knows. If man's knowledge is not from the outset defined as dependent on God's knowledge it never can be.

It was in line with Arminian and Romanist thinking to use such a method as Mr. Hamilton uses. Wherever autonomy is hailed in theology, why should it not also be welcomed in apologetics? But when autonomy is over and over regarded as the root of all evil in theology why then should it be welcomed in apologetics? see notes on free will, [code493]

Notes On What is the Free Will of Man?

Code493

John Owen, A Display of Arminianism Chapter 12

Yet here observe, that we do not absolutely oppose free-will, as if it were "nomen inane," a mere figment, when there is no such thing in the world, but only in that sense the Pelagians and Arminians do assert it. About words we will not contend. We grant man, in the substance of all his actions, as much power, liberty, and freedom as a mere created nature is capable of. We grant him to be free in his choice from all outward coercion, or inward natural necessity, to work according to election and deliberation, spontaneously embracing what seemeth good unto him. Now, call this power free-will, or what you please, so you make it not supreme, independent, and boundless, we are not at all troubled. The imposition of names depends upon the discretion of their inventors. Again; even in spiritual things, we deny that our wills are at all debarred, or deprived of their proper liberty: but here we say, indeed, that we are not properly free until the Son makes us free; -- no great use of freedom in that wherein we can do nothing at all.

We do not claim such a liberty as should make us despise the grace of God, whereby we may attain true liberty indeed; which addeth to, but taketh nothing from, our original freedom. But of this after I have showed what an idol the Arminians make of free-will. Only take notice in the entrance that we speak of it now, not as it was at first by God created, but as it is now by sin corrupted; yet, being considered in that estate also, they ascribe more unto it than it was ever capable of. As it now standeth, according to my formerly-proposed method, I shall show, -- first, what inbred native virtue they ascribe unto it, and with how absolute a dominion and sovereignty over all our actions they endow it; secondly, what power they say it hath in preparing us for the grace of God; thirdly, how effectually operative it is in receiving the said grace, and with how little help thereof it accomplisheth the great work of our conversion; -- all briefly, with so many observations as shall suffice to discover their proud errors in each particular.

"Herein," saith Arminius, "consisteth the liberty of the will, that all things required to enable it to will any thing being accomplished, it still remains indifferent to will or not." And all of them at the synod: "There is," say they, "accompanying the will of man an inseparable property, which we call liberty, from whence the will is termed a power, which, when all things pre-required as necessary to operation are fulfilled, may will anything, or not will it;" that is, our free-wills have such an absolute and uncontrollable power in the territory of all human actions, that no influence of God's providence, no certainty of his decree, no unchangeableness of his purpose, can sway it at all in its free determinations, or have any power with his highness to cause him to will or resolve on any such act as God by him intendeth to produce. Take an instance in the great work of our conversion. All unregenerate men," saith Arminius, "have, by virtue of their free-will, a power of resisting the Holy Spirit, of rejecting the offered grace of God, of contemning the counsel of God concerning themselves, of refusing the gospel of grace, of not opening the heart to him that knocketh." What a stout idol is this, whom neither the Holy Spirit, the grace and counsel of God, the calling of the gospel, the knocking at the door of the heart, can move at all, or in the least measure prevail against him! Woe be unto us, then, if when God calls us our free-will be not in good temper, and well disposed to hearken unto him! for it seems there is no dealing with it by any other ways, though powerful and almighty. "For grant," saith Corvinus, "all the operations of grace which God can use in our conversion, yet conversion remaineth so in our own free power that we can be not converted; that is, we can either turn or not turn ourselves;" where the idol plainly challengeth the Lord to work his utmost, and tells him that after he hath so done he will do what he please. His infallible prescience, his powerful predetermination, the moral efficacy of the gospel, the infusion of grace, the effectual operation of the Holy Spirit, all are nothing, not at all available in helping or furthering our independent wills in their proceedings. Well, then, in what estate will you have the idol placed? "In such a one wherein he may be suffered to sin, or to do well, at his pleasure," as the same author intimates.

Van Til, Defending the Faith, pg 17-18, on how to witness to unbelievers – comments on free will as derivative

Here the fundamental difference between Mr. Grey's (the traditional evangelical) and Mr. White's (the Calvinist or Reformed apologetic) approach to Mr. Black (the unbeliever) appears. The difference lies in the different notions of the free will of man [codefree]. Or, it may be said, the difference is with respect to the nature of man as such. Mr. White would define man, and therefore his freedom, in terms of Scripture alone. He would therefore begin with the fact that man is the creature of God. And this implies that man's freedom is a derivative freedom¹. It is a freedom that is not and can not be wholly ultimate, that is, self-dependent. Mr. White knows that Mr. Black would not agree with him in this analysis of man and of his freedom. He knows that Mr. Black would not agree with him on this any more than he would agree on the biblical idea of total depravity.

Cornelius Van Til again states from his book, Introduction to Systematic Theology: p128-9: In Paradise, man made his self-consciousness the immediate but wholly derivative starting point while he made the self-consciousness of God the remote but wholly ultimate starting point of all his knowledge. Hence he saw that his knowledge was, though finite, yet true. Hence he did not set before himself the false ideal of absolute comprehension. Hence, too, he did not despair and conclude to irrationalism simply because he himself could not fully comprehend the whole of reality.

In opposition to this, the non-Christian interpretation of the human mind is based upon the presupposition that it is the ultimate and not merely the derivative starting point for man. Hence it has set before itself the ideal of comprehension knowledge. This was done especially in the earlier stages of human thought. The Greek thinkers were as children who thought they could do everything. Even in modern times we have, in such systems as that of Leibniz, a striking manifestation of the pride, "hubris," of the sinner who wishes to be as God.³⁵ In more recent times, however, men have become more sophisticated. They have given up the quest of certainty and the quest for comprehension, except as a limiting concept. In modern irrationalism, the prodigal has recognized that he is at the swine trough, but still refuses to return to the father's house. His "hubris" never forsakes him.

³⁵ Van Til uses the strong language of hubris here about Leibniz's project. Leibniz had hoped to unify many disciplines and churches through his system, which is ultimately built on a very few general principles.

Mr. Grey, on the other hand, must at all costs have "a point of contact" in the system of thought of Mr. Black, who is typical of the natural man. Just as Mr. Grey is afraid of being charged with circular reasoning, so he is also afraid of being charged with talking about something that is "outside of experience." And so he is driven to talk in general about the free spirit of man." Of course, Mr. Black need have no objections from his point of view in allowing for the "free spirit of man." That is at bottom what he holds even when he is a naturalist. His whole position is based upon the idea of man as a free spirit, that is, a spirit that is not subject to the law of his Creator God. And Carnell does not distinguish between the biblical doctrine of freedom, as based upon and involved in the fact of man's creation, and the doctrine of freedom, in the sense of autonomy, which makes man a law unto himself. THE DOCTRINE OF GOD

Naturally in the system of theology and in apologetics the doctrine of God is of fundamental importance. We must first ask what kind of a God Christianity believes in before we can really ask with intelligence whether such a God exists. The what precedes that that; the connotation precedes the denotation; at least the latter cannot be discussed intelligently without at once considering the former.

What do we mean when we use the word God? Systematics answer this question in its discussion of the attributes or properties of God. These attributes are divided into incommunicable and communicable. Under the incommunicable attributes we have:

First, independence or aseity of God. By this is meant that God is in no sense correlative to or dependent upon anything beside his own being. [aseity = God is of himself.] God is the source of his own being, or rather the term source cannot be applied to God. God is absolute. He is sufficient unto himself.

Secondly, we speak of the immutability of God. Naturally God does not and cannot change since there is nothing besides his own eternal Being on which he depends (Mal. 3:6, Jas. 1:7).

Thirdly, we speak of the infinity of God. In relation to the question of time we speak of the eternity of God while with respect to space we speak of the omnipresence of God. By the term eternity we mean that there is no beginning or end or succession of moments in God's being or consciousness (Ps. 90:2, 2Pet. 3:8). This conception of eternity is of particular importance in Apologetics because it involves the whole question of the meaning of the temporal universe: it involves a definite philosophy of history. By the term omnipresence we mean that God is neither included in space nor absent from it. God is above all space and yet present in every part of it (1Kings 8:27, Acts 17:27).

Notes on immutability and time: the distance between each successive change in the creature is called time. So, when God created things, time was the concomitant (naturally accompanying it); time was unavoidably created along with the creation because all created things are mutable; they cannot be immutable since that is only attributed to God not to creatures; it is one of the incommutable attributes of God; only creatures change from one condition to the next. So, it's impossible for there to be anything changeable where there is no time, hence, God, being in eternity, the eternal now, where there is no time, points to his unchangeableness! When Adam was in the garden, he being created, by definition concomitant with time, he was therefore mutable. In this particular case, he did change for the worse when he rebelled against his Creator.

Fourthly, we speak of the unity of God. We distinguish between the unity of singularity and the unity of simplicity. The unity of singularity has reference to numerical oneness. There is and can be only one God. The unity of simplicity signifies that God is in no sense composed of parts or aspects that existed prior to himself. (Jer. 10:10, 1Jn 1:5). [The doctrine of Simplicity states that God is not composed of parts; he is one pure divine essence. If he were composed of parts, parts that make up God, then who put them together to make God??? That and other questions the would undermine Christian Theism are raised if God is not simple.

The attributes of God are not to be thought of otherwise than as aspects of the one simple original being; the whole is identical with the parts. On the other hand, the attributes of God are not characteristics that God has developed gradually; they are fundamental to his being; the parts together form the whole. Of the whole matter we may say that the unity and the diversity in God are equally basic and mutually dependent upon one another. The importance of this doctrine for Apologetics may be seen from the fact that the whole problem of philosophy may be summed up in the question of the relation on unity to diversity; the so-called problem of the one and the many receives a definite answer from the doctrine of the simplicity of God.

Man cannot partake of these incommunicable attributes of God. Man cannot in any sense be the source of his own being; man cannot in any sense be immutable or eternal or omnipresent or simple. These attributes therefore emphasize the transcendence of God.

Under God's communicable attributes we may speak of God as light, God as the Holy One and God as Sovereign. The first of these pertains to God's knowledge of himself and the world. The second pertains to his moral nature and its significance for man and the world. The third pertains to God's power and its relation to the world.

God's knowledge of himself is self-contained. It is not dependent upon eternal ideas of truth above him. There are no hidden depths in God's being unknown to him. God's knowledge of himself may therefore be called absolute or self-referential.

God's knowledge of the world is, in the nature of the case, not obtained as the result of an investigation of the facts and the laws of the world. The facts and laws of the world are what they are because of God's plan with respect to them. Therefore, his knowledge of the world is involved in his plan for the world. Thus, his knowledge of the facts and laws of the world precede the existence of the world.

God's holiness refers to his attribute whereby he is internally and eternally perfect. God's holy character is back of his expressed requirement of man that he must be perfect as a creature. What God says is right is right because he says it and he says it because it rests on his holy nature.

God's sovereignty refers to the fact that there is no other ultimate power beside himself and that his holy plan for the world will prevail over all opposition against it.

The incommunicable attributes of God stress his transcendence and the communicable attributes stress his immanence. The two imply one another. A Christian notion of transcendence and a Christian notion of immanence go together. [immanence: pertinent passage: In Him we live and move and have our being, Acts 17:28; God is intimately involved with his creatures, they being wholly dependent upon Him for everything. A Deist is opposed to this; God is distant and not involved at all.]

This is good:

It is not a sufficient description of Christian theism when we say that as Christians we believe in both the transcendence and the immanence of God and deistic systems believe only in the transcendence of God. The transcendence we believe in is not the transcendence of deism and the immanence we believe in is not the immanence of pantheism. In the case of deism, transcendence virtually means separation while in the case of pantheism immanence virtually means identification. And if we add separation to identification, we do not have theism as a result. As we mean a certain kind of God when as theists we speak of God, so also, we mean a certain kind of transcendence and a certain kind of immanence when we use these terms. The Christian doctrine of God implies a definite conception of the relation of God to the created universe. So also, the Christian doctrine of God implies a definite conception of everything in the created universe.

Notes on Pantheism by Van Til

Van Til states from his book, An Introduction to Systematic Theology p 204: In Paradise God walked and talked with man. Man needs God near to him. Even in the state of sin man has realized something of the need of a God who is near him. In fact, the sinner has brought God too near to him; he has identified the Creator with the creature. In idolatry we have an expression on the part of the sinner that points to his need of a God who is near.

a. The Personality of God

What we have discussed under the attributes of God may also be summed up by saying that God is absolute personality. The attributes themselves speak of self-conscious and moral activity. On the part of God. Recognizing that for this intellectual and moral activity God is dependent upon nothing beyond his own being, we see that we have the Reformed doctrine of the personality of God. There were no principles of truth, goodness or beauty that were next to or above God according to which he patterned the world. The principles of truth, goodness, and beauty are to be thought of as identical with God's being; they are the attributes of God. Non-Christian systems of philosophy do not deny personality to God, at least some of the do not, but, in effect, they all agree in denying absolute personality to God. As Christians we say that we can be like God and must be like God in that we are persons but that we must always be unlike God in that he is an absolute person while we are finite persons. Non-theists, on the other hand, maintain that though God may be a greater person than we can ever hope to be, yet we must not maintain this distinction between absolute and finite personality to be a qualitative one.

b. The Trinity

Another point in the Christian doctrine of God that needs to be mentioned here is the trinity. We hold that God exists as a tri-personality. "The trinity is the heart of Christianity." The three persons of the trinity are co-substantial; not one is derived in his substance from either or both of the others. Yet there are three distinct persons in this unity; the diversity and the identity are equally underived.

We have now before us in bare outline the main points of the Christian doctrine. Christianity offers the triune God, the absolute personality, containing all the attributes enumerated, as the God in whom we believe. This conception of God is the foundation of everything else that we hold dear. Unless we can believe in this sort of God, it does us not good to be told that we may believe in some other sort of God, or in anything else. For us everything depends for its meaning upon this sort of God.

II

THE DOCTRINE OF MAN

The whole question with which we deal in Apologetics is one of the relation between God and man. Hence, next to the doctrine of God the doctrine of man is of fundamental importance.

a. The Image of God in Man

Man is created in God's image. He is therefore like God in everything in which a creature can be like God. He is like God in that he too is a personality. This is what we mean when we speak of the image of God in the wider or more general sense. Then when we wish to emphasize the fact that man resembles God especially in the splendour of his moral attributes, we say that when man was created, he had true knowledge, true righteousness and true holiness. This doctrine is based upon the fact that in the New Testament we are told that Christ came to restore us to true knowledge, righteousness and holiness (Col. 3:10; Eph. 4:24). We call this the image of God in the narrower sense. These two cannot be completely separated from one another. It would really be impossible to think of man having been created only with the image of God in the wider sense; every act of man would from the very first have to be a moral act, an act of choice for or against God. Hence man would even in every act of knowledge manifest true righteousness and true holiness.

Then after emphasizing that man was like God and in the nature of the case had to be like God, we must stress the point that man must always be different from God. Man was created in God's image. We have seen that some of God's attributes are incommunicable. Man can never in any sense outgrow his creaturehood. This puts a definite connotation into the expression that man is like God. He is like God, to be sure, but always on a creaturely scale. He can never be like God in God's aseity, immutability, infinity and unity. For that reason, the church has embedded into the heart of its confessions the doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God. God's being and knowledge are absolutely comprehensive; such knowledge is too wonderful for man; he cannot attain unto it. Man was not created with comprehensive knowledge. Man was finite and his finitude was originally no burden to him. Neither could man ever expect to attain to comprehensive knowledge in the future. We cannot expect to have comprehensive knowledge even in heaven. It is true that much will be revealed to us that is now a mystery to us but in the nature of the case God cannot reveal to us that which as creatures we cannot comprehend; we should have to be God ourselves in order to understand God in the depth of his being. God must always remain mysterious to man. [key point]

The significance of this point will appear more fully when we contrast this conception of mystery with the non-Christian conception of mystery that is current today even in Christian circles. The difference between the Christian and the non-Christian conception of mystery may be expressed in a word by saying that we hold that there is mystery for man but not for God while the non-Christian holds that there is either no mystery for God or man or there is mystery for both God and man.

b. Man's Relation to the Universe

Next to noting that man was created in God's image we must now observe that man was organically related to the universe about him. That is, man was to be prophet, priest and king under God in this created world. The vicissitudes of the world would depend upon the deeds of man. As a prophet, man was to interpret this world, as a priest he was to dedicate this world to God and as a king he was to rule over it for God. In opposition to this, all non-Christian theories hold that the vicissitudes of man and the universe about him are only accidentally and incidentally related to one another.

c. The Fall of Man

The fall of man needs emphasis as much as his creation. As we believe that man was once upon a time, created by God in the image of God, so we also believe that soon thereafter man through disobedience fell into sin. After we have discussed what we mean by God and what we mean by the creation of man in the image of God, we can readily see what the nature of sin must be. As a creature of God man had to live in accordance with the law of God, that is, in accordance with the ordinances that God had placed in his creation. This law was for the most part not verbally transmitted to man but was created in his being. Man would act in accord with his own true nature only if he would obey the law of God and, vice versa, if he would live in accord with his own nature, he would obey the law of God. True, God did communicate to man over and above what was embedded in his very nature the specific commandment not to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. But this was only to force an immediate and final test as to whether man would really live in accordance with the law of God as everywhere revealed within and about him.

When man fell it was therefore his attempt to do without God in every respect. Man sought his ideals of truth, goodness and beauty somewhere beyond God, either directly within himself or in the universe about him. God had interpreted the universe for him, or we may say man had interpreted the universe under the direction of God, but now he sought to interpret the universe without reference to God; we mean of course, without reference to the kind of God defined above. [e.g., evolution tries to explain creation, etc., apart from God. Attributes specie development by chance rather than by design.]

The result for man was that he made for himself a false ideal of knowledge. Man made for himself the ideal of absolute comprehension in knowledge. This he could never have done if he had continued to recognize that he was a creature. It is totally inconsistent with the idea of creatureliness that man should strive for comprehensive knowledge; if it could be attained, it would wipe God out of existence; man would then be God. And, as we shall see later, because man sought for this unattainable ideal, he brought upon himself no end of woe. [massively important!]

In conjunction with man's false ideal of knowledge, we may mention here the fact that when man saw he could not attain his own false ideal of knowledge, he blamed this on his finite character. Man confused finitude with sin. Thus, he commingled the metaphysical and the ethical aspects of reality. Not willing to take the blame for sin, man laid it to circumstances round about him or within him.

III The Doctrine of Christ

When we have discussed the doctrine of God and the doctrine of man, we have the two points between which the knowledge transaction takes place. Yet since sin has come into the world, we cannot see the whole of the picture of reality from the Christian point of view until we see how God and man are brought together after their separation. Reconciliation is possible only if God brings about salvation for man and therewith reunion with himself. Christ came to bring man back to God.

To do this he was and had to be truly God. For this reason, the church has emphasized the fact that Christ was "Very God of Very God." Here it appears how important it is that we first think of the ontological trinity before we think of the economical trinity [ontological: the nature of being.] It was the second person of the ontological trinity, who was, in respect of his essence, fully equal with the Father, who therefore existed from all eternity with the Father, who in the incarnation assumed a human nature.

This does not mean that he laid aside his divine nature or that he became a human person. Nor does it mean that he became a divine-human person. Nor does it mean that the divine and human natures were intermingled. Christ was and remained even when he was in the manger in Bethlehem a divine person but this divine person took to itself in close union with its divine nature a human nature. The Creed of Chalcedon has expressed all this by saying that in Christ the divine and the human natures are so related as to be “two natures, without confusion, without change, without division, without separation.” The former two adjectives safeguard against the idea that the divine and the human are in any sense intermingled; the latter two adjectives assert the full reality of the union.

It will be noted at this point that this view of the incarnation is in full accord with the doctrine of God as above set forth. If Christ is really the second person of the ontological trinity, he shares in the incommunicable attributes of the Godhead. Accordingly, this implies that even in the incarnation Christ could not commingle the eternal and the temporal. The eternal must always remain independent of and prior to the temporal.

In addition to this brief statement about the person of Christ we must say a word about his offices.

Christ is true prophet, priest and king. The Westminster Shorter Catechism asks, “How does Christ execute the office of a Prophet?” The answer is “Christ executeth the office of a Prophet, in revealing to us by his Word and Spirit, the will of God for our salvation.” Now if we recall that man set for himself a false ideal of knowledge when he became a sinner, that is he lost true wisdom, we may say that in Christ man was re-instated to true knowledge. In Christ man realizes that he is a creature of God and that he must not seek for comprehensive knowledge. Christ is our wisdom. He is our wisdom not only in the sense that he tells us how to get to heaven; he is our wisdom too in teaching us true knowledge about everything concerning which we should have knowledge. [to prophesy means to teach.]

Again, the catechism asks: “How does Christ execute the office of a Priest?” The answer is: “Christ executeth the office of a Priest, in his once offering up himself a sacrifice to satisfy divine justice, and reconcile us to God, and in making continual intercession for us.” We need not discuss this point except to indicate that Christ’s work as priest cannot be separated from his work as Prophet. Christ could not give us true knowledge of God and of the universe unless he dies for us as priest. The question of knowledge is an ethical question at the root. It is indeed possible to have theoretically correct knowledge about God without loving God. The devil illustrates this point. Yet what is meant by knowing God in Scripture is knowing and loving God; this is true knowledge of God; the other is false.

In the third place the catechism asks: “How does Christ execute the office of a King?” The answer is: “Christ executeth the office of a King, in subduing us to himself, in ruling and defending us, and in restraining and on conquering all of his and our enemies.” Again, we observe that this work of Christ as king must be brought into organic connection with his work as prophet and priest. To give us true wisdom or knowledge Christ must subdue us. He died for us to subdue us and thus gave us wisdom. It is only by emphasizing this organic connection of the aspects of the work of Christ that we can avoid all mechanical separation of the intellectual and the moral aspects of the question of knowledge.

IV The Doctrine of Salvation

We have laid stress upon the organic relation between the offices of Christ. We must now point out that the same organic relationship exists between what Christ did for us and what Christ did and does within us. In Soteriology we deal with the application to us of the redemption Christ has wrought for us. Sin being what it is, it would be useless to have salvation lie ready at hand unless it were also applied to us. Inasmuch as we are dead in trespasses and sins, it would do us no good to have a wonderful life-giving potion laid next to us in our coffin. It would do us good only if some one actually administered the potion to us.

This point is already involved in the fact that Christ must subdue us in order to give us knowledge. But this subduing of us by Christ is done through his Spirit. It is the Spirit who takes the things of Christ and give them unto us. If Christ is to do his own work the spirit must do his. For this reason, Christ told the disciples it would profit them if he should ascend to heaven. It would only be after his ascent that the Spirit could come and finish the work that Christ had begun to do while on earth. What Christ did while he was on earth is only a beginning of his work.

For this reason, we must observe at this juncture that the Spirit who applies the work of Christ is himself also a member of the ontological trinity. He would have to be. Unless he were, the work of salvation would not be the work of God alone. If God was to be maintained in his incommunicable attributes, the Spirit of God, not man, had to effect the salvation of man. The only alternative to this would be that man could at some point take the initiative in the matter of his own salvation. This would imply that the salvation wrought by Christ could be frustrated by man. Suppose that none should accept the salvation offered to them. In that case the whole of Christ's work would be in vain and the eternal God would be set at naught by temporal man. Even if we say that in the case of any one individual sinner the question of salvation is in the last analysis dependent upon man rather than upon God, that is if we say that man can of himself accept or reject the gospel as he pleases, we have made the eternal God dependent upon man. We have then, in effect, denied the incommunicable attributes of God. If we refuse to mix the eternal and the temporal at the point of creation and at the point of the incarnation, we must also refuse to mix them at the point of salvation.

It will be noted that the point discussed in the preceding paragraph is the difference between Arminianism and Calvinism. It may be asked whether we should not in Apologetics ignore the difference that exists between different theological schools and defend the "common faith."

From what we have said above, however, it ought to appear that we cannot take this attitude. The difference between Calvinism and Arminianism is a difference in the conception of the relation of the eternal God and temporal man. Now since we hold that only such a view of theology as holds without compromise at any point to the conception of God as absolutely independent of man can really be said to represent the consistently Christian position, and since the whole debate between the Christian and non-Christian position revolves about the question of the relation of the eternal to the temporal or of God to man, it will be apparent that we must hold that Arminianism can offer no effective Apologetic for Christianity. It is up to the Arminian to show, if he can, that this view offers a better Apologetic for Christianity than that offered by the Calvinist. Certain it is that the difference between Calvinism and Arminianism cannot be ignored. He who tries to ignore it has in effect already taken the Arminian position. We shall not make much progress against the common enemy if we ignore such differences between ourselves. A Calvinist naturally thinks that the Arminian is letting the enemy into the fort in spite of what the things he is doing; on the other hand, an Arminian thinks that the Calvinists is letting the enemy into the fort without knowing it.

The Doctrine of the Church

“The catholic or universal church, which is invisible, consists of the whole number of the elect, that have been, are, or shall be gathered into one, under Christ the head thereof; and is the spouse, the body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all.” Such is the Westminster Confession’s definition of the church. This definition contains the same conception of the relation of the eternal to the temporal as is manifest in the doctrine of salvation. In the last analysis, it is the eternal that precedes the temporal; it is God who determines the salvation of man; the church, that is, the invisible church, is the “whole number of the elect.” This does not preclude human responsibility. The Confession has spoken of man’s responsibility and “free will” in preceding articles. It only brings out clearly that God is absolute, here as elsewhere.

It is this fact of God’s absoluteness as expressed in his election of men that gives us courage in preaching and in reasoning with men. Sin being what it is, we may be certain that all our preaching and all our reasoning with men will be in vain unless God brings men to bay. Men cannot be brought to bay if they have any place to which they can go. And they do have a place to which they can go if they have the inherent ability to accept or reject the gospel in which case they need not feel uneasy about rejecting it today, because they can accept it tomorrow.

Man's absolute dependence on God, knowledge of God is analogical; our knowledge of God and things cannot be comprehensive. The short comings of Arminianism and their theory of contradiction.

IV MAN'S KNOWLEDGE OF THE WORLD UNIVERSE

What we have said about man's knowledge of God is really determinative for what we have to say about man's knowledge of the universe. By the term universe we now mean the whole of the created world including man himself and his environment.

The first question we must ask with respect to the relation of our knowledge of God to our knowledge of the universe is, which of these two is prior?

Man cannot help but know himself at once in relation to his environment. The subject of knowledge must know itself in relation to and in contrast with the object of knowledge.

This contention that man must know himself in relation to his environment is not merely a general consideration obtained by observation of experience. It is implied in the very bedrock of Christianity. This may be seen by again referring to our idea of God and of God's relation to the created universe. Man exists by virtue of God's existence. Man's environment precedes man. God is man's ultimate environment, and this environment is completely interpretative of man who is to know himself.

In other words, man's environment is not impersonal. It is, moreover, not merely personal in the sense that simultaneous with his own appearance there are also other finite persons in relation to which he knows himself to be a person. Back of this relationship of finite persons to other finite persons and to other finite but impersonal things is the absolute personality of God. Back of the question as to whether man needs other finite persons or needs a finite non-personal environment is the question of the environment of man's immediate environment. God is man's ultimate environment, and this ultimate environment controls the whole of man's immediate environment as well as man himself. The whole of man's own immediate environment as well as man himself is already interpreted by God. Even the denotation of the whole universe exists by virtue of the connotation or plan of God. Thus, we have answered our question about temporal priority by answering the question of logical priority. Because man's knowledge of God is logically more fundamental than man's knowledge of the universe, we may be indifferent to the question of temporal priority. Even if in our psychological experience we know ourselves and the universe about us before we speak self-consciously of God, we have all the while known God if we have truly known anything else.

We have constantly emphasized the concept of God as being basic to everything else which a Christian believes. This is so because God exists, as he exists, necessarily. For that reason, we cannot know ourselves in any true sense unless we know God. He is our most ultimate and therefore absolutely indispensable environment. For that reason, if we know him, we know him truly though not comprehensively.

It follows from all this that we know the world truly though not comprehensively.

Our argument for the objectivity of knowledge with respect to the universe can never be complete and satisfactory unless we bring in the relation of both the object and the subject of knowledge to God. We may debate endlessly about psychological problems without fruitage if we refuse to bring in the metaphysical question of the nature of reality.^{85} If the Christian position with respect to creation, that is, with respect to the idea of the origin of both the subject and the object of human knowledge is true, there is and must be objective knowledge. In that case the world of objects was made in order that the subject of knowledge, namely man, should interpret it under God. Without the interpretation of the universe by man to the glory of God the whole world would be meaningless. The subject and the object are therefore adapted to one another. On the other hand, if the Christian theory of creation by God is not true then we hold that there cannot be objective knowledge of anything. In that case all things in this universe are unrelated and cannot be in fruitful contact with one another. This we believe to be the simple alternative on the question of the objectivity of knowledge as far as the things of this universe are concerned.

One of the points about which there has been much confusion when we speak of the objectivity of human knowledge is whether human knowledge of the world must be comprehensive to be true. Sometimes it is said that though we cannot hope to obtain comprehensive knowledge of God we may hope eventually if not now to have comprehensive knowledge of the things of this universe. But we believe that just for the reason that we cannot hope to obtain comprehensive knowledge of God we cannot hope to obtain comprehensive knowledge of anything in this world. Not as though anything in this world is infinite as God is infinite and for that reason not fully comprehensible, for it is not the infinity of things in themselves but once more the infinity of God that makes it impossible for us comprehensively to understand things in the created universe. The reason for this is not far to seek. The things of this universe must be interpreted in relation to God. The object of knowledge is not interpreted truly if though brought into relation with the human mind, it is not also brought into relation with the divine mind. God is the ultimate category of interpretation. Now we cannot fully understand God's plan for created things and so we cannot fully understand things.

We see then that our knowledge of the universe must be true since we are creatures of God who has made both us and the universe. Then too our knowledge of the universe cannot be comprehensive because our knowledge of God cannot be comprehensive.

A word must here be said about the question of antinomies. It will readily be inferred what as Christians we mean by antinomies. {86} They are involved in the fact that human knowledge can never be completely comprehensive knowledge. Every knowledge transaction has in its somewhere a reference point to God. Now since God is not fully comprehensible to us, we are bound to come into what seems to be contradiction in all our knowledge. Our knowledge is analogical and therefore must be paradoxical. We say that if there is to be any true knowledge at all there must be in God an absolute system of knowledge. We therefore insist that everything must be related to that absolute system of God. Yet we ourselves cannot fully understand that system.

We may, in order to illustrate our meaning here, take one of the outstanding paradoxes of the Christian interpretation of things, namely, that of the relation of the counsel of God to our prayers. To put it pointedly: We say on the one hand that prayer changes things and on the other hand we say that everything happens in accordance with God's plan and God's plan is immutable.

The thing we are concerned about here is to point out that in the nature of the case there would have to be such a paradox or seeming contradiction in human knowledge. God exists as self-complete apart from us; he is all-glorious. Yet he created the universe that it might glorify him. This point lies at the bottom of every paradox or antinomy. We were in the nature of the case completely interpreted before we came into existence; the universal plan of God needed not to be supplemented by historical particulars and could not be supplemented in this way. The historical could not produce anything wholly new. This much we see clearly. God being what he is, it must be his counsel which acts as the indispensable and self-complete unity back of the finite one and many. The only alternative to saying this is to say that the historical produces the wholly new, and this would be to give up the basic idea of the Christian-theistic scheme, namely, the idea of God and of his creation and control of the universe. On the other hand, the historical must have genuine significance. Or else why should God have created it? Prayer must be answered, or God would not be God. The universe must really glorify God; that is the purpose of its existence. So we seem to have on the one hand a bucket that is full of water and on the other hand we seem to add water to this bucket which we claim to be already full.

It appears that there must seem to be contradiction in human knowledge. To this we must now add that the contradiction that seems to be there can in the nature of the case be no more than a seeming contradiction. If we said that there is real contradiction in our knowledge we would once more be denying the basic concept of Christian-theism, i.e., the concept of the self-complete universal in God. We should then not merely be saying that there is no complete coherence in our thinking, but we should also be saying that there is no complete coherence in God's thinking. And this would be the same as saying that there is no coherence or truth in our thinking at all. If we say that the idea of paradox or antinomy is that of real contradiction, we have destroyed all human and all divine knowledge; if we say that the idea of paradox or antinomy is that of seeming contradiction, we have saved God's knowledge and therewith also our own.

We must note here again how impossible it is in an apologetic argument to close one's eyes to differences between various theological schools. That fact comes out here more strikingly than anywhere else. Arminianism has not been true to its own belief in creation. With belief in creation, it stands committed to that view of God and of God's counsel and that view of man's relation to that counsel which we have outlined. Yet it has been untrue to all this in its insistence that the historical does produce the absolutely new. For that reason, it has to think of the relation of God's counsel to man's activity as one of real contradiction. In order to avoid this "contradiction" it has simply thrown overboard the idea of the counsel of God, as controlling all things. Therewith it has in effect sought to destroy both divine and human knowledge and therewith it has destroyed the very meaning of history which it was so anxious to preserve. God cannot answer our prayers for the salvation of people if those people can reject that salvation when they wish.

Van Til states from his book, An Introduction to Systematic Theology, pg 208: Add to this the fact that even orthodox Arminians theology has, in its concept of the plenary ability of the sinner to accept or reject the gospel, really taught that the natural man knows what his basic needs are, and it becomes very clear that the danger facing us is indeed very great. Arminianism had made an easy alliance with evolutionism.

Abraham Kuyper's Doctrine of Common Grace

 Abraham Kuyper's Doctrine of
 Common Grace

Bold and red for emphasis. Brackets in [\[blue\]](#) are my inserts.

Turning now to an exposition of Kuyper's great work, we regret that we cannot begin with Calvin. (A reference, in passing, must be made, however, to the dissertation of Dr. Herman Kuiper, Calvin on Common Grace, 1928) We even pass by the pamphlet of Dr. Herman Bavinck on Common Grace with a remark or two. Bavinck wrote his booklet (published in 1894) with the purpose of bolstering up the claim he made for the Protestant Faith in his earlier address on The Catholicity of Christianity and the Church (published in 1888). It is Protestantism rather than Romanism, he avows in that earlier lecture, that expresses the truly catholic genius of the Christian Religion. It is in accordance with this that he says in his pamphlet on Common Grace, "Through this doctrine of gratia communis the Reformed [theologians] have on the one hand maintained the specific and absolute character of the Christian religion and on the other have been second to none in their appreciation of everything good and beautiful that God has given to sinful men. Thus they have simultaneously maintained the seriousness of sin and the rights of the natural. And thus they were protected against both Pelagianism and Pietism" (p. 29).

A similar purpose has also controlled Kuyper in his work. It was the desire to press the catholic claim of the truth of Christianity that led Kuyper as well as Bavinck to set forth this doctrine of common grace.

We shall first attempt to find the general characteristics of Kuyper's doctrine of common grace. Here a difficulty confronts us. There appears to have been a certain development in his views. In the first of his three volumes entitled De Gemeene Gratie, he tends to define common grace in more negative, while in the second he tends to define common grace in more positive, terms. In the first volume he speaks of the essence of common grace as being a certain restraint of God upon the process of the sinful development of history. In the second volume he speaks of the essence of common grace as being a certain positive accomplishment in history that the sinner is enabled to make by God's gifts to him. It looks as though Kuyper's conception of common grace grew gradually in his own mind to include a positive as well as a negative aspect. We shall look at each of these aspects in turn, in order then as far as we can, to bring them together in to one concept.

When Kuyper speaks of the restraint of the destructive process of sin as being the essence of the doctrine of common grace he makes plain that common grace, like special grace, presupposes the doctrine of the sinner's total depravity. All men are born dead in trespasses and sins. "But", he adds, "upon death follows a process of disintegration of the corpse that could be and was restrained, not wholly but in part. Not wholly, in order that the fearful results of sin might be apparent to all, but in part, in order that also in this manner the wealth of God's creation and of his recreating power in our sinful race might be glorified. (De Gemeene Gratie, Leiden, 1902), I, p. 243. He asserts a little later that the entire doctrine of common grace presupposes the fact of total depravity (I, p. 243).

Both types of grace, special and common, presuppose total depravity. The difference between the two must be indicated by the different effect they accomplish upon the totally depraved. Regeneration, a gift of the special grace, Kuyper argues, removes the cancer of sin by taking out its roots. In the place of sin it gives the power of eternal life. But common grace does nothing of the sort. It keeps down but does not quench. It tames, but does not change the nature. It keeps back and holds in leash, but thus, as soon as the restraint is removed, the evil races forth anew of itself. It trims the wild shoots, but does not heal the root. It leaves the inner impulse of the ego of man to its wickedness, but prevents the full fruition of wickedness. It is a limiting, a restraining, a hindering power, which brakes and brings to a standstill." (I, p. 251). [in other words, Hitler would have been much worse had not God restrained him; and if there were no common grace in the world, it would literally be hell on earth; no one would be safe anywhere. Common grace allows society to prosper and be livable so that we don't destroy one another.]

Thus it is the restraint of the destructive force of sin that as sin has affected the whole universe in the course of its historical development, we find, according to Kuyper, that common grace reaches out everywhere. Summing up his discussion on this point, he asserts: "Thus common grace began in the soul of man, by keeping the 'small sparks' from dying out. It took its second point of support in the body of man by supporting its physical powers and thus pushing back the coming death. In addition to this, common grace had to produce a third type of activity, namely, in the world of man..." (I, p. 261).

The essence of common grace is the restraint of the process of sin; its scope is man and his world. Its ultimate foundation, we must add, is the mercy of God. Says Kuyper: "Thus common grace is an omnipresent operation of divine mercy, which reveals itself everywhere where human hearts are found to beat and which spreads its blessing upon these human hearts." (I, p. 251).

We cannot set forth in detail what Kuyper further says on the restraint of sin. At the moment we are looking for a broad perspective of the doctrine of common grace as a whole. It is well to hasten on, then, to Kuyper's statement of what we my call the positive aspect of common grace.

Kuyper distinguishes in his second volume between the constant and the progressive aspects of common grace. By the constant aspect of common grace he means largely what in the first volume he speaks of as the essence of common grace, namely, the restraint of the process of sin. God's purpose with common grace, he adds in the second volume, is not merely to make human life possible by the restraint of sin, but also to provide for its progress (II p. 600). "There is", he says, "on the one hand the constant operation of common grace which began in Paradise after the Fall, and which has remained till this day precisely what it was in the beginning and this constant common grace itself consists of two parts." (II p. 600). These two parts are God's restraint of the power of destruction in nature and God's restraint "of the power of sin in the heart of man, to make possible the appearance of civil righteousness on the earth among sinners and heathen... This is the common grace that leads to the maintenance and control of our human life." (II p. 600).

Continuing from this point Kuyper says: "Yet common grace could not stop at this first and constant operation. Mere maintenance and control affords no answer to the question as to what end the world is to be preserved and why it has passed throughout a history of ages. If things remain the same, why should they remain at all? If life were merely repetition, why should life be continued at all? ...Accordingly, there is added to this first constant operation of common grace ...another, wholly different, operation...calculated to make human life and the life of the whole world pass through a process and develop itself more fully and richly.

The course of history would, argues Kuyper, be wholly unintelligible if we forgot to bear in mind the progressive and well adds the constant operation of common grace. Defining both aspects briefly again, he says: "The constant [operation] consists in this that God, with many differences of degree, restrains the curse of nature and the sin of the human heart. In contrast with this the progressive [operation] is that other working through which God, with steady progress, equips human life ever more thoroughly against suffering, and internally brings it to richer and fuller development." (II p. 602).

The "deep, incisive difference" between these two operations of common grace Kuyper signals by saying that in the constant operation, God acts independently of man, while in the case of the progressive operation man himself acts as "instrument and co-laborer with God." (II p. 600). The history of civilization is here brought in as proof for his contention that man himself is the co-laborer with God. [Here is my view on this as I see in scripture: man's dependence upon God is perfect, universal and absolute since we receive our all from God. God is not dependent at all on the creature for any of His happiness or glory. In one sense we are co-laborers, but in another sense, if you dig deeper here, we are not, in that we are entirely dependent upon God, his working in us, to do anything good, as John notes in John 15:5, apart from Me you can do nothing (nothing spiritually good). And so Paul relates this truth Phil. 2:13, ¹³ for it is God who works in you, both to will and to work for his good pleasure. Now, the amazing part of this, or the wonderful mystery of it, is that God does this, works in you, without doing violence to your creaturely liberty; God works not by compulsion or making you a puppet on a string. Jonathan Edwards expounds this here regarding efficacious grace or special grace, as Van Til points out above, grace that severs the root of sin, but the MO of God is the same with common grace; he works both by his sovereign power over the soul of man:

§ 64. In efficacious [special] grace we are not merely passive, nor yet does God do some, and we do the rest. But God does all, and we do all. God produces all, and we act all. For that is what he produces, viz. our own acts. God is the only proper author and fountain; we only are the proper actors. We are, in different respects, wholly passive and wholly active.

In the Scriptures the same things are represented as from God and from us. God is said to convert, and men are said to convert and turn. God makes a new heart, and we are commanded to make us a new heart. God circumcises the heart, and we are commanded to circumcise our own hearts; not merely because we must use the means in order to the effect, but the effect itself is our act and our duty. These things are agreeable to that text, "God worketh in you both to will and to do."

Van Til continues:

At a somewhat earlier point in the second volume Kuyper says: "common grace is never something that is added to our nature, but is always something that proceeds from our nature as the result of the constraint of sin and corruption." (II, p. 214). Here, though he speaks without limitation, he is evidently thinking only of what he later calls the progressive operation of common grace.

WE must not join the two aspects of common grace of which Kuyper speaks. In a general way we may affirm that, for Kuyper, common grace is primarily a restraining power of God, working either with or without man as an instrument, by which the original creation powers of the universe are given an opportunity for a certain development to the glory of God.

This very broad and qualified definition of Kuyper's doctrine of common grace is perhaps the best we can do under the circumstances. Kuyper's exposition is not fully consistent and clear. Yet, in a well-rounded statement of his view Kuyper would wish us to include (a) the two operations spoken of and (b) the activity of man as the instrument of God at certain points.

Kuyper's statement of the doctrine of common grace has not gone unchallenged. In a number of pamphlets and books, as well as in a monthly magazine, The Standard Bearer, the Rev. Herman Hoeksema, the Rev. Henry Danhof and others have vigorously denied the existence of common grace.

Hoeksema and Danhof argue that it is inconceivable that God should be in any sense, and at any point, graciously inclined to those who are not His elect. The wicked do, to be sure, receive gifts from God. But rain and sunshine are not, as such, evidences of God's favor.

Moreover, the idea of common grace, Hoeksema and Danhof contend, virtually denies the doctrine of total depravity. Man is inherently a spiritual-moral being. If he is said to do any good, as Kuyper says he does, this good must be a spiritual good. And if man does any spiritual good he is not totally depraved. When Hoeksema and Danhof began to write against the idea of common grace they were ministers of the Christian Reformed Church. In 1924 the Synod of that Church virtually condemned their views. It did so by making a pronouncement on three points of doctrine.

As these "three points" have ever since been at the center of the debate on common grace we include them at this juncture. As given in The Banner (June 1, 1939, pp. 308 f) they are:

"Synod, having considered that part of the Advice of the Committee in General which is found in point III under the head: Treatment of the Three Points, comes to the following conclusions:

“ ‘A. Concerning the first point, touching the favorable attitude of God toward mankind in general, and not alone toward the elect, Synod declares that it is certain, according to Scripture and the Confession, that there is, besides the saving grace of God, shown only to those chosen to eternal life, also a certain favor or grace of God which he shows to his creatures in general. This is evident from the quoted Scripture passages and from the Canons of Dort. II, 5, and III and IV, 8 and 9, where the general offer of the Gospel is discussed; while it is evident from the quoted declarations of Reformed writers of the period of florescence of Reformed theology that our Reformed fathers from of old have championed this view.’

“Note of the editor: The following Scripture passages are given as proof: Ps. 145:9; Matt. 5:44, 45; Luke 6:35, 36; Acts 14:16, 17; 1Tim 4:10; Rom. 2:4; Ezek. 33:11; Ezek. 18:23. We need not print these texts since the readers can easily look them up. They can also find the passages of the Canons of Dort referred to in their copy of the Psalter Hymnal. However, inasmuch as they have no access to the declarations of the Reformed fathers, we should translate these; but since that will take considerable space we shall omit a sentence here and there, where this can be done without obscuring the thought.

“Calvin: Book II, ch. II, 16: ‘Yet let us not forget that these are most excellent gifts of the Divine Spirit, which for the common benefit of mankind he dispenses to whomsoever he pleases.... Nor is there any reason for inquiring what intercourse with the Spirit is enjoyed by the impious who are entirely alienated from God. For when the Spirit of God is said to dwell only in the faithful, that is to be understood of the Spirit of sanctification, by whom we are consecrated as temples to God himself. Yet it is equally by the energy of the same Spirit that God replenishes, actuates, and quickens all creatures, and that according to the property of each species which he has given it by the law of creation...’ Book III, ch. 14:2: ‘We see how he confers many blessings of the present life on those who practice virtue among men. Not that this external resemblance of virtue merits the least favor from him; but he is pleased to discover (reveal – K.) his great esteem of true righteousness by not permitting that which is external and hypocritical to remain without a temporal reward. Whence it follows, as we have just acknowledged, that these virtues, whatever they may be, or rather images of virtue, are the gift of God; since there is nothing in any respect laudable which does not proceed from him.’

“ ‘Van Mastricht, First Part, p. 439: ‘Now from this proceeds a threefold love of God toward the creatures: a general, Psalm 104:31 and 145:9, whereby he has created, preserves, and rules all things, Psalm 36:7 and 147:9; a common, directed to human beings in particular, not indeed to all and to each, but nevertheless to all kinds, without exception, the reprobate as well as the elect, of what sort or race they may be, to which he communicates his blessings; which are mentioned in Heb. 6:4, 5; 1Cor. 3:1,2.’

“ ‘Concerning the second point, touching the restraint of sin in the life of the individual and in society, the Synod declares that according to Scripture, and the Confession, there is such a restraint of sin. This is evident from the quoted Scripture passages and from the Belgic Confession, article 13 and 36, where it is taught that God through the general operations of His Spirit, without renewing the heart, restrains sin in its unhindered breaking forth, as a result of which human society has remained possible; while it is evident from the quoted declarations of Reformed writers of the period florescence of Reformed theology that our Reformed fathers from of old have championed this view.’

“Note of the editor: The following Scripture passages are referred to: Gen. 6:3; Ps. 81:11, 12; Acts 7:42; Rom. 1:24, 26, 28; 2Thes. 2:6, 7.

“The same Reformed writers are quoted as under the first point:

“Calvin, Institutes, Book II, ch. III, 3: ‘For in all ages there have been some persons who, from the mere dictates of nature, have devoted their whole lives to the pursuit of virtue. And though many errors might perhaps be discovered in their conduct, yet by their pursuit of virtue they afforded proof that there was some degree of purity in their nature... These examples, then, seem to teach us that we should not consider human nature to be totally corrupted; since, from its instinctive bias, some men have not only been eminent for noble actions, but have uniformly conducted them selves in the most virtuous manner through the whole course of their lives. But here we ought to remember that amidst this corruption of nature there is some room for Divine grace, not to purify it but internally to restrain its operations. (we italicize – K.) For should the Lord permit the minds of all men to give up the reins to every lawless passion, there certainly would not be an individual in the world, whose actions would not evince all the crimes for which Paul condemns human nature in general, to be most truly applicable to him... In his elect the Lord heals these maladies by a method which we shall hereafter describe. In others he restrains them, only to prevent their ebullitions so far as he sees to be necessary for the preservation of the universe.’

“Van Mastricht, II, p. 330: ‘God however moderates the severity of this spiritual death and bondage: (a) internally by means of some remnants of the image of God and of original righteousness....to which things is added an internal restraining grace.... (b) Externally, through all kinds of means (“hulpmiddelen”) of State, Church, Family, and Schools, by which the freedom and dissoluteness of sin is checked and restrained, and to which even an incentive to practice what is honorable is added.’

“ ‘Concerning the third points, touching the performance of so-called civic righteousness by the unregenerate, the Synod declares that according to Scripture and the Confession the unregenerate, though incapable of any saving good (Canons of Dor, III, IV, 3), can perform such civic good. This is evident from the quoted Scripture passages and from the Canons of Dort, III, IV, 4, and the Belgic Confession, where it is taught that God, without renewing the heart, exercises such influence upon man that he is enabled to perform civic good; while it is evident from the quoted declarations of Reformed writers of the period of florescence of Reformed theology, that our Reformed fathers have from of old championed this view.

Note: The Scripture passages quoted are: 2Kings 10:29, 30; 2Kings 12:2 (compare 2Chron, 24:17-25); 2Kings 14:3 (compare 2Chron. 25:2 and vss. 14-16, 20, 27); Luke 6:33; Rom. 2:14 (compare vs. 13. Also Rom. 10:5 and Gal. 2:12).

Note: Again we translate Synod's quotations from the writings of Reformed fathers:

"Ursinus, Schatboek; on Lord's Day III: 'Concerning an unconverted person it is said that he is so corrupt that he is totally incapable of any good. To understand this one must know what kind of good and what sort of incapability is spoken of there. There is a threefold good: (1) Natural (good), as eating drinking, walking, standing, sitting; (2) Civic (good), as buying, selling, doing justice, some knowledge or skill, and more of such, which promote out temporal welfare. (3) There is also a spiritual and supernatural good, which is absolutely necessary for inheriting eternal life. It consists in this that one turns to God from the heart and believes in Christ. The last is meant here; in the other an unconverted man can even far excel a regenerated person although he had these (as a common gift) from God. See 2Cor. 3:5; James 1:17; Exod. 31:2; Prov. 16:1.'

'Van Mastricht, I, p. 458: "Reformed (scholars) acknowledge indeed that the unregenerate person, apart from saving grace, is able....but they add to this that even these things are not done only through the exercise of the free will but through God's common grace working in the unregenerate all the moral good which is in them or which is produced by them. [hence, see Phil. 2:13 above! God works in you to will and to do...] For example, all the natural art which was in Bezalel, Ex. 31:2, 3, and all the moral good in those of whom it is said that they were enlightened by the Holy Spirit, tasted the good Word of God and the powers of the age to come, Heb. 6:4, 5.'

'Van Mastricht, I, p. 300: '...There is a natural good, for example, eating, drinking, reasoning; there is a civic good as polite and friendly association with the neighbor, and offending no one; there is a moral or ecclesiastical good, as attending worship diligently, saying prayers, refraining from gross misdeeds, Luke 18:11, 12; and a spiritual good, for example, faith, hope, etc....in the state of sin the free will is indeed able to do a thing that is a natural, civic, or moral good, but not a spiritual good, which accompanies salvation.' [that is the key distinction! E.g., Jesus said the Jews, you will not come to me to have life. They will not because they cannot! See Romans 8:7-8 – ...those who are in the flesh cannot please God. To please God is to obey the gospel which is to believe on Christ for eternal life. This is the principle point upon which man's total depravity issues forth.]

We shall not pass in review the various criticisms made upon "the three points" by Hoeksema and his associates. These criticisms, together with their relative validity or invalidity will appear in substance as we turn to a fuller discussion of the latest phase of the debate on common grace.

Notes on the Image of God, Roman Catholicism/Aquinas' Errors on the Depravity of Man & Con-createdness of God's Image, etc., And notes on the Trinity and the Representational Principle

Excerpts from Lane Tipton's book,
The Trinitarian Theology of Cornelius Van Til
Pgs. 138-151, 161-162

The Representational Principle, the Image of God And the Sensus Divinitatis

This leads Van Til to suggest that the representational principle supplies a Trinitarian frame of reference that anchors Calvin's view of the image of God and the sensus divinitatis [footnote: Calvin states that this reciprocal knowledge of God and man obtains after the fall, as well, most clearly in man's inescapable knowledge of his misery.] According to Calvin's view, creatures know God in the same act of knowing themselves, and that knowledge, before the fall for image-bearing Adam consisted of true knowledge, righteousness, and holiness.

Calvin argues that Adam was created as the image of God in righteousness, holiness, and knowledge of God with no need for additional grace (such as the donum superadditum of Roman Catholicism) in order to address a defect in his psychosomatic union. He says,

In order for us to come to a sure knowledge of ourselves, we must first grasp the fact that Adam, parent of us all, was created in the image and likeness of God (Gen. 1:26-27). That is, he was endowed with wisdom, righteousness, holiness, and was to cling by these gifts of grace to God that he could have lived forever in Him, if he had stood fast in the uprightness God had given him.

Calvin construes Adam's righteousness and holiness as concreated and natural to him, so that he stood in original righteousness before God as the created image of God. He elaborates: "Now God's image is the perfect excellence of human nature which shone in Adam before his defection." In fact, Calvin emphasizes that it is of the highest importance "to know what we were like when we were first created and what our condition became after the fall of Adam." He insists, contrary to the Roman Catholic doctrine of concupiscence that "if a defect were proved to inhere in nature, this would bring reproach upon [God]. Calvin gives seminal expression to the deeper Protestant conception of the image of God as developed in chapter 2.

Van Til argues that "Calvin has really made an advance in the direction of a truly Christian theistic epistemology." This is especially so when we join Calvin's understanding of the image of God in his exposition of the sensus divinitatis. Van Til says that, in Calvin's view, "man cannot exist and never has existed apart from a sense of deity. This is [Calvin's] way of saying that man's knowledge of himself and of God comes simultaneously.” In other words, Calvin “did not think that he could know himself first and afterward know God...The knowledge of self and the knowledge of God is, according to Calvin, included in one act of thought.” On this point, Van Til echoes the language of Warfield:

The knowledge of God is given in the very same act by which we know self. For when we know self, we must know it as it is: and the means...co-knowledge with self of that on which it is dependent...We know God in knowing self.”

This means that “the knowledge of God...is given in the same act of knowledge by which we know ourselves.” The concurrent awareness of self and of God lies at the heart of Calvin’s view of the internal general revelation given to Adam before the fall in the creational endowment of the image of God.

Calvin adds, regarding the knowledge that is native to the image endowment:

Nearly all the wisdom we possess, that is to say, true and sound wisdom, consists of two parts: the knowledge of God and of ourselves. But, while joined by many bonds, which one precedes and brings forth the other is not easy to discern. In the first place, no one can look upon himself without immediately turning his thoughts to the contemplation of God in whom he “lives and moves.”

This language appeared in the context of the introductory chapter entitled, “The Knowledge of God and That of Ourselves Are Connected. How are They Interrelated.” Calvin wrote later along similar lines that “man never achieves a clear knowledge of himself unless he had first looked upon God’s face, and then descends from contemplating him to scrutinize himself.” As Edward A Dowey, Jr., remarks, “This co-relation of knowledge between God and man is of course not merely formal. It is shot through on every level with a two-sided personal relationship which expresses itself in religious and moral categories.” It is precisely this religious relationship concreated in Adam as the image of God that distinguishes the deeper Protestant conception of man as the natural image of God, together with its corresponding view of general revelation, from the deeper Catholic conception of Thomas and Bellarmine and the deeper Modernist conception of Barth.”²⁹ read this footnote! of sin and misery, since he supposes him to be capable of utilizing his intellect and will [when they are really in bondage to sin...] to arrive at and acknowledge true propositions about God from nature. Aquinas's failure to begin with concreated knowledge of God (both before and after the fall, his weakened view of original sin, and his truncated view of natural theology combine to render his method of natural theology inadequate to express the bible's teaching regarding the image of God and general revelation (see Rom. 1:18-23). In stark contrast, Van Til develops Calvin's view of general revelation in light of the representational principle, affirms man's inescapable and concreated knowledge of God (as his image), acknowledges the inability of fallen man to generate a true natural theology (given his depravity), and declares as absolutely necessary the Spirit's regeneration by means of special revelation for sinful man to acknowledge what he inescapably Knowles through God's general revelation (cf Rom. 1:20-21; Ps 19:1-4). In these ways, Van Til's apologetical method distinguishes itself crisply from the Roman Catholic approach exemplified by Aquinas, as well as from Barth's utter rejection of apologetics and general revelation.

According to Calvin, Adam was created in natural religious fellowship with God [contrary to Roman Catholicism which required the donum superadditum for this fellowship to occur], and every aspect of creation in external and internal general revelation disclosed the glory of God. so that Adam might glorify and enjoy God in true religious worship and fellowship. Thus, Calvin reasons that "God himself has implanted in all men a certain understanding of his divine majesty." This natural endowment yields a universal and innate knowledge of God's existence that lies at the heart of the religious essence of the image of God. Warfield argues that what "flow [s] from this fact [i.e., the sensus divinitatis], is that knowledge of God is universal and indelible...It is the precondition of all religion." Therefore, "our native endowment is not merely a sensus deitatis but also a semen religionis...For what we call religion is just the reaction of the human soul to what it perceives God to be."

Van Til embraces Calvin's conception of a completely revelational environment for Adam when he writes that "Calvins' thought was concrete in the true sense of the word...The knowledge of self and the knowledge of God is...included in one act of thought." This is what Van Til has in mind with he speaks of the "concrete" aspect of Calvin's thought. There is no aspect of human existence or knowledge that is immune from the absolute claims and inescapable revelation of the triune personal God, whether in the image of God or in the covenant of works. The triune God, the absolute triune personality, makes himself known to image bearers in every operation of consciousness. For this reason, image bearers inhabit an exhaustively revelational environment.

Van Til's representational principle therefore offers a Trinitarian foundation that organically interfaces with Calvins' understanding of the image of God an the sensus divinitatis. Just as the divine persons are exhaustively representational of one another in the relations of subsistence and coinherence, so that there is no residue of impersonality in the intra-Trinitarian relations, so likewise in the "new relation" between God and image-bearing Adam, God reveals himself in an inescapable personal relation of knowledge that expresses itself from the human side in worship and fellowship.

The representational principle is a Reformed Trinitarian category designed to account for the facts that Adam was (1) created in natural religious fellowship with God, (2) endowed with original righteousness as the image of God, (3) enveloped in a created environment that made coincident the knowledge of God and knowledge of self, and (4) constituted as the federal representative of the human race by an act of convenantal condescension. Adam's relation to God as the created image of God and his function as federal head constituted a creaturely reproduction of the mutually exhaustive and mutually representative relations of the Trinitarian persons of the Godhead.

The Representational Principle and the Order of Operations in the decree and the Pactum Salutis
(w/ good notes on Pantheism)

The divine processions terminate in the God entirely apart from the creation. The divine missions terminate in time in relation to creation. The divine processions ad intra are distinct from and cannot be collapsed into the divine missions ad extra. To collapse them would move directly into a species of pantheism. With the distinction between the processions and the missions clearly in view, we can understand what Van Til means when he says that “since the internal relationships of the triune God are convenantal, God's relation to mankind is also covenantal.” The internal relationships of the Trinitarian persons are covenantal, not in the opera ad intra (relations of procession, relations of subsistence, relations of coinherence) but in the opera ad extra (the eternal decree, the work of creation, the providential act of convenantal condescension). The internal relationships of the triune God are covenantal, not in the relations of personal subsistence (ad intra), but only in the relations of personal operation (ad extra). The internal relationships of the Trinitarian persons are covenantal insofar as God's acts with reference to creation involve his sovereign commitment to execute the divine plan with reference to the world.

It would amount to a profound misunderstanding of Van Til to fail to distinguish between the internal relationships of the Trinitarian persons in the order of personal subsistence and the relationships in the order of personal operation, as outlined in chapter 5. The internal relationships of the Trinitarian person in the order of personal subsistence are necessary [because of the nature of being God, who he is]; the internal relationship of the Trinitarian person in the order of personal operation are free [free from outside influence or internal necessity, e.g., I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy]. However, it is absolutely critical to maintain that in this eternal decree God does not freely will to himself new properties by which he undergoes personal change in order to relate to creatures. The divine missions are not the alpha point of change in God, and more than creation is the alpha point of change in God, because God does not change at any point in his determination to relate to creation. Van Til vigorously maintains that When God created the world by the determination of his will there was no change in himself. When the second person of the Trinity became incarnate there was no change in God. God gave the world existence alongside of himself. He could do so just because he is the self-contained infinite being. Thus, the doctrine of the infinity of God, so far from leading us into pantheism, is the best possible safeguard against it. Any attempt to safe-guard the doctrine of God against pantheism by subtracting from the self-contained internal activity of God is foredoomed to failure.

[my reasoning on this: if God is infinite you cannot add to him because you cannot add to infinity nor can you subtract from his infinitude because then God would not be infinite. And since pantheism is basically theistic mutualism or correlativism in Van Til's understanding (which is correct), that God takes on new properties, etc., in order to relate to his mutable creatures, this contradicts or destroys God's infinitude just mentioned. And hence the doctrine of God's infinity protects against all forms of pantheism.]

Notes on Pantheism by Van Til

Van Til states from his book, An Introduction to Systematic Theology p 204: In Paradise God walked and talked with man. Man needs God near to him. Even in the state of sin man has realized something of the need of a God who is near him. In fact, the sinner has brought God too near to him; he has identified the Creator with the creature. In idolatry we have an expression on the part of the sinner that points to his need of a God who is near.

Side note on pantheism:

Van Til's mentor, Abraham Kuiper was particularly concerned about the intrusion of pantheism into the church and the West. His principle concern was that by identifying God with ideals like progress, the boundaries between God and the world are blurred, and God becomes severely limited. See his "Pantheism's Destruction of Boundaries," in Methodist Review 75 (1893): 520-37; 762-78. – An Introduction to Systematic Theology, Van Til, pg 320 note 4

Pantheism for Vos and Van Til, as we saw earlier in chapter 2, is any doctrine that teaches directly or indirectly, explicitly or implicitly, that the immutable and living Trinitarian persons of the Godhead change in the sovereignly willed new relations to creation or in the event of the incarnation. Giving a concrete illustration, Van Til says that Dorner, for instance, sought to harmonize the unchangeability of God with the fact of his active concern for the things of the universe by saying that God is immutable merely in the ethical aspect of his being. God is always love and is always holy. On the other hand, God changed when he actually created the world and when, in the person of the Son, he became flesh. Bavinck insists, and rightly so, that all these efforts are foredoomed to failure. The Scriptures speak anthropomorphically of God, and could not do otherwise, but for all this, God, in himself, is immutable. "There is change round about him; the r is change in the relation of things to him; but there is no change in God himself."

The representational principle helps us grasp that neither the works of God ad intra nor the works of God ad extra introduce any change in God. Neither the sovereign work of God in the eternal decree, nor the free work of God in creation, nor the condescending work of God in covenant is an event of divine self-alteration. The nature of the mystery expressed in the representational principle is that the Trinitarian persons remain immutable and living in God's "new relation" to creation, in the act of covenantal condescension, and in the event of the incarnation.

The Representational Principle and the Transcendental

Method of Reasoning by Presupposition

Van Til quite creatively applied the representational principle to his transcendental method of reasoning by presupposition. The representational principle entails that all of creation inescapably reveals the absolute and personal Triune God. In the “new relation” of creation, God made himself known to image-bearing Adam in Eden through general and special revelation. Adam, as the first created image bearer, knew God inescapably through nature and conscience in a natural bond of religious fellowship. In the new relation, Adam began with the knowledge of God that was gifted to him as an aspect of the image of endowment itself. Adam was not only created with the capacity to know God, but was also created in true knowledge of God and in natural religious fellowship with him (Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10) [this is contrary to the Roman Catholic view which requires the donum superadditum to attain this fellowship]. Adam was created in an inescapably revelational environment and knew God in the same act by which he knew himself and the world (see Calvin’s sensus divinitatis).

The representational principle also teaches that by virtue of a voluntary act of special providential condescension in covenant, Adam was constituted a federal head of his natural posterity. Adam was not a federal head by virtue of his creation as the image of God simpliciter. Rather, by a special act of providence temporally concurrent to Adam’s creation as the image of God – a special act of providence that the WCF terms covenant – Adam came to represent his natural posterity in his natural religious fellowship with “God and in his obedience to God under probation in Eden. The covenantal condescension of God constituted Adam a “public person” and set before him (and his natural posterity in him) the prospect of confirmed and perfected natural fellowship with God and advancement beyond his estate of innocency in Eden. Upon successful probation in covenant with God, Adam and his natural posterity would inherit the immutable and condescended triune God himself as their “blessedness and reward” in the estate of glory (WCF 7.1-2; 9.2, 5). The conception of Adam as a public person grows organically out of the exhaustive personal representation of the Trinitarian persons in the Godhead that is replicated on the creaturely level in the covenantal condescension that constitutes Adam as federal head of the race.

Given the logic of the representational principle, the triune God made himself known in one grand scheme of general and special revelation. God’s general revelation to Adam by virtue of creation was immediately joined to God’s special revelation in covenantal condescension, forging one grand scheme of God’s self-revelation to Adam before the fall. In Van Til’s language, God supplies “one grand covenantal revelation of himself to man,” so that general and special revelation “must therefore be seen as presupposing and supplementing one another. There are aspects of one general philosophy of history.’

Great summary of man’s total depravity

After the fall, sinners both suppress the general revelation of God without and within and reason in a rebellious way that does not submit to God’s special revelation in Scripture. Sinners proceed in terms of a totalizing suppression and rejection of God’s one grand scheme of covenantal revelation that, after the fall, has its climactic fulfillment in the person, work, and kingdom of “the self-attesting Christ” of Scripture. Unbelief rests in empty and deceptive presuppositions (Col. 2:8) that proceed from a mind that is darkened (Eph. 4:17), a will that is enslaved (Rom. 6:20; 8:7-8), and affections that are set on forbidden earthly things that cannot satisfy (Eph. 4:19). The heart of the unbeliever is turned against God in such rebellion that it “cannot” submit to God or please him (Romans 8:7-8). Unbelief recoils at its core against the glory of the absolute and living Trinitarian persons who are the one living and true God. Unbelief reasons as though there is no absolute God who is absolutely revealed in nature and in Scripture (Gen. 3:1-6).

When employing the representational principle, Van Til enlists classical Reformed Trinitarianism and federalism to offer a transcendental critique of all forms of philosophical correlativism and theological mutualism (i.e., all systems of thought that do not begin with the being and revelation of the self-contained triune God). The representational principle provides for Van Til the Trinitarian logic underlying the method of reasoning from the “impossibility of the contrary” to Trinitarian theism.

Van Til argues that an absolute God and a transcendental method go hand in hand. Applying the logic of the representational principle to apologetical method, Van Til reasons,

Any method...that does not maintain that not a single fact can be known unless it be that God gives that fact meaning, is an anti-Christian method...Now the only argument for an absolute God that holds water is the transcendental argument...The transcendental argument seeks to discover what sort of foundations the house of human knowledge must have, in order to be what it is...A truly transcendent God and a transcendental method go hand in hand.

He explains that “if God has any significance for any object of knowledge at all, the relation of God to that object of knowledge must be taken into consideration from the outset. It is this fact that the transcendental method seeks to recognize.” Given autothean perichoresis and its implications for the “relation of God” to the “object of knowledge,” Van Til argues for the truth of classical Reformed Trinitarianism from the “impossibility of the contrary.” The transcendental argument that Christianity is true “from the impossibility of the contrary” rests directly on the fact that “it was impossible for God to create except upon the representational principle plan.”⁴² The transcendental method of reasoning by presupposition grows organically out of Van Til’s confessional Trinitarianism and federalism.

42. Van Til, 79. The entire quote is worth noting, because Van Til reasons directly from the exhaustive personal representation in the Godhead to the representational character of the new relation of creation: “Since the whole being of God, if we may in all reverence say so, is built upon the representational plan, it was impossible for God to create except upon the representational plan.” Van Til seeks to express here the way that the relations of personal subsistence find expression in the relations of personal operation. He is not saying that the being of God is covenantal, but rather that the creational and covenantal acts of God ad extra express the exhaustively personal and representational character of autothean perichoresis within the Godhead *ad intra. Religious fellowship with absolute and living Trinitarian persons lies at the heart of the covenant relation.

Elsewhere, clarifying the nature of the “relation of God” to Adam in the garden of Eden, Van Til relies on Vos’s biblical-theological expression of the deeper Protestant conception:

It should also be recognized that man was, from the outset, confronted with positive [i.e., special], as well as with natural, revelation. Dr. Vos speaks of this as pre-redemptive special revelation. God walked and talked with man. Natural revelation must not be separated from this supernatural revelation. To separate the two is to deal with two abstractions instead of with one concrete situation. That is to say, natural revelation, whether objective or subjective, is in itself a limiting conception. It has never existed by itself so far as man is concerned.

This extends the apologetical method to be a comprehensive one that is shaped by the bearing of “one grand covenantal revelation of himself to man,” which Van Til sums up as “the representational principle.”

The substance of the representation principle constrains van Til to employ a transcendental method and argue by way of presupposition in his apologetical approach to unbelief. He comments in various places in his works:

We have now before us in bare outline the main points of the Christian doctrine of God. Christianity offers the triune God, the absolute personality, containing all the attributes enumerated, as the God in whom we believe. This conception of God is the foundation of everything else that we hold dear. Unless we can believe in this sort of God, it does us no good to be told that we may believe in some other sort of God, or in anything else, For us everything depends for its meaning upon this sort of God. Accordingly, we are not interested to have any one prove to us the existence of any other sort of God but this God. Any other sort of God is not God at all and to prove that some other sort of God exists is, in effect to prove that no God exists.

To argue by presupposition is to indicate what are the epistemological and metaphysical principle which underlie and control one’s method. The Reformed apologist will frankly admit that his own methodology presupposes the truth of Christian Theism. Basic to all the doctrines of Christian Theism is that of the self-contained God.

The method of reasoning by presupposition may be said to be indirect rather than direct...The Christian apologist must place himself upon the position of his opponent, assuming the correctness of his method for merely argument’s sake, in order to show him that on such a position the “facts” are not facts, and the “laws” are not laws. He also must ask the non-Christian to place himself upon the Christian position for argument’s sake in order that he may be shown that only upon such a basis do “facts” and “laws” appear intelligible.

These three quotations help us realize that Van Til’s method of reasoning by presupposition represents the direct outworking of his classically Reformed conception of the Trinity applied to unbelief. The representation principle helps us understand the framework that integrates his distinctive conception of the Trinity and his apologetical method.

Van Til provides concrete example of how the representational principle applies to ancient and contemporary philosophical and theological alternatives to classical Reformed Trinitarianism and covenant theology, including Plato, Absolute Idealism and Karl Barth.

Pgs. 161-162 More on the donum superadditum

Barth's conception of grace that enables human participation in God's own essence bears a striking resemblance to Rome's conception of the donum superadditum. For Barth, humanity as created stands intrinsically in need of grace. Nature, for Barth, has no being, purpose, or continuance except through the grace of God in the event of Jesus Christ. Nature, for Rome, is intrinsically underproportioned to participate in the divine essence and therefore requires reportioning and elevating grace. What unites the two, despite their differences, is the belief that grace is necessary to overcome either a defect in nature (Thomas) or an inherently fallen nature (Barth). [\[Just thought of this: and I would say that there is also a striking resemblance behind this rationale of the superadded gift, the donum superadditum, to the practice in many evangelical churches especially charismatic/Pentecostal churches, of praying to be filled with the Holy Spirit after you are converted as though you needed that additional spiritual boost to be more spiritual, when conversion actually includes the indwelling of the Spirit! – same principle.\]](#) [\[see code498 on Barth's theology\]](#)

Another point unites the two theologians. For Barth, as just quoted, created human nature through the covenant of grace in the Christ-event participates in the being of God. The humanity of Jesus Christ participates in the actualized being of God in the 'third time' of God's time for us in the supertemporal Christ-event. That is fundamentally the same point that Roman Catholics make about the function of grace in the donum superadditum. Creation on Roman Catholic terms is an exitus [\[everything comes from God\]](#) that places human nature "outside of God," and the grace of the donum superadditum* inaugurates a supernatural reditus (return to God) as ontologically and ethically reportioned to participate in the divine essence. While Thomas does not conceive of the essence of God in actualistic and mutualistic terms, as does Barth, he nonetheless holds that creation inaugurates and grace perfects the creatures' participation in the essence of God. It should therefore no come as a surprise that Johnson has published a work entitled Karl Barth and the Analogia Entis, asserting that Barth's theology has its own species of the Thomistic analogia entis – what James Cassidy has incisively termed "a temporally qualified analogia entis."

Van Til saw this point of convergence well before either McCormack or Johnson and observed that "the idea of identifying man's being with his participation in the act of God's saving him is really only the modern equivalent of the Greek notion of identifying man with his participation in the changeless being of God." With an astonishing rasp of the profound issues before him, Van Til opposed both front-door (e.g., Barth) and back-door (e.g., Thomas) expressions of correlativism and mutualism.

Van Til set forth his own grand narrative of the whole that, unlike Aquinas and Barth, advance classical Reformed Trinitarianism and federalism. Vo's deeper Protestant conception, enriched by Van Til's representational principle, begins with the Trinitarian processions and ends with the beatific vision, and so offers a comprehensive confessionally Reformed alternative to the deeper Catholic conception of Thomas Aquinas and the deeper Modernist conception of Karl Barth. Further Van Til scholarship ought to pursue these profound yet relatively unexplored vistas.

“Let’s just call him just one of the chief architects [of theistic mutualism] ... And what Barth affirms is that in primal history, God wills himself to be submerged into the interiority of space-time contingency [future events that can’t be predicted with certainty] in what he calls the Christ-event. And that interiority of contingency, Barth calls God’s time for us, a third time distinct from God’s time, distinct from Adam’s fallen time. In this third time God and man come together to participate mutually in an event of becoming which Karl Barth calls Jesus Christ or the Christ-event. And what that means is that both God and man come together and participate in a tershum quid, a third-thing, something that is neither God in himself, nor something that is purely man in himself; but man comes to participate in God’s becoming and God participates in man’s becoming as the two are mutually constituted in an event by which they are enveloped in common, uniting time; they participate in it. And....not only in the Reformed tradition but also in the Lutheran tradition, this Barthian influence is just about ubiquitous! So the bottom line: Barth’s contribution is that both God and man are subsumed in and are made mutual participants in common or third-time, God’s time for us in Jesus Christ. And if that’s the case, God, once he relates primordially to the creature in this third-time, he’s no longer self-contained, he’s no longer a se, he’s no longer unconditioned and all conditioning, immutable and impassible but the same qualities that characterize the creature, characterize God [univocal as opposed to analogical] as the two are enveloped in this common process. It’s then which few greater have been conceived, I think.

And what is so difficult and pernicious about that way of speaking is that God comes to need space-time factuality! – God comes to need the historical process in order to actualize unactualized potential in himself. [undermining divine simplicity and immutability - since there is no potential actuality in God to become/change the state of his being; he is pure act, unbounded.] And so this really is Vos and Van Til, and I know there are Lutheran dogmatists that would say this as well...that really can become and I think is perhaps THE chief or cardinal theological sin, uh, because what it does is... it takes, if we talk about biblical theology, it takes the predicates of history that is progressive, organic and developmental – and it ascribes the predicates of history to the mode of God’s being which is in becoming, so that it’s no longer a discussion about the history of special revelation, it’s about the historical constitution about God himself in time and through time and in need of time. And is just as far as I can see, from any historically creedal and Reformed confessional perspective, that is fundamentally subversion of the basic religion of the Creator-creature distinction, and the Creator-creature relation. It’s the fundamental recasting of theology proper as far as I can see.”

Autothean Perichoresis and God’s “New Relation” to Creation

With notes on the Trinity

Excerpts from Lane Tipton’s book,
The Trinitarian Theology of Cornelius Van Til

Pgs. 126-129, 132-135

Autothean Perichoresis and God’s “New Relation” to Creation

Autothean perichoresis sets before us the conception of absolute and living Trinitarian persons in an exhaustively interior personal embrace that constitutes the beatitude of the Godhead. Autothean perichoresis also furnishes the archetypal relation after which the triune God patterns the “new relation” to image-bearing Adam in the work of creation and the special providential act of covenantal condescension.

Autothean persons in perichoresis forge the Trinitarian archetype replicated in the new relation of creational image endowment and in the special providential act of covenantal condescension (see WCF 7:1). Autotheos forbids the communication of origin and participation in the essence to created persons in the new relation of creation [contrary to theistic mutualism/pantheism]. Perichoresis entails that the archetypal personal communion of coinherent Trinitarian persons grounds the natural religious fellowship of image-bearing Adam in covenant with God. These Trinitarian insights deepen our understanding of God’s “new relation” to image-bearing Adam outlined in chapter 2.

From the divine side of God's "new relation" to creation, autothean persons in perichoresis remains immutable in relation to image-bearing Adam in the work of creation. [again, contrary to mutualist thinking] Trinitarian persons relate authentically to the contingent creature without participating in the contingency that characterizes the creature. [contingency: future events or circumstances which is possible but cannot be predicted with certainty, that is, from a human view. God is omniscient; man is not, nor is he immutable but always changing – so mutualist think that in order for God to relate to changing and emotional image-bearing creatures, God must change, even evolve with them in a give & take relationship, e.g., John Frame, Barth, etc.] They do so precisely because Trinitarian persons are absolute and living in creation. Hence, there is no need for the persons of the Godhead to generate or assume created properties of dynamic change in order to become relatable to creation. [God is not a metaphysical iceberg. It is only from a misunderstanding of the nature of God, his pure actuality and unboundedness, etc., that mutualist think so. See Dolezal's work on this.] Trinitarian persons are intrinsically absolute and living and as such are inherently relatable to the contingent order of creation.

From the human side, the creational endowment of the image of God replicates on the creaturely level the relations of personal coinherence in the Godhead. As the created image of God, Adam is not merely like God as endowed with intellect and will (the deeper Catholic conception). Adam is instead endowed with reason and will in natural religious fellowship with the tripersonal God. His personal fellowship with autothean Trinitarian persons is the replication on the creaturely level of Trinitarian perichoresis – the eternal union and communion of the Trinitarian persons in beatitude as described above.

This is the distinctive Trinitarian conception set forth by Van Til that undergirds and enriches the deeper Protestant conception of the image of God and the covenant of works. The union, communion, and inhabitation of the Trinitarian persons in the beatitude of perichoresis provide the concrete Trinitarian referent that is replicated at the creaturely level in Adam as the image of God in covenant with God.

Perichoresis and Endoxation

Autothean perichoresis also enables us to perceive the Trinitarian foundation of what Meredith G. Kline creatively terms the "endoxation" of the Spirit in the heaven-temple in Genesis 1:1-2 (see also Num. 9:6; Isa. 6:1-7). The concept of endoxation involves the triune Creator filling the heaven-temple with the indwelling glory of the Holy Spirit (see Isa. 6:1-7; 66:1; Ps. 10:4; Col. 1:16). Just as Trinitarian person indwells Trinitarian person in the mutual bliss of perichoresis, so likewise Trinitarian persons indwell the heaven-temple of God in the absolute beginning (Gen. 1:1) and enter into it in royal Sabbath rest at the end of the creation week (Gen. 2:2). The Spirit's inhabitation of the holy space of heaven is a creational replica of the personal indwelling of the Trinitarian persons in perichoresis.

Good comments on the beatitude of God [codeB]

Kline applies the concept of endoxation not only to the invisible heaven-temple created in the absolute beginning, but also to the visible holy realms of Eden, to the tabernacle and the temple, and ultimately to the humiliation and exaltation of Jesus Christ in his assumed and glorified humanity. The reality of Trinitarian person indwelling or inhabiting a created holy space in history is itself a replica of the ineffable relations of Trinitarian person indwelling Trinitarian person in the beatitude of perichoresis.

Properly conceived in terms of the deeper Protestant conception, Trinitarian perichoresis finds replication when the triune God creates a holy heavenly place where his glory may dwell forever as the beatitude of elect image bearers and angels. The interior embrace and mutual permeation of holy Trinitarian persons who subsist distinctly as the undivided divine essence of God constitute the beatitude of God himself. The endowment of the image of God, the act of covenantal condescension, and the prospect of seeing the glory of the triune persons in the glory-realm of the heaven-temple in the never-ending joy of covenantal fellowship – each of these is a replication on the creaturely level of the perichoresis of the Trinitarian persons.

Conclusion

Autotheos and perichoresis enable Van Til to conceive of Trinitarian persons who are absolute and immutable, yet living and active, as they indwell one another in relations of coinherence. Together they enrich our understanding of the intra-Trinitarian relations that are foundational to the deeper Protestant conception. These insights lead further to the development of what Van Til terms the representational principle – a theological conception that lies at the heart of his Trinitarian theology and apologetics. The representational principle is Van Til's constructive appropriation of Reformed Trinitarianism and federalism in polemical engagement with all forms of philosophical correlativism and theological mutualism. We will examine the meaning and implications of the representational principle in the following chapter.

Pgs 132-135 [codeTrin]

*The Representational Principle ad Intra: Exhaustive Personal Representation in the Ontological Trinity

The representational principle seeks to unpack the bearing of autothean perichoresis on God's sovereignly willed new relation to Adam in the work of creation and in covenantal condescension. The exhaustively personal processional relations within the Godhead shape the Reformed conception of the created image of God and undergird the conception of representation of inherent in Adam's federal headship under the covenant of works. Adam's personal fellowship with God and its representational significance under the covenant of works replicated on the creaturely level the exhaustively personal relations within the Godhead.

In summary terms, each Trinitarian person represents the whole of the divine essence (in the relations of subsistence) and the other Trinitarian persons (in the relations of coinherence) in the Godhead. Growing organically from this conception of the Trinity, all of created reality by general and special revelation represents in revelation the absolute and living triune God and suggests a definite conception of image-bearing Adam in covenant with God.

Each Trinitarian person distinctly subsists as the entire and undivided essence of God. Each individual subsistent is distinctly the entire essence of God. Each person also exhaustively indwells the other Trinitarian persons. They “permeate” one another in their mutual personal embrace characterized by pure interiority, while each retains his incommunicable personal property.

Tipton describes these personal properties: “The personal properties that distinguish the Trinitarian persons are as follows: The Father is personally unbegotten (paternity) in distinction from both the Son and the Spirit. The Son is personally begotten of the Father (filiation) in distinction from the Father and the Spirit. And the Spirit personally proceeds from the Father and the Son (spiration) in distinction from both the Father and the Son. These incommunicable properties of paternity, filiation, and spiration are the concrete personal relations within the Godhead, and they anchor conceptually the distinctions among the Trinitarian persons. From these properties we are warranted to infer bona fide personal distinctions within the undivided essence of God. pg 66

The Trinitarian persons are distinctly the undivided essence in relations of subsistence and exhaustively permeate one another in relations of coinherence. These relations forge together in Van Til’s estimation the notion of the mutual representation of the Trinitarian persons.

The conception of exhaustive mutual representation of the Trinitarian persons means that as each person is “exhaustive of God’s nature” and “exhaustive of the other persons,” each person in those senses exhaustively represents the others.

My comments in blue

The Subject of Knowledge

The difficulty with respect to the natural man’s knowledge of God may be somewhat alleviated if we remember that there are two senses in which we may speak of this having knowledge. The natural man has knowledge, true knowledge of God, in the sense that God through nature and man’s own consciousness impresses his presence on man’s attention. So definitely and inescapably has he done this and that, try as he may, man cannot escape knowing God. It is this point that Paul stresses in the first two chapters of Romans. Man has the sense of deity indelibly engraved upon him. He knows God and he knows himself and the world as God's creation. This is objective revelation to him. Even to the extent that this revelation is in man, in his own constitution, and as such may be called "subjective," it is nonetheless objective to him as an ethically responsible creature, and he is bound to react as an ethical person to this objective revelation.

But it is this objective revelation both about and within him that the natural man seeks to suppress. Having made alliance with Satan, man makes a grand monistic assumption^A. Not merely in his conclusion but, as well, in his method and starting point he takes for granted his own ultimacy. [in other words, fallen man thinks he is ultimate, putting himself in the room of God] To the extent that he works according to this monistic assumption, he misinterprets all things, flowers no less than God. Fortunately, the natural man is never fully consistent while in this life. As the Christian sins against his will, so the natural man "sins against" his own essentially Satanic principle. As the Christian has the incubus of his "old man" weighting him down and therefore keeping him from realizing the "life of Christ" within him, so the natural man has the incubus of the sense of deity weighing him down and keeping him from realizing the life of Satan within him.

^A See if you can see the connection between pantheism and monism. Man, assuming a monistic view, is playing God in a sense, that he, in practice, thinks he is God or partakes of the essence of God to some degree, fulfilling Satan's promise that you will be like God, that you are the ultimate arbiter of truth, that you are ultimate and autonomous, independent of God. Comments from the internet on monism: Pantheists are "monists" ... they believe that there is only one Being, and that all other forms of reality are either modes (or appearances) of it or identical with it. Pantheism is closely related to monism, as pantheists too believe all of reality is one substance, called Universe, God or Nature.

Note: "The monistic view makes no basic difference between Creator and creature, but rather presents being as uniform, though with gradations between lower and higher forms." Wm Edgar, editor of Van Til's book, Christian Apologetics, pg 31, footnote 3 [Van Til refers to this as "scale of being" in his writings.]

Side note on pantheism:

Van Til's mentor, Abraham Kuyper was particularly concerned about the intrusion of pantheism into the church and the West. His principle concern was that by identifying God with ideals like progress, the boundaries between God and the world are blurred, and God becomes severely limited. See his "Pantheism's Destruction of Boundaries," in Methodist Review 75 (1893): 520-37; 762-78. – An Introduction to Systematic Theology, Van Til, pg 320 note 4

The actual situation is therefore always a mixture of truth with error. Being "without God in the world" the natural man yet knows God, and, in spite of himself, to some extent recognizes God. By virtue of their creation in God's image, by virtue of the ineradicable sense of deity within them, and by virtue of God's restraining general grace, those who hate God, yet in a restricted sense know God and do good.¹⁸

What we should remember in this connection is that though we can do no more than hem in the territory in which the solution must be found, this is really all that we can do with respect to any problem that pertains to the relation between God and man. We cannot understand in the sense of comprehend how human action, which must by virtue of man's creation in the image of God be analogical action, can nevertheless have genuine significance. Similarly, we can not understand, in the sense of comprehend, how human reasoning which must be analogical reasoning, i.e., reinterpretation of God's interpretation, can nevertheless be genuine and significant interpretation. In fine, the temptation that constantly besets us is that we wish to comprehend how any activity on the part of man can have meaning. This we can never expect to do because God, by virtue of whom man must exist and by virtue of whom man must therefore be interpreted, is incomprehensible to man.

Human reason is not a simple linear extension of divine reasoning. The human activity or interpretation always runs alongside of and is subordinate to the main plan of God. If this is kept in mind, it will be seen that if, as Reformed theology has contended, both the doctrines of the absolute ethical antithesis of the natural man to God and of his relatively true knowledge and relatively good deeds must be maintained, we are not led into any inconsistency or self-contradiction. It is our contention all along the line that deeds and interpretations of wholly derivative creatures have genuine choice, though we know that back of their choice is the plan of God.¹ The rejection of Christ on the part of unbelievers has genuine significance so that men are punished for their unbelief even though they were born dead in trespasses and sins and therefore unable to discern and to do spiritual good. Surely then, it cannot be thought to be inconsistent if we also hold that he who is reprobate on account of some relative acts, that is, through the sin of Adam and the sin of himself, as well as on account of the counsel of God or an absolute act back of all relative acts, shall yet be considered relatively good while he is on earth.¹⁹

¹Van Til states on page 157 of his book Introduction to Systematic Theology, pg 157: Calvin never did start a chain of reasoning about man's nature and destiny by taking man by himself. He did not start with man as with an ultimate starting point. Calvin did not start with a general a priori position. His position is as radically apposed to that of Descartes as it is to that of Hume. Most apologetic writers who have come after Calvin have allowed themselves to be influenced unduly by Cartesian philosophy on this matter. Calvin recognized fully that if man is to have true knowledge of himself, he must regard God as original and himself as derivative. He did not place God and man as correlatives next to one another, but he recognized from the outset two levels of existence and two levels of interpretation: on the one hand, the divine and eternal and, on the other hand, the human or temporal. To him it is perfectly obvious that the endowments that we possess are not of ourselves, but of God. Hence he says that “not a particle of light, or wisdom, or justice, or power, or rectitude, or genuine truth, will anywhere be found, which does not flow from him: and of which he is not the cause. [Calvin, Institutes 1.2.2)

Cornelius Van Til again states from his book, Introduction to Systematic Theology: p128-9: In Paradise, man made his self-consciousness the immediate but wholly derivative starting point while he made the self-consciousness of God the remote but wholly ultimate starting point of all his knowledge. Hence he saw that his knowledge was, though finite, yet true. Hence he did not set before himself the false ideal of absolute comprehension. Hence, too, he did not despair and conclude to irrationalism simply because he himself could not fully comprehend the whole of reality.

In opposition to this, the non-Christian interpretation of the human mind is based upon the presupposition that it is the ultimate and not merely the derivative starting point for man. Hence it has set before itself the ideal of comprehension knowledge. This was done especially in the earlier stages of human thought. The Greek thinkers were as children who thought they could do everything. Even in modern times we have, in such systems as that of Leibniz, a striking manifestation of the pride, “hubris,” of the sinner who wishes to be as God.³⁵ In more recent times, however, men have become more sophisticated. There have given up the quest of certainty and the quest for comprehension, except as a limiting concept. In modern irrationalism, the prodigal has recognized that he is at the swine trough, but still refuses to return to the father’s house. His “hubris” never forsakes him.

³⁵ Van Til uses the strong language of hubris here about Leibniz’s project. Leibniz had hoped to unify many disciplines and churches through his system, which is ultimately built on a very few general principles.

3. After we have begun with the Adamic consciousness, and then turned to the unregenerate consciousness, we must next consider the regenerate consciousness. The regenerate consciousness is the Adamic Consciousness restored and supplemented, but restored and supplemented in principle or standing only.²⁰

²⁰ There is an echo of Abraham Kuyper here, but also of Geerhardus Vos. His use of the expression “in principle of standing only” is not meant to deny sanctification, but to avoid perfectionism, especially as it relates to knowledge.

In the first place, the regenerated consciousness is the Adamic consciousness restored. It recognizes afresh its own derivative character. It is able to do so only because God has regenerated it and thus made it confess its ethical depravity. God has quickened what was the natural man so that he now lives. The regenerate man can discern and do spiritually good because it is God who works in him both to will and to do. [Phil. 2:13] In the second place, the regenerated consciousness is the Adamic consciousness supplemented. Adam was in the position of posse peccare, while the restored are in the position of non posse peccare.²¹ “Whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin, because his seed abideth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is begotten of God” (1 John 3:9).

²¹ This distinction, which translates “able to sin” (Adam before the fall) and “not able to sin” (the state of glorification), along with non posse non peccare, “not able not to sin” (the unregenerate), and posse non peccare, (able not to sin) (the regenerate), is attributed to Augustine.

The regenerate consciousness is restored in principle but not in degree. The struggle of Romans 7 remains the struggle of every Christian till the day of his death. “If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.” (1 John 1:8).²²

If we keep all these distinctions between the Adamic, the non-regenerate, and the regenerate consciousness in mind, we can approach the question as to the place of reason in theology.

In the first place, we can no longer figure with the Adamic consciousness as actually existing at the present time. We deal only with the non-regenerate and the regenerate consciousness. But the true meaning of the fallen and the regenerate consciousness cannot be maintained unless back of both lies the history of Adam and his fall. This does not therefore mean that it is a matter of indifference whether or not we take the Genesis narrative with respect to Adam as historical. It is only if we do take this narrative as historical that a sound theology can be maintained. Adam’s sin was the willful transgression of man to the known revelation of God. If we deny the historicity of the Genesis narrative, we shall be compelled to reduce man’s responsibility for sin so drastically that in reality nothing remains of it. Man’s “sinfulness” is then virtually identical with “fate.” Accordingly, such theologians as Otto Piper (God in history, NY 1939) and Nels F.S. Gerre (The Christian Faith: An Inquiry into Its Adequacy as Man’s Ultimate Religion, NY 1942) Evil and the Christian Faith NY, 1947), who reduce the Genesis narrative to the status of myth, find themselves compelled to deny also the historic Christian views of sin, of Christ, and of the atonement.

In the second place, we cannot speak of human reason in general, or of the human consciousness in general, except in the objective sense explained above. And as such we may call it a limiting concept in the Christian sense of the term.²⁵ In other words, it is a concept that should never be employed to do duty by itself. All men have a sense of deity, but there is no man who has not at the same time something else that also colors his sense of deity. All men are either in covenant with Satan or in covenant with God. The former invariably seek to suppress and therefore always misinterpret the general sense of deity within them. The latter invariably seek to relate that general sense of deity to the revelation of God in Christ.

While therefore it is of the utmost consequence to recognize the fact of a “common consciousness” of God as the relational pressure of God on man, it is of no less importance that, insofar as men are aware of their most basic alliances, they are wholly for or wholly against God at every point of interest to man.

In the third place, when we do definitely deal with the non-regenerate consciousness, we must think of it as it is according to its adopted monistic assumption. Hence we cannot grant that it has any right to judge in matters of theology, or, for that matter, in anything else. The Scriptures nowhere appeal to the unregenerated reason as to qualified to judge. On the contrary, Scripture says over and over that the unregenerate reason is entirely unqualified to judge. When Scripture says, “Come, let us reason together,” it usually speaks to the people of God, and, if it does speak to others, it never regards them as equal with God or as really competent to judge. The unregenerate man has knowledge of God, that is, of the revelation of God within him, the sense of deity which he seeks to suppress. Scripture does appeal to this sense of deity in man, but it does so and can do so only by denying that man, when acting on his adopted monistic assumption, has any ability or right to judge of what is true or false, right or wrong.²⁶

In the fourth place, though Scripture does not appeal to the natural man as to a competent judge and though it considers the natural man as blind to spiritual things, the Scripture continue to hold man responsible for his blindness.²⁷

²⁷ Thus, competency and responsibility are not the same thing. Inability does not always imply innocence.

In the fifth place, Scripture teaches us to speak and preach to, as well as to reason with, blind men because God, in whose we speak and reason, can cause the blind to see. Jesus told Lazarus while dead to arise and come forth from the grave. The prophet preached to the dead bones in the valley till they took on flesh. So our reasoning and our preaching are not in vain inasmuch as God in Christ reasons with us, perhaps through some human agency, and we saw.²⁸

²⁸ Van Til's apologetics affirms the antithesis between an unbeliever's platform and the truth, yet the reality is that God can change that platform. It is as mistaken to try and build on the unbeliever's ground as it is to refuse to preach to an unbeliever at all.

In the sixth place, when God has reasoned with us and changed our minds till our every thought is brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ, we must use our minds, our intellect, our reason, our consciousness in order to receive and reinterpret the revelation God has given of himself in Scripture. That is the proper place of reason in theology. There is no conflict between this reason and faith since faith is the impelling power that urges reason to interpret aright.²⁹

²⁹ Van Til will speak more about reason in the next chapter. However, he rarely speaks elaborately about the problem of faith and reason, though he constantly defends against fideism, the notion of blind, unreasonable faith. See, for example, Christian Apologetics, 2nd ed. William Edgar (Phillipsburg NJ) The Protestant Doctrine of Scripture 1967

Note. Dr. Herman Bavinck and Professor Luis Berkhof discuss the question taken up in this chapter under the heading "Principia of Dogmatics." Under this heading they discuss such questions as the essence of religion, the seat of religion, the origin of religion, etc. In this discussion they bring out carefully and fully that God on his part must reveal himself to man, and that man must be created in the image of God in order to be able to receive this revelation. All this is admirable and highly necessary in itself. However, our limited time does not permit us to go into these questions fully. We have sought to give the main points of these extensive discussions by seeking to reduce them to the basic question of Christian epistemology.

Moreover, since we use Hodge as a reference work and seek to cover the ground in his first volume, we must pay particular attention to the manner in which Hodge has discussed various questions. Accordingly, we now turn to a consideration of what Hodge says with respect to human reason.

207. "Go to Thomas!" Who Will Follow the Pope's Invitation?

Nothing could be more explicit: "Go to Thomas!" This warm invitation was issued by Pope Francis to participants of the International Thomistic Congress (Sept. 21-24) during an audience at the Vatican. In his address, the pope extolled the thought of Thomas Aquinas (1225-1274) as a sure guide for Roman Catholic faith and a fruitful relationship with culture. Citing Paul VI (Lumen ecclesiae, 1974) John Paul II (Fides et ratio, 1998), who had magnified the importance of Thomas' thought for the contemporary Roman church, Francis stood in the wake of recent popes in emphasizing superlative appreciation for the figure of Thomas while adding his own.

This is nothing new. For centuries, Roman Catholicism has regarded Thomas Aquinas as its champion. His voice is often considered the highest, deepest, and most complete of Roman Catholic thought and belief. Canonized by John XXII as early as 1323, he was proclaimed a doctor of the church by Pius V in 1567 to be the premier Roman Catholic theologian whose thinking would defeat the Protestant Reformation. During the Council of Trent, the Summa theologiae was symbolically placed next to the Bible as a testament to its primary importance in formulating the Tridentine decrees and canons against justification by faith alone and other Protestant doctrines. In the seventeenth century, he was considered the defender of the Roman Catholic theological system by Robert Bellarmine (1542-1621), the greatest anti-Protestant controversialist who influenced many generations of Catholic apologists over the centuries. In 1879 Pope Leo XIII issued the encyclical Aeterni Patris in which he pointed to Thomas as the highest expression of philosophical and theological science. The Second Vatican Council (1962-1965) stipulated that the formation of priests should have Thomas as the supreme guide in their studies: "The students should learn to penetrate them (i.e. the mysteries of salvation) more deeply with the help of speculation, under the guidance of St. Thomas, and to perceive their interconnections" (Optatam Totius [1965] n. 17). Of recent popes, this has already been mentioned. Considering this, what could Pope Francis say but, "Go to Thomas!"

Francis indicated not only the need to study Thomas, but also to "contemplate" the Master before approaching his thought. Thus, to the cognitive and intellectual dimension, he added a mystical one. In this way, he caused Thomas, already a theologian imbued with wisdom and asceticism, to be seen as even more Roman Catholic. This mix best represents the interweaving of the intellectual and contemplative traditions proper to Roman Catholicism.

The International Congress had the exploration of the resources of Thomist thought in today's context as its theme. Thomism is not just a medieval stream of thought, but a system that is both solid and elastic at the same time. All seasons of Roman Catholicism have found it inspiring for the diverse challenges facing the Church of Rome, including the Reformation first, the Enlightenment project second, and now post-modernity. As a result of the Congress, we will continue to hear more about Thomas and Thomism, not only in historical theology and philosophy, but also in other fields of knowledge that were once far from previous interpretative traditions of Thomas.

In recent years, we have witnessed a growing fascination with Thomas Aquinas and Thomism by evangelical theologians, especially coming from the North American context. They seem to be attracted to the “great tradition” he represents. This phenomenon should be studied because it signals the existence of internal movements within evangelical theological circles. Protestant theology of the 16th and 17th centuries had a critical view of Thomas. In a sense, Thomas could not be avoided, given his stature and importance for theology, but he was read with selective and theologically adult eyes. Then, for various reasons, there has been a certain neglect not only of Thomas but with pre-Reformation historical theology as a whole. Today, in the face of the pressures coming from secularization and the identity crisis felt in some evangelical quarters, Thomas is perceived as a bulwark of “traditional” theology that needs to be urgently recovered. It is often overlooked that Roman Catholicism has considered Thomas as its champion in its anti-Reformation stance and also in its subsequent anti-biblical developments, such as the 1950 Marian dogma of the bodily ascension of Mary. Rome considers Thomas as the quintessentially Roman Catholic theologian and thinker.

“Go to Thomas!” is an invitation that even a growing number of practitioners of evangelical theology would take up. The point is not to uncritically study or absolutely avoid Thomas, but rather to provide the theological map with which one approaches him. It is necessary to develop an evangelical map of Thomas Aquinas. If Rome considers Thomas its chief architect, can evangelical theology approach him without understanding that Thomas stands behind everything Roman Catholicism believes and practices?

An Introduction to Systematic Theology

By Cornelius Van Til

Reason as Judge of the Evidences of a Revelation

The third and final legitimate use of reason, according to Hodge, is that it must judge of the evidences of any revelation that come to us. Faith, he argues, is “an intelligent reception of the truth on adequate grounds,” [Hodge, Systematic Theology, 1:53] and Scripture never demands faith “except on the ground of adequate evidence.”

On the surface, at least, this manner of statement again seems to assume that all men, regenerate and non-regenerate, agree on the nature of reason and evidence. But this is contrary to fact. The average philosopher and scientist today holds to a nontheistic conception of reason and therefore also to a nontheistic conception of evidence. Assuming the ultimacy of the human mind and of impersonal laws of logic, he must and does reject that which is, objectively, the best of evidence for what revelation teaches, for example with respect to the existence of the transcendent God and his creation of the universe. Following Kant, he simply asserts that evidence, to be intelligible, must not go beyond experience, and that to assert that a God exists who is not subject to the categories of space and time, is to assert that which is without meaning. If therefore we say to him that revelation does not expect him to accept anything that is not credible according to his rules of evidence, this is, in effect, to ask him to reject the gospel.⁵²

⁵²Kant relegated religious truth, such as God’s existence, to the noumenal realm, making hard evidence for such truth not verifiable, since empirical evidence belongs to the phenomenal realm.

It is accordingly necessary in our day, if we wish to bring out the truth for which Hodge is contending, to argue that only in theism can we find a true theory of reason and of evidence, and therefore true harmony between reason and revelation. To this must then be added that deep down in his heart even the natural man knows that theism is true and that he has concocted a false theory of reason and of evidence, which he should reject.⁵³

⁵³Here, Van Til matches his presuppositional method, which requires examining preconditions for knowledge, with the point of contact, which accuses the natural man of the guilt of knowing God while rejecting him.

At many points seeming to agree with the position just stated, Canell nonetheless falls back instantly upon the idea that reason, whether used by Christians or by the non-Christian, is authorized “to canvass the evidence of a given authority.”⁵⁴ “Bring on your revelations! Let them make peace with the law of contradiction and the facts of history, and they will deserve a rational man’s assent.” Similarly, Wilbur M. Smith says he is greatly impressed by the fact that the very kind of evidence which modern science, and even psychologists, are so insistent upon for determining the reality of any object under consideration is the kind of evidence that we have presented to us in the Gospels regarding the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, namely, the things that are seen with the human eye, touched with the human hand, and heard by the human ear.⁵⁶ [Smith, Therefore Stand, 388]

But on the monistic assumption of the non-Christian, it would be contradictory to believe in the resurrection of Jesus as the Son of God.⁵⁷ The whole idea of God as transcendent is contradictory of the monism that underlies the unbeliever's views. Hence also he can allow no evidence to be genuine that pretends to prove the activity of the transcendent God of Christianity in human history.

⁵⁷Without the context of a proper presupposition, revelations will not translate into evidence for the truth.

Note: "The monistic view makes no basic difference between Creator and creature, but rather presents being as uniform, though with gradations between lower and higher forms." Bavinck Criticizes Rationalism and Empiricism

Bavinck has himself not been fully consistent in the application of the principle here laid before us. This appears particularly in the section in which he deals with the principles of science. [GD, 180-207; RD, 208-33] In this section he develops what he thinks is an adequate epistemology for Christian dogmatics. Here it appears that he has not entirely escaped the influence of Thomas Aquinas in formulating what he calls a "moderate realism."¹³ He criticizes Hodge when the latter attempts to identify the method of systematics with the inductive method of "science."¹⁴ He points out that in

Scripture we do not deal with brute facts, but with facts plus their interpretation. Yet he himself appeals to facts as though they were brute facts when it comes to the formulation of a theory of metaphysics. He does this in setting off rationalism and empiricism against one another.¹⁵

Against rationalism and idealism Bavinck argues that all men are naturally realists and that all men are dependent on nature about them.¹⁶ He goes on to point out that idealism leads to an impersonal abstraction, and then adds that the rock on which all idealism stands is plurality.¹⁷ These criticisms of idealism are true as far as they go. Our only complaint is that Bavinck did not go far enough. The criticism he makes might have been made by a non-Christian realist. Bavinck does not tell us that the basis of his criticism is the presupposition of the self-existent God.

Against empiricism he argues that all science must begin with a set of unproved a priori assumptions that have not been derived from experience.¹⁸ To this he adds that science is, in the nature of the case, interested in "the general, the necessary, and the eternal, the logical, the idea."¹⁹ Still further he quotes with approval the words of Thomas Aquinas, which the latter in turn took from Aristotle: "Minimum quod potest haberi de cognitione rerum altissimarum, desiderabilius est quam certissima cognitio, quae habetur de minimis rebus."

¹³ Thomas Aquinas (1225-74), the greatest of the medieval theologians achieved as synthesis between Aristotelian philosophy and Christian theology. He is called a "realist," or a "modified realist," because he held that the created world was real and could be divided into divine categories God rather than the view that sees the world as only a reflection or imitation of the divine. God himself can be known only by analogy. Theology for Thomas is a science, much in the way Aristotle described scientia subalterna, subalternate science, that is, knowledge that relates concepts to a universal.

¹⁴ Bavinck, GD, 1:191; RD, 1:219.

¹⁶ Bavinck, GD, 1:195; RD, 1:223

("The slenderest acquaintance we can form with heavenly things is more desirable than a thorough grasp of mundane matters.")²⁰

The question that arises when we read this is, on what does Bavinck think the a priori principles of science rest? A non-Christian idealist might readily say what Bavinck said on this point. It is not enough for a Christian to point to the mere fact of the necessity of an a priori element in science. He must also show that unless that a priori be given the Christian-theistic basis, it is no true a priori.²¹

Bavinck quotes with approval, as noted above, the words of Aquinas to the effect that the slightest knowledge of higher things is worth more than certain knowledge with respect to lower things. Again we ask, is there no need of pointing out the difference between a Christian and an Aristotelian notion of gradation in the created universe? Surely the Christian, who believes in the doctrine of creation, cannot share the Greek depreciation of the things of the sense world.²² Depreciation of that sense world inevitably leads to a depreciation of many of the important facts of historic Christianity that took place in the sense world. The Bible does not rule out every form of empiricism any more than it rules out every form of a priori reasoning. To be sure, in effect, it rules out the empiricism of Locke, but it also, in effect, rules out the rationalism of Leibniz.²³

Bavinck's Realism

After criticizing rationalism and empiricism, Bavinck goes on to construct a realism that he thinks is acceptable as a foundation for

²⁰ GD, 222; RD, 221, See also, Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologica 1a.1.1.5

²¹ Thus even an a priori (from that which is before) approach must have a reason for being. It cannot simply be a general deductive method. To be helpful, that which is before should be the full Christian-theistic (Trinitarian presupposition).

²² A biblical view does not regard "higher things" versus "lower things," but evaluates all created thing in light of revelation.

science.²⁴ He argues that all science must begin with the common sense assumption of the real existence of the outer world and of the objectivity and truth of knowledge.²⁵ To this he then adds that man has within him the natural a priori principles spoken of above,²⁶ Bavinck refers with apparent approval to Leibniz's statement that nothing is in the intellect that was not previously found in sensation except the intellect itself, but turns again to St. Thomas, and then from St. Thomas to Voetius.²⁷ The last named, says Bavinck, shows that the intellect of man can find the universals in nature, by which he means that the intellect can find God in nature.²⁸

We note again the failure to distinguish carefully a Christian epistemology from the non-Christian epistemology. When he gives the distinguishing marks of the realism he is setting forth, he says, no more than that against empiricism it maintains certain independence of the intellect, while over against rationalism it maintains that the intellect depends to an extent on sensation.²⁹ Bavinck does to an extent wish to correct scholasticism, but this correction does not involve a rejection of its principle of commingling Aristotelianism with Christian principles.³⁰ "The fault of Scholasticism," says Bavinck, "both Protestant and Catholic, lay only in this, that it had done too quickly with observation, and that it thought almost exclusively of the confession as taken up into the books of Euclid, Aristotle, and the Church fathers."³¹ Against this position

²⁴ Realism holds that the world exists independently of ourselves, and that statements we make about it can be true, because our mind represents reality as it is. Antirealists of various sorts deny this connection. Idealists, for example, hold that our mind constructs reality at some level. They cannot accept that the mind simply represents what is real. Van Til faults Bavinck for his naïve realism, which does not sufficiently recognize the need to begin, not with reality as represented in the mind, but with God, who determines how and what we may know. once again reiterates the doctrine that all

²⁹ Bavinck, GD, 1:229; RD, 1:228. In reality, empiricism and rationalism involve far deeper (negative) philosophical commitments.

Bavinck' once again reiterates the doctrine that all knowledge must begin from observation.³² The net result of Bavinck's investigation is a moderate realism that seeks on the one hand to avoid the extremes of realism, but on the other hand to avoid the extremes of idealism. It is not a specifically Christian position based upon the presupposition of the existence of the God of Scripture that we have before us in the moderate realism of Bavinck. Yet he himself has told us again and again that dogmatics must live by one principium only. It is difficult to see how dogmatics is to live by one principle if it is not the same principle that is to guide our thinking both in theology and in other science. If we are to be true to Bavinck's requirement that there shall be only one principle of interpretation for us, then we shall have to apply that principle when we work out an epistemology no less than when we are engaged in dogmatics proper.

Bavinck's Failure to Distinguish Christian Certainty from Non-Christian Certainty

Perhaps the weakest point in the argument of Bavinck lies in his failure to distinguish clearly the Christian basis of the certainty of human knowledge from the non-Christian. Bavinck himself gives the clue as to where this certainty ought to be found for Christians. In a remarkable passage he declares that the only reason we have for thinking that our universal laws fit actual experience lies in the Logos, "who created reality beyond us and the laws of thought within us."³³ But if this is true, Bavinck should have distinguished clearly between the Christian ground for certainty in knowledge and the non-Christian ground. No non-Christian epistemology has ever offered the Creator Logos as the source of certainty of human knowledge.³⁴ The idea of creation in the Christian sense of the term is not found in Greek speculation. Accordingly, the Greeks sought a foundation for the certainty of knowledge in uncritically assuming a priori principles resting upon nowhere in particular.³⁵ And they

maintained that true certainty in knowledge consisted in seeing these so-called "eternal principles." Yet Bavinck constantly speaks as though the Greeks were essentially correct in what they said with respect to the universals of human knowledge. We quote one passage:

"The object of science is not the particular, but the universal, the logical, the idea. Greek philosophy saw this correctly."³⁶ The question is as to what the Greeks meant by universals. They meant self-existing, eternal, impersonal laws, The universals of Greek thought were not created by God and did not rest upon the nature of the Creator God. They existed in themselves. Accordingly, no amount of trimming can bring them into shape for Christian use.³⁷ Thomas Aquinas trimmed Aristotle's principles down but did not reject the foundation on which they were built, and Bavinck has too largely followed Thomas in this respect. Accordingly, he tells us at one moment that our certainty lies in the Logos of creation, but then forgets about this Logos in the course of his argumentation and makes certainty to exist merely in the fact that there are a priori principles regardless of the foundation of these principles.

Bavinck's Notion of Natural Reason

Under the same influence of St. Thomas, Bavinck offers what seems to us to be an inadequate notion of the so-called natural reason. He begins his discussion of this point by calling attention to Plato's illustration of the sun as symbolizing God as the true source of human knowledge. He tells us that we do not see things by looking directly into the sun, but by seeing them in the light of the sun. So our reason is not itself divine, but participates in the divine. God alone can know per essentiam (in respect of his being); we know per participationem (in respect of participation). This figure of the sun," says Bavinck, led men to speak in a healthy fashion of the natural light of reason, by which nothing more was meant than the permanent capacity or power of the human spirit, by which man was enabled from the beginning of his observations to form the basic concepts and basic principles which should later lead him in all his observation and thought. The light of reason therefore, in the first place, resembles the intellectus intellectus agens [active intellect] the power of abstraction that shines on objects and draws from them their intelligibility; and secondly, the fund of koina ennoia [general concepts] which our spirits, by virtue of their powers of abstraction, make their own. But in both senses we owe this light to God, and more particularly to the Logos.³⁸

³⁵ Thus, not grounded in God, they have no source. Van Til sometimes alludes to a "turnpike in the sky."

³⁶ Bavinck, GD, 1:232; RD, 1:229

In all this we meet again with the same ambiguity noted before Bavinck is far from wishing to attribute to the natural reason any ability to devise its own principles of interpretation. He wishes our knowledge to rest in God.³⁹ Why then, we ask, did he jeopardize what is most precious to him by reasoning as though what Thomas meant was essentially what he means? Thomas's notion of man's participation of man's knowledge in God's knowledge has not cut itself free from its monistic origin in Platonic Aristotelian thought.⁴⁰ Either man is created by God, or he is not. If he is, then man's knowledge must be clearly distinguished from the Platonic notion of participation. For Plato, the human soul was really a part of the divine being and, because of that fact, he thought of the a priori principles of knowledge as being directly found in the human mind. For a Christian position, the a priori of knowledge can be found in man only analogically.⁴¹ Thomas uses the idea of analogy, but has not with any adequacy escaped the Greek participation idea. The proof of this lies in the fact that he gives to the natural reason, even of sinful man, plenary ability to prove the existence of God. To be able to do this, man should, even when a sinner, be willing to recognize the true source of reasoning within himself.

³⁸ Bavinck, GD, 1:236; RD, 1:232.

Bavinck does not carry the illustration of the sun sufficiently away from Plato's metaphor.

⁴⁰ Monism is the view that being is only of one kind, as opposed to Van Til's view that there are two kinds of being, the Creator and the creature, Human knowledge, according to monism, would be by participation in a higher echelon of the same being, not an obedient submission to God. Aristotle and Plato Join company as monists, though they differ on much else.

But it is exactly this that no Protestant and, in particular, no Reformed theologian can allow. Owing to man's ethical depravity, is unwilling to recognize himself as a creature.⁴² Accordingly, he assumes that the foundation of the validity of human reasoning lies in himself. It is due to Rome's low view of sin that it is able to make an easy compromise with Aristotle on the question of the foundation of reasoning.⁴³

In contrast to this, we would agree with Bavinck himself when he says that all depends upon the presuppositions from which science begins and the purpose with which it is pursued.⁴⁴ If this is true, Bavinck himself should have cut himself loose completely from Thomistic speculation. He should have begun boldly by setting off the consistent Christian position over against Greek speculation and over against the half-Christian, half-Greek speculation of Thomas.

⁴²The key problem of the fall for Van Til is that it is ethical, not metaphysical. We have rebelled morally, not slipped lower down the scale of being.

⁴³The noetic effects of sin" is a constant refrain for VanTil. It means that sin has affected the mind as much as the rest of our lives.

Apriorism

Pg123

Now since we think of nothing as having existence and meaning independently of God, it is impossible to think of the object and the subject standing in the fruitful relation to one another that they actually do unless God is back of them both. Hence, the knowledge that we have of the simplest objects of the physical universe is still based upon the revelational activity of God.

It is customary on the part of some orthodox theologians to depreciate the objects of sensation as a source of knowledge. They have become deeply convinced of the skepticism involved in historical empiricism. There would therefore substitute an a priori approach for that of the empiricist, thinking that thus they represent biblical thought.¹⁷

¹⁷This would amount to deism, which holds that God started the whole process but is not necessarily currently involved in it. The consequences of such deism are (1) empiricism, which claims that the sense, not God, are a faithful measure of reality (a view that Van Til calls a false cure for skepticism), and (2) intellectualism, the title of this section, which holds that the senses deceive us, but that the mind does not. Of course, the mind does deceive us. But if we begin with God's full involvement, then both senses and intellect report truth.

Two points may be mentioned with respect to this. In the first place, to flee to the arms of an apriorism from those of empiricism is in itself no help at all.¹⁸ It is only if an a priori is self-consciously based upon the conception of the ontological Trinity rather than upon the work of Plato or some other non-Christian philosopher that it can safeguard against skepticism. The a priori of any non-Christian thinker will eventually lead to empiricism. It can keep from doing so only if it keeps within the field of purely formal predication. In this second place, if we do place the ontological Trinity at the foundation of all our predication, then there is no need to fear any skepticism through the avenue of sense. Sensation does "deceive us," but so does ratiocination. We have the means for their corruption in both cases. The one without the other is meaningless. Both give us true knowledge on the right presupposition; both lead to skepticism on the wrong presupposition.

¹⁸Recall that apriorism, referring to a priori thinking, means simply beginning from a particular view, following a deductive method, which may not mean anything particularly Christian. Van Til chided Bavinck for attacking empiricism merely with the need for an a priori, regardless of whether or not it is the full, Christian-theistic basis.

Revelation About Nature from Self – Psycho-Physics

Here again the importance of distinguishing a Christian a priori from a non-Christian a priori is of basic importance. Suppose we took a non-Christian a priori such as that of Descartes.²¹ In such an a priori the human self takes itself to be an ultimate starting point. And suppose further that we should then seek to know the facts of nature in terms of man. The result would be anthropomorphism in the evil, skeptical sense of the term. Each man could and would, of necessity, wind the facts of "nature" in a ball about himself as a core, and the balls thus made would have as little contact with one another as we can observe between the particles of an exploded atom bomb. On the other hand, if we start, as Calvin started, by thinking of the mind of man and its a priori laws as created and controlled by God, then the facts of "nature" have intelligence written in them.²² They are exclusively revelational of God and his plan. Then Anthropomorphism, always unavoidably, leads to insight into greater truth instead of to the blind alley of skepticism.

The Trinitarian Theology of Cornelius Van Til

Van Til is talking about the proper way to witness to unbelievers. We should not relegate our approach to a method of thinking that accommodates his fallen understanding or world view. This is like trying to build a house with a faulty foundation. You cannot trick people into the Kingdom of God by accommodating their world view of God, self, etc., and then later tell them the truth about these things, man's true condition, the biblical world view and so on. Their false presuppositions must be addressed at the get-go; you should hit them with the truth and the whole truth (in love) so as to smash their false presuppositions, because eventually, if you don't do this, somewhere down the line you're going to have to, which at that point will be extremely difficult if not impossible for them to turn around. In this section of Van Til's book, The Theological Method, he explains this approach, even mentioning some proponents of the wrong approach, namely, that of C.S. Lewis.

The Theological Method

All analogical knowledge may be called theological knowledge. We can even, if we wish, identify the concept of analogical knowledge with the concept of theological knowledge. We cannot do without God anymore when we wish to know about physics or psychology than when we wish to know about your soul's salvation. Not one single fact in this universe can be known truly by man without the existence of God. Even if man will not recognize God's existence, the fact of God's existence nonetheless accounts for whatever measure of knowledge man has about God. We can readily see that this must be so. The idea of creation is implied in the idea of the self-sufficient God. Now if every fact in this universe is created by God, and if the mind of man and whatever the mind of man knows are created by God, it goes without saying that the whole fabric of human knowledge would dash to pieces if God did not exist and if all finite existence were not revelational of God.

We emphasize this point inasmuch as a quite common way of distinguishing between theology and the other sciences is to say that in the case of theology we must allow God to teach us, while in the case of other sciences we need only to open our eyes and look around. What needs to be done, therefore, is to point out that the difference between theology and other sciences does not lie in the notion that God is any less necessary for the one than for the other, but the difference lies only in the degree of directness with which God is brought into the knowledge situation.

What is meant by saying that in the theological method we are more directly concerned with God than in the analogical method in general, cannot be expressed with sufficient exactness by saying that in the case of theology we go to the Bible while in the case of other sciences we go elsewhere. It is true that we are more directly concerned with the Bible when we deal with theology than when we deal with the other sciences, but it is not true that in the other sciences we are not at all concerned with the Bible. Even in the study of zoology or botany the Bible is involved. The Bible sheds its indispensable light on everything we as Christians study. There is a philosophy of fact in the Bible that we use for the interpretation of every fact of our lives. A Christian can never go on an expedition with archaeologists who are sincerely looking for the body of Jesus. A Christian cannot go on an expedition with evolutionists expecting that he may possibly find the "missing link" between man and animal. Yet it is true that in the study of matters of the laboratories and the field, the Bible is only indirectly concerned. We do not go to the Bible itself for the facts with which we deal. On the other hand, it is true of theology that it gets its facts about God almost exclusively from the Bible. We say almost exclusively, because we also learn about God from nature. Hence, we must say that it is only a matter of emphasis. We do not limit ourselves entirely to the Bible when we study anything else.

Another way by which we sometimes try to bring out the difference between the method of theology and the method of the other sciences is by saying that in theology we deal with redemption, while in the other sciences we do not. But this is true, also, only as a matter of emphasis. In theology, we deal not only with the matter of redemption, we deal with the whole question of the universe as existing for the glory of God. And this is also the interest that we have in our study of anything else if we are really led by the Christian motif. Yet it is true that in theology we give more attention to the question of redemption and the question of man's direct relationship to God than we do in other sciences.

Failing to make clear the point just made, that for the Christian all interpretation of any fact of "nature" even by "reason" should be performed self-consciously as an act of reinterpretation of God's revelation, leads to a serious weakening of the Christian testimony. A typical example of such a weakening of the Christian testimony is found in Lewis Sperry Chafer's Systematic Theology. Though unabridged, this work has no discussion on Christian methodology as it relates to modern thought. Instead of making clear that "reason" in the case of the non-Christian is employed by such as assume themselves to be self-sufficient, while "reason" in the case of the Christian is employed by those who through regeneration have learned to think of themselves as creatures of God [i.e., dependent creatures] and of their task in life as keeping covenant with God. Chafer talks about theology drawing its material “from both revelation and reason.” “Reason, as here considered,” he then adds, “indicates the intellectual and moral faculties of man exercise in the pursuit of truth and apart from supernatural aid.” But “reason” thus described is in practice the reason of the natural man. And the natural man suppresses the revelation round about and within him. His fundamental conclusions with respect to the universe and himself are those of a covenant breaker instead of those of a covenant keeper. These conclusions need not and cannot be supplemented by revelation; they must be reversed. Owing to the fact that man cannot wholly suppress the truth, and to the fact that God’s long-suffering would lead him to repentance, the natural man brings to light some truths. It remains true, even so, that his “system” of interpretation needs reversal. Instead of indicting this fact, Chafer follows a position infected with the weaknesses of Rome [Romanism has a man centered view very similar to Arminianism].

Another form of the weakening of the Christian testimony spoken of is found when men virtually concede that an argument about facts of history, such as archaeology or miracles, between Christians and nonbelievers, can be satisfactorily brought to a conclusion without bringing in the basic presuppositions of the Christian religion. From the Christian point of view, every fact of the space-time universe is created by God and is what it is by virtue of its place in the plan of God. It is therefore God’s revelation of this plan that comes to partial expression in every fact of “nature” and history. Hence the Christian ought to make the claim that every fact positively reveals itself for what it is in relation to this plan.

On its basis Romanism cannot do this. Its analogia entis (the analogy of being) idea assumes that it is possible to speak of being and of rationality in general prior to the distinction of God’s being and man’s being or original thought and derivative thought. On such a basis it is consistent for Christians to speak with non-Christians about “facts” and a “rational universe” in general before bringing in the distinction of God the Creator and man the creature. But then on such a basis, too, the sort of Christianity that is defended by the Christian is something that lives to some extent by the sufferance of the non-Christian.

The Arminian position is similar to that of the Romanist. Assuming with Romanism that many facts come to pass in history as the result of the decisions of man independently of the plan of God, it is consistent for the Arminian to argue with the nonbeliever about archaeology or miracles without bringing in the plan of God.

Jacob Arminius (1560-1609) argued against Calvinist orthodoxy, that predestination is not unconditional, but based on divine foreknowledge of human decision about grace, which can be resisted. His followers, known as the Remonstrants (from the term for a type of manifesto) were eventually condemned by the Synod of Dort in 1618-1619. After that, a wide variety of theologies known generally as Arminianism penetrated the Protestant church. This view implied a less-than-total depravity and thus some degree of human cooperation with divine grace. In apologetics, according to Van Til, Arminians will give credit to the reasoning process of unbelievers, and thus not challenge them sufficiently to lay bare their presuppositions. He interchangeably labels this apologetics “Arminian” or “empiricist,” because it trusts in an autonomous human activity to reason and measure the world. Van Til often cites Joseph Butler as the exemplar of this approach, but indicts numerous other, including James O. Buswell, Gordon Clark, and C.S. Lewis. Occasionally he includes “Romanists,” presumably because there are commonalities in apologetic method between Roman Catholics, particularly Thomists and Arminians.

Van Til states from his book, An Introduction to Systematic Theology, pg 208: Add to this the fact that even orthodox Arminians theology has, in its concept of the plenary ability of the sinner to accept or reject the gospel, really taught that the natural man knows what his basic needs are, and it becomes very clear that the danger facing us is indeed very great. Arminianism had made an easy alliance with evolutionism.

A recent example of the Arminian type of discussion on historical fact is found in C. S. Lewis’s book, Miracles (New York, 1947). Lewis argues that “the grand miracle” is but the outstanding example of that which happens in the world of historical being in general. “What we can understand, if the Christian doctrine is true, is that our own composite existence is not the sheer anomaly it might seem to be, but a faint image of the Divine Incarnation itself – the same theme in a very minor key.” This is the sort of argument the natural man [the unbeliever] can accept on his own assumptions. The discussion is again about being in general. But the sad result is again that the Christianity thus supposedly proves true is one in which God is included with man in a universe whose laws of being and rationality both must obey.³¹ ³¹Reader familiar with C. S. Lewis’s apologetics may plead for a more nuanced rendering of his approach. To put the best light on it, Lewis, like G. K. Chesterton, is pointing out in an informal way that miracles, while extraordinary, are not completely isolated from other divine interventions or even human acts. Thus, although obviously they are unique, they belong to the universe describe in the Bible, with God as Creator, and the world subject to his government.

We have said that the Romanist and the Arminian are consistent with their own positions if they debate the questions of historical fact with nonbelievers without bringing in the Christian presuppositions of God and his plan. [that is the key problem with most evangelicals] It is, however, quite inconsistent for those professing the Reformed faith to do so. Yet this is frequently done. A recent example is the word of Gordon H. Clark, A Christian Philosophy of Education (Grand Rapids, 1946). Speaking of archaeology in general, Clark says, “Archaeology is extremely valuable and deserves support, but it does not prove that the Bible is true, much less does it prove the existence of God.” The reason why archaeology is said not to prove the bible to be true seems to be that, in the nature of the case, not in every instance in which the Bible speaks of facts that might come into the purview of archaeology can the Bible be shown to be true. “Because the Bible has been shown to be true in these hundred and one cases, as some unwary Christians like to state the general argument, it follows that the Bible is therefore true in a thousand other cases not yet tested. Obviously this does not follow.” But surely the Reformed believer should stress with Calvin that every fact of history, here and now actually is a revelation of God. Hence any fact and every fact proves the existence of God and therefore the truth of Scriptures. If this is not the case, no fact ever will. Every fact proves the existence of God because without the presupposition of God and his counsel no fact has any distinguishable character at all. But to press this point – the point which Reformed thinking should be most concerned to stress – is to give up reasoning about facts of archaeology or of history in general on presuppositions supposedly common to both, but in reality exclusive of the Christian faith. Reformed systematics and apologetics differ from Romanist and Arminian systematics and apologetics precisely because of the former's claim that every fact is expressive of the plan of God and no fact proves or disproves anything except upon the presupposition of that plan.³⁴ [that is key!]

³⁴ As he does elsewhere, Van Til here states in the strongest terms that every fact actually proves the Christian faith. If some facts of archeology have not been correlated with the Bible, they are no less proofs of the Christian worldview. Even facts about evil and injustice prove Christianity true.

Revelation about Man from Man – Psychology Proper

On the question as to what the sinner should and does know about himself from a study of himself, we can do no better than to state first what Calvin has said on this matter, in order then to add some further remarks.⁵ Calvin's first book of the Institutes is the church's great classic on this question, as it is on the question of the knowledge of God that man should obtain from a study of nature.

⁵In the second in the series about man, on the human source, Van Til relies chiefly on Calvin's Institutes to make his points.

The first point of importance to note is that Calvin, in the first chapter of his first book, begins the whole discussion of his Institutes by bringing forward the conception of the close connection between man's knowledge of himself and his knowledge of God. We quote the first lines of his book:

Our wisdom in so far as it ought to be deemed true and solid wisdom, consists almost entirely of two parts: God and ourselves. But as those are connected together by many ties, it is not easy to determine which of the two precedes and give birth to the other. For, in the first place, no man can survey himself without forthwith turning his thoughts toward God in whom he lives and moves; because it is perfectly obvious, that the endowments which we possess cannot possibly be from ourselves, nay, that our very being is nothing else than subsistence in God along.⁶

⁶See John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 1.1.1. ...These first sentences are among the most remarkable in theological literature, because they begin, not with proofs for God's existence, nor with questions about being and essence, but with the issue of human understanding in relation to the gift of God. This relation is presupposed, not argued.

From this quotation, certain things are clear. Calvin never did start a chain of reasoning about man's nature and destiny by taking man by himself. He did not start with man as with an ultimate starting point. Calvin did not start with a general a priori position. His position is as radically opposed to that of Descartes as it is to that of Hume.⁷ Most apologetic writers who have come after Calvin have allowed themselves to be influenced unduly by Cartesian philosophy on this matter. Calvin recognized fully that if man is to have true knowledge of himself, he must regard God as original and himself as derivative. He did not place God and man as correlatives next to one another, but he recognized from the outset two levels of existence and two levels of interpretation: on the one hand, the divine and eternal and, on the other hand, the human or temporal.⁸ To him it is perfectly obvious that the endowments that we possess are not our own, but of God. Hence he says that "not a particle of light, or wisdom, or justice, or power, or rectitude, or genuine truth, will anywhere be found, which does not flow from him: and of which he is not the cause."⁹ [All key points!]

⁷Rene Descartes, the French founder of modern philosophy, author of Discourse on Method (1637), concluded his quest for certainty with his famous "rock of indubitability," cognito ergo sum ("I think, therefore I am"). He was a dualist, separating mind from matter. Although he admitted to needing revelation to ensure the connection, skeptics struggled with making any connection between the two. Descartes remains one of the greatest rationalists of all time. David Hume (1711–76), the Scottish skeptical philosopher, thought that events in nature, as well as events in the mind, such as ideas or impressions, were separate and unconnected. But neither experiment nor human reason is capable of harmonizing our perceptions and the real world. One easily sees how these two thinkers are polar opposites of Calvin.

It is this thought of Calvin, rooted as it is in the scriptural doctrines of creation and providence, that we tried to express in the previous chapter by saying that originally man was able to see the true state of affairs with respect to his own thought. He saw himself as a reinterpreter of God's interpretation.

But now the question is as to what remained of all this after the entrance of sin into the world. Of this Calvin speaks in the third chapter of his first book. We quote the first paragraph of this chapter:

That there exists in the human mind, and indeed by natural instinct some sense of Deity, we hold to be beyond dispute, since God himself, to prevent any man from pretending ignorance, has endued all men with some idea of his Godhead, the memory of which he constantly renews and occasionally enlarges, that all men being aware that there is a God, and that he is there Maker, may be condemned by their own conscience when they neither worship him nor consecrate their lives to his service.¹⁰

¹⁰As he does throughout his work, Van Til strongly echoes Calvin's view on the reality of the sense of deity despite the fall. He notes further metaphors in Calvin, such as the "seed of religion" sown in every heart. In Van Til's apologetics, this becomes the main point of contact between the believer and the unbeliever.

A little later he adds:

All men of sound judgment will therefore hold, that a sense of Deity is indelibly engraven on the human heart. And that this belief is naturally engendered in all, and thoroughly fixed as it were in our very bones, is strikingly attested by the contumacy of the wicked, who, though they struggle furiously, are unable to extricate themselves from the fear of God. Though Diagoras, and others of like stamp. Make themselves merry with whatever has been believed in all ages concerning religion, and Dionysius scoffs at the judgment of heaven, it is but a Sardonian grin; for the worm of conscience, keener than burning steel, is gnawing with them.¹¹

Still a little further, he adds: "Moreover, if all are born and live for the express purpose of learning to know God, and if the knowledge of God, in so far as it fails to produce this effect, is fleeting and vain, it is clear that all those who do not direct the whole thoughts and actions of their lives to this end fail to fulfil the law of their being."

In the fourth chapter he speaks of the seed of religion (semen religionis) that is divinely sown in all. Again in the fifth chapter he brings the seed of religion that is sown in man into contact with the revelation of God in nature and then says with respect to them both, "His essence, indeed, is incomprehensible, utterly transcending all human thought; but on each of his works this glory is engraven in characters so bright, so distinct, and so illustrious, that none, however dull and illiterate, can plead ignorance as his excuse."

The question Calvin is here asking himself is not, first of all what use men have actually made of the material that was within their reach. His primary purpose is to show what was available of the revelation of God to sinful man. He tells us what they should have known and should have done because of the revelation that God had given them. To quote again:

But herein appears the shameful ingratitude of man. Though they have in their own persons a factory where innumerable operations of God are carried on, and a magazine stored with treasures of inestimable value...instead of bursting forth into praise, as they are bound to do, they, on the contrary, are the more inflated and swelled with pride. They feel how wonderfully God is working in them, and their own experience tells them of the vast variety of his gifts which they owe to his liberality. Whether they will or not, they cannot but know that these are proofs of his God head, and yet they inwardly suppress them.

And because of this great and beautiful display of the Creator in his created universe, Calvin holds it to be the basest ingratitude when men suppress within themselves the knowledge that they should have of God, if they would only look within themselves.¹⁶ He says:

At this day, however, the earth sustains on her bosom many monster minds...minds which are not afraid to employ the seed of Deity deposited in human nature as a means of suppressing the name of God. Can anything be more detestable than this madness in man, who, finding God a hundred times both in his body and in his soul, makes his excellence in this respect a pretext for denying that there is a God.

¹⁶ Calvin, following Rom. 1, sets forth a fulsome revelation of God. Humans do not merely know about God or acknowledge some ultimate Creator being, but they know God himself in his power and divinity. Yet they continually process that knowledge such that it renders them ungrateful.

We have then, so far, the following: There is actually displayed in man, as well as round about man, and even more definitely in man than round about man (a) the fact of God's creation of this world, (b) the fact of the providence of God over this world, and (c) the glory and munificence of God displayed in this world. All this was originally displayed in the world and is still, even after sin's entrance, displayed to the world. Scripture on which this teaching is based in particular as it pertains to man in distinction from nature is found in such passages as John 1:9: "There was the true light, even the light which lightheth every man, coming into the world." Similarly, Romans 1:19: "Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them." Man is and remains God's self-conscious creature. It was in the activity of the mind of man that God's revelation in the created universe originally found its high-manifestation of the personality of God.¹⁸ Hence, in the very activity of his own personality, man is placed before the clearest manifestation of the truth with respect to himself, apart from redemptive revelation.

¹⁸In The Defense of the Faith, 3rd Ed., 12, 42, Van Til defines God as "absolute personality." He often states that covenant theology is the only "personalistic interpretation of reality," meaning that because God is a person, the whole of the creation, including humanity as representative of God, is personal. See John Frame's insightful comments in Cornelius Van Til: An Analysis of His Thought 58-61

Moreover, in the activity of man's consciousness, man's mind is brought into the most immediate contact with the truth about himself. It is this which Calvin seeks to bring out by saying that man has a sense of deity, and that there is within his very make-up the seed of religion. Calvin wants to say that before man has drawn any self-conscious conclusion, he has in himself an intuition of the truth.

Theologians have spoken of this as innate (insita) knowledge in distinction from acquired knowledge. To be sure, the distinction is usually introduced in connection with the question as to what man can know about God by analysis of himself, that is, in the discussion of rational theology; but it holds equally well with respect to man's first consciousness of himself.

Dr. Hepp has worked out the thought of Calvin by saying that in respect to the question in hand we must first think of the work of the Logos. It is through the Logos that God has created the world. Then we must think of the work of the Spirit as the active agent in displaying the work of the Logos. After that, we must introduce the general testimony of the Spirit, which testifies to the spirit of man with respect to the truth of the general revelation. It is only after this that we arrive at the question of man's reaction to the revelation about and within him. [Valantine Hepp]

In the sensus deitatis (sense of deity), then, we find welling up within the consciousness of man an immediate awareness of the fact that God is the Creator and sustainer of this world. The question is as to whether it is also indicative of man's attitude with respect to revelation. We believe it to be in line with Calvin's best thought to say that he things of it as primarily revelatory. But there is no temporal precedence of the revelational over the reaction to revelation. As soon as man is conscious, he is also self-conscious; and as soon as he is self-conscious, he is a covenant breaker. Sinful man does all he can to keep down this thing which he so utterly dislikes. The recognition of its presence is, to be sure, involved. Man can never be confronted with the revelation of God without reacting to it. But his own reaction is here contemplated from the point that it too is revelatory of God to man. Using the terms subjective and objective instead of revelatory and reaction, we have the following: All of God's revelation to man through the human mind is psychologically subjective. But this fact does not reduce the objective character of the revelation of God to man. Besides, man's reaction to this psychologically subjective but nonetheless objective revelation is ethically subjective. Even so, there is no reduction of the objectivity of God's revelation to man.²⁰

²⁰In this discussion Van Til wants to say that the sense of deity is objective revelation because it comes from God, while at the same time it is subjective because it manifests itself in our consciousness. Even when we rebel against it, that (subjective) rebellion is revelatory.

If we make clear that the sensus deitatis is primarily revelatory, we can approach a biblical evaluation of the question of intuitions. We may identify these intuitions with the sense of deity and consider them as merely revelatory of God. If we regard them thus, we can rightfully think of them as an involuntary welling up of truth within man in spite of his sinful nature. On the other hand, we may think of these intuitions as the first spontaneous moral and intellectual reactions of man to the revelation within and about him.²¹ If we regard them thus, then we cannot regard them as inherently any less sinful than man's reasoning processes. In both cases, we deal with a psychological activity on the part of man, but this psychological activity, insofar as it is the activity of a creature of God, cannot help but display the Creator; while insofar as it is the activity of a sinner, it cannot help but display man's hatred of the Creator.

²¹By “intuitions” Van Til means those unconscious responses to revelation which eventually become conscious. Reasoning, for Van Til, its intuition become self-conscious. Though unconscious, intuitions are nevertheless sinful because of the fall.

We should, however, be on our guard not to make too much of the distinction between unconscious or preconscious and self-conscious action. Scottish realism (as also Hepp) and the theology based upon it has made too much of this distinction.²²

²²Scottish common sense realism is a school of thought founded by Thomas Reid (1710-96), which argued for the connection of common consciousness to self evident truths, and opposed the theory of John Locke, which led to subjectivism and skepticism. Van Til’s concern is not to exaggerate the importance of intuition, which he believes this school, as well as Hepp, has done. Reasoning may be more elaborate than intuition, and thus it may make more room for sin, but both reason and intuition are valid in themselves.

It has often spoken as though intuition were something quite different from and something more elemental than ratiocination. This, we believe, is not the case. There is a sense in which intuition is more to be trusted than reasoning inasmuch as it is more immediate and therefore does not offer as large an area for the encroachment of error as does ratiocination. In itself, however, reasoning is nothing but self-conscious intuition, and intuition is nothing but unconscious reasoning. Therefore, the one is not inherently more or less valid than the other. That this is true can best be seen if we realize that before man had sinned there could not possibly be any distinction as to relative validity between intuition and reasoning. Both intuition and reasoning were then equally valid. On the other hand, we cannot say that reason was perverted by sin, while intuition was not. Reason, to be sure, because of its greater extensiveness, errs more often and more violently than does intuition. Yet, inherently, reason has not been affected by sin any worse than has intuition. There is not one spot in the personality of man that has not been vitiated by sin.

Just as in the case of nature, the revelation of God in man has been made more complex because of the wrath of God displayed against the sin of man. For, just as the personality of man is in itself the highest peak of the revelation of God in the created universe, so also the wrath of God reveals itself most intensely upon that which was highest. Corruptio optima pessimal est (Corruption of the best is the worst). We are told particularly by Paul that the wrath of God was revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of man. If the wrath of God came down like a shower upon the whole of creation, we may say that it poured down with a particular violence upon the soul of man that had sinned. The point at which there is the most glorious display of the evidence of God as Creator and bountiful benefactor is, at the same time, the point at which there is the most intensified concentration of the wrath of God. All of the wrath of God upon the whole creation is focused at this point. There where the water was deepest, it has also been troubled most deeply by the lash of the wrath of God.²³

²³Many think of nature as the most glorious theater of God’s revelation, but in fact the human soul is. And what was the most glorious is not the most accursed. In what follows, Van Til enumerates several implications of this corruption, including a sobering analogy with Satan.

It is impossible to say with exactitude and in detail in what ways the wrath of God appears on man himself. We can only suggest a few matters. In the first place, the fact that the body of man was weakened made of it a poor tool for the service of the soul of man. Man's knowledge of nature depends to a large extent upon the keenness of his sensations. Though we marvel that in his non-saving grace God has left to man such a large measure of ability in this respect, it is all too apparent that man is constantly making mistakes in his observations of the universe around him. Man's eye and ear and all his sense have been greatly weakened through the effects of sin. When absence of the same power in the many. Even the great in this field have great weaknesses too.

As to the result of sin with respect to the soul proper, we may see something of this by comparing the knowledge of man with the knowledge of evil spirits. Scripture tells us that Satan and his hosts were created perfect. Satan originally tried to dethrone God and has tried this throughout the ages. Yet, in the nature of the case, he can never succeed in doing this. God would not be God if he could be dethroned. Accordingly, Satan's knowledge appears as false. He has made and continues to make logical deductions about reality that are untrue to reality. Satan managed to have Christ crucified in order to destroy him. Did he not know that by the crucifixion of Christ his own kingdom would be destroyed? So we see though, on the one hand, Satan's power of ingenuity is great, he constantly frustrates himself in his purposes; he is constantly mistaken in the knowledge of reality.

In a similar way, the mind of man has been under the curse of God since the entrance of sin. The entrance of sin involved a false interpretation of reality. Man thought that he, though a creature, could actually become as God the Creator. This was a serious miscalculation. It was but to be expected that when man once fell into sin, his power of true interpretation would, from an absolute point of view, disappear altogether. No sinner can interpret reality aright. This is the first point to keep in mind in this connection. It will not do to separate the logical powers of man from his moral powers and say that though man is morally unwilling to serve God, he can intellectually know God aright. It is true, of course, that when Cain left the face of the Lord, he in a sense knew God just as well as he knew him just before. It is true also that there is a sense in which Satan knows God now as well as he knew God before he fell. In a sense, Satan knows God better now than before. Did not God prove the truth of his statements to Satan thousands of times? But herein exactly lies the contradiction of Satan's personality: that though he knows God, he yet does not really know God. His very intellect is constantly devising schemes by which he thinks he may overthrow God, while he knows all too well that God cannot be overthrown. What else can this be but a manifestation of the wrath of God? Yes, it was the natural consequence of sin, but this is itself the wrath of God, that sin should be allowed to run its course.²⁴

In like manner, too, man's thought since the entrance of sin has been characterized by self-frustration. It is quite true that the sinner was able to accumulate a great deal of knowledge, after a fashion. Though his body, as a tool with which he had to obtain much of his knowledge, was weakened, and though his logical powers themselves were weakened, as he sees with his own eyes constantly when he makes false conclusions about matters of fact in the physical world, yet, in spite of all this, man has been able to know a great deal. The laws of logic as God had created them in the universe were not broken by sin, but man's ability to use them rightly was weakened, and still it is true that in his logical interpretation man has, in the form of the matter, come very close to the truth. This is the first point to note when we say that man's knowledge has been characterized by self-frustration.²⁵

²⁴The curse we experience is from both the natural result of sin and the manifestation of God's wrath.

²⁵This argument for the self-frustration of attempts to reach God is part of this double curse. Here, as elsewhere, Van Til affirms the validity of the laws of logic (not necessarily Aristotle's laws, but absolute laws, nevertheless, imprinted upon the creation). Because of this we may know a great deal, at least in "the form of the matter." However, sin has corrupted our ability to use those laws rightly, so that our conclusions are often erroneous.

It has often been pointed out that the systems of interpretation of reality made by non-Christian philosophers are very similar in form to the system of truth as Christianity believes in it. We have no desire to obscure this fact. It is exactly what we should expect. As Satan himself must have become increasingly convinced that God is God in the sense that he is absolute and therefore can never be dethroned, so also many philosophers who have, like Plato, "lost themselves in their round globe," have increasingly felt that, unless there is an absolute God, there can be no interpretation of life. [this expression is Calvin's] As a result of this negative conviction, their form of the natural man's interpretation of reality has often been very similar to the truth. Of this the idealist tradition in philosophy is the best proof. It is necessary indeed to point out constantly that the idealist system of philosophy is formally much better than is the pragmatist system. Just as it is not at all a matter of indifference whether a man be a murderer or a respectable citizen, even though from the point of view of Christianity both will be lost forever unless brought to Christ, so it is not a matter of indifference whether a man have a high or a low form of non-Christian interpretation. It is true that a man who misses a train by a minute has missed it as well as the one who has missed it by an hour, yet we give a great deal more credit to the man who missed it only by a minute than to the man who missed it by an hour. We rejoice when men are "not far from the kingdom of heaven" even though they are not in the kingdom. But all this only brings out the more strikingly the fact that the sinner's knowledge frustrates itself. Knowing God as well as he does, that is, coming in the form of his interpretation so near to the truth, he yet refuses to accept the truth in its full significance.²⁷ It is on this self-frustration that Paul speaks particularly in romans 1:18-21:

For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who [hold down] the truth in unrighteousness; because that which is known of God is manifest in them; for God manifested it unto them. For the invisible things of him since the creation of the world are clearly seen, being perceived through the things that are made, even his everlasting power and divinity; that they may be without excuse: because that, knowing God, they glorified him not as God, neither gave thanks; but became vain in their reasonings, and their senseless heart was darkened.

²⁷In Reformed theology both the genuineness of common grace and the overall context of depravity are stressed. One may speak of a relative good within an evil context.

We shall not attempt to give an exegesis of this most difficult passage. It may suffice to call attention to the following matters. In the first place, we observe that Paul says that men do actually in some sense see the truth. We do not do justice to this passage by merely saying that all men or most men believe in a god or believe that God probably exists. Paul says that the revelation of the only existing God is so clearly imprinted upon man himself and upon his environment that no matter how hard he tries, he cannot suppress this fact. As psychologically active self-conscious creatures they must see something of the truth. They hold down the truth, to be sure, but it is truth that they hold down. Nor is it that truth is objectively placed before them only in nature and in the make-up of man. It is, to be sure, on this that Paul does lay the emphasis. But knowledge is also in man in the sense that his subjective reaction to that which he sees shows some acquaintance with the truth. [Key point! mentioned again later in the next paragraph.] The invisible things of God are perceived (kathoratai). Knowing God (gnontes ton theon), have not glorified God. In the second place, it is primarily in this fact, that men know and do not live up to what they know, that Paul sees the greatest folly. Though they knew God, yet they glorified him not. They hold down the truth that is in them as well as round about them. It is in this immediate connection that Paul speaks of the revelation of God's wrath. He says that God's wrath is displayed on men just because they hold down the truth in unrighteousness. It is true that God's wrath is displayed on whatever form unrighteousness may take, but it is specifically mentioned here that God displays his wrath because men hold down the truth.²⁸

²⁸While Van Til avows this is a difficult passage that he will not exegete, this paragraph shows how much his views depend on Rom. 1. It allows him to stress both the knowledge and folly of our reaction to God's revelation. The concern of this lengthy section is humanity as a source for understanding humanity.

If we keep these things in mind, we shall be the better able to see what Scripture teaches with respect to the knowledge that man should find by the study of himself. As far as the intellectual aspect of the matter is concerned, we have now the following factors. In the first place, the body of man is, since the entrance of sin, in a weakened condition. In the second place, the functions of the soul are weakened. In the third place, and in spite of this, the invisible things of God, that is the nature of God, his power and divinity, are still displayed in man as well as round about him, in the fact of the self-conscious activity of his person, in his own negative moral reaction to the revelation about and within him, in his sense of dissatisfaction with all nontheistic interpretations, and in a measure of involuntary recognition of the truth of the theistic interpretation as the true interpretation of the origin of the world. In this respect man's knowledge is characterized by the same folly that marks Satan's knowledge of God. The first act of man's antitheistic interpretation consisted in the attempt on his part to be something that he knew he could not be. It is this folly that man has carried on through the ages, and it is this that still makes sin so foolish. And it is upon this foolishness that Paul says that the wrath of God is revealed.

This revelation is (a) partly objective to man in the narrow sense of being outside his person, as it the case with revelation in nature, (be) partly subjective to man in the narrow sense of the consisting of his psychological constitution, and (c) partly subjective in the sense of consisting of his own involuntary ethical approval or disapproval (conscience). Over against that which is thus objective – (1) outside man, (2) within man psychologically, (3) within man as involuntary ethical relation – we call that “subjective” which gives expression self-consciously, even if not with full consistency, to what that sinner as sinner does with that which comes to him objectively. As sinner, he seeks to suppress the objective revelation of God within him.

It is difficult to know just what Paul means by this revelation of God's wrath on the folly of man. We may sense something of his meaning, it would seem, if we think again of a man far removed in time from Adam. He would have before him the endless repetition of the folly of man's interpretations.²⁹

²⁹The difficulty described here is that of relating the historical act of Adam to the present state of the world. Romans 1 describes a repetition of that foolish act, with two added ingredients: (1) the making of false though plausible claims, and (2) God's patience, which keeps us from utter depravity.

He would have before him those things of which Calvin speaks when he says that the Epicureans concluded from the diversity of interpretations given by philosophers that no interpretation could be true.³⁰ The folly of man has devised all manner of seemingly plausible interpretations. This fact in itself would complicate matters for anyone who came long after Adam. And this would constitute a manifestation of God's wrath.

³⁰ See Calvin, Institutes..., he says, "And this very confused diversity emboldened the Epicureans and other crass despisers of piety to cast out all awareness of God." Most references derive from Cicero, Nature of the Gods.

Here we should again bring in the fact of the non-saving grace of God. In the case of Satan, the folly of his interpretation appears very clear. In the case of the sinner, however, we have a mixed situation. Through God's non-saving grace, the wrath of God on the sinner had been mitigated in this life. This appears along the whole line of man's interests. It appears along the line of man's physical life. Man is given an abundance of food and drink. It is shown in the fact that man's body, though weakened, is even so, particularly in some instances, a usable tool for the soul of man. It is shown in the fact that man's mind is not fully and exclusively bent upon evil. Though basically man is at enmity against God so that he is prone to hate God and his neighbor, this enmity against God does not come to full expression in this life. He is not a finished product.

We can readily see that all these matters, taken together, produce a very complex situation. There are three main things to be taken into consideration. In the first place, we must think of what was the original situation in Paradise and what remained of this after the fall of man. In the second place, we must think of the wrath of God and the great complexity that this introduced into the situation. In the third place, we must think of non-saving grace and, especially, of the great civilization that has flourished by it as means.³¹

³¹Here Van Til summarizes the situation in three categories, which he explains below. They make the world "complicated."

Under the first head, we have the fact that man's rationality is, as a matter of fact, a creation of God. When man tries to make of himself an ultimate starting point in knowledge instead of a proximate starting point, he somehow feels that he is doing something that he can not do and then he ought not to try to do. Under the second head, we have the fact that man's mind is, as a matter of fact, now that sin has entered into it, abnormal. When man acts as though his mind were normal, he frustrates himself, and he senses something of this self-frustration. He somehow feels that his ideal of absolute comprehension is knowledge is a false ideal. Under the third head, we have the fact that, in spite of the fact that man has tried to set himself up as metaphysically ultimate starting point, and in spite of this fact that he considers his mind to be normal, he has been able to so as much as he has. He ought to recognize the fact, says Calvin, that he lives by grace.

The highest point of revelation outside of Scripture as it is found after the entrance of sin is just this point, that, together with the objective clarity of all these matters comes the fact that men, in some sense, at bottom recognize them to be true. The truth, as it were, penetrates into men's minds against their will and in spite of themselves. The whole matter is admirably summed up in the statement of Ovid: "Video Meliora probaque, deteriora sequor" (I see the better and approve, the worse I follow).³²

³²In other words, in some cases we know and approve the good, but we live according to the bad. Calvin quotes this in the Institutes. The quote is from Medea's speech in the Metamorphoses (7.20). In the context, Calvin is discussing the different types of sinfulness.

That this is the case appears even more clearly if we consider for a moment what man ought to learn from the study of his own moral consciousness. Here too the first fact is that his consciousness is as a matter of fact a derivative moral standard and not an ultimate moral standard. And the sinner somehow feels that if he sets himself up as God, judging good and evil, there is something wrong. He feels that he needs a moral absolute outside himself. The second fact is that man is abnormal in his moral judgments. Of this fact, too, the sinner has some consciousness. He admits that wrong moral action is common among men. He feels something of the fact that if moral evil is thought of as being ultimate in the universe, there is no morality possible at all. In the third place, he feels something of the fact that all the morality there is in this world must somehow exist by virtue of the ultimate victory of the good, which exists in metaphysical priority to evil. He senses something of the fact that if he is to have life, he must somehow participate in the nature of the "ideal world." All these things he sees and thus knows the truth after a fashion. In spite of all this, man sins, and thus sins against better knowledge. Paul says on this point, "Who knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them." (Rom. 1:32).

Note here that what Paul speaks of in Romans as the revelation of God in nature and man, both as to his intellectual aspects and as to his moral aspects, is fully corroborated in other portions of Scripture. We mention only a few passages especially in connection with the results of sin on the mind of man.

We are not here concerned with the blindness of the natural man as such, but only with that blindness as it illustrates the nature of the light against which it had sinned. If a man is only to be pitied, we suppose that he has not had any great opportunities, but if a man is condemned and is called a fool, it must be that he has had great opportunities. Hence the fact itself that Scripture speaks of man as a fool shows that Scripture considers the light that he had as being very great.

According to the psalmist, “The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God” (Ps. 14:1). Jeremiah says that everyman is brutish in his knowledge (Jer. 10:14). In the New Testament, Jesus says to the scribes and Pharisees, who had sinned against the revelation that they had, that they were fools and blind, Paul says to the Ephesians: “See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise.” (Eph. 5:15). Peter speaks of silencing the ignorance of foolish men (1Pet 2:15).

Man, reasoning from himself as ultimate, to God, is univocal reasoning – he’s equating his thinking equal with God’s thinking (which is impossible), as opposed to reasoning from God to man which is analogical reasoning...what God is like not how he actually is. Finitude cannot comprehend infinitude. Van Til fleshes this out and how this relates to many philosophies including pantheism and immanentistic thinking. Lastly, the self-frustration of Satan and fallen man’s thinking when out of God’s will.

Notes on Pantheism by Van Til

Van Til states from his book, An Introduction to Systematic Theology p 204: In Paradise God walked and talked with man. Man needs God near to him. Even in the state of sin man has realized something of the need of a God who is near him. In fact, the sinner has brought God too near to him; he has identified the Creator with the creature. In idolatry we have an expression on the part of the sinner that points to his need of a God who is near.

Revelation about God from Nature – Natural Theology

Pg 177

In thinking of the revelation about God from nature, we do well to think first of the fact that man did originally think analogically about nature and, in thinking analogically, was able to know God truly, as far as God had revealed himself to man.⁴ When he thought thus about nature, he thought about God as he is, that is as the self-sufficient and self-consistent rational being. It is as such that God really revealed himself to man, and it is as such that man really thought of God. God continued to reveal himself in nature as the self-sufficient and self-subsistent rational God even after man became a sinner. If therefore men would only reason analogically, they should be able to reason from nature to nature's God.⁵ But sinners, until saved by grace, do not reason analogically. The reason univocally.⁶ And because they reason ⁶As indicated at the outset of this work, we speak of all forms of reasoning in which man is assumed to be the final or ultimate reference point of predication as univocal reasoning. In contrast to this we speak of the form of reasoning employed by the Christian who recognizes that God is the ultimate reference point of predication as analogical reasoning. Univocal here describes thinking that is exactly the same as God's thinking, a clear impossibility.

univocally about nature, they conclude that no god exists or that a god exists, but never that the true God exists. It has been a basic misunderstanding of Scripture and of Calvin's interpretation of Scripture to say that even by reasoning univocally with respect to nature, man should be able to come to the knowledge of God's existence. It is true that men have claimed to be able to know the existence of God, and not his essence by "natural theology." But even this was saying too much. By univocal reasoning, one can never find the truth about God, either as to his existence or as to his being. *By univocal reasoning, one can, in the nature of the case, find an immanent God only.*⁷ [codeproofs] Hepp overlooks this when he says that the "theistic proofs" have a certain validity. [see Hepp's view in chapter 5] By univocal reasoning, one can, at most, find a God that is and extension of the universe. Univocal reasoning starts with the assumption that man and the universe are entities from which, as the ultimate starting point, we can reason to God. We believe, however, that not even Adam in Paradise could do this. He could only do what Calvin speaks of in the first paragraph of the Institutes, namely, (a) think of God and himself simultaneously, and (b) think of God as ultimate and of himself as derivative.

Again, because men ought to conclude that the sin of man is the source of the curse of God upon nature, they ought also to conclude that it is by the grace of God that they live at all, and that nature is not fallen into complete disorder. That winter and summer follow one another is actually a matter of God's grace to man, as the covenant with Noah shows. This, men ought to see. The facts are there before them, and they ought to see the facts. Hence they ought to glorify the Creator.

As a matter of fact, men have not reasoned and interpreted as they ought to have reasoned and interpreted. They have reasoned univocally instead of analogically. They have used an immanentistic principle of interpretation for the universe as a whole. They have not been willing to admit that it is by the human mind that disorder and misinterpretation have come into the world. They have not negated themselves as normal. Hence, they have also not negated themselves as ultimate. Yet they have sensed through it all that they have, with their exclusively immanentistic principle, not been able to interpret reality satisfactorily. They have shown, therefore, a desire for something different. They have recognized that if no interpretation on the part of a self-sufficient God is given to them, there is no rest for the mind of man.¹⁶

¹⁶We desire eternity, according to Eccl. 3:11, yet we cannot find it (Eccl. 8:17). The result is a restlessness of mind, as Van Til suggests, echoing Augustine's phrase from the Confessions 1.1, "Our heart is restless until it rests in you."

On the other hand, in the interpretations that they have actually given, they have shown great similarity of form to the truth. In the idealistic tradition, philosophy has verbally recognized the need of a timeless absolute. In the higher religions of the world, outside Christianity, men have also glimpsed something of the fact that it is in something above this world that the soul of man must find its peace. So modernism is today constantly seeking that which is above the mechanical and the material. And though this is in itself misinterpretation, it nevertheless shows that men are constantly seeking something or someone beyond the universe. It is remarkable how many scientists have said that they discovered God in nature. It is, to be sure, not the true God that they discover, because they, generally speaking, use the univocal method of reasoning: but the fact remains that men seek a god. All of this is eloquent testimony that God is, as matter of fact, revealed in nature and in the mind of men, and that, therefore, men ought to know him.¹⁷

¹⁷Whether in philosophy, religion, or science, there are enunciations of remarkable parallels to the truth of theism. They too echo the truth, while at the same time failing to do full justice to it.

Revelation about God from Man – Rational Theology

Pg 182-186

Moreover, all men everywhere, deep down in their hearts know that the world is created by God.¹⁸ At bottom they know that y all their attempts at explanation of nature they are suppressing within themselves the testimony of the real Creator of the universe. The more self-conscious men become with respect to the real meaning of their own position, the more clearly do they realize that their systems are escape-mechanisms by which sinners seek to hide the truth rom themselves.¹⁹

¹⁸The second source for revelation about God is man, in the process of Van Til calls “rational theology.”

¹⁹Using the term suppression, from Rom. 1:18 Van Til concludes that humans know God “deep down.” In a thoughtful treatment of the unbeliever’s knowledge of God, John Frame comments that while a surface impression would convey that Van Til is using the psychological language of repression, an examination of the broad sweep of his writings shows that he sets for the much more complex, indeed mysterious, relation of truth to error in the unbelieving consciousness.

What we have just said with respect to the revelation about God from nature applies also, mutatis mutandis (with respective differences having been considered), to the revelation about God from man.

Here in particular the point that Calvin stresses, namely, that man must think of himself as derivative and as in contact with God, is of importance. The knowledge of God and of ourselves is most important to us. All other knowledge centers on our knowledge of God and of ourselves. If we are correct in our interpretation of knowledge here, we shall be correct everywhere; if we are mistaken here, we shall be mistaken everywhere.

At this point, then, we may say that men ought to reason analogically about themselves. They ought to reason analogically about their being (ontological argument), about the cause of their being (cosmological argument), and about the purpose of their being (teleological argument),²¹ Men ought to see themselves concretely for what they are. They cannot in any true sense define or describe themselves except in terms of their derivation from and responsibility to God. They ought to see that the words being, cause, and purpose have no possible meaning when applied to themselves, except in relation to God as their Creator and Judge.

²¹Again, Van Til is ambiguous about the theistic proofs. Here he uses three of them only as example of the problems needing to be solved: the nature of being, its origins and purpose. The solution is analogy, in his sense of the term, that is, thinking God’s thoughts after him.

Accordingly, they ought also to attribute disorder to man, not to God. If error were as fundamental as the truth, if negation were as fundamental as affirmation, it would mean that there would be no truth at all. The least bit of rationality anywhere presupposes absolute rationality in God. To this we may add also that the least bit of irrationality anywhere presupposes absolute rationality in God. No irrationality could have meaning except in contrast to rationality. Yet if irrationality were contrasted merely to finite rationality, it would not be really contrasted to rationality at all. Finite irrationality, as well as finite rationality, needs absolute rationality as its presupposition.²² ²²In Van Til's apologetic, irrationality is impossible. Even to call the world irrational presupposes a higher standard of rationality.

Thus we see that the very least bit of rational interpretation, as well as the possibility of error, presupposes God. This applies both to the intellectual and to the moral realm. That man can to any extent interpret the universe aright, and that he does by nature the "things of the law" are equally significant as evidences of the existence of God. The second point, pertaining to morality, Paul speaks of in Romans 2:14-15 as follows: "For when the Gentiles that have not the law do by nature the things of the law, these, not having the law, are the law unto themselves; in that they show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness therewith, and their thoughts one with another accusing or else excusing them."

As inners, these Gentiles seek to keep down the testimony of the Spirit of God within and about them. Even so, as in the case of knowledge (Rom. 1:20), so in the case of morality (Rom. 2:14-15), he cannot wholly keep the Spirit's testimony from being effective. There is an incidental and involuntary conformity to some of the requirements of the law in their moral reactions.²³

²³What is true of understanding, that we know the truth but suppress it in unrighteousness, is also true of morality: we know what we ought to do but will not do it.

Here to we should carefully distinguish between what is merely revelatory and what is indicative of the sinner's self-conscious ethical reaction. Paul does not here say that the law is written in the hearts of men. It is true that they have the law written in their hearts. Their own makeup as image-bearers of God tells them, as it were, in the imperative voice, that they must act as such. All of God's revelation to man is law to man. But here we deal with man's response as an ethical being to this revelation of God. All men, says Paul, to some extent, do the works of the law. He says that they have the works of the law written in their hearts. Without true motive, without a true purpose, they may still do that which externally appears to be acts of obedience to God's law. God continues to press his demands upon man, and man is good "after a fashion" just as he "knows after a fashion."²⁴ good comments of the law here:

²⁴The unbelieving Gentiles do have the law, just as do the Jews, albeit through a different mode of revelation. The contrast between the law and the work of the law is meant to guard us from thinking that Gentiles without grace (any more than Jews) can fully live by it. It is true that the law is engraved on the heart in the sense that every human is God's image-bearer. But here Paul is reflecting on the response to the law. If the law were truly engraved on the Gentiles' hearts in a new covenant sense (Jer. 31:33), they would presumably conform to it. Yet they do have the work of the law written on their hearts, that is, inscribed on their deepest consciousness (by general revelation, as opposed to tablets, which are by special revelation). This is evidenced by the portions of God's law that are practiced by the Gentiles, including various virtues, and by the witness of the conscience. The point is that they are not without revelation, yet their response is to be good only in a relative sort of way, not in a redeemed way.

Order, when viewed from the point of view of the passage of time, is purpose. Men should therefore also have used the teleological argument analogically. It is in connection with the rational and moral activity of the mind of man that the concept of purpose comes out most strikingly. So then man should see that all things in this universe, and, in particular, all things in the mind and moral activity of man, would be at loose ends if it were not for God and his purposes with respect to them. Here we may note again the difference between a univocal and an analogical argument. Suppose we begin with man as a moral being, taking for granted that we know to a large extent, if not fully, what purpose means in his case, in order then to conclude that there must be a God to conserve the purposes or values of man. That would be univocal instead of analogical reason.²⁵ [²⁵Again, that is because the starting point is defective.] It would be to make God the derivative of man instead of man the derivative of God. We would be thinking of a god who is but an extension of man, with the result that all things would still be at loose ends. Thus we would defeat the very purpose we had in mind, that is, of showing the necessity of thinking of God when we think of human purpose. It is true, of course, that there is a sense in which we know what purpose means in the case of man, when we do not so plainly know it in the case of God. When we purpose to go to a certain city, we mean that we intend to exert ourselves physically in order to get there. But this only indicates that in this sense we are more immediate to ourselves than to God. Yet, from an ultimate point of view, God is nearer than breathing, and nearer than hand and feet. [see Ps. 139; Acts 17:28]

Thus we are led on to the idea of a judgment. Calvin speaks of this in particular. He says that men ought not to conclude from the fact that some men are not immediately punished for their unrighteousness, that there is no God who judges, They ought rather to conclude, he says, that God will punish in the future the wrong that he leaves unpunished now. Translating this in the terminology we have employed, we may say that there must be a comprehensive purpose with history if there is purpose anywhere in history. Without a comprehensive purpose, every act of purpose on the part of man would be set in a void. And if there must be absolute purpose, it goes without saying that all the evil must one day be abolished. All unrighteousness will one day have to be punished. God will accomplish his purpose with the universe, or he would not be God. Even the devil must be subordinate to the purpose of God. The devil's actions are therefore actions that carry in them their own frustrations. Satan must, in spite of all his efforts to the contrary, serve the glory of God. Just as his thoughts are self-frustrative, so his actions are self-frustrative. So also, man's actions, if they are not in accordance with the will of God, will be like the devil's actions in this character of self-frustration. Thus men are a law unto themselves. They condemn themselves, and, to an extent, they excuse themselves. God has shown the wisdom of man to be foolishness and will finally condemn all purposive thought and action not centered on him at the time of the judgment day.²⁷

²⁷Acts 17:21 supports the idea that we know by general revelation (in this case, ratified by Christ's resurrection) that judgment is coming.

Thus we see that, both with respect to nature and with respect to man himself, men should have known God as Creator, as preserver and as Judge. They should have known his divinity. They should have known him as the absolute one. They should have known him as the one through whom along all human predication, applied either to nature or to man, has meaning. They should have known him as the presupposition of the intelligibility of the universe. They should have known him as such in his self-testimony, the self-testimony of the Spirit with respect to nature and man.

Instead of knowing him as such, men sought to interpret the universe by an exclusively immanentistic principle. Paul says: “For that they exchanged the truth of God for a lie, and worshipped and served the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed for ever, Amen.” (Romans 1:25). Both deistic and pantheistic types of philosophy are immanentistic.²⁸ Both try to worship the creature rather than the Creator. Yet, as we have seen before, men have recognized something of the insufficiency of the immanentistic principle. They have demanded a beyond. The nations have been incorrigibly religious. The sensus deitatis (sense of deity) has been deeply ingrained in men, says Calvin, and the seed of religion has been so fixed in their being that they have tried in vain to remove the knowledge of God from their hearts.²⁹

²⁸According to deism, all that needs to be known of God is understood from nature. It is immanentistic because there is no need for supernatural revelation. According to pantheism, God is in everything. Again, there is no need for a transcendent Creator.

²⁹Calvin, Institutes, 1.3.3; 1.4.1, 4.

On the other hand, the nature of the god whom they have formed for themselves, though often brought down to the level of four-footed beasts and creeping things, has, in the higher instances, been similar in form to the conception of the true God. Plato does, to be sure, “lose himself in this globe” so that his idea of god is, from the Christian point of view utterly false: yet, on the other hand, it is most remarkable that his god is as noble as he is. But the basic differences and the formal similarities between the gods of the nations and the God of truth are evidence of the truth that God revealed himself so men. Both are given that men might be without excuse.

Side note:

Univocal is explained by Greg Bahnsen in his book, Van Til's Apologetic:

As explained later, Van Til means here that unbelievers think autonomously (as though the Creator-creature distinction were irrelevant, i.e., “univocally”), whereas believers reason in terms of the light and guidance provided by God's revelation (reinterpreting experience by thinking God's thoughts after Him, i.e., “analogously”).

Notes on Arminianism & The Necessity of Special Revelation

The Necessity of Special Revelation

This necessity does not lie in any defect in the general revelation that God have to man when he created him. When we speak of the insufficiency of general revelation, we do not wish to suggest that this revelation is as such insufficient for its purpose. It has been noted how all creation, including man's own psychological constitution, is inherently revelatory of God. This revelation was so clear and unavoidable that man was always confronted with the face of God. But in sinning, man, as it were, took out his own eyes, so that he could no longer see God in his general revelation. Moreover, through this act of self-immolation, man made himself not only helpless but also guilty and polluted before God! It is therefore to the condition of man as a sinner, not to man as finite, that the idea of the necessity of a special or saving revelation must be attached.²

²Crucial to these affirmations is the purpose of general and special revelation. General revelation is sufficient for its purpose, which, of course, is not to speak of judgment or of atonement.

Arminian theologians do not do justice to the distinction between the sinfulness and the finitude of man when they speak of special revelation in distinction from general revelation.³ In discussing general revelation they do not include man's own reaction as part of that revelation. They tend to think of man as originally standing in a state of equilibrium before the revelation of God that was around but not within him. On this position man might reject the revelation of God without sinning against and ruining his own nature. Man would have some excuse for thinking that God might possibly not exist. Even if the revelation surrounding him were calculated to make him think that in all probability God does exist, yet the intelligibility of his own nature to himself apart from the idea of revelation would logically justify him in holding that God might not exist.

³On Arminian apologetics, see Chap 2 note 29. Here, the point is made that Arminians are uncritical of human inability to assess revelation correctly because they do not believe in total depravity. For them, special revelation remedies an inadequacy in general revelation, not in human sinfulness.

Van Til states from his book, An Introduction to Systematic Theology, pg 208: Add to this the fact that even orthodox Arminians theology has, in its concept of the plenary ability of the sinner to accept or reject the gospel, really taught that the natural man knows what his basic needs are, and it becomes very clear that the danger facing us is indeed very great. Arminianism had made an easy alliance with evolutionism.

Thus, there is on the basis of the Arminian view of man an inherent and original lack of clarity or insufficiency in general revelation. On this basis, general revelation was not even historically sufficient, i.e., wholly adequate for the purpose for which it was given. God did not do this work well at the outset of his dealing with man.⁴

⁴Again, the Arminian view results in a general revelation that is insufficient and unclear. Because the view trusts unaided reason to assess the situation, there is no guarantee of finding God. Even though the existence may have a high probability, God may or may not exist, because human judgment deems the evidence to be mixed.

On this view God was really morally obliged to give man a saving revelation of himself. Since man had fallen into the ravine of sin at least partly because God's warning signals had not been clear, it was naturally to be expected that he should later make good. On the other hand, if we include the original subjective condition of man in the very concept of revelation, we see that man was originally in possession of the truth and of a true reaction to the truth. It is this that is the basis for a proper concept of a point of contact for the gospel in the mind of the natural man. Man's condition after the entrance of sin is, therefore, not that of a poor innocent man, but that of a criminal who has committed high treason. Thus, the necessity for a special revelation lies primarily in the subjective rebellion of man. The special revelation that must be given to man, if he is to be saved, must not only consist of the "objective" work of Christ in his death and resurrection, but also, result in a subjective change from the state of rebellion to a state of obedience. The work of the Holy Spirit in granting a regeneration to God's people is therefore implied in the work of Christ. The presentation of an objective revelation, that is, a revelation outside of man alone, would in itself be worse than useless. [because an inward change of heart needs to happen, John 3, Titus 3:5, you must be born again, regeneration] Arminianism again fails to realize this fact. And the Butler type of apologetics as advocated by J. Oliver Buswell also fails to realize this fact.⁵

⁵If the evidence is mixed, or unclear, then God really should make himself more clear, and so he owes it to us to bring us special revelation. On the Calvinist view, the problem is not lack of clarity but inward moral rebellion. Accordingly, God may reveal grace, but only because he is merciful, not under obligation.

It is indeed true that nature does not reveal God's grace to man. This objective insufficiency of present general revelation is plainly taught by Paul. The whole argument of the first few chapters of Romans establishes this fact that all "righteousness" that is of men whether among Jews or among Gentiles, places all under the condemnation of God and that in general revelation there is no remedy for this condition. Men are lost without Christ – and he is not revealed in nature. The whole point may be summed up in the words of Peter when he says: "And in none other is there salvation: for neither is there any other name under heaven, that is given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts 4:12), But we should remember that the objective insufficiency of present general revelation is due to the sin of man. It is true that nature does not reveal grace to us, but it is also true that man, as he was originally created, did not need grace. Even if the water supply in a city is quite sufficient for the normal needs of its citizens, it may not be sufficient if all those citizens take to burning their houses down simultaneously. The original revelation of God to man was quite sufficient for his creatures who loved him, but it was not enough for creatures who became sinners, and who, therefore, burned beneath his wrath.⁶

⁶To repeat: the insufficiency of general revelation to present grace is not because it fails in its purpose, but because human sinfulness requires a particular, special, kind of revelation that tells of judgment and atonement. Arminians blame our finitude rather than our sinful distortion for our not recognizing the truth.

In consequence of this in, then, man needs both new or additional revelation – a revelation of grace – and renewed power by which to perceive that new revelation and to understand and accept the revelation of God in nature for what it really is. He needs, as Warfield has put it, both new light and new power of sight.

Note It will be observed that the reason for the distinction between sin and finitude made above is more apparent in our day than ever before. Modernism, largely following the philosophical principle of Kant, thinks that all the revelation that is mediated in and through history, whether round about man or within him, is of necessity something less than the voice of a self-sufficient God. Man's finitude is therefore his chief excuse for his sin.⁸

Similarly, the new form of modernism of the dialectical theologians, still patterning its thought after the critical principle of Kant, finds that natural revelation is, as such, a mere "chaos of voices." In this theology too man's finitude and his sinfulness are virtually identified.⁹ Soren Kierkegaard, the Danish philosopher from whom the dialectical theologians Karl Barth and Emil Brunner received their chief inspiration, says, "Nothing is more readily evident than that the greatest attainable certainty with respect to anything historical is merely an approximation."¹⁰ Basing this approach on Kantian principle of knowledge, he argues that no knowledge of an such object as the self-existent God of orthodox Christianity is available for man. He takes away the foundation not only of biblical revelation but also of general or natural revelation. He rejects the very presuppositions on which any orthodox view must be based, namely, the temporal creation of the universe, God's providential control over the universe and man's creation in the image of God.¹¹

⁹Dialectical theology is the broad term referring to a method that shows a struggle between the capability of reason and the reality of freedom above the rations. Thus, propositional truth is considered limited and held in a "dialectical" tension with its opposite. In its modern form, it was developed by Kant and Hegel. It was brought into theology by Kierkegaard, according to some, and it was then strongly developed in neo orthodox theology by Karl Barth, Emil Brunner, C.H. Dodd, and others, including the Niebuhrs, who stressed that one must recognize the basic paradox, then rise above it by a step of faith. . [fideism - faith without knowledge. See note below]

Martin Luther's Table Talk, 353. Luther's position on faith is closely aligned with fideism, which claims reason is not necessary for faith. Faith accepts that which reason alone is unable to believe. "For reason" Luther taught, reason "is the greatest enemy that faith has; it never comes to the aid of spiritual things, but—more frequently than not- struggles against the Divine Word" Ibid., 353.

¹⁰Soren Kierkegaard, Concluding Unscientific Postscript ... Kierkegaard (1813-1855) was an enigmatic theologian and philosopher, whose life works involve a sharp critique of rationalism, and a study of action and ethical choices made before a God who calls upon us to exercise faith even when it does not make sense.

¹¹Scholars of dialectical theology may find this lineage a bit hasty. Van Til paints with broad strokes here. His point is that if one accepts the Kantian dichotomy of noumenal versus phenomenal, then God must struggle to get through to us by revelation, and we therefore have a certain excuse for not recognizing him. See Chap 7, note 35

It follows that both on the basis of modernism and on that of dialecticism, God really owes man a saving revelation of himself. And the compromising position of the Arminian easily carries him away by this confusion. [see chapter 2, note 29]

The necessity of special revelation appears not only with respect to man's failure to know and react to spiritual things right, but also with respect to his inability to interpret "natural" things aright. Calvin brings out this point fully when, after laboring to show that God is marvelously revealed in his creation, he inserts a chapter on "The Need of Scripture, as a Guide and Teacher, In Coming to God as a Creator." He begins this chapter by saying,

Therefore, though the effulgence which is presented to every eye, both in the heavens and on the earth, leaves the ingratitude of man without excuse, since God, in order to bring the whole human race under the same condemnation, holds forth to all, without exception, a mirror of his Deity in his works, another and better help must be given to guide us properly to God as a Creator. [John Calvin's Institutes, 1.6.1.]

No one, on the basis of present general revelation alone, actually knows God aright as the Creator. It is not a thought man by himself and on the basis of natural revelation alone can truly know God as the Creator, but that he cannot truly know God as Savior. Man ought, to be sure, from nature to know God as Creator, seeing that nature clearly displays the Creator. But since man has become a sinner, he has become a willing slave to sin (ethelodoulos).¹⁴ He therefore never reads the "book of nature" aright even with respect to "natural" things. He may, to be sure, by virtue of the sense of deity within him, give involuntary, adventitious interpretations of natural revelation that are, so far forth, correct. In this sense every man knows God and knows himself to be a creature of God (Rom. 1:19). But to the extent that he interprets nature according to his own adopted principles, he does not speak the truth on any subject.

¹⁴The Greek word for slave or bond-servant. Here, it is negative, as in "slave to sin." See John 8:34 and Calvin's Institutes, 2.2

Romanism, Arminianism, and traditional apologetics, whether of the empiricist school of Butler and Buswell, or of the a priori type,¹⁵ fail to do justice to this point so greatly stressed by Calvin. They attribute to the natural man the ability not only to make formally correct statements about "nature" or themselves, but also mean by these statements what the Christian means by them.

¹⁵On a priori apologetics, see Chap 2, note 3. According to Van Til, an apriorist is one who places human autonomous propositions above revelation. He readily associates James Buswell, Gordon H. Clark, and Edward Carnell with this approach.

Yet the willing disobedience on the part of man is itself the greatest damage done to god's creation; it is this that must be repaired. This cannot be done unless creation is really seen as God's creation and man is really seen as the creature of God. It is only in Man is the creature of God that he can be saved by God. Salvation means that man, the sinner, must be brought back to the knowledge of himself as the creature of God and therefore, to the knowledge of God as the Creator. Being a sinner, man will not read nature aright unless he does it in the light of Scripture. "If true religion is to beam upon us, our principle must be, that it is necessary to begin with heavenly teaching, and that it is impossible for any man to obtain even the minutest portion of right and sound doctrine without being a disciple of Scripture." [Calvin, Institutes 1.6.2]

Note We should accordingly avoid the error of separating too sharply between science and religion as is often done. The world of natural and historical fact with which science deals cannot be truly interpreted by anyone who is not a Christian, any more than can the world of spiritual things. Every statement about the physical universe implies, in the last analysis, some view about the "spiritual" realm. Scientists frequently say that in their statements they will limit themselves to the phenomenal world. But every assertion they make about the "phenomenal" world [the seen world] involves an attitude toward the "noumenal" world. [the unseen, spiritual world] Even the mere assumption that anything can intelligently be asserted about the phenomenal world by itself presupposes its independence of God, and as such is in effect a denial of him.¹⁷

¹⁷As seen previously, Van Til argues vehemently against dichotomizing the spiritual (noumenal) and the scientific (phenomenal). Herman Dooyeweerd likewise spoke against a dualistic ground motive (freedom versus nature," or "personality versus science." Francis A Schaeffer warns against an "upper story" versus a "lower story."

Van Til speaks on chance, a priori, Rationalism, Irrationalism, Existentialism, Exhaustive Knowledge, and the Dialecticism of Kant

An Introduction to Systematic Theology, pg 197-199

Code507

Now it is this basically and exclusively revelatory character of all the facts of the universe that is either openly or covertly denied by both rationalist and irrationalist forms of heresy. Both hold to a non-Christian view of possibility. Both hold that it is at least possible that the facts of the universe can be something other than revelatory of God. And this is, in effect, to posit chance as equally ultimate with God. And positing chance as equally ultimate with God is virtually the same as denying the existence of God. To say that the evidence, when fully and fairly considered, merely shows that God probably exists is tantamount to saying that he does not at all exist. The God of Christianity is the God whose counsel or plan is the source of possibility. The word possibility has no possible meaning except upon the presupposition of the existence of the self-contained ontological Trinity as the source of it.

It should be noted, too, that in presupposing chance, rationalism is as irrationalistic as is irrationalism. Rationalism is secretly, while irrationalism is frankly and openly, addicted to a philosophy of chance. Both rationalism and irrationalism are therefore committed to a form of empiricism that is utterly out of accord with Christian theism [the orthodox study of God]. Though both are committed to a supposedly neutral attitude, an attitude that is willing to find in the facts whatsoever there is to be found, it is a foregone conclusion that they will never find Christian theism there. Having presupposed chance back of the facts, they can find chance and nothing but chance in the facts.²¹

²¹Rationalism is irrationalist because it claims chance. Irrationalism is rationalist because it is committed to neutrality.

And this leads to the obvious observation that irrationalists no less than rationalists are rationalistic; both have adopted their ultimate positions not after but before they have investigated the facts. No human being can escape making an assumption about the nature of possibility at the outset of his investigation. All men have a priori assumptions in terms of which they approach the facts that confront them. The Christian frankly admits that his a priori is the assumption of the existence of the ontological Trinity, the temporal fiat creation of the universe, and man's creation in the image of God. The non-Christian has a different sort of a priori. Every non-Christian has an a priori. And the a priori of every non-Christian is different, radically different from that of the Christian.²²

²²Here Van Till uses the term a priori to mean "presupposition." This is not always the case.

It is not now our purpose to work out the significance of this fact of the difference between the Christian and the non-Christian a priori for Christian apologetics. (That significance is obviously fundamental. Failure on the part of Christian apologists to make the distinction between the two kinds of a priori spells failure to make contact with the nonbeliever. It spells failure to set forth the difference between the two positions clearly and therefore spells failure to challenge the unbeliever with the truth of the Christian position.)

Our purpose here is to show that it is quite impossible to maintain the biblical doctrine of the necessity of special revelation as being due to sin rather than to finitude on either a Romanist or a dialectical view of general revelation. Both of these views hold to the irrationalist position that the facts of the created universe only probably reveal the existence of God. Both hold to this irrationalist position because both have also assumed the non-Christian a priori position that man can determine the nature of the possible in the realm of being by means of the law of noncontradiction. The reason why both hold to probabilism is that they cannot exhaustively square the biblical view of revelation with the principle of logical consistency. That is to say, both hold to the non-Christian view that unless man can understand God exhaustively by means of logical relations, one cannot really be sure of having the truth about God in any sense.²³

²³In the diagnosis of non-Reformed views, as with unbelief, rationalism (or logical consistency) can take you only so far. It cannot accord with all to the data of revelation. Instead of avoiding irrationalism, it adds irrationalism to the mix, in the form of chance or possibility – "possibilism." On this view, understanding must be exhaustive or skeptical.

There is, of course, a great difference between Romanism and dialecticism. Immanuel Kant marks the dividing line between them. Building upon a Kantian type of epistemology, dialecticism had done away with every type of traditional transcendence.²⁴ For it the very essence of God is exhausted in "his" relationship to man, just as the very essence of man is exhausted in this relationship to God. On this basis there is really no justification for speaking of even the probable existence of God. For on this basis the very idea of knowledge presupposes that no intelligible proposition can be made about an "antecedent being."

Accordingly, if the idea of a transcendent God is to be maintained at all, it must be done in the form of a “practical” idea, in the form of a “limiting concept” a la Kant. And this implies pure mysticism.²⁵ The “existentialism” of Kierkegaard that lies at the basis of dialecticism in theology makes a complete contrast between knowledge by way of logical and propositional statement and knowledge by “indirect communication.”²⁶ The former pertains to the relative and the latter to the absolute. The absolute or eternal cannot communicate itself to man in propositional form.

²⁵ As seen in chapter 3, note 25, a limiting concept for Kant marks the limits of reason. Kant’s true world, including God, is such a limit. According to Kant, however, God did not have to exist in the true world. As Nietzsche would point out, Kant’s true world is “indemonstrable” and “unattainable” for now. Kant was merely protecting an ideal from refutation. It is “practical” because in his Critique of Practical Reason he amalgamates religion with the search for a supreme principle of morality, a “categorical imperative,” which is, again, beyond verification.

This is an outstanding analysis of God’s incomprehensibility, the problem associated with seeking exhaustive knowledge, and assumed ultimacy and autonomy - Romanism/Arminianism, first & second causes, etc. This work by Van Til connects many things together so you can see more clearly the hole that opponents of Christianity dig themselves into (Rationalism-Irrationalism, Chance vs. God’s Sovereign control, etc.) and hence you as a Christian apologist can confront unbelievers intelligently, from Reformed/biblical presuppositions. My comments in [blue].

And many of its Logical Consequents

pgs. 260-270

The subject of discussion in what has preceded has been what is usually spoken of as the prolegomena of theology.¹ There follows now a consideration of theology proper, that is, of the doctrine of God. The Westminster Shorter Catechism's definition of God. The Westminster Shorter Catechism's definition of God is very familiar. "God is a spirit, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness and truth."² The remaining chapters may be said to be in the nature of an effort to ascertain as clearly as possible the meaning of this definition and its present-day significance.

But the question will at once be asked how it is possible that man should say anything at all about a God who is infinite, eternal, and unchangeable in all his perfections. This question becomes all the more pressing if the words of the Westminster Confession of Faith are added to those quoted from the catechism.

There is but one only living and true God, who is infinite in being and perfection, a most pure spirit, invisible, without body, parts, or passions, immutable, immense, eternal, incomprehensible, almighty, most wise, most holy, most free, most absolute, working all things according to the counsel of his own immutable and most righteous will, for his own glory, most loving, gracious, merciful, long-suffering, abundant in goodness and truth, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin, the rewarder of them that diligently seek him; and withal most just and terrible in his judgments; hating all sin, and who will by no means clear the guilty. [Westminster Confession of Faith 2.1]

The modern man, brought up on the phenomenal-noumenal distinction of Immanuel Kant, will at once assert that it is quite meaningless to speak of such a God. Such a God, he says, is beyond human experience. He is unknowable. No predication whatsoever can be made about him in terms that the human mind can fathom.

Modern theology, beginning with Schleiermacher and including Karl Barth, has allowed the legitimacy of Kant's criticism of the traditional doctrine of God. In order therefore to save anything at all of the idea of a transcendent God, it speaks of the idea of such a god as being a practical rather than a theoretical concept. The modern idea of God is a limiting or border concept, rather than a constitutive one. It holds that man can know nothing of a "most absolute" God. He can only posit such a god as moral necessity. Modern theology is irrationalist. When it speaks of the primacy of faith, it means by faith the irrational acceptance of that which nothing can be known rationally.⁵

Orthodox theology is, in consequence, obliged to give itself a clear account of its doctrine of God. For one thing is certain, namely, that all orthodox or traditional theology does claim to be able to have theoretical knowledge of God. Roman Catholic and Protestant theology are in agreement in maintaining that the idea of God is not merely a limiting concept but rather a constitutive concept.⁶

⁶That is, God is not simply the opposite of what we may understand, but is self-defined. Thus, he is eternal, which means more than just not temporal.

In defense of their view, both the Romanist and the Protestant appeal to the ideal of revelation. The reason why God can be known and is known by man, says the traditional theologian, is because God has revealed himself. But the modern theologian replies that this does not help matters in the least. For any revelation that came from God would have to come to man in such forms as man would understand. Any revelation from an absolute God, one who is infinite in his self-contained perfections, would have to come to man mediated through the categories of the human mind. If God told man that he was eternal, this would mean no more to man than that he is of very long endurance in the process of time. And a god who is very old is not the eternal God of orthodox theology at all.

At this point Thomas Aquinas and his modern followers, such as Przywara, Gilson, Maritain, Sheen, and others, step back.⁷

⁷Four of the most prominent neo-Thomists of Van Til's day. Erich Przywara (1889-1972), a prolific writer, was a Jesuit influenced by Edmund Husserl and Max Scheler. Etienne Gilson, (1884-1978) was professor at the College de France and wrote on Thomas and metaphysics, as well as medieval philosophy. Jacques Maritain (1882-1973) taught at the Institut Catholique de Paris and was a leading philosopher and political thinker, specializing in human rights and democracy. Fulton J. Sheen (1895-1979) became archbishop and wrote about psychology and the soul, the philosophy of science, and moral theory.

There is nothing they can say by way of effective reply to the modern view of God. And why? Because of the defective nature of their concept of revelation. The Romanist view of revelation is defective primarily in that it does not include the human mind itself within its purview. It is only if the Creator-creature distinction is taken seriously that the human mind can be seen as inherently revelational of God. But Romanism does not take the creation doctrine seriously. It detracts from this doctrine by its idea of the freedom of man. This idea of freedom amounts to a measure of independence over against God. And to the extent that man is independent of God, he is no longer revelatory of God. Moreover, if man is made to some extent independent of God, to that extent God is made dependent upon man. Or rather, to that extent both God and man are dependent upon one another and upon the universe. If man is made partly independent of God, his ultimate reference point is no longer exclusively found in God.⁸

⁸As elsewhere, Van Til here argues that only with a full Creator-creature concept, whereby the two realms are distinct yet connected by God's sovereignty, can the human mind be given real significance as a recipient of divine revelation. In Thomist thought, being is universal, so that God and man are defined by it. Thus, human free will is partly independent, and so partly sovereign even over God, with the result that revelation cannot truly originate in God and be received by man.

It will not be apparent why the Romanist has no effective answer to the modern theologian. The modern theologian, with the modern philosopher and the modern scientist, makes the universe or reality as a whole his final or ultimate subject of predication. He includes his god and himself within a common universe. Then he makes assertions about the nature of this universe. He does so by means of the laws of logic that he finds operative in this mind. Without the least bit of justification, he assumes that reality must answer to the nature of these laws. With Parmenides of old he assumes that what man can intelligently say about reality is true, and only that is true.⁹ That is to say, only that is real which man can reduce to a network of logical relations.

⁹Parmenides taught that reality is static, in contrast to appearances, such that we need reason to link appearance to the unseen ultimate. The effect of this is to deny the reality of the created world. See Chap. 2 note 16.

With Parmenides this led to the denial of the reality of creation out of nothing and of the reality of time. In this he was consistent. In distinction from Parmenides and ancient philosophy in general, the modern philosopher does assert the reality of time and change. But in asserting the reality of time and change he also asserts or assumes the ultimacy of time and change. And so the creation idea is again excluded. The rationalism of Parmenides is merely supplemented by the irrationalism of the idea of chance. The idea of chance is merely the recognition of the failure of man to reduce all things to logical relations. In other words, the irrationalism of modern thought is not radically opposed to the rationalism of ancient thought. On the contrary, modern irrationalism is its natural outgrowth.¹⁰

¹⁰Van Til often alludes to the dialectical tension that governs unbelief between rationalism and irrationalism. Rationalism can never succeed because it requires an irrational step to believe, and irrationalism can never succeed because it needs a rational world in which to hold it. He is critical of those who think the modern condition is purely irrational, because both sides of the dialectic are required, yet here he states that no good critique of irrationalism can succeed if it comes from a rationalist (which is the case for Roman Catholicism).

It is modern irrationalism that the traditional theologian was trying to answer. But he cannot answer this if he himself is something of a rationalist. And this is the case with the Roman theologian. He has allowed that the human mind is right in maintaining that it cannot be said to know unless it can understand exhaustively. Aquinas takes the method of Aristotle as being essentially right in the field of philosophy. Now, while Aristotle may be said to be more empiricist than was Plato, it remains true that he held to essentially the same ideal of knowledge that Plato had. He says specifically and repeatedly that knowledge is of universals and of universals only. That is to say only such knowledge can be said to be scientific knowledge as enables man to reduce facts to logical relations. Therefore knowledge, properly speaking, is only of species.¹¹

¹¹See chapter 4, note 19. Although Aristotle was fascinated by the complexities of our world and sought to categorize everything into rational divisions, his views were not, as is often thought, a reaction to Plato, but were in many ways close to him. The difference is often said to be that for Plato universals exist independently of things (ante rem) and for Aristotle universals exist in things (in re) but not independently of them. So one does not know things in themselves, but only categories, like species, which are logically related groups.

Working with this Aristotelian idea of knowledge, Aquinas asserts that man cannot know what God is, but can know only what he is not. As far as knowledge of God is concerned, the primary relation according to Thomas is that of negation.¹² When he says that reason (by an Aristotelian method) can prove that God exists, this is pointless inasmuch as he adds that it cannot say what God is.¹³ And if he tones this contrast down sometimes by saying that man by reason can know something of the general characteristics of God, this is merely inconsistency. Every man must and does say something about the nature of God. He is clearly consistent with his starting point in Aristotelian logic only when he asserts that man can say nothing of the nature of God. Aristotle himself was not illogical when he concluded that such a God as he could allow for in his system was one who had not created the world and knew nothing of the world. His conception of cause was basically as immanentistic as is that of Kant.¹⁴ And it is therefore logically as little possible to reach the transcendent God of Christianity by means of the logic of Aristotle as it is to reach this God by the logic of Kant. (It is this that Wilber ¹²God is not finite, he is not temporal, etc. Saying God is infinite or eternal is merely another way of expressing the negative contrast. We may only know God analogically, never as he is.

¹³God cannot be known in his quiddity, or in his essence, according to Thomas. What God reveals of himself is not himself.

¹⁴The “unmoved mover” is not caused to move because of any need to actualize potential. So for Aristotle (not for Thomas, who was inconsistent at this point), nature may be drawn to this god, but it cannot be created by him. Although the higher spheres of the heavens closely imitate this god, he is entirely self-contained, and so cannot act in the world or even be aware of it. That is why this part of the doctrine was condemned by the church in 1277. In this, Aristotle resembles Kant with his noumenal-phenomenal distinction. See Chap 7, note 35 quoted here:

³⁵The Kantian term noumenon refers to a thing in itself, which is unknowable. A phenomenon is something knowable, as manifest in human experience. Though unknowable according to Kant, a noumenal reality must be presupposed in order to ensure the reality of the phenomenal, particularly for free will and for ethics (which is the center of religion for Kant). Van Til constantly faults this while idea as both irrationalist and rationalist.

Smith has overlooked in his book Therefore Stand. It is this that is overlooked by the traditional method of apologetics in general. It is this that Gordon H. Clark overlooks in this article “The Primacy of the Intellect.” In The Westminster Theological Journal.¹⁵ Failing to make the distinction between a primacy of the intellect that is based upon the Creator-creature distinction and a primacy of the intellect that is not based upon the Creator-creature distinction, as is the case with the Greeks, Clark argues that it is the primacy of the intellect that saves one from skepticism. But the primacy of the intellect as the Greeks held it has historically and logically led to the skepticism of the modern irrationalists.¹⁶ It is Christianity alone that saves anyone from skepticism.

¹⁵Wilbur M. Smith, Therefore Stand: A plea for a Vigorous Apologetic in te Present Crisis of Evangelical Christianity (Chicago: Moody Press, 1945); Gordon H. Clark, “The Primacy of the Intellect,” Westminster Theological Journal 5 (1943); For a discussion of the primacy of the intellect, see chap 4, “The Usus Instrumentalis of Reason.”

¹⁶“Historically” because, after realizing that rationalism cannot hope to connect with the phenomena, modern philosophers like Pierre Bayle and David Hume gave up on the power of reason to yield very much. “Logically” because rationalism must make exhaustive claims, which are never born out, and so must result in doubt about any certainty at all.

As the result of holding to what is essentially a rationalist view of human reason, Aquinas held to what is virtually an irrationalist view of revelation. If it is said that man by reason can say nothing positive about God, his view of revelation will be that of an irrational assertion that can make no connection with the system of thought that man knows by reason. In other words, the relation between reason and faith as the Romanist holds it has so far catered to the rationalist-irrationalist scheme of non-Christian thought that it cannot meet its claim that there is no knowledge possible of an absolute God.¹⁷

¹⁷In other words, following Thomist thinking, if you begin with human reason, you will make claims about God that are not necessarily revealed by him, since we cannot know him in his essence. The only way out is to begin with God, whose revelation is rational, and who does make known his essence.

What is true of the Romanist is also true of the Arminian. He too has attributed to man a measure of ultimacy. He too has thereby reduced the doctrine of the internal, self-contained infinity of the perfections of God. He too has to an extent enveloped his god with himself in a universe of logic and of fact that is above both. He too, therefore, has not answer to give the modern theologian.¹⁸

¹⁸Recall the earlier discussion of the Arminian view of the mind (see chp 2, note 29)

²⁹Jacob Arminius (1560-1609) argued against Calvinist orthodoxy, that predestination is not unconditional, but based on divine foreknowledge of human decision about grace, which can be resisted. His followers, known as the Remonstrants (from the term for a type of manifesto) were eventually condemned by the Synod of Dort in 1618-1619. After that, a wide variety of theologies known generally as Arminianism penetrated the Protestant church. This view implied a less-than-total depravity and thus some degree of human cooperation with divine grace. In apologetics, according to Van Til, Arminians will give credit to the reasoning process of unbelievers, and thus not challenge them sufficiently to lay bare their presuppositions. He interchangeably labels this apologetics “Arminian” or “empiricist,” because it trusts in an autonomous human activity to reason and measure the world. Van Til often cites Joseph Butler as the exemplar of this approach, but indicts numerous other, including James O. Buswell, Gordon Clark, and C.S. Lewis. Occasionally he includes “Romanists,” presumably because there are commonalities in apologetic method between Roman Catholics, particularly Thomists and Arminians.

It is only in Reformed theology, then, that the doctrine of revelation is held in all the depth and breath of its significance. This is done because the doctrine of God, as quoted from the confession and catechism is held uncompromisingly. Holding this doctrine without qualification implies taking the creation doctrine seriously. And taking the creation doctrine seriously involves thinking of man in his whole constitutional makeup as himself revelational of God.¹⁹ [See chap 3] Being himself exhaustively revelational of God, he is in all his activities dependent upon God. The constitution of his mind therefore interposes no obstruction to any form of revelation that might come to it. Being itself revelational, the mind of man is made for the reception of revelation. [See Jonathan Edwards on this - regarding God’s communication of his glory to created understandings, etc. Fascinating. God made the soul of man a finite replica of himself, having understanding, will, etc. to be able to receive this communication from God.] If Human reason in all of its manipulations is itself in the first place wholly dependent upon a prior revelational activity of God and upon a constant, sustained revelational activity of God, then a supernatural revelational activity will not come to it as something strange. On the contrary, it is only on the assumption that even from the outset of history the human mind never operated except in conjunction with the supernatural positive revelation of God that the original creative revelational character of the human mind is maintained. The Genesis narrative informs us that from the outset God walked and talked with man in the garden. The human reason therefore never functioned properly and could not function properly except in self-conscious relationship to this supernatural revelation. All things about man and within him were creationally revelational of God. Every fact was what it was by virtue of the place that it would occupy in the plan of God for the whole course of history. So then, the mind of man could not presume with Parmenides to legislate by means of logic about the nature of reality. The human mind by its gift of logic was merely supposed to order the facts of reality, both with respect to God and with respect to the created universe, including himself, in self-conscious subordination to the supernatural positive word revelation.

The only change that the fact of sin brought into the picture was therefore the fact that it made man unwilling to be thus obedient to God as manifested to him. This disobedient attitude is exhibited in the case of Parmenides and in the case of every man. Only by the work of Christ in history and by the work of the Spirit in regeneration can men take again the attitude that Adam took in the beginning.²⁰

²⁰As seen before, especially in chap 3, sin charges the covenant relationship of humans with God ethically, but it cannot redefine the conditions for a proper Creator-creature relation.

Thus the Reformed Christian has an effective answer for the modern man. His answer is that the capacities of the human mind would have no opportunity for their exercise except upon the presupposition that the most absolute God does exist and that all things in this world are revelational of him. We grant that it is only by the frank acceptance of the Scriptures as the infallible revelation of God that man can know this. But this only shows that unless one thus accepts the Scripture, there is no place for the exercise of reason. The most absolute God of the confession can only be presupposed. He cannot be proved to exist in the way that the idea of proof is taken by the Romanist-Arminian apologetics. But so far from this fact being unfortunate, it is the one thing that saves the idea of the reasonableness of the Christian religion.²¹

²¹This is the heart of Van Til's apologetics. Beginning with God does not mean denying reason, but affirming it. The error of the classical proofs is that they hold God to the conditions of human rationality, not that any proof is wrong in itself. [codeproofs]

The significance of what has been said for the concept of incomprehensibility may now be intimated. In the first place what is meant by the idea that God is incomprehensible can be noted with any clarity only if it is seen to be involved in the doctrine of the self-contained perfections of God. And it is only in Reformed theology that this doctrine is held without compromise. While then it is true that the incomprehensibility of God is taught by Romanist and Arminian theologians, it is not true that it is taught by them with consistency and with any true recognition of its full significance. In particular, it is only in Reformed theology that this doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God can be set off sharply over against the modern idea of the incomprehensibility of reality.²²

²²Although these considerations were set forth in chap 3, they are now more directly connected to the doctrine of God.

This modern view is based on the assumption that man is the ultimate reference point in his own predication. Then, therefore, man cannot know everything, it follows that nothing can be known. All things being related, all things must be exhaustively known or nothing can be known. And only Reformed theology clearly sets off the Christian position over against all forms of the non-Christian view because it alone makes God the ultimate reference point in all predication.

Such being the case, it is only Reformed theology that does full justice to the idea of revelation in all its comprehensiveness and depth of meaning. It is only if the doctrine of revelation is taken thus seriously that the knowledge of God is assured. Man may be certain that he knows God. More than that, man cannot help but know God. Man's predicament is not, as Henry at one point with the Romanist concedes to the "the fool," that he cannot be certain whether God exists and can be known.²³ Man's predicament is not, as Carnell grants to modern theologians, as to whether man is immortal.²⁴ It is only too surely fixed (in visceribus – in the gut or heart) in the mind of man that God does exist and that man is to meet him in judgment. The sinner's problem from his point of view is to cast doubt upon this evidence, to make it appear as though the evidence were not clear. With the rich man who lifted up his eyes in torment, it is the effort of every man to put the blame for his failure to serve God upon the elusive character of the evidence for God's existence.²⁵ If he could rightly say that God has to be diligently searched for, that he might possibly be hidden in some remote corner of the earth, or the moon, or Jupiter, then he would have an excuse for his ignorance. Following Paul, the Reformed theologian, and he alone, will stress the inescapable character of the revelation of God.

²³A reference to Carl F. H. Henry, Notes on the Doctrine of God.

²⁴A reference to Edward J. Carnell, An introduction to Christian Apologetics

²⁵A reference to the story of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19-31), in which the rich man, speaking from his flames, asks Abraham to send a man back from the dead to impress his brother, to which Abraham replies that they already have the Scriptures, and "If they do not hear Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be convinced if someone should rise from the dead" (v. 31 ESV) Van Til's point is that God is so pervasively present, we have no excuse for ignoring him.

Thus it is clear that the incomprehensibility of God presupposes the revelation of God in all its comprehensiveness. One could not talk about God at all except in terms of his revelation to man. Without the presupposition of God's revelation to man there could be no predication of God at all. God would be not incomprehensible, but inapprehensible. That is, no predication could be made of him or of anything else. Failure to make the presupposition of the self-contained character of God and the doctrines of creation and revelation fundamental in their thinking, the Romanist and Arminian are unable to distinguish clearly between the Christian notion of the incomprehensibility of God and the not-Christian notion of the incomprehensibility of reality. Pg 268

On fully Christian presuppositions, then, the apprehensibility or know ability of God is assumed in any discussion about the comprehensibility or incomprehensibility of God. This is so much the case that it is not even possible to speak of any area of existence as totally inapprehensible. This had been pointed out in the "Report of the Committee Elected by the Fourteenth General Assembly of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church to the Study of the Incomprehensibility of God, Etc."²⁶ This report shows that when Calvin speaks of the essence or of the secret counsel of god as being incomprehensible, this not to be taken as though no predication whatsoever can be made about it.²⁷ Even when Calvin uses the word inapprehensible with respect to the essence of God, this cannot imply the idea of complete ignorance. For when God tells us about his attributes, he is telling us about himself. Every bit of his revelation shows man something of the nature of the essence of God, this cannot imply the idea of complete ignorance. For when God tells us about his attributes, he is telling us about himself. Every bit of this revelation shows man something of the nature of the essence of God. If we speak therefore of the incomprehensibility of God, what is meant is that God's revelation to man is never exhaustively understood by man. As by his revelation to man God says something about himself, so that man knows something about everything that exists, so it is equally true that there is nothing that man knows exhaustively.²⁸

²⁶"Report of the Committee Elected...to the Study of the Incomprehensibility of God." May 22-28, 1947, 10-11. The full report was published a year later as an appendix to the Minutes of the fifteenth General assembly of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church, May 13-18, 1947=8, This a principal document in the controversy between Gordon Clark and twelve members of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, including Van Til, who issued a complaint against his views...

²⁸This point seems simple enough, but the heart of the matter was a comparison between God's knowledge and human knowledge, specifically in reference to the content of knowledge.

It is as impossible for man to know himself or any of the objects of the universe about him exhaustively as it is impossible for man to know God exhaustively. For man must know himself or anything else in the created universe in relation to the self-contained God. Unless he can know God exhaustively, he cannot know anything else exhaustively.

It is only if these two points are taken together – the fact that man knows something about everything, including the very essence of God and on the other hand the fact that he does not know anything exhaustively – that the doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God can be seen for what it is.

In the first place, it is possible in this way to see that the knowledge of God and the knowledge of man coincide at every point in the sense that always and everywhere man confronts that which is already fully known or interpreted by God.²⁹ The point of reference cannot but be the same for man as for God. There is not fact that man meets in any of his investigation where the face of God does not confront him. On the other hand, in this way it is possible to see that the knowledge of God and the knowledge of man coincide at no point in the sense that, in this awareness of meaning of anything, in his mental grasp or understanding of anything, man is at each point dependent upon a prior act of unchangeable understanding and revelation on the part of God. The form of the revelation of God to man must come to man in accordance with his creaturely limitations. God's thought with respect to anything is a unit. Yet it pertains to a multiplicity of objects. But man can think of that unit as involving a number of items only in the form of succession. So Scripture speaks of God as though he were thinking his thoughts step by step. All revelation is anthropomorphic. When God reveals himself to man, he reveals something of the fullness of his being. In God's mind any bit of information that he gives to man is set in the fullness of his one supreme act of self affirmation.

²⁹That divine and human knowledge could find "coincidence at a single point" was affirmed by the "Report of the committee," because the same objects, beliefs, and meanings are in common, even though the mode of the knowledge of them is different. Van Til agrees. But because God knows as the Creator, whereas humans know only re-creatively, humans may now something about everything, in principle.

This is true with respect to every bit of revelation that God gives to man. Accordingly, the fact that man is given more and ever more revelation of God does not tend to reduce the incomprehensibility of God. For man any new revelational proposition will enrich in meaning any previously given revelational proposition. [I've experienced that!] But even this enrichment does not imply that there is any coincidence, that is, identity of content between what God has in his mind and what man has in his mind. [I think he's alluding to equivocal vs analogical knowledge] If there is no identity of content in the first proposition that God gives to man, there can be no identity of content attained by means of any number of additional propositions of revelation that God gives to man. [I think he's alluding to univocal vs analogical knowledge] And there could be identity of content on the first proposition only if there were no first proposition. That is to say, if there could be an identity of content, there would be an always has been an identity of content. There could and would be an identity of content only if the mind of man were identical with the mind of God. It is only on the assumption that the human mind is not the mind of a creature but is itself the mind of the Creator that one can talk consistently of identity of content between the mind of man and the mind of God.³⁰ ³⁰So "identity of content" is acceptable, but only if the difference between the Creator' mode and the creature's mode of knowledge is fully admitted.

In the second place, it is only if we keep the presupposition of the self-contained God and therefore of the all-comprehensiveness of revelation with the consequence that man knows something about everything but know nothing comprehensively, that we can see the importance of the doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God for covenant theology. Covenant theology is Reformed theology. As such it implies the exhaustively personal relationship of man to God. Man never deals with the essence of God as such. He always deals with God. God has self-consciously placed himself before man. It is only in the Reformed faith that one can speak of the divine-human confrontation as over against impersonal views of reality. Emil Brunner speaks as though it is orthodox or traditional theology that is largely impersonalist in its views of the relation of God to man. He speaks of orthodox theology as having turned God into an object of knowledge and of having therewith depersonalized God. This is also the position of Barth and of the so-called existential theology now taught by George Hendry and others. Yet it is only in the traditional conception of Reformed Theology that a full personalistic relationship is maintained. If one does not hold to the traditional doctrine of creation, it is not possible to maintain personalism in the full sense of the term. It is taken for granted by such men as Barth, Brunner, Hendry, Piper, Reinhold and Richard Niebuhr, Ferre, and Homrighausen that the nonpersonalist procedure of modern science is quite correct in its handling of nature and history.³¹ In this they follow the assumption of Kant that man is his own ultimate reference point. But on a truly Christian basis anything whatsoever is revelatory of the personal revelational activity of God. It is only on such a basis that false staticism can be destroyed.³² There is false staticism involved in all non-Christian forms of thought. If one allows that anywhere at all man deals with facts or laws that are not based upon the self-conscious, everlasting self-affirmation of God, one is to that extent bound to a static or fatalistic view of reality. There can be nothing new on a non-Christian basis. On the other hand, all things are new on a non-Christian basis. And dialectical theology, based on an existential philosophy for all its emphasis on the once-for-all-ness of Christianity, is bound to a meaningless staticism at the same time that it is joined to a meaningless flux.

³¹See the earlier references to these theologians, especially in chap 3. Elmer Homrighausen was professor of Christian ethics at Princeton Theological Seminary. His theology was dialectical, similar to that of Karl Barth. He was critical of traditional views on biblical inerrancy. Among his books are Let the Church Be the Church (New York: Abingdon, 1940)

³²A worldview is "static" when purely rationalist (in the manner of Parmenides), and "fluid" when purely irrationalist (in the manner of Heraclitus). As was noted earlier, neither is a stable philosophy.

If theology is to escape false staticism involved in rationalism and false flux theology involved in irrationalism, it will have to affirm with the Reformed faith that God's personal activity confronts man everywhere. Therefore, obedience to God's revelation is the proper attitude for man where he is active in the laboratory or in the house of prayer.

In the third place, the same stress on the revelation of God understood, but never understood exhaustively, by man will save us from making the false distinction between the essence and the content of God's knowledge as being incomprehensible bit by bit, and the mode of God's knowing as always being incomprehensible. Whatever knowledge man has of the being and the secret counsel of God, or of anything else that we may distinguish with respect to God and his works, comes to man as the result of the self-conscious revelational activity of God. God's mode of knowing himself is what it is because God's being is what it is. More than that, there can be no knowledge of anything about God unless there is knowledge of the mode of the knowledge of God. For it is God's knowing himself that is God. And God is God's eternal self-affirmation. God is pure act. It is in the pure act of his eternal self-affirmation that God stands before man in every bit of revelation that he vouchsafes to give to man. Therefore the only way that knowledge of God's mode of knowledge can be denied is by denying knowledge of God. The only way the incomprehensibility of God's mode of knowledge can be affirmed is by affirming also the incomprehensibility of God's being and of anything that God reveals to man.³⁴

In the fourth place, it may be observed that it is only by stressing the comprehensiveness and the inexhaustible character of the idea of revelation that the process of learning can have meaning and history have genuine significance. If man is made the final reference point in predication, knowledge cannot get underway; and if it could get under way, it could not move forward. That is to say, in all non-Christian forms of epistemology there is first the idea that to be understood a fact must be understood exhaustively. It must be reducible to a part of a system of timeless logic. But man himself and the facts of his experience are subject to change. How is he ever to find within himself an a priori resting point? He himself is on the move. The futile effort of Descartes stands out from the efforts of other non-Christian thinkers not because it is essentially different, but only because it is more consistent.³⁵ Every effort of man to find one spot that he can exhaustively understand, either in the world of fact about him or in the world of experience within, is doomed to failure. If we do not with Calvin presuppose the self-contained God back of the self-conscious act of the knowing mind of man, we are doomed to be lost in an endless and bottomless flux.

But granted that man could get started on the way to learning by experience on a non-Christina basis, he could add nothing new to what he already knows. There would be nothing new. If it were known, it would be no longer new. As long as it were new, it would be unknown. Thus the old dilemma – that either man must know everything and he need ask no questions or he know nothing and therefore cannot ask question – remains unsolved except on the basis of the Reformed faith. To affirm the incomprehensibility of God is in the interest of saving men from skepticism. By presupposing the God of eternal self-affirmation man can get on the way to learning because he knows God when he first appears upon the scene. He has knowledge of self for what he really is. He also can add to his knowledge since the new facts of which he learns are already known and not new to God. Therefore they are related to what man already knows in true coherence. In setting out a series of propositions about the revelation of God, as the church has done in its confessions, the Christian may rest assured that he has "the system of the truth" while yet he may add to his knowledge of that system. All his knowledge is analogical of God. God is the original knower, and man is the derivative re-knower. Man knows in subordination to God; he knows as the covenant keeper. If he is not a covenant keeper, he will set the false ideal of knowing even as God knows, by complete coincidence with the contents of the mind of God, and end up by knowing that what he calls knowledge is no true knowledge at all, and that what he calls false submission to authority is the true knowledge of God and of man.

The Incomprehensibility of God

The Apologetic Import of the Incomprehensibility of God

In addition to what has been said in the previous chapter, some further attention must be given to the presentation of the doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God to “the modern man.”¹

¹In this chapter, Van Til pursues the ontological and epistemological issues. While he announces at the outset that he is considering an apologetic to “modern man,” this takes the form of polemics with erring Reformed theologians, especially Buswell, neo-Thomists, Barthians, and new evangelicals, once again.

The modern man is, in the first place, a rationalist. All non-Christians are rationalists. As descendants of Adam, their covenant-breaking representative (Rom. 5:12), every man refuses to submit his mind in the way of obedience to the mind of God. He undertakes to interpret the nature of reality in terms of himself as the final reference point. But to be a rationalist, man must also be an irrationalist.²

²Van Til often alludes to the dialectical tension that governs unbelief between rationalism and irrationalism. Rationalism can never succeed because it requires an irrational step to believe, and irrationalism can never succeed because it needs a rational world in which to hold it. He is critical of those who think the modern condition is purely irrational, because both sides of the dialectic are required, yet here he states that no good critique of irrationalism can succeed if it comes from a rationalist (which is the case for Roman Catholicism).

Man obviously cannot legislate reality by logic. Unwilling to admit that God has determined the laws of reality, man, by implication, attributes all power to chance. As a rationalist he says that only that is possible which he can logically grasp in exhaustive fashion. As an irrationalist he says that since he cannot logically grasp the whole of reality, and really cannot legislate existence by logic at all, it is chance that rules supreme. [This is the reason why man sees evolution as the governing principle behind things, trying to explain things of the world apart from the true knowledge of the true God.]

It is to this rationalist-irrationalist man that the gospel comes with its doctrine of creation and revelation, its doctrine of redemption through grace in Christ. It is quite impossible to challenge the modern man with the gospel of Christ unless this gospel of Christ is set in its widest possible setting. It is that which the Reformed faith tries to do.

As it tries to do this it must not make compromise with Romanism and Arminianism. To the extent that it does so it loses its power. For Romanism and Arminianism are partly rationalist-irrationalist themselves. Is well then that we set off the full Reformed view of the incomprehensibility of God against the modern rationalist-irrationalist view that has obtained since the time of Kant.

In the Christian doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God, the Creator-creature distinction is made fundamental. In the non-Christian view this is not the case. The non-Christian view is monistic.

Note: "The monistic view makes no basic difference between Creator and creature, but rather presents being as uniform, though with gradations between lower and higher forms." Wm Edgar, editor of Van Til's book, Christian Apologetics, pg 31, footnote 3 [Van Til refers to this as "scale of being" in his writings.]

The mere form of words by which we assert the ultimacy of the Creator-creature distinction is insufficient to distinguish clearly between the Christian and the non-Christian forms of the incomprehensibility of God. There are more than enough of non-Christian systems of philosophy, notably the idealist, that also speak of making this distinction basic. But none of these systems mean by this distinction that which the orthodox Christian means by it. for the latter this distinction implies that the triune God, as he has from all eternity existed apart from any relationship to the universe of space and time, is wholly sufficient to himself in his being and knowledge. It implies therefore that God is wholly knowable and wholly known to himself. God is light and in him is no darkness at all.³

³This statement implies a completely dependent creation, as Van Til explains below.

The orthodox idea of the Creator-creature distinction involves further the idea that the world of space and time has been brought into existence by the forth-putting of God's power, by creation out of nothing, by the mere exercise of his will, and not as a necessity of his being. Thus there is no power of any sort operative in the course of history of the world as man knows it that is not, without any qualification, under the control and direction of God. Even that which man accomplishes through his created freedom, through the exercise of his will, is accomplished in subordination to and in accordance with the ultimate will of God. In particular, the evil done by man in thwarting the revealed will of God for his behavior is not done against the all-controlling will or decree of God. We may, if we wish, in connection with the entrance of sin and evil into the world, speak of the permissive will of God in order to stress man's undoubted responsibility for sin, but this distinction may never lead to subversion of the clear teaching of Scripture on the all-controlling, if ultimate and mysterious, power of God.⁴

⁴Van Til concedes to traditional language that distinguishes God's permissive will from his decretive will. The distinction can help clarify God's relation to evil and to human freedom. But ultimately, both are grounded in God's ordination of whatsoever comes to pass.

The moment a Christian theologian admits that anything happens in the whole course of history, whether by devil or man or power of nature, without the will of God, that moment the foundations of a Christian theology are shaken. For to admit that any thing happens outside the will of God is to admit the pagan notion of chance. God by his plan controls whatsoever comes to pass.

It is this assertion of the knowledge of God as naturally and inherently comprehensive of his own being and as all comprehensive of all created being by virtue of his omnipotence over it that the modern man charges with being rationalistic. He who on the basis of the Scripture dares to assert the omnipotence and therefore the omniscience of God without any qualification, is certain to meet with this charge of determinism and rationalism is that of destroying the foundation of human freedom and responsibility, of making God the author sin, etc. The average reader of the New York Times or the Evening Bulletin knows little of Calvinism, except its doctrine of election, by which, it is said, Calvinism designs men to everlasting perdition no matter what they do.⁵

⁵At the popular level, one often hears that divine sovereignty, God's full control means determinism.

Good points here!

What is the Christian theologian to do about this charge? Is he to tone down the all-determining character of God's plan in order at least part way to meet the critics? Is he to preserve so much of it as is necessary for the idea of order in the universe and then counterbalance it with a measure of indeterminism in order to save face the defender of human freedom and morality? This is the policy of the Romanist and of the Arminian. It is also the policy of some Reformed theologians. So, for instance, J. Oliver Buswell Jr., in dealing with the relation of God to the morality of man, speaks of the "free, undetermined acts of moral agents." And of the moral choices of human beings as those "in which we are ourselves the ultimate cause." In flat contradistinction from Calvin, Buswell refuses to speak of God as the ultimate cause of all things. In answering to Pighius and other critics who said that to speak of God as the ultimate cause of all things is to reduce both human rationality and morality to nonsense, Calvin replied that the exact reverse was true.⁸

⁸Albert Pighius was the subject of Calvin's polemics, especially in the matter of predestination and responsibility. See Institutes of the Christian Religion, 3.21.5-17.

He argued in effect that unless God is thought of as the ultimate cause of all things, there is no significance or meaning to the thoughts and acts of man. Unless there is back of the thoughts and deeds of man the all-inclusive and therefore also all-controlling plan of God, human thought and human action happens in a void.

Rejecting this approach Buswell follows the policy of the Romanist and the Arminian. When called upon to meet the charge of determinism, he does what Thomas Aquinas and the Arminian theologians did, namely, steer a middle course between determinism and indeterminism, between realism and nominalism.⁹ “I do not think that every act of the will of God is determined by the nature of God, nor that everything in the nature of God is controlled by the will of God.” [Buswell, What is God? 46]

⁹Determinism holds that every event is directly caused. Indeterminism holds that some events are without a cause. Realism maintains that a thing exists. Nominalism states that the name or category in which things are grouped is only a name; universals are not truly real. Thomas Aquinas was called a “modified realist” because he could not accept either realism or nominalism in its extreme form. (See chap 5, note 13). Van Til rejects the propriety of these distinctions altogether, believing that God causes all things, but not in such a way as to violate the significance of the creature, and that particulars and universals, rightly understood, are equally valid in the created world.

What is the reason for thus holding that some things are not determined by the nature of God and that others are not determined by the will of God? The answer is given as follow:

If, on the one hand, the will of God is completely determined by the nature of God, then God is not free in his saving work and God’s redemptive program is not a matter of grace, but a matter of necessity. If, on the other hand, all wisdom, holiness, righteousness, goodness, and truth in the nature of God are completely determined by the will of God, then the moral law in every aspect is a matter of mere power, then God’s redemptive program is purely arbitrary, and there is no ontological reason for the sacrifice of the Son of God. God might just as well have arbitrarily accepted the offering of Cain as the offering of Abel, and God might just as well have arbitrarily decreed redemptive value through the robbery of Barabbas as through the sacrificial death of his Son. [Buswell]

With respect to this approach, the following observations are in order:

1. A sharp antithesis is made between the nature of God and the will of God. To be “completely determined by the nature of God” is for Buswell identical in meaning with the idea of impersonal fate. To be free, God’s own will must be relieved from complete determination by the nature of God. And since the redemptive program of God for man is sovereign and gracious, this program must not be “completely controlled by the nature of God.” We are to think of God’s will and of his work of grace in redemption as partially rather than completely controlled by the nature of God. To be completely controlled by God’s nature, God’s will and its acts in saving grace would not be “free”; but to be partially controlled, God’s will and its acts would be free and gracious. But until an answer is forthcoming regarding to what extent the will of God may be controlled by the nature of God without losing its freedom, the distinction is meaningless. And the answer to this question of the extent of the relation of freedom and necessity cannot be answered till the one who replies has reached omniscience.¹²

¹²Van Til ties Buswell’s idea of limited sovereignty to the need for human omniscience, in order to know where to draw the line between what God ordains and what he does not.

2. It may be replied that Buswell does not partially separate, but at some points wholly separates the freedom of the will of God from the necessity of the nature of God. Does he not say that “not every act of the will of God is determined by the nature of God”? That seems to indicate that he thinks of some acts of the will of God as having no relation whatever to the nature of God. The question in this quotation seems to be one not of complete or partial determination, but of any or no determination.

But if the will of God is free in some of its actions because these actions are not at all determined by the nature of God, what then of the other actions of the will of God? Are they not at all free because they are determined by the nature of God? If so, how can man know which actions of God's will are and which are not free? And is the will of God then a unity because it is the expression of the personality of God? It is such questions as these that one must answer if one interprets the nature of God in terms of determinism and realism and the will of God in terms of indeterminism and nominalism. [See not 9 above] This can be done consistently only by one who does not make the Creator-creature distinction basic to his thought.

The initial and basic error of Buswell lies in seeking the freedom of the will of God at any point either partially or wholly by way of contrast with the nature of God. The freedom of God is the freedom of God. And what is God apart from his nature? God is a spirit, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness and truth. God as the Spirit is the self-contained personal God. His personality is nothing apart from his nature. God is free not in spite of but because of the necessity of his nature. God's necessary self-existence constitutes his freedom. It is only by emphasizing this fact that we can escape being thrown back and forth upon the horns of the realist-nominalist or determinist-indeterminist dilemma. [see note 9 above]

3. It may be asked further whether in asserting that some acts of the will of God are not determined by the nature of God, Buswell has met the charge of determinism as made by the non-Christian who believes in chance. If everything happens because God wills that it should happen, says the reader of the New York Times or the Evening Bulletin, then if I am saved, I am saved, and if I am not saved there is nothing that I can do about it. To him it makes no difference whether it is said that it is God's will, rather than his nature, that determines man and his universe.

Buswell seeks to protect the freedom of the will of man from determination of it by the will of God. [the classic mantra of Arminianism and all unbelievers.] The method he follows is naturally the same in the case of defending the freedom of the will of man against the all-determining power of the will of God as that employed in defending the freedom of the will of God against the all-determining power of the nature of God. It is again a matter of making them partially though not wholly dependent on the will of God. [Man always want to get his will in there, again, defending his assumed autonomy.] Note the following words:

This is good!

God of his mere good pleasure chose to endow man with freedom of actions so that, as created by God, man's actions are not entirely determined from without, but in some respects (though not in all respects) God has given to man the privilege of being an ultimate cause somewhat similar to a creative cause. There are many things in human life, of course, which are not subject to human volition. We might even admit that ninety-nine percent of all our actions are determined by forces outside of ourselves. Nevertheless, our moral choices are choices in which we are ourselves the ultimate cause. [Buswell, What is God, 50]

[This is man putting himself into the room of God, who alone is the true fountain and first (or ultimate) cause! We are, however, in a proper sense, genuine or second causes - we do what seems best to us, that is, we are not puppets or block of wood.]

Key points following:

In the first part of this passage Buswell speaks of “man’s actions” in general. In the latter part of the passage, he speaks of man’s moral actions as a separate group of actions. Presumably the first phrase includes the latter. Human actions in general would seem to include the narrower class of moral actions. Of all human actions, including moral actions, it is said that they are “not entirely determined from without.” [A textbook Arminian view.] They are therefore partially determined from without. In the latter part of the quotation, it is said that we might even admit that in 99 percent of all our actions we are determined by forces outside of ourselves. And it is added that in the remaining 1 percent of our actions “we are ourselves the ultimate cause.” In the first part of the quotation mans’ actions without distinction are said to be partially determined from without and partially by ourselves. In the last part of the quotation some actions (99 percent) are determined from the outside, and some actions (1 percent) are determined exclusively by ourselves.

Would the indeterminist reader of the Evening Bulletin now be satisfied? He might catch at the brief sentence in which it is said without qualification that our moral choices are choices in which we are ourselves the ultimate cause. He would say that this does away with the Calvinist notion of election, of God’s determining whether I shall “will” or not “will” to be saved. If it does not mean this, then what is meant by my being the ultimate cause of my actions? And he will be comforted by the worlds of Buswell pertaining to human faith in its relation to election in the immediate context of the passage already quoted. Buswell says:

The ground of our salvation is the mere good pleasure of our gracious Lord. He is under no compulsion whatever to save any of the rebellious race of Adam, but of his mere good pleasure and sovereign grace he has elected to save those who, he foreknew, would put their faith and trust in the crucified and risen Savior. All who will believe will be save because God in his sovereign grace elects to save them. All who will not believe will be lost because they will not believe. [Buswell, What is God? 52] [This is the classic error of Arminianism.]

Here election seems to be made dependent upon foreseen faith. God elects only those who he knew would put their faith in Christ. The reader of the Bulletin will not be able to distinguish this from the ordinary Arminian with of stating the matter. And he will rejoice in the concession to indeterminism.¹⁷

¹⁷In traditional Reformed theology, predestination and foreknowledge imply one another. Biblically they are virtually identical.

The indeterminist may seek further comfort from the fact that, according to Buswell, God’s foreknowledge is made independent of his predestination of all things in the universe. He speaks of the foreknowledge of God as including the ‘undetermined, free acts of moral creatures.’ [Buswell, What is God? 39]

The indeterminist, however, will not be satisfied. Nothing can satisfy him that does not ascribe to man the sort of freedom that consistent orthodox Christian theology ascribes to God. Even to ascribe so much freedom to man as Romanism or Arminianism ascribes to God is not sufficient in his eyes. For the God of Romanism and of Arminianism is partly (perhaps 1 percent) determined in his choices. And the indeterminist wants to be free without any limitations.

It is true, of course, that there are many inconsistent non-Christian indeterminists and irrationalists. But those who wish to hold to indeterminism consistently must reject every type of control over man. Modern existentialism comes near to holding such a consistent indeterminism. When Heidegger speaks of reality as exhaustively temporal, as being reality unto the end or unto death, he is aiming to suggest the idea of utter interminacy.¹⁹

¹⁹Martin Heidegger (1889-1976) is the author of Being and Time (originally published in 1927), In it he argues that freedom is not rational, but can be found in connection with non-metaphysical being. See Van Til, "The Later Heidegger and Theology," which appears to be an extended review of Robinson and Cobb....

So, then, all the concessions Buswell is willing to make, when he contrasts the will of God with the nature of God and again ascribes ultimacy to the will of man as over against the will of God, will not help in the least to remove the charge of determinism.

And what is true with respect to the charge of determinism is therefore also true with respect to the charge of rationalism. The indeterminist will point out that Buswell would have to be omniscient in order to make his position intelligible, and that we all should have to be omniscient in order to understand him. We are said to be free in our moral choices. Which are these moral choices? How do we distinguish between them and the nonmoral choices? Where is the borderline? Surely our moral choices are influenced by things that happen about us without our control There is the whole question of 'natural evil' and its influence on our choices. Heredity and environment have great influence on our moral choices, and there is no possibility of pointing to one choice in which we are not influenced at all. If Buswell wants to fall back on his own distinction to the effect that all our choices are partially determined and partially free, then the question of degree comes up that can never be settled without benefit of omniscience.²⁰

²⁰At this point Van Til opens a lengthy parenthesis, which allows him to explore Kierkegaard, Hegel and Calvin.

It is to me be noted that on his presuppositions the indeterminist and irrationalist is right in pressing his point. He is not merely pointing out the internal inconsistencies in a position that seeks to build up its structures partly in terms of the God of Christianity and partly in terms of would-be ultimate man. He is after the destruction of the Christian position itself. Working on his monistic assumption, he must hold that unless man can exhaustively reduce all factual historical existence to changeless logical relations, there is that which is utterly undetermined and unknowable. [a theory or doctrine that denies the existence of a distinction of duality in some sphere, such as that between matter and mind or God and the world. For example, monism is the belief that the mind and the brain are the same thing. – Google definitions.] This argument has been stated in great detail by Kierkegaard against Hegel. Kierkegaard speaks of Hegel's "System" and ridicules it. By seeking to show by logical manipulation how all reality must be what it is, argues Kierkegaard, Hegel kills all uniqueness and all genuine newness in history. Genuine historical uniqueness, argue Kierkegaard, is unpredictable. It cannot be systematized by logic.²¹

²¹Kierkegaard's principal critique of Hegel is his Either/Or; a standard English version is 2 vols. In a famous passage, "the Judge" criticizes the "young seducer" for being aesthetic, remaining outside the arena of active life (2:175) Hegel's system was purely intellectual according to Kierkegaard, never engaging in ethics and moral choices. See chap 10, note. 1

The assumption back of Kierkegaard's position is the common monistic one. He takes for granted that unless man can himself place all factual existence into logical categories, there is no existential system at all. To be sure, Kierkegaard says that there is an existential system in "God," but this is a meaningless assertion on his part, since on this basis man can know nothing of such a God. Such a "God" is for him an article of faith in the Kantian sense of faith, namely, as a practical rather than a theoretical notion.²²

²²Van Til sides with Kierkegaard's criticism of Hegel as a rationalist, yet faults Kierkegaard for his own irrationalism. Ultimately, though, both Kierkegaard and Hegel fall into a kind of irrationalism because they have a monistic view of reality, which knows only of universals or particulars. Below, he opposes both of them to Calvin, whose God is fully rational.

But if, from Kierkegaard's point of view, Hegel is to be called a rationalist, how much the more the orthodox Christian. It is the orthodox Christian, to the extent that he is consistent with his own principles, and he alone, that holds to the idea of all reality being exhaustively determined by the will of God and therefore exhaustively known by the mind of God. Hegel does not believe in such a God at all. He does not believe in the idea of God as a constitutive concept. For him the idea of a god is a limiting concept. And this makes all the world of difference. The modern idea of the limiting concept is based on the monist assumptions that unless man can himself logicize reality, that is, show how all factual existence is reducible to loci in a network of logical relations, to that extent reality is irrational. And so the very rationalism of Hegel is the expression of utter skepticism and irrationalism.

Kierkegaard should have directed his shafts at Calvin rather than at Hegel. It is Calvin rather than Hegel who believes that there actually is a system of reality and knowledge. Calvin does and Hegel does not believe that there is a self-contained ontological Trinity who exhaustively knows himself by virtue of the nature of his existence and who exhaustively knows the universe by virtue of the fact that he determines all that happens in it.

We may therefore imagine Hegel and Kierkegaard as standing together as irrationalists and indeterminists against Calvin the rationalist and determinist.²³ They will say to Calvin that since it is impossible for him to know the mind of God exhaustively by his own admission and assertion, therefore he ought with them to become an irrationalist. Calvin would reply: "I can understand why you should say so. You are on your assumptions quite consistent in saying so. For if all reality is on one piece, as you assume, then the human mind and the divine mind are also of one piece. [One piece - The monistic view as opposed to a dualistic view, that God is distinct from his creatures, the Creator-creature distinction. Also, the equivocal (our thoughts the same as God's thoughts but of different degree) vs. the analogical interpretation of the things of God - if I'm interpreting Van Til right. Now you can see how pantheistic the monistic view is, that God is in everything since there is one ultimate substance in the universe...it's all one piece.] The divine mind does not then know anything more, and the divine will does not then control anything more, than does the human mind and the human will. There is then no point in appealing to the divine mind as knowing that which the human mind does not know, and there is then no sense to speaking of the divine mind as revealing anything to the human mind. There is then either no mystery at all, either to the divine mind or to the human mind, or there is mystery to both the divine mind and the human mind. And since there obviously is mystery to the human mind, I conclude that there is mystery also to the divine mind. I conclude, in short, that reality is ultimately mysterious. But then, you see, I work on the presupposition of God as being the Creator and controller of man.

"I begin with making this distinction. I have frankly accepted the distinction on the authority of Scripture. And it will seem reasonable to you that on my assumption it is reasonable that I should do so. If man is to know about this divine mind which stands above him as his Creator and therefore as his lawgiver, he will be dependent on the divine mind for a voluntary revelation of itself. The voluntary character of this revelation appears not only if and when this God speaks to man in directly personal way; it appears no less in every fact of the created universe. For the created universe itself owes its existence to a voluntary act of God. It is intelligible only if seen as such.

"If then every fact that confronts me is revelational of the personal and voluntary activity of the self-contained God, it follows that when I try to think God's thoughts after him, that is to say, when by means of the gifts of logical manipulation that this Creator has given to me, I try to make a 'system' of my own, my system will be at no point a direct replica of the divine system [equivocally], but will at every point be analogical [analogically] of the system of God. It can at no point be a direct replica, because to say so would be to wipe out the very foundation on which I am working. To say so would also mean that man is after all not the creature of God but has in his mind just what God has in his mind. [again, seeing God, etc., equivocally as opposed to analogically] Man could then reduce all factual existence to logical relations. He could then predict all future eventuation in history. [This is the foundation of technical analysis of stock prices!] On the other hand, since the human mind is created by God and is therefore in itself naturally revelational of God, the mind may be sure that its system is true and corresponds on a finite scale to the system of God. This is what we mean by saying that it is analogical to God's system. It is dependent upon God's system, and by being dependent upon God's system it is on necessity a true system. I hold therefore that it is possible for the human being to have what you call and existential system. But I also hold that the human mind, in all the propositions that it makes by means of its logical facilities, is confronted with facts that are what they are in the last analysis because of the existential system that is God's. Therefore when God tells me something that pertains directly to his own being apart from the world, I may repeat on the level of my experience the words that he has spoken. When he, for instance, tells me that he has existed from all eternity before the foundation of the world, I may repeat his words and say, 'God is eternal,' but it is evident that God has, and I have not, grasped fully what God means. God knows himself exhaustively, and I know him truly but not exhaustively. [Key point! Hence, we know what He is like (analogically), not what he actually is (equivocally). The bible was written, God speaking to us, analogically - God lowering himself to our level of imbecility as Owen puts it.] Moreover, what holds true of things that God tells me about himself holds true of everything God tells me about myself or the world. Even of the things that I observe with my senses, with respect to the things that you are accustomed to speaking of as belonging to the realm of science or to the realm of the phenomenal world, it remains true on my presuppositions that I do not comprehend them exhaustively. All the facts of the phenomenal world are incomprehensible to me precisely because they are what they are by virtue of the voluntary action of the will of God with respect to them. They are what they are, they occupy a place in the scheme of things spatio-temporal, because God by his plan and by the execution of his plan in the works of creation and providence makes them what they are. They are in the last analysis as incomprehensible to me as is God himself. My idea of the incomprehensibility of God therefore presupposes his true knowability. And his true knowability is based on the fact that I am his creature and that all things created are made by him. I could therefore not even assert the incomprehensibility of God unless I presupposed the knowability of God. It is therefore upon the idea that all phenomenal reality, whether within the mind of man or surrounding it, is what it is because of the result of the activity of the will of God as revelational of his character - upon this I base the doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God.

"In my doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God I am, therefore, not siding with you, Mr. Kierkegaard, as over against Hegel. On the contrary, from my point of view you are both irrationalists. Both of you deny the knowability of God, and both of you should, if you were consistent, deny the knowability of anything. You cannot make intelligible to me how anything can be known unless you presuppose my God, who knows all because he controls all. My notion of the incomprehensibility of God is, therefore, as the poles apart from what is today called modern irrationalism. And from your points of view, my doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God must be hopelessly determinist and rationalist. The doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God as I hold it presupposes that God is wholly known to himself and that he wholly knows his created world. It presupposes further that man, as created by God in his image, does know and cannot help but know God. Even you, Mr. Hegel, will have to admit that you are as averse to such rationalism, so such alte Metaphysik, as is Mr. Kierkegaard.

"I do not therefore intend to make any concessions to either of you. I can make no concessions that would satisfy you unless I were willing to sacrifice my entire position on the knowability of God. If I made any concessions to you, they would have to be to the effect that in my system I do not have a genuine though finite or analogical replica of the existential system of God. That is to say, I should have to renounce the genuine knowability of anything at all. I should have to be utterly skeptical. I submit that unless you interpret reality in terms of the God of the Scripture by whom all things consist and are what they are, you cannot even make intelligible to yourself your own position. So I am really asserting the incomprehensibility of God in order to avoid the destruction of the possibility of predication in any field whatsoever [the parenthesis ends here.]

Returning now to Buswell's position, it is plain that, together with the positions of Romanism and Arminianism, it makes the fatal mistake of trying to appease the foes of the Christian faith by making such concessions as shake the foundation of the Christian faith, the foundation of knowledge – without any prospect of winning its opponents. It is not reasonable to expect to win the opponents to the Christian position if we do not carefully set off the Christian position from that of its opponents.

The following is an excellent teaching on what Arminians believe, how they see God and man, etc.: this will give you a more in depth understanding of our fallen nature, our mind, etc. represented by Arminianism, that God is transforming into His image. See Romans 12:2, Phil. 2:13. Van Til nails it here. Mull this heretical concept of man's autonomy or ultimacy. This is what God is weaning us off of day by day, year by year. And the only way it progresses meaningfully, is by a diligent study and meditation of the Scriptures. Otherwise, we subject ourselves to routine self-frustration, no peace, restlessness, etc.

In what has been said so far, stress was laid upon the idea that God controls and therefore knows all things. It is because of this claim that Christianity is frequently charged with rationalism. To this must be added that man does not know and cannot ever expect to know God or anything else exhaustively. He never has and never can expect to have in his mind exactly the same thought content that God has in his mind. As a creature of God man never knows God “adequately.” He knows pro mensura humana (according to human measure). This contention is not contrary to but rather involved in the first contention with respect to the all-comprehensiveness of God's knowledge. If we hold to the first, we must also hold to the second. For if we hold to the first, then and then only have we thought of the human mind as really derivative and wholly dependent at every point on the mind of God and its prior activity. Romanists and Arminians do not hold to the first, and therefore they do not hold to the second. The do not hold to the first because to hold to the first would be to deny that the human mind has ultimacy, and this not Romanist or Arminian is willing to do. Holding to the ultimacy of the human mind in some respect, the Romanist and the Arminians can then also maintain – and even must, to be consistent – that the relation between the divine and the human mind is similar to that of a teacher to a pupil. The teacher knows many things that the pupil does not know. Yet the teacher tells the pupil what he knows, and there is no reason at all why the pupil should not eventually know as much as the teacher. Nor is there any reason why the pupil should not understand a single proposition made by the teacher as well as the teacher himself. The teacher may understand some of the implications of a proposition that he has made to the pupil, while the pupil does not understand these implications at a certain time. But when the teacher adds new propositions to the first one, these implications will gradually become clear to the pupil as well as to the teacher. There is only a gradational difference between the two. The teacher and what the teacher knows are incomprehensible to the pupil until the teacher reveals what he knows to the pupil. The possibility of the pupil's understanding the teacher in what he says rests upon the fact that both are operating under the same conditions and limitations. The teacher does not know everything because he does not control everything. Particularly, he does not control the pupil's mind. The teacher therefore cannot predict the future because the future is not wholly under his control. He cannot be sure that the laws of logic by means of which he makes predictions fit wholly into the facts of the universe about which he is making assertions. So there is mystery for him in the same way that there is mystery for the pupil. Both the teacher and the pupil look up to the impersonal laws of logic that are independent of them both, as neither of them controls the facts of reality by means of his power.

It is true that Romanism and Arminians will not put the matter as plainly as this. They want to maintain the Creator-creature relationship, but, in the last analysis, their teaching with respect to the ultimacy or autonomy of the human mind accounts for their compromise with the non-Christian view of the relation between God and man as illustrated by the teacher-pupil relationship. According to all non-Christian thought, man is potentially divine. Man is not really dependent upon God. Man is not created by God. The world is not under the providential control of God. So the mind of man may eventually know all things.

Even if, with modern idealism, the knowledge of all things by man is held to be a mere limiting concept so that man may never at any given time expect to know all things, it remains true that God and man are on this view essentially subject to the same limitations. The reason why according to modern idealism man can never expect to know all things at any given time is that God cannot either. The reason lies in the fact that the rationalistic ideal of comprehensive knowledge is counterbalanced with the irrationalistic assumptions that reality is never exhaustively knowable to any mind.

Thus the two positions, the Christian and the non-Christian, stand squarely over against one another. Affirming the primacy of the Creator-creature relationship, the Christian position, consistently expressed in the Reformed faith, maintains that man does not at any point have in his mind exactly the same thought content that God has in his mind. When his God makes a revelational proposition to him, such as that he, God, is eternal, man in repeating this proposition says the God is eternal. The reference point is the same but the content is not. Being subject to no conditions, himself the source of all conditions of man,²⁵ God at once sees the significance of such a proposition in all the depth of its meaning. God knows the meaning of this proposition in all the fullness of its significance because he knows it in relationship to all other propositions that he will make or will not make to man. If God had made all the revelational propositions that he will ever make to man about himself, even then man could not have the same thought content in his mind that God has in his mind unless he were himself divine.

²⁵Recall the earlier discussion of Gordon Clark's views, where Van Til insisted on a common reference point between divine and human knowledge, on condition that the Creator-creature relationship be properly respected.

Man can never experience the experience of God. An endless number of added propositions does not change the matter in the least. Added revelation has in the past enriched and no doubt will hereafter enrich the fullness of meaning that man possesses when he responds to this revelation in his confession and adoration, but added revelation cannot wipe out the difference between the experience of the self-contained ontological Trinity and the experience of the created man. [Finitude cannot comprehend infinitude.] When man says the God is eternal, he can, because of his own limitations, think of God only as being very old. He can think of eternity only in terms of endless years.²⁶

²⁶Recall earlier discussions of Thomas Aquinas's way of negation.

In saying this we are not for a moment slipping into modern irrationalism. We do not speak vaguely of the oceanic depths of God, that is reality, and of the impossibility of emptying out this depth by means of teacups of our understanding. Nor do we with Thomas Aquinas assert that our knowledge of God is by remotion only.²⁷

²⁷That is, a regress from contingency, for example, cause and effect, to ultimacy, for example a first cause.

Key points on rationalism and irrationalism:

To speak of the infinity of reality and of its unfathomability by the understanding – in short, to be an irrationalist – is quite consistent with being a rationalist. For the essence of rationalism springs from the idea of the ultimacy or autonomy of the mind of man. And on this basis irrationalism is in agreement with rationalism. The only difference between the two is the irrationalism is sophisticated or worn-out rationalism: it is rationalism that knows it is lost in the forests of irrationalism. But irrationalism, though knowing that enlarging ever so much the clearing it has made in the woods of the “bad infinite,” will always find more wilds to conquer, is not a rejection of the principle of rationalism.

In contrast with this the Christian position with respect to man’s not knowing at any point just what God knows is based upon the presupposition of the self-contained God of Scripture. And this presupposition is the death of both rationalism and irrationalism. It is the death of both because it alone maintains the full dependence of the mind of man upon the mind of God.²⁸

²⁸This is the heart of the antithesis: rationalism and irrationalism, versus the fully rational, self-contained God of the Bible.

So then when man says that God is eternal, he is saying something positive about the being of God even though, as far as his own conceptualization is concerned, he cannot think of this eternity otherwise than in terms of the passage of years. He is saying something positive because of the fact that all the facts of the universe, and especially the facts of his own experience, are a positive revelation of the nature or character of God. It is this fact of the priority of the positive relation of God to the world in the way of creation and providence, in the way of man’s creation in the image of God, that saves from skepticism. The Christian idea of human knowledge as analogical of God’s knowledge is therefore the only position in which man, who cannot control or know anything in the ultimate comprehensive sense of the term, can nevertheless be assured that his knowledge is true.

Great summary here:

To say therefore that the human mind can know even one proposition in its minimal significance with the same depth of meaning with which God knows that proposition is an attack of the Creator-creature relationship and therewith an attack on the heart of Christianity. And unless we maintain the incomprehensibility of God as involved in and correlative to the idea of the all-controlling power and knowledge of God, we shall fall into the Romanist and Arminian heresy of making the mind of man at some points as ultimate as is the mind of God.

The Doctrine of the Trinity and Related Heresies

The History of the Doctrine

The full statement of biblical truth on the doctrine of the Trinity is the fruit of a long and laborious process of Scripture interpretation. A knowledge of this history is particularly helpful in order for us to note the types of heresy against which the doctrine has been formulated.

The Trinity is of the utmost practical significance to us. After discussing various attributes of God, Calvin says: “But there is another special mark by which he designates himself, for the purpose of giving a more intimate knowledge of his nature. While he proclaims his unity, he distinctly sets it before us as existing in three persons. These, we must hold, unless the bare and empty name of Deity merely is to flutter in our brain without any genuine knowledge.” Calvin does not merely mean that God has, as a matter of fact, revealed himself as Trinity. This true, but he also seems to say that God cannot exist otherwise than in trinitarian fashion. To quote Warfield, “According to Calvin, then, it would seem, there can be no such thing as a monadistic God; the idea of multiformity enters into the very notion of God.” By saying that God’s essence is simple and that the three persons are equal to one another as to their divinity, the Church has set itself in opposition to all forms of non-Christian thought. The Trinity is not a speculative doctrine of little significance. Every type of heresy is, in the last analysis, an attack upon the Trinity. Bavinck says, “The essence of Christianity, the absolute self-revelation of God in the person of Christ, and the absolute self-communication of God in the Holy Spirit, could only be maintained if they have their foundation and principle in the ontological trinity.” [It is likely that this favorite expression of Van Til’s, the “ontological Trinity,” derives from Bavinck.] Bavinck speaks of the ontological Trinity. This is important. All non-Christian thought would have us think of God as one aspect of the universe as a whole. In one way or another, all heresies bring in the space-time existence as the other aspect of the universe as a whole. This is clearly characteristic of present-day heresies. Here, in fact, lies the bond of connection between ancient and modern heresies. For this reason, the church has emphasized the fact that the ontological Trinity, that is, the Trinity as it exists in itself, apart from its relation to the created universe, is self-complete, involving as it does the equal ultimacy of unity and plurality.¹³ [13On the equal ultimacy of the one and the many, see chap 2 note 15.]

¹⁵This view stands in strong contrast to the so-called classical apologetics, which absolutizes the law of contradiction (despite claims to ground it in the deity). Thus, Van Til here and throughout is fond of saying that there is “equal ultimacy” of the one and the many, derived from the Trinity. Strictly according to Aristotle’s absolute laws of logic, this would be impossible.

But it was a long and arduous road by which the church reached its high doctrine of the Trinity.

The first period of the history of the doctrine of the Trinity, A.D. 1-325, was characterized by the effort to show that the Christ of history is the second person of the Godhead. When Christians worshiped Christ as God, they were charged with polytheism. Men were willing to identify Christ with the Logos of the Gnostics.¹⁵

¹⁵Gnosticism was a complex set of teachings widespread in the ancient world, and with repercussions to our own day. It generally held that salvation was through knowledge (gnosis), which could take one away from the material world of evil to the spiritual realm of the good. Often, it believed in some sort of mediator, such as a demiurge, a Logos, or even a docetic Christ (one who was neither truly incarnate nor could suffer). It was consistently attacked both in the New Testament and the church fathers.

They were willing to think of Christ as a sort of being midway between God and man. It was only in this way, they thought, that they could find the unity between the eternal and the temporal that they needed. Greek thought spoke of God as the absolutely other than this world, as the silent abyss, and of the Logos as the means of self-expression for God in the universe. Naturally, this type of speculation was opposed to the idea of the self-contained being of God.

The apostolic fathers of the first and second centuries had already begun the fight against Ebionitism and Docetism.¹⁶ They did not go far beyond direct Scripture statements in their discussion of the Trinity. Little equipped were they to show that with this self-revelation of God they possessed the only defensible philosophical system of truth.

¹⁶These are heresies from the early church. The Ebionites took a vow of poverty (ebyonim) and on the whole espoused much of the Jewish ceremonial law. Jesus, for them, was a human prophet whose father was Joseph and who did not preexist. The Docetics taught that Christ could not really have suffered if he truly were divine. Close to Gnostics, they held that Jesus was a messenger from outside the present evil world who came to guide the enlightened out of it. Van Til points out that before the doctrinal definitions laid down in the creeds and councils, the fathers simply appealed to Scripture in order to respond to these heresies.

In the second century, the apologists, especially Justin Martyr, brought out the divinity of Christ more clearly. “But,” Bavinck says, “the immanent relation between Father and Son is not yet clear in the case of Justin Martyr.” “It still seems as though the Son was generated in the interest of the creation of the world. It is still presented as though God in himself is the hidden God, in contrast to the Son as the revealed God. Similarly, there is very little in Justin Martyr about the divine nature of the Spirit and his ontological relation to the Son and the Father.

Irenaeus, Tertullian, Origen

Irenaeus made a great advance by opposing the Gnostic concept of God and of the Logos. Bavinck says, "The Logos was as it were relieved of his twofold nature and place on the divine side."¹⁹ Though not always consistent with himself, Irenaeus opposed the idea of the hidden God (buthos) as contrasted to the Son. This was a great advance. It showed that God did not in any wise need the universe as a medium of self-expression; he was self-expressed in the Trinity.

Tertullian supplements Irenaeus by insisting that, though the Son and the Spirit are a unit with the Father, the Godhead is not only unity, but also Trinity.²⁰ Irenaeus had not emphasized this side of the matter sufficiently. With respect to Tertullian, Bavinck says:

In spite of the fact that he does not always fully transcend subordinationism, and does not sufficiently distinguish between the ontological, the cosmological and the soteriological in the doctrine of the Trinity, he has furnished the concepts and the words which the doctrine of the Trinity required for its formulation. He has substituted filiation for the Logos-speculation, and in this way separated the ontological Trinity from cosmological speculation. And he has been the first who has tried to derive the Trinity of persons, not from the person of the Father, but from the essence of God. [Bavinck, GD, 2:228; RD, 2:284]

Origen also fell into the error of subordinationism.²² He stressed the unity of the Son with the Father, but in order to maintain the diversity that he knew was needed, he made a distinction between the essence of the Father and the essence of the Son. The Father was once more, in the Greek fashion, thought of as the most ultimate being, as much higher than the Son as the Son is higher than the world.

²²Origen (ca. 185-254) was one of the greatest of the Greek church fathers. His Against Celsus responds to a pagan attack on the Christian faith. In it he argues that God the Father is the Creator, God the Son is the eternal Logos, and God the Holy Spirit brings the gift of salvation to men and women. This trinitarian view lies at the basis for the orthodox expressions of Athanasius and the Cappadocian Fathers. At the same time, Origen taught that though the three are equal, the Son and the Spirit are subordinate to the Father. Subordinationism at its extreme was taught by the Arians.

Arianism

Charles Hodge points out that many followers of Origen, such as Dionysius of Alexandria, and especially Arius, taught a doctrine much lower than that of Origen. According to Arius, Christ was created not from the substance of the God, “but ek ouk ontoon [not truly from], and therefore was not homoousios [of one substance] with the Father.”²³

²³Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology, 3 vols.... Arius taught in the early fourth century. His views were eventually rejected by the church. He asserted that because God was immutable, he could never truly impart his substance to another being. Thus, Christ was not preexistent, but begotten as a creature, and thus subordinate; and although given the title of Son of God, he was not homoousios (of one substance) with the Father.

Sabellianism

Another unsatisfactory form of statement of the doctrine of the Trinity is that which usually is spoken of as Sabellianism.²⁴

²⁴Also known as Monarchianism and patripassionism, Sabellianism (named after Sabellius) held that God is one person, a “monarch,” who could not be divided into three persons. Thus, Jesus is the Logos, yet a mere man endowed by the Spirit. This view was rejected in the third century. Arianism claimed to avoid the error of Sabellianism by dignifying Christ as the first of God’s creation. Van Til makes the point that Arianism and Sabellianism are flip sides of the same coin because both define plurality as not essential to the Godhead.

Sabellianism is commonly contrasted with Arianism by saying that Arianism taught the diversity of persons in the Trinity without sufficiently stressing the unity of essence, while Sabellianism taught the unity of the essence without sufficiently stressing the diversity of the persons. This is true, but does not clearly strike at the root of the matter. It is a distinction similar to that which says that while pantheism stresses the immanence of God and deism stresses the transcendence of God, theism stresses both. The point is that the church could not merely unite Arianism and Sabellianism in order to get at the truth. It had to reject both because they were at bottom reducible to the same heresy, that of uniting the temporal in a correlative union with the eternal. This is the case with all the subordinationist speculation that is summed up in the name “Arianism.” But Sabellianism, too, seeks to have the temporal world furnish the plurality as a supplement to the eternal world, which furnished the unity of reality as a whole.

The Nicene Creed

When the Nicene Council met to state and defend the true doctrine of the Trinity, it rejected Arianism by stating that Christ is homoousion to patri (of one substance with the Father), and

Sabellianism by stating that the persons were persons in the ontological Trinity, and not merely economical manifestations with respect to the world.²⁵ They differ not as allo kai allo (one thing or the other), but as allos hai allos (one person or the other). In rejecting these two heresies the council rejected two forms of one heresy, the one basic heresy with respect to the Trinity, i.e., the mixing of the temporal with the eternal in ultimate union. In order to oppose these two forms of the one heresy it was necessary not only to maintain the two points mentioned against the Arians and the Sabellians but also to emphasize that the internal relation of the persons in the Godhead is prior to and independent of the relation of the Godhead to the created universe. Charles Hodge says:

As the essence of the Godhead is common to the several persons, they have a common intelligence, will and power. There are not in God three intelligences, three wills, three efficiencies. The three are one God, and, therefore, have one mind and will.²⁶ This intimate union was expressed in the Greek Church by the word "perchooresis," which the Latin words "inexistentia," "inhabitation" and "intercommunion" ["coexistence," cohabitation," and "intercommunion"], were used to explain.²⁷

²⁵The Council of Nicaea is the first great ecumenical council of the church. It met in 325 primarily to deal with Arianism, while avoiding Sabellianism. The Nicene Creed, a defining confession of the early church that resulted from the council, declares that Christ is homoousios ("of one substance") with the Father, but also "begotten – not made."

²⁶Below Van Til asserts that God is one person.

²⁷Athanasius (ca. 296-373), Bishop of Alexandria, was a major contributor to the Council of Nicaea. A fierce opponent of Arianism, he taught that the Word, or Logos, is equal to God, and that only a Savior who is God can save humanity from sin. The Council of Constantinople (381) was the second great ecumenical council of the early church. It ratified Nicene orthodoxy and disqualified several heresies. It further established the full deity of the Holy Spirit. For example, it added that the Spirit is the "Lord and giver of life, who with the Father and the Son is together to be worshiped and glorified." In it we find the first indication of the "filioque clause," which says that the Spirit proceeded not only from the Father but also from the Son (filio, Son; que, also), a phrase officially accepted only in 589. Van Til argues succinctly here that the Spirit's generation from both Father and son is a clear expression of the coordination of the three persons, better understood in the West than in the East. Although the official expression of its statement of doctrine has been lost, its essence is found in both Nicaea and Constantinople. Tradition ties them together, so that we may speak of the Council of Nicaea-Constantinople.

Constantinople, 381

In the Nicene Creed all the elements of the true Scripture doctrine are present. What has taken place since that is not without importance, however. If the true doctrine was to be maintained, it had to be continually restated and refined. So it had to be made plainer than it had been made that the Holy Spirit as well as the son is a person co-substantial with the Father and the Son. Athanasius and Augustine did much to make clearer that all three of the persons are co-ordinate.²⁸ And an important point in this connection was to show that the Holy Spirit proceeds not only from the Father but also from the Son (filioque). It is only if the Spirit proceeds from both that the inter-communion of the persons of the Trinity is eternally complete. The Western church more clearly than the Eastern saw that the co-ordination of the persons and their exclusively internal inter-communication could not be expressed without the filioque clause. As the generation of the Son by the Father had to be an eternal generation, so the proceeding of the Spirit had to be an eternal proceeding from both the Father and the Son. Hodge says, "The most obvious deficiency in the Nicene Creed is the omission of any definite statement concerning the Holy Spirit; the Constantinople Council added the words: 'We believe in the Holy Ghost' of the Nicene Creed, the words: 'Who is the Lord and giver of life, who with the Father and the Son together is worshiped and glorified, who spoke by the prophets.'" (The filioque clause was finally adopted by the Synod of Toledo in 589.)

Chalcedon, 451

All the heresies with respect to the Trinity may be reduced to the one great heresy of mixing the eternal and the temporal. Therefore the heresies of Nestorianism and Eutychianism, which were set aside at the council of Chalcedon, were no more than modified forms of opposition to the church's doctrine of the Trinity.²⁹ Of the Chalcedon Creed, Dr. Schaff says:

While the first Council of Nicea had established the eternal, preexistent Godhead of Christ, the Symbol of the fourth ecumenical council relates to the incarnate Logos, as he walked upon earth, and sits on the right hand of the Father. It is directed against the errors of Nestorius and Eutychas, who agreed with the Nicene Creed as opposed to Arianism, but put the Godhead of Christ in a false relation to his humanity.³⁰

As to the form of statement of the Chalcedon doctrine, the words of Schaff may be quoted:

The orthodox doctrine maintains, against Eutychianism, the distinction of nature even after the act of incarnation, without confusion or conversion (asygchytoos, inconfuse, and atreptoos, immutabiliter), yet, on the other hand, without division or separation (adiarivetoos, indivise, and achoristoos, inseparabiliter), so that the divine will ever remain divine, and the human ever human, and yet the two have continually one common life, and interpenetrate each other, like the person of the Trinity.³¹

²⁹Nestorius became Patriarch of Constantinople in 428. His views may have been misunderstood. Nestorianism was perceived to teach that Christ is two persons, one human, the other divine. Eutyches (d. 454) taught monophysitism, the view that Christ has only one, divine nature, mingled with human flesh. The Council of Chalcedon (451) was the fourth great ecumenical council of the early church. The Chalcedonian Creed, known also as the Definition, stated that Christ has two natures, divine (consubstantial with the Father, born of Mary Theotokos, the God-bearer), and human (consubstantial with us in manhood). The two are united in the one person, in which they coexist "without confusion, change, division or separation.” This became known as the hypostatic union, meaning a perennial union of two natures. Van Til sees in Chalcedon the answer to any confusion of Creator and creature.

³⁰Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom, 1:30

³¹*Ibid.*, 31

The Westminster Confession

Here we may also add the words of the Westminster Confession:

The Son of God, the second person in the Trinity, being very and eternal God, of one substance, and equal with the Father, did, when the fullness of time was come, take upon him man's nature, with all the essential properties and common infirmities thereof, yet without sin; being conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost in the womb of the Virgin Mary, of her substance. So that two whole, perfect and distinct natures, the Godhead and the manhood were inseparably foined together in one person, without conversion, composition, or confusion. Which person is very God and very man, yet one Christ, the only mediator between God and man.

From these statements it appears that the one main concern of the church has been to keep God and man in the proper relation to one another without confusing them. God exists as triune. He is therefore self-complete. Yet he created the world. This world has meaning not in spite of, but because of, the self-completeness of the ontological Trinity. Thus God is the foundation of the created universe and therefore is far above it. If he were defined only as the negation of the universe, without first being thought of as its foundation, we would have an absolute otherness of God. But this absolute otherness would in the end become an aspect of reality as a whole when brought into relation with the temporal universe at all. Any doctrine that denies God's providence (as deism does) or his providence and creation (as Greek thought did) must in the end become a confusion of the eternal and the temporal. Deism and pantheism are no more than two forms of the one basic error of confusion of the eternal and the temporal. ³³ ³³Van Til earlier compared pantheism with intellectualism. Here, he compares it to deism. In deism God is unrelated to creation, whereas in pantheism he is identical with it. Both are cases of denial of a true Creator-creature relationship. In the test case of the incarnation, Nestorians resemble deism because the divine is removed from the human, while Eutychians resemble pantheism by commingling the divine and human, according to Van Til. See note 29, above.

So also when sin came into the world, and the second person of the Trinity assumed a human nature, the eternal and the temporal were not confused. Nestorianism was again the deistic form of opposition to the true doctrine, and Eutychianism was the directly pantheistic form.

Modern Antitrinitarianism

We cannot do more than indicate in a word that the modern heresies in theology have their origin in, or can be traced back to, a false conception of the Trinity, the self-contained God of Scripture. In modern times as in ancient times, men have mixed the ternal and the temporal.

One striking instance of this is seen in the opposition to Calvin's formulation of the doctrine of the Trinity. Calvin was strongly interested in asserting the consubstantiality of the three persons of the Godhead. To quote Warfield:

In his assertion of the "autotheotes" [deity of himself] of the Son, Calvin, then was so far from supposing that he was enunciating a novelty, that he was able to quote the Nicene Fathers themselves as asserting it "in so many words." And yet, in his assertion of it, he marks an epoch in the history of the doctrine of the Trinity. Not that men had not before believed in the self-existence of the Son as He is God: but that the current modes of stating the doctrine of the Trinity left a door open for the entrance of defective modes of conceiving the deity of the Son, to close which there was needed some such sharp assertion of His "autotheotes."

Warfield adds:

Tertullian, Augustine, and Calvin are the three men to whom the Church owes most for the formulation of the doctrine of the Trinity. It was no wonder that Calvin's statements were hotly opposed. Not to mention the Roman Catholics, who debated among themselves about Calvin's doctrines, or the Lutherans whose objections were to points of detail, we briefly note the Arminian objections. In contrast to the Lutherans, the Arminians had "distinct tendency to the proper subordinationism of the Origenists."³⁵ ³⁵On Arminius, see chap 2, note 29. On Origen, see note 22, above.

Arminius himself, thought he denies the "autotheotes" of the Son, "fairly saves this orthodoxy."

The gravitation of Arminianism was, however, downward; and we find already taught by Episcopius, no longer a certain subordination in order among the persons of the Trinity in the interests of the Nicene doctrine of "eternal generation" and "procession," but rather a generation and procession in the interests a subordination in nature among the persons of the Trinity.³⁶

³⁶Warfield, Calvin and Calvinism, 264. Simon Episcopius was an ally of the Arminians in the 17th century.

"Curcellaeus taught no more than a 'Specific unity' of the divine Person."³⁷ George Bull himself was less extreme than Curcellaeus. But after Bull came Samuel Clarke, who was willing to admit that the Son may have been begotten of the essence of the Father "though he wished to be allowed that it was equally possible that He may have been made out of nothing."³⁸

³⁷Warfield, Calvin and Calvinism, 270. Stephanus Curcellaeus, or Etienne de Courcelle (1586-1659) was an Arminian theologian and the author of Opera Theologica, 2 vols. George Bull (1634-1710), who was more moderate than Curcellaeus, and who became the bishop of St. David's, wrote on the Trinity...Samuel Clark (1675-1729) was a well-known defender of Isaac Newton and correspondent with Leibniz...

The Arminian opposition to the true doctrine only prepared to soil for more radical departures. The idealist philosophers have identified the Trinity with the principle of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis in reality as a whole.³⁹ Influenced by these philosophers, many theologians have gone far astray from the faith. Unitarianism is nothing but a new form of the old error of mixing the ternal and the temporal. Modernism is the happy heir of all heresies, and basic to all its heresies is the denial of the consubstantiality of the Son and the Sprit with the Father; or rather, its error is ever deeper than that, since the Father himself is for modernism no more than as aspect of reality. If ever there was need for reaffirming and teaching the true doctrine of the Trinity, it is now.

³⁹This threefold dynamic of history is attributed to Hegel. It belongs to his dialectical materialism, the theory that a necessary process leads toward progress in both the world and in reason (which Hegel considered identical). One event/idea is overcome by another until resolution occurs. Thus, the contradiction of thesis and antithesis is overcome in a synthesis, which itself is contradicted and overcome, until final perfection arrives.

There is as much misunderstanding about Barth's view of the Trinity as there is with respect of his notion of transcendence of God.⁴⁰ Barth's Kantian principle of the "freedom of God" does not allow any room whatsoever for anything like the traditional doctrine of the self-contained ontological Trinity. In this case, as in others, he uses the words of orthodoxy but rejects their meaning. All of the incommunicable attributes of God are correlativized by Barth. His activism requires him to do so. So also the ontological Trinity is correlativized.

⁴⁰It is fitting to mention Karl Barth here, in that he is credited with bringing the doctrine of the Trinity back into the prominence it deserves...Van Til here is sharply critical of Barth, understanding him to teach correlativization, that is, making each attribute an aspect of each other so that God may be fully free and thus fully active.

It appears, then, that in setting forth its doctrine of this Trinity the church prepared itself for its life and death struggle with the world. In stating its doctrine of the Trinity, the church affirmed its unswerving faith in a self-contained, mysterious God. It is this self-contained, mysterious being who has deigned to reveal himself to man. He has revealed himself as necessarily existing as he exists. Therefore we may say that God exists necessarily as a trinitarian God. When Scripture ascribes certain works specifically to the Father, others specifically to the Son, and still others specifically to the Holy Spirit, we are compelled to presuppose a genuine distinction within the Godhead back of that ascription. On the other hand, the work ascribed to any of the persons is the work of one absolute person.⁴¹ [⁴¹Van Til reasserts this more forcefully five paragraphs below] Bavinck has pointed out that, in the doctrine of the Trinity, we have the heart of the Christian religion. We are always in danger, he says of turning in the direction of Sabellianism by allowing the absolute unity of the being of God to do despite to the genuine personal distinctions in the Godhead, or of turning to Arianism by allowing the distinctions of the persons in the Godhead to do despite to the absolute unity of the being of God.

How shall we avoid this danger? The answer would seem to be that we can best avoid this danger if we (a) clearly set forth the doctrine and see that in it we have a doctrine of God that is the diametrical opposite from that of modern philosophy and theology and (b) offer this triune God without apology as the only possible presupposition for the possibility of predication.⁴⁴

⁴⁴Reasoning analogically, rather than either univocally or equivocally, is basic to Van Til's epistemology. See chap 5, note 41. Univocal reason can never arrive at the Trinity, since God is neither the equivalent of human reason nor its mysterious opposite.

If we reason thus univocally, we cannot help falling into either of two errors. We either maintain that the Trinity can be shown to the non-Christian man to be a rational doctrine upon his own assumption, or we maintain that the Trinity is a mystery in the sense that it is irrational. Let us look for a moment at these errors.

It is sometimes asserted that we can prove to men that we are not asserting anything that they ought to consider irrational, inasmuch as we say that God is one in essence and three in person. We therefore claim that we have not asserted unity and trinity of exactly the same thing.

Yet this is not the whole truth of the matter. We do assert that God, that is, the whole Godhead, is one person.⁴⁵ We have noted how each attribute is coextensive with the being of God. We are compelled to maintain this in order to avoid the notion of an uninterpreted being of some sort. In other words, we are bound to maintain the identity of the attributes of God with the being of God in order to avoid the specter of brute fact. [isolated uninterpreted facts arguments or data in a void; fact should not be isolated from the framework in which they come. Search codeBF, brutefactdef, and code524] In a similar manner we have noted how theologians insist that each of the persons of the Godhead is coterminous with the being of the Godhead. But all this is not to say that the distinctions of the attributes are merely nominal. Nor is it to say that the distinctions of the persons are merely nominal. We need both the absolute coterminousness of each attribute and each person with the whole being of God, and the genuine significance of the distinctions of the attributes and the persons. "Each person," says Bavinck, "is equal to the whole essence of God and coterminous with both other persons and with all three." Over against all other beings, that is, over against created beings, we must therefore hold that God's being presents an absolute numerical identity. And even within the ontological Trinity we must maintain that God is numerically one. He is one person. When we say that we believe in a personal God, we do not merely mean that we believe in a God to whom the adjective “personality” may be attached. God is not an essence that has personality; he is absolute personality. Yet, within the being of the one person we are permitted and compelled by Scripture to make the distinction between a specific or generic type of being and three personal subsistences. [see note 45 above]

⁴⁵This is one of Van Til’s most original contributions to theology proper. As he said at the beginning of the chapter, to speak of God as one is to speak of God as a person. This fits our ordinary experience, as, for instance, when we pray, we pray to one person. It also fits biblical data that constantly refers to God as a person. By this reminder Van Til avoids two errors. The first is the tendency, found mostly in Western theology, of separating God’s essence, which becomes a remote inaccessible being, from the persons. The other is the neo-orthodox error of reducing personality to relationship, rather than regarding it as the foundation of ontological consciousness.

As Christians we say that this is a mystery that is beyond our comprehension. It surely is. God himself in the totality of his existence, is above our comprehension. At the same time, this mysterious God is mysterious because he is, within himself, wholly rational. It is not as though we can first, apart from Scripture, determine the fact that there must be a triune God if there is to be rationality. If we are Christians, all our interpretation is in terms of this God of whom we speak. It is he who has first revealed himself in his creation before we could know anything of him. But if there is one thing that seems clear from Scripture, it is that there are no brute uninterpreted facts. [isolated self-evident arguments or data in a void; fact should not be isolated from the framework in which they come.] If God is being considered apart from his relation to the world, being and consciousness are coterminous. And because this is so, the facts of the world are created facts, facts brought into existence as the result of a fully self-conscious act on the part of God. So then, though we cannot tell why the Godhead should exist tri-personally, we can understand something of the fact, after we are told that God exists as a triune being, that the unity and the plurality of this world has back of it a God in whom unity and the plurality are equally ultimate. Thus we may say that this world, in some of its aspects at least, shows analogy to the Trinity. This world is made by God and, therefore, to the extent that it is capable of doing so, it may be thought of as revealing God as he exists. And God exists as a triune being.⁴⁸

⁴⁸This paragraph contains in a nutshell the fundamentals of Van Til’s worldview. The nature of the creation is derived from the determination of the fully rational, triune God to create. Only if we begin from this presupposition can reality make sense. Only if we start from the God whose attributes and being are conterminous, rather than with men, can our predications have meaning. See Chap 10, not 30.

This is good here:

To the non-Christian, however, all this must seem irrational. He has begun his process of thought by assuming that man is ultimate. On this assumption he can at best allow for a species of personality that is higher than himself. He can never allow for absolute personality. If he did, he would himself no longer be ultimate. [He would then see himself as derivative of God, dependent upon him and not independent. Man loves his independence, i.e., he loves his sin!] When he speculates on the question of being, it must appear to him as a universal that stands in contrast to every form of personality. For him, the essence of God can be nothing but an empty buthos (depth, or foundation) that is a counterpart to personality. In this sense, the non-Christian thinker will frequently be ready to admit mystery and the super-rational. This type of irrationality does no injury his pride. It does not assault his assumed independence. Therefore it is this type of irrationality that the non-Christian calls the "super-rational." It is the not-yet, though possibly-to-be-rationalized. On the other hand, what the Christian calls the super-rational, or that which is above reason to man but quite acceptable and even indispensable to man, the non-Christian must call and does call "irrational" in the objectionable sense of the term. The notion of a personality that is at the same time absolute, the notion of a consciousness that is not set over against but is conterminous with absolute being, is, to the non-Christian, contradictory. He says that such a notion claims to say something while it says nothing. To say that God is one person and at the same time to say that he exists as three persons, he will say, is not merely to contradict yourself verbally, but also to say that all predication is analytic. It is to assert that being is already fully complete [that is, He needs no further becoming via correlativeness with creation, coming into his own via creation, the pantheistic view; his being is already complete! I think that's what he's concluding here.]; that it cannot be added to. All the difficulties that Parmenides faced are thus said to face the Christian believer.⁴⁹

⁴⁹In much of this Van Til is contrasting the Trinity, as one person and three persons, comforting in the end. And only the Trinity furnishes a basis for human predication. We have here a dilemma because unbelievers claim the opposite, that predication is impossible if we begin with the Trinity.

Thus we are face to face with a dilemma. The Christian maintains that only on the basis of the God of the Bible, whom we surely cannot fathom in his being, but who has told us that in him unity and diversity are equally ultimate, is there any possibility of predication. On the other hand, the non-Christian says that with belief in such a God there is no possibility of predication. There is no possible way of softening this dilemma. Nor should we wish to tone it down. If we say that we can explain the doctrine of the Trinity to the satisfaction of the natural man by reducing the objectionable irrational element to his own non-objectionable irrational element, we are in fact setting up an irrational that is objectionable from the Christian point of view. Christians and non-Christians cannot pool or trade their mysteries as long as they are true to their positions. It remains therefore to argue as to whose super-rational is really objectionable. To do this, we must place ourselves upon one another's positions for argument's sake. And if this is done, the Christian must hold that the non-Christian worships brute fact, while he himself, though gladly admitting that he cannot exhaustively interpret facts, may turn to God because for God there are no brute facts.⁵⁰ [isolated uninterpreted arguments or data in a void; fact should not be isolated from the framework in which they come. See codeBF and code524]

⁵⁰The approach here outlined is sometimes known as the transcendental method. Beginning with the true God, we may challenge the unbeliever's claims by arguing from his own grounds that predication is impossible. In the Roman Catholic type of apologetics, one must actually abandon the authority of the true God in order to accommodate the unbeliever's system. For further development of this see Van Til's The Defense of the Faith, 3rd ed....chap 6.

The Roman Catholic Church at first blush seems to avoid the error of seeking to reduce the doctrine of the Trinity to such proportions as to make it unobjectionable to the natural man. It is very insistent that the doctrine of the Trinity is a mystery totally beyond the reach of human reason. Yet, if we look more closely, we observe that Rome has pooled the Christian and then non-Christian conceptions of rationality. It claims that in the phenomenal world there is not difference between the Christian and the non-Christian principles of interpretation. It holds that by reason (that is, non-regenerated reason), man may interpret correctly many aspects of the created world. And it then adds that there is an area beyond the reach of reason. And that it is this area, called the area of faith, in which we are told to believe in the Trinity. But this is to identify the Christian and the non-Christian notions of mystery. And, as for the charge of contradiction involved in the belief in the Trinity, Rome resorts to a non-Christian notion of the union of unity and plurality in order to remove that charge. We have noted before that Roman Catholic theology begins its thinking with the abstract notion of being. And non-Christian thinkers do not object to this abstract notion of being. If therefore Rome identifies the essence of God with this abstract notion of being and adds the personality of God to this abstract being, there is very little to which any non-Christian thinker could object.

We do not say that Rome does not often present a better doctrine of the Trinity than we have here outlined. Our only contention is that, according to the genius of its method, it is not entitled to a better doctrine. Rome has made a compromise with non-Christian thought at the essential point of methodology, and it is fatal to the development of sound doctrine so to do.

Summing up what has been said about the Trinity and setting it into relation to what was said in the previous chapter about the incommunicable attributes of God, we may assert that for a consistent Christian theology the principle of individuation lies within the Godhead.⁵¹ God has, from all eternity, completely identified himself as the only self-existent fact. He identified himself without the need of other facts from which he needed to be distinguished. There was not universal being of which he was a particular instance. There was no mind independent of absolute being that could exercise itself within God himself. There is a deep and rich differentiation in the personal relationship between the three persons of the Trinity. The persons of the Godhead are mutually exhaustive of one another, and, therefore, of the divine essence.

⁵¹By individuation is meant the possibility of identifying the true significance of individual facts. This can be done only if God himself is fully rational, both one and many, not an individual instance of an abstract universal principle.

For all non-Christian speculation, on the other hand, the principle of individuation lies somewhere else than in the self-contained deity. Rationalisms may find this principle of individuation in some eternal impersonal reason, and empiricists may find it in the "space-time continuum," but both agree in finding it somewhere else than where Christianity finds it. Only Christianity finds it in the absolute personality of God.

It is with this background that we may now turn to a consideration of the communicable attributes of God. If the principle of individuation is really to be found in the absolute personality of God, man is the created image-bearer of God. God communicates to man a being similar to his own. [see Edwards's similar comments (in bold red) of God's communications to man.¹] That communication is then not a participation in the eternal being of God but is the finite replication of the divine being. It is only before the background of the fullness of the being of God as so far discussed that we can do justice to the communicable attributes.

¹God's internal glory is partly in his understanding, and partly in his will. And this internal glory, as seated in the will of God, implies both his holiness and his happiness: both are evidently God's glory, according to the use of the phrase. So that as God's external glory is only the emanation of his internal, this variety necessarily follows. And again, it hence appears that here is no other variety or distinction, but what necessarily arises from the distinct faculties of the creature, to which the communication is made, as created in the image of God: even as having these two faculties of understanding and will. God communicates himself to the understanding of the creature, in giving him the knowledge of his glory; and to the will of the creature, in giving him holiness, consisting primarily in the love of God: and in giving the creature happiness, chiefly consisting in joy in God. In the second place, we should observe that God, who is good in himself, does good to his creatures. It is not as though his being would naturally overflow into other being. God's creation of the world was a self-conscious act.¹³ It was a self-conscious act of himself as the one who is altogether good. There can therefore be no good in any creature except it have its source in God. "God is the cause efficiens, exemplaris et finalis [the efficient cause, the standard and the goal.] of all good, ¹³Bartlett holds that to become self-conscious, God created the world.

howsoever diversified this good may be." [Bavinck] God saw that his creation was good when first he made it. Scripture calls upon us to praise the goodness of God continually. In a world of suffering, this goodness of God manifests itself as mercy and pity.³³

³³Bavinck discusses God's mercy, grace, and love, successively under his goodness.

Good reasoning here:

When God's goodness manifests itself to the utterly undeserving, it is called grace. We cannot speak of the question of grace fully. That is a matter to be discussed in soteriology. We merely speak of it here as a manifestation of the goodness of God. Only he who believes in the God of the Scriptures, the fully self-conscious God, the God whom being and idea are coterminous, can really do justice to the biblical notion of grace. If one does not believe in the God of the Bible, one must hold that not all goodness is ultimately dependent upon him. Then not all evil is an offense against the goodness of God. And if sin is not exclusively an offense against the goodness of God, then grace can, at best, be a sort of fellow-sympathy on the part of God for beings that are somehow not as fortunately situated as he.³⁴

³⁴Although Van Til will critique Barth's theology in this regard, he anticipates the contemporary movement known as "open theism."

Modern theology, therefore, based as it is upon idealist philosophy, had no right to speak of the grace of God to sinners. And Barthian theology, which pretends to be vigorously opposed to modernism at every turn, cannot do justice to the notion of grace because it too holds to the existence of an evil that is not the result of a willful act of disobedience on the part of man. Barthianism does not believe that God originally created man perfect, and that sin came into the world by the fall of a historical Adam who lived in Paradise. For a Barthian, the whole story of Paradise is not to be taken as an account of historical events, but is rather to be taken as symbolical of spiritual truths. It is thus that dialectical theology takes away the foundation for a true doctrine of the grace of God to man. And as for Arminian theology it, too, cannot consistently preach the full scriptural doctrine of the grace of God, inasmuch as it too thinks of man as independent of the council of God at some point of his activity. [See chap 2, note 29] Man's offense in breaking god's law in Paradise was, for Arminianism, not wholly and exclusively an offense against the absolute God. 'Arminianism does not hold to a wholly absolute God. It could not hold to a wholly absolute God unless it were willing to give up its teaching with respect to man's ultimate independence at some point. And sin not being wholly and exclusively an act of hostility against the absolute God, grace cannot be wholly and exclusively the sovereign act of the removal of sin as an offense against the absolute God.

Thus it appears that, in the full proclamation of the absolute unmerited grace of God to man, the Reformed faith, with its fully biblical notion of God as self-contained in all his virtues and therefore in goodness, stands alone. No doubt others do, in a measure, preach the grace of God. Yet, it remains true that it is the mission of the Reformed faith to recall man to the full scriptural teaching on this subject. It is Calvinism's doctrine of God that enable it to do justice to the gospel of the free grace of God.

Common Grace

It is only if we think concretely of God that we can also think concretely of the things of the created world. And therefore we can think scripturally about the much-disputed doctrine of common grace. If we think concretely of the question, we see at once that the term common is really applicable only in a very loose sense to the idea of grace. God's attitude toward the saved and the unsaved can at no point be strictly common. It is well that we begin at this point. God always regards the reprobate as reprobate. When, therefore, he gives to the reprobate certain gifts in this life, of which they are undeserving, and these same gifts (as, for instance, rain and sunshine) also come to the saved, we cannot conclude that, with respect to rain and sunshine, God has the same attitude toward the believer and the unbeliever. When we speak of the attitude of God toward unbeliever's, we must take into consideration the total picture of the unbeliever's relationship to God. Thus the gifts of rain and sunshine to the believer are the gifts of a covenant God who has forgiven the sins of his people, and who knows that his people need these gifts. In a similar way, the gifts of rain and sunshine to unbelievers are gifts to these whom God hates, and are given because they too have a need of those things to fulfill the purpose that God has with them. God gave Pharaoh life and ability to rule, that he might be able to do that for which God has raised him up.

Both the wheat and the tares receive rain and sunshine so that both may reach the day of judgment for the revelation of the glory of God. In all this, God gave a witness to his presence (Acts 14:16). Men are, through this witness, without excuse. Thus God gave men and nations everywhere what they needed for a natural life and civilization, that they might accomplish the purposes of God. He restrained them in their natural tendency to do only evil continually, so that they, in spite of their own inherent evil nature, do that which externally resemble the requirement of the law of God (Rom. 2:14-15). It was thus by the gifts of God to sinners that the full demoniacal character of sin appeared and shall appear. When the world by its wisdom shows itself to be ignorant of God, God by his grace saves sinners unto himself. When the righteousness of men is shown to be but as filthy rags, God reveals his righteousness from heaven among men.

We conclude then, that “common grace” is not strictly common. The “common” grace that comes to believers comes in conjunction with their forgiven status before God; the “common” grace that comes to unbelievers comes in conjunction with their unforgiven status. Externally considered, the facts may be the same, but the framework in the two cases is radically different.

Attributes of the Understanding

We are told in Scripture that God is light and that there is not darkness in him at all (1John1:5).¹⁰

¹⁰Van Til continues to follow Bavinck's order rather closely, although succinctly. Bavinck subdivides the intellectual attributes into knowledge, foreknowledge, the problem of middle knowledge, wisdom and trustworthiness.

He dwells in light that no man can approach unto (1Tim.6:16). Bavinck says, "In this appellation there is included the idea that God is fully conscious of himself, that He sees through the whole of His being and that there is nothing in His Being that is hid to His consciousness." Or again, "There is and can be in God no darkness, He is altogether light, He dwells in light and is the source of light." Or yet again: "God is eternal and pure being. And His eternal knowledge has nothing less than that full eternal essence for its object. Being and knowledge are coterminous in God."¹³

¹³Here Bavinck argues that being and knowledge are coterminous in God. see chap 10 note 30.

³⁰The insistence that God's being and knowledge are coterminous is crucial to Van Til's understanding of God, and to his entire apologetic system. If his knowledge is only a subset of his being, or even supplementary to it, then God's being is a generalized, abstract concept, not the fully personal deity. Indeed, every attribute must be coterminous with his being.

In contrast to this an Arminian theologian, C. Norman Bartlett, says, "His subconscious perfections flower out into conscious self-recognition through the activities involved in the shaping of more or less refractory material into an ever closer resemblance to the divine original."

It is only if we thus insist on the coterminity of the self-knowledge with the being of God that we can escape all forms of pantheistic thought. If God's knowledge is not coterminous with his being, his knowledge can, at best, be a correlative to being. This being is then given a potentiality of its own. God's knowledge can then no longer be an internally complete knowledge. It becomes instead a knowledge that he must obtain by a process of investigation of a being that exists independently of himself. Such is actually Bartlett's view.¹⁵

¹⁵Van Til has made this point several times before. It is foundational for his whole apologetic. See Chap 10, note 30 (above). Here, coterminity is applied to God's knowledge of himself and of the world, which makes him utterly different from the creature.

By the idea of coterminity of the Knowledge and the being of God, we can avoid the identification of the self-consciousness and the world-consciousness of God. If being and knowledge are not coterminous in God, then being stands over against the knowledge of God as a complement. There is then no possibility of distinguishing between non-created and created being. There can then be no creation except in the attenuated Platonic sense of formation of preexisting material. God's consciousness of self is then interwoven with his consciousness of the world. That too is Bartlett's view. It is, of course, true that we must distinguish between God's knowledge and his being. This is as true as that we must distinguish between the various attributes of God. But if these distinctions are really to be maintained in their full significance, they must be maintained as correlative to a principle of identity that is as basic as they are themselves. To avoid the blank identity of pantheism, we must insist on an identity that is exhaustively correlative to the differentiations and equivocations of deism, we need a differentiation that is exhaustively correlative to the principle of identity in the Godhead.

William Edgar states: In deism, God is merely a sort of original designer of the universe, an absentee landlord. The theory is abstract and least logically to the point of evaporation. Diderot famously remarked that a deist was someone who had not lived long enough to become an atheist. In pantheism God is in everything, which in a different way results in his vanishing from definition. Sys. Theol. Van Til pg 336 note 36

God's knowledge of himself may further be spoken of as necessary knowledge. He himself exists as a necessary being. His knowledge of himself is therefore necessary in the sense that it is knowledge of himself as a necessarily existing being. And it is because God has this full and extensive knowledge of himself necessarily, and therefore exhaustively, that he also has a comprehensive knowledge of all possibility beside himself. That possibility itself depends upon God's plan with respect to it. God is free to create with he pleases. This knowledge that God has of all possibility beyond himself may therefore be called the free knowledge of God. It is in this way that we may keep a rigid and clear distinction between God's knowledge and his power.¹⁶ Bavinck points out that of the necessary knowledge of God, man can have no more than a finite replica.

¹⁶See Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology, 3 vols... Van Til's point is that for God there is no outside possibility, but only what is possible within his plan, which is determined by his necessary knowledge. Thus, he is free to create or not to create because his knowledge is absolute. In idealism and Arminianism, as he will point out, creation becomes necessary because possibility exists only in abstraction from his plan.

Idealistic philosophy cannot make this distinction. For it there is no real difference between the possible and the actual. God did not freely create the universe, but necessarily expressed himself in it. Thus God cannot have a free knowledge of the possible. Neither can he have a necessary knowledge of the possible. In fact he cannot have knowledge of anything. He cannot exist as an absolute personality.

Arminianism does not base God's knowledge of the universe upon God's control of the universe. If we keep clearly in our minds the point that God's knowledge of himself is an absolute and necessary knowledge, and that he can therefore freely create and freely know reality beyond himself, we are safeguarded against the false notions that speak of God's foreknowledge as though it were something that depended upon the prior existence of something beside God. Strictly speaking, there is no foreknowledge in God. But we may speak of foreknowledge if only we realize that we speak analogically. God knows all things beyond himself with one act of vision of his own plan with respect to those things. It is this that we signify when we say the God's knowledge is analytical. We take this word in its modern philosophical sense of "self-dependent."¹⁸ ¹⁸Arminianism so separates foreknowledge from present knowledge and from the plan of God that it posits a power outside of God's control. But according to Scripture, God's knowledge is analytical, that is, immediate and logically necessary, as opposed to synthetic, or after the fact.

Because God's knowledge is to be thought of as analytical, we reject what is usually spoken of as the mediate knowledge of God.¹⁹ It is contended that in the case of certain circumstances, God's ¹⁹Van Til continues to follow Bavinck here, who has the subcategory, "The Problem of Middle Knowledge." Middle, or "mediate," knowledge was a solution to the problem of predestination and significance introduced by Molina and the Jesuits. It holds to a category between the decree and the created event, which is the knowledge of possible outcomes. God knows what may happen and how he will react to events without determining them in advance. Van Til rejects this flatly.

knowledge depends upon certain conditions that are to be fulfilled by man. So, for instance, in 1Samuel 23:11, when David inquires of the Lord whether the men of Keilah would deliver him to his enemies if he remained among them, it seems that the Lord's answer depends upon a condition over which he has not control. Or, again, when Jesus said that, if the mighty works that he did elsewhere had been done in Tyre and Sidon, these cities would not have been destroyed, it seems as though there is a condition over which he had no control. Against this notion of mediate knowledge, Hodge rightly contends that there is no other category beside that of the possible and the actual and that God controls both completely. God's foreordination controls whatsoever comes to pass. If God had to wait for events to happen independently of himself before he could now then, he would be a finite God. His knowledge would then be inferential.

If we keep this biblical notion of the knowledge of God before us, we shall think of human knowledge as analogical of God's knowledge. And only if we do this, can we have a truly Christian apologetic knowledge. And only if we do this, can we have a truly Christian apologetic. Arminianism, with its salvation of the basis of foreseen faith, and Roman Catholicism, with its semi-Pelagian doctrine of human freedom, rest their thinking upon a false notion of divine knowledge. Accordingly, they are not able to offer an effective argument against idealist philosophy when it reduces the personal God to an abstract a priori principle that needs as its complement an equally ultimate a posteriori principle. This has become newly apparent in the writings of C. S. Lewis, C. Norman Bartlett, and John Thomas.²¹

²¹That is, these views defend the significance of human choice only because a posteriori (after the fact) knowledge determines a priori (before the fact) knowledge. This means human knowledge, rather than being analytical, is autonomous. The effect of this is to reduce God to an abstract principle, not the predestinating God of revelation. In his reference to the writing of three authors named, Van Til is no doubt thinking of C. S. Lewis, Miracles: A Preliminary Study (1947)...

As for Karl Barth and his school, they too destroy the biblical notion of the knowledge of God.²² They do not wish to speak of a foreordination of all things in this world. They do not wish, therefore, to speak of the knowledge of God with respect to his world as vouchsafed to man in any systematic way. They deny the validity of the analogical knowledge that man has of God, even when this knowledge is confessedly based upon the self-revelation of God. It is difficult to see how one, in doing this, can avoid doing injustice to the sovereignly free knowledge of God with respect to the world. If God has such a knowledge, there is no reason why man, created in God's image, may not have a finite and therefore systematic replica of that knowledge. And if Barth, by implication at least, denies the free knowledge of God with respect to the world, he also by implication denies the absolute and necessary knowledge that God has of himself. The former is based upon the latter. We should begin with the absolutely necessary self-knowledge of God. From it we conclude to the free knowledge of God with respect to the world. And from it in turn we may conclude that man may have an analogical constructed and therefore systematic, though not comprehensive, knowledge of God and of his will.

Medieval Man's Idea of Free Will

Man's Assumed Autonomy

Van Til does a good job in explaining this; the effects of the fall of Adam which led to man turning inward, selfish wickedness (Socratic inwardness, the spirit of apostasy code512), declaring their independence from God...hence man's assumed autonomy. That is the problem that the philosophers cannot see and that is why philosophy is dangerous and leads eventually to skepticism and apostasy. So, read this and anything by Van Til or Greg Bahnsen and you'll see this thread of corruption, all kinds of philosophical inventions of man. Van Til is a hard read, but it's very good.

H. The Substantial Unity of Man

It is of particular importance to observe that, by the principle of plenitude, or scale of being, the medieval synthesis described by Gilson (Etienne Gilson, 1884-1978, a French philosopher, influence by Descartes and Aquinas) expected to attain to a true definition of man. More especially, the substantial unity of man is said to have been both source and product of the principle of plenitude.

Those theologians who, like Augustine, followed Plato, could not justify their own faith in the unity of man, but those who championed Aristotle found indeed the "integral man" (p. 175). It would seem that, if man were to be saved by grace, it must be known who needs to be saved, and why. If, then, we would adopt the Aristotelian position, "we shall no longer be troubled with any difficulty about the substantial unity of man..." (p. 176)

But is it not through the metaphysics of Exodus that God is Being, and through the Johannine assurance that God is likewise Love, that we are to find the integral man? Is not the "unity of the human composite" to be found in the fact that it participates in God within the plenitude of His love?

Yes, indeed, responds Gilson, even as we build on Aristotle at this point, so we must, as Christians, always go beyond him, which invariably involves correcting him. For Aristotle, "the relation of the soul to the body was a particular case of the general relationship between form and matter" (p. 175), yet, if we should follow Aristotle in imagining the soul as being merely the form of the body, are we not in danger of losing the soul's substantiality, and with it its mortality? (p. 176)

Have we, then by patronizing Aristotle rather than Plato, escaped the “accidental juxtaposition imagined by Plato?” (p. 175). This Gilson cannot answer. Aristotle was, in the last analysis, no more able than Plato, to furnish us with the integral man, because in both, and basically for the same reason, man was torn apart by the necessity of always taking off in the opposite directions simultaneously. As participant in divine knowledge and love, man must move upward and backward toward identification with God as the absolute negation of everything which he is as an individual: he is not truly real unless his individuality be absorbed into pure abstract universality. On the other hand, in order to escape absorption into God as the pure negation of all individuality and change, man must rush toward absorption into absolute change.

This dilemma face Aristotle and Plotinus no less than Plato. When Gilson constructs his view of man, at least initially, upon Aristotelian rather than Platonic principle, he has to see that, only on the Christian principles over against both Plato and Aristotle, can man in his integrality be discovered, or identify himself, since then he becomes revealed as creature, covenant breaker, and freedman of Christ; and only then can “tending toward God” mean love toward God without absorption into Him. Thus the idea of sin become that of ethical alienation from God, without being reduced to a metaphysical tendency to lapse into non-being.

For Gilson, the integrity of the medieval approach, both of theology and of philosophy, stands or falls on his doctrine of “and indestructible free will” (p. 322). The significance of this fact appears only upon remembrance that the nature of free will is conceived as participated autonomy. In the medieval view, it was precisely as autonomous as God’s own, with the sole difference being that God had more, and man less. Neither the will of God nor that of man was counted as really absolute and sovereign, since both had non-being facing them as an inhibitive.

In particular, God was not sovereign in the dispensing of His grace to men. Men partook even more deeply in non-being than did God, and this gave them independence from and toward God’s will. If God ever approached man in terms of His own intellect’s being higher than man’s, then this was, in part, the approach of man to himself. Was not man’s intellect what it was a participant in God’s? Yet, again, it was the intellect of himself as wholly different from God’s because participant in non-being. If God ever succeeded in persuading the “free will” of man, then He succeeded in persuading Himself as nationally present within man as analogue. Therefore, man had ideal identity of intellect with God, for which reason God was obliged to persuade man to accept of His grace. Yet all this pre-supposed, as Gilson has stressed so definitely, that God was beforehand with man, having saved Himself from all eternity, and thus all men as well, as participant in Himself.

Conversely, however, in the medieval view of reality and knowledge, man could never be saved. As far as he was real as an individual, he was real by being non-real, i.e., by partaking of non-being. What, then, became of the assurance that, as distinguished from that of the Reformers, it is the medieval position which supports nature so that it is real, actual, and therefore can be saved? On the medieval basis, there is, in fact, not free will at all. This is true for the twofold reason already suggested. Thus, man, to be real, must be essentially or ideally identical with pure Being; but otherwise, to be real, he must be essentially identical with non-being. More fully, man’s supposed reality and substantiality consist in this being the point where abstract rationality and abstract irrationality are self-supplementary in thus seeking to assassinate each other.

Needless to add, such a view of man's unity is inherently destructive of the doctrine of God as the sovereign Lord of men, as the free dispenser of grace to His chosen people through Christ his Son and through the Holy Spirit.

Each of these biblical teachings, and all together, were compromised by medieval teacher who, although "Christians," refused to send out their very thought as captive to the Word of Christ.

I. Conclusion

What, then, did medieval man answer when Jesus confronted him with the question: "Who do you say that I am?" It was this: that He, together with all other men, climbs upward on the scale of being, from pure non-being to pure being. "You have," he told Jesus, "more being, knowledge, and love within you than any of the rest of us men have. Metaphorically speaking, you have 'come down' to us, having even travelled more deeply into the realm of utter non-being., non-rationality, and hatred than any of the rest of us have. Once down, you are preparing, again metaphorically speaking, to take all the rest of us up with you toward absorption into pure being." Such was medieval man's response, signifying, of course, a rejection of Jesus and His claim that of Him, through Him, and to Him were all things. Controlled ultimately by the form-matter scheme of pagan Greek thought, and like the Pharisees, medieval man sought, first of all, himself and his own righteousness; and then, afterward, he "accepted" the righteousness of Christ.

"Who do you say I am?" asked Jesus. Came the answer: "You are not what you claim to be. We cannot but interpret you in terms of a principle of unity and of diversity which excludes the appearance in history of any such thing as you claim, namely, to be One with the eternal Father. To the extent that this claim of yours is true, so are we all one with the eternal Father, the eternal principle of rationality. You claim also, however, to die for sinners. To the same extent similarly, we are all likewise dying for sinners, since we participate with you in both eternal rationality and temporal irrationality.

Accordingly, we reject every claim you lay to absolute uniqueness, either in your being or your work. In particular we reject your claim to have died on the cross for us, in our place, so as to have satisfied God's justice and thereby to have brought men to God.

III Modern Man Replies

In the first of this tripartite series, we have seen how apostate man began to develop for himself a culture through which he could suppress the truth about himself, the world, and God. Deep in his heart, Paul said, all men knew that they were created beings who had rebelled against their Creator (Romans 1:19); but all, as sinners, had developed interpretative principle on the assumption that man was not God's creature or a sinner, but self-sufficient and autonomous.

Upon exactly this assumption the Greeks had insinuated to Paul that if he would speak to them on Christ and the Resurrection, he must do so in terms agreeing with the human autonomy idea. However, Christ had already appeared to him and revealed that truth and life came to men only if they forsook this vaunted autonomy and knelt before Him as their Creator-Redeemer-King. Some of the Greeks, by the power of the Holy Spirit, had repented and accepted the Christ Paul preached, but many had not, reasoning, as indeed from their premises they had to, and as the Pharisees had, that Jesus a mere man, blasphemed in exalting himself to a God.

In the second lecture we revealed how, during the late Roman empire, Plotinus carried through the Greek mode of thinking, but Augustine, that of Paul the apostle.

We learned how Plotinus developed a comprehensive explanation of religious and theoretical experience in terms friendly toward human autonomy, the result being a massive, all-comprehensive view of being, knowledge, and behavior in which all entities were gradationally interrelated. [i.e., the Creator/creature distinction is blurred.] There was, he argued, a scale or ladder of being, upon which man as man was forever climbing, making use of the energy of being latent within him. [a deistic notion, that God is not immanent with his creatures, and that they are not absolutely dependent upon God for everything. Man is not self-sufficient as he thinks.] Opposed to Plotinus, Augustine represented the Pauline conviction that man, as God's creature, had in Adam, become a sinner, a fugitive from God, and that, as such, lay forevermore under God's wrath unless Jesus Christ, the Son of God and of man, bore this wrath in his place, thus freeing him to develop his Christian paideia unto God.

Note on what paideia is: The term paideia refers to the fundamentals of education set forth by thought leaders in Ancient Greek society. Paideia principles set a pedagogical standard for creating well-rounded citizens of society, addressing areas of a person's mental, physical, social, and moral improvement starting in youth. [I think this refers to our day-to-day sanctification, our being transformed into his image from glory to glory...]

Medieval man, we saw, attempted to synthesize the Plotinian and Augustinian, i.e., Christian points of view and thus, practically speaking, rejected Christ's claim that in Him alone were truth and life. In effect, he considered Christ to be a man-God, a monstrosity.

In the present lecture, we shall inquire finally into modern man's notion of who Christ was and is. Does he really accept Christ's claim? Does he interpret all of life in Christ's name? In fact, what is the name he gives Christ?

To obtain an answer, we shall trace briefly his view of man, cosmos, and God, with emphasis on his view of man as – of course – autonomous.

A. Renaissance Man Replies

We naturally start at the Renaissance. What did Renaissance man believe of himself and his culture?

He thought, first of all, that he was free. He had escaped the burden of all authority, especially that of the church, whereby, having shaken it off his back, he imagined himself as having not only shrugged off the authority of Aristotle, but especially, of Christ. Now he would be himself at last, and thus act on that principle of inwardness which had impelled Socrates to live in his own life so graciously and imperturbably.

In other words, a true, man-centered culture was about to be born. The treasured idea of the ultimately self-explanatory nature of human personality had underlain the cultural endeavors of apostate man at every stage of his development, but its full significance in respect to the struggle between the kingdom of God and that of man was not to appear clearly till modern times, in the cultural ideals of Renaissance man.

1. Renaissance Man vs. Reformation Man

To grasp this, we may at once undertake a singularly large leap and set the Renaissance view of man and his freedom in contrast to that of the Reformation. Renaissance man sought his freedom in the idea of absolute independence from Christ and found it where the Greeks had found it, namely, in the construction of a paideia which excluded and opposed Him; and Reformation man found his freedom where Paul had found it, i.e., in his final, definitive escape from the sin of persecuting Christ to the joy of constructing culture in His name. Erasmus of Rotterdam thus pled with Socrates to pray for progress in building the city of man, while Luther prayed to Christ and the triune God for progress in constructing that of God.

a. Modern Science

The question of the place and significance of science emerged during the time of the Renaissance and Reformation as perhaps the main bone of contention between them, expressing as it did in modern form the old Meno-problem of Plato, namely, "How was learning by experience possible?" Man possessed a cultural mandate, with Renaissance man declaring that it had been given him by his own self-sufficient consciousness, and Reformation man, that I had been endowed by Christ, his Creator-Redeemer. The two views excluded each other entirely, with every fact between them in dispute. Renaissance man began with himself as self-referential, presuming that no method of research was tolerable or intelligible unless it served him in his capacity as *ultimate interpreter of reality, and that no conclusion could be true unless proceeding from the premise of himself as the *ultimate, central reference point of all experience. Reformation man began with Christ as self-referential, and only thereafter, from himself, as the meek servant of the Christ.

2. Renaissance Man's Idea of Himself

The development of Renaissance man may be appreciated best if note be first taken of his relationship to his predecessor, medieval man.

We begin with Abelard, who was a typically “obedient son of the church.” Yet according to Windelband, “he is first of all a rationalist; thought is for him the norm of truth.” (Willhelm Windelband, A history of Philosophy, tr. By James H. Tufts, 1895, pl 299). Thus, he believed in divine revelation “only because it’s reasonable;” regarded Christianity “as the philosophy of the Greeks made democratic;” and was, therefore, “the spokesman of free science, the prophet on the newly awakened impulse toward real and independent knowledge” (p. 300).

A second medieval figure worth mentioning is William of Occam, whose very name recalls the nominalism of the late Middle Ages, by which Occam had enabled infant science work free from Scholasticism (p. 315). Thus the idea of the independence of human personality began to assert itself on every side: the individual mind knew only what was within itself. [looking into self...the Socratic spirit of inwardness, all about self, etc.]

The Spirit of Apostasy

Van Til writes on this subject of apostasy - fascinating. The philosophies of the world (man's wisdom) is this spirit of apostasy. This is an excerpt from his book Who Do You Say That I Am. He gives a good explanation of sinful man, too. So, you wonder why Paul, when arguing on Mars Hill with the local philosophers, why he said that the true God is the Creator of all things including man. This is why: there are important inferences with this statement that conflict with the world's wisdom, that deny God as the Creator and elevate man and his will far above what he is capable of. In this effort, man declares his independence from God and establishes his ultimacy and, hence, his assumed autonomy. The language of the heart of fallen man is this: I will decide what is good or evil (not God.)

The Christian man is, of course, yet the sinner, unconsciously emulating Satan’s example of rebellion against the gracious manifestation of God’s love, suppressing God’s revelation to him in the world about him and within own constitution, establishing himself as the final point of reference in his rationalist principle of unity which either reduces his God to his own level or exalts himself to God’s, or in his irrational principle of individuation which envelopes his God with himself into a bottomless, shoreless ocean of irrationality.

Aristotle’s philosophy, or Plato’s, or Plotinus’, were only particular forms of the apostate conspiracy. Should one Christian theologian prefer Plato’s, or Plotinus’, to that of Aristotle, and another prefer the opposite, this evinces the fact that they have not recognized the common wellspring of these and similar ideologies as expressions of the spirit of apostasy.

Sermon on Mars Hill - Acts 17

²² So Paul stood in the midst of the Areopagus and said, “Men of Athens, I see that you are very religious in all respects. ²³ For while I was passing through and examining the objects of your worship, I also found an altar with this inscription, ‘TO AN UNKNOWN GOD.’ Therefore, what you worship in ignorance, this I proclaim to you. ²⁴ The God who made the world and everything that is in it, since He is Lord of heaven and earth, does not dwell in temples made by hands; ²⁵ nor is He served by human hands, as though He needed anything, since He Himself gives to all people life and breath and all things; ²⁶ and He made from one man every nation of mankind to live on all the face of the earth, having determined their appointed times and the boundaries of their habitation, ²⁷ that they would seek God, if perhaps they might feel around for Him and find Him, though He is not far from each one of us; ²⁸ for in Him we live and move and exist, as even some of your own poets have said, ‘For we also are His descendants.’ ²⁹ Therefore, since we are the descendants of God, we ought not to think that the Divine Nature is like gold or silver or stone, an image formed by human skill and thought. ³⁰ So having overlooked the times of ignorance, God is now proclaiming to mankind that all people everywhere are to repent, ³¹ because He has set a day on which He will judge ^[c]the world in righteousness ^[d]through a Man whom He has appointed, having furnished proof to all people ^[e]by raising Him from the dead.”

The Limits of Reason

Code514

According to Van Til, evidence of this weakness in Lutheranism is further seen in the Lutheran conception of the Person of Christ. The two natures of Christ are seen as blending entirely and both natures as present in the elements of the Lord’s supper. According to Krauth, “To say that the nature of Christ is personally present without his humanity is to deny that his humanity is part of his personality and the doctrine of the incarnation, falls to the dust.” The orthodox formula of Chalcedon is thus virtually rejected, as is its declaration, directed against the Eutychian heresy of a single nature, which asserted the two natures “without confusion, without conversion, or change.”

Lutheranism, in seeking, to some extent, its principle of unity in an intermingling of the eternal and temporal, set forth in dramatic fashion in its concept of the Lord’s supper, is refusing to accept the determinative character of the eternal and insisting that man’s freedom is endangered if the temporal is not fused into the eternal. [see code515 and code518] Such a view tends to deny reality to anything in eternity which does not at the same time exist in time, whereas the consistently theistic view holds that the only solution to time lies in eternity. The natural outcome of this intermingling is an insistence on the independence of man because time is determinative of both the temporal and the eternal. The incarnate Christ becomes determinative of not only the Second Person of the Godhead but the trinity as a whole because He works in time and the trinity in eternity. God must therefore limit Himself out of respect for His creatures; He cannot infringe on their independence because time is the arena of ultimate reality, not eternity. Accordingly, the sinner determines his own salvation. God’s grace starts or assists him to that end; it cannot determine him without destroying the meaning of time and its centrality. To grant the sinner this capability has far-reaching implications, as Van Til discerningly points out:

If one maintains that he can approach Christ of his own accord even though he is a sinner, he may as well say that he can approach the Father too. And if one can say that he knows what the fact of sin means without the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit, he may as well say that he can know other facts without reference to God. In fact he may as well say that he can know any and every fact without reference to God. If one fact can be known without reference to God, there is no good reason to hold that not all facts can be known without reference to God. When the elephant of naturalism once has his nose in the door, he will not be satisfied till he is altogether in.

Thus Lutheranism veers from an impersonal and mechanical determinism to an insistence on the independence of man. In neither extreme is the personal God fully determinative of time; the determination lies within the universe or within man. Despite its great beginnings, Lutheranism has been unwilling to follow the Reformation faith to its philosophical conclusions. In Arminianism, as Van Til analyzes it, the unwillingness to face the full implications of original sin carried Protestantism further along on the road of concessions. In Watson, sin is ascribed to finitude rather than to moral revolt against God. Evil and finitude of necessity go together in this view, and man needs a savior not because of a moral condition but because he is a human being. In other words, the implication is that man needs to be delivered not so much from sin as from creaturehood—from his finitude into infinitude. Moreover, from the Arminian point of view, man’s rationality and freedom involve and include his ability to change the history God has planned or to do things God has not planned. In short, man’s life is outside the plan of God and constitutes a fact beyond God’s control, one to which God can offer assistance but cannot govern. We are here on the road to the modern philosophic point of view which sees the space-time continuum as the matrix of all reality. God exists, and is in the picture, but increasingly as a spectator; on the sidelines, ready to cheer man on but unable to determine the course and outcome of the race. Arminianism allows God and Christ onto the scene only to start the race, remove certain obstacles, and to award a prize. The final determination of events belongs to man. Arminianism further holds that, to be truly ethical, the will of man must be exclusively responsible for what is done.

But the measure of self-determination demanded for man is an impossibility (and a significant impossibility) in that such self-determination is possible for God alone. Since man is a creature, living in a created world, in time governed by God, his act cannot suddenly break context with its entire world. The act of a creature, in a created world and in created time, can be only a created act. It is not only a personal act and a responsible act but also a created act. Thus, in its concept of the ethical act, Arminianism claims for man what is possible only with God and thereby robs God to honor man. Moreover, God is further robbed by making evil virtually mean finiteness. If evil is finiteness, and finitude is the inherent condition of man, then the Greek dilemma is again with us, namely, that evil is as ultimate as the good, that evil is a part of the ultimate reality. Primacy is given to the temporal realm, which is the determinative one in this view, and evil is made basic to the temporal realm because finitude is inherent in it. The moral evil of Christian thought is eliminated; man is too independent for a concept of transmitted original sin to be credible. Theology thus gives way to an anthropology, God to man, and eternity to time.

In Calvinism, the Greek element was eliminated from Christian-theistic thought and a consistent epistemology formulated. The false independence of man was shown for what it is, and the noetic influence of sin fully recognized. Scripture was made central to thinking and the work of the Holy Spirit in the restoration of man to the true knowledge of God emphasized. [code514b] Calvin's conception distinguished between the narrower and wider sense or understanding of the image. In the narrower sense, it applies to the true knowledge, true righteousness, and true holiness which man possessed when created by God. The fall destroyed this image, whereas the image in its broader sense, man's rationality and morality, his intellectual and emotional life, remain still in God's image but with limitations. Man retains these aspects of his nature but in a blinded sense. He is rational but his rationality is spiritually blind, emotionally distorted, and out of kilter in terms of its created purpose, i.e., to function analogically, to think God's thoughts after Him, and to interpret and experience life in terms of the will of God.

Man, while spiritually blind, is still a person, and therefore the synergism of Luther is no necessity for Calvin. Synergism faced an either-or situation: either God acted or man acted. It did not dare face the ultimate question: either God is a person or man is a person. For Calvin, man is a personality because God is a person. The sinner, a created person, cannot know God aright unless new light is given him by the Scripture and the power of sight restored by the Holy Spirit working in his heart. Salvation is not the eternalization of man but rather his restoration to his original perfection and a development thereof. The incarnation is therefore not made necessary by man's finitude but by his sin. Since man's finitude is not the problem, Christ's human nature, in the Lutheran sense, is not needed in the sacrament. The eternal order is the determinative one, and God saves man in time, not because of time. God saves man through the incarnation, by means of the appearance of the Second Person of the trinity in history and his incarnation, whereby human nature was united without intermingling with the divine nature. The incarnation was the means of salvation, but the cause of salvation was to be found only in the foreordained and predestined eternal counsel of God—only in the ontological trinity.

To emphasize the incarnation, especially the human nature of Christ, as against the ontological trinity, is to insist on mixing the temporal and eternal and shifting the area of reality away from the eternal and from God. As Van Til has stated: "It is upon the development of these teachings of Calvin that we must depend for a consistent Christian epistemology. Calvin did not mix the categories of the temporal and eternal. He did not succumb to the temptation of giving man a false independence in the work of salvation. Hence, he alone of all the Reformers could rid himself of the last remnants of Platonic reasoning."

The Mixing of Eternal and Temporal - What is Ultimate?

Greek Epistemology

From Van Til and The Limits of Reason

By R.J. Rushdoony

Pgs. 20-22

Code515

Van Til's analyses of the history of philosophy are significant in their development of the epistemological presuppositions of the various schools. Greek philosophy he finds particularly important in that it represented the development of the antitheistic mind without any intermixture of Christian elements. Greek thinking lacked any true theistic elements and, despite many references to God, believed basically in the self-contained and ultimate character of nature. God and man, form and content, spirit and matter, were essentially aspects of nature or identifiable with nature. It was not only possible to study the objective world without any reference to a God beyond the universe but possible to study God in the same manner also.

Basically, man defined God, not God man. The human mind was capable of knowing any and all finite facts without any reference to God. The universe was ultimate and the mind, in a sense, ultimate as part of that universe. Greek speculation assumed, first, that "all things are at bottom one." Second, the world of becoming is ultimate, whereas, for Christian thought, "being is before becoming and independent of becoming." Third, for Greek thought, "not only is change taken for granted as ultimate but the many generated from the one is always identical with the one." Greek thought, moreover, assumed the possibility of neutrality, whereas, for Van Til, the existence of an absolute God, from whom every creature has derived existence and to whom all are responsible, rules out all possibility of neutrality. The Greek mind is the end result of Eve's course.

Before Eve could listen to the tempter she had to take for granted that the devil was perhaps a person who knew as much about reality as God knew about it ... That is, Eve was obliged to postulate an ultimate epistemological pluralism before she could even proceed to consider the proposition made to her by the devil. Or, otherwise expressed, Eve was compelled to assume the equal ultimacy of the mind of God, the devil, and herself. And this surely excludes the exclusive ultimacy of God. This therefore was a denial of God's absoluteness epistemologically. Thus neutrality was based upon negation. {negation: e.g., what God is not, etc., as opposed to what He is.} Or we may as well say that neutrality is negation ... In connection with this we may remark in passing that when Eve listened to the tempter, she not only had to posit an original epistemological pluralism, but also an original metaphysical pluralism. She had to take for granted that a time created being could reasonably consider herself to be sufficiently ultimate in her being, as to warrant an action that was contrary to the will of an eternal being. That is, she had to equalize time and eternity not only, but she had to put time above eternity. It was in time that Satan told her the issue was to be settled. He said that it still remained to be seen whether God's threats would come true. The experimental method was to be employed. Only time could tell. Now this attitude implied that God was no more than a finite God. If He were thought of as absolute, it would be worse than folly for a creature of time to try out the interpretation of God in the test-tube of time. If He were thought of as eternal, such an undertaking was doomed to failure, because in that case history could be nothing but the expression of God's will.[21]

Greek epistemology was Eve's thinking hardened into certainty. In Greek thinking, as in Plato's, for example, time and eternity are very nearly identified, though at first they seem to be radically opposed to one another. Time is "the moving image of eternity"; the temporal and eternal are alike aspects of one general reality. Man is the temporal appearance of the eternal.

As such, mankind and not the Second Person of the Trinity, Jesus Christ, is the mediator and interpreter. Time and eternity, moreover, are intermixed in mankind, whereas, in Christ, the two natures are without intermixture. For Platonism, philosophy ends in final mystery, whereas, in Christianity, the absolutely self-conscious God knows no mystery.

Plato's final mystery comes close to destroying all knowledge. Plato tried unsuccessfully with Heraclitus to find a basis for knowledge in the Sense world alone. He tried unsuccessfully with Parmenides to find knowledge in the Ideal world alone.

In the modern era, the question of epistemology has come to the foreground in philosophy. Ostensibly, this is a by-passing of metaphysics and an elimination of God from philosophy as irrelevant. Actually, the full significance of the Christian-theistic position is most clearly seen in the extent to which modern philosophy goes to eliminate an independent and sovereign God. The issues are more sharply drawn therefore between the consciousness of man and the consciousness of God as the frame of reference. In Descartes, the ground of all certainty is the human consciousness in independence not only from the universe around him but especially from God. For Calvin, the personality of man cannot be known nor can it exist without the personality of God. For Descartes, nothing can be known without man's self-consciousness and personality in itself. The universe is a mechanistic one and God merely the creator of the machine, now functioning in independence of Him. The machine has its own laws and workings, and the inventor need not be known in order to understand the machine. The lives of the Wright brothers are of great interest to any student of the history of aviation but utterly irrelevant to any understanding of the principles of flight or to the piloting of aircraft today. The Wright brothers created the first successful plane, but they did not create the principles of flight which made that plane possible. They merely used them. The God of Descartes is ultimately in the same position. More than that, man rather than God is made the ultimate source of universal laws and interpretation. As a result of Descartes' point of departure, two lines of thought developed in philosophy: empiricism and rationalism. Empiricism holds that the individual man is the standard of truth and holds to the ultimacy of the sense world. The universals are purely subjective. The climax of such thought was the skepticism of Hume, for whom no knowledge was possible. Rationalism sought to interpret reality in terms of certain a priori principles. These a priori principles, however, were not anchored in the ontological trinity or in eternity but in the human mind as ultimate. In Spinoza and Leibniz rationalism reached its climax.

For Spinoza, God, man, and the universe are but individuations and aspects of the general idea of substance. But, as Van Til has pointed out, to say that all is God is no different than saying nothing is God. "Univocal reasoning must always lead to negation. Univocal reasoning is based upon negation. The very presupposition of univocal reasoning is that there is no absolute God. If there were an absolute God it is ipso facto out of the question to apply the categories of thought to Him in the same way that they are applied to man." Leibniz sought individuation on the basis of complete description and by reduction to mathematical formulae. Revelation was thus an impossibility. The interpreter is the mind of man, not the mind of God, and the mind of man can wholly comprehend all reality. The equal ultimacy of the one and many is sought without success in the universe, and the old theory of the gradation of being espoused. None of these devices enabled Leibniz to escape the dilemma of Spinoza or to rescue religion as he sought to do; having begun with the ultimacy of the universe, he could do no more than attempt to analyze it into both God and man. “As Leibniz sought to be wholly univocal, so Hume sought to be wholly equivocal in his reasoning. As in the philosophy of Leibniz God lost his individuality in order to become wholly known, so in the philosophy of Hume God maintained his individuality but remained wholly unknown.”

Indeed, apostate man, were he to be consistent with his own principles, ought always boldly to maintain that he has, not merely in thought, but also in reality, completely reversed the relationship between God and man as defined in the Genesis account, since it is not until man not only asserts, but proves, to himself, to all the world and the heavens as well, that he, instead of God, is the manipulator and source of all possibility and reality – viz., the anti-Christ – that his autonomous endeavor throughout history will assume their most logical meaning.

Renaissance man was truly “modern” in this bearing the ark of God toward the temple of Dagon, the god of the philistines, and his reference to Christ as the superfluous man. He was, like a small boy, telling his father that he had been, was, and ever would be superfluous. “I control the world, Dad. I know I need food, but, you see, I’ll grow my own, in fact, I’ll buy up all the chain stores, then the whole country, the whole world. I’ll be the master of my fate and the captain of my soul.” Then, the boy discovered that he had nothing with which to buy his next breakfast, finding that, like the prodigal of the parable, he was soon at the swine trough, having denied his own manhood. So also, the Renaissance man in his denying Christ as the way to the Father’s house.

Summing up, Renaissance man in the first place had renewed the pagan principle of inwardness, following Plato, Aristotle and Plotinus, demonstrating the willy-nilly that his victory spelt his defeat.

But in the second place, Renaissance man went beyond his medieval associates in his effort to synthesize the Socratic preoccupation with his own ultimacy with Christ’s insistence on His divine ultimacy. To Renaissance man, the natural teleology of man was higher than it was to medieval man. He accordingly invited Christ to join him in building the city of man, behaving exactly the same as Satan the Prince of the World, when he offered Christ the world’s kingdoms if only He would prostrate Himself before the Prince.

You may object to such a “harsh” evaluation of Renaissance man by interjecting that he was simply “doing without” Christ rather than actually opposing Him. The answer, however, has long ago been given: all human beings not for Christ are against Him! The world is one grand estate whose proprietor is, indeed, the Christ, because He is its Creator-Redeemer. Renaissance man was fully justified to repudiate the Roman Church’s authority, which was largely that of an artificial, man-made Christ. However, a false authority cannot rightly be rejected without kneeling to the true one. Whose claims were indeed heard by Renaissance man, and then, no less, rejected by him, as Erasmus of Rotterdam did in asserting man’s freedom independently of Christ, and above his having achieved liberation as a sinner through Christ’s blood. Such was the issue between Erasmus and Luther. And was Socrates indeed, with Mary the mother of God, to become an equal spokesman for the human race? If Erasmus meant this by his request to Socrates to pray for him, it was virtually claiming Socrates no to have been a sinner, in need of forgiveness for his declaration of independence from God. Should it be furthermore objected that one need not adopt Luther’s theology to accept Christ, the reply is again clear: the Bible as Christ’s Word was quite available to Renaissance man, yet he chose to ignore its doctrine of man the sinner in need of redemption so as to build thereafter the city of God. This was clearly to imply that Christ erred in His insistence against the powers of Satan that unless men were saved by His destiny of suffering in their place, they and their total cultural effort rested under God’s wrath.

b. Descartes vs. Calvin (pg 75)

The absolute contrast of principle between the City of Man [man’s Babylonish temple to heaven] and the one of God appeared with particular clarity in the instance of Rene Descartes vs. John Calvin. Descartes, of course, was the typical Renaissance man, whereas Calvin had developed and extended the biblical approach to God rediscovered by Luther. The former stood for the Socratic-Plotinian, the latter, the Augustinian, Pauline principle of inwardness.

The issue (at stake) was that of human certainty. In this book, New Paths of Philosophy, Fritz Heinemann states that ancient man concerned himself with the cosmos, medieval man with God, and modern man with man himself. Superficially, then, it may be said that both Descartes and Calvin were modern. However, both were finally, also, concerned with man in respect to his environment, thus his relationship to God. Both sought for the actual inwardness of man by ascertaining this peculiar relationship, in other words, not merely the Socratic question of how man may know himself, but also the Platonic one of his “true” culture, thus ultimately his “salvation.” It was a matter of “cultural” philosophy, as well as “humanistic.”

Renaissance man aimed at “controlling” nature so as to erect his earthly kingdom, and Descartes in questing for self-knowledge exemplified this splendidly. Also, Bacon and Galileo Galilei had developed a “method” which projected human control over nature. Many others, notably Descartes, constructed a mathematically oriented method, based on the Parmenidean assumption that reality was fully expressible by human conceptualization. But Kroner has emphasized that Galileo, for one, warned that mathematics would “never disclose anything about the true nature of the universe, or even of a stone,” although his metaphysically-minded successors generally disregard the warning and proceeded to hatch their farfetched speculative systems. In a sense, one might say that they resorted to ancient cosmology in claiming to have discovered the true nature of existence.

Descartes, Spinoza, and Leibniz, the three outstanding examples of such cosmology, were, nevertheless, modern thinkers indeed, in that they centered their final efforts, not upon nature or the world, but upon man, his niche in the world and also his relationship to God. Descartes launched his from his famous Cogito, a fully anthropocentric [man-centered] principle. Spinoza was basically a mystic for whom knowledge of God was of importance, and yet he was not theocentric [God-centered], but embraced rather the belief that speculation could bring about man’s harmony with the divine being, thus the “end” of all his aspirations and personal longings. Leibniz’s whole system was at heart anthropocentric, with man to be the pattern and model of all things, even of the world, and God. Any “naturalism” of these three “scientific” metaphysicians was therefore an illusion. In so far as it figured into their systems, it was a tribute to the prevailing fashion of thought during their time, not to the intrinsic or esoteric doctrine of their systems (Speculation and Revelation in the Age of Christian Philosophy, pp. 256-257, The Westminster Press.)

To the latter observations from Kroner’s work on medieval speculation, we add a quotation from his work on modern speculation and revelation. Descartes, says Kroner, opposed the Roman Catholic Aristotelian doctrine of man as consisting of soul and body. “The Aristotelian” doctrine treats the person as it treats other ‘substances.’ My soul is then conceived in the same manner as the forms of other things; indeed, it is only a special form which is characteristic of man. Descartes is too much of a Christian to accept this theory. I am not a special substantial form; I am, rather, a thinking being and only a thinking thing (res cogitans), that is, a mind or soul (mens sive animus), understanding or reason, terms whose significance was before unknown to me.”

Kroner remarks as follows about these works of Descartes: “What is completely new in this definition is the emphasis laid upon the self as not belonging to the world, in so far as I think of the world and thereby of myself as the subject of thinking, whereas the physical things (including my body) are objects of my thinking.”

Finally, of the utmost importance is this further observation by Kroner: “The Christian inwardness is here interpreted as the unique position of the thinking subject in contrast to the objects thought. No thinker before Descartes brought the principle of modern philosophy, its epistemological subjectivism, so emphatically and definitely to light. In that respect he was the true initiator of philosophy in the modern world.”

What Kroner says of Descartes is most enlightening. Descartes has not fully worked out or even been fully true to his basic principle of inwardness. For one thing, it rejects the scholastic notion of form, and it points forward to Kant. Man is thus not a thing, but a person. In this respect, he was followed by Spinoza and Leibniz, upon which principle of inwardness they too cast their thoughts.

Unfortunately, argues Kroner, Descartes was not faithful, ultimately, to his own principle. He sacrificed is true epistemological inwardness in favor of a metaphysics that would understand ultimate reality. “The modern anthropocentric position was abandoned; instead, the pre-Christian cosmocentric principle was revived. Spinoza and Leibniz followed Descartes’ lead. Renaissance naturalism marred thus the foundation of modern epistemology. The terms mind, intellect, reason, even self or ego were now understood as parallels to extension, as if they lay on the same plane. The superiority and primacy of the thinking subject in contrast to the objects thought was surrendered” (p. 97). Kant alone was able to clarify these misunderstanding, and to dissolve the falsity of metaphysical solutions: (p. 98).

Basically, the problem was against that of human freedom, which the metaphysical systems of Descartes, Spinoza and Leibniz denied. In Descartes’ philosophy, “the idea of the individual ego is swallowed up by that of mathematical reason. The desire to justify the validity of science is stronger than the wish to understand the self, as the center of the person” (p. 100). It was Kant who at last recognized the full significance of man’s inwardness, not allowing any desire for a metaphysical foundation of science to overshadow the fact that man was a free personality. Says Kroner: “The critical position that Kant finally took originated in part from his protest against the doctrine that man was an automaton. Only thus could Kant save moral responsibility.

The final contest was thus between Kant and Calvin. Man’s true freedom and inwardness were expounded first by Reformation man, whom Calvin represented the best. It was he who, more cogently than Luther, isolated man’s true inwardness and freedom in terms of the free, self-sufficient act of God in His creation and redemption. Calvin, not Luther, confronted Renaissance man with the call to repentance in the authentic manner of Paul, who had similarly summoned ancient man.

The struggle between the Renaissance city of man of Descartes, Spinoza, Leibniz, and Kant, and the Reformation city of God is an all-out one, using the weapons of theology, philosophy, and science. Since the Renaissance and Reformation, it has become even more intensive and extensive than before,

In his mindfulness of man's cultural task, Calvin diametrically opposed Descartes, a fact which Kroner senses somewhat. Kroner says that Calvin spoke merely for those who would make an automaton of man. Yet, while admitting that Luther, as well as Calvin, believed in election, Kroner ignores this fact, and imagines Luther's aim thrust to have been rather a type of inwardness akin to that of the mystics and ultimately of Kant. This is consistent with his believing Augustine to form the connecting link between Socratic and Cartesian inwardness.

For Calvin, man was himself free, i.e., free to undertake his cultural task in the name of Christ, which was, basically, whether in theology, philosophy, or science, to challenge apostate man to repentance at every point in the universe. This fact has, of course, been more fully elaborated by his followers than by Calvin himself. For instance, Abraham Kuyper wrote a three-volume work under the title Pro Rege, according to which every square inch of ground had to be claimed for Christ as mans' Redeemer-King. Thus also D. H. Th. Vollenhoven, Herman Dooyeweerd and Hendrik Stoker have presented a methodology of philosophy and science which is calculated to challenge, at every step of the way, all man-centered cultural efforts. [aka, a Babylonish temple to heaven!]

Yet, from Kroner's point of view, all such endeavor must be discarded in the name of that inwardness of man represented by Socrates, Descartes, and Kant. Considering once again their contrast with Calvin, the following elements come to mind.

Organic is the question of the primum notum, viz., the most basic thing that one may know. Calvin agreed with Descartes that man must start from himself as the object of thought, but with the proviso that no one really contemplated himself properly unless as a creature of God became sinner against God, and redeemed from such rebellion through the historical work of Jesus Christ and the regenerating action within him of the Holy Spirit. [this is the proper lens though which a person must view things to have a right knowledge of those things as Van Til routinely point out. This must be the case if for from Him and through Him and to Him are all things. Romans 11:36]

The Greeks of course had rejected this thought of themselves as a slur on their self-sufficiency, preferring their old belief that they were ultimate, not created, and the "God" whose existence they "proved" or "disproved," not Him whose creatures they, in fact, were. [a massively key point! Man's natural desire in rebellion against his Creator, is to build a kingdom for himself, to exalt himself into the room of God, Satan's original temptation, You can be like God...to be independent from God, self-sufficient, autonomous, etc. This is the sin that fallen man loves from which proceed all manner of rebellion - thoughts and acts of sin.] Greek autonomous speculation was what Calvin and Luther, like Augustine, had spurned after Christ had appeared to them in Scripture, at which time they would have it no more, nor the Roman Catholicism sprung falsely from it.

Key paragraph here:

Every man, argued Calvin, after Paul, knew inherently that such speculation was an effort to suppress the truth within him, that God was his Creator and that, in all speculation, he seeks by very nature to suppress such knowledge (Romans 1). Surely also, Descartes' view of man consisted basically of this effort to suppress what, deep down in his heart, he knew was really true. No human being can doubt this. Knowledge of God as Creator-Redeemer travels with knowledge of oneself, the two being mutually, immediately involved. Human doubt itself presupposes awareness of the truthful claim of God in Scripture affirming the creatureliness and sinfulness of man against Him. Descartes' own doubt is, therefore, irrefutable evidence of his confirmed desire to exclude the true God from his world of knowledge. He was like the boy described earlier who, having left his father's house, paused and asked himself and others whether, perhaps, he even had a father. Christ was, for him, the superfluous man, whom he requested, so to speak, to remove himself kindly so that he might proceed to unfold his world-view without obstruction. Descartes' metaphysics is not, as Kroner contends, inconsistent with his epistemological view [how and why what he knows what he knows] of the freedom of man, but rather, it is perfectly consistent. [Fallen man believes that he has a free will as though he were not under God's control because man has a falsely assumed autonomy, declaring independence from God. Now, man has a free will in the creaturely sense, that he does what seems good to him - we are not puppets or blocks of wood. So, though God controls all things for his glory, and it can't be otherwise, or God would not be God, yet in God being sovereign over man's will, moving it wherever He pleases (e.g., Prov. 21:1), he does no violence to it - He does not rule by compulsion or force. For as Jonathan Edwards said, "For him to promise, who has it not in his hand to dispose and determine, is a great absurdity; and yet God oftentimes in promising, speaks of himself as the sovereign disposer of the matter, using such expressions as abundantly imply it." This is an amazing mystery; though we may understand this truth, we do not comprehend it! Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high; I cannot attain it, the Psalmist says in Ps. 139:6] Freedom is self-sufficiency, on which basis he postulated a culture controlled by an abstract principle of continuity according with mathematical law, and an abstract view of discontinuity according to pure contingency.

Descartes is, then, a later Renaissance man who continued his apostate predecessor's endeavor of attempted to build the "city of man," [a Babylonish tower, man trying to make a name for himself, e.g., Nimrod in Gen 10 to:8 to Gen. 11] thus repudiating that of God. If Paul had come to earth and met the Renaissance Descartes, he might well have repeated: "Has not God made foolish the wisdom of this world, for after that the world by wisdom knew not God it pleased God through the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe" (1Cor. 1:9). Even Kroner points out that Descartes' universal swallowed up this individual, thus that he deliberately isolated himself from all relationships in terms of which he alone could identify himself. Man is what he is by virtue of the place and task that God his Creator-Redeemer assigns to him, but Descartes imagined he could reject all this as so much tree bark so as to discover his own "essence"; and yet, by his own admission, he found nothing further identifiable after having accomplished his removal of God, creation, and providence. Really, how could he have expected to find anything, having thus destroyed himself? He knew only that he was, not what he was. To groan that I know that I am without knowing anything about what I am is to assert nothing, but rather, to demonstrate the folly, confusion, and guilt of denying the God who has created me, died so as to redeem me, and thus set me truly free.

If obedient to the will of God, man would be accomplishing genuine results. The controlling and directing power of his will would be the will of God. It would be by his own will, however, that he would reach the goal that God has set for him. If disobedient to the will of God he would be going counter to the expressed will of God for him. Yet he would not be able to frustrate the plan of God either as a whole or in any detail. Man as a creature cannot will anything either by way of obedience or by way of disobedience except in a relation of subordination to the plan of God. It is the ultimate will or plan of the self-determinate God that gives determinate character to anything that is done by the human will. [doctrine of compatibility, e.g., God says he will harden Pharaoh’s heart, yet Pharaoh hardens his own heart. God’s sovereign control over the wills of men is consistent with their creaturely liberty (or creaturely free will) and their responsibility.]

Over against this Christian view of the will of God as ultimate is the non-Christian view of the will of man as ultimate. Morality is assumed to be autonomous. Man is virtually said to be a law unto himself. He may, and in many cases, does, speak of God as his law-giver. But then this God is a projection of his own ultimate moral consciousness; God is but man’s would-be ultimate and autonomous moral consciousness writ large. Socrates wanted to know what “the holy” was, apart from what any man or God might say about it. This might seem to point to an objective holiness quite apart from the consciousness of man. But such a holiness apart from the consciousness of man is devoid of meaning. There is no alternative to the Christian view of the will of God as ultimate but the idea of man’s moral consciousness itself as being ultimate. In modern times the categorical imperative of Kant is a good illustration of the would-be autonomous nature of the non-Christian ethics.¹⁰ It is therefore the business of Christian apologetics to challenge the non-Christian view of morality and to show that unless the will of God be taken as ultimate, there is no meaning to moral distinctions.

The Roman Catholic view of ethics is unable to do this. It has been noted that Romanism virtually speaks of being in general and of knowledge in general before it speaks of the being and knowledge of God as distinct from the being and knowledge of man. It is natural, then, that God's will cannot be made primary in ethics. Roman Catholic theology ascribes to the will of man such a measure of autonomy and ultimacy is to enable it to determine man's own final destiny, whether for good or for evil, requiring only the assistance of God. For Romanism man is himself the ultimate source of his own determinateness. To be sure, Romanism tones down this teaching of man's autonomy by also teaching the almighty character of God's will. For all that, Romanism is jealous for the ultimacy of the will of man.

The consequences of this position for systematic theology and apologetics are again far-reaching. For systematic theology it means that the initiative is taken out of God's hand at every point of doctrine. The doctrine of creation becomes a cross between the Christian doctrine of creation out of nothing and the pagan doctrine of the chain of being. [e.g., evolution] The doctrine of salvation becomes a matter of give and take between God and man [theistic mutualism], man is saved partially by grace and partially by works [synergism, provisionalism, etc.]. For apologetics it means that the natural man is not challenged to forsake his disobedience to God in order to find rest for his soul and significance in his moral distinctions.

Roman Catholic ethics seeks to by-pass the will of God in order to appeal to his nature. But this in effect amounts to an appeal to the fitness of things in general. Such a notion of the fitness of things in general is in accord with the idea of being and knowledge in general. One who seeks to make intelligent predication about being in general allows in effect that one who does not make the Creator-creature distinction basic in his thought can yet make true assertions about reality. Accordingly, Romanism admits that non-Christian ethicists can truly determine the nature of the so-called cardinal virtues. Romanism allows that the natural man who makes himself the final reference point of moral distinctions can say what is true about man's proper behavior with respect to many things in this world.

Thus, Romanism grants in effect that those who do not handle all things in this world in obedience to the will of God and for the glory of God are yet doing what is right. Nor does it merely admit that the natural man can do what is right as far as the matter of the thing apart from its motivation is concerned. Romanism admits that the natural man who makes himself the goal of his efforts, who uses his own experience instead of the will of God as the criterion of his undertakings, and who has not faith as the motivation of all that he does, is yet able to do what is right without qualification in certain areas of life. And this fact disqualifies Romanism from either stating of defending a true Christian doctrine of human behavior.

For our present purposes the doctrine of God need not be set forth more fully. It has appeared that in the Christian doctrine of the self-contained ontological Trinity we have the foundational concept of a Christian theory of being, of knowledge, and of action. Christians are interested in showing to those who believe in no god or in a god, a beyond, some ultimate or absolute, that it is this God in whom they must believe lest all meaning should disappear from human words. Christians are interested in showing to those who hold that “God” possibly (or probably) exists but possibly (or probably) does not exist, that the words possibility and probability have no meaning unless the God of Christianity actually exists. It is their conviction that the actuality of the existence of this God is the presuppositions of all possible predication.¹¹

¹¹Predication is a central concern for Van Til. Technically, it means a true affirmation, or assigning meaning. In lay terms it means being able to make sense of something.

Pg. 42

The Fall of Man

When man fell, it was therefore an attempt to do without God in every respect. Man sought his ideals of truth, goodness, and beauty somewhere beyond God, either directly within himself or indirectly within the universe about him. Originally man had interpreted the universe under the direction of God, but now he sought to interpret the universe without reference to God. We mean, of course, without reference to the kind of God defined above.

Man made for himself a false ideal of knowledge, the ideal of absolute inderivative comprehension.¹³

¹³In Van Til’s terminology, “comprehensive knowledge” means exhaustive recognition of creaturely dependence upon the Creator.

This he could never have done if he had continued to recognize that he was a creature. It is totally inconsistent with the idea of creatureliness that man should strive for comprehensive knowledge; if it could be attained, it would wipe God out of existence; man would then be God. And, as we shall see later, because man sought this unattainable ideal, he brought upon himself no end of woe.

In conjunction with man’s false ideal of knowledge we may mention here the fact that when man saw he could not attain his own false ideal of knowledge, he blamed this on his finite character. Man confused finitude with sin. Thus he commingled the metaphysical and the ethical aspects of reality.¹⁴

¹⁴The distinction between the ethical and the metaphysical is fundamental to Van Til’s understanding. An ethical fall means moral revolt against God, while a metaphysical fall would somehow mean humans are not entirely to blame for evil since they were victims of finitude, or the way things are. The following critique of Roman Catholicism depends on this point because of the view that we are on a scale of being.

Not willing to take the blame for sin, man laid it to circumstances round about him or within him. Over against this biblical view of man, the non-Christian view assumes or asserts that man is neither created nor sinful in the sense described. Even though much stress is laid upon the fact that man is finite and evil (cf. Barth, Brunner, Niebuhr), yet man is taken to be his own ultimate reference point. Man virtually occupies the place that the ontological Trinity occupies in orthodox theology. He is self-sufficient and autonomous.

It is only when this point is carefully noted that the Christian and the non-Christian points of view are seen in their right relationship to one another. The two positions have mutually exclusive views of the ultimate reference point in predication.

Roman Catholic apologetic is unable to make this point clear. As already noted, it does not make the Creator-creature distinction basic in its thought. It has therefore a half-Christian and half-non-Christian view of God. Similarly, it has a half-Christian and half-non-Christian view of man. [Key point!] According to Romanism, man's being is not exclusively describe in terms of the general concept of the chain of being. Man is said to have less being than God. He is said to hover near the edge of non-being. Hovering near the edge of non-being and therefore having but little being, he is said to tend to slip into non-being. Thus man's "sinfulness" is described in part in terms of the law status he occupies in the scale of being. Because of the attenuated character of his being he tends to evil.

Is then God responsible for creating man with so thin a stream of being? The answer is in the negative. But the reason why God is excused from making man evil is that man's being is not exclusively derived from God. The nature of "being in general" controls and limits God in the creation of man. God cannot give man stable being because being is already defined as unstable at the point where man is to be placed. The nature of "being in general" is first defined in indeterminist terms, and then God is made to fit into the picture. If man is to exist at all, he must be placed at the lower end of the scale of being. Then, being placed there at the same time constitutes his "freedom." For his "freedom" consists in the fact of the unstable nature of his being.¹⁵

¹⁵In Thomas Aquinas one finds a hierarchy of being, with God as ultimate, pure existence. Human beings are lower than God, though naturally capable of God's blessedness. Grace is a superadded gift, [see donum superadditum at code490] lost at the fall, given again at redemption. While Thomas Aquinas jealously guards against blaming God for evil, he does make him the author of forms that can become corrupt. Van Til's point is that being and its gradations, rather than a holy Creator and morally culpable creature, is the backdrop for Thomism, and thus much of Roman Catholic theology. This holds for the subsequent sections on knowledge and ethics.

In the field of knowledge the Romanist view of man involves both rationalism and irrationalism. These correspond to determinism and indeterminism in the realm of being. The Roman Catholic apologist will make his final appeal to “knowledge in general” instead of to the self-conscious ontological Trinity. He will try to prove the existence of God by the method of Aristotle, i.e., by showing that God’s existence is in accord with “logic in general.” So doing, he does not prove the existence of the ontological Trinity; he “proves” the existence of a god, a god that fits into the pattern of “being in general.” And he will “prove” that this God “probably” exists; for man has no experience of any sort of being except such as lies at the edge of non-being. Thus Romanism cannot challenge the interpretations of the non-Christian. Seeking to appeal to the “reason” of the natural man, as the natural man himself interprets his reason, the Roman Catholic apologist falls victim both to the rationalism and irrationalism inherent in the non-Christian view of life.

In the field of ethics the Romanist view involves both dictatorship and autonomy. These correspond to determinism and indeterminism in the field of being and to rationalism and irrationalism in the field of knowledge. The average man is virtually said to be properly subject in an absolute sense (papal authority) to such of his fellow men as have attained to a higher position than he in the scale of being. The relationship between those in authority and those under authority is not exclusively or even primarily ethical but metaphysical. The pope, to be sure, speaks for Christ, on Christ’s authority, but the only Christ he knows is one who, though God as well as man, yet fits into a certain position in the scale of being. Thus even the pope deals not exclusively or primarily with the Creator-Redeemer but with “being in general” and “knowledge in general.” He derives his authority not primarily from revelation given him by Christ but from his supposedly superior insight into the proper proportions within the scale of being. He is an “expert” in realm of religion. The average man must listen to him as to a dictator.

On the other hand, the average man cannot through the pope hear the imperative voice of God at all. “Being in general” and “knowledge in general” have in them an element of ultimate contingency. God himself has no control over the lower reaches of being. These lower reaches of being, though very attenuated, yet have in them a potentiality of their own. God could therefore not make man perfect. There was a sort of “matter” with a refractory power that made it impossible for God to make man perfect. True, Romanism asserts that God made man perfect. But its notion of “being in general” prevents its putting truly Christian meaning into these words. Thus the idea of autonomy, which constitutes the heart of non-Christian ethics, cannot be challenged in Romanist views.

Man’s Assumed Autonomy

The Fall of Man

When man fell, it was therefore an attempt to do without God in every respect. Man sought his ideals of truth, goodness, and beauty somewhere beyond God, either directly within himself or indirectly within the universe about him. Originally man had interpreted the universe under the direction of God, but now he sought to interpret the universe without reference to God. We mean, of course, without reference to the kind of God defined above. [i.e., not a God of man’s imagination.]

Man made for himself a false ideal of knowledge, the ideal of absolute inderivative comprehension.¹³ This he could never have done if he had continued to recognize that he was a creature. It is totally inconsistent with the idea of creatureliness that man should strive for comprehensive knowledge; if it could be attained, it would wipe God out of existence; and would then be God. And, as we shall see later, because man sought this unattainable ideal, he brought upon himself no end of woe.

In conjunction with man’s false ideal of knowledge we may mention here the fact that when man saw he could not attain his own false ideal of knowledge, he blamed this on his finite character. Man confused finitude with sin. Thus he commingled the metaphysical and the etherical aspects of reality.¹⁴ Not willing to take the blame for sin, man laid it to circumstances round about him or within him. Over against the biblical view of man, the non-Christian view assumes or asserts that man is neither created or sinful in the sense described. Even though much stress is laid upon the fact that man is finite and evil (cf. Barth, Brunner, Niebuhr), yet man is taken to be his own ultimate reference point. Man virtually occupies the place that the ontological Trinity occupies in orthodox theology. He is self-sufficient and autonomous.

Roman Catholic apologetics is unable to make this point clear. As already noted, it does not make the Creator-creature distinction basic in its thought. It has therefore a half-Christian and half-non-Christian view of God. Similarly, it has a half-Christian and half-non-Christian view of man. According to Romanism, man's being is not exclusively described in terms of the general concept of the chain of being. Man is said to have less being than God. He is said to hover near the edge of non-being. Hovering near the edge of non-being and therefore having but little being, he is said to tend to slip into non-being. Thus man's "sinfulness" is described in part in terms of the law of status he occupies in the scale of being. Because of the attenuated character of his being, he tends to evil.

Is then God responsible for creating man with so thin a stream of being? The answer is in the negative. But the reason why God is excused from making man evil is that man's being is not exclusively derived from God. The nature of "being in general" controls and limits God in the creation of man. God cannot give man stable being because being is already defined as unstable at the point where man is to be placed. The nature of "being in general" is first defined in indeterminist terms. And then God is made to fit into the picture. If man is to exist at all, he must be placed at the lower end of the scale of being. Then, being placed there at the same time constitutes his "freedom." For his "freedom" consists in the fact of the unstable nature of his being.¹⁵

¹⁵In Thomas Aquinas one finds a hierarchy of being, with God as ultimate, pure existence. Human beings are lower than God, though naturally capable of God's blessedness. Grace is a superadded gift, lost at the fall, given again at redemption. While Thomas Aquinas jealously guards against blaming God for evil, he does make him the author of forms that can become corrupt. Van Til's point is that being and its gradations, rather than a holy Creator and a morally culpable creature, is the backdrop for Thomism, and thus much of Roman Catholic theology. This holds for the subsequent sections on knowledge and ethics.

In the field of knowledge the Romanist view of man involves both rationalism and irrationalism. These correspond to determinism and indeterminism in the realm of being. The Roman Catholic apologist will make his final appeal to "knowledge in general" instead of to the self-conscious ontological Trinity. He will try to prove the existence of God by the method of Aristotle, i.e., by showing that God's existence is in accord with "logic in general." So doing, he does not prove the existence of the ontological Trinity; he "proves" the existence of a god, a god that fits into the pattern of "being in general." And he will "prove" that this God "probably" exists; for man has no experience of any sort of being except such as lies at the edge of non-being. Thus, Romanism cannot challenge the interpretations of the non-Christian. Seeking to appeal to the "reason" of the natural man, as the natural man himself interprets his reason, the Roman Catholic apologist falls victim both to the rationalism and irrationalism inherent in the non-Christian view of life.

of knowledge. The average man is virtually said to be properly subject in an absolute sense (papal authority) to such of his fellow men as have attained to a higher position than he in the scale of being. The relationship between those in authority and those under authority is not exclusively or even primarily ethical but metaphysical. The pope, to be sure, speaks for Christ, on Christ's authority, but the only Christ he knows is one who, though God as well as man, yet fits into a certain position in the scale of being. Thus even the pope deals not exclusively or primarily with the Creator-Redeemer but with "being in general" and "knowledge in general." He derives his authority not primarily from revelation given him by Christ but from his supposedly superior insight into the proper proportions within the scale of being. He is an "expert" in the realm of religion. The average man must listen to him as to a dictator. [how society that forgets God, elevates man, ends up in dictatorships!]

On the other hand, the average man cannot, through the pope, hear the imperative voice of God at all. "Being in general" and "knowledge in general" have in them an element of ultimate contingency. God himself has no control over the lower reaches of being. These lower reaches of being, though very attenuated, yet have in them a potentiality of their own. God could therefore not make man perfect. There was a sort of "matter" with a refractory power that made it impossible for God to make man perfect. True, Romanism asserts that God made man perfect. But its notion of "being in general" prevents its putting truly Christian meaning into these words. Thus, the idea of autonomy, which constitutes the heart of non-Christian ethics, cannot be challenged in Romanist views.

Ecclesiology

"The catholic or universal church, which is invisible, consists of the whole number of the elect that have been, are, or shall be gathered into one, under Christ the head thereof; and is the spouse, the body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all." This is the Westminster Confession's definition of the church (25.1). We need not say much about it for our purposes. It can readily be seen that it is in accord with the preceding statement on soteriology. It contains the same conception of the relation of the eternal to the temporal as is manifest in the doctrine of salvation. In the last analysis it is the eternal that precedes the temporal; it is God who determines the salvation of man; the church, that is, the universal church, is the "whole number of the elect." This does not preclude human responsibility and "free will" in preceding articles. It only brings out clearly that God is absolute, here as elsewhere.

It is this fact of God's absoluteness as expressed in his election of man that gives us courage in preaching and in reasoning with men. Sin being what it is we may be certain that all our preaching and all our reasoning with men will be in vain unless God brings men through it to himself. Men cannot be brought to bay if they have any place to which they can go. Now they do have a place to which they can go if they have the inherent ability to accept or reject the gospel. [which in the case of the effectual call of God, they do not, thank God!] In that case they need not feel uneasy about rejecting it today because they can accept it tomorrow.

Eschatology

When we come to the Christian conception of the “last things” we see once more how diametrically the Christian position is set over against that of its opponents. If anywhere, it becomes plain here that in the Christian conception of things God’s interpretation of facts precedes the facts. Every Christian who commits his future to God believes that God controls the future. He believes that God had interpreted the future; he believes that the future will come to pass as God has planned it. Prophecy illustrates this point. Belief in the promises of God with respect to our eternal salvation is meaningless unless God controls all things.

Analogical thinking about God

The Perspicuity of Natural Revelation pg 76

...This God naturally has an all-comprehensive plan for the created universe. He has planned all the relationships between all the aspects of created being. He has planned the end from the beginning. All created reality therefore actually displays this plan. It is, in consequence, inherently rational.

It is quite true, of course, that created man is unable to penetrate to the very bottom of this inherently clear revelation. But this does not mean that on this account the revelation of God is not clear, even for him. Created man may see clearly what is revealed clearly even if he cannot see exhaustively. Man does not need to know exhaustively in order to know truly and certainly. When on the created level of existence man thinks God’s thoughts after him, that is, when man thinks in self-conscious submission to the voluntary revelation of the self-sufficient God, he has therewith the only possible ground of certainty for his knowledge. When man thinks thus, he thinks as a covenant creature would wish to think. That is to say, man normally thinks in analogical fashion. [What is God like, not what he actually is.] He realizes that God’s thoughts are self-contained. He knows that his own interpretation of nature must therefore be a reinterpretation of what is already fully interpreted by God.

The concept of analogical thinking is of especial significance here. Soon we shall meet with a notion of analogy that is based upon the very denial of the concept of the incomprehensible God. It is therefore of the utmost import that the confession’s concept of analogical thinking be seen to be the direct implication of its doctrine of God.¹⁹

¹⁹Though he does not develop it here; the concept of analogy is central to Van Til’s epistemology. It means “thinking God’s thoughts after him,” or knowing according to a creaturely mode. In A Christian Theory of Knowledge, 1969... he distinguishes his view from Thomas Aquinas’s doctrine of analogy of being, by which the cosmos moves from the full being of God, who is self-governing, to the being of humanity, which is partly self-governing, to the lower beings, or even non-being, undifferentiated matter, incapable of any essence. In Thomas’s view we can never speak univocally about God, yet we do not have to limit ourselves to equivocal or purely metaphorical knowledge. Analogy is a middle way. (See chap. 4, note 17 above) For Van Til, analogy is quite different. It refers to the only way to know a God who is both Creator, and thus transcendent, and Redeemer, and thus imminent. For him, univocal knowledge is simply knowing the way God knows, or autonomously, and equivocal knowledge means skepticism.

One further point must be noted here. We have seen that since the fall of man God's curse rests on nature. This has brought great complexity into the picture. All this, however, in no wise detracts from the historical and objective perspicuity of nature. Nature can and does reveal nothing but the one comprehensive plan of God. The psalmist does not say that the heavens possible or probably declare the glory of God. Nor does the apostle assert that the wrath of God is probably revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. Scripture takes the clarity of God's revelation for granted at every stage of human history. Even when man, as it were, takes out his own eyes, this act itself turns revelational in his wicked hands, testifying to him that his sin is a sin against the light that lighteth every man coming into the world. Even to the very bottom of the most complex historical situations, involving sin and all its consequences, God's revelation shines with unmistakable clarity. "If I make my bed in hell, behold thou art there." (Ps. 139:8). Creatures have no private chambers. ...The central unifying concept of this entire confession is the doctrine of God and his one unified comprehensive plan for the world. The contention consequently is that at no point is there any excuse for man's not seeing all things as happening according to this plan.

Jump to pg 79 - 82

When man fell, he denied the naturally revelatory character of every fact, including that of his own consciousness. He assumed that he was autonomous; he assumed that his consciousness was not revelational of God but only himself. He assumed himself to be non-created. He assumed that the world of interpretation, as by the force of his natural powers he was engaged in it, was an original instead of a derivative procedure. He would not think God's thoughts after him; he would instead think only his own original thoughts. [that all originates from himself which Arminians hold to. This is man's declaration of his own self-containedness, that he is independent; that he is God. For example, if I love God, it is because it originated within me, my self-determined will, not from God's determining/saving grace. They see God's determining grace as God doing violence to man's liberty.]

Now if anything is obvious from Scripture, it is that man is not regarded as a proper judge of God's revelation to him. Man is said or assumed from the first page to the last to be a creature of God. God's consciousness is therefore taken to be naturally original as man's is naturally derivative. Man's natural attitude in all self-conscious activities was therefore meant to be that of obedience. It is to this deeper depth, deeper than the sinner's consciousness can ever reach by itself, that Scripture appeals when it says: "Come let us reason together." It appeals to covenant breakers and argues with them about the unreasonableness of covenant breaking. And it is only when the Holy Spirit gives man a new heart that he will accept the evidence of Scripture about itself and about nature for what it really is. The Holy Spirit's regenerating power enables man to place all things in true perspective.

Man the sinner, as Calvin puts it, through the testimony of the Spirit receives a new power of sight by which he can appreciate the new light that has been given in Scripture. This new light and the new power of sight imply one another. The one is fruitless for salvation without the other. It is by grace, then, by the gift of the Holy Spirit alone, that sinners are able to observe the fact that all nature, including even their own negative attitude toward God, is revelational of God, the God of Scripture. The wrath of God is revealed, Paul says, on all those who keep down the truth. Man's sinful nature has become his second nature. This sinful nature of man must now be included in nature as a whole. And through it God is revealed. He is revealed as the just one, as the one who hates iniquity and punishes it.

Yet he must also be seen as the one who does not yet punish to the full degree of their ill desert the wicked deeds of sinful men.

All this is simple so say that one must be a believing Christian to study nature in the proper frame of mind and with the proper procedure. It is only the Christian consciousness that is ready and willing to regard all nature, including man's own interpretative reactions, as revelational of God. But this very fact requires that the Christian consciousness make a sharp distinction between what is revelational in this broad and basic sense and what is revelational in the restricted sense. When man had not sinned, he was naturally anxious constantly to seek contact with the supernatural positive revelation of God. But it is a quite different matter when we think of the redeemed sinner. He is restored to the right relationship. But he is restored in principle only. There is a drag upon him. His "old man" wants him to interpret nature apart from the supernatural revelation in which he operates. The only safeguard he has against this historical drag is to test his interpretations constantly by the principles of the written Word. And if theology succeeds in bringing forth ever more clearly the depth of the riches of the biblical revelation of God in Scripture, the Christian philosopher or scientist will be glad to make use of this clearer and fuller interpretation in order that his own interpretation of nature may be all the fuller and clearer too, and thus more truly revelational of God. No subordination of philosophy or science to theology is intended here. The theologian is simply a specialist in the field of biblical interpretations taken in the more restricted sense. The philosopher is directly subject to the Bible and must in the last analysis rest upon his own interpretation of the Word. But he may accept the help of those who are more constantly and more exclusively engaged in biblical study than he himself can be.²¹

²¹Here, as in his Note 2, at the beginning of the chapter, Van Til interacts with the Amsterdam philosophy. Its claim is that no discipline should be "subjected" to theology because each intellectual sphere has its own sovereignty. Hermon Dooyeweerd, the most articulate exponent of this view, restricted the work of theology to a rather narrow "pistic" sphere, a technical study of dogma. While Van Til agrees with the general principle that theology should not dictate terms to another discipline, he nevertheless establishes theology as something more than narrowly dogmatic studies. Theology draws, in a specialized way, directly from the Bible and as such has authority to guide other specialists in understanding the written Word of God.

Roman Catholicism on the Starting Point

It is of the utmost importance to stress the point just made. If a Protestant finds it necessary to dispute with the Roman Catholic on the nature of Christianity itself, he will find it equally necessary to dispute with him on the problem of the point of contact. A Protestant theology requires a Protestant apologetic.

Rome's Doctrine

The difference between a Protestant and a Roman Catholic conception of the point of contact will naturally have to be formulated in a way similar to that in which we state the difference between a Protestant and a Roman Catholic theology. There are two ways of stating this difference. One very common way is to indicate first an area of doctrine that the two types of theology have in common, in order afterwards to enumerate the differences between them. This is the course followed in B. B. Warfield's justly famous little book, The Plan of Salvation. Between those holding to a plan of salvation, says Warfield, there are those who think of this plan along naturalist and there are others who think of this plan along supernaturalist lines. As against the Pelagians, who hold to a naturalist view "the entire organized Church - Orthodox Greek, Roman Catholic, Latin, and Protestantism in all its great historical forms, Lutheran and Reformed, Calvinistic and Wesleyan - bears its consentient, firm and emphatic testimony to the supernaturalistic conception of salvation."4

Continuing from this point Warfield then divides the supernaturalists into sacerdotalists and evangelicals. The issue between them concerns "the immediacy of the saving operations of God." The Church of Rome, holding the sacerdotal point of view, teaches that "grace is communicated by and through the ministrations of the church, otherwise not" On the other hand, evangelicalism, "seeking to conserve what it conceives to be the only consistent supernaturalism, sweeps away every intermediary between the soul and its God, and leaves the soul dependent for its salvation on God alone, operating upon it by his immediate grace." Now Protestantism and evangelicalism are "coterminous, if not exactly synonymous designations."

At this point Warfield goes on to mark the main variations within Protestantism.

Among Protestants or evangelicals there are those who hold to a universalistic and there are those who hold to a particularistic conception of the plan of salvation. All evangelicals agree that all the power exerted in saving the soul is from God and that this saving power is exerted immediately upon the soul. But they differ as to whether God exerts this saving power equally, or at least indiscriminately, upon all men, be they actually saved or not, or rather only upon particular men namely upon those who are actually saved (22)

Signalizing the difference between universalistic and particularistic evangelicals again, Warfield uses these words: "The precise issue which divides the universalists and the particularists is, accordingly, just whether the saving grace of God, in which alone is salvation, actually saves."

It is not germane to our purpose to follow Warfield further as he differentiates once more between various forms of particularists. The "differences of large moment" are now before us. Warfield defends particularism or Calvinism. And it has become customary to use the term evangelical with reference to non-Calvinistic Protestants.

What interests us now is the fact that though beginning from the common denominator point of view. Warfield is compelled, each time he signalizes a new difference, to indicate that it is made in the interest of consistency. Protestants are Protestants in the interest of being more consistently supernaturalist than are the Roman Catholics Calvinists are particularists in the interest of being more consistently evangelical than are the other Protestants Calvinists aim at holding a position, according to

Warfield that shall be "uncolored by intruding elements from without." Accordingly, the several conceptions of salvation "do not stand simply side by side as varying conceptions of that plan, each making its appeal in apposition to all the rest. They are related to one another rather as a progressive series of corrections of a primal error attaining ever more and more consistency in the embodiment of the one fundamental idea of salvation."

It appears, then, that Warfield himself really suggests a better way of expressing such differences as obtain between Romanism and Protestantism, or between universalistic and particularistic Protestantism than he has himself employed." That better way is pointed out by Professor John Murray when he says,

It would appear, therefore, that the truer, more effective and, on all accounts, more secure defense of Christianity and exposition of its essential content is not to take our starting point from those terms that will express the essential creedal confession of some of its most widely known historical deformations but rather from those terms that most fully express and give character to that redemptive religion which Christianity is.

In other words, Christianity cannot receive proper understanding or its exposition proper orientation unless it is viewed as that which issues from, and is consummated in the accomplishment of the covenantal counsel and purpose of Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

We are not to define the essence of Christianity in terms of its lowest but rather in terms of its highest forms. Calvinism is "Christianity come to its own." Beginning from Calvinism we should descend to universalistic Protestantism and thence to Romanism as deviations from the true view of Christianity.

It is Romanism with which we are now primarily concerned. Accordingly, Romanism should be regarded as a deformation of Christianity, in fact as its lowest deformation. And this deformation expresses itself not merely at some but at every point of doctrine. The differences between Protestantism and Romanism are not adequately indicated if we say that Luther restored to the church the true doctrines of the Bible, of justification by faith, and of the priesthood of all believers. The difference is rather that Protestantism is more consistently and Rome is less consistently Christian at every point of doctrine. It could not well be otherwise. Having inconsistency at one point of doctrine is bound to result in inconsistency at all points of doctrine. Rome has been consistently inconsistent in the confusion teaching along of non-Christian with Christian elements of the entire gamut of doctrinal expression.

The bearing of all this on the question of starting point may now be briefly suggested. In the question of starting point it is all-important that we have a truly Christian doctrine of man. But this Rome does not have. Without going into details, it may be asserted that Rome has a defective doctrine (1) with respect to the nature of man as he was created and (2) with respect to the effect of the entrance of sin upon the nature of man. "The important point of difference is," says Charles Hodge,

"that Protestants hold that original righteousness, so far as it consisted in the moral excellence of Adam, was natural, while the Romanists maintain that it was supernatural. According to their theory, God created man soul and body. These two constituents of his nature are naturally in conflict. To preserve the harmony between them, and the due subjection of the flesh to the spirit, God gave man the supernatural gift of original righteousness. It was this gift that man lost by his fall; so that since the apostasy he is in the state in which Adam was before he was invested with this supernatural endowment. In opposition to this doctrine, Protestants maintain that original righteousness was concreated and natural."

The objections to this view [Rome's view of man's creation], as Hodge enumerates them, are these: (1) "It supposes a degrading view of the original constitution of our nature. According to this doctrine the seeds of evil were implanted in the nature of man as it came from the hands of God. It was disordered or diseased, there was about it what Bellarmine calls a morbus (sickness of soul) or languor (weakness, exhaustion), which needed a remedy." (2) "This doctrine as to original righteousness arose out of the Semi-Pelagianism of the Church of Rome, and was designed to sustain it."⁸

⁸Ibid, 105. Cardinal Robert Bellarmine (1542-1621) was the ablest of all defenders of Trent and of the papacy against Protestant views. "Semi-Pelagianism" is a modern term (16th century) referring to a monastic group from 427 to 529 that rejected both Augustine and Pelagius on the issue of divine grace and human responsibility. John Cassian, for example, taught that Adam's descendants inherit a sickness from him, but do not entirely lose their free will. A certain cooperation with grace is admissible. More recent forms of semi-Pelagianism were held by Luis Molina (1535-1600) and have made their way into the church right up to the present.

Next, a textbook example of an apologetic experience.

Suppose then that a Romanist approaches an unbeliever and asks him to accept Christianity. The unbeliever, in his eyes, is merely such an one as has lost original righteousness. The image of God in him, which according to Romanism consists, as Hodge says, "only of the rational, and especially the voluntary nature of man, or the freedom of the will," is thought of as still intact. That is to say, the unbeliever is, perhaps barring extremes, correct in what he himself thinks of the powers of his intellect and will. There is not necessarily any sin involved in what the unbeliever, or natural man, does by way of exercising his capacities for knowledge and action. On this view the natural man does not need the light of Christianity to enable him to understand the world and himself aright. He does not need the revelation of Scripture or the illumination of the Holy Spirit in order that by means of them he may learn what his own true nature is.

Christianity therefore needs, on this basis, to be presented to the natural man as something that is merely information additional to what he already possesses. The knowledge of Christianity is to be related to the knowledge derived from the exercise of man's powers of reason and observation in a way similar to that in which at the beginning original righteousness was added to the image of God in man.

But without the light of Christianity it is as little possible for man to have the correct view about himself and the world as it is to have the true view about God. On account of the fact of sin, man is blind with respect to the truth wherever the truth appears. And truth is one. Man cannot truly know himself unless he truly knows God. Not recognizing the fact of the fall, the philosophers, says Calvin, throw everything into confusion. They do not reckon with the fact that “at first every part of the soul was formed to rectitude.” But that after the fall man is equally corrupt in all aspects of his being.” “They tell us,” says Calvin, there is great repugnance between the organic movements and the ratiocinatory part of the soul. As if reason also were not at variance with herself, and her counsels sometimes conflicting with each other like hostile armies. But since this disorder results from the deprivation of nature, it is erroneous to infer that there are two souls, because the faculties do not accord harmoniously as they ought. [Institutes of the Christian Religion, 1.5.7]

The next several paragraphs are great discussion on original sin and its effects on man:

It appears, then, that there is a fundamental difference of opinion between Romanism and Calvin on the origin and nature of “disturbance” in human nature. The view of Rome is essentially the same as that of the Greek philosophers: in particular, that of Aristotle. According to this view the disturbance is endemic to human nature because man is made up, in part, of nonrational elements. To the extent that man consists of intellect he does not and cannot sin. The “disturbance” in man’s make-up is not due primarily to any fault of his own. It is basically due to “God” who made him. On the other hand, according to Calvin, there is no “disturbance” in the nature of man as he comes forth from the hands of God. The “disturbance” has come in as the result of sin. Accordingly, every one of fallen man’s functions operates wrongly. The set of the whole human personality has changed. The intellect of fallen man may, as such, be keen enough. It can therefore formally understand the Christian position. It may be compared to a buzz-saw that is sharp and shining, ready to cut the boards that come to it.

Let us say that a carpenter wishes to cut fifty boards for the purpose of the floor of a house. He has marked his boards. He has set his saw. He begins at one end of the mark on the board. But he does not know that his seven-year-old son has tampered with the saw and changed its set. The result is that every board he saws is cut slantwise and thus unusable because too short except at the point where the saw first made its contact with wood. As long as the set of the saw is not changed, the result will always be the same.

So also whenever the teachings of Christianity are presented to the natural man, they will be cut according to the set of sinful human personality. The keener the intellect, the more consistently will the truths of Christianity be cut according to an exclusively immanentistic pattern.¹² The result is that however much they may formally understand the truth of Christianity, men still worship “the dream and figment of their own heart. [Calvin, The Institutes...] They have what Hodge calls “mere cognition,” but no true knowledge of God.

¹²That is, earthly, naturalistic, or in the human mind, as opposed to transcendental. Van Til’s illustration is meant to convey that though the mechanical ability to perform functions such as reasoning is working fine, sin disturbs its motive, its standard, and its goals, and so “disturbs,” or distorts those functions.

Still further, as the “philosophers” and Calvin differ on the source and nature of the “disturbance” in human nature, so they also differ on the remedy to be employed for the removal of that disturbance. According to the philosophers man does not need supernatural help for the removal of the disturbance within his being. According to the Greek view, so largely followed by Rome, man’s intellect has within itself the proper set. The fall has not disturbed the set of the saw, and therefore there is no need of the supernatural power of the Holy Spirit to reset it. The nature of the intellect and its activity is almost unaffected by what happens to man in the course of history.

In opposition to this view, Hodge, following the lead of Calvin, stresses the fact that the whole set of sinful man needs to be renewed by the power of the Holy Spirit. The natural man must be “renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him” (Col. 3:10). “New man (neon), “says Hodge in exposition of St. Paul, agreeable to the ordinary distinction between neon and kainos means recent newly made as opposed to (paloios) old. The moral quality of excellence of this recently formed man is expressed in the word anakainoumenon as in Scriptural usage what is kainos is pure. This renovation is said to be eis epignosin not in knowledge, much less by knowledge, but unto knowledge, so that he knows. Knowledge is the effect of the renovation spoken of. [see 1 John 5:20... And we know that the Son of God has come and has given us an understanding, that we may know Him who is true; and we are in Him who is true, in His Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God and eternal life.]

A little further Hodge adds: “The knowledge here intended it no mere cognition. It is full, accurate, living, or practical knowledge; such knowledge as is eternal life, [see 1 John 5:20 above!] so that this word here includes what in Ephesians 4:24 is expressed by righteousness and holiness.” [which is the restoring of the chief part of the image of God that was lost at the fall, holiness (love for God) righteousness and the knowledge of God]

Hodge also exegetes Ephesians 4:24, “Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness.” “These words,” says Hodge,

When used in combination are intended to be exhaustive, i.e., to include all moral excellence. Either term may be used in this comprehensive sense, but, when distinguished, dikaiousune means rectitude., the being and doing right, what justice demands; osiotes purity, holiness, the state of mind produced when the soul is full of God. Instead of true holiness, the words of the Apostle should be rendered “righteousness and holiness of the truth”; that is, the righteousness and holiness which are the effects of manifestations of the truth. By truth here as opposed to the deceit (apate) mentioned in the twenty-second verse, is meant what in Colossians 3:10 is called knowledge. It is the divine light in the understanding, of which the Spirit of truth is the author, and from which, as their proximate cause, all right affections and holy acts proceed.

Repeatedly Hodge stresses the fact that according to Scripture the natural man is incapable of himself to understand and accept the truth of Christianity.

The natural man, man as he is by nature, is destitute of the life of God, i.e., of spiritual life. His understanding is darkness, so that he does not know or receive the things of God. [see 1Cor. 2:14] He is not susceptible of impression from the realities of the spiritual world. He is as insensible to them as a dead man to the things of this world.

In discussing regeneration Hodge asserts,

The Bible makes eternal life to consist in knowledge; sinfulness is blindness; or darkness; the transition from a state of sin to a state of holiness is a translation from darkness into light; men are said to be renewed unto knowledge, i.e., knowledge is the effect of regeneration, conversion is said to be effected by the revelation of Christ; the rejection of Him as the Son of God and Saviour of men is referred to the fact that the eyes of those who believe not are blinded by the god of this world.

Or again,

The heart in Scripture is that which thinks, feels, wills, and acts. It is the soul, the self. A new heart is, therefore, a new self, a new man. It implies a change of the whole character. It is a new nature. Out of the heart proceed all conscious, voluntary, moral exercises. A change of heart, therefore, is a change which precedes these exercises and determines their character. ...According to the evangelical doctrine the whole soul is the subject of regeneration. It is neither the intellect to the exclusion of the feelings, nor the feelings to the exclusion of the intellect; nor is it the will alone, either in its wider or in its more limited sense, that is the subject of the change in question.... Regeneration secures right knowledge as well as right feeling; and right feeling is not the effect of right knowledge, nor is right knowledge the effect of right feeling. The two are the inseparable effects of a work which affects the whole soul.

We conclude, then, that it is natural and consistent for Roman Catholic apologetics to seek its point of contact with the unbeliever in a “common area” of knowledge. Roman Catholic theology agrees with the essential contention of those it seeks to win to the Christiana faith that man’s consciousness of himself and of the objects of the world is intelligible without reference to God.

But herein precisely lies the fundamental point of difference between Romanism and Protestantism. According to the principle of Protestantism, man’s consciousness of self and of objects presupposes for their intelligibility the consciousness of God. In asserting this we are not thinking of psychological and temporal priority. We are thinking only of the question as to what is the final reference point in interpretation. The Protestant principle finds this in the self-contained ontological Trinity. By his counsel the triune God controls whatsoever comes to pass. If then the human consciousness must, in the nature of the case, always be the proximate starting point, it remains true that God is always the most basic and therefore the ultimate or final reference point in human predication.²⁰

²⁰What is at stake here is the framework in which meaningful predication is possible. Ultimately, it must be God, the “ontological Trinity.” It is true, besides this, that in a secondary sense we begin with ourselves, meaning that self-consciousness is where we live. But this secondary starting point can never be ultimate, without sacrificing the need for God in epistemology.

This is, in the last analysis, the question as to what are one’s ultimate presuppositions. When man became a sinner, he made of himself instead of God the ultimate or final reference point. And it is precisely this presupposition, as it controls without exception all forms of non-Christian philosophy, that must be brought into question. If this presupposition is left unquestioned in any field, all the facts and arguments presented to the unbeliever will be made over by him according to his pattern. The sinner has cemented colored glasses to his eyes, which he cannot remove. And all is yellow to the jaundiced eye. There can be no intelligible reasoning unless those who reason together understand what they mean by their words.

In not challenging this basic presupposition with respect to himself as the final reference point in predication the natural man may accept the “theistic proofs” as fully valid.²¹ He may construct such proofs. He has constructed such proofs. But the God whose existence he proves to himself in this way is always a God who is something other than the self-contained ontological Trinity of Scripture. But the Roman Catholic apologete does not want to prove the existence of this sort of God. He wants to prove the existence of such a god as will leave intact the autonomy of man to at least some extent. Rome’s theology does not want a God whose counsel controls whatever comes to pass.

[codeproofs]

²¹Such proofs were developed in the Medieval period, Anselm of Canterbury’s ontological proof and Thomas Aquinas’s cosmological proof were the two best-known. Anselm’s demonstrates God’s existence from the (platonic) argument that if God is “that than which no greater can be conceived,” he must exist in reality, which is greater than in the mind. Thomas argues (from Aristotle) that from the contingency of the world, there must be a first cause, an unmoved mover. It should be noted that Van Til does not reject these altogether, but faults them as self-contained arguments, because without presupposing the larger framework of God’s revelation, unbelievers may accept them as “fully valid,” and thus arrive at a god who is only a human construct.

It is natural then the Rome’s view of the point of contact with the unbeliever is what it is.

Pg99-118

Non-Calvinistic Protestantism

We have spoken of the basic difference between Romanism and Protestantism on this question of the point of contact. But not all Protestantism has been fully true to the Protestant principle. Warfield has pointed this out admirably in the book discussed. It was only in Calvinism that the Protestant principle that salvation is of God alone has come to its consistent expression. Non-Calvinistic Protestants, frequently spoken of as evangelicals, have conceived of “the operations of God looking to salvation universalistically” in order to leave room for an ultimate decision the part of the individual human being. [Warfield, Plan of Salvation] God, as it were, through Christ deposits a large sum of money in a bank and announces this fact in the daily papers, offering to each one who comes sufficient for all his needs. It is then, in the last analysis, up to the individual whether he want to be and remain in the class of those who live by the generosity of this bank. God approaches man by means of universals.

There are differences among evangelicals, but, in the last analysis, these differences are merely as to whether God approaches the individuals by means of a wider or narrower species. The final issue is always left up to the individual. “Particularism in the process of salvation becomes thus the mark of Calvinism.” [Warfield] Warfield speaks therefore of Calvinism as being the only form of Protestantism “uncolored by intruding elements from without.” God’s action is the ultimate source of all determinate being.

For our purposes, then, the point of importance is that evangelicalism has retained something of Roman Catholicism both in its view of man and in its view of God. Like Romanism, evangelicalism thinks of human self-consciousness and consciousness of objects as to some extent intelligible without the consciousness of God. It is to be expected that evangelicalism will be in agreement with Tomé on the question of the point of contact. Both forms of theology are colored by elements of an underlying naturalism. Both are therefore unwilling to challenge the natural man's basic presupposition with respect to himself as the ultimate reference point in interpretation. Both are unwilling to prove the existence of such a God as controls whatsoever comes to pass.

The great textbook of evangelical apologetics is Bishop Butler's famous Analogy.²⁴ It is not our purpose here to deal with its argument fully. Suffice it to point out that its argument is closely similar to that which is found, for instance, in the Summa Contra Gentiles of Thomas Aquinas.²⁵ Butler holds to an Arminian view in theology.²⁶ He therefore assumes that the natural man, by "a reasonable use of reason," can interpret aright "the course and constitution of nature." If only the natural man will continue to employ the same "reasonable use of reason" with respect to the facts presented to him in Scripture about Christ and this work, there is every likelihood that he will become a Christian.

²⁴Mentioned earlier (chap. 2, note 9), Bishop Joseph Butler (1692-1752) was an influential Anglican moral philosopher. He attempted to refute deism, which taught that traditional dogma and clerical rule were antagonistic to human reason, and that natural religion is incompatible with miracles, Christ's atonement, etc. Butler's defense against deists centers on an analogy between revealed religion and the natural realm, hence the title of his most important book, The Analogy of Religion Natural and Revealed to the Constitution and Course of Nature (1736). Van Til regularly refers to Butler as the principal exponent of classical apologetics, which appeals to a neutral ground as understood by the criteria of unaided human reason.

²⁶Jacobus Arminius (1560-1609) objected to unconditional predestination and asserted that human will is free to believe, not bound because of sin; though we need grace, it is resistible. His followers were called semi-pelagian (see note 8, on pg 91 above, ref. Bellarmine).

Less Consistent Calvinism

The question of starting point, then, is largely determined by one's theology. In the first chapters it has been our aim to set forth the salient features of Christianity according to the principle of the Reformed faith. In particular it has been the aim to indicate the main features of Christianity after the fashion indicated by the great Reformed theologians of recent time. It is on the basis of the work of such men as Charles Hodge and B. B. Warfield, to mention no others, that we have formulated the broad outline of the Reformed life-and-world view. It is only by the help of such men that we have been enabled to attain to anything like a consistent Protestantism.

It is only to follow out their suggestion, then, if we follow their principles in apologetics as well as in theology proper. We are to defend, as Warfield himself so well expresses it, not some minimal essence of Christianity, nor every detail included in the doctrines of Christianity, but “just Christianity itself, including all its “details” and involving its ‘essence’ in its unexplicated and uncompressed entirety.”

And this is Christianity we must bring to those who are dead in trespasses and sin. “it is,” says Warfield,

Upon a field of the dead that the Son of righteousness has risen, and the shouts that announce His advent fill on deaf ears; yea, even though the morning stars should again sing for joy and the air be palpitant with the echo of the great proclamation, their voice could not penetrate the ears of the dead. As we seep our eyes over the world lying in its wickedness it is the valley of the prophet’s vision which we see before us; a valley that is filled with bones, and lo! They are very dry. What benefit is there in proclaiming to dry bones even the greatest of redemptions? How shall we stand and cry, “O, ye dry bones, hear ye the word of the Lord.” In vain the redemption, in vain its proclamation, unless there come a breath from heaven to breathe upon these slain that they may live.

“The Christian lives by virtue of the life that has been given to him, and prior to the inception of that life, of course, he has no power of action; and it is of the utmost importance that as Christian men we should not lower our testimony to this supernaturalness of our salvation.” [Warfield] Regeneration, we have seen Hodge argue, is unto knowledge, righteousness and holiness.

It would seem that we have dropped from this high plane to the level of evangelicalism when Hodge speaks of the office of reason in matters of religion.³⁰ Under this heading he takes up three points. First he shows that reason is necessary as a tool for the reception of revelation. About this point there can be little cause for dispute. “Revelations cannot be made to brutes or to idiots”³¹ Second, Hodge argues that “reason must judge of the credibility of a revelation.” And “the credible is that which can be believed. Nothing is incredible but the impossible. What may be, may be rationally (i.e., on adequate grounds) believed.” What then is impossible? Hodge replies:

(1) That is impossible which involves a contradiction; as, that a thing is and is not; that right is wrong, and wrong right. (2) It is impossible that God should do, approve, or command what is morally wrong. (3) It is impossible that He should require of us to believe what contradicts any of the laws of belief which He has impressed upon our nature. (4) It is impossible that one truth should contradict another. It is impossible, therefore, that God should reveal anything as true which contradicts any well authenticated truth, whether of intuition, experience, or previous revelation.

³⁰Evangelicalism for Van Til is a general Protestant faith, which does not have the consistency of Calvinism. He finds Hodge’s treatment of reason not sufficiently free from Arminian theology. Accordingly, Hodge cannot fully recognize the sinful use of reason, based on its supposed ultimacy, by those outside of Christ. He does not fully distinguish between upright, created mankind, and the sinful consciousness of fallen mankind. Van Til is still discussing the point of contact, but widens the discussion to the issue of the ability of reason. It is evident that he remains a great admirer of Hodge, despite these polemics in one area.

Third, Hodge continues, “Reason must judge of the evidences of a revelation.” As “faith involves assent, and assent is conviction produced by evidence, it follows that faith without evidence is either irrational or impossible.” The second and third prerogatives of reason, say Hodge, are approved by Scripture itself. Paulo “recognized the paramount authority of the intuitive judgments of the mind” and “Jesus appealed to his works as evidence of the truth of this claims.”

It is not our purpose here to deal fully with the question of reason and revelation. Suffice it to note the ambiguity that underlies this approach to the question of the point of contact. When Hodge speaks of reason, he means “those laws of belief which God has implanted in our nature.” Now it is true that, of course, that God has planted such laws of belief into our very being. It is this point on which Calvin lays such great stress when he says that all men have a sense of deity. But the unbeliever does not accept the doctrine of his creation in the image of god. It is therefore impossible so appeal to the intellectual and moral nature of men, as men themselves interpret this nature, and say that it must judge of the credibility and evidence of revelation. For if this is done, we are virtually telling the natural man to accept just so much and no more of Christianity as, with his perverted concept of human nature, he cares to accept.

To use once again the illustration of the saw: The saw is in itself but a tool. Whether it will move at all and whether it will cut in the right direction depend upon the man operating it. So also reason, or intellect, is always the instrument of a person. And the person employing it is always either a believer or an unbeliever. If he is a believer, his reason has already been changed in its set, as Hodge has told us, by regeneration. It cannot then be the judge; it is now a part of the regenerated person, gladly subject to the authority of God. It has by God’s grace permitted itself to be interpreted by God’s revelation. If, on the other hand, the person using his reason is an unbeliever, then this person, using his reason, will certainly assume the position of judge with respect to the credibility and evidence of revelation, but he will also certainly find the Christian religion incredible because impossible and the evidence for it always inadequate.

Hodge’s own teaching on the blindness and hardness of the natural man corroborates this fact. To attribute to the natural man the right to judge by means of his reason what is possible or impossible, or to judge by means of this moral nature what is good or evil, is virtually to deny the “particularism” [unconditional election/limited atonement] that Hodge, no less than Warfield, believes to be the very hallmark of a truly biblical theology. In such a case Christianity would not claim to interpret the reasoner himself. That reasoner would be taken as already having within himself, previous to his acceptance of Christianity, the ability rightly to interpret and rightly to employ the powers of his own nature. And this is the exact equivalent of the Arminian position when it claims that God made salvation objectively possible but did not actually save individual men.

The main difficulty with the position of Hodge on this matter of the point of contact, then, is that it does not clearly distinguish between the original and the fallen nature of man. Basically, of course, it is Hodge’s intention to appeal to the original nature of man as it came forth from the hands of its Creator. But he frequently argues as though that original nature can still be found as active in the “common consciousness” of men. Now there is a large element of truth in the contention that the common sense of man has not strayed so far from the truth as have the sophistications of the philosophers. Outspoken, blasphemous atheism is not usually found among the masses of men. But his does not take away the fact that all men are sinful in all the manifestations of their personality.

A comparison may tend to clarify this point. In the seventh chapter of Romans, Paul speaks of himself, though a believer, as having a law of sin within his members, which often controls him against his will. His “new man” is the real man, the man in Christ Jesus. But his “old man” is the remnant of his sinful nature, which has not been fully destroyed. Applying this analogy to the natural man we have the following. The sinner is the one whose “new man” is the man in alliance with Satan. But his “old man” is that which wars within his members against his will; it is his nature as he came forth from the hands of his Creator. When the prodigal has left his father’s house, he is on the way to the swine-trough. But while on his way he has his misgivings. He seeks to make himself believe that his true nature consists in his self-assertion away from the father’s house. But he kicks against the pricks. [Acts 9:5 NKJV] He sins against better knowledge.

Now it is quite in accord with the genius of Hodge’s theology to appeal to the “old man” in the sinner and altogether out of accord with his theology to appeal to the “new man” in the sinner as though he would form a basically proper judgment on any question. Yet Hodge has failed to distinguish clearly between these two. Yet Hodge has failed to distinguish clearly between these two. Accordingly he does not clearly distinguish the Reformed from the Evangelical and Roman Catholic views of the point of contact. Accordingly he also speaks about “reason” as something that seems to operate rightly wherever it is found. But the “reason” of sinful men will invariably act wrongly. Particularly is this true when they are confronted with the specific contents of Scripture. The natural man will invariably employ the tool of his reason to reduce these contents to a naturalistic level. He must do so even in the interest of the principle of contradiction. For his own ultimacy is the most basic presupposition of his entire philosophy. It is upon this presupposition as its fulcrum that he uses the law of contradiction. If he is asked to use his reason as the judge of the credibility of the Christian revelation without at the same time being asked to renounce his view of himself as ultimate, then he is virtually asked to believe and to disbelieve in his own ultimacy at the same time and in the same sense. [Wow!]

Moreover, this same man, in addition to rejecting Christianity in the name of the law of contradiction, will also reject it in the name of what he calls his intuition of freedom. By this he means virtually the same thing as his ultimacy. Speaking of the “philosophers” Calvin says, “The principle they set out with was that man could not be a rational animal unless he had a free choice of good and evil... They also imagined that that distinction between virtue and vice was destroyed, if man did not of his own counsel arrange his life.” [Textbook Arminianism] If such a one is asked to accept the position of Christianity, according to which his destiny is ultimately determined by the counsel of God, he is asked to accept what to him makes right wrong and wrong right. [hence the darkness that is in unregenerate men.]

It is only to follow out the lead which Hodge in his theology, following Calvin, has given, if we seek our point of contact not in any abstraction whatsoever, whether it be reason or intuition. No such abstraction exists in the universe of men. We always deal with concrete individual men. These men are sinners. They have “an axe to grind.” They want to suppress the truth in unrighteousness. They will employ their reason for that purpose. And they are not formally illogical if, granted the assumption of man's ultimacy, they reject the teachings of Christianity. On the contrary, to be logically consistent they are bound to do so. This point will engage us more fully in the sequel. For the moment it must suffice to have shown how the apologist is not only untrue to his own doctrine of man as the creature of God, but also defeats his own purpose if he appeals to some form of the "common consciousness of man."

Before going on to discuss what appears to us to be a more truly Biblical view of the problem of the point of contact, we would call attention to one other form of inconsistent Calvinism on this matter. In his book, Het Testimonium Spiritus Sancti, D. Valentine Hepp speaks about prima principia with respect to God, man and the world which, he says, men in general accept.³³

With respect to the central truths which speak to us from creation as such, there is little doubt among men. A few mistaken scientists, who insist on maintaining their mistaken starting-point, insist that they doubt whether God or man or world exist. They owe such statements, not to experience, but to their systems. But their number, though we hear much of them, is very small. Taken as a whole mankind does not deny the central truths. The great majority of men recognize a higher power above them, and do not hesitate to accept the reality of the world and of man.

The position of Hepp, as appears even from this one quotation, is similar to that of Hodge. Like Hodge, Hepp wants to appeal to a general faith in "central truths" that all men, when not too sophisticated, accept. There seems to be for Hepp, as for Hodge, something in the way of a commonsense philosophy which the natural man has and which, because intuitive or spontaneous, is, so far forth, not tainted by sin. It appears, however, even from the brief quotation given, that the "common notions" of men are sinful notions. For man to reflect on this own awareness of meaning and then merely to say that a higher power, a God, exists, is in effect to say that God does not exist. It is as though a child, reflecting upon his home environment would conclude that a father or a mother exist. And to "recognize the reality of the world and of man" is in itself not even to recognize the elemental truths of creation and providence. It is not enough to appeal from the more highly articulated systems of non-Christian thinkers to the philosophy of the common consciousness, of common sense, of intuition, that is to something that is more immediately related to the revelational pressure that rest upon men.

Both Hepp and Hodge seem to be desirous of doing no more than Calvin does when he appeals to the sense of deity present in all men. But this notion, seeking to set froth as it does the teaching of Paul, that God's revelation is present to every man, must be carefully distinguished from the reaction that sinful men make to this revelation. The revelation of God, not of a god, is so immediately present to every man, that, as Warfield, following Calvin, says: "The conviction of the existence of God bears the marks of an intuitive truth in so far as it is the universal and unavoidable belief of men, and is given in the very same act with the idea of self, which is known at once as dependent and responsible and thus implies one on whom it depends and to whom it is responsible." It is to this sense of deity, even this knowledge of God, which, Paul tells us (tom 1:19-20) every man has, but which, as Paul also tells us, every sinner seeks to suppress, that the Christian apologetic must appeal.

Comments on Thomas Aquinas, Plato - relating to Arminianism, etc.

The Dilemma of the Roman Catholic View

Plato's famous allegory of the cave may illustrate the Roman Catholic position. The dwellers of this cave had chains about their necks and on their legs. They saw nothing but shadows and attributed echoes to these shadows. Yet they supposed that "they were naming what was actually before them." If one of them should be released, says Plato, he would need to get accustomed to the light of the sun. But he would pity those who were still in the cave. And "if he had to compete in the measuring the shadows with the prisoners who have never moved out of the den would he not be ridiculous" in their view? "Men would say of him that up he went and down he comes without his eyes; and that there is no use in even thinking of ascending" and if anyone tried to loose another and lead him up to the light, let them only catch the offender in the act, and they would put him to death." [Plato, The Republic, bk 7]

Plato himself interprets this allegory in relation to man's capacity for and knowledge of the truth. The prisoners have eyes with which to see the truth; all they need is to have their heads turned about so they may face the truth. [typical evangelical view of man's capacity for truth]

It is in some such fashion that Rome thinks of the natural man. [the unsaved man or unregenerate man.] Following Aristotle's general method of reasoning, Thomas Aquinas argues that the natural man can, by the ordinary use of his reason, do justice to the natural revelation that surrounds him. He merely needs some assistance in order that he may also see and react properly to the supernatural revelation that is found in Christianity. [of course, man's depravity prevents this, Romans 8:7-8]

According to the Roman view then, the natural man is already in possession of the truth. To be sure, he is said to be in possession of the truth only with respect to natural revelation. But if the natural man can and does interpret natural revelation in a way that is essentially correct, there is no reason why he should need supernatural aid in order to interpret Christianity truly. [that's the key assumption Rome and Arminianism makes] At most he would need the information that Christ and his Spirit have come into the world. Hearing this news, he would not fail, as a rational being, to make the proper reaction to it. If the natural man's eyes (reason) enable him to see correctly in one dimension, there is no good reason to think that these same eyes will not enable him, without further assistance from without, to see correctly in all dimensions. There would be no reason why all of the prisoners of the cave could not break their chains and walk in the light of day. In fact, Plato gives no reason why those who did not escape could not have escaped as well as the one who did.

On the other hand, it may be said that according to the Roman Catholic view the natural man does not give a fully correct interpretation of natural revelation. Does not Thomas Aquinas correct the interpretations that “the philosopher” has given of the things of nature? And does not the Roman Catholic view of the image of God in man itself imply that even originally, before the fall, man was unable, without the bonum superadditum (super-added good) to know anything in a perfect way?³⁸

³⁸In traditional Roman Catholic theology, mankind before the fall was partly earthy, but with an added gift of goodness from God. At the fall, the gift was removed, though the earthly qualities remained. [that is, not wholly corrupted by sin.] Recall Van Til’s arguments against this view, which places humans somewhere along a scale of being, with higher and lower tendencies, rather than fully as image-bearers [righteousness being natural to Adam, concreated, not superadded], whether in pre-fallen integrity or fallen corruption of the whole self.

Note: “The monistic view makes no basic difference between Creator and creature, but rather presents being as uniform, though with gradations between lower and higher forms.” Wm Edgar, editor of Van Til’s book, Christian Apologetics, pg 31, footnote 3 [Van Til refers to this as “scale of being” in his writings.]

We reply that though Aquinas does correct some of the conclusions of Aristotle, he accepts the method of Aristotle as essentially sound. But, ignoring this, and granting for the sake of the argument that according to Rome the natural man’s view of natural revelation is not fully correct, it should be noted that the only reason Rome can adduce for this fact is a defect in revelation itself. The prisoners of Plato’s cave are not to be blamed for the fact that they see shadows only. They are doing full justice by the position in which they find themselves. If their heads are bound so that they see shadow only, this is due to no fault of theirs. It is due to the constitution and course of nature. According to this view the human mind is not originally and naturally in contact with truth. The idea of freedom, as entertained by Roman theology, is base upon man’s being metaphysically distinct from “god.” And this is tantamount to saying that man is free to the extent that he has no “being.” There is on this basis no genuine point of contact with the mind of the natural man at all.

We do not object to the idea that the mind of man is said to be always in need of supernatural revelation. On the contrary we would stress the fact that even in paradise the mind of man needed and enjoyed a supernatural revelation. What we object to is the reason given for the need that man had of supernatural revelation even in paradise. The reason for this need, according to the Roman Catholic view, is virtually a defect in the original constitution of man. This implies that man is naturally, according to his original constitution, prone to error as well as to truth. The reason for this is that the god of Roman Catholicism does not control “whatsoever comes to pass.” Man is, accordingly, not exclusively confronted with that which reveals God. Man is also confronted with the ultimately non-rational. On such a conception of reality in general it is natural that man’s constitution should be thought of, on the one hand, as of itself possessing the truth and, on the other hand, as never able, by its natural actions, to come into possession of the truth.

On such a basis too, the addition of the supernatural to natural revelation would not remedy matters. It would be as true of supernatural as of natural revelation that either it would not reach man or else if it did reach man, he would not be in need of it.

If natural revelation does not so envelop man as to make it impossible for him to look at anything that does not speak of God, then supernatural revelation will not do this either. If natural revelation does not speak of such a God who by his counsel surrounds man completely, then neither can supernatural revelation speak of such a god. But if it did, per impossible (though this is impossible), speak of such a God, it could mean nothing to the mind of man as Rome conceives of it. The revelation of a self-sufficient God can have no meaning for a mind that thinks of itself as ultimately autonomous. The possibility of a point of contact has disappeared. The whole idea of the revelation of the self-sufficient God of Scripture drops to the ground if man himself is autonomous or self-sufficient. If man is not himself revelational in the internal structure of his being, he can receive no revelation that comes to him from without.³⁹

³⁹For Van Til, self-awareness is not outside of revelation, but operates precisely because of revelation. As image-bearers, any self-knowledge leads to knowledge of God, as well as the other way around. Van Til is arguing against a neutral, or autonomous, reasoning process that must somehow grope to find God.

On the other hand, if man is in any sense autonomous, he is not in need of revelation. If he is, then, said to possess the truth, he possesses it as the product of the ultimately legislative power of his intellect. It is only if he can virtually control by means of the application of the law of non-contradiction all the facts of reality that surround him, that he can know any truth at all. And thus, if he knows any truth in this way, he in effect knows all truth.

On the Roman Catholic position, then, man is, with the cave-dwellers of Plato, by virtue of his own constitution [not his sinfulness], adapted to semi-darkness. Revelation would not do him any good, even though we might think of him as in need of it. If revelation is to come to him, it must come to him as the truth came to one of Plato's cave-dwellers, in an accidental fashion. Or else man is, with the accidentally liberated cave-dwellers of Plato, not in need of supernatural revelation; potentially he has all truth within his reach.

The Reformed Position

The fully biblical conception of the point of contact, it ought now to be clear, is the only one that can escape the dilemma of absolute ignorance of absolute omniscience. The one great defect of the Roman Catholic view and the Arminian view is, as noted, that it ascribes ultimacy or self-sufficiency to the mind of man. Romanism and Arminianism do this in their view of man as stated in their works on systematic theology. It is consistent for them, therefore, not to challenge the assumption of ultimacy as this is made by the non-believer. But Reformed theology, as worked out by Calvin and his recent exponents, such as Hodge, Warfield, Kuyper, and Bavinck, holds that man's mind is derivative. As such it is naturally in contact with God's revelation. It is surrounded by nothing but revelation. It is itself inherently revelational. It cannot naturally be conscious of itself without being conscious of its creatureliness. For man, self-consciousness presupposes God-consciousness. Calvin speaks of this as man's inescapable sense of deity.

The Reformed Position

Of course, when we thus stress Paul's teaching that all men do not merely have a capacity for but are in actual possession of the knowledge of God, we have at one to add Paul's further instruction to the effect that all men, due to the sin within them, always and in all relationships seek to "suppress" this knowledge of God (Rom. 1:18 NASB). The natural man is such a one as constantly throws water on a fire he cannot quench. He has yielded to the temptation of Satan and has become this bondservant. When Satan tempted Adam and Eve in paradise, he sought to make them believe that man's self-consciousness was ultimate rather than derivative and God-dependent. He argued, as it were, that it was of the nature of self-consciousness to make itself the final reference point of all predication. He argued, as it were, that God had not control over all that might come forth in the process of time. That is to say, he argued, in effect, that as any form of self-consciousness must assume its own ultimacy, so it must also admit its own limitation in the fact that much that happens is under no control at all. Thus, Satan argued, as it were, that man's consciousness of time and of time's products in history is, if intelligible at all, intelligible in some measure independently of God.

Romanism and evangelicalism, however do not attribute to sin this assumption of autonomy or ultimacy on the part of man. They hold that man should quite properly think of himself and of his relation to objects in time in this way. Hence, they do injustice to Paul's teaching with respect to the effect of sin on the interpretative activity of man. As they virtually deny that originally man not merely had a capacity for the truth but was in actual possession of the truth, so also they virtually deny that the natural man suppresses the truth.

It is not to be wondered at, then, that neither Rome nor evangelicalism is little interested in challenging the "philosophers" when these, as Calvin says, interpret man's consciousness without being aware of the tremendous difference in man's attitude toward the truth before and after the fall. Accordingly, they do not distinguish carefully between the natural man's own conception of himself and the biblical conception of him. Yet for the question of the point of contact this is all-important. If we make our appeal to the natural man without being aware of this distinction, we virtually admit that the natural man's estimate of himself is correct. We may, to be sure, even then maintain that he is in need of information. We may even admit that he is morally corrupt. But the one thing that, on this basis, we cannot admit is that his claim to be able to interpret at least some area of experience in a way that is essentially correct, is mistaken. We cannot then challenge his most basic epistemological assumption to the effect that his self-consciousness and time-consciousness are self-explanatory. We cannot challenge his right to interpret all his experience in exclusively immanentistic categories [as opposed to transcendent categories]. And on this everything hinges. For if we first allow the legitimacy of the natural man's assumption of himself as the ultimate reference point in interpretation of himself as the ultimate reference point in interpretation in any dimension, we cannot deny his right to interpret Christianity itself in naturalistic terms.

The point of contact for the gospel, then, but be sought within the natural man. Deep down in his mind every man knows that he is the creature of God and responsible to God. Every man, at bottom, knows that he is a covenant breaker. But every man acts and talks as though this were not so. It is this one point that cannot bear mentioning in his presence. A man may have internal cancer. Yet it may be the one point he will not have one speak of in his presence. He will grant that he is not feeling well. He will accept any sort of medication so long as it does not pretend to be given in answer to a cancer diagnosis. Will a good doctor cater to him on this matter? Certainly no. He will tell his patient that he has promise of life, but promise of life on one condition, that is, of an immediate internal operation.

So it is with the sinner. He is alive but alive as a covenant breaker. But his own interpretative activity with respect to all things proceeds on the assumption that such is not the case. Romanism and evangelicalism but failing to appeal exclusively to that which is within man but is also suppressed by every man, virtually allow the legitimacy of the natural man's view of himself. They do not seek to explode the last stronghold to which the natural man always flees and where he always makes his final stand. They cut off the weeds at the surface but do not dig up the roots of these weeds for fear that crops will not grow.

The truly biblical view, on the other hand, applies atomic power and flame-throwers to the very presupposition of the natural man's ideas with respect to himself. It does not fear to lose a point of contact by uprooting the weeds rather than by cutting them off at the very surface. It is assured of a point of contact in the fact that every man is made in the image of God and has impressed upon him the law of God. In that fact alone he may rest secure with respect to the point of contact problem. For that fact makes men always accessible to God. That fact assures us that everyman, to be a man at all, must already be in contact with the truth. He is so much in contact with the truth that much of his energy is spent in the vain effort to hide this fact from himself. His efforts to hide this fact from himself are bound to be self-frustrative.

Only by thus finding the point of contact in man's sense of deity that lies underneath his own conception of self-consciousness as ultimate can we be both true to Scripture and effective in reasoning with the natural man. end pg 121

Our concern throughout is to indicate the nature of a truly Protestant, that is, a Reformed, apologetic. A Reformed method of apologetics must seek to vindicate the Reformed life-and-world view as Christianity come to its own. It has already become plain that this implies a refusal to grant that any area or aspect of reality, any fact or any law of nature or of history, can be correctly interpreted except it be seen in the light of the main doctrines of Christianity. But if this is true, it becomes quite impossible for the apologist to do what Roman Catholics and Arminians can and must do on the basis of their view of Christianity, namely, agree with the non-Christian in his principles of methodology to see whether or not Christian theism is true. From the Roman Catholic and the Arminian point of view the question of methodology, like that of starting point, is a neutral matter. According to these positions the Christian apologist can legitimately join the non-Christian scientist or philosopher as he, by his recognized methods, investigate certain dimensions of reality. Neither the follower of Thomas Aquinas nor the follower of “judicious Butler” world need, on his principles, to object when, for instance A. E. Taylor says:

Natural science, let me say again, is exclusively concerned with the detection of “laws of nature,” uniformities of sequence in the course of events. The typical form of such a law is the statement that whenever certain definitely measurable events occur some other measurable event will also be found to occur. Any query thus delimited obviously can throw no light on the question whether God exists or not, the question whether the whole course of events among which the man of science discovers these uniformities of sequence is or is not guided by a supreme intelligence to the production of an intrinsically good result.

The Reformed Apologist, on the other hand, would compromise what he holds to be of the essence of Christianity if he agreed with Taylor. For him the whole of created reality, including therefore the fields of research with which the various sciences deal, reveals the same God of which Scripture speaks. The very essence of created reality is its revelational character. Scientists deal with that which has the imprint of God’s face upon it. Created reality may be compared to a great estate. The owner has his name plainly and indelibly written at unavoidable places. How then would it be possible for some stranger to enter this estate, make researches in it, and then fairly say that in these researches he need not and cannot be confronted with the question of ownership? To change the figure, compare the facts of nature and history, the facts with which the sciences are concerned, to a linoleum that has its figure indelibly imprinted in it. The pattern of such as linoleum cannot be effaced to the linoleum itself is won away. Thus inescapably does the scientist meet the pattern of christian theism in each fact with which he deals.

The apostle Paul lays great stress upon the fact that man is without excuse if he does not discover God in nature. Following Paul’s example, Calvin argues that men ought to see God, not a god, not some supernatural power, but the only God in nature. They have not done justice by the facts they see displayed before and within them if they say that a god exists or that God probably exists. The Calvinist holds to essential perspicuity of natural as well as biblical revelation. This does not mean that no non-Christian and a non-theistic interpretation of reality cannot be made to appear plausible. But it does mean that no non-Christian position can be made to appear more than merely plausible.

Roman Catholic apologists can, therefore, to the extent that their own theology does not teach the perspicuity of natural revelation, with consistency use the method of the natural man. Just as Rome, having a semi-pagan conception of the nature of man, can agree with the natural man’s conception of the starting point in knowledge, so also, having a semi-pagan concept of the nature of the objects man must know, he can to a large extent agree with the natural man’s conception of the method of knowledge.

Arminian apologists also, to the extent that their theology is faulty, can consistently agree with the non-believer on the question of methodology. Believing to some extent in the autonomy and ultimacy of human personality, Arminianism can, in a measure, agree on the question of starting point with those who make men the final reference point in all human predication. So also, believing to some extent in the existence of facts that are not wholly under the control and direction of the counsel of God, Arminianism can agree on the question of method with those for whom the object of knowledge has nothing at all to do with the plan of God.

In contradistinction from both Roman Catholics and Arminians, however, the Reformed Apologists cannot agree at all with the methodology of the natural man. Disagreeing with the natural man's interpretation of himself as the ultimate reference point, the Reformed apologist must seek his point of contact with the natural man in that which is beneath the threshold of his working consciousness, in the sense of deity that he seeks to suppress. And to do this the Reformed apologist must also seek a point of contact with the systems constructed by the natural man. But this point of contact must be in the nature of a head-on collision. If there is not head-on collision with the systems of the natural man, there will be no point of contact with the sense of deity in the natural man.

Notes on Arminianism

Excerpt from

Van Til and the Limits of Reason

Pgs. 28-31

My comments in [blue]

In Arminianism, as Van Til analyzes it, the unwillingness to face the full implication of original sin carried Protestantism further along on the road of concessions. In Watson, sin is ascribed to finitude rather than to moral revolt against God. Evil and finitude of necessity go together in this view, and man needs a savior not because of a moral condition but because his is a human being. In other words, the implication is that man needs to be delivered not so much from sin as from creaturehood – from his finitude into infinitude. Moreover, from the Arminian point of view, man's rationality and freedom involve and include his ability to change the history of God has planned or to do things God has not planned. In short, man's life is outside the plan of God and constitutes a fact beyond God's control, one to which God can offer assistance but cannot govern. We are here on the road to the modern philosophic point of view which sees the space-time continuum as the matrix of all reality. God exists, and is in the picture, but increasingly as a spectator, on the sidelines, ready to cheer man on but unable to determine the course and outcome of the race. Arminianism allows God and Christ onto the scene only to start the race, remove certain obstacles, and to award a prize. The final determination of events belongs to man. Arminianism further holds that, to be truly ethical, the will of man must be exclusively responsible for what is done. [That is, man in his assumed autonomousness thinks he is self-determinative in all he does - his will is self-determined, he is the 'first cause' in his actions, etc., which excludes God as the first cause. This perverted mindset is the result of man's declaration of independence from God. Man is a genuine second cause, but back of that is God as the first cause. See also the doctrine of compatibility.]

But the measure of self-determination demanded for man is an impossibility (and a significant impossibility) in that such self-determination is possible for God alone. Since man is a creature, living in a created world, in time governed by God, his act cannot suddenly break context with its entire world. The act of a creature, in a created world and in created time, can be only a created act. It is not only a personal act and a responsible act but also a created act. Thus, in its concept of the ethical act, Arminianism claims for man what is possible only with God and thereby robs God to honor man. Moreover, God is further robbed by making evil virtually mean finiteness. If evil is finiteness, and finitude is the inherent condition of man, then the Greek dilemma is again with us, namely, that evil is as ultimate as the good, that evil is a part of the ultimate reality. Primacy is given to the temporal realm, which is the determinative one in this view, and evil is made basic to the temporal realm because finitude is inherent in it. The moral evil of Christian thought is eliminated, man is too independent for a concept of transmitted original sin to be credible. Theology thus gives way to an anthropology, God to man, and eternity to time.

In Calvinism, the Greek element was eliminated from Christian-theistic thought and a consistent epistemology formulated. The false independence of man was shown for what it is and the noetic influence of sin fully recognized. Scripture was made central to thinking and the work of the Holy Spirit in the restoration of man to the true knowledge of God emphasized. Calvin's conception distinguished between the narrower and wider sense or understanding of the image. In the narrower sense, it applies to the true knowledge, true righteousness, and true holiness which man possessed when created by God. The fall destroyed this image, whereas the image in its broader sense, man's rationality and morality, his intellectual and emotional life, remain still in God's image but with limitations. Man retains these aspects of his nature but in a blinded sense. He is rational but his rationality is spiritually blind, emotionally distorted and out of kilter in terms of its created purpose, i.e., to function analogically, to think God's thoughts after Him, and to interpret and experience life in terms of the will of God.

Man, while spiritually blind, is still a person, and therefore the synergism of Luther is no necessity for Calvin. Synergism faced an either-or situation: either God acted or man acted. It did not dare face the ultimate question: either God is a person or man is a person. For Calvin, man is a personality because God is a person. The sinner, a created person, cannot know God aright unless new light is given him by the Scripture and the power of sight restored by the Holy Spirit working in his heart. Salvation is not the externalization of man but rather his restoration to his original perfection and a development thereof. The incarnation is therefore not made necessary by man's finitude but by his sin. Since man's finitude is not the problem, Christ's human nature, in the Lutheran sense, is not needed in the sacrament. The eternal order is the determinative one, and God saves man in time, not because of time. God saves man through the incarnation, by means of the appearance of the Second person of the Trinity in history and his incarnation, whereby human nature was united without intermingling with the divine nature. The incarnation was the means of salvation, but the cause of salvation was to be found only in the foreordained and predestined eternal counsel of God – only in the ontological trinity.

The Errors of Human Philosophy

Notes on Reality and the 'god' of Philosophers: Immanentistic Philosophy, from Calvin vs. Aquinas on Man's Depravity and Man Suppressing the Knowledge of God, Calvin on Regeneration Necessary, Fallen Man's Understandings and Reasonings

Excerpts from
The Defense of Christianity and My Credo

By Cornelius Van Til

Pgs. 15-21

Code521

What then of the generality of men that are not taught of God through Christ and his Spirit? Must it be said, since they have not this "saving knowledge" of God which comes through Christ, that they have no knowledge of God at all? Must it first be shown to them in terms of a theory of knowledge and reality which they have devised to their own principles, to come to the knowledge of God? If so, then why must men be taught by the Christ who has revealed God? Must it be shown to them that in terms of their own principles it is possible for them to learn about the Christ? If so, then must not men first teach the Christ of God and the world before they Christ can teach them? Must they be told that in terms of their own principle they can see the need for the regenerating power of the Spirit as a prerequisite to understanding the Scriptures, knowing the Christ and thus coming to God? If so, then why is the Holy Spirit necessary to convict men of sin, of righteousness and of judgement?

All these questions must , therefore, be answered in the negative. For to answer them in the affirmative would mean that though man as a finite being is not in contact with the truth, that though he be floating in an infinity of Chance, yet he might find the truth. If on this basis he would find the truth, it would be because he, by accident, had "hit upon it." When thus hitting upon it, he would "hit upon" a god who is himself afloat in the bottomless ocean of Chance. It would not be the God of the Scriptures at all.

Accordingly Calvin argues that though mankind generally does not have the knowledge that comes from being "taught of God," men do have a knowledge that is created with them and inherited from Adam. It is the knowledge which they have as image bearers of God. Men generally seek to suppress this knowledge of God. They would gladly live where the searchlight of God's revelation does not constantly expose them to themselves. But there is no such place. This searchlight never ceases to shine. It shines particularly within them. There is no hiding from it. The knowledge of God is infixed in their being. Hence,

If for these there is any respite from anxiety of conscience, it is not much different from the sleep of drunken or frenzied persons, who do not rest peacefully even while sleeping because they are continually troubled with dire and dreadful dreams. The impious themselves therefore exemplify the fact that some conception of God ever alive in all men's minds. (Calvin, I. 3, 2)

Although Diagoras and his like may jest at whatever has been believed in every age concerning religion, and Dionysius may mock the heavenly judgment, this is sardonic laughter, for the worm of conscience sharper than any cauterizing iron, gnaws away within them (I. 3, 3).

Men in general are, therefore, truth suppressors. They are not those who are first of all without knowledge of the truth. They are indeed such, if one thinks of the knowledge that must come from Scripture. But they are first of all truth possessors, or truth-knowers, who have, by sinning, become truth suppressors. Having taken to themselves the right to define the nature of God and of themselves, they have mingled the idea of their new god with that of the God they know by virtue of their creation. In their natural theology, that is, in what, as sinful men, they set forth as their view about God, they never state the truth without adulteration. They do not completely succeed in suppressing the truth, but they never assert the truth without an overwhelming admixture of error. The god of the philosophers is never their Creator and the Creator of the universe. He is always of necessity bound up with his creation. Hence sinful unregenerate men never worship the true God as they ought. In practice they do not know him because when they think of him, they, of necessity, think falsely of him; they always degrade him to the level of the creature.

But now, says Calvin, God does not allow this process of degradation to go on to its full expression. The Holy Spirit continues to appeal to men to return to God, And though God may, in punishment for their in, allow men to fall into every deeper sin, he never utterly ignores them. He keeps calling men back to himself. Accordingly, the knowledge of ourselves not only arouses us to seek God, but also, as it were, leads us by the hand to find him (I. 1, 1). God does not allow men wholly to suppress "that which nature, itself permits no one to forget, although many strive with every nerve to this end" (I, 3,). God sees to it that it is more difficult to obliterate his impression from the mind of man than to alter our "natural disposition" (I. 3, 1). Though the world "tries as far as it is able to cast away all knowledge of God" and though of all things they most wish to extinguish the sense of deity with them, they never fully succeed in doing so. (I. 3, 3).

This maintenance of the sense of deity within men in spite of their most desperate acts of suppression is coupled with the idea that they continue to receive from God his bountiful gifts. God is not man's Creator without as such also being his bountiful benefactor.

Let us remember, whenever each of us contemplates his own nature, that there is one God who so governs all natures that he would have us look unto him, direct our faith to him, and worship and call upon him. For nothing is more preposterous than to enjoy the very remarkable gifts that attest the divine nature within us, yet to overlook the Author who gives them to us at our asking. With what clear manifestation his might draws us to contemplate him! (I. 5, 6)
...the prophet shows that what are thought to be chance occurrences are just so many proofs of heavenly providence, especially of fatherly kindness. (I. 5, 8).

Consequently, we know that most perfect way of seeking God, and the most suitable order, is not for us to attempt with bold curiosity to penetrate to the investigation of this essence, which we ought more to adore than meticulously to search out, but for us to contemplate him in his works whereby he renders himself near and familiar to us, and in some manner communicates himself....(I. 5,9).

...Sometime we are driven by the leading and direction of these things to contemplate God; this of necessity happens to all men. Yet after we rashly grasp a conception of some sort of divinity. Straightway we fall back into the ravings or evil imaginings of our flesh, and corrupt by our vanity the pure truth of God. In one respect we are indeed unlike, because each one of us privately forges his own particular error; yet we are very much alike in that, one and all, we forsake the one truth God for prodigious trifles. Not only the common folk and dull-witted men, but also the most excellent and those otherwise endowed with keen discernment, are infected with this disease. (I. 5. 11).

It is therefore in vain that so many burning lamps shine for us in the workmanship of the universe to show forth the glory of its Author. Although they bathe us wholly in their radiance, yet they can of themselves in no way lead us into the right path... For this reason, the apostle, in that very passage where he calls the worlds the images of things invisible, adds that through faith we understand that they have been fashioned by God's word (Heb. 11:3). He means by this that the invisible divinity is made manifest in such spectacles, but that we have not the eyes to see this unless they be illumined by the inner revelation of God through faith.... Therefore, although the Lord does not want for testimony while he sweetly attracts men to the knowledge of himself with many and varied kindnesses, they do not cease on this account to follow their own ways, that is, their fatal error (I. 5, 14).

Now, those not "taught of Christ," sometimes in spite of themselves, speak "from a real feeling of nature," as if content with a single God (I. 10, 3). When they thus speak, they "simply use the name God as if they had thought one God sufficient." It is not their "natural theology" – the interpretations usually given by men of the revelation of God – which has in it any particle of truth.

But all the heathen, to a man, by their own vanity either were dragged or slipped back into false inventions, and thus their perceptions so vanished that whatever they had naturally sensed concerning the sole God had no value beyond making them inexcusable... As we have already said elsewhere, all the evasions the philosophers have skillfully contrived to not refute the charge of defection; rather, the truth of God has been corrupted by them all. For this reason, Habakkuk, when he condemned all idols, bade men seek God “in his temple” (Hab. 2:20) lest believers admit someone other than him who revealed himself by his Word (I. 10, 3).

The “light of nature,” and the “law of their being,” speak to men of God, as the bountiful benefactor of mankind calling them back to himself. In the face of this inescapable wooing of God to forsake their rebellion against God, Man’s mind, full as it is of pride and boldness, dares to imagine a god according to its own capacity; as it sluggishly plods, indeed is overwhelmed with the crassest ignorance, it conceives an un-reality and an empty appearance as God (I. 11,8).

Naturally then, Calvin could not do what Aquinas had done with respect to the knowledge of unbelievers. He could not think of taking the Aristotelian view of the analogy of being as an essentially true interpretation of reality. The philosophy of Aristotle, like the philosopher of any of those not “taught by Christ,” offers no concepts that are essentially sound. All the concepts of such a philosophy are based upon the assumption that God and the cosmos are aspects of one reality subject to the same laws. The god of Aristotle as well as the god of Plato, in fact, the god of any non-christian philosopher, is a god constructed by the rebellious mind of man in the interest of suppressing the truth.

This does not mean that no use whatsoever can be made of the interpretations given by non-Christian men of the facts of God’s revelation to them. Although not according to their innate principle of rebellion against God but in spite of it, when the “light of nature,” revelation of God, shines through to them in spite of themselves, they have been able to speak much truth.

The “idea that God is the sould of the world” is “the most tolerable that philosophers have suggested” (Calvin: 1, 14, 1 -) However, such a basic interpretation of the world given by fallen man is immanentistic. [immanentistic is pantheistic...God is in all, is all, working himself out through all things, etc., as opposed to transcendent. Philosophers do not distinguish between Creator and creature. Tree huggers are pantheistic in their world view]

In spite of this fact, we may freely learn from “secular writers” about many things (I. 15, 2) Though what remains in man of the image of God after the fall into sin is a “frightful deformity” ((I. 15, 4), “though nothing remains after the ruin except what is confused, mutilated, and disease ridden’ (I. 14, 4), though philosophers, since they do not distinguish between man as he was before and as he is after the fall, “mistakenly confuse two very diverse states of man” ((I. 15, 7); we may profitably listen tot hem, especially when they turn their “attention to things below” (II. 2, 13). For all men are sunder the power of God “whether their minds ar to be conciliated, or their malice to be restrained that it may not do harm (I. 17, 7).

...soundness of mind and uprightness of heart were withdrawn at the same time. This is the corruption of the natural gifts. For even though something of understanding and judgment remains as a residue along with the will, yet we shall not call a mind whole and sound that is both weak and plunged into deep darkness. And depravity of the will is too well known.

Since reason, therefore, by which man distinguishes between good and evil, and by which he understand and judges, is a natural gift, it could not be completely wiped out; but is was partly weakened and partly corrupted, so that its misshapen ruins appear.

Similarly the will, because it is inseparable from man's nature, did not perish, but was so bound to wicked desires that it cannot strive after the right. This is, indeed, a complete definition, but one needing a fuller explanation.

...When we so condemn human understanding for its perpetual blindness as to leave it no perception of any object whatever, we not only go against God's Word, but also run counter to the experience of common sense. For we see implanted in human nature some sort of desire to search out the truth to which man would not at all spire if he had not already savored it. Human understanding then possesses some power of perception, since it is by nature captivated by love of truth... Yet this longing for truth, such as it is, languishes before it enters upon its race because it soon falls into vanity. Indeed, man's mind, because of its dullness, cannot hold to the right path, but wanders through darkness, until it strays away and finally disappears. Thus it betrays how incapable it is of seeking and finding truth (II. 2, 12).

Good summary: good insight here by John Calvin (1550s). He is one of the best theologians of all time. Edwards is the other one.

He is talking about how God gives gifts to men, even if they are reprobates. I mean, there are many good scientists, athletes, etc., many moral people, that are hell-bound. Heavy. But this fact makes the world livable for the elect. Heavy, too!

...pg 23, Let us, accordingly, learn by their example how many gifts the Lord left to human nature even after it was despoiled of its true good (II. 2, 15).

Meanwhile, we ought not to forget those most excellent benefits of the divine Spirit, which he distributes to whomever he will, for the common good of mankind... It is no wonder, then, that the knowledge of all that is most excellent in human life is said to be communicated to us through the Spirit of God. Nor is there reason for anyone to ask, What have the impious, who are utterly estranged from God, to do with this Spirit? We ought to understand the statement that the Spirit of God dwells only in believers (Rom. 8:9) as referring to the Spirit of sanctification through whom we are consecrated as temples to God (1Cor. 3:16). Nonetheless he fills, moves, and quickens all things by the power of the same Spirit, and does so according to the character that he bestowed upon each kind by the laws of creation. But if the Lord has willed that we be helped in physics, dialectic, mathematics, and other like disciplines, by the work and ministry of the ungodly, let us use this assistance. For if we neglect God's gift freely offered in these arts, we ought to suffer just punishment for our sloths. But lest anyone think a man truly blessed when he is credited with possessing great power to comprehend truth under the elements of this world [cf. Col. 2:8], we should at once add that all this capacity to understand, with the understanding that follows upon it, is an unstable and transitory thing in God's sight, when a solid foundation of truth does not underlie it. For with the greatest truth Augustine teaches that as the free gifts were withdrawn from man after the Fall, so the natural ones remaining were corrupted (II. 2, 16).

Romanism/Arminianism vs. Calvinism

Implications of Calvinism for Apologetics

From the four points which our pastor saw clearly in Calvin's Institutes, it is apparent that:

1. Calvin makes a sharp distinction between the revelation of God to man and man's response to that revelation. This implies the rejection of natural theology such as Aquinas taught.

2. He makes a sharp distinction between the responses to God's revelation made by:

(a.) man in his original condition, i.e., Adam before the Fall;

(b.) mankind, whose "understanding is subjected to blindness and the heart to depravity: (II. 1,9).

(c.) those that are "taught of Christ' through the Scripture and whose eyes have been opened by the Holy Spirit.

3. These points together indicate an approach to apologetics on the part of Calvin distinct from that of Aquinas. From Calvin's point of view the Romanist position does not do justice to the Christian doctrine of creation.

(a.) This indicates, as noted, first: a measure of irrationalism in Romanist thought.

(1) Romanism does not place all the facts of man's environment exclusively under the categories of creation and providence. This implies sympathy for the idea of "brute facts," facts that are not now, or are not yet, interpreted by God. Search codeBF, brutefactdef, and code524. In toning down the biblical doctrines of creation and providence by seeking to combine them with Aristotelian notion of the analogy of being (that the world is both somehow participant in Being, and participant in non-being), Romanism takes away from the clarity of the revelation of God so far as this revelation surrounds man.

(2) Romanism does not think of the image of God in through Christ. It thinks of man, in part at least, in terms of Aristotle's notion of the analogy of being. Accordingly, man is thought of as having an inherent weakness – a bias towards sin. Man, as created, lives on the verge of non-being. On an Aristotelian basis, non-being is evil. Thus the biblical idea of sin, as exclusively ethical in its import, is confused, to some extent, with the idea of sin as inherent in man because of his finitude.

(b.) This indicates, secondly, a measure of rationalism in Romanist thought.

(1) In not interpreting man's environment exclusively in terms of creation and providence, Romanism tends to think of facts of this environment as part of a chain of being which includes God as well as the universe. As the Aristotelian notion of the analogy of being tends on the one hand to the idea of brute fact and therefore to irrationalism, so this same notion tends on the other hand to conceive the difference between eternal and temporal being as merely a gradational one. This again indicates the presence of a measure of rationalism in Romanist thought.

(2) In Romanist thinking, the image of God in man is partly based upon the idea of man's participation in the being of God. Thus man's own constitution is not exclusively revelational of God on a created plane. The idea of participation in the nature of God in part cancels out the idea of God's revealing himself to man within man.

In consequence, too, man's ideal of knowledge would not exclusively be that of re-interpreting God's revelation within and about man. His ideal of knowledge would become, in part, a joint enterprise with God of interpreting reality. Thus revelation and response to revelation tend to merge into one process of rational inquiry. Thus rationalism appears in the apologetic of Thomas.

Turning these things over in his mind, our pastor realized in a general way that his sympathies lay with Calvin. He began to realize that the difference between Roman Catholic theology and the Reformed faith is an all-pervasive one. He began to realize too that this all-pervasive difference in theology implies a difference in the method of defending Christianity. He sensed in particular that on the Romanist basis he would still be the victim of the battle between experts. There would be no finished revelation available to him. The revelation he would deal with would not be fully clear. And such would be true even for the experts themselves. The Pope himself, though the vicar of Christ, would still be facing the same impenetrable mystery that is inherent in Reality which he, as pastor, faces. The revelation of God would tend to merge with the theology of man. Man would have to shift for himself; he would have no absolute authority speaking to him. The Pope, though the vicar of Christ, would tend to be no more than a wise man than other men.

In particular it appeared to our pastor that on the Romanist position man cannot be thought of as a covenant being. Since man is not directly and exclusively dependent upon God in all this knowledge and action, his sin would not be essentially sin against God. Sin would not be the self-conscious breaking of the law of God. It would be in part a failure to live up to the law of his being which participates in the law of the being of God.

There could, on this basis, be no genuine responsibility on the part of man in the course of history. Even the plan of God is, on the Romanist view, not all-determinative of the course of history. This plan of God is not all-determinative, because man participates in the being of God. The will of man participates in the nature of the will of God. Hence God could not and did not confront the will of man in Adam with a choice that would bring all men under the condemnation of God. The condemnation of men by God could not depend upon an act of their human will, because the human will is not exclusively a creation of the will of God, and the will of God is not in a position to issue an absolute command to man. Man's will is, on this view, not exclusively the will of a creature of God, and therefore it is not, at the beginning of history, a perfect will. Its finitude implies a measure of imperfection.

Furthermore, on the Romanist view, when Adam fell into sin his intellect did not become blinded, and his will did not become wholly perverse in its intent. Being already partly blind by virtue of its finitude, man's fall could not result in intellectual blinding. So also, being partly immersed in non-being, the will could not be wholly perverted by the fall. On the other hand, being partly participant in the intellect of God, the intellect of man could not lose its inherent measure of divinity. So also the will of man, being participant in the will of God, could not lose this inherent measure of divinity. In short, to the extent that Romanist thought is patterned after the idea of the analogy of being, man was originally never placed high enough to fall very low and never fell low enough to need the reaching down of the grace of God for this restoration before he could think or will that which is true and right.

Our pastor could now see that on the view of Calvin the difference between believer and unbeliever as they confront one another may be summarized as follows.

Christian and Non-Christian Views

1. Reality

Both Christians and non-Christians make presuppositions about the nature of reality.

a. The Christian presupposes the self-contained God and his plan for the universe as back of all things and therewith the absolute distinction between Creator and creature.

b. The non-Christian presupposes "Chaos and the Old Night," or the self-existence of matter in some sense.

2. Epistemology

Neither Christian nor non-Christian can, as finite beings, by means of logic, legislate what reality should be.

a. Knowing this, the Christian observes facts and arranges them logically in self-conscious subjection to the plan of God revealed in Scripture, i.e., he listens to God's explanation of this relation to the world and man, both in Adam and in Christ, before he "listens" to, and during his observation of, the "facts." He knows that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. Assuming the plan of God, the Christian knows that the facts have a divine order. The Christians' task in science is to uncover the God-ordained structure of the world. For the Christian, man and the world are made for one another so that the rational abilities of man are applicable to the world as man seeks to "subdue the earth."

b. Knowing this, the non-Christian, nonetheless, constantly attempts to impossible by demanding a coherence that originate with himself.

(1) Negatively, he must assume that reality is not divinely created and controlled in accordance with God's plan at all, and that the Christian story therefore cannot be true. The world of "facts" springs from "Chaos and Old Night" – ultimate Chance.

(2) Positively, he must assume that reality is after all rationally constituted and answers exhaustively to his logical manipulations. If the world were not rational or "uniform," then there could be no science. Any "cosmic mind," or God, must therefore be able to be manipulated by man-made categories. Any God not reducible to logical or empirical categories, [hence view of Leibniz I think] and therefore completely understandable, is a false God.

Calvin/Aquinas

B. The Place of Scripture

The second very obvious feature of Calvin’s Institutes noted by our pastor is the place assigned to Scripture. On the basis of present general revelation alone, no one actually knows God truly as Creator. Hence the need of Scripture.

Now, in order that the true religion may shine upon us, we ought to hold that it must take its beginning from heavenly doctrine and that no one can get even the slightest taste of right and sound doctrine unless he be a pupil of Scripture. Hence, there also emerges the beginning of true understanding when we reverently embrace what it pleases God thereto witness of himself (I. 6, 2).

Even the world of natural and historical fact with which science deals cannot be truly interpreted by anyone who is not a Christian.

Combining these two points, the clear revelation of God is in the universe, both in man’s environment and in man himself, and God’s revelation in Scripture produces a remarkable result. According to the first point, which is based on Paul’s letter to the Romans, every man knows God. No one can help but know God. Self-consciousness immediately involves God-consciousness. According to the second point, no one knows God except through Scripture. No one even knows any fact of nature for what it is, as created, directed and controlled by God, except through Scripture. No one knows how to combine “logic” and “fact” aright in the universe except through revelation.

Both points set Calvin’s position over against that of Aquinas. The first does so by stressing the fact that wherever he looks man is naturally and unavoidably confronted with the face of God. It is only by suppressing the truth that man can be said “not to know” the truth. Man cannot be a sinner against God unless he knows God in the sense of Romans 1. On the other hand, man cannot be rescued from sin, i.e., unless he knows God in a saving sense through the death and resurrection of Christ applied to him by the regeneration of the Holy Spirit.

According to Aquinas, the creation of man in the image of God does not mean that man unavoidably knows God. The revelation of God round about and within man is not so clear as to make it impossible for man not to know God, and himself as the creature of God. Man does full justice to the evidence within and about him if he merely concludes that God probably exists. Aquinas argued that man’s knowledge begins with sensation. There is in this knowledge of God derived from sensation an inherent uncertainty. We can only be certain of what God is not. Any positive statement about God on the basis of natural revelation must, in the nature of the case, be a subjective projection and as such must be uncertain. Finite man cannot be expected to have, through natural revelation, any certain knowledge of God. Ignorance of God is not blameworthy. Why should man be accountable for knowing God and God’s requirement for man, if God has not clearly revealed himself to man?

Calvin's point concerning the absolute necessity of Scripture also sets off his position from that of Aquinas. Since man's ignorance of God is blameworthy, this ignorance can be removed by nothing else than the redeeming work of Christ. Only Scripture as the word of Christ reports God's work of redemption in Christ. Only through the mirror of Scripture, therefore, can general revelation be seen for what it is.

For Aquinas, on the other hand, Scripture occupies no such important place. It is not indispensable for the right interpretation of nature. Ignorance of God is not necessarily, at least not exclusively, the result of a misinterpretation of nature. Ignorance of God is inherent in human nature as finite. Hence this ignorance is not exclusively culpable ignorance. The Bible as the message of redemption is not necessary for man's proper interpretation of natural revelation.

C. The Necessity of the Testimony of the Holy Spirit (pg 9)

The third obvious feature about Calvin's Institutes noted by our pastor is its stress on the necessity of the testimony of the Holy Spirit in the heart of man if he is to receive the Scripture as the Word of God.

Special revelation, or Scripture in its documented form, provides in point of fact in the view of Calvin, only the objective side of the cure he finds has been provided by God. The subjective side is provided by the Scriptures: the eyes are opened that they may see even through these spectacles, only by the witness of the Spirit in the heart.

It is not that the Scriptures, in Calvin's view, do not clearly manifest themselves to be the Word of God. On the contrary, "Scripture exhibits fully as clear evidence of its own truth as white and black things do of their color, or sweet and bitter things do of their taste" (I. 7,2; I. 7, 5). The heavenly nature of its doctrine, the consent of its parts, the majesty of its style, the antiquity of its teaching, the sincerity of its narrative, its miraculous accompaniment, circumstantially confirmed, its continuous use through many ages, its sealing by martyr's blood, clearly indicate the divinity of Scripture. Even so the words of Scripture "will not find acceptance in men's hearts before it is sealed by the inward testimony of the Spirit. The same Spirit, therefore, who has spoken through the mouths of the prophets must penetrate into our hearts to persuade us that they faithfully proclaimed what had been divinely commanded" (I. 7,4).

Some good folks are annoyed that a clear proof is not ready at hand when the impious, unpunished, murmur against God's Word. As if the Spirit were not called both "seal" and "guarantee" (2Cor. 1:22) for confirming the faith of the godly; because until he illumines their minds, they ever waver among many doubts! (I. 7,4).

Let this point therefore stand: that those whom the Holy Spirit has inwardly taught truly test upon Scripture, and that Scripture indeed is self-authenticated; hence, it is not right to subject it to proof and reasoning. And the certainty it deserves with us, it attains by the testimony of the Spirit. For even if it wins reverence for itself by its own majesty, it seriously affects us only when it is sealed upon our hearts through the Spirit. Therefore, illumined by his power, we believe neither by our own nor by anyone else's judgment that Scripture is from God; but above human judgment we affirm with utter certainty (just as if we were gazing upon the majesty of God himself) that it has flowed to us from the very mouth of God by the ministry of men. We seek no proofs, no marks of genuineness upon which our judgment may lean; but we subject our judgment and wit to it as to a thing far beyond any guesswork! (I. 7,5).

If now this third point be added to the first two, the following result is obtained: Natural revelation is perfectly clear. Men ought from it to know God and ought through it to see all other things as dependent on God. But only he who looks at nature through the mirror of Scripture does understand natural revelation for what it is. Furthermore, no one can see Scripture for what it is unless he is given the ability to do so by the regenerating power of the Holy Spirit. Only those who are taught of God see the Scriptures for what they are and therefore see the revelation of God in nature for what it is. To be taught of God is a “singular privilege” which God bestows on his “elect whom he distinguishes from the human race as a whole.” As taught of God, the elect both understand the Bible as the Word of God, and interpret natural revelation through the Bible. [All key points!] The rest of mankind, not taking Scripture as the Word of God, in consequence also misinterpret the natural revelation of God.

If God has willed this treasure of understanding to be hidden from his children, it is no wonder or absurdity that the multitude of men are so ignorant and stupid! Among the “multitude” I include even certain distinguished folk, until they become engrafted into the body of the church. Besides, Isaiah, warning that the prophetic teaching would be beyond belief, not only to foreigners but also to the Jews who wanted to be reckoned as members of the Lord’s household, at the same time adds the reason: “The arm of God will not be revealed” to all (Isa. 53:1) Whenever, then, the fewness of believers disturbs us, let the converse come to mind, that only to those to whom it is given can comprehend the mysteries of God [cf. Matt. 13:11] (I. 7, 5)

By this time our pastor has become aware of a radical difference between the approach of Calvin and that of Aquinas!

In the first place there is a basic difference concerning the nature of revelation. For Calvin, revelation is always and everywhere clear. The facts of natural revelation, both within and about man, are so clearly revelatory of God that he who runs may read. The indicia divinitatis (marks of divinity) of Scripture are equally clear. In fact, the revelation of God to man is so clear that no man can help but to know God. Thus, man is from the beginning in contact with the truth. Moreover, he cannot separate the existence of God from the character of God. The intelligibility of anything, for man, presupposes the existence of God – the God whose nature and character are delineated in God’s revelation, found both in nature and in Scripture. It is this God – the only God – whom all men, of necessity, “know.”

Over against this idea of revelation, as clearly and exclusively based upon, and expressive of the idea of the Creator-creature distinction, stands that of Aquinas. According to Aquinas the revelation of God to man is not inherently clear. As finite man lives on the verge of non-being,³ and as such a mixture, man’s knowledge is derived from the senses. Man is also, therefore enmeshed in an environment which is not exclusively determined by the plan of God, but rather a combination of the forces of God and of chaos.⁴ Accordingly, Aquinas thinks that man can intelligently discuss the question of the existence of God without at the same time presupposing the nature of God as revealed in Scripture. Thus the attitude of doubt with respect to the existence of God is assumed to be legitimate. Ignorance is not basically culpable.

In volved in this original separation of the existence and the nature of God is the idea that for man, the nature of God is not exclusively determined by the revelation of God. The nature of God is, in part, determined by man himself.

It is thus that the scholastic notion of natural theology is born. If man, without special revelation, partly determines the nature of God, then this nature of God is, to an extent, defined by the supposed demands of logic and fact, as man knows these independently of revelation of God. Thus, the distinction between the revelation of God to man and the interpretation of this revelation by man is obscured. Natural revelation then tends to be identified with natural theology. This idea of natural theology assumes that without Scripture and the testimony of the Spirit men generally can have a measure of morally and spiritually acceptable knowledge of God. It assumes that there can be an interpretation of the natural revelation of God with which both believers and unbelievers are in basic agreement.

The difference between the knowledge of the Christian and the knowledge of the non-Christian consists, then, primarily by former being more comprehensive than the latter. The Christian adds to his knowledge of facts obtained by his own empirical research without reference to scripture, the information about these facts that he gets from supernatural revelation. On the Thomistic basis the difference between the knowledge of the Christian and the knowledge of the non-Christian is primarily qualitative. To be sure, according to Thomas, sin has wounded the natural capacities of man. Accordingly, the supernatural must, to some extent, be remedial as well as supplementative. This fact, however, does not change the fact that for Thomas supernatural revelation is primarily supplementative.

Aquinas thinks of the position of Calvin as being rationalistic because he holds that man unavoidably, by virtue of his innate knowledge of God, is in contact with the truth. If all men do of necessity know God, Aquinas would reason, then how could they be responsible for seeking God in the world? How could they be responsible creatures in the sight of God? Aquinas therefore insists that man is only potentially, and not necessarily, in contact with the truth about God.

On the other hand, Aquinas thinks of Calvin's position as being irrationalistic because he says that none but the elect, after the entrance of sin, can be said to have any morally or spiritually acceptable knowledge of God. Aquinas would say that all men have this knowledge. Aquinas is concerned, therefore, about cultivation, while Calvin is concerned about implantation of the grace and knowledge of God, and only after that about its implementation.

Calvin thinks of the position of Aquinas as being irrationalistic, because it is not clearly and exclusively from the outset based upon the distinction between God as Creator and man as creature. Any position that is clearly based upon this distinction, Calvin would say, must regard the image of God in man as implying the idea of inherent knowledge of God. It is only this inherent and unavoidable content of human knowledge that makes it possible to avoid skepticism and to hold man responsible for sin. Without this idea of the unavoidability of the knowledge of God on the part of man, it is always possible for man to make an excuse for not knowing God. Herein is the irrationalism of Aquinas.

Secondly, Calvin thinks of Aquinas' position as being rationalistic because it assigns to the mind of man the ability to determine to some extent the nature of God apart for the contents of divine revelation. If the knowledge of God's nature is not from the outset given with the knowledge of man's nature as the creation of God, then it is up to man to determine the nature of both God and man for himself apart from revelation. Man is therefore left to his own devices and determines a "way which seems right unto man."

In the third place, man is also responsible, to some extent, for determining the nature of sin. Thus sin cannot, on Aquinas' position, be "want of conformity to, or transgression of, the law of God" which God has, on the basis of his nature, given to man, but is rather the transgression of that which is "right in his own eyes." The only revelation of himself and his laws which God may give man, therefore, must be in terms of what man has by his own logic and experience already said about God, religion, and morality. God must listen to man before man listens to God.

To be sure, Aquinas does not carry out this point of view with such consistency. But, since he assigns to the mind of man, some measure of ability to determine the nature of both God and man, apart from being taught of God through Scripture and the testimony of the Spirit, his God is no longer the sovereign God of mankind.

Arminian Apologetics

Having contemplated these matters, our pastor realized that he could not engage in the propagation and defense of Christian faith conjointly with those who are committed to the Roman Catholic point of view. The reason for this now appeared to be obvious to him. One's theology and one's apologetics go together. A Roman Catholic theologian will, naturally, also be a Roman Catholic apologist, and will, therefore, encourage the non-Christian to hold onto his covenant-breaking viewpoint. The Roman Catholic apologist is unable to challenge the wisdom of the world.

But how about the differences among Protestants? The basic difference in historic Protestantism is that of Arminianism and Calvinism.

What about Arminian evangelicals? Perhaps they can offer our pastor an apologetic less drastic and therefore more acceptable to the natural man than that of Calvin. But can one, who has seen with Benjamin Breckinridge Warfield that Calvinism is Christianity come to its own, cooperate with Arminian Christians in an effort to defend the faith?

Arminianism holds, as Warfield says, to a defective theology. Arminianism is inconsistent Protestantism. In its view of the "freedom" of the will of man, Arminianism resembles Romanism. Like the Romanist theologian, though to a lesser extent, the Arminian theologian holds to some measure of self-salvation. Warfield therefore says that "Calvinism is just Christianity." Must we then not also say that Reformed apologetics is just Christian apologetics?

If this should be the case then we must, perhaps, speak of a Romanist-Arminian method and, in contrast with it, of a Reformed method of apologetics.

Suppose now that our young pastor meets his close friend, the young minister from the “evangelical” church down the street. Certainly, on more than one occasion they have agreed that they together have far more in common than they do with the Roman Catholic priest. This Arminian evangelical gives our pastor a copy of Bishop Butler’s Analogy. Let us look with him into this work and see what we find.

We soon find that the Butler type of argument also assumes that there is an area of “fact” on the interpretation of which Christians and non-Christians agree. It assumes a non-rational principle of individuation, which means that a “fact” may be discovered, analyzed, and “known” in isolation from all other facts. It therefore concedes to the unbeliever that since historical facts are “unique” nothing certain can be said of them by way of significance or meaning. But this assumption, always untrue, has never appeared so clearly false as in our own day.

To be sure, there is a sense in which it must be said that all men have all facts “in common.” Saint and sinner alike are face to face with God and the universe of God. But the sinner is like the man with colored glasses on his nose. The Scriptures tell us that the facts speak plainly of God (Rom. 1:20; 2:14, 15). But all is yellow to the jaundiced eye. As the sinner speaks of the facts, he reports them to himself and others as “yellow.” There are no exceptions to this. It is the facts as reported to himself by himself, as distorted by his own subjective condition, which he assumes to be the facts as they really are.

Failing to keep these things in mind, Butler appealed to the sinner as though there were in his repertoire of “facts” some that he did not see as “yellow,” such as the life, death, and resurrection of Christ, or miracles in general. Butler actually placed himself on a common position with his opponents on certain “questions of fact,” i.e., “Did Christ rise from the dead?”

The compromising character of this position is obvious. It is compromising, in the first place, with respect to the objective clarity of the evidence for the truth of Christian theism. The psalmist does not say that the heavens probably declare the glory of God; they infallibly and clearly do. Probability is not, or at least should not be, the guide of life. Men ought, says Calvin following Paul, to believe in God, for each one is surrounded with a superabundance of evidence with respect to him. The whole universe is lit up by God. Scripture requires men to accept its interpretation of history as true without doubt. Doubt of this is as unreasonable as doubt with respect to the primacy of the light of the sun in relation to the light of bulbs in our homes. It is as unreasonable as a child asking whether he has parents and, after looking at the evidence, concluding that he probably has!

But according to Butler, men have done full justice by the evidence if they conclude that God probably exists. Worse than that, according to this position, men are assumed to have done full justice by the evidence if they conclude that a God exists. But a god is a finite god, which is no god, but an idol. How can they then identify this probable God with the God of the Bible on whom all things depend for their existence?

In presupposing a non-Christian philosophy of fact, the Butler type of argument naturally also presupposes a non-Christian principle of coherence, or rationality. The two go hand in hand. The law of non-contradiction employed positively or negatively by man assuming his own ultimacy⁷, is made the standard of what is possible or impossible, both for men and for whatever “gods” may be. But on this basis the Bible cannot speak to man of any God whose revelation and whose very nature is not essentially penetrable to the natural intellect of man.

In the second place, the Butler type of argument is compromising on the subjective side. It allows that the natural man has the plenary ability to interpret certain facts correctly even though he wears the colored spectacles of the covenant-breaker. As though covenant-breakers had no axe to grind! As though they were not anxious to avoid seeing the facts for what they really are!

The traditional argument of Butler is, moreover, not only compromising but also self-destructive. Today, more than ever before, men frankly assert that facts are taken as much as given. Thus, they admit that they wear glasses. But these glasses are said to help rather than to hinder vision. Modern man assumes that, seeing facts through the glasses of his own ultimacy, he can really see these facts for what they are. For him it is the orthodox believer who wears the colored glasses of prejudice. Thus the Christian walks in the valley of those who more than ever before, identify their false interpretations about themselves and about the facts, with the facts themselves.

However, the argument of Butler does not challenge men to repentance for their sin of misrepresentation. It virtually grants that they are right. But then, if men are virtually told that they are right in thus identifying their false interpretations of the facts, with the facts themselves, in certain instances, why should such men accept the Christian interpretation of other facts? Are not all facts within one universe? If men are virtually told that they are quite right in interpreting certain facts without God, they have every logical right to continue their interpretation of all other facts without God.

From the side of the believer in the infallible Word of God, the claim should be made that there are not, because there cannot be, other facts than God-interpreted facts, i.e., facts which are what they are because of their place in the plan of God. In practice, this means that since sin has come into the world, God's interpretation of the facts must come in finished, written form and be comprehensive in character. God continues to reveal himself in the facts of the created world, but the sinner needs to interpret every one of them in the clearer light of Scripture. Every thought on every subject must become obedient to the requirement of God as he speaks in his Word, every thought must be brought into subjection to Christ. But Butler's argument fails to make this requirement and thus fatally compromises the claims of Scripture.

It has frequently been argued that this view of Scripture is impracticable. Christians differ among themselves, after all, in their interpretation of Scripture.

This objection, however, is not to the point. No one denies a subjective element in the restricted sense. The real issue is whether God exists as self-contained, whether therefore the world runs according to his plan, and whether God has confronted those who would frustrate the realization of that plan, with a self-contained interpretation of that plan (the Bible). The fact that Christians individually and collectively can never do more than restate the given self-contained interpretation of that plan approximately neither implies the non-existence of that plan itself nor the impossibility of the self-revelation of that plan given by Christ in the Scriptures.

The self-contained circle of the ontological trinity (the trinity considered apart from the economic relations) is not broken up by the fact that there is an economical relation of this triune God to man. No more is the self-contained character of Scripture broken up by the fact that there is diversity of transmission and acceptance of that word of God. Such as least is, or ought to be, the contention of Christians if they would really challenge the modern principle. The Christian principle must present the full force and breadth of its claim. It is compelled to engage in an all-out war against the misinterpretation of the universe by the natural man.

In contrast, therefore, with both Catholic and Arminian types of apologetics, the Reformed apologist insists that the natural man is quite mistaken in starting from his own sense of freedom as an ultimate given of experience. It is this which both Catholic and Arminian apologetics cannot do. They allow the natural man to continue to assume the ultimate freedom of himself and the facts about himself. In defending Christianity, our Reformed pastor then realized that he must challenge the non-Christian to see himself in the light that Christ gives to men in Scripture. Our pastor knew, to be sure, that even this the natural man cannot do, for he cannot, himself, remove his colored glasses. [KEY POINT!!] He needs, therefore, the operation of the Holy Spirit to regenerate him, to open his eyes so that he may see. He must be born again.

The natural man, says Warfield, needs new light – the Bible, and new power of sight, regeneration.

When the sinner has by God's grace in Christ received this new light and this new power of sight then he sees all things in their proper relationships. Formerly he stood on this head while now he stands on his feet. Formerly he referred all things to himself as the final point of reference. Now he refers all things to God his Creator, and to Christ his redeemer as the final point of reference. His conversion was a Copernican revolution. It was not accomplished by steps or stages, it was an about-face. Before his conversion he can't see a fact in the world that he does not wish to deal with to the glory of God. The words of Paul, "Whether ye eat, or drink, or do anything else, do all to the glory of God," are now his motto. Deeply conscious of this continued sinfulness he is, nonetheless, now, in the core of his being, a lover instead of a hater of God.

With great urgency he now seeks to go back to his erstwhile partners whose goal continues to be to glorify man in all that they do.

We have now, with our young pastor, looked into the various methods of defending Christianity. Our young pastor has seen that cooperation efforts in presenting and defending Christianity are impossible for there is only one consistent Christianity and only one consistent defense of it, He has also noted the radical difference which exists between the world-views of Christians and non-Christians. In the following section, we shall attempt to illustrate these points in the form of a dialogue among two Christians – one Reformed and the other Arminian – and a non-Christian.

V. Dialogue with Mr. Black, Mr. White, Mr. Grey pgs. 36-81

V. A Dialogue – Mr. Black, Mr. White, Mr. Grey

We have first the non-Christian, who worships the creature rather than the Creator. We shall call him Mr. Black. Mr. Black may be a very "decent" sort of man. By God's common grace he may do much that is "good." Even so he is, as long as he remains in his unconverted state, black in the sight of God.

On the other hand, we have a representative of those who have, by the grace of God, become worshipers of the Creator-Redeemer, called Mr. White. Mrs. White is far from what, judging him by his name, we should expect him to be. But he is washed in the blood of the Lamb. In Christ he is whiter than snow. Mr. White is the Reformed Christian.

But, strangely enough, there is a third party, an Arminian, called Mr. Grey. Of course, in Christ Mr. Grey is as white as is Mr. White. Mr. Grey thinks that Mr. White is too severe in his evaluation of Mr. Black. Mr. Black is not all that black. It is not pedagogically wise [\[teaching wise - my insert\]](#) to require of Mr. Black that he make a complete about-face. Surely no such complete revolution is necessary in the field of science and in the field of philosophy. Many of Mr. Black's followers have valiantly defended the existence of God against materialism, atheism, and positivism. Even in theology many of these disciples of Mr. Black have sprung to the defense of God when he was attacked by the God-is-dead theologians. Mr. Grey, therefore, typifies the Aquinas-Butler method of defending Christianity.

Let us now note the difference between the way Mr. White and the way Mr. Grey approach the unbeliever, Mr. Black, with the gospel of Christ.

Let us say that Mr. Black has toothache. Both Mr. White and Mr. Grey are dentists. Mr. White believes in a radical methodology. He believes that Mr. Black should have all the decayed matter removed from his tooth before the filling is put in. Mr. Grey is a very kind-hearted man. He does not want to hurt Mr. Black. Accordingly, he does not want to drill too deeply. He will, therefore, take only a part of the decayed matter out of the tooth and then fill it.

Naturally Mr. Black thinks this is marvelous. Unfortunately, Mr. Black's tooth soon begins to decay again. He goes back to Mr. Grey. But Mr. Grey can never bring himself to do anything radical. As a consequence, he is never able to resolve Mr. Black's toothache problem.

Let us now suppose that instead of coming to Mr. Grey, Mr. Black had gone to the office of Mr. White. Mr. White is radical, very radical. He uses the X-ray machine to diagnose Mr. Black's condition. He drills deeply. All of the tooth decay is removed. The tooth is filled. Mr. Black never need return. This simple illustration points out a basic truth.

The Bible says that man is spiritually dead in sin. The Reformed creeds speak of man's total depravity. The only cure for this spiritual deadness is his regeneration by the Holy Spirit on the basis of the atoning death of Christ. It is therefore by means of the light that Scripture sheds in the natural man's condition that Mr. White examines all his patients. Mr. White may also, to be sure, turn on the light of experience, but he always insists that this light of experience derives, in the first place, from the light of Scripture. So he may appeal to reason or to history, but, again, only as they are to be seen in the light of the Bible. He does not even look for corroboration of the teachings of Scripture in experience, reason, or history, except insofar as these are themselves first seen in the light of the Bible. For him, the Bible, and therefore the God of the Bible, is like the sun from which the light that is given by oil lamps, gas lamps, and electric lights is derived.

Quite different is the attitude of the Arminian. Mr. Grey uses the Bible, experience, reason, or logic as equally independent sources of information about his own and therefore about Mr. Black's predicament. I did not say that for Mr. Grey the Bible, experience, and reason are equally important. Indeed, they are not. He knows that the Bible is by far the most important. But he none the less constantly appeals to "the facts of experience" and to "logic" without first dealing with the very idea of fact and with the idea of logic in terms of Scripture.

The difference is basic. When Mr. White diagnoses Mr. Black's case he takes as his X-ray machine, the Bible only. When Mr. Grey diagnoses Mr. Black's case he first takes the X-ray machine of experience, then the X-ray machine of logic, and finally his biggest X-ray machine, the Bible. In fact, he may take these in any order. Each of them is, for him, an independent source of information.

Let us first look briefly at a typical procedure generally followed in evangelical circles today. Let us, in other words, note how Mr. Grey proceeds with an analysis of Mr. Black, and at the same time see how Mr. Grey would win Mr. Black to an acceptance of Christianity. We take for this purpose a series of articles which appeared in the January, February, and March, 1950, issues of Moody Monthly, published by the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago. The late Edward John Carnell, author of An Introduction to Christian Apologetics and Professor of Apologetics at Fuller Theological Seminary, was the writer of this series. Carnell's writings were among the best that appeared in evangelical circles. In fact, in his book on apologetics Carnell frequently argues as we would expect a Reformed apologist to argue. By and large, however, he represents the Arminian rather than the Reformed method of apologetics.

When Carnell instructs his readers "How Every Christian Can Defend His Faith," he first appeals to facts and to logic as independent sources of information about the truth of Christianity. Of course, he must bring in the Bible even at this point. But the Bible is brought in only as a book of information about the facts of what has historically been called Christianity. It is not from the beginning brought in as God's Word. It must be shown to Mr. Black that it is the Word of God by means of "facts" and "logic." Carnell would thus avoid at all costs the charge of reasoning in a circle. He does not want Mr. Black to point the finger at him and say: "You prove that the bible is true by an appeal to the Bible itself." That is circular reasoning. How can any person with any respect for logic accept such a method of proof?"

Carnell would escape such a charge by showing that the facts of experience, such as all men recognize, and logic, such as all men must use, point to the truth of Scripture. This is what he says: "If you are of a philosophic turn, you can point to the remarkable way in which Christianity fits in with the moral sense inherent in every human being, or the influence of Christ on our ethics, customs, literature, art, and music. Finally, you can draw upon your own experience in speaking of the reality of answered prayer and the witness of the Spirit in your own heart.... If the person is impressed with this evidence, turn at once to the gospel. Read crucial passages and permit the Spirit to work on the inner recesses of his heart. Remember that apologetics is merely a preparation. After the ground has been broken, proceed immediately with sowing and watering."

It is assumed in this argument that Mr. Black agrees with the evangelical, Mr. Grey, on the character of the "moral sense" of man. This may be true, but then it is true because Mr. Grey has himself not taken his information about the "moral sense" of man exclusively from Scripture. If, with Mr. White, Mr. Grey had taken his conception of the moral nature of man from the Bible, then he would hold that Mr. Black will, as totally depraved, misinterpret his own moral nature. Thru, Christianity is in accord with the moral nature of man. but this is so only because the moral nature of man is first in accord with what the Bible says it is, i.e., originally created perfect, it is now wholly corrupted in its desires through the fall of man.

If you are reasoning with a naturalist, Carnell advises his readers, ask him why, when a child throws a rock through his window, he chases the child and not the rock. Presumably even a naturalist knows that the child, not the rock, is free and therefore responsible. "A bottle of water cannot ought; it must. When once the free spirit of man is proved, the moral argument – the existence of a God who imposes moral obligations – can form the bridge from man to God."

Here the fundamental difference between Mr. Grey's and Mr. White's approaches to Mr. Black appears. The difference lies, as before noted, in the different notions of the free will of man. Or, it may be said, the difference is with respect to the nature of man as man. Mr. White should define man, and therefore his freedom, in terms of Scripture alone. He would therefore begin with the fact that man is a creature of God. This implies that man's freedom is a derivative freedom. It is a freedom that is not and cannot be wholly ultimate, that is, self-dependent. Mr. White knows that Mr. Black would not agree with him in this analysis of man and of his freedom. He knows that Mr. Black would not agree with him on this anymore than he would agree on the biblical idea of total depravity.

Mr. Grey, on the other hand, must at all costs have "a point of contact" in the system of thought of Mr. Black, who is typical of the natural man. Just as Mr. Grey is afraid of being charged with circular reasoning, so he is also afraid of being charged with talking about something that is "outside of experience". So he is driven to talk in general about the "free spirit of man." Of course, Mr. Black need have no objections from this point of view in allowing for the "free spirit of man." That is at bottom what he holds even when he is a naturalist [an unsaved man]. His whole position is based upon the idea of man as a free spirit, that is, a spirit that is not subject to the will of his Creator God. Carnell does not distinguish between the biblical doctrine of freedom, in the sense of autonomy, which makes man a law unto himself.

Note on this subject of the "point of contact" from Van Til later in this book, pg 89:

"To look for a point of contact with the unbeliever in the unbeliever's notions of himself and his world is to encourage him in his wicked rebellion and to establish him in his self-frustration. We have already seen that the natural man is under the self-imposed delusion that he is "free," i.e., independent of the control and counsel of God, and that the "facts" about him are also "free" in this way. He may pretend to be "open-minded" and ready to consider whether God exists. But in being so "neutral" he commits the same sin as Adam and Eve.

Why seek truth where only a lie is to be found? Can the non-Christian tell us and therefore the Christian himself, what the facts are and how they are related to each other, in what way they cohere, while yet excluding creation and providence. If he can, and if he can tell us truly, then the Christian story simple is not true! Because the natural man cannot do this, because the Christian message is true, I have sought and will seek to reap the benefit of a theology in which the true God of Scripture has the initiative in salvation.

The Calvinist's idea of an actual as opposed to an imagined point of contact is not just some useless notion. It is the only intelligible point of contact possible. The non-Christian holds that pure chance or absolute fate are equally ultimate [not dependent upon the Creator] and mutually correlative limiting concepts or heuristic principles which man uses to explain the fact that we have learned much about the world, that there is order in the world, a uniformity, while there is also continual change and development. But the non-Christian's "explanation" is no explanation at all. To say, "it just happens" as an explanation of an event is really to say, "There is no explanation that I know of."

The Calvinist, therefore, using his point of contact, observes to the non-Christian that if the world were not what Scripture says it is, if the natural man's knowledge were not actually rooted in the creation and providence of God, then there could be no knowledge whatsoever. The Christian claims that non-Christians have made and now make many discoveries about the true state of affairs of the universe simply because the universe is what Christ says it is. The unbelieving scientist borrows or steals the Christian principles of creation and providence every time he says that an “explanation” is possible, for he knows he cannot account for “explanation” on his own. As the image-bearer of God, operating in a universe controlled by God, the unbeliever contributes indirectly and adventitiously to the development of human knowledge and culture.

Of course, Mr. Black will be greatly impressed with such an argument as Mr. Grey has presented to him for the truth of Christianity. In fact, if Christianity is thus shown to be in accord with the moral nature of man, as Mr. Black himself sees that moral nature, then Mr. Black does not need to be radically converted to accept Christianity. He only needs to accept something additional to what he has always believed. He has been shown how nice, even how important, it would be to have a second story built on top of the house which he has already built according to his own plan.

To be sure, the evangelical intends no such thing. Least of all does Canell intend such a thing. But why then does the “evangelical” not see that by presenting the non-Christian with Arminianism rather than with the Reformed faith he compromises the Christian religion? Why does Carnell not see that in doing what he does, the non-Christina is not really challenged either by fact or by logic? For facts and logic which are not themselves first seen in the light of Christianity have, in the nature of the case, no power in them to challenge the unbeliever to change his position. Facts and logic, not based upon the creation doctrine and not placed in the context of the doctrine of God’s all-embracing Providence, which culminates in the redemption through Christ, are without significant relation to one another and therefore wholly meaningless.

It is this truth which must be shown to Mr. Black. The folly of holding to any view of life except that which is frankly based upon the Bible as the absolute authority for man must be pointed out to him. Ony then are we doing what Paul did when he said: “Where is the wise? where is the scribe? Sherries the disputer of this world? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?” (1Cor. 1:20).

As a Reformed Christian, Mr. White therefore cannot cooperate with Mr. grey in his analysis of Mr. Black. This fact may appear more clearly if we turn to see how Mr. Black appears when he is analyzed by Mr. White in terms of the Bible alone.

According to Mr. White’s analysis, Mr. Black is not a murderer. He is not a drunkard or a dope addict. He lives in one of the suburbs. He is every whit a gentleman. He gives to the Red Cross and to the United Fund campaigns. He was a Boy Scout; he is a member of a lodge; he is very civic minded; now and then his name is mentioned in the papers as an asset to the community. But he is spiritually dead. He is filled with the spirit of error. Perhaps he is a member of a “fine church” in the community, but nevertheless he is one of those “people that do err in their heart” (Ps. 95:10). He lives in a stupor (Rom. 11:8). To him the wisdom of God is foolishness. The truth about God, and about himself in relation to God, is obnoxious to him. He does not want to hear of it. He seeks to close his eyes and ears to those who give witness to the truth. He is, in short, utterly self-deceived.

On the other hand, Mr. Black is certain that he looks at life in the only proper way. Even if he has doubts as to the truth of what he believes, he does not see how any sensible or rational man could believe or do otherwise. If he has doubts, it is because no one can be fully sure of himself. If he has fears, it is because he has to be expected in the hazardous and ambiguous situation in which modern man lives. If he sees men's minds break down, he thinks this is to be expected under current conditions of stress and strain. If he sees grown men act like children, he says that they once were beasts. Everything, including the "abnormal" is to him "normal."

In all this, Mr. Black has obviously taken for granted that what the Bible says about the world and himself is not true. He has taken this for granted. He may never have argued the point. He has cemented yellow spectacles to his own eyes. He cannot remove them because he will not remove them. He is blind and loves to be blind.

But do not think that Mr. Black has an easy time of it. He is the man who always "kicks against the pricks." His Conscience troubles him all the time. Deep down in his heart he knows that what the Bible says about him and about the world is true. Even if he has never heard of the Bible, he knows that he is a creature of God and that he has broken the law of God (Rom. 1:19, 20; 2:14, 15). When the prodigal son left his father's house, he could not immediately efface from his memory the look and voice of his father. That look and that voice came back to him even when he was at the swine trough! How hard he had tried to live as though the money with which he so freely entertained his "friends" had not come from his father! When asked where he came from, he would answer that he came "from the other side." He did not want to be reminded of his past. Yet he could not forget it. It required a constant act of suppression to forget his past. But that very act of suppression itself keeps alive the memory of the past.

Mr. Black daily changes the truth of God into a lie. He daily holds the truth in unrighteousness (Rom. 1:18). But what a time he has with himself! He may try to sear his conscience as with a hot iron. He may seek to escape the influence of all those who witness to the truth. But he can never escape himself as witness bearer to the truth.

His conscience keeps telling him: "Mr. Black, you are a fugitive from justice. You have run away from home, from your father's bountiful love. You are an ingrate, a sneak, a rascal! You shall not escape meeting justice at last. The father still feeds you. Yet you despise the riches of his goodness and forbearance and longsuffering; not recognizing that the goodness of God is calculated to lead you to repentance (Rom. 2:4). Why do you kick against the pricks? Why do you stifle the voice of your conscience? Why do you use the wonderful intellect that God has given you as a tool for the suppression of the voice of God which speaks to you through yourself and your environment? Why do you build your house on sand instead of on rock? Can you be sure that no storm is ever coming? Are you omniscient? Are you omnipotent? You say that nobody knows whether God exists or whether Christianity is true. You say that nobody knows this because man is finite. Yet you assume that God cannot exist, and that Christianity cannot be true. You assume that no judgment will ever come. You must be omniscient to know that. Yet you have just said that all man declares about 'the beyond' must be based upon his brief span of existence in this world of time and chance. How, then, if you have taken for granted that chance is one of the basic ingredients of human experience, can you at the same time say what can or cannot be in all time to come? You certainly have made a fool of yourself, Mr. Black,” says Mr. Black to himself. “You reject the claims of truth which you know to be the truth, and you do that in terms of the lie which really you know to be the lie. It is you, not Mr. White, who engages in circular reasoning. It is you, not Mr. White, who refuses to face the facts as they are. It is you, not Mr. White, who crucifies Logic.”

It is not always that Mr. Black is thus aware of the fact that he lives like the prodigal who would have eaten of the things the swine did eat, but who knew he could not because he was a human being. Mr. Black is not always thus aware of his folly. This is, in part at least, because of the failure of evangelicals and particularly Reformed Christians to stir him up to a realization of this basic depth of his folly. The Reformed Christian should, on his basis, want to stir up Mr. Black to an appreciation of the folly of his ways.

However, when the Reformed Christian, Mr. White, is to any extent aware of the richness of his own position and actually has the courage to challenge Mr. Black by presenting to him the picture of himself as taken through the X-ray machine called the Bible, he faces the charge of “circular reasoning” and of finding no “point of contact” with experience. He will also be subject to the criticism of the Arminian for speaking as if Christianity were irrational and for failing to reach the man in the street.

Thus we seem to be in a bad predicament. There is a basic difference of policy between Mr. White and Mr. Grey as to how to deal with Mr. Black. Mr. Grey thinks that Mr. Black is not really such a bad fellow, it is possible, he thinks, to live with Mr. Black in the same world. Mr. Black is pretty strong. It is best to make a compromise peace with him. That seems to be the way of the wise and practical politician. On the other hand, Mr. White thinks that it is impossible to live permanently in the same world with Mr. Black. Mr. Black, he says, must therefore be placed before the requirement of absolute and unconditional surrender to Christ. Surely it would be out of the question for Mr. White first to make a compromise of peace with Mr. Black and then, after all, to require unconditional surrender to Christ! But what, then, about the charge of circular reasoning and about the charge of having no point of contact with the unbeliever?

A. A Consistent Witness

The one main question to which we are to address ourselves now is whether Christians holding to the Reformed Faith must also hold to a specifically Reformed method of reasoning when they are engaged in the defenses of the faith.

This broad question does not pertain merely to the “five points of Calvinism.” When Arminians attack these great doctrines (total depravity, unconditional election, limited atonement, irresistible grace, perseverance of the saints) we, as Calvinists, are quick to defend them. We believe that these five points are directly drawn from Scripture. But the question now under discussion is whether, in the defense of any Christian doctrine, Reformed Christian should use a method all their own.

People easily give a negative reply to this question. Do we not have many doctrines in common with all evangelicals? Do not all orthodox Protestants hold to the substitutionary atonement of Christ? More particularly, what about the simple statements of fact recorded in Scripture? How could anyone, if he believes such statements at all, take them otherwise than as simple statements of fact? How could anyone have a specifically Reformed doctrine of such a fact as the resurrection of Christ? If together with evangelicals we accept certain simple truths and facts of Scripture at face value, how then can we be said to have a separate method of defense of such doctrines?

Yet it can readily be shown that a negative answer to these questions cannot be maintained. Take, for example, the doctrine of the atonement. The Arminian doctrine of the atonement is not the same as the Reformed doctrine of atonement. Both the Arminian and the Calvinist assert that they believe in the substitutionary atonement is colored, and as Calvinists we believe discolored, by the view of “free will.” According to the Arminian view, man has absolute or ultimate power to accept or to reject the salvation offered him. This implies that the salvation offered to man is merely the possibility of salvation.

To illustrate: suppose I deposit one million dollars to your account in your bank. It is still altogether up to you to believe that such wealth is yours, and to use it to cover the floor of your house with Persian rugs in place of the old threadbare rugs now there. Thus, in the Arminian scheme, the very possibility of things no longer depends exclusively upon God, but, in some areas at least, upon man. What Christ did for us is made to depend for its effectiveness upon what is done by us. It is no longer right to say that with God all things are possible.

It is obvious, therefore, that Arminians have taken into their Protestantism a good bit of the leaven of Roman Catholicism. Arminianism is less radical, less consistent in its Protestantism than it should be.

Now Mr. Grey, the evangelical, seems to have a relatively easy time of it when he seeks to win Mr. Black, the unbeliever, to an acceptance of “the substitutionary atonement.” He can stand on “common ground” [\[a point of contact as Van Til notes\]](#) with Mr. Black on this matter of what is possible and what is impossible. Listen to Mr. Grey as he talks with Mr. Black.

“Mr. Black, have you accepted Christ as your personal Savior? Do you believe that he died on the cross as your substitute? If you do not, you will surely be lost forever.”

“Well now,” replies Mr. Black, “I’ve just had a visit from Mr. White on the same subject. You two seem to have a ‘common witness’ on this matter. Both of you believe that God exists, that he has created the world, that the first man, Adam, sinned, and that we are all to be sent to hell because of what that first man did, and so forth. All this is too fatalistic for me. If I am a creature, as you say I am, then I have no ultimate power of my own and therefore am not free. And if I am not free, then I am not responsible. So, if I am going to hell, it will be simply because you ‘God’ has determined that I should. You orthodox Christians kill morality and all humanitarian progress. I will have none of it. Goodbye!”

“But wait a second,” says Mr. Grey, in great haste. “I do not have a common witness at this point with the Calvinist. I have a common witness [\[a point of contact\]](#) with you against the Calvinist when it comes to all that determinism that you mention. Of course you are free. You are absolutely free to accept or reject the atonement that is offered to you. I offer the atonement through Christ only as a possibility. You yourself must make it an actuality for yourself. I agree with you over against the Calvinist in saying that ‘possibility’ is wider than the will of God. I would not for a moment say with the Calvinist that God’s counsel determines ‘whatsoever comes to pass’.”

“Besides, even less extreme Calvinists like Dr. J. Oliver Buswell, Jr., virtually agree with both of us. Listen to what Buswell says: ‘Nevertheless, our moral choices are choices in which we are ourselves ultimate causes.’ Dr. Buswell himself wants to go beyond the ‘merely arbitrary answer’ in Romans 9:20, 21, which speaks of the potter and the clay, to the ‘much more profound analysis of God’s plan of redemption’ in romans 9:22-24, in which Paul pictures Pharaoh as ‘...one who, according to the foreknowledge of God, would rebel against God.’

My note on ultimate causes: Man is a genuine second cause, but not an ultimate or first cause. Only God is the first cause. Arminians believe that our choices to believe or love God must originate within us or else they are not genuine; they see God as doing violence to the assumed autonomous will of man by God influencing their will one way or the other. Of course this view of Arminianism robs God of his glory, attributing it to man.

“I understand then,” replies Mr. Black, “that you Arminians and more moderate Calvinists are opposed to the determinism of regular, old-style Calvinists of the historic Reformed Confessions? I am glad to hear that. To say that all things have been fixed from all eternity by God is terrible! [Arminians hate the idea of God’s decrees because it strips man of his independence or assumed autonomy] It makes me shudder! What would happen to all morality and decency if all men believed such teaching? But now you Arminians have joined us in holding that ‘possibility’ is independent of the will of God. You have thus with all good people and with all liberal and new-orthodox theologians, like Barth, made possible the salvation of men.” [Karl Barth, 1886-1968. He had some radical unorthodox views.]

“That means, of course, that salvation is also possible for those too who have never heard of Jesus of Nazareth. Salvation is therefore possible without an acceptance of your substitutionary atonement through this Jesus of whom you speak. You certainly would not want to say with the Calvinists that God has determined the bounds of all nations and individuals and has thus, after all, determined that some men, millions of them, in fact, should never hear this gospel.”

“Besides, if possibility is independent of God, as you evangelicals and moderate Calvinists teach, then I need not be afraid of hell. It is then quite possible that there is no hell. Hell, you will then agree, is that torture of man’s conscience which he experiences when he fails to live up to his own moral ideals. So, I do not think that I shall bother just yet about accepting Christ as my personal Savior. There is plenty of time.”

Poor Mr. Grey. He really wanted to say something about having a common testimony with the Calvinists after all. At the bottom of his heart, he knew that Mr. White, the Calvinist, and not Mr. Black, the unbeliever, was his real friend. But he had made a common witness with Mr. Black against the supposed determinism of Mr. White, the Calvinist, so it was difficult for him, after that, to turn about face and also make a common testimony with Mr. White against defending his faith had force him to admit that Mr. Black was basically right. He had not given Mr. Black an opportunity of knowing what he was supposed to accept, but his testimony had confirmed Mr. Black in his belief that there was no need of his accepting Christ at all.

It is true, of course, that in practice Mr. Grey is much better in his theology and in his method of representing the gospel than he is here said to be. But that is because in practice every evangelical who really loves his Lord is a Calvinist at heart. How could he really pray to God for help if he believed that there was a possibility that God could not help? In their hearts all true Christians believe that God controls “whatsoever comes to pass.” But the Calvinists cannot have a common witness for the substitutionary atonement with Arminians who first make a common witness with the unbeliever against him on the all-important question whether God controls all things that happen.

It must always be remembered that the first requirement for effective witnessing is that the position defended be intelligible. Arminianism, when consistently carried out, destroys this intelligibility.

The second requirement for effective witnessing is that he to whom the witness is given must be shown why he should forsake his own position and accept that which is offered him. Arminianism, when consistently carried out, destroys the reason why the unbeliever should accept the gospel. Why should the unbeliever change his position if he is not shown that it is wrong? Why should he exchange his position for that of Christianity if the one who asks him to change is actually encouraging him in thinking that he is right? The Calvinist will need to have a better method of defending the doctrine of the atonement therefore than that of the Arminian.

We have dealt with the doctrine of the atonement. That led us into the involved question whether God is the source of possibility, or whether possibility is the source of God. It has been shown that the Arminian holds to a position which requires him to make both of these contradictory assertions at once. But how about the realm of fact? Do you also hold, I am asked, that we need to seek for a specifically Reformed method of defending the “facts” of Christianity? Take the resurrection of Christ as an example – why can there be no common witness on the part of the Arminian and the Calvinist so such a fact as that?

Once more Mr. Grey, the Arminian, pushes the doorbell at Mr. Black’s home. Mr. Black answers and admits him.

“I am here again, Mr. Black,” begins Grey, because I am still anxious to have you accept Christ as your personal Savior. When I spoke to you the other time about the atonement you got me into deep water. We got all tangled up on the question of ‘possibility.’”

“But now I have something simpler. I want to deal with simple facts. I want to show you that the resurrection of Jesus from the dead is as truly a fact as any fact that you can mention. To use the words of Dr. Wilbur Smith, himself a ‘moderate’ Calvinist but opposed to the idea of the distinctively Reformed method for the defense of the faith: ‘The meaning of the resurrection is a theological matter, but the fact of the resurrection is a historical matter; the nature of the resurrection of body of Jesus may be a mystery, but the fact that the body disappeared from the tomb is a matter to be decided upon by historical evidence.’ The historical evidence for the resurrection is the kind of evidence that you as a scientist would desire.”

“Smith writes in the same book: ‘About a year ago, after studying over a long period of time the entire problem of our Lord’s resurrection, and having written some hundreds of pages upon it at different times, I was suddenly arrested by the thought that the very kind of evidence which modern science, and even psychologists, are so insistent upon for determining the reality any object under consideration is the kind of evidence that we have presented to us in the regarding the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, namely, that things that are seen with the human eye, touched with human hand, and heard by the human ear. This is what we call empirical evidence. It would almost seem as if parts of the gospel records of the resurrection were actually written for such a day as ours when empiricism so dominates our thinking.”

“Now I think that Smith is quite right in thus distinguishing sharply between the fact and the meaning of the resurrection. I am now only asking you to accept the fact of the resurrection. There is the clearest possible empirical evidence for this fact. The living Jesus was touched with human hands and seen with human eyes of sensible men after he had been crucified and put into the tomb. Surely you ought to believe in the resurrection of Christ as a historical fact. And to believe in the resurrected Christ is to be saved.”

“But hold on a second,” says Mr. Black. “Your friend the Calvinist, Mr. White, has been ahead of you again. He was here last night and spoke of the same thing that you are not speaking about. However, he did not thus distinguish between the fact and the meaning of the resurrection. At least, he did not for a moment want to separate the fact of the resurrection from the system of Christianity in terms of which it gets its meaning. He spoke of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, as rising from the dead. He spoke of the Son of God through whom the world was made and through whom the world is sustained, as having risen from the dead. When I asked him how this God could die and rise again from the dead, he said that God did not die and rise from the dead but that the second person of the Trinity had taken to himself a human nature, and that it was in this human nature that he died and rose again. In short, in accepting the fact of the resurrection he wanted me also to accept all this abracadabra about the trinitarian God. I have a suspicion that you are secretly trying to have me do something similar.”

“No, no,” replies Mr. Grey. “I am in complete agreement with you here against the Calvinist. I have a common witness with you against him. I, too, would separate fact from system. Did I not agree with you against the Calvinist, in holding that possibility is independent of God? Well then, by the same token I hold that all kinds of facts happen apart from the plan of God. We Arminians are in a position, as the Calvinists are not, of speaking with you on neutral ground. [aka, a point of contact] With you, we could simply talk about the “facts” of Christianity without immediately bringing into the picture anything about the meaning or the significance of those facts.”

“It makes me smile,” continues Mr. Grey, “when I think of Mr. White coming over here trying to convert you. That poor fellow is always reasoning in circles! I suppose that such reasoning in circles goes with determinism. He is always talking about his self-contained God. He says that all facts are what they are because of the plan of God. Then each fact would of necessity, to be a fact at all, prove the truth of the Christian system of things and, in turn, would be proved as existing by virtue of this self-same Christian system of things. I realize full well that you, as a modern scientist and philosopher, can have no truck with such horrible, circular reasoning as that.”

It is for this reason that, as Arminian evangelicals, we have now separated sharply between the resurrection as a historical fact and the meaning of the resurrection. I’m merely asking you to accept the fact of the resurrection. I am not asking you to do anything that you cannot do in full consistency with your freedom and with the ‘scientific method.’”

“Well, this is delightful,” replies Mr. Black. “I always felt that the Calvinists were our real foes. But I read something in the paper the other day to the effect that some Calvinist churches or individuals were proposing to make a common witness with Arminian evangelicals for the gospel. Now I was under the impression that the gospel had something to do with being saved from hell and going to heaven. I knew that the modernist and the ‘new modernist,’ like Barth, do not believe in tying up the facts of history with such wild speculations. It was my opinion that ‘fundamentalists’ did tie up belief in historical facts, such as the death and resurrection of Jesus, with going to heaven or to hell. So I am delighted that you, though a fundamentalist, are willing to join with the liberal and the neo-liberal in separating historical facts from such a rationalistic system as I thought Christianity was.

“Now as for accepting the resurrection of Jesus,” continued Mr. Black, “as thus properly separated from the traditional system of theology, I do not in the least mind doing that. To tell you the truth, I have accepted the resurrection as a fact now for some time. The evidence for it is overwhelming. This is a strange universe. All kinds of ‘miracles’ happen in it. The universe is ‘open.’ So why should there not be some resurrections here and there? The resurrection of Jesus would be a fine item for Ripley’s Believe It or Not. Why not send it in?”

Mr. Grey wanted to continue at this point. He wanted to speak of the common witness that he had, after all, with the Calvinist for the gospel. But it was too late. He had no “common” witness left of any sort. He had again tried to gallop off in opposite directions at the same time. He had again taken away all credibility from the witness that he meant to bring. He had again established Mr. Black in thinking that his own unbelieving reason was right. For it was as clear as crystal to Mr. Black, as it should have been to Mr. Grey, that belief in the fact of the resurrection, apart from the system of Christianity, amounts to belief that the Christian system is not true, to believe in the universe as run by Chance, and to believe that it was not Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who rose from the dead.

To be sure, in practice the Arminian is much better in his witness for the resurrection of Christ than he has been presented here. But that is, as noted already, because every evangelical, as a sincere Christian, is at heart a Calvinist. But witnessing is a matter of the head as well as of the heart. If the world is to hear a consistent testimony for the Christian faith, it is the Calvinist who must give it. If there is not a distinctively Reformed method for the defense of every article of the Christian faith, then there is no way of clearly telling an unbeliever just how Christianity differs from his own position and why he should accept the Lord Jesus Christ as his personal Savior. We are happy and thankful, of course, for the work of witnessing done by Arminians. We are happy because of the fact that, in spite of their inconsistency in presenting the Christian testimony, something, often much, of the truth of the gospel shines through unto men, and they are saved.

B. The Authority of Scripture

“But how can anyone know anything about the ‘beyond’?” asks Mr. Black.

“Well, of course,” replies Mr. Grey, “if you want absolute certainty, such as one gets in geometry, Christianity does not offer it. We offer you only ‘rational probability.’ ‘Christianity,’ as I said in effect a moment ago when I spoke of the death of Christ, ‘is founded on historical facts, which, by their very nature, cannot be demonstrated with geometric certainty. All judgments of historical particulars are at the mercy of the complexity of the time-space universe.... If the scientist cannot rise above rational probability in his empirical investigation, why should the Christian claim more?’ And what is true of the death of Christ,” adds Mr. Grey, “is, of course, also true of his resurrection. But this only shows that ‘the Christian is in possession of a world-view which is making a sincere effort to come to grips with actual history.’”

By speaking thus, Mr. Grey again seeks for a neutral point of contact with Mr. Black. For Mr. Black, history is something that floats on an infinitely extended and bottomless ocean of Chance. Therefore he can say that anything may happen. Who knows but the death and resurrection of Jesus as the Son of God might issue from this womb of Chance? Such events would have an equal chance of happening with “snarks, boojums, splinth, and gobble-de-gook.” God himself may live in this realm of Chance. He is then “wholly other” than ourselves, and his revelation in history would then be wholly unique.

The Arminian does not challenge this underlying philosophy of Chance as it controls the unbeliever’s conception of history. He is so anxious to have the unbeliever accept the possibility of God’s existence and the fact of the resurrection of Christ that, if necessary, he will exchange his own philosophy of the facts for that of the unbeliever. Anxious to be genuinely “empirical” like the unbeliever, he will throw all the facts of Christianity into the bottomless pit of Chance. Or, rather, he will throw all these facts at the unbeliever, and the unbeliever throws them over his back into the bottomless pit of Chance.

Of course, this is the last thing that such men as Wilbur Smith, Edward J. Carnell, and J. Oliver Buswell, Jr., want to do. But in failing to challenge the philosophy of Chance that underlies the unbeliever’s notion of “fact,” they are, in effect, doing it.

This approach of Mr. Grey’s is unavoidable if one hold to an Arminian Theology. The Arminian view of man’s free will implies the “possibility” is about God. But a “possibility” that is above God is the same thing as Chance. A God surrounded by Chance cannot speak with authority. He would be speaking into a vacuum. His voice could not be heard. If God were surrounded by Chance, then human beings would be too. They would live in a vacuum, unable to hear either their own voices or those of others. Thus the whole of history, including all of its facts, would be without meaning.

It is this that the Reformed Christian, Mr. White, would tell Mr. Black. In the very act of presenting the resurrection of Christ or in the very act of presenting any other fact of historic Christianity, Mr.

White would be presenting it as authoritatively interpreted in the Bible. He would argue that unless Mr. Black is willing to set the facts of history in the framework of the meaning authoritatively ascribed to them in the Bible, he will make “gobble-de-gook” of history.

If history were what Mr. Black assumes that it is, then anything might happen, and then nobody would know what may happen. No one thing would then be more likely to happen than any other thing. [The door is open to Open Theism] David Hume, the great skeptic, has effectively argued that, if you allow any room for Chance in your thought, then you no longer have the right to speak of probabilities. Whirl would then be king. No hypothesis would then have any more relevance to facts than any other hypothesis. Did God raise Christ from the dead? Perchance he did. Did Jupiter do it? Perchance he did. What is Truth? Nobody knows. Such would be the picture of the universe if Mr. Black were right.

No comfort can be taken from the assurance of the Arminian that, since Christianity makes no higher claim than that of rational probability, “the system of Christianity can be refuted only by probability. Perhaps our loss is gain.” How could one ever argue that there is a greater probability for the truth of Christianity than for the truth of its opposite, if the very meaning of the word “probability” rests upon the idea of Chance? On this basis, nature and history would be no more than a series of pointer readings pointing into the blank.

In assuming this philosophy of Chance and thus virtually saying that nobody knows what is back of the common objects of daily observation, Mr. Black also virtually says that the Christian view of this is wrong.

If I assert that there is a black cat in the closet, and you assert that nobody knows what is in the closet, you have virtually told me that I am wrong in my hypothesis. So when I tell Mr. Black that God exists, and he responds very graciously by saying that perhaps I am right since nobody knows what is in the “Beyond,” he is virtually saying that I am wrong in my hypothesis. He is obviously thinking of such a god as could comfortably live in a closet. But the God of Scripture cannot live in a closet.

When confronted with the claims of God and his Christ, Mr. Black’s response is essentially this: Nobody knows – nevertheless your hypothesis is certainly wrong and mine is certainly right! Nobody knows whether God exists, but God certainly does not exist and Chance certainly does exist.

When Mr. Black thus virtually makes his universal negative assertion, saying in effect that God cannot possibly exist and that Christianity cannot possibly be true, he must surely be standing on something very solid. Is it on solid rock that he stands/ No, he stands on water! He stands on his own “experience.” But this experience, by his own assumption, rests again on Chance. Thus standing on Chance, he swings the “logician’s postulate” and modestly asserts what cannot be in the “Beyond,” of which he said before that nothing can be said.

Of course, what Mr. Black is doing appears very reasonable to himself. “Surely,” he says, if questioned at all on the subject, “a rational man must have systematic coherence in his experience. Therefore, he cannot accept as true anything that is not in accord with the law of non-contradiction.”

So long as you leave your god in the realm of the 'Beyond,' in the realm of the indeterminate, you may worship him by yourself alone. But as soon as you claim that your God has revealed himself in creation, in providence, or in your Scripture, at once I shall put that revelation to the test by the principle of rational coherence.

"And by that test none of your doctrines are acceptable. All of them are contradictory. No rational man can accept any of them. If your God is eternal, then he falls outside of my experience and lives in the realm of the 'Beyond,' of the unknowable. But if he is to have anything to do with the world, then he must himself be wholly within the world. I must understand you God throughout if I am to speak intelligently of any relationship that he sustains to my world and to myself. Your idea that God is both eternal and unchangeable and yet sustains such relationships to the world as are involved in your doctrine of creation and providence, is flatly contradictory. Pg 56

"For me to accept your God," continues Mr. Black, "you must do to him what Karl Barth has done to him, namely, strip him of all the attributes that orthodox theology has assigned to him, and thus enable him to turn into the opposite of himself. With that sort of I have a principle of unity that brings all my experience into harmony. And that God is wholly within the universe. If you offer me such a God and offer him as the simplest hypothesis with which I may seek to order by experience as it comes to me from the womb of Chance, then the law of non-contradiction will be satisfied. As a rational man I can settle for nothing less."

All this amounts to saying that Mr. Black, the lover of a Chance philosophy, the indeterminist, is at the same time an out-and-out determinist or fatalist. It is to say that Mr. Black, the irrationalist, who says that nobody knows what is in the "Beyond" is at the same time a flaming rationalist. For him only that can be, which he thinks he can exhaustively determine by logic must be. He may at first grant that anything may exist, but when he says this, he at the same time says, in effect, that nothing can exist and have meaning for man but that which man himself can exhaustively know. Therefore, for Mr. Black, the God of Christianity cannot exist. For him the doctrine of creation cannot be true. There can be no revelation of God to man through nature and history. There can be no such thing as the resurrection of Christ.

Strangely enough, when thus says, in effect that the resurrection of Christ cannot be a fact, and when he also says that God may very well exist and that the resurrection of Christ may very well be a fact, he is not inconsistent with himself. For he must, to be true to his method, contradict himself in every statement that he makes about any fact whatsoever. If he does not, then he would deny either his philosophy of Chance or his philosophy of Fate. According to him, every fact that he meets has in it the two ingredients: that of Chance and that of Fate, that of the wholly unknown and that of the wholly known. Thus man turns the tools of thought, which the Creator has given him in order therewith to think God's thoughts after him on a created level, into the means by which he makes sure that God cannot exist, and therefore certainly cannot reveal himself.

When Mr. White meets Mr. Black, he will make this issue plain. He will tell Mr. Black that his methodology cannot make any fact or any group of facts intelligible to himself. Hear him as he speaks to the unbeliever:

“On your basis, Mr. Black, no fact can be identified by distinguishing it from any other fact. For all facts would be changing into their opposite all the time. All would be ‘gobble-de-gook.’ At the same time, nothing could change at all. Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? He clearly has. I know you cannot see this even though it is perfectly clear. I know that you have taken out your own eyes. Hence your inability to see is at the same time unwillingness to see. Pray God for forgiveness and repent.”

But what will be the of the approach of the Arminian, Mr. Grey, on this question of logic? He will do the same sort of thing that we saw him do with respect to the question of facts. Mr. Grey will again try to please Mr. Black by saying that, of course, he will justify his appeal to the authority of the Bible by showing that the very idea of such an appeal, as well as the content of the Bible, are fully in accord with the demands of logic. Listen to him as he speaks to the unbeliever:

“You are quite right in holding that nothing meaningful can be said without presupposing the validity of the law of non-contradiction,” says Mr. Grey. “ ‘the conservative ardently defends a system of authority.’ But ‘without reason to canvass the evidence of a given authority, how can one segregate a right authority from a wrong one?... Without systematic consistency to aid us, it appears that all we can do is to draw straws, count noses, flip coins to choose an authority. Once we do apply the law of contradiction, we are no longer appealing to ipse dixit authority [ipse dixit is an unproven statement], but to coherent truth; ‘The Scripture tells us to test the spirits (1 John 4:1). This can be done only by applying the cannons of truth. God cannot lie. His authority, therefore, and coherent truth are coincident at every point. Truth, not blind authority, save us from being blind followers of the blind.’

“ ‘Bring on your revelations!’ ” continues Mr. Grey. “ ‘Let them make peace with the law of contradiction and the facts of history, and they will deserve a rational man’s assent.’ ‘Any theology which rejects Aristotle’s fourth book of the Metaphysics is big with the elements of its own destruction.’ ‘If Paul were teaching that the crucified Christ were objectively foolish, in the sense that he cannot be rationally categorized, then he would have pointed to the insane and the demented as incarnations of truth.’ ”

“Well,” says Mr. Black, “this is great news indeed. I knew that the modernists were willing with us to start from human experience as the final reference point in all research. I knew that they were willing with us to start from Chance as the source of facts, in order then to manufacture such facts of nature and of history as the law of non-contradiction, based on Chance, will allow. I also knew that the famous new-orthodox theologian, Karl Barth, is willing to re-make the God of historic Christianity to that he can change into the opposite of himself, in order that thus he may satisfy both our irrationalist philosophy of Chance and our rationalist philosophy of logic. But I did not know that there were any orthodox people who were willing to do such a thing. But you have surprised me before. You were willing to throw your resurrection into the realm of Chance in order to have me accept it. So I really should have expected that you would also be willing to make the law of non-contradiction rest upon man himself instead of upon God.

“I am extremely happy, too, that not only Arminian fundamentalists but also less extreme or moderate Calvinists, like Buswell, Carnell, and Smith, are not willing to test revelation by a principle that is wholly independent of that revelation. It is now only a matter of time until they will see that they have to come over on our side altogether.

“I do not like the regular Calvinists. But they are certainly quite right from their own point of view. Mr. White claims that I am a creature of God. He says that all facts are made by God and controlled by the providence of God. He says that all men have sinned against God in Adam their representative. He adds that therefore I am spiritually blind and morally perverse. He says all this and more on the basis of the absolute authority of Scripture. He would interpret me, my facts, and my logic in terms of the authority of that Scripture. He says I need this authority. He says I need nothing but his authority. His Scripture, he claims, is sufficient and final. The whole thing, he claims, is clear in the light of Scripture.

“Now all this looks like plain historic Protestantism to me. I can intellectually understand the Calvinist on this matter of authority. I cannot understand you. You seem to me to want to have your cake and eat it. If you believe in scriptural authority, then why not explain all things, man, fact, and logic, in terms of it? If you want with us to live by your own authority, by the experience of the human race, then why not have done with the Bible as absolute authority? It, at best, gives you the authority of the expert.

“In your idea of the rational man who tests all things by the facts of history and by the law of non-contradiction, you have certainly made a point of contact with us. If you carry this through, you will indeed succeed in achieving complete coincidence between your ideas and ours. With us, you will have achieved complete coincidence between the ideas of man and the ideas of God. The reason for this coincidence of your ideas with ours, and for coincidence of man’s ideas with God’s, is that you, like we, then have a God and a Christ who are virtually identical with man.

“Do you not think, Mr. Grey, that this is too great a price for you to pay? I am sure that you do not thus mean to drag down your God into the universe. I am sure that you do not thus mean to crucify your Christ afresh. But why then halt between two opinions? I do not believe Christianity, but, if I did, I would stand with Mr. White.”

C. Proofs for the Existence of God

When Mr. Black objects against Mr. White that unconditional surrender to the authority of Scripture is irrational, then Mr. Grey nods approval and says that, of course, the “rational man” has a perfect right to test the credibility of Scripture by logic. When the Bible speaks of God’s sovereign election of some men to salvation this must mean something that fits in with his “rational nature.” When Mr. Black objects to Mr. White that unconditional surrender to Scripture is rationalistic, then Mr. Grey again nods approval and says that, of course, genuine human personality has a perfect right to test the content of Scripture by experience. When the Bible speaks of God controlling by his counsel whatsoever comes to pass, this must mean something that fits in with man’s “freedom.” God created man and gave man a share in his own freedom; mean therefore participate in his being.

But what of natural or general revelation? Here surely there can be no difference, you say, between the requirements of Mr. White and Mr. Grey. Here there is no law and no promise; here there are only the facts of nature. How can you speak of any requirement at all with respect to them? Herer surely Mr. White can forget the “five points of Calvinism” and join Mr. Grey in taking Mr. Black through the picture gallery of his world, pointing out its beauties to him so that with them he will spontaneously exclaim, “The whole chorus of nature raises one hymn to the praise of its Creator.”

Let us think of Mr. White as trying to hard to forget his “five points.” “Surely,” he says to himself, “there can be nothing wrong with joining Mr. Grey in showing Mr. Black the wonders of God’s creation. We believe in the same God, do we not? Both of us want to show Mr. Black the facts of creation so that he, too, will believe in God. When Mr. Black says, ‘I see no meaning in all I have seen, and I continue, just as I was, confused and dismayed,’ Mr. Grey and I can together take him to the Mr. Wilson observatory so he may see the starry heavens above. Surely the source of knowledge of the natural sciences is the Book of Nature which is given to everyone. Do not the Scriptures themselves teach that there is a light in nature which cannot be, and is not, transmitted through the spectacles of the Word? If this were not so, how could the Scriptures say of those who have only the light of nature that they are without excuse?”

So the three men, Mr. White, Mr. Grey, and Mr. Black, go here and there and everywhere. Mr. White and Mr. Grey agree to share the expense. Mr. Black is their guest.

They go first to the Mt. Wilson observatory to see the starry skies above. “How wonderful, how grand!” exclaims Mr. Grey. Then to the marvels of the telescope they add those of the microscope. They circle the globe to see “the wonders of the world.” They listen to the astronauts speaking down to the earth from the vicinity of the moon. There is no end to eh “exhibits” and Mr. Black shows signs of weariness. So, they sint down on the beach. Will not Mr. Black now sign on the dotted line?

As they wait for the answer, Mr. Grey spies a watch someone has lost. Holding it in his hand he says to Mr. Black: “Look around the world: contemplate the whole and every part of it: you will find it to benothing but one great machine, subdivided into an infinite number of lesser machines, which again admit of subdivisions, to a degree beyond that which human senses and faculties can trace and explain. All these various machines, and even their minute parts, are adjusted to each other with an accuracy which forces admiration from all men who have ever contemplated them. The curious adapting of means to ends, throughout all nature, resembles exactly, though it much exceeds, the production of human contrivance, of human designs, thought, wisdom, and intelligence. Since, therefore, the effects resemble each other, we ar led to infer, by all the rules of analogy, that the causes also resemble one another. The Author of Nature is somewhat similar to the mind of man, though possessed of much larger faculties, proportioned to the grandeur of the word, which he has executed. [\[Van Til is describing Rome’s idea that man is much lower than God on the scale of being as opposed to God being separate from Man as his creator as well as God being transcendent.\]](#)

“Now, Mr. Black, I don’t want to put undue pressure on you. You know your own needs n your own business. But I think that as a rational being you owe it to yourself to join the theistic party. Isn’t it highly probable that there is a God?

“I’m not now asking you to become a Christian. We take things one step at a time. I’m only speaking of the book of Nature. Of course, if there is a God and if this God should have a son, and if this Son should also reveal himself, it is not likely to be more difficult for you to believe in him than it is now to believe in the Father. But just now I am only asking you to admit that there is a great accumulation of evidence of the sort that any scientist or philosopher must admit to be valid for the existence of a God back of and above this world. You see this watch. Isn’t it highly probable that a power higher than itself has made it? You know the purpose of a watch. Isn’t it highly probable that the wonderful contrivances of nature serve the purpose of a god? Looking back we are naturally led to a god who is the cause of this world; looking forward we think of a god who has a purpose with this world. So far as we can observe the course and constitution of the universe there is, I think, no difficulty on your own adopted principles, against belief in a god. Why not become a theist? You do want to be on the winning side, don’t you? Well, the Gallop poll of the universe indicates a tendency toward the final victory of theism?”

When Mr. Grey had finished his obviously serious and eloquent plea, Mr. Black looked very thoughtful. He was clearly a gentleman. He disliked disappointing his two friends after all the generosity they had shown him. but he could not honestly see any basic difference between his own position and theirs. So he declined politely but resolutely to sign on the dotted line. He refused to be “converted” to theism. In substance he spoke as follows: “You speak of evidence of rationality and purpose in the universe. You would trace this rationality or purpose back to a rational being who is back of the universe who, you think, is likely to have a purpose with the universe. But who is back of your God to explain him in turn? By your own definition your god is not absolute or self-sufficient. You say that he probably exists; which means that you admit that he may not exist. Probability rests upon possibility. I think that any scientific person should come with an open mind to the observation of the facts of the universe. He ought to begin by assuming that any sort of fact may exist. I was glad to observe that on this all-important point you agree with me. Hence the only kind of god that either of us can believe in is one who may or may not exist. In other words, neither of us does or can believe in a God who cannot not exist. It was just this sort of God, a God who is self-sufficient, and as such necessarily existent, that I thought you Christian theists believed in.”

By this time Mr. White was beginning to squirm. He was beginning to realize that he had sold out the God of his theology, the Sovereign God of Scripture, by his silent consent to the argument of Mr. Grey. Mr. Black was right, he felt at once. Either one presupposes God back of the ideas of possibility or one presupposes that the idea of possibility is back of God. Either one says with historic Reformed theology on this basis of Scripture that what God determines and only what God determines is possible, or one says with all non-Christian forms of thought that possibility surrounds God. But for the moment Mr. White was stupefied. He could say nothing. So Mr. Black simply drew that conclusion from what he had said in the following words:

“Since, in your effort to please me, you have accepted my basic assumption with respect to the possibility, it follows that your God, granted he exists, is of no use whatsoever in explaining the universe. He himself needs in turn to be explained. Let us remember the story of the Indian philosopher and his elephant. It was never more applicable than to the present subject. If the material world rests upon a similar ideal world, this ideal world must rest upon some other; and so on, without end. It were better, therefore, never to look beyond the present material world. In short, gentleness, much as I dislike not to please you, what you offer is nothing better than what I already possess. Your God is himself surrounded by pure possibility or Chance. In what way can he help me? How could I be responsible to him? For you, as for me, all things ultimately end in the irrational.”

At this point Mr. Grey grew pale. In desperation he searched his arsenal for another argument that might convince Mr. Black. There was one that he had not used for some time. The argument for God that he had so far use, he had labeled a posteriori arguments. They ought, he had thought, to appeal to the “empirical” temper of the times. They started from human experience with causation and purpose and by analogy argued to the idea of a cause of and a purpose with the world as a whole. But Mr. Black had pointed out that if you start with the ideas of cause and purpose as intelligible to man without God, when these concepts apply to relations within the universe, then you cannot consistently say that you need God for the idea of cause or purpose when these concepts apply to the universe as a whole. So now Mr. Grey drew out the drawer marked a priori argument. In public he called this the argument from finite to absolute being. “As finite creature,” he said to Mr. Black, “we have the idea of absolute being. The idea of a finite being involves of necessity the idea of an absolute being. We have the notion of an absolute being; surely there must be a reality corresponding to our idea of such a being; if not, all our ideas may be false. Surely we must hold that reality is ultimately rational and coherent and that our ideas participate in this rationality. If not, how could science be possible?”

When Mr. Grey had thus delivered himself of this appeal to logic rather than to fact, then Mr. White for a moment seemed to take courage. Was not this at least to get away from the idea of a God who probably exists? Surely the “incommunicable attributes of God,” of which hee had been taught in his catechism classes, were all based upon, and expressive of, the idea of God as necessarily existing. But Mr. Black soon disillusioned him for the second time. Said he in answer to the argument from Mr. Grey, “Again I cannot see any basic difference between your position and mine. Of course, we must believe that reality is ultimately rational. And of course, we must hold that our minds participate in this rationality. But when you speak thus you thereby virtually assert that we must not believe in a God whose existence is independent of our human existence. A God whom we are to know must, with us, be a part of a rational system that is mutually accessible to, and expressive of, both. If God is necessary to you, then you are also necessary to God. That is the only sort of God that is involved in your argument.”

“But Mr. Back, this is terrible, this is unbearable! I will give you a Bible. Please read it! It tells you of Jesus Christ and how you may be saved by his blood. I am born again, and you can be born again too if you will only believe. Please do believe in God and be save!”

Meanwhile, Mr. white took new courage. He realized that he had so far made a great mistake in keeping silent during the time that Mr. Grey had presented his arguments. The arguments for the existence of God taken from the ideas of cause and purpose as set forth by Mr. Grey had led to pure irrationalism and Chance. The argument about an absolute being as set forth by Mr. Grey had led to pure rationalism and determinism. In both cases, Mr. Black had been quite right in saying that a God whose existence is problematic, or a God who exists by the same necessity as does the universe, is still an aspect of, or simply the whole of, the universe. But now he felt that perhaps Mr. Grey was right in simply witnessing to the existence of God. HE thought that, if the arguments used are not logically coercive, they may at least be used as a means with which to witness to unbelievers. And surely witnessing to God's existence was always in order. But poor Mr. White was to be disillusioned again. For the witness-bearing done by Mr. Grey was based on the assumption that the believe in God is a purely non-rational or even irrational matter.

Mr. Black's reply to the words of Mr. Grey indicated this fact all too clearly. Said Mr. black to Mr. Grey: "I greatly appreciate your evident concern for my 'eternal welfare.' But there are two or three questions that I would like to have you answer. In the first place, I would ask whether in thus simply witnessing to me of God's existence you thereby admit that the arguments for the existence of God have no validity? Or rather do you not thereby admit that these arguments, if they prove anything, prove that God is finite and correlative to man and therefore that your position is not basically different from mine?"

Mr. Grey did not answer because he could not answer this question otherwise than by agreeing with Mr. Black.

"In the second place," said Mr. Black, "you are now witnessing to Christ as well as to God, to Christianity as well as to theism. I suppose your argument for Christianity would be similar in nature to your argument for theism, would it not? You would argue that the Jesus of the New Testament is probably the Son of God and that he quite probably died for the sins of men. But now you witness to me about your Christ. And by witnessing instead of reasoning you seem to admit that there is no objective claim for the truth of what you hold with respect to Christ. Am I right in all this?"

Again Mr. Grey made no answer. The only answer he could consistently have given would be to agree with Mr. Black.

"In the third place," said Mr. Black, "you are now witnessing not only to God the Father, to Jesus Christ the Son, but also to the Holy Spirit. You say you are born again, that you know you are saved and that at present I am lost. Now, if you have had a special experience of some sort, it would be unscientific for me to deny it. But, if you want to witness to me about your experience, you must make plain to me the nature of that experience. To do that you must do so in terms of principle that I understand. Such principles must needs be accessible to all. Now if you make plain your experience to me in terms of principles that are plain to me as unregenerate, then how is your regeneration unique? On the other hand, if you still maintain that your experience of regeneration is unique, then can you say anything about it to me so that I may understand? Does not then our witness-bearing appear to be wholly unintelligible and devoid of meaning? Thus again you cannot make any claim to the objective truth of your position.

"Summing up the whole matter, I would say in the first place, that your arguments for the existence of God have rightfully established me in my unbelief. They have shown that nothing can be said for the existence of a God who is actually the Creator and controller of the world. I would say in the second place that using such arguments as you have used for the existence of God commits you to using similar arguments for the truth of Christianity with similar fatal results for your position. In both cases you first use intellectual arguments upon principles that presuppose the justice of my unbelieving position. Then, when it is pointed out to you that such is the case, you turn to witnessing. But then your witnessing is in the nature of the case an activity that you yourself have virtually admitted to be wholly irrational and unintelligible.

When Mr. Black had finished, Mr. White was in great distress. But it was through this very distress that he at last saw the richness of his own faith. He made no pretense to having greater intellectual power than Mr. Grey. He greatly admired the real faith and courage of Mr. Grey. But he dared keep silence no longer. His silence had been sin, he now realized. Mr. Black had completely discomfited Mr. Grey, so that he had not another word to say. Mr. Black was about to leave them established rather than challenged in his unbelief. And all of that in spite of the best intentions and efforts of Mr. Grey, speaking for both of them. A sense of urgent responsibility to make known the claims of the sovereign God pressed upon him. He now saw clearly, first, that the arguments for the existence of God, as conducted by Mr. Grey, are based on the assumption that the unbeliever is right with respect to the principle in terms of which he explains all things. These principles are: (a) that man is not a creature of God but rather is ultimate and as such must properly consider himself instead of God the final reference point in explaining all things; (b) that all other things beside himself are non-created but controlled by Chance; and (c) that the power of logic that he possesses is the means by which he must determine what is possible or impossible in the universe of Chance.

At last, it dawned upon Mr. White that first to admit that the principles of Mr. Black, the unbeliever, are right and then to seek to win him to the acceptance of the existence of God the Creator and judge of all men is like first admitting that the United States had historically been a province of the Soviet Union but ought at the same time to be recognized as an independent and all-controlling political power.

In the second place, Mr. White now saw clearly that a false type of reasoning for the truth of God's existence and for the truth of Christianity involves a false kind of witnessing for the existence of God and for the truth of Christianity. If one reasons for the existence of God and for the truth of Christianity, on the assumption that Mr. Black's principles of explanation are valid, then one must witness on the same assumption. One must then make plain to Mr. Black, in terms of principles which Mr. Black accepts, what it means to be born again. Mr. Black will then apply the principles of modern psychology of religion to Mr. Grey's "testimony" with respect to his regeneration and show that it is something that naturally comes in the period of adolescence.

In the third place, Mr. White now saw clearly that it was quite "proper," for Mr. Grey, to use a method of reasoning and a method of witness-bearing that is based upon the truth of anti-Christian and anti-theistic assumptions. Mr. Greys' theology is not Reformed. It is therefore based upon the idea that God is not wholly sovereign over man. It assumes that man's responsibility implies a measure of autonomy of the sort that is the essence and foundation of the whole of Mr. Black's thinking. It is therefore to be expected that Mr. Grey will assume that Mr. Black needs not to be challenged on his basic assumption with respect to his own assumed ultimacy or autonomy.

From now on Mr. White decided that, much as he enjoyed the company of Mr. Grey and much as he admired his evident sincerity and basic devotion to the truth of God, they he must go his own way in apologetics as he had, since the Reformation, gone his own way in theology. He tried to make an appointment with Mr. Black then to see him soon. Meanwhile he expressed to Mr. Grey his great love for him as a fellow believer, his great admiration for his fearless and persistent efforts to win men to an acceptance of truth as it is in Jesus. Then he confessed to Mr. Grey that his conscience had troubled him during the entire time of their travels with Mr. Black. He had started in good faith, thinking that Mr. Grey's efforts at argument and witnessing might win Mr. Black. He had therefore been quite willing, especially since Mr. Grey was through his constant study much more conversant with such things than he himself was, to be represented by Mr. Grey. But now he had a last come to realize that not only had the effort been utterly fruitless and self-frustrating but, more than that, it had been terribly dishonoring to God. How could the eternal I AM be pleased with being presented as being a god and as probably existing, as probably necessary for the explanation of some things but not all things, as on who will be glad to recognize the ultimacy of his own creatures? Would the God who had in paradise required of men implicit obedience now be satisfied with a claims-and-counter-claims arrangement with his creatures?

From the dialogue given above, the reader can for himself discern why we have advocated what seems to us to be a Reformed as over against the traditional method of apologetics. The traditional method, the method practiced by various Christians for centuries, was constructed by Roman Catholics and Arminians. It was, so to speak, derived from Romanist or Arminian theology. Just as Roman Catholic and Arminian theology compromises the Christian doctrines of Scripture, of God, of man, of sin, and of redemption, so the traditional method of apologetics compromises Christianity in order to win men to an acceptance of it.

The traditional method of compromises the biblical doctrine of God in not clearly distinguishing his self-existence from his relation to the world. The traditional method compromises the biblical doctrine of God and his relation to his revelation to man by not clearly insisting that man, as a creature and as a sinner, must not seek to determine the nature of God, otherwise than from his revelation.

The traditional method compromises the biblical doctrine of the counsel of God by not taking it as the only all-inclusive ultimate "cause" of whatsoever comes to pass.

The traditional method therefore compromises the clarity of God's revelation to man, whether this revelation comes through general or through special revelation. Created facts are not taken to be clearly revelational of God; all the facts of nature and of man are said to indicated no more than that a god probably exists.

The traditional method compromises the necessity of supernatural revelation in relation to natural revelation. It does so in failing to do justice to the fact that even in paradise man had to interpret natural revelation in the light of the covenantal obligations placed upon him by God through supernatural communication. In consequence, the traditional method fails to recognize the necessity of redemptive supernatural, as concomitant to natural, revelation after the fall of man.

The traditional method compromises the sufficiency of Scripture by not taking it as self-attesting in the full sense of the term.

The traditional method compromises the biblical doctrine of man's creation in the image of God by thinking of him as being "free" or ultimate rather than analogical. [I think he means dependent upon God or derivative in nature to God. We are not wholly free creatures; our freedom of our will is derivative. Jer. 10:23, O LORD, I know the way of man is not in himself; It is not in man who walks to direct his own steps.]

The traditional method compromises the biblical doctrine of sin, in not thinking of it as an ethical break with God which is complete in principle even though not in practice.

In spite of these things, this traditional method has been employed by Reformed theologians, and this fact has stood in the way of the development of a distinctly Reformed apologetic.

VI. Conclusion

It has become even more apparent now that our Reformed pastor cannot, as he defends the Christian faith, cooperate with the Arminian any more than he could cooperate with the Roman Catholic.

The Arminian as well as the Roman Catholic fails to present to the believer a challenge to the effect that he needs a radical conversion. Neither the Arminians or the Roman Catholic so much as gives the unbeliever the opportunity of seeing what the gospel really is. They do not direct the all-revealing searchlight of the Scripture toward him. They do not even show him the face of the Great Physician lest this Great Physician should say that the heart of the natural man is desperately wicked and that no man knows the depth of that wickedness except the Great Physician, who would heal all his diseases.

Of course, we are speaking primarily of systems rather than men. Many roman Catholics, and especially many Arminians are much more biblical than are their systems. Therein must all rejoice. But the Reformed Christian must be true to his Lord. He must love sinners with a deep compassion. But he must not love sinners more than he loves Christ. The more truly he loves sinners the more uncompromisingly will he require of them that they must be saved on God's terms, not their own. It is Christ, through his Word in Scripture, who must diagnose their disease even as it is Christ who heals only those who confess that their disease is what the Great Physician says it is. Pg 71

NOTES

3. Man is a mixture of form (Being) and matter (non-being). Except for his participation in God (Being), a participation which God himself sustains, man would be wholly absorbed into matter or pure Chaos (non-being), which is the polar opposite of God and therefore evil. It is, however, equally ultimate with God. (By "equally ultimate" we mean that neither in any way is dependent on the other for existence.)

4. Since both man and nature are in some sense combinations of the finite (Chaos) and infinite (Rationality), the witness of both man and nature is unclear. Therefore, the existence of God, for Aquinas, is a matter of question and can be answered only in terms of rational and empirical argumentation. Of course, Aquina thought that his arguments for the existence of God were completely valid. Many modern orthodox apologists, however, recognizing the inadequacies of the “theistic proofs,” generally maintain that, when all of the arguments are taken together, God’s existence is seen to be highly probable. However, they still hold to Aquinas’ belief in (1) the lack of clarity in God’s revelation; and (2) the ability of man’s intellect to reason about God correctly prior to, and independently of, the revelation of God.

II. Christ Writes Me a Letter

I have never met Christ in the flesh. No matter, he has written me a letter. Not he, himself. He chose helpers. By his Spirit, the Spirit of truth, these helpers wrote what he wanted me to know. From heaven my Lord then sent his Holy Spirit on Pentecost to dwell in the hearts of all these whom he came into the worlds to redeem. I am, by his grace, one of them. Together we form the church, his people. In us and through us he establishes his kingdom. As a soldier of the cross, strengthened by his power in the inward man, I fight daily against Satan, who seeks at every point to establish is own kingdom in the hearts and to the hurt of men.

In his letter Jesus tells me that all men are made of one bold because all are created by God. As such all men are God’s children; they all bear his image. But the first pair, from whom all later generations of men cam “by ordinary generation,” sinned against God. God set before them the ideal of joy which he would give them if they led their lives in the direction he indicated to them. That direction was to be marked by love and obedience to their Maker and benefactor. But our first parents had a person-to-person confrontation with Satan. Satan told them how free he had become since declaring his independence of God. To be self-determining man must surely be able to decide the “nature of the good” – regardless of what God says about it.

Adam saw Satan’s point. “You are right, Satan, I must first decide whether such a God as often speaks to us (1) knows what the ‘good’ for us is, (2) controls history so that he can determine what will happen if we disobey him, and (3) has the right to demand obedience from us. After I decide these issues, and if the answer is ‘yes,’ then I shall obey him. Certainly not before.”

But by taking to himself the right to decide these issues, Adam had already decided them 0 in the negative. If God is such a one as knows the “good” for us, controls whatsoever comes to pass, and has the right of unquestioned obedience, then man obeys his word because it is his word. Adam, in disobedience, became a “free” man.

But Satan miscalculated. Refusing to believe that God controls the courses of history, Satan began his attempt to take over the whole of mankind to himself. Having succeeded with the first Adam, he tried his trick on the Second Adam. But the Second Adam replied to Satan’s scheme, “Get thee behind me, Satan,” and, “It is written”! The Second Adam both knew and received the Word of God, for he was God, the Word. He lived his life according to what he, in his program, had written down in advance. Even the words, "I thirst," spoken on the cross, were spoken in accord with what was written.

Now what was written consisted chiefly in his promise to his people that he would, in the face of Satan and his hosts, redeem them from their sin. He would be their Great High Priest by giving himself as their substitute. "Cursed is everyone that hangeth on a tree." He would be their Prophet, like unto Moses, proclaiming the final word of deliverance to his people, establishing them in the truth in the face of Satan's effort to make them believe the lie. He would be their King, establishing his elect nation of "holy ones" against the effort of Satan to establish a kingdom based upon the self-righteousness of the Pharisees.

He came, he saw, he conquered: there was a transition from wrath to grace in history. The new age had come, the age of grace and glory. In his letter Jesus tells us of this new age. Much of this letter comes to us through his servant Paul. Much of the early growth of Christ's kingdom came through the work of his servant Paul. How did Paul tell the story of the Christ?

In Romans Paul tells us of the wayward path of mankind. Both Jews and Greeks, being from the beginning of the world confronted with the truth of God, have nevertheless exchanged the truth of God for a lie and worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator. Since they chose not to have God in their knowledge, the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against these men who hold back the revelation of God as if it were some awful, destructive flood. Such a flood it will be for men who refuse to turn back to God through his Son.

As children of Adam, they have always made and continue to make the effort required to cover-up the truth about themselves and God. They see every fact as other than it really is. By means of their literature – drama, poetry, and philosophy – they try to prove to themselves that the world is not the estate of God and that they are not made in this image. Both Jew and Gentile have blinded themselves to the true state of affairs about themselves and their world – about their past, their present and their future. Not being creatures of God, they could not have sinned against such a one. They do not need, therefore, the atoning death of Christ for the remission of their sins. As Stephen said of the Jews, so also it must be said of the Gentiles, that they have always resisted the Holy Spirit – to their own damnation.

In his address on the Areopagus Paul proclaims the name of the resurrected Christ to the Gentile covenant-breakers, would-be-fugitives from divine judgment. Paul does not place himself on their level in order with them to investigate the nature of being and knowledge in general, to discover whether the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob might possibly exist. He tells them straight out that what they claim not to know, he knows. He tells them that their so-called ignorance is culpable, for God is as near to them as their own selves. He tells them, therefore, to repent of their worship of idols, to turn to the living God, lest they stand without the robes of righteousness before the resurrected Lord Christ on the day of judgment.

Paul's preaching to the Greeks was similar to Noah's preaching to the men of his time. When at first Noah claimed that God had given him a world of warning which men reject only to their own peril, they were nevertheless sure what they could dispose of such claims in terms of their own wisdom. There were, they said, no “facts” or “valid reasons” to support Noah’s claim, unless one accepts the “fact” that God spoke to Noah. But there was only Noah’s word for this and who was Noah? But when the last men were drowning, they saw themselves and their wisdom for what they really were, namely, foolishness. It was then too late. Even so at the end of time, in the face of the wrath of the Lamb, men will again see themselves and their wisdom for what it is and will call upon the hills to cover them lest they fall into the hands of an angry God.

Paul knew that the Greeks could not identify themselves truly in terms of their philosophy. “Chaos” and “old Night” [Chance] were their only substitutes for what Paul told them of the origin and destiny of the world. They tried various combinations of ultimate rationality (unity) and ultimate chance (diversity) in terms such as “form” and “matter” to take the place of creation and providence, but to no satisfaction. Even so, Paul could not prove to the Greeks in their sense of the word “prove,” that what they believed was foolishness and what he believed was “good sense,” Paul could not adopt the principles of the “free” first Adam to “prove” the principles of the Second Adam. Paul recognized, as did his Greek audience, that his ideas were, all of them, foolishness to the non-Christian mind. The Greeks would not believe any single one of them, much less all of them in their proper relation to each other, unless by the regeneration of the Holy Spirit they were given eyes with which to see the whole truth of God in Christ. Paul knew that the natural man, like Xantippe who is said to have kept on clipping her fingers even though these fingers were all that was left of the above the water, will keep on saying that Christ is wrong and that Satan is right so long as he has breath except the Spirit in mercy give him light and life.

This, then, is the message of the letter written to me and to the whole Church by Christ himself. Ever since I can remember it was of this letter of Christ which my father read to me and to the family. It was also this letter which I heard in church, spoken by the minister of Christ. Every minister in those days had a VDM degree: Verbum Die Minister. When, therefore, I became a teacher of apologetics it was natural for me to think, not only of my Th.M. and my PhD., but above all of my VDM. The former degrees were but means whereby I might be true to the latter degree.

How else, I thought, can anyone be a follower of the Reformation? Calvin and Luther: they expounded the Scriptures for the edification of the church of Christ. They rescued the Bible as the Word of God for the people of God from the apostate church of Rome. When they insisted on the necessity, authority, sufficiency, and the perspicuity of the Scriptures, they rejected in principle the entire Roman theological structure as it was largely based upon the very Greek thought against which Paul so vigorously preached.

Wanting to follow the Reformers, it was natural that I read and appreciated the works of those who before me likewise attempted to do so. I first used the words of Abraham Kuyper and Herman Bavinck. How basic and how broad was their view! The idea of Scripture, they said, must never be separated from its message.

The Roman Catholics, for example, in separating the two, distort the biblical views of sin and salvation. According to the position of Rome, the transition from sinner to saint is a metaphysical process of elevation on the “scale of being.” This Greek-Christian metaphysics of salvation brings with it a false view of the nature of Scripture. Scripture, on this view, cannot be “sufficient.” The Roman church adds itself as the continuing organ of revelation to written revelation, therewith achieving the sufficiency which Scripture, of itself, lacks. As Bavinck truly said, the nature of the message of salvation and the nature of Scripture are always involved in one another.

Just so, from the Reformed point of view, all so-called “evangelical” non-Reformed theologies “all those which, although non-Reformed, hold to what J.I. Packer calls the “evangelical equation” of Scripture with the Word of God, such as orthodox Lutheranism, traditional Arminian-Wesleyanism, and synergistic fundamentalism), which have an inadequate view of sovereign grace, have also an inadequate view of Scripture. A God who cannot control history because of countless men with wills not fully dependent of his own can only make salvation a bare “possibility.” Christ might have died in vain. Being “free,” all men might refuse to exercise their supposedly “God-given freedom” to “draw their check for ‘eternal life’ put in the Band of Heaven for all men.” God’s plan, to call out a people for himself, might never have been realized. Needless to say, every major teaching of Scripture excludes such a “scheme.” God is God. Christ finished the work of salvation for his own. Only those “in Christ” from the foundation of the world died with Christ on the cross. Christ saved his sheep; he did not just make their salvation “possible.” The emphasis, therefore, on human autonomy in non-Reformed evangelical theology not only play havoc with the scriptural message of salvation by grace alone, but distorts the doctrine of Scripture itself by finding the ultimate exegetical tool in the subjective experience of human freedom and by denying to Scripture and the Holy Spirit the power, authority and necessity of invading the souls of men. The Holy Spirit and the Word of God do not change men, men first must agree to be changed! [the Arminian view] For this reason no non-Reformed theology can properly be called a “theology of the Holy Spirit.” A theology which loses the right to be called a “theology of the Holy Spirit loses also the right to be called “a theology of the Word of God.” It is no wonder, therefore, that G.C. Berkouwer speaks of the “isolation of the Reformed view of Scripture.”

This point receives even stronger confirmation in the case of existential theology.

If non-Reformed evangelical theologies [e.g., Arminian] tend toward subjectivism, modern non-evangelical theology stands on it flat-footed. Take the theology of Karl Barth, for example. The free grace of God, Barth maintained, could not be communicated through a stabilized, objectivized revelation. Orthodox theology, he argues, has reduce the living, active revelation of God that of a lifeless form. When Barth spoke agreeable, therefore, of verbal inspiration he “actualized” it and therewith fitted it ‘into his system.” In bringing down the Bible to the dimension of “causal relations,” orthodoxy brings down the entire religious relation between God and man to the level of impersonal concepts and ideas. Orthodoxy is the theology of the “blessed possessors,” the theology of those who control the freedom of God. The God of orthodoxy, indeed the God of Calvinism, is not sovereign! The God of Calvin is not the God of sovereign, universal grace.

We may say, therefore, that the Barthian soteriology of “sovereign, free grace” which comes to us only in our subjectivity entails a radically new view of Scripture itself. The Bible may now be called the Word of God only in so far as it brings this message of subjectivity to us. To say, “the Bible is the Word of God,” for Barth, does not imply a directly discernible revelation of God in history as we know it.

From these example of Roman Catholic, Arminian-Wesleyan-Lutheran, and finally modern theology, it is clear (1) that the idea of Scripture can never be separated from the message of Scripture, and (2) that none of these non-Reformed evangelical and modern theologies have a view of Scripture such that the Lord Christ speaks to man with an absolute authority. The self-attesting Christ of Scripture is not absolutely central to these theologies. Just so, he will not be central in any apologetic form to defend them.

III. Toward a Christ-Centered Apologetic

Deciding, therefore, to follow the Reformers in theology, it was natural that I attempt also to do so in apologetics. I turned to such Reformed apologists as Warfield, Greene, and others. What did I find? I found the theologians of the “self-attesting Christ,” defending their faith with a method which denied precisely that point! That this was that this was the case may be shown by a brief survey of what I call the “traditional” method of Christian apologetics.

The traditional method, offered first in detail by Thomas Aquinas in its Catholic form and my Joseph Butler in its Protestant form (but being in principle that offered by the very earliest of apologists), is based upon the assumption that man has some measure of autonomy, that the space-time world is in some measure “contingent” [by chance] and that man must create for himself his own epistemology in an ultimate sense. [e.g., existentialism! Man creates his own meaning in life completely independent of any outside influence, including God’s.]

The traditional method was concessive on these basic points on which it should have demanded surrender! As such, it was always self-frustrating. The traditional method had explicitly built into it the right and ability of the natural man, apart from the work of the Spirit of God, to be the judge of the claim of the authoritative Word of God. It is man who, by means of his self-established intellectual tools. Puts is “stamp of approval” on the Word of God and then, only after that grand act, does he listen to it. God’s Word must first pass man’s tests of good and evil, truth and falsity. But once you tell a non-Christian this, why should he be worried by anything else that you say? You have already told him he is quite alright just the way he is! Then the Scripture is not correct when it talks of “darkened minds,” “willful ignorance,” “dead men,” and “blind people”! With this method the correctness of the natural man’s problematics is endorsed. That is all he needs to reject the Christian faith.

Seeing therefore, the failure of even Reformed theologians and apologists in their efforts to defend consistently the self-attesting Christ of Scripture, it became clear to me that new groundwork needed to be done. I did not, however, undertake this task de novo. I learned much from other men, just as I did in theology from Kuyper and Bavinck. Since I conceived of Christian apologetics as focusing on the self-attesting Christ of Scripture, it was natural that I should learn most of the development and defense of the doctrine of the person of Christ in the historical, theological development of the church. There are three eras in history in which Christian apologetics was help forward in the right direction.

The Council of Nicea. _ Herer, in A.D. 325, the church concluded that the only adequate expression of the teaching of Christ concerning himself and of the apostles concerning God, was in a formulation cush that all three persons of the Trinity were equally ultimate. The church rejected the subordination of the Son to the Father in any “ontological” sense. Herman Bavinck points out that herewith was rejected any attempt to unite God with man in terms of some change wherein God ceased to be himself as God.

The Chalcedon Creed. – This formulation of the church deals particularly with the difficult question of the relation of the divine to the human “natures” of Christ. Adopted in A.D. 451, it says that the divine and human “natures” of Christ are related unconfusedly, unchangeably, indivisibly, and inseparably. The first two adjective were directed against the Eutychians, the sconed tow against the Nestorians. Pg 84

Pg 86-90 (duplicate on: Van Til - A Lesson in Apologetics - Mr. White, Grey, Black - DCM 36-81.docx)

I have said that the development of the church’s doctrine of Christ took place in three basic steps and that these three steps were necessary prerequisites for a truly biblical apologetics. L Further I observed that Tertullian was a man ahead of his time, both in Christology and in apologetic method. The third step, the Reformed creeds, was basically an expression of the theology of John Calvin. We shall understand the third step more fully, therefore, if we look in detail at the Christology of Calvin. In doing so we shall also see a development and application of the method of Tertullian and therewith the beginnings of a Christ-centered apologetics.

For Calvin speculation about God, independently of Scripture, is excluded. Natural theology, therefore, is also excluded. Natural theology starts with man as autonomous and with the world as “given.” Natural theologians assume that “reason” and “logic” and “fact” are “religiously neutral.” They are but “tools” by which man may and must determine what is and what is not possible.

Now if there is anything which is basic to the ideas of the Reformation it is that which Calvin expresses at the very outset of his Institutes: man is what God in Christ through Scripture says he is. This is God triune. “The tripersonality of God is conceived by Calvin, ...not as something added to the complete idea of God, or as something into which God develops in the process of his existence, but as something which enters into the very idea of God, without which he cannot be conceived in the truth of his being.” For Calvin the doctrine of the Trinity was involved in his experience of salvation “in the Christian’s certainty that the Redeeming Christ and Sanctifying Spirit are each Devine persons.” “The main thing was, he insisted, that men should heartily believe that there is but one God, whom only they should serve; but also that Jesus Christ our Redeemer and the Holy Spirit the Sanctifier is each no less this one God than God the Father to whom we owe our being; while yet these three ar distinct personal objects of our live and adoration.” It was because of this deep religious interest in making the triune God of Scripture the stating point of all his theology that Calvin found it necessary to exclude every last vestige of subordinationism which might even be said to be sanctioned by the language of Nicea. He therefore used the word $\alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{o}\theta\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$ with respect to the Son of God.

The significance of this for Christian apologetics should be clear at one. “All those who were for any reason or in any degree unable or unwilling to allow Christ a deity in every respect equal to that of the Father were necessarily offended by the vindication to him of the ultimate divine quality of self-existence.” Calvin explicated the person of Christ solely in scriptural terms, i.e., his method is exegetical rather than speculative. As such his method is simple: who Christ is, depends on Christ's self-identification. If Christ is who he says he is, then all speculation is excluded, for God can swear only by himself. To find out what man is and who God is, one can only go to Scripture. Faith in the self-attesting Christ of the Scriptures is the beginning, not the conclusion, of wisdom! It was, therefore, not until the fully developed trinitarian theology of Calvin, which says that Christ is authoritative because αὐτόθεος, that there was therewith developed a truly Christian methodology of theology and of apologetics. The method by which a Christian develops the content of his faith must not be denied by the method he uses to defend that content. Calvin, seeing this, denied all speculation and natural theology as "avenues" to faith. Rather, faith and understanding are pure gifts of free grace. pg 87

The apologetic method thus far outlined will be made clearer if we consider as objection, indeed the "stock" objection, to such an approach as Calvin's. It comes from Stuart Cornelius Hackett in his The Resurrection of Theism We must, says Hackett, have "a rational justification for the metaphysical ultimate" which we believe in. Calvinism denies this. The Calvinists say that God has "created rational men as mere puppets of his sovereignty. But if it seems to be the case that man is under obligation to believe the gospel and that he must accept Christ as Savior before the Spirit of God regenerates the heart – if, I say, man is a moral and rational agent confronted with a revelation or the acceptance of which he is morally and rationally responsible – then let the presuppositionalist framework be consigned to the irrationalism that is written so plainly through its structure... With here opponents thus languishing in defeat, reason pushes on to consider experience itself to determine whether God is real.

With these words Hackett sums up the issue between himself as an Arminian and myself as a Calvinist very well. It goes without saying that we two have radically different beliefs as to what the Bible says about man and his sinfulness and about the Holy Spirit and his sovereignty. Indeed, the issues between us are total. There are not "fundamentals" in common between us: we will necessarily understand creation-providence, the fall of man, the atonement of Christ, his sinlessness and his resurrection, his second coming and his ultimate triumph, the doctrine of Scripture, the nature of saving faith – we will necessarily understand, I say, these doctrines in different ways. Hackett's Christian faith and my Christian faith, which we both desire non-Christians to accept, are radically different. They are different not only in their content but also in the very method of their construction.

I make two broad points in reference to this. First, any non-Christian epistemology, i.e., any theory of knowledge based upon principle acceptable per se to the "mind of the flesh," (and therefore those of Hackett's own method) is doomed to failure; not only failure as an avenue to Christian faith, but as an avenue to any form of knowledge whatsoever. This I think can be, and has been repeatedly, shown by myself and many others. Second, Hackett's basic charge that Calvinism is determinist and irrational is simply not true. First, as to the charge that it is determinist and that men are but "puppets," not need only read Calvin himself to be persuaded that such an understanding of Calvinism is false. The Calvinist notion of divine sovereignty has nothing to do with the philosopher's notion of physical, causal determinism. I have developed at length in other places the covenantal, exhaustively personalist view of providence which is clearly part of Calvin's thought.

As to the charge that the Calvinist position is “irrational,” I assume that Hackett cannot mean that it is inconsistent. After all, one of the so-called “sins” of Calvin was that he was too deductive, too logical, in drawing implications from this and that in Scripture, that in “logicizing” theology he destroyed its heart. I assume that what Hackett means is that on the Calvinist position man is called upon to repent of his sins and accept Christ without having reasons for doing so. The Calvinist cannot give reason because he has no point of contact [no common ground] with the non-Christian. There are, for the Calvinist, no reasons to which he might appeal in an effort to get his friend to accept Christ.

In response to this I observe that this also is not the case. Hackett assumes that unless one finds a point of contact with the natural man by way of agreeing with him on his false views of man and the world then one has no point of contact with him at all. Against this position, I maintain, with Calvin following Paul, that my point of contact lies in the actual state of affairs between men as the Bible tells us of it. It is Hackett who has no real point of contact, for he lies in what men imagine (and, to be sure, “agree”) to be the case. The Calvinist’s point of contact is rooted in the actual state of affairs [i.e., man is what God says he is not what unregenerate man thinks he is.]. All things are what they are because of their relation to the world of the triune God as rooted in Scripture. Hackett’s “point of contact” as an evangelical Arminian is an essentially Kantian epistemology, an epistemology in terms of which men stand utterly unrelated to one another and are, at the same time, reduced to relations of one another.

To look for a point of contact with the unbeliever in the unbeliever’s notions of himself and his world is to encourage him in his wicked rebellion and to establish him in his self-frustration. We have already seen that the natural man is under the self-imposed delusion that he is “free,” i.e., independent of the control and counsel of God, and that the “facts” about him are also “free” in this way. He may pretend to be “open-minded” and ready to consider whether God exists. But in being so “neutral” he commits the same sin as Adam and Eve.

Why seek truth where only a lie is to be found? Can the non-Christian tell us and therefore the Christ himself, what the facts are and how they are related to each other, in what way they cohere, while yet excluding creation and providence. If he can, and if he can tell us truly, then the Christian story simple is not true! Because the natural man cannot do this, because the Christian message is true, I have sought and will seek to reap the benefit of a theology in which the true God of Scripture has the initiative in salvation.

The Calvinist’s idea of an actual as opposed to an imagined point of contact is not just some useless notion. It is the only intelligible point of contact possible. The non-Christian holds that pure chance or absolute fate are equally ultimate [not dependent upon the Creator] and mutually correlative limiting concepts or heuristic principles which man uses to explain the fact that we have learned much about the world, that there is order in the world, a uniformity, while there is also continual change and development. But the non-Christian’s “explanation” is no explanation at all. To say, “it just happens” as an explanation of an event is really to say, “There is no explanation that I know of.”

The Calvinist, therefore, using his point of contact, observes to the non-Christian that if the world were not what Scripture says it is, if the natural man’s knowledge were not actually rooted in the creation and providence of God, then there could be no knowledge whatsoever. The Christian claims that non-Christians have made and now make many discoveries about the true state of affairs of the universe simply because the universe is what Christ says it is. The unbelieving scientist borrows or steals the Christian principles of creation and providence every time he says that an “explanation” is possible, for he knows he cannot account for “explanation” on his own. As the image-bearer of God, operating in a universe controlled by God, the unbeliever contributes indirectly and adventitiously to the development of human knowledge and culture.

When Hackett maintains that the Calvinist position is irrational because it cannot give “reasons” for believing, he must mean that on a position such as mine the Christian does not accept the non-Christian scheme wherein the non-Christian determines what are “good reasons” and “valid proofs.” This is perfectly true, but this is not irrational. Rather the Christian offers the self-attesting Christ to the world as the only foundation upon which a man must stand in order to give any “reasons” for anything at all. The whole notion of “giving reasons” is completely destroyed by any ontology other than the Christian one. The Christian claims that only after accepting the biblical scheme of things will any man be able to understand and account for his rationality. Pg 90

IV. The Total Picture

A. My problems with the “traditional method.”

1. This method compromises God himself by maintaining that his existence is only “possible” albeit “highly probable,” rather than ontologically and “rationally” necessary.
2. It compromises the counsel of God by not understanding it as the only all-conclusive, ultimate “cause” of whatsoever comes to pass.
3. It compromises the revelation of God by:
 - a. Compromising its necessity. It does so by not recognizing that even in Paradise man had to interpret the general (natural) revelation of God in terms of the covenantal obligations place upon him by God through special revelation. Natural revelation, on the traditional view, can be understood “on its own.”
 - b. Compromising its clarity. Both the general and special revelation of God are said to be unclear to the point that man may say only that God’s existence is “probable.”
 - c. Compromising its sufficiency. It does this by allowing for an ultimate realm of “chance” out of which might come “facts” such as are wholly new for God and for man. Such “facts” would be uninterpreted and unexplainable in terms of the general or special revelation of God.
 - d. Compromising its authority. On the traditional position the Word of God’s self-attesting characteristic, and therewith its authority, is secondary to the authority of reason and experience. The Scriptures do not identify themselves, man identifies them and recognizes their “authority” only in terms of his own authority.
4. It compromises man’s creation as the image of God by thinking of man’s creation and knowledge as independent of the Being and knowledge of God. On the traditional approach man need not “think God’s thoughts after him.”

5. It compromises man's covenantal relationship with God by not understanding Adam's representative action as absolutely determinative of the future.

6. It compromises the sinfulness of mankind resulting from the sin of Adam by not understanding man's ethical depravity as extending to the whole of his life, even to his thoughts and attitudes.

7. It compromises the grace of God by not understanding it as the necessary prerequisite for "renewal unto knowledge." On the traditional view man can and must renew himself unto knowledge by the "right use of reason."

B. My understanding of the relationship between Christian and non-Christian, philosophically speaking.

1. Both have presuppositions about the nature of reality:

a. The Christian presupposes the triune God and his redemptive plan for the universe as set forth once for all in Scripture.

b. The non-Christian presupposes a dialectic between "chance" and "regularity," the former accounting for the origin of matter and life, the latter accounting for the current success of the scientific enterprise.

2. Neither can, as finite beings, by means of logic as such, say what reality must be or cannot be.

a. The Christian, therefore, attempts to understand his world through the observation and logical ordering of facts in self-conscious subjection to the plan of the self-attesting Christ of Scripture.

b. The non-Christian, while attempting an enterprise similar to the Christian's, attempts nevertheless to us "logic to destroy the Christian position. [he borrows principles from God to destroy God!] On the one hand, appealing to the non-rationality of "matter," he says that the chance-character of "facts" is conclusive evidence against the Christian position. Then, on the other hand, he maintains like Parmenides that the Christian story cannot possibly be true. Man must be autonomous, "logic" must be legislative as to the field of "possibility" and possibility must be above God.

3. Both claim that their position is "in accordance with the facts."

a. The Christian claims this because he interprets the facts and his experience in the light of the revelation of the self-attesting Christ in Scripture. Both the uniformity and the diversity of facts have at their foundation the all-embracing plan of God.

b. The non-Christian claims this because he interprets the facts and his experience in the light of the autonomy of human personality, the ultimate "givenness" of the world and the amenability of matter to mind. There can be no fact that denies man's autonomy or attest to the world's and man's divine origin.

4. Both claim that their position is "rational."

a. The Christian does so by claiming not only that his position is self-consistent but that he can explain both the seemingly "inexplicable" amenability of fact to logic and the necessity and usefulness of rationality itself in terms of Scripture.

b. The non-Christian may or may not make this same claim. If he does, the Christian maintains that he cannot make it good. If the non-Christian attempts to account for the amenability of facts to logic in terms of the ultimate rationality of the cosmos, then he will be crippled when it comes to explaining the "evolution" of men and things. If he attempts to do so in terms of pure "chance" and ultimate "irrationality" as being the well out of which both rational man and a rationally amenable world sprang, then we shall point out that such an explanation is in fact not explanation at all and that it destroys predication.

C. My proposal, therefore, for a consistently Christian methodology of apologetics is this:

1. That we use the same principle in apologetics that we use in theology: the self-attesting self-explanatory Christ of Scripture.
2. That we no longer make an appeal to “common notions” which Christians and non-Christians agree on, but to the “common ground” which they actually have because man and his world are what Scripture says they are.
3. That we appeal to man as man, God’s image. We do so only if we set the non-Christian principle of the rational autonomy of man against the Christian principle of the dependence of man’s knowledge on God’s knowledge as revealed in the person and by the Spirit of Christ.
4. That we claim, therefore, that Christianity alone is reasonable for men to hold. It is wholly irrational to hold any other position than that of Christianity. Christianity alone does not slay reason on the altar of “chance.”
5. That we argue, therefore, by “presupposition,” The Christian, as did Tertullian, must contest the very principle of his opponent’s position. The only “proof” of the Christian position is that unless its truth is presupposed there is no possibility of “proving” anything at all. The actual state of affairs as preached by Christianity is the necessary foundation of “proof” itself.
6. That we preach with the understanding that the acceptance of the Christ of Scripture by sinners who, being alienated from God, seek to flee his face, comes about when the Holy Spirit, in the presence of inescapably clear evidence, opens their eyes so that they see things as they truly are. [That is what saving faith does.]
7. That we present the message and evidence for the Christian position as clearly as possible, knowing that because man is what the Christian says he is, the non-Christian will be able to understand in an intellectual sense the issues involved. In so doing, we shall, to a large extent, be telling him what he “already knows” but seeks to suppress. This “reminding” process provides a fertile ground for the Holy Spirit, who in sovereign grace may grant the non-Christian repentance so that he may know him who is life eternal.

I hope that by this, “My Credo,” I have been able in a small way sincerely to thank all those who took the time to write for this birthday-book. – C.V.T.

Regarding the Roman Catholic doctrine man’s assumed autonomy.

CA pg 179

In the second place we may discover the nature of the compromise if we go back to the Roman Catholic conception of the nature of man, and especially of man's freedom in relation to God. According to Roman Catholic theology man has a measure of autonomy over against the plan of God. God has to await man's decisions on many points. Thus, God does not really control whatsoever comes to pass.

Describe the expert idea here:

Insert 162-172 re expert

Authority and Reason (excerpt from pgs 161-172)

The general principles of methodology that have been discussed in the preceding chapter must now be applied to the problem of authority. Here, if anywhere, the difference between the Protestant and the Roman Catholic methodology becomes clearly apparent. For Rome the authority of the church, in particular that of the pope, speaking ex cathedra (from the bishop's Seat, thus, infallibly) is ultimate; for Protestantism the Scripture stands above every statement of the church and its teachers.

The question that now confronts us is as to how the Roman Catholic and how the Protestant approach the non-believer on the question of authority. To answer this question, it is well that we begin by asking what place the non-believer himself attributes to authority. And in order to discover the place allowed to authority by the natural man, it is imperative to note what he means by authority.

There are those, of course, who deny that they need any form of authority. They are the popular atheists and agnostics. Such men say that they must be shown by "reason" what ever they are to accept as true. But the great thinkers among non-Christian men have taken no such position. They know that they cannot cover the whole area of reality with their knowledge. They are therefore willing to admit that there may be others who have information that they themselves do not possess. In everyday life this sort of thing is illustrated in the idea of the expert. A medical doctor knows much about the human body that the rest of us do not know. Then among medical men there are those who, because of natural ability, industry, and opportunity, make such discoveries as their fellows so not make, So everywhere and in all respects the lesser minds are bound to submit to the authority of greater minds. [that's the key idea here regarding the expert.]

In putting the matter in this way, the nature of the authority that can be allowed by the natural man is already indicated. The natural man will gladly allow for the idea of authority if only it is the authority of the expert in the use of reason.* Such a conception of authority is quite consistent with the assumption of the sinner's autonomy.

On the other hand, the conception of authority as something that stand "above reason" is unacceptable to the natural man. But it is not easy to distinguish in every instance when authority is considered to be "above reason." There are some forms of authority that might seem, at first sight, to be "above reason" while in reality they are not. Some discussion of this matter must therefore precede our analysis of the difference between the Roman Catholic and the Protestant methods of presenting the authority of Christianity to the natural man.¹

Side notes on rationalism by Dr. Greg Bahnsen from his lecture on Worldview Issues part 2 (part 14) <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=HRhLqQARUfM> Min. mark 42. Bahnsen was a student of Van Til Rationalism sometimes is used for that attitude of autonomy that says I don't need supernatural revelation. In essence, rationalism is secularism: we don't need revelation.

Sometimes rationalism is that school of thought totally apart from the question of whether we need revelation that says that man's reason should dominate in his personality. That we should be rational in what we are doing. That we're subject to the laws of rationality. That we shouldn't despise intellect and submit to emotion or pure will.

Now just in those first two definitions, you see the difference in that the Christian is not a rationalist if you mean somebody who rejects revelation. A Christian is a rationalist if you mean somebody who believes the intellect is subject to the laws of logic and so forth. That we should use our intellect in a proper way. But then as a specific school of philosophy in the history of western thought, rationalism is the view that it's possible to know certain things apart from observation. A good example is the laws of mathematics. There are certain things that we know that we did not learn from observation. And that third sense of the world rationalism is what I'm referring to here in my little outline. The idealist approach: it says there are ideas, and they are the fundamental reality in all of our thinking and is to be governed by the law of ideas or rationality, is a form of rationalism.

Forms of Authority

Let us note then some of the forms of authority that are quite acceptable to the natural man because, to his mind, they do not violate the principle of autonomy.

First there is the need for authority that grows out of the existence of the endless multiplicity of factual materia. Time rolls its ceaseless course. It pours upon us an endless stream of facts. And the stream is really endless on the non-Christian basis. For those who do not believe that all that happens in time happens because of the plan of God, the activity of time is like to that, or rather is identical with that, of chance. Thus, the ocean of facts has no bottom and no shore. It is this conception of the ultimacy of time and of pure factuality on which modern philosophy, particularly since the days of Kant, has laid such great stress. And it is because of the general recognition of the ultimacy of chance that rationalism of the sort of Descartes, Spinoza and Leibniz represented, is out of date. It has become customary to speak of post-Kantian philosophy as irrationalistic.

It has been said that Kant limited reason so as to make room for faith. Hence there are those who are willing to grant that man's emotions or his will can get in touch with such aspects of reality as are not accessible to the intellect. The intellect, it is said, is not the only, and in religious matters, not even the primary, instrument with which men come into contact with what is ultimate in human experience. There is the world of the moral imperative, of aesthetic appreciation, of the religious a priori (prior: self-evident assumption, deductive beginning point) as well as the world of science. There is in short, the world of “mystery” into which the prophet or genius of feeling or of will may lead us.

It is of the greatest import to note that the natural man need not in the least object to the kind of authority that is involved in the idea of irrationalism. And that chiefly for two reasons. In the first place the irrationalism of our day is the direct lineal descendent of the rationalism of previous days. The idea of pure chance has been inherent in every form of non-Christian thought in the past. It is the only logical alternative to the position of Christianity, according to which the plan of God is back of all. Both Plato and Aristotle were compelled to make room for it in their maturest thought. The pure “not-being” of the earliest rationalism of Greece was but the suppressed “otherness” of the final philosophy of Plato. So too the idea of pure factuality or pure chance as ultimate is but the idea of “otherness” made explicit. Given the non-Christian assumption with respect to man’s autonomy, the idea of chance has equal rights with the idea of logic. If Parmenides was first upon the scene to press the claims of the intellect by saying that to be and to know ought for man to be conterminous, it was natural that chance would not fail at some time in the future to assert its independence.²

²Reason was ultimate for Parmenides. As we say, this means experience was potentially illusory, because irrational. Thinking and being are the same for him. Thus, according to Van Til, the irrational would want eventually to claim its rights. It did so first with Heraclitus (d. 480 B.C.) and his doctrine of “flux.”

In the second place modern irrationalism has not in the least encroached upon the domain of the intellect as natural man things of it. Irrationalism has merely taken possession of that which the intellect, by its own admission, cannot in any case control. Irrationalism has a secret treaty with rationalism by which the former cedes to the latter so much of its territory as the latter can at any given time fine forces to control. Kants’ realm of the noumenal has, as it were, agreed to yield so much of its area to the phenomenal as the intellect by its newest weapons can manage to keep in control.

Side note: The phenomenal world is the world we are aware of; this is the world we construct out of the sensations that are present to our consciousness. The noumenal world consists of things we seem compelled to believe in, but which we can never know (because we lack sense-evidence of it). (Google)

In philosophy, a noumenon is knowledge posited as an object that exists independently of human sense. The term noumenon is generally used in contrast with, or in relation to, the term phenomenon, which refers to any object of the senses. Wikipedia

Moreover, by the same treaty irrationalism has promised to keep out of its own territory any form of authority that might be objectionable to the autonomous intellect. Ther very idea of pure factuality or chance is the best guarantee that no true authority, such as that of God as the Creator and Judge of men, will ever confront man.

If we compared the realm of the phenomenal as it has been ordered by the autonomous intellect to a clearing in a large forest, we may compare the realm of the noumenal to that part of the same forest which has not yet been laid under contribution by the intellect.³ The realm of mystery is on the basis simply the realm of that which is not yet known. And the service of irrationalism to rationalism may be compared to that of some bold huntsman in the woods who keeps all lions and tigers away from the clearing. This bold huntsman covers the whole of the infinitely extended forest, ever keeping away all danger from the clearing. This irrationalistic Robin Hood is so much of a rationalist that he virtually makes a universal negative statement about what can happen in all future time. In the secret treaty spoken of he has assured the intellect of the autonomous man that the God of Christianity cannot possibly exist and that no man therefore need to fear the coming judgment. If the whole course of history is, at least in part, controlled by chance, then there is no danger that the autonomous man will ver meet with the claims of authority ads the Protestant believes in it. For the notion of authority is but the expression of the idea that God by his counsel controls all things that happen in the course of history.

³Van Til is using the forest, some of it cleared and some of it virgin, as parallel to what is rationally accessible (the phenomenal) and what is mystery (the noumenal). His point is that this dualism, which has many guises, keeps God and his judgment out of the bargain as a matter of prior assumption. [a wicked presumption!]

There is a second kind of authority that the natural man is quite ready to accept. It does not spring, as did the first, from the fact that the intellect can by definition not control the whole realm of chance. It springs from the fact that even that which the intellect does assert about the objects of knowledge is, of necessity, involved in contradiction. F. H. Bradley's great book, Appearance and Reality, has brought out this point with the greatest possible detail. The point is not that the many philosophers who have speculated on the nature of reality have actually contradicted each other and themselves. The point is rather that in the nature of the case all logical assertion with respect to the world of temporal existence must needs be self-contradictory in character.⁴

⁴This is the point about unbelief being dualistic of necessity.

On the assumptions of the natural man, logic is a timeless impersonal principle, as factuality is controlled by chance. It is by means of universal timeless principles of logic that the natural man must, on his assumptions, seek to make intelligible assertions about the world of reality or chance. But this cannot be done without the world of reality or chance. About chance, no manner of assertion can be made. In its very idea it is the irrational. And how are rational assertions to be made about the irrational? If they are to be made, then it must be because the irrational is itself wholly reduced to the rational. That is to say, if the natural man is to make any intelligible assertions about the world of 'reality' or 'fact,' which according to him is what it is for no rational reason at all, then he must make the virtual claim of rationalizing the irrational.

To be able to distinguish one fact from another fact he must reduce all time existence, all factuality, to immovable timeless being. But when he has don so, he has killed all individuality and factuality as conceived of on his basis. Thus the natural man must on the one hand assert that all reality is non-structural in nature. He must even assert on the one hand that all reality is non-structurable in nature and on the other hand that he himself has virtually structured all of it. Thus all this predication is in the nature of the case self-contradictory.

Realizing this dilemma, many modern philosophers have argued that any intellectual system of interpretation is therefore no more than a perspective. No system, these men asset, should pretend to be more than a system “for us.” We have to deal with reality as if it will always behave as we have found it behaving in the past. The world of appearance formed by means of the exercise of the intellect must be taken as “somehow” similar to the world of reality. And thus we seem to have come again upon the idea of mystery, the world of ‘faith” and of “authority” where prophets and seers may suggest to us the visions they have seen in the night.

Modern Philosophy

To be sure, this tradition may, to some extent at least, be itself reduced to writing. Yet there is no body of writings that the church officially accepts as containing the written statement of what it accepts as tradition. It is the living voice of the church speaking in its official ministers, and especially through the pope, that is the final guardian of this tradition. Tradition is therefore finally that which the church propounds from time to time.

The bearing of this conception of tradition on the questions of authority and its relation to reason must now be drawn. The hierarchy of the church in general, and of the pope in particular, is not to be thought of as itself subject to the final and comprehensive revelation of God. There is no place anywhere in the whole being should be wholly subject to God. On the contrary, the position of Rome requires the rejection of the council of God as all-determinative. Hence the pope himself, as he makes up his mind with respect to the infallible pronouncement that his office requires or permits him to make from time to time, must seek as an expert to interpret the meaning of brute fact, of being in general. [Brute facts are uninterpreted facts that one may use to support their suppositions - Bahnsen] What the Bible teaches him he will be required to relate to what his autonomous reason teaches him with respect to being in general. The result is that the voice of God as the controller and governor of man and the universe can never speak through the voice of the pope. Those who listen to the voice of the pope are listening to the voice of an expert who is supposed, for some wholly non-rational reason, to be able to peer more deeply into the realm of “being” than other men are able to.

How can we begin with human reason and still respect authority? Unbelief accepts a sort of limited authority, that of the expert. But it cannot accept the final, unlimited authority of the biblical God. (Footnote 22 pg 179).

Theistic proofs: pg 178 (Kant)

Kant criticized the theistic proofs because he could not see how beginning with autonomous reason would lead to anything else but a “god” who is in the image of the human being, rather than the true God of revealed from heaven. (Footnote 19 pg 178)

Aquinas/Aristotle

For these Roman Catholic thinkers, the problem is how to arrive at certain truths about God by reason, and thus justify Aristotle, and Thomas Aquinas’ use of Aristotle, without denying the role of faith in revelation. Gilson distinguishes between essences and existence, the form being accessible through reason, the latter through faith. Van Til will oppose this whole scheme because it makes reason autonomous. (Footnote 17, pg 176)

Here is a good explanation of brute facts by Dr. Alan Strange who was a friend Dr. Greg Bahnsen:

A quote from a sermon by Alan Strange

The Continued Need for and Usefulness of Bahnsen's Apologetic

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-mH7zuxhbSU>

Min 25:22: So back to the point of Greg's [Bahnsen] clear apologetic exposition: for unbelievers, some combination of empiricism/rationalism, supposedly explains how we know what we know. Sadly, also, for those who are evidentialist or classicists apologetically; they're falling into the existent..., the empiricism or the rationalism trap.

Unbelievers reject that we know what we know by revelation. We understand that. In fact, though, according to 1Cor. 2:14, the natural person does not accept the things of the Spirit of God. Now Greg, when you would say that, when Greg would say that, he pressed this point a lot: "natural man does not accept the things of the spirit of God" – and Greg was used to this objection coming even from Christians, from evidentialists and classicists, "But Dr. Bahnsen, this refers only to spiritual things and not natural things; they can't know spiritual things; they can know natural things." But there are no brute facts, which means there are no merely natural things, unconnected to the supernatural. Nothing in this world is autonomous from God. All of autonomy and neutrality is pretended!! It's pretended; it's not real. Every created fact witnesses to its creator. This is God's world; and all "natural things" (Psalm 19, Romans 1 - externally, Romans 2 – internally, witness in conscience) points to the supernatural and finds their true meaning as being part of the world made by God (and for God, my insert). Taken by themselves, they just don't make any sense because you're back to the empiricism/rationalism trap. Again, notice that the Spirit then, verse 10, [1Cor. 2:10] searches everything, panta, πάντα. I'll use a little Greek there, since Roger didn't. Everything in the world relates to its maker. We only know what we know (and here we differ from the unbeliever in our conscious and joyful confession as such (and sadly some Christians who aren't up to snuff on this), we know what we know only because God has revealed it to us. Believers believe the ultimate source of knowledge is neither our senses! - notice what I'm saying! Ultimate! - neither our senses nor our mind, but external to us! – a revelation of the God who is there. (quoting Francis Schaffer there at the end, his book, The God Who Is There)

Block-House Methodology¹²

¹²The term refers to a type of apologetics Van Til rejects: building an argument one step at a time, block upon block. For example, defending theism in general, and then the Trinitarian God later, is blockhouse methodology. Instead, the Christian worldview should be argued as a whole, with each part systematically joined to the others.

A final point must be made before concluding this chapter. We have seen that the proper method for Protestant apologetics is that of presupposition instead of the direct approach. But the theology of Rome and the theology of Arminianism do not permit such an argument. Roman Catholic and Arminians must of necessity argue by way of direct approach. As deformations of Christian theism, they contain no challenge to the position of the natural man till it is too late. [Theism is the belief that there is one God, creator of the universe and its sustainer who is sovereign over all that comes to pass; a subject that has to do with the God of Scripture, not a god of man's imaginations.]

We have also seen that the method of presupposition requires the presentation of Christian theism as a unit. But the theology of Roman Catholics compels them to deal with theism first and with Christianity afterwards. Assigning to reason the task of interpreting nature without dependence upon Scripture, this theology is bound to prove the truths of theism first. The theism that is proved in this way cannot be the only theism that any Christian should want to prove, namely, Christian theism. Yet having proved some sort of theism by "reason," the Roman Catholic is bound by virtue of his theology to prove a type of Christianity that will fit onto the deformation of theism it has "established." And what holds true of Roman Catholicism holds true fundamentally also of Arminianism.

It remains now to indicate more fully than has been done that the Roman Catholic and Arminian method of reasoning is bound, not merely to cut the unity of Christian theism in two, but even to prove its theism piece by piece. Romanism and Arminianism lead not merely to dualism but to atomism in methodology.

A truly Protestant method of reasoning involves a stress upon the fact that the meaning of every aspect or part of Christian theism depends upon Christian theism as a unit. When Protestants speak of the resurrection of Christ, they speak of the resurrection of him who is the Son of God, the eternal Word through whom the world was made. The truth of theism is involved in this claim that Christians make with respect to the domain of history. And what is true of the resurrection of Christ is true with respect to all the propositions about historical fact is presented for what it really is till it is presented as a part of the system of Christian theism that is contained in Scripture. To say this is involved in the consideration that all facts of the created universe are what they are by virtue of the plan of God with respect to them. Any fact in any realm confronted by man is what it is as revelational through and through of the God and of the Christ of Christian theism.

But if this is true – and it would seem to be of the very essence of the biblical point of view to say that it is true – then it follows that the whole claim of Christian theism is in question in any debate about any fact. Christian theism must be presented as that light in terms of which any proposition about any fact receives meaning. Without the presupposition of the truth of Christian theism, no fact can be distinguished from any other fact. To say this is but to apply the method of idealist logicians in a way that these idealist logicians, because of their own anti-Christian theistic assumptions, cannot apply it.

The point made by these logicians is that even the mere counting of particular things presupposes a system of truth of which these particulars form a part. Without such a system of truth there would be no distinguishable difference between one particular and another. They would be as impossible to distinguish from one another as the millions of drops of water in the ocean would be indistinguishable from one another by the naked eye. “The main point is this, that all counting presupposes and depends upon a qualitative whole, and that the Collective Judgment asserts a generic connection within its group. Hence no more particulars can be counted.”²²

²²F. H. Bradley, The Principle of Logic, 2d ed., rev., 2 vols 1928. Van Til often uses the terms of idealist philosophy. Occasionally, he endorses one of its conclusions, though without endorsing its system. Here, the point made by idealism is that facts can have no value without a framework within which to place them. That point is true in ways the system cannot itself justify.

It may be objected that one fact differs from other facts precisely because none of them are rationally controlled. Is it not the insertion of individual facts into a logically concatenated system that makes these facts lose their individuality? Has not Kant taught us that, if we are to have logical concatenation between the individual facts of our experience at all, we can have it just to the extent that we give up the impossible ideal of knowing individual things in themselves?²³

²³ In Kant’s philosophy we can know things through the filter of the forms of sense, but only on condition that we renounce any knowledge of the Ding an sich, or the noumenon. In the Reformed, biblical approach, because God is fully rational, there is no dilemma between knowing individual facts and knowing the whole. God knows both perfectly, and we know them derivatively, by knowing God.

In reply we need only to observe that this way of escape is not open to the Reformed apologist. The Reformed apologist must, if he is at the same time a Reformed theologian, hold to what the average scientist and philosopher today will look upon as the most hopeless form of rationalism he has ever met. The historical forms of rationalism have done either of two things. If they were reasonably consistent, then they were ready to deny the existence and meaning of individuality in history altogether. Parmenides claimed that the “great question, Is it or is it not?” was to be determined by what man can consistently say about it.²⁴

On the other hand, if rationalists were consistent, they held to the same ideal of individuation by means of complete logical description on the part of man, but they realized that such a description cannot be accomplished. Leibniz was not less a rationalist in his hopes and ambitions than was Parmenides. He did not hesitate to make the “possibility of knowledge to depend upon a knowledge of possibility.” Yet, Leibniz questioned whether man can ever attain to the perfect analysis, which would carry him back, without finding any contradiction, to the absolute attributes of God.²⁵ Thus, in spite of himself, Leibniz had to allow for the actual existence of individual, ultimately changing things. But then to do so he had to sacrifice his system of logic. He recognized temporal individuality but could do so only at the expense of logical system. And the idealist logicians, such as F. H. Bradley and Bernard Bosanquet were no exceptions to this rule.²⁶

²⁶ F. H. Bradley (1846-1924) and B. Bosanquet (1848-1923) were British absolute idealists. In slightly different ways they both attacked utilitarian and liberal thinking. Bradley argued that universals, and the whole, were more basic than any empirical particulars, or than the inadequacies of language. Bosanquet argued that the social whole was more basic than single individuals.

But in contradistinction from the rationalist and the irrationalist, and in contradistinction from the forms of thought that seek some sort of combination between these two, the Reformed apologist must hold both to the idea of absolute system and to that of genuine historic fact and individuality. He does not hold to “truths of fact” at the expense of “truths of reason.” He holds to truths of fact only because to him they are truths of reason. But then it is obvious that he is not himself, as a human being, able to show the exhaustive logical relationships between the facts of history and nature, which are in debate as between believers and disbelievers in Christian theism. In consequence, he must maintain that the truths of fact presented in Scripture must be what Scripture says they are or else they are irrational and meaningless altogether.

The true Christian apologist has his principle of discontinuity; it is expressed in his appeal to the mind of God as all-comprehensive in knowledge because all-controlling in power. He holds his principle of discontinuity, then, not at the expense of all logical relationship between facts, but because of the recognition of this creaturehood. His principle of discontinuity is therefore the opposite of that of irrationalism, without being that of rationalism. The Christian also has his principle of continuity. It is that of the self-contained God and his plan for history. His principle of continuity is therefore the opposite of that of rationalism without being that of irrationalism.

Conjoining the Christian principle of continuity and the Christian principle of discontinuity we obtain the Christian principle of reasoning by presupposition. It is the actual existence of the God of Christian theism and the infallible authority of the Scripture, which speaks to sinners of this God, that must be taken as the presupposition of the intelligibility of any fact in the world.

This does not imply that it will be possible to bring the whole debate about Christian theism to full expression in every discussion of individual historical fact. Nor does it imply that the debate about historical detail is unimportant. It means that no Christian apologist can afford to forget the claim of his system with respect to any particular fact. He must always maintain that the “fact” under discussion with his opponent must be what Scripture says it is, if it is to be intelligible as a fact at all. He must maintain that there can be no facts in any realm but such as actually do exhibit the truth of the system of which they are a part. If facts are what they are as parts of the Christian theistic system of truth, then what else can facts do but reveal that system to the limit of their abilities as parts of that system? It is only as manifestations of that system that they are what they are. If the apologist does not present them as such, he does not present them for what they are.²⁷

²⁷ This passage clearly states Van Til's commitment to evidences. In ways some of his critics would ignore, he stresses that facts matter; indeed, they are required by our worldview. For strategic purposes the entire system does not need to be laid out in each conversation. But it does matter that such a system be true, and so the apologist should always presuppose it, whether or not it is discussed each time.

Over against this Christian theistic position, any non-Christian philosophy virtually denies the unity of truth. It may speak much of it and even seem to contend for it, as idealistic philosophers do, but in the last analysis non-Christian philosophy is atomistic. This follows from the absolute separation between truth and reality that was introduced when Adam and Eve fell away from God. When Satan tempted Eve to eat of the forbidden fruit, he tried to persuade her that God's announcement of the consequences of such an act would not come true. That was tantamount to saying that no assertion about a rational scheme could predict the course of movement of time-controlled reality. Reality, Satan practically urged man, was to be conceived of as something that is not under rational control. Every non-Christian philosophy makes the assumption made by Adam and Eve, and is therefore irrationalistic. This irrationalism comes to most consistent expression in various forms of empiricism and pragmatism. In them predication is frankly conceived of in atomistic fashion.

On the other hand, when Satan tempted Eve, he virtually asked her to become a rationalist. He asked her to take the position that she needed not to obtain any information about the course of factual eventuation from any source but her own mind. Prior to any tendency that had developed in the course of historical events, she, following Satan's advice, made what was tantamount to a universal negative judgment about time reality. She took for granted that punishment could not come in consequence upon her eating of the forbidden fruit. This rationalism appears most consistently in such men as Parmenides. But even the inconsistent rationalists are really a priorists; they make concessions only because they cannot realize their ideal. “The rationalists (Descartes, Spinoza, and Leibniz) argued that all knowledge comes from reason alone.”²⁸ [as opposed from revelation] Yet Leibniz was forced to speak of truths of fact as well as of truths of reason.

In modern times Kant has combined the principle of rationalism and empiricism. “He described the contribution of reason to knowledge as exactly so and so and the contribution of sense as exactly such and such.” This position of Kant is the dominating position that confronts us today. [1970s - Van Til: 1895-1987] It is usually spoken of as phenomenistic.³⁰ It is characteristic by an attempt to bridge the gulf between fact and mind that was brought into the world as the consequence of the sin of Adam. But it cannot be a remedy for this dualism. Phenomenalism is still basically atomistic inasmuch as it still maintains that factuality in itself is non-rational in character. At the same time phenomenism is still rationalistic in that whatever unity it thinks it finds in this atomistically conceived reality virtually proceeds from the human soul. At least this rationality is not taken as proceeding from the mind of God.

³⁰ Van Til is using this term in a general way to describe the view that one can move from sense experience to rational, free thought. There was a school known as phenomenism, associated with Bertrand Russell, which attempted to translate talk of physical objects into talk of possible experiences. But the broader idea is simply to safeguard the phenomenal aspect of a subject matter, rather than making the concrete facts too easily dependent upon prior theories.

Leibniz

An Introduction to Systematic Theology

by Cornelius Van Til pg 92-93

Against rationalism and idealism Bavinck argues that all men are naturally realists and that all men are dependent on nature about them. He goes on to point out that idealism leads to an impersonal abstraction, and then adds that the rock on which all idealism stands is plurality.¹⁷ These criticisms of idealism are true as far as they go. Our only complaint is that Bavinck did not go far enough. The criticism he makes might have been made by a non-Christian realist. Bavinck does not tell us that the basis of his criticism is the presupposition of the self-existent God.

¹⁷ GD, 218, RD, 246. “Materially, in terms of content, idealism puts the [mental] representation [of reality] on a level with an image from a dream and consequently makes all kinds of futile attempts to move by reasoning and proofs from the subject to the object.” Perception is thus confused for the real world, according to Bavinck (RD, 223). Van Til agrees, but pleads for a foundation for such a judgment.

Against empiricism he argues that all science must begin with a set of unproved a priori assumptions that have not been derived from experience. [Bavinck] To this he adds that science is, in the nature of the case, interested in “the general, the necessary, and the eternal, the logical, the idea.” Still further he quotes with approval the words of Thomas Aquinas, which the latter in turn took from Aristotle: “minimum quod potest haberi de cognitione rerum altissimarum, desiderabilius est quam certissima cognitio, quae habetur de minimis rebus.” (The slenderest acquaintance we can form with heavenly things is more desirable than a thorough grasp of mundane matters.)

The question that arises when we read this is, On what does Bavinck think a priori principles of science rest? A non-Christian idealist might readily say what Bavinck said on this point. It is not enough for Christians to point to the mere fact of the necessity of an a priori element in science. He must also show that unless that a priori element in science. He must also show that unless that a priori be given the Christian-theistic basis, it is no true a priori.²¹

²¹ Thus, even an a priori (from that which is before) approach must have a reason for being. It cannot simply be a general deductive method. To be helpful, that which is before should be the full Christian-theistic (Trinitarian) presupposition.

Bavinck quotes with approval, as noted above, the words of Aquinas to the effect that the slightest knowledge of higher things is worth more than certain knowledge with respect to lower things. Again we ask, is there no need of pointing out the difference between a Christian and an Aristotelian notion of gradation in the created universe? Surely the Christian, who believes in the doctrine of creation, cannot share the Greek depreciation of the things of the sense world.²²

²² A biblical view does not regard “higher things” versus “lower things,” but evaluates all created things in light of revelation.

Depreciation of that sense world inevitably leads to a depreciation of many of the important facts of historic Christianity that took place in the sense world. The Bible does not rule out every form of empiricism anymore than it rules out every form of a priori reasoning. To be sure, in effect, it rules out the empiricism of Locke, but it also, in effect rules out the rationalism of Leibniz.²³

²³ Empiricism looks at measurable data. If it is grounded in a theistic worldview, then it is legitimate. Locke's empiricism has no such ground. If a priori reasoning is based on a theistic worldview, then it too is legitimate. Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz (1646-1716), a philosopher, statesman, and expert in jurisprudence, devised a highly rationalist system in which each component is the reflection of a complete notion, known to God, so that one may derive all the properties of one component by knowing how it fits into the whole. Accordingly, for everything there is a reason (the principle of sufficient reason) to which God himself is bound. This led Leibniz to assert that although there is evil, it is necessary in a world that God has created, which is the “best of all possible worlds.” Leibniz's apriorism is rationalistic, based on a certain autonomy of human reason, which ultimately fails to make sense of the reality of the created world.

Comments on Plato and Utopias

Van Til

pages 172-173

For this reason, too, speculations of Plato about the future of the human soul do not bring the soul before the judgment seat of an absolute God. There is, to be sure, a difference made – in the literature not only of Plato, but of other non-Christian writers – between the more wicked and the less wicked. This difference is, however, one that pertains to the distance that one can get away from certain circumstances that are inevitable in the universe. And what is most significant is the fact that the utopias of man do not center on the personal God, but are descriptive of improved conditions that may, in the last analysis, be quite independent of God.

The Platonic myth further points to the fact that, though relegated to a lower place, the idea of a revelation from above is not altogether cast aside. It shows once more that man has not been able to solve his problems when he has bound up his soul with the universe, and, in particular, with the universe as it has fallen into sin. So also in the Egyptian literature we have a considerable emphasis upon the fact of a future judgment. In this future judgment the gods play an important part. Men have felt something of the fact that righteousness and justice must in the end prevail. As far as their immanentistic principles are concerned, they have not made provision for the ultimate triumph of righteousness. They have made evil as original and therefore as ultimate as the good. On this basis, there is logically no reason to expect that the good will be ultimately victorious over the evil. In spite of this, men have dreamed dreams in which all unrighteousness should be put down. The fact that they still dream such dreams is in itself significant. The evolutionary optimism, the socialistic dreams of pragmatic philosophers, indicate what the books of the dead did in the case of the Egyptians with equal logical validity, but also with equal significance from the point of view of the meaning of human life. Even in modern times when the immanentistic principle has been more fearlessly and more consistently applied than in ancient times, men cannot find final rest within the universe alone. Unless man may study himself in the light of God, there is no hope for him.

More on Leibniz, pg 375-377

Wisdom

In connection with the knowledge of God, we should mention the wisdom of God. It is much praised in Scripture. God is set forth as the one who uses the most effective means for the accomplishment of his one inclusive purpose. We may contrast the Christian and the non-Christian notions of the idea of wisdom. The Christian notion of wisdom depends upon the notion of the self-contained God. Because of his self-contained and necessary knowledge he can, when he chooses, create a universe, and create this universe just as he wasn't to create it. This is, therefore, "the best of possible worlds." God's wisdom is displayed in it. Man can understand something of it if only he will think God's thoughts after him.²⁴

²⁴ Somewhat ironically, Van Til uses the phrase touted by Leibniz, but in a very different sense. Leibniz considers possibility as an abstract set, from which God chooses the best. For Van Til the best does not come from a set of possibilities, but is simply the characteristic of every choice God makes, owing to his nature.

But exactly here lies the difficulty. Idealistic thought has sought to think out an order and plan for this world by positing certain eternal principles of truth, goodness, and beauty. And then it has made the mind of man the standard by which to judge the effectiveness by which these principles seem to be realized in this world. The idealists were kind enough to find that this is perhaps the best world that God could make, in view of the limitations he was under. In this way “the best possible world” of Leibniz’s theodicy is really nothing more than a great apology for a finite God.²⁵

²⁵ See G. W. Leibniz, Theodicy: Essays on the Goodness of God, Trans. E. M. Huggard (LaSalle: Open Court, 1985) The original publication of Theodicy was 1710, Theodicy literally means the justification of God and treats the relationship of a good and powerful God to the reality of evil. See note chapter 5, note 23 [above]

A Christian theodicy will have to start its defense from quite different principle. It will need to start frankly from the presupposition of the self-sufficient God. It goes without saying that this self-sufficient God, who controls all things and knows all things because he controls them, can use the best means to attain his end. But what are the best means? They are those which God sees fit to use. And since they are those which God sees fit to use, they may be wholly beyond the reach of human understanding. It was wholly beyond Job’s understanding to know why he should suffer. His friends could advise him that it was for the purpose of cultivating his personality. And this was no doubt true as a formal principle. But why did God have to make him suffer so much more than others who were certainly, in their deeds, no better than he? Job found the solution only when finally he surrendered himself fully into the hands of the sovereign God. To be sure, the wisdom of God appears in the world, and man can see something of it. Yet it remains true that God is a God that hides himself, and no man should essay to approve or condemn the deeds of the Holy One by standards of his own devising. The Reformed theodicy is therefore quite different from the Romanist and Arminian. The latter finds that God needed obstacles in the universe in order fully to realize himself.

b. Descartes vs. Calvin pg 75

The absolute contrast of principle between the City of Man and the one of God appeared with particular clarity in the instance of Rene Descartes vs. John Calvin. Descartes, of course, was the typical Renaissance man, whereas Calvin had developed and extended the biblical approach to God rediscovered by Luther. The former stood for the Socratic-Plotinian, the latter, the Augustinian, Pauline principle of inwardness.

The issue (at stake) was that of human certainty. In his book, New Paths of Philosophy (New Wege der Philosophie), Fritz Heinemann states that ancient man concerned himself with the cosmos, medieval man with God, and modern man with man himself. Superficially, then, it may be said that both Descartes and Calvin were modern. However, both were finally, also, concerned with man in respect to his environment, thus his relationship to God. Both sought for the actual inwardness of man by ascertaining this peculiar relationship, in other words, not merely the Socratic question of how man may know himself, but also the Platonic one of his “true” culture, thus ultimately his “salvation.” It was matter of “cultural” philosophy, as well as “humanistic.”

Renaissance man aimed at “controlling” nature so as to erect his earthly kingdom, and Descartes in question for self-knowledge exemplified this splendidly. Also, Bacon and Galileo Galilei had developed a “method” which projected human control over nature. Many others, notably Descartes., constructed a mathematically oriented method, based on Parmenidean assumption that reality was fully expressible by human conceptualization. But Kroner has emphasized that Galileo, for one, warned that mathematics would “never disclose anything about the true nature of the universe, or even of a stone,” although his metaphysically-minded successors generally disregarded the warning and proceeded to hatch their farfetched speculative systems. In a sense, one might say that they resorted to ancient cosmology in claiming to have discovered the true nature of existence.

Descartes, Spinoza, and Leibniz, the three outstanding example of such cosmology, were, nevertheless, modern thinkers indeed, in that they centered their final efforts, not upon nature or the world, but upon man, [that’s the problem! Not on God, but on man.] his niche in the world and also his relationship to God. Descartes launched his from his famous Cogito, a fully anthropocentric [man centered] principle. Spinoza was basically a mystic for whom knowledge of God was on importance, and yet he was not theocentric, but embraced rather the belief that speculation could bring about man’s harmony with the divine being thus the “end” of all his aspirations and personal longings. Leibniz’s whole system was at heart anthropocentric, with man to be the pattern and model of all things, even of the world and God. Any “naturalism” of these three “scientific” metaphysicians was therefore an illusion. In so far as it figured into their systems, it was as tribute to the prevailing fashion of thought during their time, not to the intrinsic or esoteric doctrine of their systems.

Excerpts from
Van Til and the Limits of Reason

As a result of Descartes’ point of departure, two lines of thought developed in philosophy: empiricism and rationalism. Empiricism holds that the individual man is the standard for truth and holds to the ultimacy of the sense world. The universals are purely subjective. The climax of such thought was the skepticism of Hume, for whom no knowledge was possible. Rationalism sought to interpret reality in terms of certain a priori principles. These a priori principle, however, were not anchored in the ontological trinity or in eternity but in the human mind as ultimate. [Adam and Eve’s sin!] In Spinoza and Leibniz rationalism reached its climax.

For Spinoza, God, man, and the universe are but individuations and aspects of the general idea of substance. But, as Van Til has pointed out, to say that all is God is no different that saying nothing is God. “Univocal reasoning must always lead to negation. Univocal reasoning is based upon negation. There very presupposition of univocal reasoning is that there is no absolute God. If there were an absolute God, it is ipso facto out of the question to apply the categories of thought to Him in the same way that they are applied to man.

Leibniz sought individuation on the basis of complete description and by reduction to mathematical formulae. Revelation was thus an impossibility. The interpreter is the mind of man, not the mind of God, and the mind of man can wholly comprehend all reality. The equal ultimacy of the one and many is sought without success in the universe, and the old theory of the gradation of being espoused. None of these devices enabled Leibniz to escape the dilemma of Spinoza or to rescue religion as he sought to do; having begun with the ultimacy of the universe, he could do no more than attempt to analyze it into both God and man. "As Leibniz sought to be wholly univocal, so Hume sought to be wholly equivocal in his reasoning. As in the philosophy of Leibniz God lost his individuality in order to become wholly known, so in the philosophy of Hume God maintained his individuality but remained wholly unknown.

III. Modern Man Replies

In the first of this tripartite series, we have seen how apostate man began to develop for himself a culture through which he could suppress the truth about himself, the world, and God. Deep in his heart, Paul said, all men knew that they were created beings who had rebelled against their Creator (Romans 1:19); but all, as sinners, had developed interpretative principles on the assumption that man was not God's creature or a sinner, but self-sufficient and autonomous.

Upon exactly this assumption the Greeks had insinuated to Paul that if he would speak to them on Christ and the Resurrection, he must do so in terms agreeing with the human autonomy idea. [\[the approach of Arminians, Roman Catholic and Evangelicals\]](#) However, Christ had already appeared to him and revealed that truth and life came to men only if they forsook this vaunted autonomy and knelt before Him as their Creator-Redeemer-King. Some of the Greeks, by the power of the Holy Spirit, had repented and accepted the Christ Paul preached, but many had not, reasoning, as indeed from their premises they had to, and as the Pharisees had, that Jesus, a mere man, blasphemed in exalting himself to a God.

In the second lecture we revealed how, during the late Roman empire, Plotinus carried through the Greek mode of thinking, but Augustine, that of Paul the apostle.

We learned how Plotinus developed a comprehensive explanation of religious and theoretical experience in terms friendly toward human autonomy, the result being a massive, all-comprehensive view of being, knowledge, and behavior in which all entities were gradationally interrelated. There was, he argued, a scale or ladder of being, upon which man as man was forever climbing, making use of the energy of being latent within him. Opposed to Plotinus, Augustine represented the Pauline conviction that man, a God's creature, had, in Adam, become a sinner, a fugitive from God, and that, as such, lay forevermore under God's wrath unless Jesus Christ, the Son of God and of man, bore this wrath in his place, thus freeing him to develop his Christian paideia unto God. [paideia, (Greek: "education," or "learning"), system of education and training in classical Greek and Hellenistic (Greco-Roman) cultures.]

Medieval man, we saw, attempted to synthesize the Plotinian and Augustinian, i.e., Christian points of view and thus, practically speaking, rejected Christ's claim that in Him alone were truth and life. In effect, he considered Christ to be a man-God, a monstrosity.

In the present lecture, we shall inquire finally into modern man's notion of who Christ was, and is. Does he really accept Christ's claim? Does he interpret all of life in Christ's name? In fact, what is the name he gives Christ?

To obtain an answer, we shall trace briefly his view of man, cosmos, and God, with emphasis on his view of man as - of course! - autonomous.

A. Renaissance Man Replies

We naturally start at the Renaissance. What did Renaissance man believe of himself and his culture? He thought, first of all, that he was free. He had escaped the burden of all authority, especially that of the church, whereby, having shaken it off his back, he imagined himself as having not only shrugged off the authority of Aristotle, but especially, of Christ. Now he could be himself at last, and thus act on that principle of inwardness which had impelled Socrates to live his own life so graciously and unperturbedly.

In other words, a true, man-centered culture was about to be born. The treasured idea of the ultimately self-explanatory nature of human personality had underlain the cultural endeavors of apostate man at every stage of his development, but its full significance in respect to the struggle between the kingdom of God and that of man was not to appear clearly till modern times, in the cultural ideals of Renaissance man.

1. Renaissance Man vs. Reformation Man

To grasp this, we may at once undertake a singularly large leap and set the Renaissance view of man and his freedom in contrast to that of the Reformation. Renaissance man sought his freedom in the idea of absolute independence from Christ and found it where the Greeks had found it, namely, in the construction of a paideia which excluded and opposed Him; and Reformation-man found his freedom where Paul had found it, i.e., in his final, definitive escape from the sin of persecuting Christ to the joy of constructing culture in His name. Erasmus of Rotterdam thus pled with Socrates to pray for progress in 64 building the city of man, while Luther prayed to Christ and the triune God for progress in constructing that of God.

a. Modern Science

The question of the place and significance of science emerged during the time of the Renaissance and Reformation as perhaps the main bone of contention between them, expressing as it did in modern form the old Meno-problem of Plato, namely, "How was learning by experience possible?" Man possessed a cultural mandate with Renaissance man declaring that it had been given him by his own self-sufficient consciousness, and Reformation man, that it had been endowed by Christ, his Creator-Redeemer. The two views excluded each other entirely, with every fact between them in dispute. Renaissance man began with himself as self-referential, presuming that no method of research was tolerable or intelligible unless it served him in his capacity as ultimate interpreter of reality, and that no conclusion could be true unless proceeding from the premise of himself as the ultimate, central reference point of all experience. Reformation man began with Christ as self-referential, and only thereafter, from himself, as the meek servant of the Christ

2. Renaissance Man's Idea of Himself

The development of Renaissance man may be appreciated best if note be first taken of his relationship to his predecessor, medieval man.

We begin with Abelard who was a typically "obedient son of the church." Yet, according to Windelband, "he is first of all a rationalist: thought is for him the norm of truth" (Willhelm Windelband, A History of Philosophy, tr. by James H. Tufts, 1895, p. 299). Thus, he believed in divine revelation "only because it is reasonable"; regarded Christianity "as the philosophy of the Greeks made democratic", and was, therefore, "the spokesman of free science, the prophet of the newly awakened impulse toward real and independent knowledge" (p. 300).

A second medieval figure worth mentioning is William of Occam whose very name recalls the nominalism of the late Middle Ages, by which Occam had enabled infant science to work free from Scholasticism (p. 315). Thus the idea of the independence of human 65 personality began to assert itself on every side: the individual mind knew only what was within itself.

a. Nicolas Cusanus [Nicolas of Cusa]

It was along nominalistic lines that Nicolas Cusanus contended that human thought "possesses only conjectures, that is, only modes of representation which correspond to its own nature and the knowledge of the relativities of all positive predicates," the knowledge of this non-knowledge, the docta ignorantia, being the only way "to go beyond rational science and attain to the inexpressible, signless, immediate community of knowledge with true Being, the deity" (p. 343).

When Occam had "declared the individual being to be the alone truly Real, he was thereby pointing out to 'real science' the way to the immediate apprehension of the actual world" (p. 344).

Thus the way was prepared, exclaims Windelband, for a "richer more living and more inward' writing of history" (p. 345).

Still, the old framework occasionally hampered men in their research, as one may detect strikingly in the person of Nicolas Cusanus. "Seized in every fibre of his being by the fresh impulse of his time, he nevertheless could not give up the purpose of arranging his new thoughts in the system of the old conception of the world" (p. 345).

Renaissance man carried forth the motif of Plotinus, who had gathered together all the elements of ancient philosophy into his concept of the One which was above all temporal things, yet present within them. Cusanus thus gathered together all the elements of medieval philosophy into his own concept of the deus implicitus who was, at the same time, the deus explicitus. "God is the greatest (maximum) and, at the same time, also the smallest (minimum)." "All is in all omnia ubique. In this way every individual contains within itself the universe, though in a limited form peculiar to this individual alone and differing from all others. In omnibus partibus relucet fotum" (p. 347). "Thus the finite also is given with and in the infinite, the individual with and in the universal. At the same time, the infinite is necessary in itself, the finite, however, (following Duns Scotus), is absolutely contingent, i.e., mere fact" (p. 347).

We note that Windelband sums up the whole situation of medieval philosophy with the idea that, as Plotinus had demonstrated the 66 failure of ancient philosophy, so had Cusanus that of the medieval. "Cusanus aims to bring every aspect of infinite and finite reality into intelligible relation to every other aspect. He could be successful in this attempt only if he would deny the reality of the distinctness of all aspects from one another. But this must not be. Pure contingency must have a place in the system.

Thus it was that in early modern philosophy, says Richard Kroner, "man discovered that he was in the center of the world, and that he had to seek truth and guidance within himself. No outer authority can assume ultimate responsibility for the individual character of the person or for the faith that a man may accept as the ultimate source of all his decisions and norms of conduct" (Richard Kroner, Speculation and Revelation in Modern Philosophy, p. 25).

He adds: "All modern philosophy is based upon these presuppositions. Man had never before felt his freedom so strongly. In his famous oration on The Dignity of Man (written about 1486), Pico della Mirandola, the Italian, glorified the autonomy of man in general and of the individual person in particular" (p. 27).

The Frenchman Michel de Montaigne (1533-1592) said, "I study myself more than any other subject. That is my metaphysics, that is my physics" (cf. Kroner, p. 29).

Thus, it is clear that Renaissance man carried out the Socratic spirit of inwardness more consistently than Socrates himself had done. Having heard somewhat of Christ's claims to be the way, the truth and the life, he would still have none of it. Whereas Socrates rebelled against the revelation of God speaking to him through nature and consciousness, Renaissance man rebelled against the same God as He had revealed Himself in the death and Resurrection of Jesus Christ and in the challenge to repentance of Paul and the other apostles. Renaissance man had therefore to assure himself conclusively of his new found "freedom" in that the triune God did not speak to him anywhere. Especially, he had to interpret nature as being properly his own domain, not God's.

b. Francis Bacon

The Englishman Francis Bacon (1561-1626) performed a great service among his fellow denizens of the city of man when he wrote that "knowledge is power (Scientia est potentia). He was, says Kroner, "the prophet of the conquest of nature by means of investigation and inductive thinking." True, he had not entirely "medieval forms of thought, but he did anticipate the outgrown possibility of knowing and using the natural forces for the sake of aggrandizing man's power and self-dependence" (p. 28).

Bacon announced that it was his purpose "to try out whether the foundation of the power and grandeur of man can be established" (cf. Kroner, p. 28). In his essay on New Atlantis, he had the fictitious president of a learned society of scholars say, "The end of our foundation is the knowledge of causes and secret motions of things, and the enlarging of the bounds of human empire, to the effecting of all things possible" (p. 29).

When we read this, we must naturally think of Plato, who sought to develop a culture, an ideal state, on the basis of the Socratic principle of inwardness, thus of philosophy pur sang, with mythology and theology relegated to the realm of second best (deuteros plous). Similarly, although Bacon prayed initially to the triune God for success, to the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, he then proceeded to draw up a blueprint for the city of man in which the trinitarian doctrine had only an emotive significance. [emotive: to arouse intense feeling] (cf. Francis Bacon, "The Great Instauration" in Edwin A. Burt, The English Philosophers from Bacon to Mill, The Modern Library, 1939).

He has offered to us an illustration of how, as he imagined, a proper methodology in science ought to proceed. It was thus through induction that he would have discovered "the simple elements of reality, from the 'nature' of which, in their regular relation and connection, the whole compass of what we perceive is to be explained. Induction, he thought, will find the Forms by which Nature must be interpreted."

Bacon's inductive method was all-inclusive, aiming "to understand man and all the activities of his life as a product of the same elements of reality which also lie at the basis of external Nature." Moreover, by the comprehensive application of his method, he would have enabled man to realize his dream of making himself the king of the universe. [The classic 'Babylonish' attempt to make name for man!]

With reliance on "divine assistance," he undertook not merely to "cast a glance or two upon facts and examples and experience," but also to dwell "purely and constantly among the facts of nature..." He sought to lead men "to things themselves and the concordance of things, and, if he had committed an error anywhere, he at least presented to others the means of correcting him: "and by these means 68 I suppose that I have established forever a true and lawful marriage between the empirical and the rational faculty, the unkind and ill-starred divorce and separation of which has thrown into confusion all the affairs of the human family."

In this manner, Bacon believed to have set aside "the mischievous authority of systems, which are founded either on common notions or on a few experiments, or on superstition, declaring, in effect, that he had solved the Meno problem. Having renounced all classes of idols, he promised to lead us into "the kingdom of man. . . ." Thus the prophecy of Daniel would now, apparently, be fulfilled, that in the latter days "knowledge shall be increased..."

Some comments from the web that may shed light on this 'Meno Problem':

Plato's Meno introduces aspects of Socratic ethics and Platonic epistemology in a fictional dialogue that is set among important political events and cultural concerns in the last years of Socrates' life. It begins as an abrupt, prepackaged debater's challenge from Meno about whether virtue can be taught, and quickly becomes an open and inconclusive search for the essence of this elusive "virtue," or human goodness in general. This inquiry exhibits typical features of the Socratic method of elenchus, or refutation by cross-examination, and it employs typical criteria for the notoriously difficult goal of Socratic definitions. But then a distinctive objection to the possibility of learning anything at all by such inquiry prompts the introduction of characteristically Platonic themes of immortality, mathematics, and a "recollection" of knowledge not learned by experience in this life. A model geometry lesson with an uneducated slave is supposed to illustrate the importance of being aware of our own ignorance, the nature of proper education, the difference between knowledge and true belief, and the possibility of learning things without being taught. When the conversation returns to Meno's initial question of whether virtue can be taught, Socrates introduces another manner of investigation, a method of "hypotheses," by which he argues that virtue must be some kind of knowledge, and so it must be something that's taught. But then Socrates also argues to the contrary that since virtue is never actually taught, it seems not to be knowledge after all.

This dialogue portrays aspects of Socratic ignorance and Socratic irony while it enacts his twofold mission of exposing common arrogant pretensions and pursuing a philosophical knowledge of virtue that no one ever seems to have. It is pervaded with typical Socratic and Platonic criticisms of how, in spite of people's constant talk of virtue, they value things like wealth and power more than wisdom and justice. And it includes a tense confrontation with one of the men who will bring Socrates to trial on charges of corrupting young minds with dangerous teachings about morality and religion. The dialogue closes with the surprising suggestion that virtue as practiced in our world both depends on true belief rather than knowledge and is received as some kind of divine gift. We might now, he asserted, pray with confidence "to God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost" that he would lead us on toward and into that kingdom of man. "They will vouchsafe through my hands to endow the human family with new mercies."

Other scientists besides Bacon had contributions to make to the building of the city of man. One thing that needed attention badly was the demonstration that the "facts" to be discovered by empirical research must necessarily fit together into a blueprint constructed by Renaissance man himself, who had to be certain that the Parmenidean principle of the identity of thought and being would remain in control of the situation.

Man in the present world had to apply this principle to the material which chance presented to him. He was therefore compelled to interpret all reality, himself and the world alike, in terms of the idea of the correlativity of his abstract principles of identity and diversity respectively.

But now, a new form of an old threat loomed for him on the horizon: namely, the danger of the absorption of his own newly acquired, free individuality into the moment-by-moment, grinding interaction of pure staticism and pure flux.

When Parmenides had asserted that all reality was one changeless block of being, he had committed his individuality to a similar complete fusion with fate, and when Heraclitus had alleged all to be flux, he had consigned his individuality to a similarly total blending with chance.

Their successors faced the same problem, but had, in general sought to save man from absorption in either direction by asserting that neither the Parmenidean nor the Heraclitean principles 69 possessed any validity within itself; rather, it was only through possessed interaction that they might become fruitful for the interpretation of human experience. Still, the problem remained. Aristotle's idea that all being was inherently analogical remained a perfect example of the futility of bearing into the direction of ever-increasing correlativity between pure determinism and pure indeterminism. And the end was not yet. Actually, there was no other way to go but down the path of further such correlativity unless, of course, one would listen to Paul's preaching of the resurrection of Christ. But what "free" man wished to head that way? [no one, because all have gone astray; all are corrupt, blind, etc.]

In fact, Renaissance man found that, with his bold assertion of freedom from all authority, he was obliged to stress the correlativity of absolute contingency and absolute determinism still further than Greek philosophy had ever done. The "stuff" of his experience must, in no sense, have for its source the activity of the Creator-Redeemer God of Christianity for, if it did, then man would find himself - dreadful thought! - dependent upon God. Similarly, the "form" of experience ought not have made him reflect upon the Divine directing activity, or he would thus once again have become dependent upon the Creator. [Again, see here that fallen man's heart is at enmity with God, etc.]

Renaissance man sensed that this necessity of declaring both absolute rationality and absolute irrationality to be correlative to one another posed even a new and different threat to him: it was, namely, that he seemed to himself as "condemned to be free." Having left the Father's house because its order was too confining for him, he now found himself afloat on a desert island, in a shoreless, bottomless ocean whose water was salty as the Dead Sea, unsuited for irrigating the sterile sand that trickled between his fingers as he stooped to inspect it, with no minerals underneath, and no greenage atop the lifeless ground. How, then, could he erect the city of man and fortify it with walls, so as to keep out Prince Emanuel who would come to claim and renew His own?

But to speak thusly of Renaissance man, as one who lived on desert island, was, even so, not to describe him adequately, as natural man. For the notion of the barren island would only apply, had apostate man ever been successful in his attempt to overthrow the claims of Christ to be the Way, the Truth, and the Life; that is, it illustrates the devastating nature of the principle of apostate (hence, Renaissance) man, had he, in fact, been successful in his claims and 70 his autonomous principles so as to have brought his "city of man" to complete, actual realization. [Remember God frustrated the building of Babylon! a kind of 'city of man' where man strived to make a name for himself.] And that this result could not have been, had been proven long before by the complete failure of Greek philosophy.

On the basis of the Socratic principle of inwardness, then, with its unending conflict between contingency/ irrationalism and determinism/rationalism, man could not identify himself, could not say "I am" and make it stick, in distinction from anyone or anything else, and could not say anything definite about himself as distinct from anything said by and about anyone else. As in the old adage, there was nothing else that anyone else said about anything else that could not as well be said about "Socrates."

As "Socrates" not able to use the law of identity with respect to himself, even so he could not apply the law of non-contradiction to the world of facts, and thus had Parmenides been quite "brave" when he asserted that the world of being had to answer perfectly to the laws of thought, Plato braver still when he worked with this Parmenidean principle (especially after he had been forced to admit of pure contingency as existing behind the world of reality and logic, and of non-being as possessing a measure of being!), and Aristotle the bravest of the three when he continued to insist that knowledge was of universals only, although criticizing Socrates for not having allowed for an irrational element in the soul, and Plato for not having been sufficiently inductive in his reasoning. But now there came Renaissance man, the first "modern," who was bravest of all when he (as, for instance, in the person of Francis Bacon) asserted that all previous methods were defective in not having assigned due place to the observation of contingent facts. The particular form of the bravery of Renaissance man appeared still further in the fact that (as again with Bacon) he promised a sure foundation for the city of man by his appeal to facts themselves, but then blandly announced that he would find the forms of things in the facts. Thus did Bacon imagine that he had escaped the Aristotelian idea of substantial forms, yet, of course, his own forms emerged as made of the same stuff as Aristotle's since both were composed ultimately of Parmenidean to absolute indeterminism and absolute irrationalism. Bacon had merely walked a bit further down the via dolorosa that was to lead to Immanuel Kant, in whose thinking forms were to have their very source in man. And, as will be seen, even Kant himself had not gone 71 all the way. Indeed, apostate man, were he to be consistent with his own principles, ought always boldly to maintain that he has, not merely in thought, but also in reality, completely reversed the relationship between God and man as defined in the Genesis account, since it is not until man not only asserts, but proves, to himself, to all the world and the heavens as well, that he, instead of God, is the manipulator and source of all possibility and reality viz., the anti-Christ- that his autonomous endeavors throughout history will assume their most logical meaning.

Renaissance man was truly "modern" in his bearing the ark of God toward the temple of Dagon, the god of the Philistines, and his reference to Christ as the superfluous man. He was, like a small boy, telling his father that he had been, was, and ever would be superfluous. "I control the world, Dad. I know I need food, but, you see, I'll grow my own. In fact, I'll buy up all the chain stores, then the whole country, the whole world. I'll be the master of my fate and the captain of my soul." Then, the boy discovered that he had nothing with which to buy his next breakfast, finding that, like the prodigal of the parable, he was soon at the swine trough, having denied his own manhood. So also the Renaissance man in his denying Christ as the way to the Father's house

Summing up, Renaissance man in the first place had renewed the pagan principle of inwardness, following Plato, Aristotle and Plotinus, demonstrating willy-nilly that his victory spelt his defeat. [same with Satan!]

But in the second place, Renaissance man went beyond his medieval associates in his effort to synthesize the Socratic preoccupation with his own ultimacy with Christ's insistence on His divine ultimacy. To Renaissance man, the natural teleology of man was higher than it was to medieval man. He accordingly invited Christ to join him in building the city of man, behaving exactly the same as Satan the Prince of the World, when he offered Christ the world's kingdoms if only He would prostrate Himself before the Prince. [Wow!]

The teleological argument is an attempt to prove the existence of God that begins with the observation of the purposiveness of nature. The teleological argument moves to the conclusion that there must exist a designer.

You may object to such a "harsh" evaluation of Renaissance man by interjecting that he was simply "doing without" Christ rather than actually opposing Him. The answer, however, has long ago been given; all human beings not for Christ are against him! The world is one grand estate whose proprietor is, indeed, the Christ, because He is its Creator-Redeemer. Renaissance man was fully justified to 72 repudiate the Roman Church's authority, which was largely that of an artificial, man-made Christ. However, a false authority cannot rightly be rejected without kneeling to the true one, Whose claims were indeed heard by Renaissance man, and then, no less, rejected by him, as Erasmus of Rotterdam did in asserting man's freedom independently of Christ, and above his having achieved liberation as a sinner through Christ's blood. Such was the issue between Erasmus and Luther. And was Socrates indeed, with Mary the mother of God, to become an equal spokesman for the human race? If Erasmus meant this by his request to Socrates to pray for him, it was virtually claiming Socrates not to have been a sinner, in need of forgiveness for his declaration of independence from God. Should it be furthermore objected that one need not adopt Luther's theology to accept Christ the reply is again clear: the Bible as Christ's Word was quite available to Renaissance man, yet he chose to ignore its doctrine of man the sinner in need of redemption so as to build thereafter the city of God. This was clearly to imply that Christ erred in His insistence against the powers of Satan that unless men were saved by His destiny of suffering in their place, they and their total cultural effort rested under God's wrath.

3. Reformation Man's Idea of Himself

We already indicated the fact that Renaissance man found his greatest opponent in Reformation, not medieval man. To amplify clearly the views expressed concerning this contrast, we turn first to Richard Kroner's evaluation of it.

Reformation and Renaissance man, says Kroner, were both opposed to the Church's external authority. Proceeding from that point, their opposition to Romanism's externality was united on the ground of man's spiritual inwardness. Kroner mentions that "the Biblical word remained the authority to which Luther and other Reformers referred," yet, he minimizes the profound and basic significance of this fact by adding that "the Protestant conscience, rather than the Bible, was, for Luther, the basic point of reference. It was this "Protestant conscience," Kroner argues, which led eventually to "modern religiosity, as based upon the individual conscience" (Kroner, Speculation, p. 26).

a. Martin Luther vs. Boehme

Consistent with this same line of thinking, Kroner associates and identifies the spirit of mysticism with that of the Reformation. He says: "Like the mystics, Luther was convinced that the redemptive atonement of Christ has to be understood as an inner truth that must be experienced by the soul, that God is not an object of doctrine, but the supreme goal of the will and the heart; not a 'form' in the Aristotelian sense, but a living power, and that man cannot unite with God by theoretical knowledge, but only by inward regeneration" (p. 64).

Kroner's complete misinterpretation of the relation of Lutheran theology to mysticism is similar to the one so often made with respect to Augustine's theology and Plotinus' mysticism. The basic theological convictions expressed best in Augustine's later writings are, of course, diametrically opposite to those of Plotinus, as Luther's basic convictions squarely oppose those of the Medieval mystics; and Luther, of course, continued Augustine's theology as the mystics of Renaissance times perpetuated Plotinus. Kroner's views are the exact reverse of historical reality.

Particularly difficult to grasp is how he can speak of Jakob Boehme's (1575-1624) beliefs as a "Protestant faith" (p. 68). Describing them, Kroner says: "The Ungrund, the abysmal arche of all things, is the divine will. This will is absolutely independent, unmotivated not impelled by any desire. The primordial will wills nothing; as compared with all definite things, things, it is itself Nothing" (p. 72). But after all, "the will must will something in order to be a will. Boehme knows the solution of this riddle. . . . The eternal, every joyful will longs for its own self-revelation, self-manifestation, or self-contemplation. As pure Will, God does not know Himself, he does not confront Himself, He is not conscious of Himself. In this respect God is indeed lacking something. Being infinite He is also indefinite. The abundance of His will is curtailed is by the poverty of His knowledge; the power of His freedom is restricted by the impotency of awareness. Only by revealing Himself to Himself, by articulating Himself does the impersonal Ungrund become the personal author of the Creation" (p. 63)

In all his thinking, Kroner concludes, Boehme was concerned with the problem of selfhood. "If God is personal, then He is a self; but the human self is finite, so how can we conceive of an infinite self? This question occupied all his thinking" (p. 73).

It is obvious from this display of Boehme's views that he was a thinker along Plotinian rather than Augustinian, lines of reasoning, his position resting upon the assumption of human autonomy, thus he "found the key to the riddle" of God's self-hood "within himself." And thus he could also say, "the source of the Creation of this world is much easier to understand in the will of God by the inner man than the visible things by the outer one." Again, "if thou wilt to behold God and eternity, turn thy will around into thy inner self, then thou art like God himself, for so thou art created in the beginning and so thou livest in accordance with the inner will of God and in God." Having excerpted this from Boehme, Kroner then adds: "Augustine and Luther said the same" (p. 74). It is impossible to agree with this evaluation.

To be sure, Kroner can appeal to Windelband, and to that great historian of doctrine, Adolf von Harnack, for support of the claim that Augustine "said the same." But then, these men have overlooked the fact that Augustine gradually outgrew his early Platonic Plotinian education, coming later to believe what the apostle Paul had taught about the sovereign, electing Christ.

Boehme's religious conviction was, basically, that man was not a creature of God, a sinner before God, in the way that Luther, through Augustine, through Paul had believed. Boehme was of the Renaissance, not the Reformation.

Our animadversion on Boehme has been primarily to understand the nature of the principle of inwardness of post-Kantian, viz. natural man. Kroner is himself a brilliant and profound exponent of it, in his amazing belief that the "line" of true inwardness began with Socrates, and was best expressed by Jesus Christ, who was later and appropriately emulated by Augustine, Luther and Kant.

In fact, the genuine Socratic principle of inwardness was, properly speaking, carried on by Plotinus, Renaissance man, and finally, in its climactic form by Kant. It clashes, we posit, with Christ's claim to be the Way, the Truth and the Life. After conversion, Paul challenged it as Jesus had done among the Pharisees, whereafter Augustine again was-to confront it directly as expressed in the "salvation by self-elevation" concept of the Plotinian scale of being. And Luther, after conversion, challenged it once more in its mildly Christianized Plotinian form within the Roman Catholic church. For Luther, the free man of Erasmus was actually a slave to sin, and only in the case of him for whose sins Christ paid the penalty on the cross did there exist true freedom (Luther, On the Bondage of the Will).

b. Descartes vs. Calvin

The absolute contrast of principle between the City of Man and the one of God appeared with particular clarity in the instance of Rene Descartes vs. John Calvin. Descartes, of course, was the typical Renaissance man, whereas Calvin had developed and extended the biblical approach to God rediscovered by Luther. The former stood for the Socratic-Plotinian, the latter, the Augustinian, Pauline principle of inwardness.

The issue (at stake) was that of human certainty. In his book, New Paths of Philosophy (Neue Wege der Philosophie), Fritz Heinemann states that ancient man concerned himself with the cosmos, medieval man with God, and modern man with man himself. Superficially, then, it may be said that both Descartes and Calvin were modern. However, both were finally, also, concerned with man in respect to his environment, thus his relationship to God. Both sought for the actual inwardness of man by ascertaining this peculiar relationship, in other words, not merely the Socratic question of how man may know himself, but also the Platonic one of his true culture, thus ultimately his "salvation." It was a matter of "cultural" philosophy, as well as "humanistic."

Renaissance man aimed at "controlling" nature so as to erect his earthly kingdom [like the Tower of Babel], and Descartes in questing for self-knowledge exemplified this splendidly. Also, Bacon and Galileo Galilei had developed a "method" which projected human control over nature. Many others, notably Descartes constructed a mathematically oriented method, based on the Parmenidean assumption that reality was fully expressible by human conceptualization. But Kroner has emphasized that Galileo, for one, warned that mathematics would "never disclose anything about the true nature of the universe, or even of a stone," although his metaphysically-minded successors generally disregarded the warning and proceeded to hatch their farfetched speculative systems. [e.g., LaRouche] In a sense, one might say that they resorted to ancient cosmology in claiming to have discovered the true nature of existence.

Descartes, Spinoza, and Leibniz, the three outstanding examples of such cosmology, were, nevertheless, modern thinkers indeed, in that they centered their final efforts, not upon nature or the world, but upon man, his niche in the world and also his relationship to God. Descartes launched his from his famous Cogito, a fully anthropocentric principle. Spinoza was basically a mystic for whom knowledge of God was of importance, and yet he was not theocentric, but embraced rather the belief that speculation could bring about man's harmony with the divine being, thus the "end" of all his aspirations and personal longings. Leibniz's whole system was at heart anthropocentric, with man to be the pattern and model of all things, even of the world and God. Any "naturalism" of these three "scientific" metaphysicians was therefore an illusion. In so far as it figured into their systems, it was a tribute to the prevailing fashion of thought during their time, not to the intrinsic or esoteric doctrine of their systems (Speculation and Revelation in the Age of Christian Philosophy, pp. 256-257, The Westminster Press)

To the latter observation from Kroner's work on medieval speculation, we add a quotation from his work on modern speculation and revelation. Descartes, says Kroner, opposed the Roman Catholic Aristotelian doctrine of man as consisting of soul and body. "The Aristotelian doctrine treats the person as it treats other 'substances.' My soul is then conceived in the same manner as the forms of other things; indeed, it is only a special form which is characteristic of man. Descartes is too much of a Christian to accept this theory. I am not a special substantial form; I am, rather, a thinking being and only as such am I in contrast to the whole world of substances and forms. Only thus am I a self and know myself to be myself. I am therefore, precisely speaking, only a thinking thing (res cogitans), that is, a mind or soul (mens sive animus), understanding or reason, terms whose significance was before unknown to me."

Kroner remarks as follows about these words of Descartes: "What is completely new in this definition is the emphasis laid upon the self as not belonging to the world, in so far as I think of the world and thereby of myself as the subject of thinking, whereas the physical things (including my body) are objects of my thinking.

Finally of the utmost importance is this further observation by Kroner: "The Christian inwardness is here interpreted as the unique position of the thinking subject in contrast to the objects thought. No thinker before Descartes brought the principle of modern philosophy, is epistemological subjectivism, so emphatically and definitely to light. In that respect he was the true initiator of philosophy in the modern world."

What Kroner says of Descartes is most enlightening. Descartes has not fully worked out or even been fully true to his basic principle of inwardness. For one thing, it rejects the scholastic notion of form and it points forward to Kant. Man is thus not a thing, but a person. In this respect, he was followed by Spinoza and Leibniz, upon which principle of inwardness they too cast their thoughts.

Unfortunately, argues Kroner, Descartes was not faithful ultimately, to his own principle. He sacrificed his true epistemological inwardness in favor of a metaphysics that would understand ultimate reality. "The modern anthropocentric position was abandoned; instead the pre-Christian cosmocentric principle was revived. Spinoza and Leibniz followed Descartes' lead. Renaissance naturalism marred thus the foundation of modern epistemology. The terms mind, intellect, reason, even self or ego were now understood as parallels to extension, as if they lay on the same plane. The superiority and primacy of the thinking subject in contrast to the objects thought was surrendered" (p. 97). "Kant alone was able to clarify these misunderstandings, and to dissolve the falsity of metaphysical solutions" (p. 98).

Basically, the problem was again that of human freedom, which the metaphysical systems of Descartes, Spinoza, and Leibniz denied. In Descartes' philosophy, "the idea of the individual ego is swallowed up by that of mathematical reason. The desire to justify the validity of science is stronger than the wish to understand the self, as the center of the person" (p. 100). It was Kant who at last recognized the full significance of man's inwardness, not allowing any desire for a metaphysical foundation of science to overshadow the fact that man was a free personality. Says Kroner: "The critical position that Kant finally took originated in part from his protest against the doctrine that man was an automaton, Only thus could Kant save moral responsibility and, indeed, the whole sphere of moral life" (p. 165).

The final contest was thus between Kant and Calvin. Man's true freedom and inwardness were expounded first by Reformation man, whom Calvin represented the best. It was he who, more cogently than Luther isolated man's true inwardness and freedom in terms of the free, self-sufficient act of God in His creation and redemption. Calvin, not Luther, confronted Renaissance man with the call to repentance in the authentic manner of Paul, who had similarly summoned ancient man.

The struggle between the Renaissance city of man of Descartes Spinoza, Leibniz, and Kant, and the Reformation city of God is an all-out one, using the weapons of theology, philosophy, and science. Since the Renaissance and Reformation, it has become even more intensive and extensive than before.

In his mindfulness of man's cultural task, Calvin diametrically opposed Descartes, a fact which Kroner senses somewhat. Kroner says that Calvin spoke merely for those who would make an automaton of man. Yet, while admitting that Luther, as well as Calvin, believed in election, Kroner ignores this fact, and imagines Luther's main thrust to have been rather a type of inwardness akin to that of the mystics and ultimately of Kant. This is consistent with his believing Augustine to form the connecting link between Socratic and Cartesian inwardness.

For Calvin, man was himself free, i.e., free to undertake his cultural task in the name of Christ, which was, basically, whether in theology, philosophy, or science, to challenge apostate man to repentance at every point in the universe. This fact has, of course, been more fully elaborated by his followers than by Calvin himself. For instance Abraham Kuyper wrote a three-volume work under the title Pra Rege, according to which every square inch of ground had to be claimed for Christ as man's Redeemer-King. Thus also D. H. Th Vollenhoven, Herman Dooyeweerd and Hendrik Stoker have presented a methodology of philosophy and of science which is calculated to challenge, at every step of the way, all man-centered cultural efforts.

Yet, from Kroner's point of view, all such endeavor must be discarded in the name of that inwardness of man represented by Socrates, Descartes, and Kant, Considering once again their contrast with Calvin, the following elements come to mind.

Organic is the question of the primum notum, viz., the most basic thing that one may know. Calvin agreed with Descartes that man must start from himself as the object of thought, but with the proviso that no one really contemplated himself properly unless as a creature of God become sinner against God, and redeemed from such rebellion through the historical work of Jesus Christ and the regenerating action within him of the Holy Spirit.

The Greeks of course, had rejected this thought of themselves as a slur on their self-sufficiency, preferring their older belief that they were ultimate not created, and the "God" whose existence they "proved" or "disproved," not Him whose creatures they, in fact, were. Greek autonomous speculation was what Calvin and Luther, like Augustine, had spurned after Christ had appeared to them in Scripture, at which time they world have it no more, nor the Roman Catholicism sprung falsely from it.

Every man, argued Calvin, after Paul, knew inherently that such speculation was an effort to suppress the truth within him, that God was his Creator and that, in all speculation, he seeks by very nature to suppress such knowledge (Romans 1). Surely also, Descartes' view of man consisted basically of this effort to suppress what, deep down in his heart, he knew was really true. No human being can doubt this. Knowledge of God as Creator-Redeemer travels with knowledge of oneself, the two being mutually, immediately involved. Human doubt itself presupposes awareness of the truthful claim of God in Scripture affirming the creatureliness and sinfulness of man against Him. Descartes' own doubt is, therefore, irrefutable evidence of his confirmed desire to exclude the true God from his world of knowledge. He was like the boy described earlier who, having left his father's house, paused and asked himself and others whether perhaps, he even had a father. Christ was, for him, the superfluous man, whom he requested, so to speak, to remove himself kindly so that he might proceed to unfold his world-view without obstruction

Descartes' metaphysics is not, as Kroner contends, inconsistent with his epistemological view of the freedom of man, but rather, it is perfectly consistent. Freedom is self-sufficiency, on which basis he postulated a culture controlled by an abstract principle of continuity according with mathematical law, and an abstract view of discontinuity according with pure contingency. [chance]

Descartes is, then, a later Renaissance man who continued his apostate predecessors' endeavor of attempting to build the "city of man," thus repudiating that of God. If Paul had come to earth and met the Renaissance Descartes, he might well have repeated: "Has not God made foolish the wisdom of this world, for after that the world by wisdom knew not God it pleased God through the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe" (I Cor. 1:9). Even Kroner points out that Descartes' universal swallowed up his individual, thus that he deliberately isolated himself from all relationships in terms of which he alone could identify himself. Man is what he is by virtue of the place and task that God his Creator- Redeemer assigns to him, but Descartes imagined he could reject all this as so much tree bark so as to discover his own "essence" and yet, by his own admission, he found nothing further identifiable after having accomplished his removal of God, creation, and providence. Really, how could he have expected to find anything, having thus destroyed himself? He knew only that he was, not what he was. To groan that I know that I am without knowing anything about what I am is to assert nothing, but rather, to demonstrate the folly, confusion, and guilt of denying the God who has created me, died so as to redeem me, and thus set me truly free.

B. Immanuel Kant and the Principle of Inwardness

Next, in order is a consideration of Immanuel Kant and his own expression of the principle of inwardness, Kroner's own description of Kant's principle shall be presented in the main and, therewith, the present writer's evaluation. Kroner believes that Kant, for the first time, rendered anything like full justice to the aforementioned Socratic principle. The Greek, Socrates, had begun well enough confessing that, having read the natural philosophers, he became discouraged because none had a principle of unity such as would have enabled him to adopt a totality view of life, or do justice to the higher aspects of himself. But then, he had learned from Anaxagoras to explain all of what the natural philosophers had spoken of in terms of a higher unity, that of nous. Thereafter, said Socrates, "I worshipped him as though he had been a God." Yet, one could not discover nous by a study of any of the individual natural elements, viz., start from the bottom to reach the top, but rather, one had to begin with nous and learn to regard natural objects in its light. Nous was that single presupposition by whose light all things of-nature were revealed in their true unity, which was not natural, but, rather, teleological. The objects of nature all pointed toward nous, being in fact unintelligible without it.

nous, (Greek: "mind" or "intellect") in philosophy, the faculty of intellectual apprehension and of intuitive thought. Used in a narrower sense, it is distinguished from discursive thought and applies to the apprehension of eternal intelligible substances and first principles.

Having acknowledged the primacy of the nous, Socrates thus inspired Plato and Aristotle to elaborate a teleological view of all reality. But, when Socrates spoke of attaining to objective reality by knowledge, he was really retiring to that naturalist conceptual position which he had attempted all along to overcome. Plato and Aristotle thus conceived that they were conforming to Socrates' doctrine in offering conceptual, i.e., speculative knowledge, of all of reality, and, in particular, of timeless ultimate reality, but the result was that the individual man found himself swallowed up in the universal realm of changeless being Christianity, particularly the "Protestant consciousness," developed superbly the idea of true inwardness. Luther's final appeal against the speculation of the Romanist doctrinal system was "directed to the internal consciousness of man." He simply did not believe in any system of speculative doctrine, but rather, in revelation, having been influenced in this realm in part by Meister Eckhart, the medieval mystic (Speculation and Revelation in Christian Philosophy, (p. 236). And here lies the connecting link between modern philosophy and Protestant theology (p. 23). Eckhart was, namely, the first outspoken subjectivistic, or existential mystic in the history of philosophy. In his sermons, he overtly presented his individual experience as that which mattered most in the search for truth, as in the practice of religious devotion. ... Only since the time of Eckhart have the terms "mystic" and "mysticism." in fact assumed the meaning of an individual inner experience which needs no logical demonstration, but, rather, withstands it, being convincing and infectious imply because it is not logically demonstrable, but immediately impressive and emotionally persuasive. ... "Eckhart was convinced that God can be experienced only if the soul abandons all outer support, be it that of historical narrative or of scientific theory, although Biblical imagery and metaphysical terminology may be used in order to express what is truly inexpressible. He went even farther. He believed that this inward experience is superior in rank, certainty, and truth to any merely learned content of faith or any cognitive principle of thought. Again and again he warns his hearers that they must turn into their innermost center, into the 'castle' of their soul, into the 'darkness' of the inner light, to see God and to be united with him. He speaks often about his 'discoveries' which reveal the secret meaning of things divine. Only by an intense inner concentration upon the voices that sound within the soul can man find the source of his, and of all, life: being as such, the absolute mind, the ultimate goodness, the divine simplicity. This inner treasure gives to the soul its nobility, its power, its uniqueness. Here faith should rest. Eckhart uses metaphysical concepts or religious images only to awake this sense of utter urgency and need in the believer. If he succeeds in this inner concentration, the believer may finally experience the birth of Christ in his own breast" (p. 228).

Was it then, we muse, in the spirit of Meister Eckhart that perchance, Montaigne had written: "I have my own laws and court to judge me, and I go to them more than anywhere else"? Probably it was, but Kroner disagrees. Speaking of this same statement of Montaigne's, he says: "A stronger contrast to the Christian conscience and also to that of the ancients can hardly be imagined. Since he felt himself the center of the world, he did not know repentance." (p. 31). "Montaigne has no God to pray to," says Kroner. And yet, did Meister Eckhart? Why was not Montaigne's inwardness, as well as Meister Eckhart's, a forerunner of Kantian inwardness?

Already noted has been Kroner's view of Descartes as a true "initiator of philosophy in the modern world," because he set himself up, in distinction from the world, as the starting point of any intelligible interpretation of human experience (p. 88). Finally, Kroner speaks of Blaise Pascal, as of one who prefigured Kant even more so than had Descartes. Namely, after asserting his spirit of inwardness, Descartes had fallen back upon speculative metaphysics but Pascal did not. Therefore, "he directly anticipated Kant" (p. 105).

It is apparent from the evidence that, in Kroner's estimation Kant did greater justice to the idea of inwardness than had any man before him, namely those highest spiritual ideas that man senses within himself as a member of the human race. True inwardness requires the rejection of every form of externalism, which Socrates had understood most clearly. The idea of revelation itself was not wrong if taken to mean that the higher aspect of human personality must enlighten and quicken the lower. Nature cannot be revelational of God as its creator since, if we regard it in that fashion, it will be unintelligible to us. The Bible cannot contain an absolute authoritative revelation of Christ as the Son of God and of man who died in the place of "sinful" men and wrought righteousness for them and within them at a particular time in history.

Kant envisioned all this better than any one before him. Socrates had relapsed into speculation, and Augustine also, although claiming to follow revelation: he interpreted his revelation conceptually, which was, to all intents, the same as speculation. In fact, any intellectually stated system of doctrine, says Kroner, is, in effect, the same as speculation.

Thus, even Luther fell back upon it when he accepted the Bible as containing conceptually stable, reliable truths.

But Kant caused us to overcome all this, to perceive the message of Christianity for what it was, namely, the message of Jesus Christ as the Nous, which is within all, above all, and going before all as we construct our city of man.

In describing Kant's life and world view (Weltanschauung), Kroner speaks of his ethical dualism, ethical subjectivism, ethical voluntarism, and ethical phenomenalism. His ethical dualism, Kroner says, indicated the fact that man's relation to his fellow man and to his God cannot be expressed conceptually, because God has no essence intellectually stable by either God or man. Neither is man's nature intellectually stable by either God or man. God's nature is will, as is also man's. When we say this, then we are, to be sure, using concepts. There is no escape! Are we then, after all, back to the level of intellectualism? Not at all. We must use concepts for purposes of personal communication, but we think of the systems of truth that we construct by means of them as being indicators of what is wholly beyond them. The ethical relationships among men and the relationship between God and man is primary and the intellectual one is secondary, thus subordinate to the ethical.

By saying this, Kant restricts science and, in so doing, founds it. Science is the result of the conceptualizing activity of man with respect to the material presented to him in the realm of space and time, and therefore involves no ethical relationships. There is an absolute antithesis between the ethical relationships among persons and the quite impersonal ones of persons to things.

The trouble with all philosophies before him had been, Kant claimed, that they made not this contrast, therefore, they did not place the realm of ethics, of personal relationships, above that of science, viz., impersonal relationships.

Therefore, he introduced his "Copernican Revolution," which involved subject rather than object as primary in man's interpreting himself and the world. Kroner calls this "ethical subjectivism," and it was of course immediately involved in his ethical dualism. The subject knew itself not as product of a process of intellection, but as the presupposition of the very possibility of such intellection and moreover, since the subject was will and not intellect, the ethical and the ethical subjective involved ethical voluntarism. Then, finally, all three involved ethical phenomenalism. When the ethical and voluntaristic subject had been properly distinguished from, and set above, the world of nature, then it could reveal itself in nature, viz., after the nous had first been set over against terms of which nature acquired real significance.

It was thus that Kant both restricted and founded science, and thereby at the same time "made room for religion." But the religion for which he "made room" was not the historic Christian one, there being no room in it for Jesus Christ as the One from whom and to whom are all things. To be sure, there was room in it for a Christ from whom, through whom, and to whom were all things, and this was the Christ-Event of more recent theology for which Kant "made room," namely, "the projection into the realm of the unknown" which has united many currents of modern theology. Kant's man was utterly independent of the Creator-Redeemer man of Scripture. If there was anything central to the historic Christian, viz., the historic Protestant religion, it was that it leaned entirely on the Christ who, as eternal Son of God, died for sinners on the cross and thereby made atonement for them at a specific date in history. But to have held such an idea was, according to Kant, to embrace the intolerable, both intellectually and morally, to fall back upon naturalism, upon speculation rather than revelation, to reduce persons to things, to interpret higher spiritual realities of the human person in terms of the impersonal, to seek the living among the dead, to reduce Christ Himself to a conglomeration of mutually contradictory concepts, to undermine science and petrify religion; in short, to find the absolute in the relative, topple God, the "wholly-other" who dwells in the realm of the ineffable, and force him to "live" in the realm of science where soon he will expire.

How might we, then, ask people to repent of sin and turn unto Christ if our Christ, if our Christ is measurable by the concepts of finite man? In Kant's thought, it was therefore not only the fundamentalist, but also the one who expressed his faith in the worlds and concepts of any of Protestant Confessions who had to be called to conversion to a higher, more spiritual view of things.

Here it is again to be surmised what Paul would now say if he could read Kant's works and or Kroner's exposition of them. No doubt he'd repeat what he once said to the Corinthians. Kant was trying to save human predication, under such conditions that, on the one hand, there could have been none on the basis of the empiricism of Locke, Berkeley, and Hume, since, as Hume affirmed, human concepts were but faint replicas of his percepts, thus implying all to be pure contingency; and, that, on the other hand, there could have been none on the basis of the rationalism of Spinoza or Leibniz either, since the order and connection of facts are all to be static. One could not individuate by complete description, thus neither empiricism nor rationalism could explain how learning by experience was possible.

Therefore, how was synthetic knowledge a priori possible, and the Meno problem to be solved? Parmenides and Heraclitus could not, neither had any one since their day by an intermingling of methods.

So, now how could Kant expect to do it? Did he imagine that his "Copernican Revolution" would help? How could it? It wasn't Copernican at all. No one could really have gone farther in declaring ultimacy and originality than Socrates himself did, such that absolutely nothing specifically enunciated by God could possibly have interested him.

True, Kant did articulate more fully than any predecessor how God could be kept from oppressively directing man's attention to Himself by striving to assure his own comfort and security as well as his fellow man's in his redoubt of hypothetical self-sufficiency by asserting God's voice to be but an echo of men's. Did they formerly believe nature conversed with them of God? Were there such things as laws, natural or moral, which they must obey, since in doing so they were obeying God? Kant assured them that all was mythology and metaphor, the "laws" of nature being what they were because man's own mind had intruded its categories on the stuff of experience. Did Moses God's servant, once receive the moral law from the Sovereign Himself? No, said Kant, do not fear, that law is what it is because, in your own sovereign freedom and wisdom, you have subjected yourself to it.

However, Kant's total effort was meaningless or worse unless he could prove the inherent intelligibility of his inwardness principle, and this he could not do until he was able to show that man was what Christianity had already affirmed God to be, namely, the internally self-complete, self-referential being whose beneficent omnipotence controls, and omniscient wisdom directs, the world of men and things. [Man's assumed independence from God is always at odds with the truly sovereign God.]

As it is, Kant's supposedly self-sufficient man was torn asunder moment by moment by the interaction of the impersonal forces of pure contingency and fate. Kantian freedom was freedom from God, the Creator-Redeemer of men. But it is his conscience, autonomous man then will insist, which requires him to be free in this sense of the term. Yet, I ask, where is this freedom to be found? Certainly not in pure contingency by itself, although Kant says so; neither in abstract rationality, although he again says so. Is it, then, to be found by contemplating these as correlative to each other? But many before him had already imagined it there. Thus, all that was left was to make abstract rationality more formal, and abstract contingency more contingent, than had his rationalist and irrationalist predecessors; but, of course, all this to none effect also. He did not, he could not, solve his predecessors' problem because apostate man's problematics is invariably false and insoluble.

Since the advent of Christ, apostate man has indeed tried untiringly, and always in vain, to find a foundation for preventing Christ's call to repentance and salvation from reaching his ears. A man may rebel against the rules of conduct issued by the captain of an ocean steamer, and he may even jump off and attempt deflecting the steamer's course, to prevent it from reaching its destination. But who will fail, he or the captain? Or, again, he may set fire to the waste-basket in his room, hopefully to incinerate the captain, and if successful, both he and the captain would burn to death or drown. Who is the captain in this case? It is the self-attesting Christ of Scripture, he it is who has set before him, set in motion, the forces that will lead the steamer to his own chosen destination.

He offers mutineers aboard his over ship the chance to repent and to join him in his inevitable victory over evil, and, if they refuse, doing all in their power to keep the captain from reaching this destination, they will reap only eternal death for their folly.

He offers the mutineers aboard his ship the chance to repent and to join him in his inevitable victory over evil, and, if they refuse, doing all in their power to keep the captain from reaching his destination, they will reap only eternal death for their folly.

Thus, human predication has been saved by Christ, not by Kant. 87

C. Post-Kantian Man Replies

Finally, the answer must be presented, which post-Kantian man returns to Jesus' question: "Who do you say that I am?" Of course, there will be always those who seem to have nothing at all to reply; they simply "have never heard of him." Christ is, to them, the unknown one. However, we have learned from what has preceded that even to say absolutely nothing is to confess, in effect, that Christ is not the Way, the Truth and the Life. As the One from Whom through Whom, and to Whom all things exist, He is present to all men, calling them to repentance from their sin of breaking God's covenant made with them through Adam.

Then, there are many who have heard of Him and what He claims to have done for men in Palestine, but who reply simply that they do not need Him, being quite able to understand themselves and their cultural efforts at best without Him. To them, Christ is the superfluous man.

Again, there are those who will insist that He is a hindrance to their self-expression and their cultural aims. Christ is, to them, the unwanted man.

1. The Post-Kantian Theologian Karl Barth Replies

It is at the doorstep of such men as have never heard of, have no need of, and do not want Christ that post-Kantian Christianity arrives with its message of salvation through its own Christ. Whether or not you have heard of Him, or think you need or want Him, He is the one in whom you actually live, move, and have your being. [Acts 17:28] You are able to know yourself only because you participate in His knowledge. The older Cartesian Faux pas was that Descartes presumed to know himself apart from Christ, whereas Calvin was correct to say that knowledge of God and of Christ was presupposed in self-knowledge, and to desire no speculation on God's essence apart from His revelation to men in Christ. But of course, Calvin, and Luther too, were mistaken to "make" the salvation of men depend on what they alleged to have been a once-and-for-all finished work of atonement within the space-time world on their behalf. A Christ who had done that would not be the genuine item any more than the God who had sent Him. The actual Christ is, in fact, the Event of salvation of all men, for Kant has shown us how correctly to state and apply the Parmenidean principle of the adequacy of thought and being in our own day, that "thinking" is "acting," and "being" is "Event." Accordingly acting is Event.

Paul realized all of this when he said that, knowing God, men had yet not kept Him in remembrance. But no one can help but know the Christ-Event, since to know at all is to know in Christ; all of reality, in fact, is the Christ-Event.

By extension, Christ is the real Man, all other men being His fellow men (Mitmenschen Jesu).

1Cor2:1-15

And I, when I came to you, brothers, did not come proclaiming to you the testimony of God with lofty speech or wisdom. ² For I decided to know nothing among you except Jesus Christ and him crucified. ³ And I was with you in weakness and in fear and much trembling, ⁴ and my speech and my message were not in plausible words of wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power, ⁵ so that your faith might not rest in the wisdom of men but in the power of God.

Wisdom from the Spirit

⁶ Yet among the mature we do impart wisdom, although it is not a wisdom of this age or of the rulers of this age, who are doomed to pass away. ⁷ But we impart a secret and hidden wisdom of God, which

God decreed before the ages for our glory. ⁸ None of the rulers of this age understood this, for if they had, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. ⁹ But, as it is written,

“What no eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man imagined,
what God has prepared for those who love him” —

¹⁰ these things God has revealed to us through the Spirit. For the Spirit searches everything, even the depths of God. ¹¹ For who knows a person's thoughts except the spirit of that person, which is in him? So also no one comprehends the thoughts of God except the Spirit of God. ¹² Now we have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit who is from God, that we might understand the things freely given us by God. ¹³ And we impart this in words not taught by human wisdom but taught by the Spirit, interpreting spiritual truths to those who are spiritual. ¹⁴ The natural person does not accept the things of the Spirit of God, for they are folly to him, and he is not able to understand them because they are spiritually discerned. ¹⁵ The spiritual person judges all things, but is himself to be judged by no one. ¹⁶ “For who has understood the mind of the Lord so as to instruct him?” But we have the mind of Christ.

⁵ Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own eyes.

The excerpt from his lecture starting at minute 43:13 to 48.11

So how are we to speak to them if there's no neutrality, no place where our ultimate commitments don't come into play as they always do both for believers and unbelievers. We do have common ground but at the level of being, not at knowing. Our common ground is ontological, which is to say, everywhere. This is our Father's world for all alike. Everybody lives in this world that God has made. For believers, we have the mind of Christ; and that conditions how we see everything in the world – verses 12 and 13, especially 15. And this sheds light on the meaning of verse 2. Notice back in verse 2, Paul says, I have decided to know nothing among you except Jesus Christ and him crucified. That can sound like a very odd sort of statement – like uh, some kind of gnostic super-spiritual, platonic statement. If you come up to him and say you know, My Aunt Sadie has cancer, Uncle cousin Bill just had stroke OH!!!! I don't want to hear about that!!! Is that what that means? You gotta come to passages and wrestle...well, what, what does this mean? What does this mean? And the resolve to know nothing but Christ and him crucified is a determination...it is a kind of narrowing here. It a narrowing, it's a narrowing...it's almost like a single lens focus, single lens focus. And your gonna say, I know nothing but Christ and him crucified and it's a determination to know everything through that lens through which you view all reality. You see everything through the lens of Christ and him crucified. That's a synecdoche, not the city in New York, but a part of speech, a part for the whole. So, Christ and him crucified is speaking about the person and work of Christ. And you're determined – Paul is resolved to see everything through that lens. Everything will be seen through that lens. Which is a proper spiritual, a not merely natural lens.

Well, how do you talk to an unbeliever since they are lacking such a spiritual lens? And Greg [Bahnsen] offered great insight here – and I wish I had more time on this – but his comments on Proverbs 26:4 & 5 are really helpful. Because you have that strange thing there – cheek to jowl, you know, uh, Answer a fool according to his folly. Answer not a fool according to his folly. And you have to, and it's conditioned, ah, on the one hand, lest he be wise in his own eyes, lest you be like him. And Greg applies this, ah, verse 4, Answer not a fool according to his folly lest you be like him – this means don't answer a fool according to his naturalistic methods of empiricism or rationalism. You don't try to prove the resurrection or anything to him on naturalistic terms. Rather you furnish him with a biblical answer to his objections. You could say something like this: I know that you don't see things as I do as a Christian, but this is how we as Christians see things. And we believe what we do, not based on naturalistic assumptions that can't account for themselves, but the revelation of God, the God who is there; we see according to truth. So come let us reason together on such biblical grounds. Again, I know you're saying, I don't believe that and so forth, ah, but you're saying for the sake of argument, let me tell you what the Christian answer is. Because, then I'll come over to your world, verse 5, and look and see and make sure I understand where you're really coming from and I'll stand in your worldview and say, uh, wait a minute, this doesn't seem consistent; this doesn't seem coherent. This doesn't seem to quite make sense. And here's what's not happening. I'm not saying there's a neutral zone; I really need a chalkboard, white board for this... there's not a neutral zone here into which I'm saying, You give up your presuppositions, unbelieving friend, and I'll give up my presuppositions and will go into the neutral zone. That sounds like an episode of Star Trek or something, to me...you know the good Kirk and the bad Kirk... But we'll both go into the neutral zone all of which is just a fantasy; this thing doesn't exist. Nobody's giving up their presuppositions. I'm not asking you to give up your presuppositions, because you would be converted if you did!!! If you're really giving up your presuppositions, if you're adopting Christian ones, it because God's spirit has worked in you and you're converted! I can't do that in you. But I am saying, listen; this is how I reason on this as a Christian. And let me come over and figure out how you would...and so we're not playing a game and we're not sprinting to a finish line to get them to pray a prayer and say, You're ok now. You prayed the sinner's prayer; go out there and, you know, go to church sometime maybe – uh, something like that. Ya know, that's not what we're doing here. We're really seriously engaging people. Paul says, I plant, another waters, God gives the increase. It's always only and ever God who gives the increase. That's what this whole approach recognizes, the utter need for the work of the Spirit of God.

Calvinism Not Against Common Sense
 SECT. III.

The reasons why some think it contrary to common Sense, to suppose those things which are necessary to be worthy of either Praise or Blame.

It is abundantly affirmed and urged by Arminian writers, that it is contrary to common Sense, and the natural notions and apprehensions of mankind, to suppose otherwise than that necessity (making no distinction between natural and moral necessity) is inconsistent, with Virtue and Vice, Praise and Blame, Reward and Punishment. And their arguments from hence have been greatly triumphed in; and have been not a little perplexing to many, who have been friendly to the truth, as clearly revealed in the Holy Scriptures: it has seemed to them indeed difficult, to reconcile Calvinistic doctrines with the notions men commonly have of justice and equity. And the true reasons of it seem to be the following:

I. It is indeed a very plain dictate of common Sense, that natural necessity is wholly inconsistent with just Praise or Blame. If men do things which in themselves are very good, fit to be brought to pass, and attended with very happy effects, properly against their Wills; or do them from a necessity that is without their Wills, or with which their Wills have no concern or connexion; then it is a plain dictate of common Sense, that such doings are none of their virtue, nor have they any moral good in them; and that the persons are not worthy to be rewarded or praised; or at all esteemed, honoured, or loved on that account. And, on the other hand, that if, from like necessity, they do those things which in themselves are very unhappy and pernicious, and do them because they cannot help it; the necessity is such, that it is all one whether they will them, or no; and the reason why they are done, is from necessity only, and not from their Wills; it is a very plain dictate of common Sense, that they are not at all to blame; there is no vice, fault, or moral evil at all in the effect done; nor are they, who are thus necessitated, in any wise worthy to be punished, hated, or in the least disrespected, on that account.

In like manner, if things in themselves good and desirable are absolutely impossible, with a natural impossibility, the universal reason of mankind teaches, that this wholly and perfectly excuses persons in their not doing them.

And it is also a plain dictate of common Sense, that if the doing things, in themselves good, or avoiding things in themselves evil, is not absolutely impossible, with such a natural impossibility, but very difficult, with a natural difficulty; that is, a difficulty prior to, and not at all consisting in, Will and inclination itself, and which would remain the same, let the inclination be what it will; then a person's neglect or omission is excused in some measure, though not wholly; his sin is less aggravated, than if the thing to be done were easy. And if instead of difficulty and hindrance, there be a contrary natural propensity in the state of things, to the thing to be done, or effect to be brought to pass, abstracted from any consideration of the inclination of the heart; though the propensity be not so great as to amount to a natural necessity; yet being some approach to it, so that the doing of the good thing be very much from this natural tendency in the state of things, and but little from a good inclination; then it is a dictate of common Sense, that there is so much the less virtue in what is done; and so it is less praiseworthy and rewardable. The reason is easy, viz. because such a natural propensity or tendency is an approach to natural necessity; and the greater the propensity, still so much the nearer is the approach to necessity. And, therefore, as natural necessity takes away or shuts out all virtue, so this propensity approaches to an abolition of virtue; that is, it diminishes it. And, on the other hand, natural difficulty, in the state of things, is an approach to natural impossibility. And as the latter, when it is complete and absolute, wholly takes away Blame; so such difficulty takes away some Blame, or diminishes Blame; and makes the thing done to be less worthy of punishment.

II. Men, in their first use of such phrases as these, must, cannot, cannot help it, cannot avoid it, necessary, unable, impossible, unavoidable, irresistible, &c., use them to signify a necessity of constraint or restraint, a natural necessity or impossibility; or some necessity that the Will has nothing to do in; which may be, whether men will or no; and which may be supposed to be just the same, let men's inclinations and desires be what they will. Such kind of terms, in their original use, I suppose among all nations, are relative; carrying in their signification (as was before observed) a reference or respect to some contrary Will, desire, or endeavour, which, it is supposed, is, or may be, in the case. All men find, and begin to find in early childhood, that there are innumerable things that cannot be done, which they desire to do; and innumerable things, which they are averse to, that must be, they cannot avoid them, they will be, whether they choose them or no. It is to express this necessity, which men so soon and so often find, and which so greatly and early affects them in innumerable cases, that such terms and phrases are first formed; and it is to signify such a necessity, that they are first used, and that they are most constantly used, in the common affairs of life; and not to signify any such metaphysical, speculative, and abstract notion, as that connexion in the nature or course of things, which is between the subject and predicative of a proposition, and which is the foundation of the certain truth of that proposition; to signify which, they who employ themselves in philosophical inquiries into the first origin and metaphysical relations and dependencies of things, have borrowed these terms, for want of others. But we grow up from our cradles in a use of such terms and phrases entirely different from this, and carrying a sense exceeding diverse from that in which they are commonly used in the controversy between Arminians and Calvinists. And it being, as was said before, a dictate of the universal sense of mankind, evident to us as soon as we begin to think, that the necessity signified by these terms, in the sense in which we first learn them, does excuse persons, and free them from all Fault or Blame; hence our idea of excusableness or faultlessness is tied to these terms and phrases by a strong habit, which is begun in childhood, as soon as we begin to speak, and grows up with us, and is strengthened by constant use and custom, the connexion growing stronger and stronger.

The habitual connexion, which is in men's minds between Blamelessness and those forementioned terms, must, cannot, unable, necessary, impossible, unavoidable, &c. becomes very strong, because, as soon as ever men begin to use reason and speech, they have occasion to excuse themselves, from the natural necessity signified by these terms, in numerous instances.—I cannot do it—I could not help it.—And all mankind have constant and daily occasion to use such phrases in this sense, to excuse themselves and others, in almost all the concerns of life, with respect to disappointments, and things that happen, which concern and affect ourselves and others, that are hurtful, or disagreeable to us or them, or things desirable, that we or others fail to obtain.

That our being accustomed to a union of different ideas, from early childhood, makes the habitual connexion exceeding strong, as though such connexion were owing to nature, is manifest in innumerable instances. It is altogether by such an habitual connexion of ideas, that men judge of the bigness or distance of the objects of sight, from their appearance. Thus it is owing to such a connexion early established, and growing up with a person, that he judges a mountain, which he sees at ten miles distance, to be bigger than his nose, or further off than the end of it. Having been used so long to join a considerable distance and magnitude with such an appearance, men imagine it is by a dictate of natural sense: whereas, it would be quite otherwise with one that had his eyes newly opened, who had been born blind: he would have the same visible appearance, but natural sense would dictate no such thing, concerning the magnitude or distance of what appeared.

III. When men, after they had been so habituated to connect ideas of Innocency or Blamelessness with such terms, that the union seems to be the effect of mere nature, come to hear the same terms used, and learn to use them in the forementioned new and metaphysical sense, to signify quite another sort of necessity, which has no such kind of relation to a contrary supposable Will and endeavour; the notation of plain and manifest Blamelessness, by this means, is, by a strong prejudice, insensibly and unwarily transferred to a case to which it by no means belongs: the change of the use of the terms, to a signification which is very diverse, not being taken notice of, or adverted to. And there are several reasons why it is not.

I. The terms, as used by philosophers, are not very distinct and clear in their meaning: few use them in a fixed determined sense. On the contrary, their meaning is very vague and confused. Which commonly happens to the words used to signify things intellectual and moral, and to express what Mr. Locke calls mixt modes. If men had a clear and distinct understanding of what is intended by these metaphysical terms, they would be able more easily to compare them with their original and common sense; and so would not be so easily led into delusion by words of this sort.

2. The change of the signification of the terms is the more insensible, because the things signified, though indeed very different, yet do in some generals agree. In necessity, that which is vulgarly so called, there is a strong connexion between the thing said to be necessary, and some thing antecedent to it, in the order of nature; so there is also a philosophical necessity. And though in both kinds of necessity, the connexion cannot be called by that name, with relation to an opposite will or endeavour, to which it is superior; which is the case in vulgar necessity; yet in both, the connexion is prior to Will and endeavour, and so, in some respect, superior. In both kinds of necessity, there is a foundation for some certainty of the proposition, that affirms the event.—The terms used being the same, and the things signified agreeing in these and some other general circumstances; and the expressions as used by philosophers being not well defined, and so of obscure and loose signification; hence persons are not aware of the great difference; and the notions of innocence or faultiness, which were so strongly associated with them, and were strictly united in their minds, ever since they can remember, remain united with them still, as if the union were altogether natural and necessary; and they that go about to make a separation, seem to them to do great violence even to nature itself.

IV. Another reason why it appears difficult to reconcile it with reason, that men should be blamed for that which is necessary, with a moral necessity, (which, as was observed before, is a species of philosophical necessity) is, that for want of due consideration, men inwardly entertain that apprehension, that this necessity may be against men's Wills and sincere endeavors. They go away with that notion, that men may truly will, and wish, and strive, that it may be otherwise; but that invincible necessity stands in the way. And many think thus concerning themselves: some wicked men think they wish that they were good, that they love God and holiness; but yet do not find that their wishes produce the effect.—The reasons why men think so, are as follow:

1. They find what may be called an indirect willingness to have a better Will, in the manner before observed. For it is impossible, and a contradiction to suppose the Will to be directly and properly against itself. And they do not consider that this indirect willingness is entirely a different thing from properly willing what is the duty and virtue required; and that there is no virtue in that sort of willingness which they have. They do not consider, that the volitions, which a wicked man may have that he loved God, are no acts of the Will at all against the moral evil of not loving God; but only some disagreeable consequences. But the making of the requisite distinction requires more care of reflection and thought, than most men are used to. And men, through a prejudice in their own favour, are disposed to think well of their own desires and dispositions, and to account them good and virtuous, though their respect to virtue be only indirect and remote, and it is nothing at all that is virtuous that truly excites or terminates their inclinations.

2. Another thing that insensibly leads and beguiles men into a supposition that this moral necessity or impossibility is, or may be, against men's Wills and true endeavors, is the derivation of the terms often used to express it. Such words for instance, as unable, unavoidable, impossible, irresistible; which carry a plain reference to a supposable power exerted, endeavors used, resistance made, in opposition to the necessity: and the persons that hear them, not considering, nor suspecting, but that they are used in their proper sense; that sense being therefore understood, there does naturally, and as it were necessarily, arise in their minds a supposition, that it may be so indeed, that true desires and endeavors may take place, but that invincible necessity stands in the way, and renders them vain and to no effect.

V. Another thing which makes persons more ready to suppose it to be contrary to reason, that men should be exposed to the punishments threatened to sin, for doing those things which are morally necessary, or not doing those things morally impossible, is, that imagination strengthens the argument, and adds greatly to the power and influence of the seeming reasons against it, from the greatness of that punishment. To allow that they may be justly exposed to a small punishment, would not be so difficult. Whereas, if there were any good reason in the case, if it were truly a dictate of reason, that such necessity was inconsistent with faultiness, or just punishment, the demonstration would be equally certain with respect to a small punishment, or any punishment at all, as a very great one: but it is not equally easy to the imagination. They that argue against the justice of damning men for those things that are thus necessary, seem to make their argument the stronger, by setting forth the greatness of the punishment in strong expressions:—“That a man should be cast into eternal burnings, that he should be made to fry in hell to all eternity, for those things which he had no power to avoid, and was under a fatal, unfrustrable, invincible necessity of doing,” &c.

Sect. IV

It is agreeable to common sense, and the natural notions of mankind, to suppose moral Necessity In be consistent with Praise and Blame, Reward and Punishment.

Whether the reasons, that have been given, why it appears difficult to some persons, to reconcile with common sense the praising or blaming, rewarding or punishing, those things which are morally necessary, are thought satisfactory, or not; yet it most evidently appears, by the following things, that if this matter be rightly understood, setting aside all delusion arising from the impropriety and ambiguity of terms, this is not at all inconsistent with the natural apprehensions of mankind, and that sense of things which is found every where in the common people; who are furthest from having their thoughts perverted from their natural channel, by metaphysical and philosophical subtleties; but, on the contrary, altogether agreeable to, and the very voice and dictate of, this natural and vulgar sense.

I. This will appear, if we consider what the vulgar notion of blameworthiness is. The idea which the common people, through all ages and nations, have of faultiness, I suppose to be plainly this; a person being or doing wrong, with his own will and pleasure; containing these two things: 1. His doing wrong, when he does as he pleases. 2. His pleasure being wrong. Or, in other words, perhaps more intelligibly expressing their notion; a person having his heart wrong, and doing wrong from his heart. And this is the sum total of the matter.

The common people do not ascend up in their reflections and abstractions to the metaphysical sources, relations, and dependences of things, in order to form their notion of faultiness or blameworthiness. They do not wait till they have decided by their refinings, what first determines the Will; whether it be determined by something extrinsic, or intrinsic; whether volition determines volition, or whether the understanding determines the Will; whether there be any such tiling as metaphysicians mean by contingency (if they have any meaning); whether there be a sort of a strange unaccountable sovereignty in the Will, in the exercise of which, by its own sovereign acts, it brings to pass all its own sovereign acts. They do not take any part of their notion of Fault or Blame from the resolution of any such questions. If this were the case, there are multitudes, yea the far greater part of mankind, nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand, would live and die, without having any such notion, as that of Fault, ever entering into their heads, or without so much as once having any conception that any body was to be either blamed or commended for any thing. If this were the case, it would be a long time before men came to have such notions. Whereas it is manifest, they are in fact some of the first notions that appear in children; who discover, as soon as they can think, or speak, or act at all as rational creatures, a sense of desert. And, certainly, in forming their notion of it, they make no use of metaphysics. All the ground they go upon, consists in these two things: experience and a Natural sensation of a certain fitness or agreeableness, which there is in uniting such moral evil as is above described, viz. a being or doing wrong with the Will, and resentment in others, and pain inflicted on the person in whom this moral evil is. Which natural sense is what we call by the name of conscience.

It is true, the common people and children, in their notion of any faulty act or deed, of any person, do suppose that it is the person's own act and deed. But this is all that belongs to what they understand by a thing being a person's own deed or action; even that it is something done by him of choice. That some exercise or motion should begin of itself, does not belong to their notion of an action, or doing. If so, it would belong to their notion of it, that it is the cause of its own beginning: and that is as much as to say, that it is before it begins to be. Nor is their notion of an action some motion or exercise, that begins accidentally, without any cause or reason; for that is contrary to one of the prime dictates of common sense, namely, that every thing that begins to be, has some cause or reason why it is.

The common people, in their notion of a faulty or praiseworthy work done by any one, do suppose, that the man does it in the exercise of liberty. But then their notion of liberty is only a person having opportunity of doing as he pleases. They have no notion of liberty consisting in the Will first acting, and so causing its own acts; determining, and so causing its own determinations; or choosing, and so causing its own choice. Such a notion of liberty is what none have, but those that have darkened their own minds with confused metaphysical speculation, and abstruse and ambiguous terms. If a man is not restrained from acting as his Will determines, or constrained to act otherwise; then he has liberty, according to common notions of liberty, without taking into the idea that grand contradiction of all, the determinations of a man's free Will being the effects of the determinations of his free Will.—Nor have men commonly any notion of freedom consisting in indifference. For if so, then it would be agreeable to their notion, that the greater indifference men act with, the more freedom they act with; whereas, the reverse is true. He that in acting proceeds with the fullest inclination, does what he does with the greatest freedom, according to common sense. And so far is it from being agreeable to common sense, that such liberty as consists in indifference is requisite to Praise or Blame, that, on the contrary, the dictate of every man's natural sense through the world is, that the further he is from being indifferent in his acting good or evil, and the more he does either with full and strong inclination, the more is he esteemed or abhorred, commended or condemned.

II. If it were inconsistent with the common sense of mankind, that men should be either blamed or commended in any volitions, in case of moral Necessity or impossibility; then it would surely also be agreeable to the same sense and reason of mankind, that the nearer the case approaches to such a moral Necessity or impossibility—either through a strong antecedent moral propensity, on the one hand, ¹⁴⁰ or a great antecedent opposition and difficulty, on the other—the nearer does it approach to a person being neither blamable nor commendable: so that acts exerted with such preceding propensity, would be worthy of proportionably less Praise; and when omitted, the act being attended with such difficulty, the omission would be worthy of the less Blame. It is so, as was observed before, with natural Necessity and impossibility, propensity and difficulty: as it is a plain dictate of the sense of all mankind, that natural Necessity and impossibility take away all Blame and Praise; and therefore, that the nearer the approach is to these, through previous propensity or difficulty, so Praise and Blame are proportionally diminished. And if it were as much a dictate of common sense, that moral Necessity of doing, or impossibility of avoiding, takes away all Praise and Blame, as that natural Necessity or impossibility does; then, by a perfect parity of reason, it would be as much the dictate of common sense, that an approach of moral Necessity of doing, or impossibility of avoiding, diminishes Praise and Blame, as that an approach to natural Necessity and impossibility does so. It is equally the voice of common sense, that persons are excusable in part, in neglecting things difficult against their Wills, as that they are excusable wholly in neglecting things impossible against their Wills. And if it made no difference, whether the impossibility were natural and against the Will, or moral, lying in the Will, with regard to excusableness; so neither would it make any difference, whether the difficulty, or approach to Necessity, be natural, against the Will, or moral, lying in the propensity of the Will.

But it is apparent, that the reverse of these things is true. If there be an approach to a moral Necessity in a man's exertion of good acts of Will, they being the exercise of a strong propensity to good, and a very powerful love to virtue; it is so far from being the dictate of common sense, that he is less virtuous, and the less to be esteemed, loved, and praised; that it is agreeable to the natural notions of all mankind, that he is so much the better man, worthy of greater respect, and higher commendation. And the stronger the inclination is, and the nearer it approaches to Necessity in that respect; or to impossibility of neglecting the virtuous act, or of doing a vicious one; still the more virtuous, and worthy of higher commendation. And, on the other hand, if a man exerts evil acts of mind; as, for instance, acts of pride or malice from a rooted and strong habit or principle of haughtiness and maliciousness, and a violent propensity of heart to such acts; according to the natural sense of men, he is so far from being the less hateful and blamable on that account, that he is so much the more worthy to be detested and condemned, by all that observe him.

Moreover, it is manifest that it is no part of the notion, which mankind commonly have of a blamable or praiseworthy act of the Will, that it is an act which is not determined by an antecedent bias or motive, but by the sovereign power of the Will itself; because, if so, the greater hand such causes have in determining any acts of the Will, so much the less virtuous or vicious would they be accounted; and the less hand, the more virtuous or vicious. Whereas, the reverse is true; men do not think a good act to be the less praiseworthy, for the agent being much determined in it by a good inclination or a good motive, but the more. And if good inclination, or motive, has but little influence in determining the agent, they do not think his act so much the more virtuous, but the less. And so concerning evil acts, which are determined by evil motives or inclinations.

Yea, if it be supposed, that good or evil dispositions are implanted in the hearts of men, by nature itself, (which, it is certain, is vulgarly supposed in innumerable cases,) yet it is not commonly supposed, that men are worthy of no Praise or Dispraise for such dispositions; although what is natural, is undoubtedly necessary, nature being prior to all acts of the Will whatsoever. Thus, for instance, if a man appears to be of a very haughty or malicious disposition, and is supposed to be so by his natural temper, it is no vulgar notion, no dictate of the common sense and apprehension of men, that such dispositions are no vices or moral evils, or that such persons are not worthy of disesteem, or odium and dishonour; or that the proud or malicious acts which flow from such natural dispositions, are worthy of no resentment. Yea, such vile natural dispositions, and the strength of them, will commonly be mentioned rather as an aggravation of the wicked acts, that come from such a fountain, than an extenuation of them. It being natural for men to act thus, is often observed by men in the height of their indignation: they will say, "It is his very nature: he is of a vile natural temper; it is as natural to him to act so, as it is to breathe; he cannot help serving the devil," &c. But it is not thus with regard to hurtful mischievous things, that any are the subjects or occasions of, by natural necessity, against their inclinations. In such a case, the necessity, by the common voice of mankind, will be spoken of as a full excuse.—Thus it is very plain, that common sense makes a vast difference between these two kinds of necessity, as to the judgment it makes of their influence on the moral quality and desert of men's actions.

And these dictates are so natural and necessary, that it may be very much doubted whether the Arminians themselves have ever got rid of them; yea, their greatest doctors, that have gone furthest in defence of their metaphysical notions of liberty, and have brought their arguments to their greatest strength, and as they suppose, to a demonstration, against the consistence of virtue and vice with any necessity: it is to be questioned, whether there is so much as one of them, but that, if he suffered very much from the injurious acts of a man, under the power of an invincible haughtiness and malignancy of temper, would not, from the forementioned natural sense of mind, resent it far otherwise, than if as great sufferings came upon him from the wind that blows and the fire that burns by natural necessity; and otherwise than he would, if he suffered as much from the conduct of a man perfectly delirious; yea, though he first brought his distraction upon him some way by his own fault.

Some seem to disdain the distinction that we make between natural and moral Necessity, as though it were altogether impertinent in this controversy; "that which is necessary, say they, is necessary; it is that which must be, and cannot be prevented. And that which is impossible, is impossible, and cannot be done; and, therefore, none can be to blame for not doing it." And such comparisons are made use of, as the commanding of a man to walk, who has lost his legs, and condemning him and punishing him for not obeying; inviting and calling upon a man, who is shut up in a strong prison, to come forth, &c. But in these things Arminians are very unreasonable. Let common sense determine whether there be not a great difference between these two cases: the one, that of a man who has offended his prince, and is cast into prison; and after he has lain there a while, the king comes to him, calls him to come forth; and tells him, that if he will do so, and will fall down before him and humbly beg his pardon, he shall be forgiven, and set at liberty, and also be greatly enriched, and advanced to honour: the prisoner heartily repents of the folly and wickedness of his offence against his prince, is thoroughly disposed to abase himself, and accept of the king's offer; but is confined by strong walls, with gates of brass, and bars of iron. The other case is, that of a man who is of a very unreasonable spirit, of a haughty, ungrateful, wilful disposition; and moreover, has been brought up in traitorous principles; and has his heart possessed with an extreme and inveterate enmity to his lawful sovereign; and for his rebellion is cast into prison, and lies long there, loaded with heavy chains, and in miserable circumstances. At length the compassionate prince comes to the prison, orders his chains to be knocked off, and his prison-doors to be set wide open; calls to him, and tells him, if he will come forth to him, and fall down before him, acknowledge that he has treated him unworthily, and ask his forgiveness; he shall be forgiven, set at liberty, and set in a place of great dignity and profit in his court. But he is so stout, and full of haughty malignity, that he cannot be willing to accept the offer; his rooted strong pride and malice have perfect power over him, and as it were bind him, by binding his heart: the opposition of his heart has the mastery over him, having an influence on his mind far superior to the king's grace and condescension, and to all his kind offers and promises. Now, is it agreeable to common sense, to assert and stand to it, that there is no difference between these two cases, as to any worthiness of blame in the prisoners; because, forsooth, there is a necessity in both, and the required act in each case is impossible? It is true, a man's evil dispositions may be as strong and immovable as the bars of a castle. But who cannot see, that when a man, in the latter case, is said to be unable to obey the command, the expression is used improperly, and not in the sense it has originally and in common speech? and that it may properly be said to be in the rebel's power to come out of prison, seeing he can easily do it if he pleases; though by reason of his vile temper of heart, which is fixed and rooted, it is impossible that it should please him?

Upon the whole, I presume there is no person of good understanding, who impartially considers these things, but will allow, that it is not evident, from the dictates of common sense, or natural notions, that moral Necessity is inconsistent with Praise and Blame. And, therefore, if the Arminians would prove any such inconsistency, it must be by some philosophical and metaphysical arguments, and not common sense.

There is a grand illusion in the pretended demonstration of Arminians from common sense. The main strength of all these demonstrations lies in that prejudice, that arises through the insensible change of the use and meaning of such terms as liberty, able, unable, necessary, impossible, unavoidable, invincible, action, &c. from their original and ⁶⁷vulgar sense, to a metaphysical sense, entirely diverse; and the strong connexion of the ideas of blamelessness, &c. with some of these terms, by a habit contracted and established, while these terms were used in their first meaning. This prejudice and delusion, is the foundation of all those positions they lay down as maxims, by which most of the scriptures they allege in this controversy, are interpreted, and on which all their pompous demonstrations from Scripture and reason depend. From this secret delusion and prejudice they have almost all their advantages: it is the strength of their bulwarks, and the edge of their weapons. And this is the main ground of all the right they have to treat their neighbours in so assuming a manner, and to insult others, perhaps as wise and good as themselves, as “weak bigots, men that dwell in the dark caves of superstition, perversely set, obstinately shutting their eyes against the noon-day light, enemies to common sense, maintaining the first-born of absurdities,” &c. &c. But perhaps, an impartial consideration of the things which have been observed in the preceding parts of this inquiry, may enable the lovers of truth better to judge, whose doctrine is indeed absurd, abstruse, self-contradictory, and inconsistent with common sense, and many ways repugnant to the universal dictates of the reason of mankind.

Corol. From the things which have been observed, it will follow, that it is agreeable to common sense to suppose, that the glorified saints have not their freedom at all diminished, in any respect; and that God himself has the highest possible freedom, according to the true and proper meaning of the term; and that he is, in the highest possible respect, an agent, and active in the exercise of his infinite holiness; though he acts therein, in the highest degree, necessarily: and his actions of this kind are in the highest, most absolutely perfect, manner virtuous and praiseworthy; and are so, for that very reason, because they are most perfectly necessary.

SECT. V.

Objections, that this scheme of Necessity renders all Means and Endeavours for avoiding Sin, or obtaining Virtue and Holiness, vain, and to no purpose; and that it makes men no more than mere machines, in affairs of morality and religion, answered.

Arminians say, If sin and virtue come to pass by a Necessity consisting in a sure connexion of causes and effects, antecedents and consequents, it can never be worth while to use any Means or Endeavours to obtain the one, and avoid the other; seeing no Endeavours can alter the futurity of the event, which is become necessary by a connexion already established.

But I desire, that this matter may be fully considered; and that it may be examined with a thorough strictness, whether it will follow that Endeavours and Means, in order to avoid or obtain any future thing, must be more in vain, on the supposition of such a connexion of antecedents and consequents, than if the contrary be supposed.

For Endeavours to be in vain, is for them not to be successful; that is to say, for them not eventually to be the Means of the thing aimed at, which cannot be, but in one of these two ways; either, first, That although the Means are used, yet the event aimed at does not follow; or, secondly, If the event does follow, it is not because of the Means, or from any connexion or dependence of the event on the Means, the event would have come to pass as well without the Means as with them. If either of these two things are the case, then the Means are not properly successful, and are truly in vain. The success or non-success of Means, in order to an effect, or their being in vain or not in vain, consists in those Means being connected, or not connected, with the effect, in such a manner as this, viz. That the effect is with the Means, and not without them; or. that the being of the effect is, on the one hand, connected with Means, and the want of the effect, on the other hand, is connected with the want of the Means. If there be such a connexion as this between Means and end, the Means are not in vain: the more there is of such a connexion, the further they are from being in vain; and the less of such a connexion, the more they are in vain.

Now, therefore, the question to be answered—in order to determine, whether it follows from this doctrine of the necessary connexion between foregoing things, and consequent ones, that Means used in order to any effect, are more in vain than they would be otherwise—is, whether it follows from it, that there is less of the forementioned connexion between Means and effect; that is, whether on the supposition of there being a real and true connexion between antecedent things and consequent ones, there must be less of a connexion between Means and effect, than on the supposition of there being no fixed connexion between antecedent things and consequent ones: and the very stating of this question is sufficient to answer it. It must appear to every one that will open his eyes, that this question cannot be affirmed, without the grossest absurdity and inconsistency. Means are foregoing things, and effects are following things: And if there were no connexion between foregoing things and following ones, there could be no connexion between Means and end; and so all Means would be wholly vain and fruitless. For it is only by virtue of some connexion, that they become successful: It is some connexion observed, or revealed, or otherwise known, between antecedent things and following ones, that directs in the choice of Means. And if there were no such thing as an established connexion, there could be no choice, as to Means; one thing would have no more tendency to an effect, than another; there would be no such thing as tendency in the case. All those things, which are successful Means of other things, do therein prove connected antecedents of them: and therefore to assert, that a fixed connexion between antecedents and consequents makes Means vain and useless, or stands in the way to hinder the connexion between Means and end, is just so ridiculous, as to say, that a connexion between antecedents and consequents stands in the way to hinder a connexion between antecedents and consequents.

Nor can any supposed connexion of the succession or train of antecedents and consequents, from the very beginning of all things, the connexion being made already sure and necessary, either by established laws of nature, or by these together with a decree of sovereign immediate interpositions of divine power, on such and such occasions, or any other way (if any other there be); I say, no such necessary connexion of a series of antecedents and consequents can in the least tend to hinder, but that the Means we use may belong to the series; and so may be some of those antecedents which are connected with the consequents we aim at, in the established course of things. Endeavours which we use, are things that exist; and, therefore, they belong to the general chain of events; all the parts of which chain are supposed to be connected: and so Endeavours are supposed to be connected with some effects, or some consequent things or other. And certainly this does not hinder but that the events they are connected with, may be those which we aim at, and which we choose, because we judge them most likely to have a connexion with those events, from the established order and course of things which we observe, or from something in divine revelation.

Let us suppose a real and sure connexion between a man having his eyes open in the clear daylight, with good organs of sight, and seeing; so that seeing is connected with his opening his eyes, and not seeing with his not opening his eyes; and also the like connexion between such a man attempting to open his eyes, and his actually doing it: the supposed established connexion between these antecedents and consequents, let the connexion be never so sure and necessary, certainly does not prove that it is in vain, for a man in such circumstances to attempt to open his eyes, in order to seeing: his aiming at that event, and the use of the Means, being the effect of his Will, does not break the connexion, or hinder the success.

So that the objection we are upon does not lie against the doctrine of the Necessity of events by a certainty of connexion and consequence: On the contrary, it is truly forcible against the Arminian doctrine of contingency and self-determination; which is inconsistent with such a connexion. If there be no connexion between those events, wherein virtue and vice consist, and any thing antecedent; then, there is no connexion between these events and any Means or Endeavours used in order to them: and if so, then those means must be in vain. The less there is of connexion between foregoing things and following ones, so much the less there is between Means and end, Endeavours and success; and in the same proportion are Means and Endeavours ineffectual and in vain.

It will follow from Arminian principles, that there is no degree of connexion between virtue or vice, and any foregoing event or thing: or, in other words, that the determination of the existence of virtue or vice does not in the least depend on the influence of any thing that comes to pass antecedently, as its cause, Means, or ground; because, so far as it is so, it is not from self-determination: and, therefore, so far there is nothing of the nature of virtue or vice. And so it follows, that virtue and vice are not at all, in any degree, dependent upon, or connected with, as, any foregoing event or existence, its cause, ground, or Means. And if so, then all foregoing Means must be totally in vain.

Hence it follows, that there cannot, in any consistence with the Arminian scheme, be any reasonable ground of so much as a conjecture concerning the consequence of any Means and Endeavours, in order to escaping vice or obtaining virtue, or any choice or preference of Means, as having a greater probability of success by some than others; either from any natural connexion or dependence of the end on the Means, or through any divine constitution, or revealed way of God, bestowing or bringing to pass these things, in consequence of any Means, Endeavours, Prayers, or Deeds. Conjectures, in this latter case, depend on a supposition, that God himself is the Giver or determining Cause of the events sought: but if they depend on self-determination, then God is not the determining or disposing Author of them: and if these things are not of his disposal, then no conjecture can be made, from any revelation he has given, concerning any method of his disposal of them.

Yea, on these principles, it will not only follow, that men cannot have any reasonable ground of judgment or conjecture, that their Means and Endeavours to obtain virtue or avoid vice will be successful, but they may be sure, they will not; they may be certain, that they will be in vain; and that if ever the thing, which they seek, comes to pass, it will not be at all owing to the Means they use. For

Means and Endeavours can have no effect at all, in order to obtain the end, but in one of these two ways: either, (1.) Through a natural tendency and influence, to prepare and dispose the mind more to virtuous acts, either by causing the disposition of the heart to be more in favour of such acts, or by bringing the mind more into the view of powerful motives and inducements; or, (2.) By putting persons more in the way of God's bestowment of the benefit. But neither of these can be the case. Not the latter; for, as has been just now observed, it does not consist with the Arminian notion of self-determination, which they suppose essential to virtue, that God should be the bestower, or (which is the same thing) the determining, disposing author of virtue. Not the former; for natural influence and tendency suppose causality, connexion, and necessity of event, which are inconsistent with Arminian liberty. A tendency of Means, by biassing the heart in favour of virtue, or by bringing the Will under the influence and power of motives in its determinations, are both inconsistent with Arminian liberty of Will, consisting in indifference, and sovereign self-determination, as has been largely demonstrated.

But for the more full removal of this prejudice against the doctrine of necessity, which has been maintained, as though it tended to encourage a total neglect of all Endeavours as vain, the following things may be considered.

The question is not, Whether men may not thus improve this doctrine: we know that many true and wholesome doctrines are abused: but, whether the doctrine gives any just occasion for such an improvement; or whether, on the supposition of the truth of the doctrine, such a use of it would not be unreasonable? If any shall affirm, that it would not, but that the very nature of the doctrine is such as gives just occasion for it, it must be on this supposition; namely, that such an invariable necessity of all things already settled, must render the interposition of all Means, Endeavours, Conclusions or Actions, of ours, in order to the obtaining any future end whatsoever, perfectly insignificant; because they cannot in the least alter or vary the course and series of things, in any event or circumstance; all being already fixed unalterably by necessity: and that therefore it is folly, for men to use any Means for any end; but their wisdom, to save themselves the trouble of Endeavours, and take their ease. No person can draw such an inference from this doctrine, and come to such a conclusion, without contradicting himself, and going counter to the very principles he pretends to act upon: for he comes to a conclusion, and takes a course, in order to an end, even his ease, or saving himself from trouble; he seeks something future, and uses Means in order to a future thing, even in his drawing up that conclusion, that he will seek nothing, and use no Means in order to any thing in future; he seeks his future ease, and the benefit and comfort of indolence. If prior necessity, that determines all things, makes vain all actions or conclusions of ours, in order to any thing future; then it makes vain all conclusions and conduct of ours, in order to our future ease. The measure of our ease, with the time, manner, and every circumstance of it, is already fixed, by all-determining necessity, as much as any thing else. If he says within himself, "What future happiness or misery I shall have, is already, in effect, determined by the necessary course and connexion of things; therefore, I will save myself the trouble of labour and diligence, which cannot add to my determined degree of happiness, or diminish my misery; but will take my ease, and will enjoy the comfort of sloth and negligence." Such a man contradicts himself: he says, the measure of his future happiness and misery is already fixed, and he will not try to diminish the one, nor add to the other: but yet, in his very conclusion, he contradicts this; for, he takes up this conclusion, to add to his future happiness, by the ease and comfort of his negligence; and to diminish his future trouble and misery, by saving himself the trouble of using Means and taking Pains.

Therefore persons cannot reasonably make this improvement of the doctrine of necessity, that they will go into a voluntary negligence of Means for their own happiness. For the principles they must go upon, in order to this, are inconsistent with their making any improvement at all of the doctrine: for to make some improvement of it, is to be influenced by it, to come to some voluntary conclusion, in regard to their own conduct, with some view or aim: but this, as has been shown, is inconsistent with the principles they pretend to act upon. In short, the principles are such as cannot be acted upon at all, or, in any respect, consistently. And, therefore, in every pretence of acting upon them, or making any improvement at all of them, there is a self-contradiction.

As to that objection against the doctrine, which I have endeavoured to prove, that it makes men no more than mere machines; I would say, that notwithstanding this doctrine, man is entirely, perfectly, and unspeakably different from a mere machine, in that he has reason and understanding, with a faculty of Will, and so is capable of volition and choice; in that his Will is guided by the dictates or views of his understanding; and in that his external actions and behaviour, and in many respects also his thoughts, and the exercises of his mind, are subject to his Will; so that he has liberty to act according to his choice, and do what he pleases; and by means of these things, is capable of moral habits and moral acts, such inclinations and actions as, according to the common sense of mankind, are worthy of praise, esteem, love, and reward; or, on the contrary, of disesteem, detestation, indignation, and punishment.

In these things is all the difference from mere machines, as to liberty and agency, that would be any perfection, dignity, or privilege, in any respect: all the difference that can be desired, and all that can be conceived of; and indeed all that the pretensions of the Arminians themselves come to, as they are forced often to explain themselves; though their explications overthrow and abolish the things asserted, and pretended to be explained. For they are forced to explain a self-determining power of Will, by a power in the soul, to determine as it chooses or wills; which comes to no more than this, that a man has a power of choosing, and, in many instances, can do as he chooses. Which is quite a different thing from that contradiction, his having power of choosing his first act of choice in the case.

Or, if their scheme make any other difference than this, between men and machines, it is for the worse: it is so far from supposing men to have a dignity and privilege above machines, that it makes the manner of their being determined still more unhappy. Whereas, machines are guided by an intelligent cause, by the skillful hand of the workman or owner; the will of man is left to the guidance of nothing, but absolute blind contingency!

SECT. VI.

Concerning that objection against the doctrine which has been maintained, that it agrees with the Stoical doctrine of Fate, and the opinions of Mr. Hobbes.

When Calvinists oppose the Arminian notion of the freedom of Will, and contingency of volition, and insist that there are no acts of the Will, nor any other events whatsoever, but what are attended with some kind of necessity; their opposers exclaim against them, as agreeing with the ancient Stoics in their doctrine of Fate, and with Mr. Hobbes in his opinion of Necessity.

It would not be worth while to take notice of so impertinent an objection, had it not been urged by some of the chief Arminian writers.—There were many important truths maintained by the ancient Greek and Roman philosophers, and especially the Stoics, that are never the worse for being held by them. The Stoic philosophers, by the general agreement of Christian divines, and even Arminian divines, were the greatest, wisest, and most virtuous of all the heathen philosophers; and, in their doctrine and practice, came the nearest to Christianity of any of their sects. How frequently are the sayings of these philosophers, in many of the writings and sermons, even of Arminian divines, produced, not as arguments for the falseness of the doctrines which they delivered, but as a confirmation of some of the greatest truths of the christian religion, relating to the unity and perfections of the Godhead, a future state, the duty and happiness of mankind, &c. and how the light of nature and reason, in the wisest and best of the heathen, harmonized with and confirms the gospel of Jesus Christ.

And it is very remarkable, concerning Dr. Whitby, that although he alleges the agreement of the Stoics with us, wherein he supposes they maintained the like doctrine, as an argument against the truth of ours; yet, this very Dr. Whitby alleges the agreement of the Stoics with the Arminian, wherein he supposes they taught the same doctrine with them, as an argument for the truth of their doctrine. ¹⁴¹ So that, when the Stoics agree with them, it is a confirmation of their doctrine, and a confutation of ours, as showing that our opinions are contrary to the natural sense and common reason of mankind: nevertheless, when the Stoics agree with us, it argues no such thing in our favour; but, on the contrary, is a great argument against us, and shows our doctrine to be heathenish!

It is observed by some Calvinistic writers, that the Arminians symbolize with the Stoics, in some of those doctrines wherein they are opposed by the Calvinists; particularly in their denying an original, innate, total corruption and depravity of heart; and in what they held of man's ability to make himself truly virtuous and conformed to God, and in some other doctrines.

It may be further observed, that certainly it is no better objection against our doctrine, that it agrees, in some respects, with the doctrine of the ancient Stoic philosophers; than it is against theirs, wherein they differ from us, that it agrees, in some respects, with the opinion of the very worst of the heathen philosophers, the followers of Epicurus, the father of atheism and licentiousness, and with the doctrine of the Sadduces and Jesuits.

I am not much concerned to know precisely, what the ancient Stoic philosophers held concerning Fate, in order to determine what is truth; as though it were a sure way to be in the right, to take good heed to differ from them. It seems, that they differed among themselves; and probably the doctrine of Fate, as maintained by most of them, was, in some respects, erroneous. But whatever their doctrine was, if any of them held such a Fate, as is repugnant to any liberty, consisting in our doing as we please, I utterly deny such a Fate. If they held any such Fate, as is not consistent with the common and universal notions that mankind have of liberty, activity, moral agency, virtue and vice; I disclaim any such thing, and think I have demonstrated, that the scheme I maintain is no such scheme. If the Stoics, by Fate, meant any thing of such a nature, as can be supposed to stand in the way of advantage and benefit of in use of means and endeavours, or would make it less worth while for men to desire and seek after any thing wherein their virtue and happiness consists; I hold no doctrine that is clogged with any such inconvenience, any more than any other scheme whatsoever; and by no means so much as the Arminian scheme of contingency; as has been shown. If they held any such doctrine of universal fatality, as is inconsistent with any kind of liberty, that is or can be any perfection, dignity, privilege, or benefit, or any thing desirable, in any respect, for any intelligent creature, or indeed with any liberty that is possible or conceivable; I embrace no such doctrine. If they held any such doctrine of Fate, as is inconsistent with the world being in all things subject to the disposal of an intelligent, wise agent, that presides—not as the soul of the world, but—as the Sovereign Lord of the Universe, governing all things by proper will, choice, and design, in the exercise of the most perfect liberty conceivable, without subjection to any constraint, or being properly under the power or influence of any thing before, above, or without himself; I wholly renounce any such doctrine.

As to Mr. Hobbes maintaining the same doctrine concerning necessity; I confess, it happens I never read Mr. Hobbes. Let his opinion be what it will, we need not reject all truth which is demonstrated by clear evidence, merely because it was once held by some bad man. This great truth, "that Jesus is the Son of God," was not spoiled because it was once and again proclaimed with a loud voice by the devil. If truth is so defiled, because it is spoken by the mouth, or written by the pen, of some ill minded, mischievous man, that it must never be received, we shall never know, when we hold any of the most precious and evident truths by a sure tenure. And if Mr. Hobbes has made a bad use of this truth, that is to be lamented; but the truth is not to be thought worthy of rejection on that account. It is common for the corrupt hearts of evil men to abuse the best things to vile purposes.

I might also take notice of its having been observed, that the Arminians agree with Mr. Hobbes ¹⁴² in many more things than the Calvinists. As, in what he is said to hold concerning original sin, in denying the necessity of supernatural illumination, in denying infused grace, in denying the doctrine of justification by faith alone; and other things.

SECT. VII.

Concerning the Necessity of the Divine Will.

Some may, possibly, object against what has been supposed of the absurdity and inconsistency of a self-determining power in the Will, and the impossibility of its being otherwise, than that the Will should be determined in every case by some motive, and by a motive which (as it stands in the view of the understanding) is of superior strength to any appearing on the other side; that if these things are true, it will follow, that not only the Will of created minds, but the Will of God himself, is necessary in all its determinations. Concerning which the author of the Essay on the Freedom of Will in God and in the Creature, (page. 85, 86.) says: "What strange doctrine is this, contrary to all our ideas of the dominion of God? does it not destroy the glory of his liberty of choice, and take away from the Creator and Governor and Benefactor of the world, that most free and Sovereign Agent, all the glory of this sort of freedom? does it not seem to make him a kind of mechanical medium of fate, and introduce Mr. Hobbes's doctrine of fatality and Necessity, into all things that God hath to do with! Does it not seem to represent the blessed God, as a Being of vast understanding, as well as power, and efficiency, but still to leave him without a Will to choose among all the objects within his view? In short, it seems to make the blessed God a sort of Almighty Minister of Fate, under its universal and supreme influence; as it was the professed sentiment of some of the ancients, that Fate was above the gods.

This is declaiming, rather than arguing; and an application to men's imaginations and prejudices, rather than to mere reason. I would now calmly endeavour to consider, whether there be any reason in this frightful representation. But, before I enter upon a particular consideration of the matter, I would observe; that it is reasonable to suppose, it should be much more difficult to express or conceive things according to exact metaphysical truth, relating to the nature and manner of the existence of things in the Divine Understanding and Will, and the operation of these faculties (if I may so call them) of the Divine Mind, than in the human mind; which is infinitely more within our view, more proportionate to the measure of our comprehension, and more commensurate to the use and import of human speech. Language is indeed very deficient, in regard of terms to express precise truth concerning our own minds, and their faculties and operations. Words were first formed to express external things; and those that are applied to express things internal and spiritual, are almost all borrowed, and used in a sort of figurative sense. Whence they are, most of them, attended with a great deal of ambiguity and unfixeness in their signification, occasioning innumerable doubts, difficulties, and confusions, in inquiries and controversies about things of this nature. But language is much less adapted to express things existing in the mind of the incomprehensible Deity, precisely as they are.

We find a great deal of difficulty in conceiving exactly of the nature of our own souls. And notwithstanding all the progress which has been made, in past ages, and the present, in this kind of knowledge, whereby our metaphysics, as it relates to these things, is brought to greater perfection than once it was; yet, here is still work enough left for future inquiries and researches, and room for progress still to be made, for many ages and generations. But we had need to be infinitely able metaphysicians, to conceive with clearness, according to strict, proper, and perfect truth, concerning the nature of the Divine Essence, and the modes of action and operation in the powers of the Divine Mind

And it may be noted particularly, that though we are obliged to conceive of some things in God as consequent and dependent on others, and of some things pertaining to the Divine Nature and Will as the foundation of others, and so before others in the order of nature: as, we must conceive of the knowledge and holiness of God as prior, in the order of nature, to his happiness; the perfection of his understanding, as the foundation of his wise purposes and decrees; the holiness of his nature, as the cause and reason of his holy determinations. And yet, when we speak of cause and effect, antecedent and consequent, fundamental and dependent, determining and determined, in the first Being, who is self-existent, independent, of perfect and absolute simplicity and immutability, and the first cause of all things: doubtless there must be less propriety in such representations, than when we speak of derived dependent beings, who are compounded, and liable to perpetual mutation and succession.

Having premised this, I proceed to observe concerning the forementioned author's exclamation, about the necessary determination of God's Will, in all things, by what he sees to be fittest and best;

That all the seeming force of such objections and exclamations must arise from an imagination, that there is some sort of privilege or dignity in being without such a moral Necessity, as will make it impossible to do any other, than always choose what is wisest and best; as though there were some disadvantage, meanness, and subjection, in such a Necessity; a thing by which the Will was confined, kept under, and held in servitude by something, which, as it were, maintained a strong and invincible power and dominion over it, by bonds that held him fast, and from which he could, by no means, deliver himself. Whereas, this must be all mere imagination and delusion. It is no disadvantage or dishonour to a being, necessarily to act in the most excellent and happy manner, from the necessary perfection of his own nature. This argues no imperfection, inferiority, or dependence, nor any want of dignity, privilege, or ascendancy. ¹⁴³ It is not inconsistent with the absolute and most perfect sovereignty of God. The sovereignty of God is his ability and authority to do whatever pleases him; whereby "he doth according to his will in the armies of heaven, and amongst the inhabitants of the earth, and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, what dost thou?—The following things belong to the sovereignty of God; viz. (1.) Supreme, universal, and infinite Power; whereby he is able to do what he pleases, without control, without any confinement of that power, without any subjection, in the least measure, to any other power; and so without any hinderance or restraint, that it should be either impossible, or at all difficult, for him to accomplish his Will; and without any dependence of his power on any other power, from whence it should be derived, or of which it should stand in any need: so far from this, that all other power is derived from him, and is absolutely dependent on him. (2.) That he has supreme authority; absolute and most perfect right to do what he wills, without subjection to any superior authority, or any derivation of authority from any other, or limitation by any distinct independent authority, either superior, equal, or inferior; he being the head of all dominion, and fountain of all authority; and also without restraint by any obligation, implying either subjection, derivation, or dependence, or proper limitation. (3.) That his Will is supreme, underived, and independent on any thing without himself; being in every thing determined by his own counsel, having no other rule but his own wisdom; his Will not being subject to or restrained by the Will of any other, and other Wills being perfectly subject to his. (4.) That his Wisdom, which determines his Will, is supreme, perfect, underived, self-sufficient, and independent; so that it may be said, as in Isa. xl. 14. “With whom took he counsel? And who instructed him and taught him in the path of judgment, and taught him knowledge, and showed him the way of understanding?” There is no other Divine Sovereignty but this; and this is properly absolute sovereignty: no other is desirable; nor would any other be honourable, or happy: and indeed, there is no other conceivable or possible. It is the glory and greatness of the Divine Sovereign, that his Will is determined by his own infinite, all-sufficient wisdom in every thing; and is in nothing at all directed either by inferior wisdom, or by no wisdom; whereby it would become senseless arbitrariness, determining and acting without reason, design, or end.

If God’s Will is steadily and surely determined in every thing by supreme wisdom, then it is in every thing necessarily determined to that which is most wise. And, certainly, it would be a disadvantage and indignity, to be otherwise. For if the Divine Will was not necessarily determined to what in every case is wisest and best, it must be subject to some degree of undesigned contingency; and so in the same degree liable to evil. To suppose the Divine Will liable to be carried hither and thither at random, by the uncertain wind of blind contingency, which is guided by no wisdom, no motive, no intelligent dictate whatsoever, (if any such thing were possible,) would certainly argue a great degree of imperfection and meanness, infinitely unworthy of the Deity. If it be a disadvantage, for the Divine Will to be attended with this moral Necessity, then the more free from it, and the more left at random, the greater dignity and advantage. And, consequently, to be perfectly free from the direction of understanding, and universally and entirely left to senseless unmeaning continence, to act absolutely at random, would be the supreme glory!

It no more argues any dependence of God’s Will, that his supremely wise volition is necessary, than it argues a dependence of his being, that his existence is necessary. If it be something too low, for the Supreme Being to have his Will determined by moral Necessity, so as necessarily, in every case, to Will in the highest degree holily and happily; then why is it not also something too low, for him to have his existence, and the infinite perfection of his nature, and his infinite happiness, determined by Necessity? It is no more to God’s dishonour, to be necessarily wise, than to be necessarily holy. And, if neither of them be is the beauty of this Necessity, that it is strong as faith itself, with all the advantage of reason and goodness.—It is strange, to see men contend, that the Deity is not free, because he is necessarily rational, immutably good to his dishonour, then it is not to his dishonour necessarily to act holily and wisely. And if it be not dishonourable to be necessarily holy and wise, in the highest possible degree, no more is it mean and dishonourable, necessarily to act holily and wisely in the highest possible degree; or which is the same thing, to do that, in every case, which, above all other things, is wisest and best.

The reason why it is not dishonourable to be necessarily most holy is, because holiness in itself is an excellent and honourable thing. For the same reason, it is no dishonour to be necessarily most wise, and, in every case, to act most wisely, or do the thing which is the wisest of all; for wisdom is also in itself excellent and honourable.

The forementioned author of the Essay on the Freedom of Will, &c. as has been observed, represents that doctrine of the Divine Will being in every thing necessarily determined by superior fitness, as making the blessed God a kind of Almighty Minister and mechanical medium of fate: he insists, (p. 93, 94.) that this moral Necessity and impossibility is, in effect, the same thing with physical and natural Necessity, and impossibility: and says, (p. 54, 55.) "The scheme which determines the Will always and certainly by the understanding, and the understanding by the appearance of things, seems to take away the true nature of vice and virtue. For the sublimest of virtues, and the vilest of vices, seem rather to be matters of fate and Necessity, flowing naturally and necessarily from the existence, the circumstances, and present situation of persons and things; for this existence and situation necessarily makes such an appearance to the mind; from this appearance flows a necessary perception and judgment, concerning these things; this judgment necessarily determines the Will; and thus, by this chain of necessary causes, virtue and vice would lose their nature, and become natural ideas, and necessary things, instead of moral and free actions."

And yet this same author allows, (p. 30, 31.) That a perfectly wise being will constantly and certainly choose what is most fit; and says, (p. 102, 103.) "I grant, and always have granted, that wheresoever there is such antecedent superior fitness of things, God acts according to it, so as never to contradict it; and, particularly, in all his judicial proceedings as a Governor and Distributer of rewards and punishments." Yea, he says expressly, (p. 42.) "That it is not possible for God to act otherwise, than according to this fitness and goodness in things."

So that, according to this author, putting these several passages of his Essay together, there is no virtue, nor any thing of a moral nature, in the most sublime and glorious acts and exercises of God's holiness, justice, and faithfulness; and he never does any thing which is in itself supremely worthy, and, above all other things, fit and excellent, but only as a kind of mechanical medium of fate; and in what he does as the Judge, and moral Governor of the world, he exercises no moral excellency; exercising no freedom in these things, because he acts by moral Necessity, which is, in effect, the same with physical or natural Necessity; and therefore, he only acts by an Hobbistical fatality; "as a Being indeed of vast understanding, as well as power and efficiency, (as he said before,) but without a will to choose, being a kind of Almighty Minister of fate, acting under its supreme influence. "For he allows, that in all these things, God's Will is determined constantly and certainly by a superior fitness, and that it is not possible for him to act otherwise. And if these things are so, what glory or praise belongs to God for doing holily and justly, or taking the most fit, holy, wise, and excellent course, in any one instance? Whereas, according to the Scriptures, and also the common sense of mankind, it does not, in the least, derogate from the honour of any being, that through the moral perfection of his nature, he necessarily acts with supreme wisdom and holiness; but on the contrary, his praise is the greater: herein consists the height of his glory.

The same author (p. 56.) supposes, that herein appears the excellent "character of a wise and good man, that though he can choose contrary to the fitness of things, yet he does not; but suffers himself to be directed by fitness;" and that, in this conduct, "he imitates the blessed God." And yet, he supposes it is contrary wise with the blessed God; not that he suffers himself to be directed by fitness, when “he can choose, contrary to the .fitness of things;” but that “he cannot choose contrary to the fitness of things;” as he says, p. 42. “That it is not possible for God to act otherwise than according to this fitness, where there is any fitness or goodness in things:” Yea, he supposes, (p. 31.) That if a man “were perfectly wise and good, he could not do otherwise than be constantly and certainly determined by the fitness of things.”

One thing more I would observe, before I conclude this section; and that is, that if it derogate nothing from the glory of God, to be necessarily determined by superior fitness in some things, then neither does it to he thus determined in all things; from any thing in the nature of such Necessity, as at all detracting from (God’s freedom, independence, absolute supremacy, or any dignity or glory of his nature, state, or manner of acting; or as implying any infirmity, restraint, or subjection. And it the thing be such as well consists with God’s glory, and has nothing tending at all to detract from it; then we need not be afraid of ascribing it to God in too many things, lest thereby we should detract from God’s glory too much.

Excellent footnote!

¹⁴³ “It might have been objected, with more plausibleness, that the Supreme Cause cannot be free, because he must needs do always what is best in the whole. But this would not at all serve Spinoza’s purpose; for this is a necessity, not of nature and of fate, but of fitness and wisdom: a necessity consistent with the greatest freedom, and most perfect choice. For the only foundation of this necessity is such an unalterable rectitude of will, and perfection of wisdom, as makes it impossible for a wise being to act foolishly.” dark’s Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God. Edit. 6. p. 64. “Though God is a most perfect free Agent, yet he cannot but do always what is best and wisest in the whole. The reason is evident; because perfect wisdom and goodness are as steady and certain principles of action, as necessity itself; and an infinitely wise and good Being, indued with the most perfect liberty, can no more choose to act in contradiction to wisdom and goodness, than a necessary agent can act contrary to the necessity by which it is acted; It being as great an absurdity and impossibility in choice, for Infinite Wisdom to choose to act unwisely, or Infinite Goodness to choose what is not good, as it would be in nature, for absolute necessity to fail of producing its necessary effect. There was, indeed, no necessity in nature, that God should at first create such beings as he has created, or indeed any being at all; because he is. in himself, infinitely happy and all-sufficient. There was, also, no necessity in nature, that he should preserve and continue things in being, after they were created; because he would be self-sufficient without their continuance, as he was before their creation. But it was fit and wise and good, that Infinite Wisdom should manifest, and Infinite Goodness communicate itself: and therefore it was necessary, in the sense of necessity I am now speaking of, that things should be made at such a time, and continued to long, and indeed with various perfections in such degrees, as Infinite Wisdom and Goodness saw it wisest and best that they should.” Ibid. p. 112, 113.

“It is not a fault, but a perfection of our nature, to desire, will, and act, according to the last result of a fair examination.—This is so far from being a restraint or diminution of freedom, that it is the very improvement and benefit of it: it is not an abridgment, it is the end and use of our liberty; and the further we are removed from such a determination, the nearer we are to misery and slavery. A perfect indifference in the mind, not determinable by its last judgment, of the good or evil that is thought to attend its choice, would be so far from being an advantage and excellency of any intellectual nature, that it would be as great an imperfection, as the want of indifferency to act, or not to act, till determined by the will, would be an imperfection on the other side.—It is as much a perfection, that desire or the power of preferring should be determined by good, as that the power of acting should be determined by the will: and the certainer such determination is, the greater the perfection. Nay, were we determined by any thing but the last result of our own minds, judging of the good or evil of any action, we were not free. This very end of our freedom being, that we might attain the good we choose; and, therefore, every man is brought under a necessity by his constitution, as an intelligent being, to be determined in willing by his own thought and judgment, what is best for him to do; else he would be under the determination of some other than himself, which is want of liberty. And to deny that a man's will, in every determination, follows his own judgment, is to say, that a man wills and acts for an end that he would not have, at the same time that he wills and acts for it. For if he prefers it in his present thoughts, before any other, it is plain he then thinks better of it, and would have it before any other; unless he can have and not have it, will and not will it, at the same time; a contradiction too manifest to be admitted.—If we look upon those superior beings above us, who enjoy perfect happiness, we shall have reason to judge, that they are more steadily determined in their choice of good than we; and yet we have no reason to think they are less happy, or less free, than we are. And if it were fit for such poor finite creatures as we are, to pronounce what Infinite Wisdom and Goodness could do, I think we might say, that God himself cannot choose what is not good. The freedom of the Almighty hinders not his being determined by what is best.—But to give a right view of this mistaken part of liberty, let me ask. Would any one be a changeling, because he is less determined by wise determination, than a wise man? Is it worth the name of freedom, to be at liberty to play the fool, and draw shame and misery upon a man's self? If to break loose from the conduct of reason, and to want that restraint of examination and judgment, that keeps us from doing or choosing the worse, be liberty, true liberty, mad men and fools are the only free men. Yet, I think, nobody would choose to be mad, for the sake of such liberty, but he that is mad already.” Locke Hum. Und. Vol. I. Edit 7. p. 215. 216.

“This Being, having all things always necessarily in view, must always and eternally will, according to his infinite comprehension of things; that is, must will all things that are wisest and best to be done. There is no getting free of this consequence. If it can will at all, it must will this way. To be capable of knowing, and not capable of willing, is not to be understood. And to be capable of willing otherwise than what is wisest and best, contradicts that knowledge which is infinite. Infinite Knowledge must direct the will without error. Here, then, is the *origin of moral Necessity; and that is, really, of freedom.—Perhaps it may be said, when the Divine Will is determined, from the consideration of the eternal aptitudes of things, it is as necessarily determined, as if it were physically impelled, if that were possible. But it is unskilfulness, to suppose this an objection. The great principle is once established, viz. That the Divine Will is determined by the eternal reason and aptitudes of things, instead of being physically impelled; and after that, the more strong and necessary this determination is, the more perfect the Deity must be allowed to be: it is this that makes him an amiable and adorable Being, whose will and power are constantly, immutably determined, by the consideration of what is wisest and best; instead of a surd [irrational] Being, with power, but without discerning and reason. It is the beauty of this Necessity, that it is strong as fate itself, with all the advantage of reason and goodness.—It is strange, to see men contend, that the Deity is not free, because he is necessarily rational, immutably good and wise; when a man is allowed still the perfecter being, the more fixedly and constantly his Will is determined by reason and truth.” Inquiry into the Nature of the Hum. A Consistent Arminian Must Be An Open Theist

Code528

*Comment by Van Til on Arminianism:
The Defence of the Faith, pg 69*

We must note here again how impossible it is in an apologetic argument to close one's eyes to differences between various theological schools. That fact comes out here more strikingly than anywhere else. Arminianism has not been true to its own belief in creation. With belief in creation it stands committed to that view of God and of God's counsel and that view of man's relation to that counsel, which we have outlined. Yet it has been untrue to all this in its insistence that the historical does produce the absolutely new. For that reason it has to think of the relation of God's counsel to man's activity as one of real contradiction.⁴² In order to avoid this "contradiction" it has simply thrown overboard the idea of the counsel of God as controlling all things. Therewith it has in effect sought to destroy both divine and human knowledge, and therewith it has destroyed the very meaning of history which it was so anxious to preserve. God cannot answer our prayers for the salvation of people if those people can reject that salvation when they wish.

⁴² That is in my Arminianism attempts to release the points of tension between God's counsel and man's activity by arguing that man's choices, or at least many of them, are "new" for man and for God such that God can only know about and respond to those choices once man has decided something. [in other words, a consistent Arminian has to be an open theist; that the future is open – i.e., unknown to God. God just responds to man's choices when they occur. Of course, this undermines sovereignty of God's disposal of events as Van Til notes. God is not dependent upon the creature, but the creature upon God.]

Sin and It's Curse

An excerpt from Cornelius Van Til's book
The Defence of the Faith, Chapter 3
 The Christian Philosophy of Knowledge
 Pgs. 69-73

5. SIN AND ITS CURSE

What we have said thus far in this chapter about man's knowledge has not taken sin into consideration. We have spoken only of the normal situation as it existed when man was first created perfect by God. We must now ask what happened to the knowledge situation when sin entered into the heart of man.

We know that sin is an attempt on the part of man to cut himself loose from God. But this breaking loose from God could, in the nature of the case, not be metaphysical; if it were, man himself would be destroyed, and God's purpose with man would be frustrated. Sin is therefore a breaking loose from God ethically and not metaphysically.⁴³ Sin is the creature's enmity and rebellion against God but is not an escape from creaturehood.

⁴³That is, even as sinful, we are, and forever will be, creatures of God

When we say that sin is ethical, we do not mean, however, that sin involved only the will of man and not also his intellect. Sin involved every aspect of man's personality. All of man's reactions in every relation in which God had set him were ethical and not merely intellectual; the intellectual itself is ethical.

What then was the result as far as the question of knowledge is concerned of man's rebellion against God? The result was that man tried to interpret everything with which he came into contact without reference to God. The assumption of all his future interpretation was the self-sufficiency of intra-cosmical relationships. This does not signify that man would immediately and openly deny that there is a God. Nor does it mean that man would always and everywhere deny that God is in some sense transcendent. What he would always deny, by implication at least, would be that God is self-sufficient or self-complete. At best he would allow that God is a correlative to man. He might say that we need God to interpret man, but he would at the same time say that in the same sense we need man to interpret God. He might say that the temporal cannot be interpreted without reference to the eternal, but he would at the same time say that the eternal cannot be interpreted without reference to the temporal. He might say that we need God in order to obtain unity in our experience, but he would at the same time say that God needs the historical many in order to get diversity into his experience. All these forms of correlativity amount in the end to the same thing as saying that the finite categories are self-sufficient. For that reason we can make a very simple and all-comprehensive antithesis between the knowledge concept of all non-Christian philosophies and the Christian view. Scripture says that some men worship and serve the Creator; they are the Christians. All other men worship and serve the creature rather than the Creator.

Christian-theism says that there are two levels of thought, the absolute and the derivative. Christian theism says that there are two levels of interpreters, God who interprets absolutely and man who must be the re-interpreter of God's interpretation. Christian-theism says that human thought is therefore analogical of God's thought. In opposition to all this non-Christian thought holds in effect that the distinction between absolute and derivative thought must be wiped out. To be sure, God's thoughts may be more comprehensive than ours, but it is not self-complete without ours. This means that as all being was thought of as equally ultimate, so now all thought is thought of as equally ultimate. There is only one level of interpreters; if God comes into the picture at all, it is as a collaborator with man. We do not think God's thoughts after him, but together with God we think out thoughts that have never been thought either by God or by man. Non-Christian philosophies hold that human thought is univocal instead of analogical.⁴⁴

⁴⁴ Univocal thinking is thinking between two (or more) persons that is "connected" by some point of epistemological identity.

Thus the Christian concept of analogical thought and the non-Christian concept of univocal thought stand over against one another as diametrical opposites.

Non-Christian thought holds to the ultimacy of the created universe. It holds therefore to the ultimacy of the mind of man itself and must in consequence deny the necessity of analogical thought. It holds to the normalcy of the human mind as well as to its ultimacy. It holds to the normalcy of the human mind as it holds to the normalcy of everything else in the world.

Naturally this conception of the normalcy of the human mind does not imply that the human mind never makes mistakes. It only means that mistakes are thought of as natural and to be expected and have nothing to do with sin.

We can readily see from this that the nontheistic mind must set for itself the ideal of absolutely comprehensive knowledge as long as as it has not become fully conscious of the implications of its own thought.⁴⁵ However it will maintain that it is unnecessary for man to have any comprehensive universal in order to live. As long as nontheistic thought still thinks it necessary for man to have an absolute universal, it naturally has to set for itself the task of finding this universal, inasmuch as God has been put out of the picture. Then when it appears impossible for man ever to find a universal, inasmuch as the particulars of the time are by definition always ahead of any time-generated universal, man says that he does not need any absolute universal anyway except as a limiting concept.⁴⁶

It may be useful in this connection to point out that in the whole situation we have therefore to deal with three types of consciousness.

In the first place there is the Adamic consciousness. When man was first created, he was perfect. He recognized the fact that he was a creature; he was actually normal. He wanted to be nothing but a re-interpretor of the interpretation of God. He was receptive to God's revelation within him and round about him; he would reconstruct this revelation. He was receptively reconstructive. For that reason he had real though not comprehensive unity in his experience.⁴⁷

In the second place we deal with the fallen or non-regenerate consciousness. It builds upon the nontheistic assumption. It in effect denies its creaturehood. It claims to be normal.⁴⁸ It will not be receptive of God's interpretation; it wants to create its own interpretation without reference to God. It will not reconstruct God's interpretation. It will construct only its own interpretation. It seeks to be creatively constructive. It thus tries to do the impossible with the result that self-frustration is written over all its efforts. There is no unity and never will be unity in nontheistic thought; it has cut itself loose from the only existing source of unity. Yet since it could not cut itself loose from God metaphysically and since God, for the purpose of realizing his plan of redemption, has given all men common grace, even this non-regenerate consciousness has rudera or *scintilla*⁴⁹ of the knowledge of God and of the universe. Non-Christians know after a fashion, as Paul tells us in Romans. Thus also there is a relative good in those who are ethically totally evil. The unity that they have in experience is a shadow unity, a unity that prevents them from falling into complete disintegration in this world. Hereafter complete disintegration will follow, though even hereafter the disintegration can only be ethical and not metaphysical; there must be a kingdom or mock-unity even in hell.⁵⁰

In the third place there is the regenerate consciousness. This regenerate consciousness has in principle been restored to the position of the Adamic consciousness.⁵¹ It recognizes anew that man is God's creature and that he has fallen into sin, recognizes the fact that it has been saved by grace. It therefore wants to be receptively reconstructive once more. It wants to interpret reality in terms of the eternal one-and-many.

⁴⁷ The reader may observe again how basically important Adam's place in history is said to be.

⁴⁸ Van Til follows Abraham Kuyper here. Kuyper insisted that though sin is inevitable after the fall, it is nevertheless not the normal situation; the normal situation is the one initially created.

⁵⁰ That in part, because man will remain the image of God even in hell.

⁵¹ It is important – so important that it bears repeating here – that Van Til is thinking of the principles in place, regardless of the practice, which is inconsistent in every case.

It therefore does have unity in its experience, though not comprehensive unity.

Yet this regenerate consciousness is restored in principle only. It does not and cannot, because of the remnants of sin that remain in man even after regeneration, live up to its own principle fully. For this reason there is the relatively evil in those who are absolutely good in principle. This relative evil in the absolutely good has a very great detrimental effect on the consistency of presentation of the theistic position on the part of the Christian. And this inconsistency appears both in word and in deed, in the compromising presentation of the intellectual argument for Christianity and in the un-Christian life that Christians live. Hence non-Christians frequently do not have the full Christian position placed before them.

All this makes the matter of apologetical argument very complicated. Only a clear recognition of the three types of consciousness, of the total inability of the non-regenerate consciousness of itself⁵² to accept the truth of Christianity, and of the necessity of a consistent presentation of the Christian position together with firm reliance on the grace of God, can help us to reason fruitfully with men.

⁵²The "of itself" here is crucial. The non-regenerate consciousness can be regenerated and thus accept the truth of Christianity when the Holy Spirit applies that truth to an otherwise dead heart.

Rationalism, Irrationalism and Revelation

Man's Assumed Ultimacy

Comments by Philip Schaff, Rushdoony and Cornelius Van Til

and James L Cassidy

In a letter to my brother, Don

Code531

Philip Schaff wrote this in 1888. He is a highly regarded church historian. It took me two years to go through all eight volumes (see attachment) and after 5 years of reading, I need to re-read it!

This excerpt is from Volume 7, The German Reformation. There is so much information here, it is mind boggling. He is talking about rationalism vs revelation, that man due to sin, has exalted his reason over scripture - what the bible says. In other words, man has assumed ultimacy in his thinking, in his opinions on life, morality, God, etc., as well as an assumed autonomusness, that he is independent of God. (i.e., all summed up by the word rationalism) With that in mind read this excerpt. I highlighted, emboldened and underlined some key points.

My comments in blue in brackets. Also, comments on Leibniz and the meaning of rationalism and irrationalism near the bottom in an article by James L Cassidy. Vitally important.

§ 9. The Reformation and Rationalism.

The Roman Catholic Church makes Scripture and tradition the supreme rule of faith, laying the chief stress on tradition, that is, the teaching of an infallible church headed by an infallible Pope, as the judge of the meaning of both.¹⁵

Evangelical, Protestantism makes the Scripture alone the supreme rule, but uses tradition and reason as means in ascertaining its true sense.

Rationalism raises human reason above Scripture and tradition, and accepts them only as far as they come within the limits of its comprehension. It makes rationality or intelligibility the measure of credibility. We take the word Rationalism here in the technical sense of a theological system and tendency in distinction from rational theology. The legitimate use of reason in religion is allowed by the Catholic and still more by the Protestant church, and both have produced scholastic systems in full harmony with orthodoxy. Christianity is above reason, but not against reason.

The Reformation is represented as the mother of Rationalism both by Rationalistic and by Roman Catholic historians and controversialists, but from an opposite point of view, by the former to the credit, by the latter to the disparagement of both.

The Reformation, it is said, took the first step in the emancipation of reason: it freed us from the tyranny of the church. [I think he's referring to the Roman Catholic church which was very corrupt and wrong on almost all key protestant doctrines.] Rationalism took the second step: it freed us from the tyranny of the Bible. "Luther," says Lessing, the champion of criticism against Lutheran orthodoxy, "thou great, misjudged man! Thou hast redeemed us from the yoke of tradition: who will redeem us from the unbearable yoke of the letter! Who will at last bring us a Christianity such as thou would teach us now, such as Christ himself would teach!"

Roman Catholics go still further and hold Protestantism responsible for all modern revolutions and for infidelity itself, and predict its ultimate dismemberment and dissolution.¹⁶ But this charge is sufficiently set aside by the undeniable fact that modern infidelity and revolution in their worst forms have appeared chiefly in Roman Catholic countries, as desperate reactions against hierarchical and political despotism. The violent suppression of the Reformation in France ended at last in a radical overthrow of the social order of the church. In Roman Catholic countries, like Spain and Mexico, revolution has become a chronic disease. Romanism provokes infidelity among cultivated minds by its excessive supernaturalism.

The Reformation checked the skepticism of the renaissance, and the anarchical tendencies of the Peasants' War in Germany and of the Libertines in Geneva. An intelligent faith is the best protection against infidelity; and a liberal government is a safeguard against revolution. [I pretty sure the word 'liberal' does not mean what it means today. It had a better meaning back then. probably meant 'charitable,' the fruit of a love for God leading to a love for your neighbor, etc. Also, intelligent faith is in contrast to a blind faith or fideism. Christians need to know why they believe what they believe; not just a blind faith which actually is a dead or ineffectual faith. They need to know the doctrine!]

The connection of the Reformation with Rationalism is a historical fact, but they are related to each other as the rightful use of intellectual freedom to the excess and abuse of it. Rationalism asserts reason against revelation, and freedom against divine as well as human authority. It is a one-sided development of the negative, protesting, antipapal and antitraditional factor of the Reformation to the exclusion of its positive, evangelical faith in the revealed will and word of God. It denies the supernatural and miraculous. It has a superficial sense of sin and guilt, and is essentially Pelagian [Pelagianism is very heretical]; while the Reformation took the opposite Augustinian ground and proceeded from the deepest conviction of sin and the necessity of redeeming grace. The two systems are thus theoretically and practically opposed to each other. And yet there is an intellectual and critical affinity between them, and Rationalism is inseparable from the history of Protestantism. It is in the modern era of Christianity what Gnosticism was in the ancient church—a revolt of private judgment against the popular faith and church orthodoxy, an overestimate of theoretic knowledge, but also a wholesome stimulus to inquiry and progress. It is not a church or sect (unless we choose to include Socinianism and Unitarianism), but a school in the church, or rather a number of schools which differ very considerably from each other.

Rationalism appeared first in the seventeenth century in the Church of England, though without much effect upon the people, as Deism, which asserted natural religion versus revealed religion; it was matured in its various phases after the middle of the eighteenth century on the Continent, especially in Protestant Germany since Lessing (d. 1781) and Semler (d. 1791), and gradually obtained the mastery of the chairs and pulpits of Lutheran and Reformed churches, till about 1817, when a revival of the positive faith of the Reformation spread over Germany and a serious conflict began between positive and negative Protestantism, which continues to this day.

1. Let us first consider the relation of the Reformation to the use of reason as a general principle.

The Reformation was a protest against human authority, asserted the right of private conscience and judgment, and roused a spirit of criticism and free inquiry in all departments of knowledge. It allows, therefore, a much wider scope for the exercise of reason in religion than the Roman church, which requires an unconditional submission to her infallible authority. It marks real progress, but this progress is perfectly consistent with a belief in revelation on subjects which lie beyond the boundary of time and sense. What do we know of the creation, and the world of the future, except what God has chosen to reveal to us? Human reason can prove the possibility and probability of the existence of God and the immortality of the soul, but not the certainty and necessity. It is reasonable, therefore, to believe in the supernatural on divine testimony, and it is unreasonable to reject it.

The Reformers used their reason and judgment very freely in their contest with church authority. Luther refused to recant in the crisis at Worms, unless convinced by testimonies of the Scriptures and "cogent arguments."¹⁷ For a while he was disposed to avail himself of the humanistic movement which was skeptical and rationalistic in its tendency, but his strong religious nature always retained the mastery. He felt as keenly as any modern Rationalist, the conflict between natural reason and the transcending mysteries of revelation. He was often tormented by doubts and even temptations to blasphemy, especially when suffering from physical infirmity. A comforter of others, he needed comfort himself and asked the prayers of friends to fortify him against the assaults of the evil spirit, with whom he had, as he thought, many a personal encounter. He confessed, in 1524, how glad he would have been five years before in his war with papal superstition, if Carlstadt could have convinced him that the Eucharist was nothing but bread and wine, and how strongly he was then inclined to that rationalistic view which would have given a death blow to transubstantiation and the mass. He felt that every article of his creed—the trinity, in unity, the incarnation, the transmission of Adam's sin, the atonement by the blood of Christ, baptismal regeneration, the real presence, the renewal of the Holy Spirit, the resurrection of the body—transcended human comprehension. In Aug. 2, 1527, during the raging of the pestilence at Wittenberg, he wrote to Melancthon, who was absent at Jena: "For more than a week I have been tossed about in death and hell; so that, hurt in all my body, I still tremble in every limb. For having almost wholly lost Christ, I was driven about by storms and tempests of despair and blasphemy against God. But God, moved by the prayers of the saints, begins to have pity upon me, and has drawn my soul out of the lowest hell. Do not cease to pray for me, as I do for you. I believe that this agony of mine pertains to others also."¹⁸

In such trials and temptations he clung all the more mightily to the Scriptures and to faith which believes against reason and hopes against hope. "It is a quality of faith," he says in the explanation of his favorite Epistle to the Galatians, "that it wrings the neck of reason and strangles the beast, which else the whole world, with all creatures, could not strangle. But how? It holds to God's Word, and lets it be right and true, no matter how foolish and impossible it sounds. [due to the fall, our reason is riddled with corrupt reasonings and knowledge that war against God's word. Remember what the bible says, the heart is corrupt, deceitful, who can know it... so Christians must be on guard for anything that exalts itself against the knowledge of God, 2Cor.10:5] So did Abraham take his reason captive and slay it, inasmuch as he believed God's Word, wherein was promised him that from his unfruitful and as it were dead wife, Sarah, God would give him seed."

This and many similar passages clearly show the bent of Luther's mind. He knew the enemy, but overcame it; his faith triumphed over doubt. In his later years he became more and more a conservative churchman. He repudiated the mystic doctrine of the inner word and spirit, insisted on submission to the written letter of the Scriptures, even when it flatly contradicted reason. He traced the errors of the Zwickau prophets, the rebellious peasants, the Anabaptists, and the radical views of Carlstadt and Zwingli, without proper discrimination, to presumptuous inroads of the human reason into the domain of faith, and feared from them the overthrow of religion. He so far forgot his obligations to Erasmus as to call him an Epicurus, a Lucian, a doubter, and an atheist. Much as he valued reason as a precious gift of God in matters of this world, he abused it with unreasonable violence, when it dared to sit in judgment over matters of faith.¹⁹

Certainly, Luther must first be utterly divested of his faith, and the authorship of his sermons, catechisms and hymns must be called in question, before he can be appealed to as the father of Rationalism. He would have sacrificed his reason ten times rather than his faith.

Zwingli was the most clear-headed and rationalizing among the Reformers.²⁰ He did not pass through the discipline of monasticism and mysticism, like Luther, but through the liberal culture of Erasmus. He had no mystic vein, but sound, sober, practical common sense. He always preferred the plainest sense of the Bible. He rejected the Catholic views on original sin, infant damnation and the corporeal presence in the eucharist, and held advanced opinions which shocked Luther and even Calvin. But he nevertheless reverently bowed before the divine authority of the inspired Word of God, and had no idea of setting reason over it. His dispute with Luther was simply a question of interpretation, and he had strong arguments for his exegesis, as even the best Lutheran commentators must confess.

Calvin was the best theologian and exegete among the Reformers. He never abused reason, like Luther, but assigned it the office of an indispensable handmaid of revelation. He constructed with his logical genius the severest system of Protestant orthodoxy which shaped French, Dutch, English and American theology, and fortified it against Rationalism as well as against Romanism. His orthodoxy and discipline could not keep his own church in Geneva from becoming Socinian in the eighteenth century, but he is no more responsible for that than Luther for the Rationalism of Germany, or Rome for the infidelity of Voltaire. Upon the whole, the Reformed churches in England, Scotland and North America, have been far less invaded by Rationalism than Germany. end of excerpt

Notes on Gottfried Leibniz

Van Til notes that he was a rationalist among many others like Descartes, etc. during the 1700s. R. J. Rushdoony wrote about Leibniz in his book, Van Til And The Limits of Reason pg 32:

In Descartes, the ground of all certainty is the human consciousness in independence not only from the universe around him but especially from God. [this is key! and is the result of man's rebellion against God, his declaration of independence, due to the fall of Adam] For Calvin, the personality of man cannot be known nor can it exist without the personality of God. For Descartes, nothing can be known without man's self-consciousness and personality in itself. The universe is a mechanistic one and God merely the creator of the machine, now functioning in independence of Him. The machine has its own laws and workings, and the inventor need not be known in order to understand the machine. The lives of the Wright brothers are of great interest to any student of the history of aviation but utterly irrelevant to any understanding of the principles of flight or to the piloting of aircraft today. The Wright brothers created the first successful plane, but they did not create the principles of flight which made that plane possible. They merely used them. The God of Descartes is ultimately in the same position. More than that, man rather than God is made the ultimate source of universal laws and interpretation. [The sinful effects of the fall; man's assumed ultimacy – not God, his law or will, as ultimate!. The language of Adam and Eve's heart was, I will decide what is good and evil, not God! Is not this how we think coming into this world??? Yes! This is the putrid fountain from where all sin and misery proceeds in this world.]

The subject of man's assumed ultimacy

As a result of Descartes' point of departure, two lines of thought developed in philosophy: empiricism and rationalism. Empiricism holds that the individual man is the standard of truth and holds to the ultimacy of the sense world. The universals are purely subjective. [hence, relativism; everyone does what is right in their own eyes.] The climax of such thought was the skepticism of Hume, for whom no knowledge was possible. Rationalism sought to interpret reality in terms of certain a priori principles. These a priori principles, however, were not anchored in the ontological trinity [God] or in eternity but in the human mind as ultimate. In Spinoza and Leibniz rationalism reached its climax.

For Spinoza, God, man, and the universe are but individuations and aspects of the general idea of substance. [gradation of being mentioned above] But, as Van Til has pointed out, to say that all is God is no different than saying nothing is God. "Univocal reasoning must always lead to negation. Univocal reasoning is based upon negation. The very presupposition of univocal reasoning is that there is no absolute God. [there is not distinction between God as creator and man as his creature.] If there were an absolute God it is ipso facto out of the question to apply the categories of thought to Him in the same way that they are applied to man. [i.e., univocal reasoning. This is what corrupt reasoning amounts to when man does not account for the distinction between man as created and God as the creator. This idea of God relative to man is the effect of the fall. Man thinks that God is just higher up in the order of being (see the comment on gradation of being below). This is a result of man's blindness in this key distinction, the denial of God's self-contained existence and sovereignty, and man's absolute dependence upon Him for everything.]

1. Leibniz sought individuation on the basis of complete description and by reduction to mathematical formula. Revelation was thus an impossibility. [a huge red flag!! This amounts to a denial of God and the Christian faith since all saving knowledge of God, of the Son of God, is by revelation! See Matt. 16:17," And Jesus answered him, "Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jonah! For flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but my Father who is in heaven." God does reveal himself to his creatures, especially his elect, in this case, Peter. God is transcendent and immanent, not just transcendent which is Deism.] The interpreter is the mind of man, not the mind of God, and the mind of man can wholly comprehend all reality. The equal ultimacy of the one and the many is sought without success in the universe, and the old theory of the gradation of being espoused. None of these devices enabled Leibniz to escape the dilemma of Spinoza or to rescue religion as he sought to do; having begun with the ultimacy of the universe, he could do no more than attempt to analyze it into both God and man. "As Leibniz sought to be wholly univocal, so Hume sought to be wholly equivocal in his reasoning. As in the philosophy of Leibniz God lost his individuality in order to become wholly known [trying to bring God down to man, which the world's wisdom/philosophy tries to do], so in the philosophy of Hume God maintained his individuality but remained wholly unknown." [Rushdoony and Van Til use a lot of terms that you may not understand; I learn them eventually.]

Don, you gotta read this to further see what this rationalism is about. It is anti-Christ. Read it twice. I copied the text below the link, excellently stated.

The Essential Van Til – How Irrationalism is Rationalism

- James J. Cassidy
- September 25, 2017

For Van Til no form of unbelief escapes the charge of rationalism. Irrationalism is only a disguised form of rationalism. But before getting to that, it might help to explain what he means by irrationalism.

Irrationalism is modern critical thinking in the tradition of Kant. Irrationalism rejects any form of ultimate authority and therefore must have chance as its ultimate basis. If there is no God back of time and history whose plan is absolutely necessary then chance must rule. This is the logical descendant of the pre-Kantian (rationalistic) philosophy. Van Til explains:

It is this conception of the ultimacy of time and of pure factuality on which modern philosophy, particularly since the days of Kant, has laid such great stress. And it is because of the general recognition of the ultimacy of chance that rationalism of the sort that Descartes, Spinoza and Leibniz represented, is out of date. It has become customary to speak of post-Kantian philosophy as irrationalistic. It has been said that Kant limited reason so as to make room for faith. ... In the first place the irrationalism of our day is the direct lineal descendent of the rationalism of previous days. The idea of pure chance has been inherent in every form of non-Christian thought in the past. It is the only logical alternative to the position of Christianity according to which the plan of God is back of all. (Christian Apologetics, 163-64).

It is often assumed that Kant provides a kind of Copernican revolution in the history of philosophy, overturning every Scholastic table that came before him. But Van Til does not see it that way. Kantian irrationalism is just another form of rationalism. Kant and Descartes are not enemies, but rather twins struggling in the womb of mother rationalism.

So, how then is irrationalism actually rationalism? Before we answer that, we first need to say more about what Van Til means by irrationalism understood in the tradition of Kant. [1] Another phrase we can use for this tradition is “critical thought” (hereafter CT). CT begins with a basic dualism between the noumenal and phenomenal realms. The phenomenal realm is everything we can perceive with the senses. We can only know this realm through the categories of the mind. Therefore, there is a “contribution” that man makes to knowing objective reality. What he can know is only that which is phenomenal. The noumenal realm is, however, directly unknowable by man. It contains things which cannot be perceived – the things of faith (God, being, etc.). In his critique of pure reason Kant, as Van Til says above, limited reason to make room for faith. Man can reason only according to what he can know in the phenomenal realm. Faith then is for those things in the noumenal realm which cannot be known.

It is with regard to the noumenal realm that Van Til speaks about irrationalism. Irrationalism does not mean that man does not use reason. Rather, irrationalism is the idea that there is a place (the noumenal realm) that reason cannot go. It is the realm of ineffable mystery. It is the realm of the unknown. The noumenal realm cannot be known, at least not directly. [2] This means that no source of ultimate authority can be accessed by us living in the here and now. The final arbiter of all truth is inaccessible to us.

Now we can begin to see how irrationalism is really just rationalism. If there is no access to the transcendent realm, then there is no direct knowledge of God or his revelation. That means that man along with his reason is completely on his own. He can speak about facts without any reference to an ultimate and final authority. In this way man is autonomous and is able to interpret reality quite apart from or without reference to God. Irrationalism “boxes out” the noumenal realm where transcendent truth is found. This allows fallen man to interpret reality according to his own sinful reason. Van Til gives a great illustration of this situation which is worth quoting at length here:

In the second place modern irrationalism has not in the least encroached upon the domain of the intellect as the natural man thinks of it. Irrationalism has merely taken possession of that which the intellect, by its own admission, cannot in any case control. Irrationalism has a secret treaty with rationalism by which the former cedes to the latter so much of its territory as the latter can at any given time find the forces to control. Kant’s realm of the noumenal has, as it were, agreed to yield so much of its area to the phenomenal, as the intellect by its newest weapons can manage to keep in control. Moreover, by the same treaty irrationalism has promised to keep out of its own territory any form of authority that might be objectionable to the autonomous intellect. The very idea of pure factuality or chance is the best guarantee that no true authority, such as that of God as the Creator and Judge of men, will ever confront man. If we compare the realm of the phenomenal as it has been ordered by the autonomous intellect to a clearing in a large forest we may compare the realm of the noumenal to that part of the same forest which has not yet been laid under contribution by the intellect. The realm of mystery is on this basis simply the realm of that which is not yet known. And the service of irrationalism to rationalism may be compared to that of some bold huntsman in the woods who keeps all lions and tigers away from the clearing. This bold huntsman covers the whole of the infinitely extended forest ever keeping away all danger from the clearing. This irrationalistic Robin Hood is so much of a rationalist that he virtually makes a universal negative statement about what can happen in all future time. In the secret treaty spoken of he has assured the intellect of the autonomous man that the God of Christianity cannot possibly exist and that no man therefore need to fear the coming of a judgment. If the whole course of history is, at least in part, controlled by chance, then there is no danger that the autonomous man will ever meet with the claims of authority as the Protestant believes in it. For the notion of authority is but the expression of the idea that God by his counsel controls all things that happen in the course of history. (Christian Apologetics, 164-65).

In short, irrationalism (or pushing all forms of ultimate authority, i.e., God, into an unknowable realm) serves rationalism by pleading ignorance (“makes a universal negative statement”) about time. It knows nothing about the meaning of history (because it does not know God whose plan stands back of history) nor does it know what the future holds (because it knows no God and his plan back of the future). [Hence Romans 1:18-23, man suppresses the truth...the knowledge of God, in and around him!!!!] The true meaning and significance of time (whether past or future) is inaccessible to man. Therefore time (whether past or future) only has the meaning that autonomous man would assign to it. That is to give to man’s mind a quasi-divine status, thus breaking down the distinction between the Creator and creature. And that is the heart and soul of rationalism.

[1] Before we get to that, it is necessary to briefly acknowledge that the interpretation of Kant is quite variegated. I am no Kant scholar, and neither was Van Til. So, here I recognize that what I am about to say can legitimately be quibbled with by Kant scholars who would argue on the lines of a different school of interpretation. Our purpose here, however, is not to enter those debates but simply to explain what Van Til understood by modern thought after Kant.

[2] The noumenal realm if it is to be known can be known only indirectly. That is, by way of deduction from what can be known.

The Donum Superadditum of Romanism

The Defense of the Faith, pg 177

Code530

This response may be, and often is, unfavorable. Men will reject the claims of God, but, nonetheless, they will own them as legitimate. That is, they will in their hearts, when they cannot suppress them, own these claims. There are no atheists, least of all in the hereafter. Metaphysically¹⁶ speaking then, both parties, believers and unbelievers, have all things in common; they have God in common, they have every fact in the universe in common. And they know they have them in common. All men know God, the true God, the only God. They do not merely have a capacity for knowing him, but actually do know him.

Thus there is not and can never be an absolute separation between God and man. Man is always accessible to God. There can be no absolute antithesis in this sense of the term. In this respect Protestant theology, and in particular Reformed theology, stands over against the *analogia entis*¹⁷ idea of Romanist theology. On a Romanist basis man might, as it were, escape from the face of God. He might fall entirely into the realm of nonbeing. He is so near to it to begin with [as his creation] that he is always in danger of falling into it. From the outset of his existence it took supernatural grace to keep him from falling into it.¹⁸ There is therefore on the basis of Romanism no inescapable revelation of God- within the constitution of man.

And what is true of God's revelation mediated through man is true also with respect to God's revelation to man mediated through the facts of the universe about him. According to Romanism these too do not clearly and inescapably reveal God to man. They too are too near the realm of nonbeing to reveal God clearly. Thus the Romanist principle of discontinuity is out of accord with the teaching of the apostle Paul with respect to the inescapable knowledge that all men have of God. There is no true commonness of knowledge on this basis between men. For each man may individually slip into nonbeing. Thus no believer can approach an unbeliever knowing that the unbeliever must respond to him in terms of a common relationship that both sustain to God.

¹⁶ By 'metaphysically,' Van Til means the essential nature of things whether we know it or not. We have God in common really and truly, even though those apart from him will not acknowledge it.

¹⁷ "Analogy of being.

¹⁸ Van Til's reasoning here, though complex includes at least the following. Because, on a Romanist scheme, man was not "perfect and complete" at creation, there was need of a donum superadditum in order for him to will the good. Evil, according to Romanism (following early Augustine) is nothing, it is a privation. To the extent that man wills evil he is closer to no-thing, to nonbeing, and has rejected that which is supernatural, i.e., the donum superadditum. So, man is "so near" to nonbeing "to begin with." Hence the need for the superadded gift. And, "there is...no inescapable revelation of God within the constitution of man" because he could, if he chooses only evil, slip into nonbeing itself. Combined with the notion of evil is the Greek notion of the inherent resistance, or imperfection, of matter itself.

Man Suppresses the Knowledge of God By His Assumed Autonomy and Ultimacy

All Sin and Misery Flows From That

Code532

For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who by their unrighteousness suppress the truth. Romans 1:18 ESV

This is what man's sin boils down to: man has declared his independence from God. This is what Adam and Eve did and it is the curse upon all man coming into this world - we have assumed the same thing, we have assumed a degree of autonomy (independence from God) and assumed the ultimacy of our own mind or understanding and reasoning of things, a hostility to God's law, his will. Van Til explains this in his book, The Defense of the Faith, pg 190-193

A word must now be said about the idea of "common notions" referred to in the quotation given above. The present writer made a distinction between notions that are psychologically⁴⁰ and metaphysically, that is revelationally, common to all men, and common notions that are ethically and epistemologically common. The reason for this distinction lies in the difference between a view that is based upon the concept of the creation of man in the image of God, who thus has within him the ineradicable knowledge of God, and a view that is based upon man as participant with God in one general being. All men have common notions about God; all men naturally have knowledge of God, In this sense there is, as Calvin points out on the basis of Paul's letter to the Romans, a natural knowledge of God and with it of truth and morality.

It is this actual possession of the knowledge of God that is the indispensable presupposition of man's ethical opposition to God. There could be no absolute ethical antithesis to God on the part of Satan and fallen man unless they are self-consciously setting their own common notions, derived from the folly of sin, against the common notions that are concreated with them. Paul speaks of sinful man as suppressing within him the knowledge of God that he has. How does he do this? He does this by assuming his own ultimacy. For with this idea of his own ultimacy goes the idea that God and man are aspects of the same reality. They are then a part of a reality that is on the one hand utterly discontinuous with itself, a reality in which chance is king, and on the other hand a reality that is, in principle exhaustively determined by its own internal relations and is in principle exhaustively known to man and God alike. It is these notions of human autonomy, of irrational discontinuity, and of rationalistic continuity that are the common notions of sinful or apostate mankind.

Or else what does the doctrine of total depravity mean? If these common notions were allowed to come to fruition, the mandate given to man by God at the beginning of history could not and would not be fulfilled. There would be no possibility even of finding a single fact in a universe of chance. Individual men would have no common notions with other men; they would not even be able to distinguish themselves from other men. Observation of facts would be impossible because the idea of a fact is, on this basis, unintelligible. And if facts were found they could not be brought into a pattern. How could logic ever be said to have any bearing upon reality in a universe of chance?⁴¹ But if it were granted to have a bearing, this logic would be inherently destructive of the facts of reality and of their individuality. For their identity would be lost in one abstract blank, in some such way as Parmenides said that they would be. There would be no God distinct from man. There would be no creation out of nothing. There would be no fall. There would be no historic Christianity. There would be one common blur.

⁴⁰ One should not think of the word "psychological" as it is commonly used or understood. By "psychologically" here Van Til means that which, in part, constitutes man as the image of God; it is for this reason that he couples it with the word "metaphysically." That which is "psychological" is, literally, "of the soul" of man. It is embedded in his very existence.

Kuyper has well brought out the fact that the natural man, working on the principles of his adoption, must, to be logical, deny all that Christianity stands for

It is this fact-that the natural man, using his principles and working on his assumptions, must be hostile in principle⁴² at every point to the Christian philosophy of life - that was stressed in the writer's little book, Common Grace. That all men have all things in common metaphysically and psychologically was definitely asserted, and further, that the natural man has epistemologically nothing in common with the Christian. And this latter assertion was qualified by saying that this is so only in principle. For it is not till after the consummation of history that men are left wholly left to themselves. Till then the Spirit of God continues to strive with men that they might forsake their evil ways. Till then God in his common grace, in his long-suffering forbearance, gives men rain and sunshine and all the good things of life that they might repent, The primary attitude of God to men as men is that of goodness. It is against this goodness expressing itself in the abundance of good gifts that man sins. And even then God prevents the principle of sin from coming to full fruition. He restrains the wrath of man. He enables him by his restraint to cooperate with the redeemed of God in the development of the work he gave man to do.

⁴¹ The reason for this is that logic, assumed to be static, could not be applied to anything that is subject, by chance, to constant change. Thus, as Van Til says elsewhere logic would be a "turnpike in the sky"; i.e., it would not be able to "come down" to the world.

But all this does not in the least reduce the fact that as far as the principle of the natural man is concerned, it is absolutely or utterly, not partly, opposed to God.⁴³ That principle is Satanic. It is exclusively hostile to God. If it could it would destroy the work and plan of God. So far then as men self-consciously work from this principle, they have no notion in common with the believer. Their epistemology is informed by their ethical hostility to God.

But in the course of history the natural man is not fully self-conscious of his own position. The prodigal cannot altogether stifle his father's voice. There is a conflict of notions within him. But he himself is not fully and self consciously aware of this conflict within him. He has within him the knowledge of God by virtue of his creation in the image of God. But his idea of God is suppressed by his false principle, the principle of autonomy. This principle of autonomy is, in turn, suppressed by the restraining power of God's common grace. Thus the ideas with which he daily works do not proceed consistently either from the one principle or from the other.⁴⁴ ⁴² Jesus said to them, "If God were your Father, you would love me, for I came from God and I am here. I came not of my own accord, but he sent me. ⁴³ Why do you not understand what I say? It is because you cannot bear to hear my word. ⁴⁴ You are of your father the devil, and your will is to do your father's desires. He was a murderer from the beginning, and does not stand in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he lies, he speaks out of his own character, for he is a liar and the father of lies. ⁴⁵ But because I tell the truth, you do not believe me.

⁴⁴ Herein lies the difficulty in precisely defining what man's ethical hostility will always look like. Because of the entrance of sin in the world, and because God restrains that sin so that we are not as bad as we could be, or even as we might want to be, there is no clear, universal line that precisely demarcates the situation of the unbeliever over against the situation of the believer. Some unbelievers live on one level, ethically purer lives than some believers. This, however, does not change the principle itself. It may help to think of "ethical" as synonymous with "covenantal." All people are either in Adam, thus under God's wrath, or in Christ, thus under God's grace. f

Ridderbos [a Dutch reformed theologian who Van Til is criticizing on a particular point] also says that the natural man's ideas of God and of morality are vague. But for him this vagueness is not due to the fact of the conflict just now discussed. He has no interest in distinguishing clearly between the knowledge of the natural man that comes from his creation and his knowledge as it is implied in the idea of autonomy. He thinks it is a mistake to distinguish between common notions derived from the image of God in man and common notions that proceed from the idea of autonomy. Thus he cannot take the principle of autonomy in its full seriousness of opposition to the truth. Thus too he cannot account for the unity of science upon clearly Christian principles alone.

That such is the case may be briefly indicated with respect to two matters mentioned by Ridderbos himself.

In the first place there is the question of the non-Christian's contribution to the progress of science. In the second place there is the question of the theistic proofs. Is it not obviously true that non-Christian scientists have contributed largely to the progress of science? Can they not weigh? Can they not count? Can they not see? Do they not have logical powers as good as those of the believer? Did not Abraham Kuyper, the great protagonist of the idea of a twofold science, the science of regenerate and the science of nonregenerate men, himself maintain that in the field of externals and in the field of formal thought the subjective element of regeneration need not and should not be taken into account? How then can one say that epistemologically the believer and the nonbeliever have nothing in common?

In reply it may be said that only if sin and salvation are thought of along metaphysical rather than along ethical lines is it possible that such questions can arise. If sin is seen to be ethical alienation only, and salvation as ethical restoration only, then the question of weighing and measuring or that of logical reasoning is, of course, equal on both sides. All men, whatever their ethical relation to God, can equally use the natural gifts of God. How could men abuse the gift of God if they could not even use it? And what an easy way of escape for sinners it would be if the result of their folly were nothing more serious than the loss of their natural powers, and with it the loss of responsibility. The presupposition of a modern war is that both parties to it shall be equally able to use the weapons of such a war.

Some Notes on “facts” as Van Til Describes As God Gives Them Meaning, As Opposed to Brute Facts By G. Clark Code533

This subject of “facts” and their meaning as Van Til explained is fascinating to me. Think on this a lot. It’s totally scriptural. If God made all things for his glory, Rm. 11:36, Col. 1:16, etc., then it’s clear that all that God made must have the purpose and meaning associated with each fact whether it’s scientific facts, ideas, historical, you name it. Nothing just happens apart from God’s sovereign decree. And so the 1689 London Confession of Faith so states:

1. God hath decreed in himself, from all eternity, by the most wise and holy counsel of his own will, freely and unchangeably, all things, whatsoever comes to pass; yet so as thereby is God neither the author of sin nor hath fellowship with any therein; nor is violence offered to the will of the creature, nor yet is the liberty or contingency of second causes taken away, but rather established; in which appears his wisdom in disposing all things, and power and faithfulness in accomplishing his decree. (Isa. 46:10; Eph. 1:11; Heb. 6:17; Rom. 9:15, 18; James 1:13; 1 John 1:5; Acts 4:27, 28; Jn 19:11; Num. 23:19; Eph.. 1:3-5)
2. Although God knoweth whatsoever may or can come to pass, upon all supposed conditions, yet hath he not decreed anything, because he foresaw it as future, or as that which would come to pass upon such conditions. (Acts 15:18; Rom. 9:11, 13, 16, 18)
3. By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated, or foreordained to eternal life through Jesus Christ, to the praise of his glorious grace; others being left to act in their sin to their just condemnation, to the praise of his glorious justice. (1 Tim. 5:21; Matt. 25:34; Eph. 1:5, 6; Rom. 9:22, 23; Jude 4)

A classic example is marriage. If you ask someone why does marriage exist? Why do you get married? You'll get a worldly worldview from most (even Christians! due to ignorance) And you'll get a radically different answer from an orthodox Reformed Protestant. One will say I got married out of tradition, and all that goes with that, and because I love her/him (the common affection) and want to be together, etc. The Protestant sees marriage as a type or shadow of the marriage of Christ and his bride (the Church), and his gospel – that it's all about that, a covenantal love, which is an act of the will to keep covenant – aka, a *divine love, that covers (overlooks) a multitude of sin, all of which points to the gospel where Christ overlooks the sins of his bride, the church, the elect. Marriage shadows forth the gospel...to the rest of the world, a testimony!

These are two radically different views. Ruminate on this whole “fact” thing. The facts are what they are and mean what they mean as God meant them to mean. This is really heavy. This separates all the philosophies of the world (the wisdom of this world that God makes foolish) from true/orthodox Christianity. Go to all those passages above. Ok. Good. Excellent. D's alright! ☺

Some quotes by Van Til that will help paint this picture:

Not only do all facts reveal God but they, in revealing him, manifest his attitude toward men.

For us, the facts are what they are, and the universals are what they are, because of their common dependence upon the ontological trinity.

If there are no brute facts, if brute facts are mute facts, it must be maintained that all facts are revelational of the true God. If facts may not be separated from faith, neither may faith be separated from facts. Every created fact must therefore be held to express, to some degree, the attitude of God to man. Not to maintain this is to fall back once again into a natural theology of a Roman Catholic sort. For it is to hold to the idea of brute fact after all. [People want to keep God out of the picture! They do not want to look into the face of their judge! This is why they're taking God out of the schools, out of everything.] And with the idea of brute fact goes that of neutral reason. A fact not revelational of God is revelational only of itself. [neutral reason infers that man has no enmity towards God; he's neutral, sitting on the fence; he can choose to believe or not upon his own assumed spiritual strength, which of course is against scripture, Rom. 8:6-8.

That is to say, it then appears that all the facts of this world, including the facts of man's own consciousness as well as the facts of his environment, must be seen in the covenantal perspective in which, as was pointed out, the Scriptures put them in order to exist at all. All the facts therefore speak to all men everywhere of the fact that God once spoke to mankind in general about their common creation and confrontation by God. All the facts speak of the one event that took place at the beginning of history and therefore of the fact that God was favorably disposed toward mankind and that He offered them eternal life on condition of love and obedience to Him with their whole hearts.”

Col. 1:16

¹⁶ For by him all things were created, in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or dominions or rulers or authorities—all things were created through him and for him.

b. The God of Idealism

The charge that my view of God resembles that of idealistic philosophy has no more foundation in evidence than does the charge that I think of the ontological Trinity as an abstract principle of one and many. The basic distinction between the works of God ad intra and the works of God ad extra is constantly employed in what I have written in order to distinguish between the Christian and all forms of non-Christian thought. Vriend expressed this point well when he says in description of my views:

Christianity stands or falls, epistemologically and otherwise, with the doctrine of temporal creation. Any tampering with this doctrine is damaging to the whole system. Pantheism or Pancosmism is the ultimate heresy.

The doctrine means, roughly, that God chose to give temporal embodiment to a pre-interpreted pattern of things which would publish, each in its own key, the magnificence of his attributes. Man, “his masterpiece of self-portraiture,” was appointed vice regent of this created realm. But he was never to forget that his was a derived and not an original authority. In the realm of thought, conformably to this status, he was to be a re-interpreter of the patterns God had laid down – a task for which he was equipped to perfection. [Vriend, How Do We Know? 35.]

Vriend has done no more than summarize what I have stated over and over again when he says that temporal creation is as important for me as is the doctrine of God's self-contained existence.⁷⁴ And there is no one school of non-Christian thought against which I have argued more frequently for the necessity of holding to temporal creation than against idealist philosophy.

As documentation of this, I shall take first a few passages from the syllabus on An Introduction to Systematic Theology. Chapter 2 deals with the question of methodology. How does the Christian method of theology differ from other methods?

We may speak of the method of Christian theism as being the method of implication. By that we bring out that there is both an a priori and an a posteriori aspect to the method of Christian theism. The a posteriori aspect element is represented in what Hodge speaks of as the gathering and arranging the facts of Scripture. The a priori aspect appears in the fact that it is the facts of Scripture that we gather and not facts in general. Or, we may say that the a priori element lies in the fact that we interpret all the facts with which we deal in the light of Scripture.⁷⁵

A Good teaching on the “facts” of creation relative to the plan of God, the error of all non-Christian Philosophy in suppressing the knowledge of God, and the following subjects

Chance vs. God’s controlling hand, genuine second causes, ultimate cause, Arminian/Romanism, brute facts, creation and providence, Kant, determinism, man’s assumed autonomy and ultimacy

2. SECOND CAUSES

Cecil De Boer suggests that I do not do justice to “second causes.”

Incidentally, this practice of ignoring the actuality of secondary causes involves the danger of what has been called “suffocating supernaturalism,” a habit of mind in which everything is referred to God in such a way as virtually to identify both natural events and human actions with God’s action. . . . Of course, indeed God’s grace in order to believe, but it is I and not God who does the believing – or the doubting, the repenting and the suffering. In other words, if a human being, being believer or unbeliever, wishes to gain true knowledge of a tree or a bar of iron in terms of secondary causes, he must submit his thinking to the objective existence of these things and their qualities as God has established them.²¹

²¹ Cecil De Boer, “The New Apologetic,” The Calvin Forum 19, nos. 1-2 (August-Sept. 1953); 5.

On this point the following remarks seem to be in order: In constantly setting the Christian position in terms of God’s plan, as realized in creation and providence, I have argued the existence of “secondary causes” as established by God! And I have done this over against the various forms of non-Christian thought, whether “classic realism” or modern idealism, in which there is no place for God’s plan, his creation, and his providence.

In their view “second causes” become “first” or ultimate causes; there is then no ultimate cause back of them. As ultimate, these second causes then rest on nothing better than chance. Thus all of human experience is meaningless. It is quite true that “conversion did not make a Euclid out of the Philippian jailor,”²² but this is beside the point under discussion. My interest is only to show that it takes an ultimate cause, God, if there are to be genuine second causes. In other words, it is only on the presupposition of the truth of Christianity that science is to be explained. I do not think the “objectivity” of “classic realism” or of any form of modern realism such as we find represented by John Wild and his friends, allows for the ideas of creation and providence in the biblical sense of the term. It is not “suffocating supernaturalism” to aver that secondary causes are meaningless without God the Creator as primary or remote cause. Suffocation of science and of all human experience would take place if either “classic realism” or modern idealism were true. For then there would be no causes at all. All reality would be composed of irrational particulars. All would then be “chaos and old night.”²³

²¹ Cecil De Boer, “The New Apologetic,” The Calvin Forum 19, nos. 1-2 (August-September 1953): 5.

²³ This a reference to ancient Greek cosmogony probably Hesiod’s (ca. eighth century B.C.) in which chaos gives birth to all that is, and old night comes out of the void. In this cosmogony, chance reigns supreme, and thus whatever comes forth from it comes forth “from the void.”

3. Contingency

A point similar to that of second causes is that of contingency. Jesse De Boer claims that I mistake Morris R. Cohen’s²⁴ “description of natural science for a theological compendium. Cohen said only that natural science is not concerned about origins. “And on this question Cohen is right.”

Obviously Van Til and Cohen are talking about quite different matters, so that Van Til is mistaken if he supposes that he contradicts Cohen. It might be useful to make a careful comparison of Van Til’s formulations of certain Christian doctrines with the formulations in the Westminster Confession. I quote Article II of Chapter V. “Although in relation to the foreknowledge and decree of God, the first cause, all things come to pass immutably and infallibly, yet, by the same providence, he ordereth them to fall out according to the nature of second causes, either necessarily, freely, or contingently. There is no talk of “presuppositions” here, and there is no hint that second causes have not a nature of their own which is open to understanding and which expresses itself, in some cases, contingently.”²⁵

In reflecting on this I shall concentrate on the question of contingency Will the Christian deny that there is such a thing as contingency? In particular will those Christians who subscribe to the Reformed Faith reject any position that makes room for contingency? Is it a sign of Romanism or Arminianism, if not of paganism if one employs the word?

The answer is clearly given in the section of the Westminster Confession quoted by De Boer. The idea of contingency is clearly taught in it.

²⁵ Jesse De Boer, “Professor Van Til’s Apologetics Part II: God and Human Knowledge,” The Calvin Forum 19, no. 3 (October 1953): 33

Then we turn to Cohen's description of contingency in his chapter on "The Metaphysics of Reason and Scientific Method."²⁶ We find him using the idea of contingency. Obviously we cannot reject what he says because he uses the term. We shall have to inquire into the meaning of the term; what does he mean by contingency? Does it mean something similar to what the confession means by the same word? When the confession speaks of contingency, it means something that takes place in accord with God's immutable decree. The confession defends the Reformed Christian against of determinism. Unbelievers, and Christians of the Romanist or evangelical persuasion are ready to charge that in making God's counsel the ultimate ground of whatever comes to pass, Reformed Christians really make God the author of sin and do injustice to the will of man, as well as to the genuine significance of contingency.

This sort of objection was raised by Pighius against Calvin, and the confession speaks the language of Calvin. It insists that God by his counsel controls whatsoever comes to pass. Accordingly, "in his sight all things are open and manifest, his knowledge is infinite, infallible, and independent upon the creature, so as nothing is to him contingent. or uncertain."²⁷ Does this signify determinism? Says the confession, "God, from all eternity, did, by the most wise and holy counsel of his own will, freely, and unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass: yet so, as thereby neither is God the author of sin, nor is violence offered to the will of the creatures; nor is the liberty or contingency of second causes taken away but rather established,"²⁸

There is, to be sure, "no talk of 'presuppositions' here." The confession is not a philosophical treatise. But-the confession does make plain that by the will of man, by second causes - and their contingency, it means something that is within the ultimately determinative plan of God.

On the other hand, all non-Christian thought thinks of the freedom of man, of "second causes" and of "contingency," as quite independent of God's counsel, his creation, and his providence.

²⁶ Chapter 4 in Morris, R. Cohen, Reason and Nature (New York: Harcourt Brace, & Co., 1931)

²⁷ Westminster Confession of Faith, 2.2.

²⁸ Westminster Confession of Faith, 3.1

This marks its ultimate indeterminism. One of the ingredients in a non-Christian philosophy of science is ultimate indeterminism. What a non-Christian can do adventitiously, in spite of his principle, is not now in question. But when a non-Christian scientist gives himself an account of his method, he finds that there is a theory of being presupposed in it and that this theory of being involves the idea of the open universe, a universe not under God's control.

To be sure, if you ask him about his method he will insist that he is open-minded, that he will follow the facts wherever they may lead him, even if they should lead him to the position of the Christian. But to begin with, he must be allowed to make any hypothesis he pleases. And this assumption of the theoretical relevancy of any hypothesis already excludes the Christian position. The Christian believes on the authority of Scripture that "there is no contingency for God" because he controls all things. The relevancy of scientific hypotheses for man therefore falls within the idea of God's providence.

But Cohen, quite consistently from his point of view, finds that the idea of providence must be ruled out if science is to be free in the making of hypotheses. He posits a metaphysics of chance as the foundation of the scientific method: "Contrary to the usual views of it, the principle of sufficient reason as actually relied on in scientific procedure is not only compatible with a domain of chance, contingency or indetermination, but positively demands it as the correlative of the universality of law."²⁹

Now in a universe of chance it might seem that anything might Christian position be true, by chance? Cohen replies that though in scientific procedure we need the idea of chance or indeterminism we also need, as its correlative the idea of determinism. Otherwise we could not exclude the absurd.

It is frequently asserted that the principle of scientific method cannot rule out in advance the possibility of any fact, no matter how strange or miraculous. . . . Actually, however certain types of explanation cannot be admitted within the body of scientific knowledge. Any attempt, for instance, to explain physical phenomenon as directly due to providence or disembodied spirits, is incompatible with the principle of rational determinism. For the nature of these entities is not sufficiently determinate to enable us to deduce definite experimental consequences from them. The Will of Providence, for instance, will explain everything whether it happens one way or another. Hence, no experiment can possibly overthrow it. A hypothesis, however, which we cannot possibly refute cannot possibly be experimentally verified. Thus ruling out ghostly, magical, and other supernatural influences, it would seem that scientific method impoverishes our view of the world. It is well, however, to remember that a world where no possibility is excluded is a world of chaos, about which no definite assertion can be made. Any world containing some order necessarily involves the elimination of certain abstract or ungrounded possibilities such as fill the minds of the insane.³⁰

²⁹ Cohen, Reason and Nature, 151

³⁰ Ibid. 159.

Now all this is, to be sure, not metaphysics in the pre-Kantian sense of the term. Cohen, like many other modern thinkers, disavows man's ability to know ultimate reality. In this they follow Kant in limiting human knowledge to the realm of the phenomenal. But for all its disavowal of having anything to do with the alte metaphysik,³¹ this modern phenomenalism does rest upon an assumed metaphysics. It could not well be otherwise. Cohen's exposition is itself a clear indication that phenomenalism requires the exclusion of the idea of the supernatural and even of providence. Cohen seeks to make sure that his island of reality is safe from any possible attack by the supernatural, in short, by God as Christianity thinks of him. Involved in his phenomenalism is a universal negative judgment to the effect that the God of Christianity cannot exist. The facts and laws of the universe are the resultant of a combination of pure chance and pure determinism kept in balance with one another as limiting concepts. The "old metaphysic" assumed that there is something above or beyond the phenomenal realm. Kant's position claimed that, while something is beyond the phenomenal (namely, God the self, and things-in-themselves), they could not be known.

³¹The "old metaphysic" assumed that there is something above or beyond the phenomenal realm. Kant's position claimed that, while something is beyond the phenomenal (namely, God, the self, and things-in-themselves), they could not be known.

A completed rational system having nothing outside of it or any possible alternative to it, is both presupposed and beyond the actual attainment of any one moment. It coincides in part with the Bradleyan Absolute, but it is an ideal limit rather than an actual experience. Unrealized possibilities are within it precisely to the extent that it contains endless time.³² The idea of God with incommunicable attributes is reduced to the notion of a limit or idea. Eternity is not an attribute of God in distinction from man; it is, as is the whole idea of God, no more than an ideal. "Eternity may thus also be viewed as the limit or ordering principle of a series of expanding vistas."³⁸

In one form or another, modern phenomenalism is widely prevalent. In the syllabus on Christian Evidences I have dealt with a number of scientists who hold a position similar to that of Cohen. And in the syllabus on Christianity and Psychology I have tried to show how the supposedly neutral method of science actually involves the negation of Christianity. The importance of the subject warrants a remark or two about the latter point.

In applying the scientific method to the question of religion here is first the assertion of open-mindedness. We are told that the question whether or not religion has an objective reference does not concern the psychologist of religion. He is merely seeking to describe, not explain, the religious consciousness. He wants the native witness of that consciousness. So he asks the Christian, the Mohammedan, the Buddhist, and various others what religion means to them. The assumption back of this first point is to the effect that no one knows in advance that there is a true as opposed to a false religion. Christianity, with its concept of supernatural, infallible revelation, is put on a par with other religions. Abstract possibility is placed higher than God.

Second, the question of criterion or standard is introduced. Which religion, if any, is better than other religions? Thus Christianity could never appear as the true religion; it can, and does in the case of many psychologists of religion appear as better than other religions.

³² Cohen, Reason and Nature, 158.

³³ Ibid., 156

Third, the definitions of religion that come out of this process of mere "description" invariably speaks of the objective reference of religion as indeterminate. The God of the average psychologists of religion is either a force within the universe or some sort of something beyond the universe. It is anything but the self contained and self-determinate God of Christianity. Robert Millikan³⁴ says, "In three words, I conceived the essential task of religion to be 'to develop the consciences, the ideals and the aspirations of mankind.'"³⁵ Similar definitions of religion have advanced by Heber D. Curtis,³⁶ Albert Einstein," and many others; Sir James Jeans³⁸ tells us that some millions of years ago certain stars wandered blindly through space. "In course of time, we know not how, when, or why, son of these cooling fragments gave birth to life." Thus in the same breath we have an assertion of agnosticism, a denial of Christianity, and the assurance that chance rules the world.³⁹

In 1909 Jeans returned to England and was thereafter appointed Stocks Lecturer in Applied Mathematics at Cambridge. He held this post 1912 when he retired Guildford to devote himself completely to mathematical research and writing books.

Here, then, is the picture as I am convinced ministers of the gospel should see it. Modern scientific methodology pretends to be that of a neutral, non-metaphysical descriptive procedure. As such it is in accord with modern post-Kantian philosophy, which is also, by and large, phenomenalistic- [man believes only in what is perceived by the senses; the noumenal realm is unknowable.]

The modernist and neo-modernist minister feels that he is in accord with both modern science and modern philosophy if he talks vaguely about a "wholly beyond" and of "eternal values." And the modern minister is quite right. He is permitted to use the terms "God," "Christ," and "the Holy Spirit" all he wants as long as they are no more than idealizations and projections of the natural man who does not want to meet his Creator and Judge. accomplished scientist and physicist who

It is the orthodox Christian who allows himself to be deceived if he embraces the current form of dimensionalism⁴⁰ in which the supposedly neutral scientist describes the lower aspect of reality. If the orthodox Christian accepts the "description" of the "neutral" scientist in the realm of the phenomenal, he should, to be consistent, also accept the vague indeterminate deity of the modernist minister. We noted before that orthodox Christianity does not comport with the "classic realism" Jesse De Boer praises so highly. Still less does it fit on to the descriptive phenomenalism of post-Kantian science and philosophy. For the latter is basically similar to the position of idealism, and idealism is no friend of Christianity.

Even so Romanism and evangelicalism may be expected to think of classic realism" as a fine theistic foundation for Christianity and of phenomenalism as an innocent and neutral description of the lower dimension of reality. For Romanism and evangelicalism do not believe that whatsoever comes to pass comes to pass by virtue of the counsel of God.

They need not therefore object to the idea of contingency of "brute fact," and therefore to an utterly indeterminist and indeterminate principle of individuation. When modern scientific methodology needs the idea of the "open universe" of facts that are what they are for no reason at all, the Romanist and Arminian need not, from their point of view, too greatly object. They would make the Bible itself teach the indeterminate.

On the other hand, when modern scientific methodology needs the ideal of comprehensive description as a correlative to its notion of brute fact, Romanism and evangelicalism need not too greatly object. For their own rejection of the idea of the Reformed Faith is due to the fact that it is not, in their view, possible that there should be an all-determinative ultimate Cause and at the same time genuinely significant second cause.

Romanism and Arminianism have toned down the doctrines of creation and providence so as to make them consistent with their "experience" of free will. Their thinking is therefore in some measure vitiated by the indeterminist-determinist, irrational-rationalistic methodology of non-Christian thinking.

⁴⁰ Dimensionalism, as Van Til uses it, is any philosophy that seeks to bifurcate the structure of reality. Upper story/lower story, real/ideal (Plato), phenomenal/noumenal (Kant) are all examples of dimensionalism.

Accordingly, they can, from their point of view, legitimately have common notions, as common interpretations of the universe with the unbeliever.

In particular, they can join with "classic realism" in the formulation of a natural theology. They can allow, that is, that the unbeliever can and does, together with him, interpret God's natural revelation aright.

This point will engage us further in the next chapter. For the moment we refer to it in order to indicate that it is only those who are committed to the Reformed Faith who hold the Christian doctrine of reality with full seriousness. They alone are concerned to maintain and press the significance of the doctrines of creation and providence at the point even of identification and ordering of space-time facts. They alone realize that once it is admitted that space-time factuality can be identified_ that one fact can be assumed to have any determinate character so that it may be differentiated from other facts apart from the creative and providential activity of God, indeterminism will creep in everywhere. Admit indeterminism in the lowest dimension, that of arithmetic, and you are forced, in principle, to admit it everywhere. Only if God is the ultimate self-determinate fact, and therefore the Creator and sovereign providential determiner of all the facts of the world, do any of these have anything about them that marks them as distinct, as individual, and therefore as countable. For that reason only the Calvinist is as much opposed to the "brute facts" as they are presupposed in scientific methodology as when they appear in theology.

And as alone the Calvinist is concerned to oppose indeterminism at the lowest level of existence, so also he alone is concerned to oppose determinism. Cohen and many others exclude the idea of providence or miracle on the ground that if they were admitted, the idea of testing hypotheses by brute facts as demanded by scientific methodology would be done for; it is again only the Calvinist who demurs. The Calvinist will not allow space-time facts to derive their determinate character from the ordering activity of the human mind as though it were ultimate. The doctrines of creation and providence, when seen in their bearing, both on the facts to be known and on the human mind that seeks to know them, require that man think of himself as the finite re-interpreter of a reality that is what it is, ultimately because of the determinative activity of God with respect to it. Allow the principle that man is the ultimate source, the only source that needs to be mentioned of the determinate character of any of the facts of the universe, and one has, in principle, dethroned the sovereign God everywhere.

Jesse De Boer says that I am

“unduly concerned about establishing the certainty of natural science. Scientists do not need to be encouraged to defend themselves or to screw up their confidence in their business. General talk about the certainty of natural uniformity is no aid to the search for fruitful hypotheses and for means of testing them. There is no good reason for recommending the Christian faith on the ground of its playing a role visa a vis natural science like that of the indulgent uncle who picks up the gambling checks of his erring nephew. In strict language, the most important and distinctive components of Christian faith are matters of belief, not of knowledge or proof.”⁴¹

A little earlier, when discussing the idea of the uniformity of nature, he says, "At any rate, natural uniformity signifies a type of order among natural events and things, not a relation of creatures to God."⁴² Again: "Naturally, physics does not exhaust man's knowledge about natural things; besides attending to those features of things which physics investigates, man can also attend to the creatureliness of creatures and understand that the ground of their existence is in God."⁴³ Once more: "But the important question is, What can the Christian do to defend himself? I have suggested that he can do something by offering a careful definition of the limitations and hierarchical interrelation of the sciences, and by doing science without indulging in philosophical heresies."⁴⁴

⁴¹ J. De Boer, "Professor Van Til's Apologetics: Part II," 28, 29.

⁴² Ibid., 28.

⁴³ Ibid., 30.

⁴⁴ Ibid., 32.

The reader will note, from our former discussion, from these quotations, and especially if he rereads the articles of Jesse De Boer, that there is a considerable difference between us.

De Boer apparently holds that one is not “indulging in philosophical heresies” if only one holds to “classic realism” rather than to modern idealism.

De Boer apparently holds that one can first interpret the order of nature scientifically in conjunction with non-Christians and afterward attend to the creatureliness of created things. In consonance with this he holds that the “distinctive components of Christian faith are matters of belief, not of knowledge or proof.”

I hold that one cannot attend to the creatureliness of things at all unless one does so at the beginning. It is when as a physicist I investigate what is proper to my field that I attend to the creatureliness of things. This is not to engage in worship while handling my laboratory equipment. I am thinking only of Kuyper's famous slogan, Pro Rege.⁴⁵ [For the King] How could I afterward attend to the creatureliness of things if first I have allowed, in effect, that they are not creatures and that there is nothing created about them? Here as a Christian, I first allow that the ideas of creation and providence are irrelevant as hypotheses since they cannot be tested by brute facts. If I allow this then I am doing what neither Kuyper nor Calvin would have thought of doing, namely, thinking of the uniformity of nature as not signifying "a relation of creatures to God." In fact, I have then excluded the creatureliness of things from my field of investigation.

If then I afterward attend to this creatureliness and therefore to the idea of God as Creator, this becomes a matter of "belief instead of a matter of knowledge. My religion then becomes a "faith-construct," a practical rather than a theoretical idea.

A sad example of such dimensionalism, which shares theoretical knowledge of the phenomenal realm with unbelievers and then reduces the Christ of the Scriptures to a projection, is found in the theology of President John A. Mackay of Princeton Seminary. Once a great stronghold of the Reformed Faith Princeton now teaches modern dimensional philosophy instead of Christianity.

If then Christianity as interpreted in the Reformed creeds, as championed by Kuyper, Bavinck, Hodge, Warfield, and Machen, is to be presented to men today, ministers must learn to understand the riches of their own position. Christianity is the sine qua non of the intelligibility of anything. Why am I so much interested in the foundations of science? It is (a) because with Kuyper I believe that God requires of us that we claim every realm of being for him, and (b) because with Kuyper I believe that unless we press the crown rights of our King in every realm, we shall not long retain them in any realm.

Insights on the Meaning of Scholasticism

By Cornelius Van Til, The Defense of the Faith

Pg. 286

Code535

The scholastic idea is based on the conviction that the method of finding truth advocated by Aristotle and the method of finding truth advocated by Christianity can be brought into a synthesis.²⁴

But the method of Aristotle is based upon the assumption that the world, including man, is not created by God. It is based on the assumption that man is not, as created in God's image, an analogue of God. In other words, the Christian idea that human knowledge is analogous to God, as set forth in the first part, cannot be combined with the Aristotelian idea that man is ultimate.

The synthesis of Aristotle and Christ is as monstrous as is the synthesis of Kant and Christ. The main thrust of Kuyper's theology, and of that of Bavinck and Warfield as well, is against this scholastic synthesis. In Reformed theology the ideas of Scripture, of the self-contained God of Scripture, of temporal creation, of man's being made in the image of God, of the fall of man as involving the setting of the creature in the place of the Creator, together form as well as express an idea of analogy that is opposed to the idea of analogy advocated by scholasticism.

The scholastic idea is that all being is, as being, good. Hence if there were to be an absolutely evil will in man, he would have no more being at all.

This virtually constitutes a denial of the Reformed doctrine of total depravity. According to this doctrine a creature, given existence or being by God, does not lose any of its being, does not "tend to nonbeing," when it sets itself in ethical opposition to God. Satan has as much being now as he had when he was an angel. But he has an absolutely evil will. And the sinner has as much being as has the saint. But in principle, so the Reformed confessions repeat as it were in unison, the natural man hates God and his neighbor. And this is a perfect hatred in principle even though it never expresses itself fully in the course of human history.

My critics might well concern themselves with this absolutistic position of Kuyper's. This head-on collision between the principle of the natural man and the principle of the regenerate man, can it do anything but destroy science? Warfield thought it would. He therefore reduced Kuyper's distinction between two kinds of science to one of degree. Otherwise "there would be no science attainable at all." [Cf. B.B. Warfield, "Introduction" to Francis R. Beatie, Apologetics, 1903]

Warfield accordingly attributes to "right reason" the ability to interpret natural revelation with essential correctness. This "right reason" is not the reason of the Christian. It is the reason that is confronted with Christianity and possesses some criterion apart from Christianity with which to judge of the truth of Christianity. [Cf. B.B. Warfield, "Apologetics," in The New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge 1908]

Appealing to "right reason" in the sense defined, Warfield asks it to judge in its own terms that Christianity is true.

We found the whole Christian system on the doctrine of plenary inspiration as little as we found it upon the doctrine of angelic existences. Were there no such thing as inspiration, Christianity would be true, and all its essential doctrines would be credibly witnessed to us in the generally trustworthy reports of the teaching of our Lord. . . . Inspiration is not the most fundamental of Christian doctrines, nor even the first thing we prove about the Scriptures. It is the last and crowning fact as to the Scriptures. These we first prove authentic, historically credible, generally trustworthy, before we prove them inspired. [B.B. Warfield, "The Real Problem of Inspiration," in The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible, 1948]

The result of this method of appealing to "right reason" is that theism and Christianity are shown to be only probably true. [Ibid. 218]

It is not, of course, that Warfield himself entertains any doubts about the plenary inspiration of Scripture. He was one of its greatest advocates. Nor is it that he disagrees with Calvin in maintaining the clarity of natural revelation or in holding that all men have the sense of deity. It is only that, in apologetics, Warfield wanted to operate in neutral territory with the nonbeliever. He thought that this was the only way to show to the unbeliever that theism and Christianity are objectively true. He sought for an objectivity that bridged the gulf between Kuyper's "natural" and special principles.

In seeking to reduce the difference between Kuyper and Warfield to one of emphasis, Masselink, in effect, chooses for Warfield. It is impossible to hold with Kuyper that the Christian and the non-Christian principles are destructive of one another and to hold with Warfield that they differ only in degree.

In maintaining that the positions of classic realism" and of scholasticism are an essentially true interpretation of reality, Cecil and Jesse De Boer have also in effect, chosen their part with Warfield against Kuyper.

For myself I have chosen the position of Kuyper But I am unable to follow him when, from the fact of the mutually destructive character of the two principles, he concludes to the uselessness of reasoning with the natural man.

The Arminian holds that on the Reformed conception of man there is no sense to preaching. There would, the Arminian argues, be no approach to an identity of meanings between the preacher and the man "dead in trespasses and sins" to whom he preaches. The dead man cannot even count and weigh and measure. There is an absolute severance of all connection between him and the living.

For this absolute deadness of the natural man, the Arminian substitutes the notion of degrees of deadness, in order thus to establish degrees of contact with the truth. There can be no absolutely evil deed because then the will itself would be destroyed. It is ambiguous or meaningless, says the Arminian, to talk about the natural man as knowing God and yet not truly knowing God.²⁵ Knowing is knowing. A man either knows or he does not know. He may know less or more but if he does not truly know, he knows not at all. The Calvinist, he argues, is an absolutist who destroys the light of day.

In reply to this the Calvinist insists that there are no degrees in deadness. The natural man does not know God. But to be thus without knowledge, without living, loving, true knowledge of God, he must be one who knows God in the sense of having the sense of deity (Rom. 1). For the spiritual deadness of the natural man is what it is as suppression of the knowledge of God given by man virtue of creation in God's image.²⁶

Hence Warfield was quite right in maintaining that Christianity is objectively defensible.²⁷ And the natural man has the ability to understand intellectually though not spiritually, the challenge presented to him. And no challenge is presented to him unless it is shown him that on his principle he would destroy all truth and meaning. Then, if the Holy Spirit enlightens him spiritually, he will be born again "unto knowledge" and adopt with love the principle he was previously anxious to destroy.

²⁵ Note that God himself speaks this way; compare Romans 1:19 with 1 Thessalonians 4:5.

²⁶ In other words, spiritual deadness is not inactivity with respect to God; it is opposition to him.

²⁷ This is a most important point To put the matter more succinctly, it is not the case that Van Til has chosen Kuyper over Warfield. Rather, Van Til has retained much of Kuyper's notion of the antithesis and yet, because of the sense of deity in all men, has also retained the idea, supported by Warfield, that apologetics is a central and necessary theological discipline. Thus, Van Til stands on the shoulders of both men in this case.

skip to page 360: Van Til makes a good summary of this idea of neutrality in apologetics that Warfield and most evangelicals and even some of the Reformed support.

Only a very brief survey of Greene's position has been given. His method is clearly similar to that of Warfield. There is the same concept of reason apart from the question of its regeneration, as able to interpret general revelation with essential correctness. And there is the same ability and function ascribed to this reason with respect to determining the factuality of special revelation. When Greene begins from the abstract possibility of the existence of the Supernatural and goes on to the probability and after that to the actuality of its appearance, he employs the categories of the natural man without challenging them. He seeks to prepare men for an acceptance of the gospel by showing them that the gospel is possible, probable, and actual in terms of the principles of continuity and discontinuity of the natural man.

It is this avowed insistence that apologetics must deal neutrally with such questions as the existence of God and the facts on Christianity that marks the Old Princeton apologetics. And it is this type of apologetics that is definitely rejected as being out of accord with the principles of the Reformed Faith in Kuyper's Encyclopedia of Sacred Theology. It is difficult to see how Masselink can reduce the difference between "Princeton" and "Amsterdam" to one of emphasis and speak of one historic method of apologetics used by both.

3. FLOYD E. HAMILTON³³

The old Princeton approach in apologetics may be seen in easy survey in the first edition of the Reverend Floyd E. Hamilton's book, The Basis of the Christian Faith (New York, 1927). In his preface Hamilton says: "Special thanks are due to Dr. William Brenton Greene, Jr., former professor of Apologetics in Princeton Theological Seminary, for his assistance in revising and criticizing the whole book" (p. ix).

In the first Chapter Hamilton deals with The Human Reason.

Before we can attempt to prove the existence of God or discuss the truth of Christianity, we must show that the soul exists as something distinct from the body. We must show that our reasoning processes can be trusted, and that we have a valid right to reason from our sensations to the real world back of these sensations. And we must also show that when we attempt to deal with questions such as the existence of God and the possibility of his giving a revelation to man in a Book, we are dealing with questions which properly lie within the scope of the human reason. First of all, then, we must discuss the question of the existence of the soul (op. cit., p. 15).

³³Floyd Hamilton (1890-1969) was a theologian and missionary. Though critical of evolutionary theory, he was likely one of the first in the Princeton tradition to advocate a notion of "progressive creation," which was a kind of theistic evolution.

The human mind is shown not to be a mere stream of consciousness (p. 18). "It is an active agent and not a passive substance" (p.19).

So here we take our start. We have found and identified ourselves. "Here at any rate we have reality" (ibid). Having identified our real selves we examine our reasoning process. We receive sensations, In receiving them our mind is not a blank.

In addition to these space and time forms which the mind uses in the thinking process there are certain other "mind born" or innate ideas which the mind originates upon the occasion of receiving sensations. We will mention only two ideas of this class which particularly concern us in our discussion. They are the ideas of "being" and "cause." We cannot think without unconsciously assuming the existence of something. When we receive a sensation our mind assumes the reality of the sensation and the reality of the fact that receiving it. When we think, we assume the reality of at least the mind that is doing the thinking. This idea of existence is thus seen to underlie all thought, and to be a presupposition of thought. We call it by the name of "being." It is an idea not received through the senses, but originating in the mind itself upon the occasion of sensation.

When the brain receives a sensation it assumes that there is a cause of the sensation. It may not be able to tell what the cause is, but it never doubts that there is a cause. It is not an idea which comes into the mind through the senses, but is originated upon the occasion of sensation (pp. 21, 22)

Thus we have ourselves as the real starting point, and we have the idea of cause which serves us as a bridge between ourselves and the external world. We are now ready to express judgments about the world. "But when is a judgment trustworthy?" (p. 25.) When it is made in accordance with the laws of reasoning. Our minds and the facts they deal with must be normal. Our minds must possess the necessary facts. Our minds must not fall into logical fallacies (p. 25). If care is exercised "in checking the process of reasoning it is possible to trust the reasoning process in all ordinary circumstances" (p. 26).

Reasoning must not proceed regardless of facts. And "there are some things which are beyond the realm of reason" (p. 27). Then too our emotions must be kept in control.

However with these limitations and imperfections guarded against there remains a wide scope of activity for the mind. The mind can take all the evidence which comes to us through the senses and reason about it, building up a splendid structure of logical truth. It has a right to take these facts which come to us through the senses and use them as stepping stones into the realm of cause lying back of them. The mind becomes the judge of evidence presented to the mind in support of the giving to man from God of a supernatural revelation. If the mind, however, after weighing this evidence decides that such a revelation has been given to man, there it has no right to set itself up as a judge to decide what things embodied in this revelation are reasonable, for in the nature of things, if there has been revelation from God, it will concern those things which cannot be discovered by the unaided human reason. Since the mind has no actual experience with things which do not come to it through the senses, it has no right to deny truth which comes through revelation from a realm where sense perception is impossible.

In regard to revelation, the legitimate sphere of the human reason is to investigate the evidence in support of such revelation and then to decide as to the meaning of that revelation. (p. 28).

In the second chapter Hamilton invites us to advance with him "over the bridge of cause which we have erected" from ourselves to the external world. In the third he leads us even beyond the world by the same bridge to God. We know "that we must have been caused by someone other than ourselves who must have had sufficient power to produce our souls, which are the observed effect" (p.44). This gives us "our first link in the chain of proof for the existence of God" (p. 46). One by one the other links are forged and soldered to the first. There is order in the universe (p 47). There is design (p. 48). In man himself there is will. Will there not be a Will back of the universe? (p. 50). Man has a conscience. It is a "certain characteristic innate in the mind which enables a person who has reached the age of reasoning ability, to make a judgment as to the rightness or wrongness of any course of action which may be presented to the mind" (p. 53). "Shall we not then conclude with Bordon P. Bowne³⁴ that man has a moral creator?" (p. 54.)

The preceding arguments are so plain that the conclusion is inescapable. There is no alternative for thinking man in the face of such evidence but to fall upon his face before the wonderful Being who has created him, and to worship him. Let it be borne in mind that the arguments cited above are cumulative. Each adds proof to the others, and their force is only felt when they are taken together (p. 54).

Thus theism is supposed to have been established by a neutral process of reasoning. As has earlier been indicated, such a theism is not the theism of Scripture. Calvin's procedure is quite the reverse of Hamilton's. Following Descartes and others, Hamilton thinks that man can identify himself in terms of himself. Calvin says the knowledge of self immediately presupposes the relation of the self to God as its creator. No identification of the human self is possible in the realm of open chance. And no bridge of cause can be made from that which cannot be identified (the self) to something else that cannot be identified (the external world).³⁵ The idea of causation cannot be taken as intelligible by itself in order by means of it to show that God has created the world. If God has created the world the idea of cause in the world must be determined from this its derivative nature. If it is first assumed to be working without God it cannot after that be shown to be working only in dependence upon God. [the problem with natural theology or Aristotelian method of proving God's existence]

³⁴B. P. Bown (1847-1910) was of the school of Boston personalists who taught at BU in the late 19th century.

The same point is to be made about the ideas of order, purpose and morality. If any of them can function independently of God at the beginning why do they need God at all?³⁶

³⁶ The reader should keep in mind here that Van Til's criticism has to do with the principles involved in a defense of the faith, and not specifically the practice. One may, as Van Til himself says elsewhere, start anywhere in an apologetic discussion. One may start with causality, for example, and show how it must be the case that God is the cause of the universe. But this practical starting point must never be a principal one, lest we think causality within itself has its own explanation, which only later needs supplementation by referring to God. Causality itself is understood properly only within the context of God's sovereign plan in and for the universe.

Moreover, how shall these several autonomous entities be forged into a chain? How shall there be cumulative force in the series of arguments if each argument is itself without force?

The whole procedure followed is out of line with the basic principle of the Reformed Faith. Only in God's light is there any light. The Psalmist (Psalm 94) teaches us to begin from above with God instead of from the bottom with man. If even a creature, who is derivative, knows, how much more shall the original know? That is the method of the Psalmist. Descartes assumes that man as the original knows, and that then God also knows. If man's knowledge is not from the outset defined as dependent on God's knowledge it never can be.

It was in line with Arminian and with Romanist thinking to use such a method as Mr. Hamilton uses. Wherever autonomy is hailed in theology why should it not also be welcomed in apologetics? But when autonomy is over and over regarded as the root of all evil in theology why then should it be welcomed in apologetics?

In chapter five of his book Hamilton deals with the Reasonableness of Supernaturalism. God is shown to exist; therefore it is possible for him to intervene in the universe (p. 87). He goes on to show the probability of such intervention.

1. In the first place, it seems strongly probable that God would not create man and leave him alone. A personal God, if he is at all like men in his fundamental characteristics, as the Bible says he is, having created a personal being, would most naturally want to have communion and fellowship with the being he had created.
2. It also seems unlikely that man should be left in ignorance of the ultimate destiny of the human soul. If it is true that there is a Heaven and a Hell, to one of which places every soul will go, then it seems unlikely that God would leave man in ignorance of these momentous facts. Especially is this true, if the corollary is true that man's ultimate destiny is decided by his actions upon the earth during a short lifetime, and that he will have no further chance after death to redeem his mistakes made during life on the earth. Most of all, if God intended as the Bible teaches, to have this redemption applied to a man's life through faith in a risen Lord, there he would most certainly tell men about this fact in some way or other. We thus see that there is a very great probability, if the God represented in the Bible exists, that he would reveal certain vital facts to man (pp. 93, 94).

From the question of probability we go on to that of actuality:

Now a little reflection on the subject will be sufficient to convince one that the only way we can decide whether or not such a revelation has been given to us by God is by an examination of the evidence tending to show that such a revelation has been given. Since the matter is one purely of fact, and of fact alone, it can be decided only by the evidence. We may have a theory that it is impossible for the earth to revolve upon its axis, but no matter how plausible our theory may sound, our having the theory will not prevent the earth from turning on its axis once every twenty-four hours! In the same way, if God has given a revelation, no amount of theorizing to the contrary can change the fact. The only way those who do not believe God has given a revelation to man can prove their case, is for them to show that the evidence for such a revelation is worthless (pp. 98, 99).

When we deal with the witnesses to supernatural revelation we ask: "Is the witness competent?" "Is the witness reliable?" "Was the witness in a position to know the facts?" (p. 99.) So we are ready as neutral observers to take up "the evidence for the Bible as the Word of God and decide for ourselves whether or not it contains such a revelation" (p. 100). In particular we are prepared to deal with the Bible and its claim to be the Word of God.

To be sure we must not make unreasonable claims for ourselves.

If God teaches that a certain doctrine is true, then it is not man's place to decide whether or not it is reasonable! It is man's duty to accept it, even though he may not be able to understand all about it or to prove its truth by the human reason! If God has taught it, then all man has a right to do is to accept it. The whole question resolves itself into a question as to whether God has or has not taught it. In deciding this question man has a perfect right to use his reason to the fullest extent in judging the evidence on this point. It is purely a matter of fact, and as such must be judged according to the laws of evidence. But if the intellect is convinced that God actually did teach these doctrines in the Bible through inspired prophets and inspired writers of the various books of the Bible, then the intellect has no right to set itself up as a judge of the reasonableness of the doctrines which God teaches. The intellect can reason about the meaning of the doctrines taught, but it has no right to reason about the truth or falsity of the doctrines themselves after their meaning has been decided upon. To do so would be to put oneself above God himself and to question his own wisdom. Some men apparently do not hesitate even to do this, but to the man who has at least average intelligence, such a course is nothing less than blasphemy (p. 133).

It is our rightful business as men then to seek to identify this body of literature as being the Word of God. We do not take it to be self-attesting from the outset. We do not accept it as the Word of God on its own assertion. On the contrary, by means of criteria not taken from the Scripture as self-attesting we test the Bible as to its claim to be the Word of God.

We must "approach the Bible as we would approach any other book" (p. 134). Then we find, step by step, link by link, that it meets all the demands which we legitimately make of any book claiming to be the Word of God. So on the question of Biblical ethics Mr. Hamilton says: "We now wish to show that Christianity fulfils all the demands which must be made of any system which will work, and that the ethical system taught in the Bible is superior to any other system of ethics (p. 147).

In Chapter 10 Mr. Hamilton deals particularly with "the historic trustworthiness of the Bible." He tests the Bible by well established philosophical knowledge obtained independently of the Bible.

The Bible is not a textbook of philosophy, but the Bible in no wise contradicts the theories which are most accepted by philosophers of the present day (p. 167).

He finds that the historicity of the Bible is not contradicted by "the clearly discovered and well proved facts of modern science..." (p. 168).

In chapter 16 there is a discussion of the resurrection of Christ and in chapter 17 of the fulfilment of prophecy.

We have reserved until last the two strongest proofs that the Bible is the Word of God and that Christianity is true. We believe that in fulfilled prophecy and in the resurrection of Jesus Christ we have positive proof that our claims are true. We believe that these two lines of proof are so strong that they will convince anyone whose mind is open to evidence, that we have as much positive proof of 54 mins left in book just as strong a character that the Bible and its contents are true and in very truth the Word of God, as we have that the Declaration of Independence was a genuine document produced in 1776 in Philadelphia, by the representatives of the thirteen colonies (pp. 283, 284).

In the resurrection of Christ we have a miracle that differs from all other miracles. Had there been no resurrection there would have been no Christian Church. The Christian Church as we know it was founded absolutely on the resurrection of Jesus Christ and all that it implied (p. 284). So we turn to the New Testament as containing the only historical documents attempting to explain the origin of Christianity or the belief in the resurrection (p. 286).

And when we are through we conclude:

We have examined all possibilities and find that the only conclusion possible is that Christ actually rose from the dead. If he did rise, that fact carries with it, as was said at the beginning of the chapter, all the implications of supernatural Christianity. It is fact that carries clouds of glory trailing through our Christianity. Nothing but a supernatural Savior is possible after he has risen from the dead. The fact of Christ's resurrection establishes beyond a doubt the truth of Christianity. But not only does it prove that Christianity is the one true religion. It also proves that all that Christ said and did was true, and this in turn proves that the Bible is the Word of God (p. 295).

The argument from fulfilment of prophecy again points to the truth of Christianity.

God alone knows the future, and the future can be revealed only by God. When, therefore, we find a book unquestionably written hundreds of years before the prophecies recorded in it were fulfilled, can there be any question but that those prophecies were revealed by God himself? The prophecies which we shall cite will be those so detailed that there will be no question but that they were actual prophecies, and we shall show that no man unless he were speaking as the mouthpiece of God, could possibly have known or even guessed that the events prophesied would take place, both because of the unlikelihood of such events taking place at all, and because of the impossibility of a human being foretelling the events in such detail (pp. 297, 298).

So then after we have identified ourselves then built a bridge of cause, order, purpose and morality to God, we approach the Biblical writings as we do any other book. The foundation fact to which they testify is the resurrection of Christ. Thus we have reached the risen Christ by neutral approach. After that we stand on his authority. He witnessed to the Old Testament as the Word of God. He promised the Spirit to his apostles so they might write the New Testament as the completion of the Word of God.

After that we bow before the Word of the sovereign God and require men to subject their reason to its verdict.

It was the after this that Kuyper so vigorously opposed in the sort of apologetics we have before us. If reason is not challenged at the outset it cannot fairly be challenged at all. Why should not "reason" be as anxious to suppress the evidence for the fact that the Bible is God's Word as to deny the system of truth of that Word? No one can recognize the fact of Christ's resurrection and the fact of the divinity of Scripture except in terms of the meaning of the resurrection and the content of the system Scripture presents. In all the stress on the fact that true faith is not blind but is faith in response to the presentation of evidence, this indissoluble unity of the that and the what of Christianity is overlooked.

It is impossible to discuss the works of Charles Hodge Casper Wistar Hodge Francis Patton and others. Suffice it to have dealt briefly with Warfield, with the sainted William Brenton Greene, Jr., and with his pupil, Floyd E. Hamilton.

Even in what has been adduced it is evidenced that the basic loyalty of these men is the full-orbed Reformed Faith. None the less it remains true that in their avowed apologetical procedure they embraced a method that resembled that of Bishop Butler, rather than that of Calvin.

To have a balanced view of the relation of the "old Princeton" and the "Amsterdam" apologetics, it is imperative that we turn to the question of "inconsistency" in the views of Kuyper and Bavinck. We have stressed the fact that in his main contention Kuyper strongly opposed the idea of a neutral area of interpretation between believers and unbelievers. And we have shown that Warfield was strongly insistent on the necessity of proceeding with unbelievers on a neutral basis with respect to the problem of theism and even with respect to the claims of Scripture to be the Word of God, But we have also indicated that Kuyper too some times reasons as though he were on neutral grounds with unbelievers. Even in his Encyclopedia, in which he so valiantly defends the idea of a twofold science, even in this work which Warfield so vigorously criticized Kuyper sometimes does the same thing that Warfield does. Indeed Warfield has pointed out this very inconsistency in Kuyper.

We shall deal briefly with the evidence that indicates the presence of this inconsistency in Kuyper. We shall also deal briefly with Bavinck. As this inconsistency has to some extent been pointed out in Common Grace and in the syllabus Introduction to Systematic Theology we shall here deal with the matter chiefly in relation to the question of Scripture.

Both Kuyper and Bavinck have greatly stressed the fact that Scripture is the objective principle of knowledge for the Christian. The Christian must regard all the knowledge that he obtains from a study of nature and history in the light of the doctrines of creation and providence and of the work of redemption through Christ. Only thus is the Romanist doctrine of natural theology to be avoided. Apologetically this means that the Scriptures must be taken as self-attesting and the system of truth they contain as the light in which all the facts of experience are seen for what are. [Ps 36:9]

Therefore, no corroboration is to be sought for the truth of the idea of Scripture, or for the truth of the system of doctrine it contains, by an appeal to the natural man as he interprets life in terms of his own principles. In fact it cannot be allowed that the natural man can in terms of his principles interpret any aspect of experience correctly. He does, to be sure, contribute to the edifice of true interpretation, but he does this because his principle is false and the Christian principle is true

Yet while showing that the natural man is bound to seek to destroy the truth of God that speaks to him, Kuyper and Bavinck at times seek comfort in the fact that the natural man will approve their sayings even when he is not asked to change his assumption of autonomy.

Excellent insights by Dr. Lane Tipton on Van Til

A Critique on Kierkegaard's and Kant's Philosophy

an Excerpt from Cornelius Van Til's book

The Defense of the Faith p 209-215

Excellent comments by Lane Tipton (Kant)

Code538

My intro: Van Til is a philosopher and a theologian; probably the best in the 20th century. I have found his teaching invaluable in understanding all the Christian doctrines. He has an amazing talent for stripping off the facades of modern evangelicalism, Roman Catholicism, Arminianism, and the modern philosophies of the world such as Kierkegaard's existentialism, Karl Barth's views, etc. He's a hard read until you get used to the philosophical terminology (which he assumes you know, ha ha). It is Dr. Oliphant, who edited the 4th edition of Van Til's book, The Defense of the Faith, who clarifies what Van Til means by them in footnotes.

From what I can see so far, Existentialism is anti-Christian philosophy. Take your time on this. It has taken me about 9 months of reading Van Til to comprehend all the terminologies in their contexts to understand his explanations...to understand the importance of Total Depravity and man's assumed autonomy and ultimacy in his reasoning in an overall effort to distant him from God's authority. After you do get used to it, you'll understand more clearly why Paul, when arguing against the Greeks, emphasized the fact that the God who they should be worshipping is the Creator of man, who is not like man at all (not like the Greek gods who are like man but on a higher scale of being which the Roman Catholics hold to!!). Paul magnifies the Creator/creature distinction most apparent and for very good reason. Van Til brings this out more so than any other theologian I've studied. (Read Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion - Van Til refers to him a lot.)

a. Daane's Objections

Now Daane chooses against the historic Reformed position on this matter. In Common Grace I was speaking of Calvin's argument against Pighius.¹³ (This will engage us again when we come to the question of the reality of second causes.) I was defending Calvin's view that second causes have genuine significance not in spite of, but just because of, the fact that they act in accord with the one ultimate cause or plan of God.¹⁴ Pighius argued that unless the human will is ultimate, it is not free and therefore not responsible. Calvin argues that man's choice is free and responsible just because it is within and therefore subject to the ultimate will of God.

¹⁴ Note in this regard the Westminster Confession of Faith, 3.1: "God, from all eternity, did, by the most wise and holy counsel of His own will freely, and unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass: yet so, as thereby neither is God the author of sin, no is violence offered to the will of the creatures; nor is the liberty or contingency of second causes taken away, but rather established" (emphasis added).

Yet Daane calls this determinism. I argued against ultimate possibilities outside the plan of God. Daane concludes that therefore I deny "genuine possibilities that do not become actualities in history." As was the case with Pighius so with Daane, a genuine possibility may and must be outside the plan of God. As Pighius called Calvin's position deterministic, so Daane calls my position simple restatement of Calvin's, deterministic.

It is no marvel then that my views should appear to him also to be rationalistic. The Calvinist holds that God controls whatsoever comes to pass. For him the ultimately possible is only that which God has planned shall actually take place. The Reformed idea of Scripture, as already noted, presupposes and is presupposed by this idea. But the evangelical speaks of determinism and rationalism when he hears such things. Daane does likewise.

But Daane does more than side with the Arminian against the Calvinist position on the question of human choice. In his dissertation, Kierkegaard's Concept of the Moment, he expressed admiration for this existentialist philosopher's conception of history. Kierkegaard¹⁶ does not believe in the God of Scripture. He does not think of God as having incommunicable attributes, as being self contained. He does not believe in temporal creation or the historical fall. In fact, he is violently opposed to all these truths. For him they form part of a system of truth. And truth, according to Kierkegaard, is not a system. He does not distinguish between the non-Christian, Hegelian idea of system, which envelops God, and the Christian idea of God's internal, self-consistent existence. For him any system, Christian or non-Christian, is anathema. In short, Kierkegaard replaced the non-Christian "rationalism" of Hegel with an equally non-Christian "irrationalism" of his own.¹⁷ In his Concluding Unscientific Postscript he argues at great length against the possibility of there being any such thing as absolute truth identifiable anywhere in history. His thinking is obviously controlled by the basic principles of Imanuel Kant, for whom everything that man knows is relative to the human mind. Kierkegaard's views are as definitely opposed to historic Christianity as are those of Hegel.

¹⁷ I put these terms in quotation marks because I think that Hegel's "rationalism" involves irrationalism, these and Kierkegaard's irrationalism involves rationalism. The contrast between these two is within the scheme of rationalism/irrationalism that marks all non-Christian thought.

Yet Daane speaks with deep sympathy of this modern existential irrationalism of Kierkegaard. "It was to the task of smashing Hegel's system and re-introducing Christianity into Christendom and thereby teach[ing] men what it means to exist, that Kierkegaard devoted a frail body but a penetrating intellect, a withering and a brilliance of humor."¹⁸ To be sure, Daane has his criticism of Kierkegaard, but he speaks of Kierkegaard's concept of "the Moment" as being "orientated in the direction of the Christian Faith."¹⁹

I shall quote Daane at length in this connection.

Becoming for Hegel, was a conceptual becoming. We shall now discover that for Kierkegaard, Becoming is paradoxical and "qua" paradoxical defies all rational comprehension. In the belief that Hegelianism not only destroyed Ethics and Christianity, but existence itself, and defining existence as the conjunction of the temporal and the eternal, in his most fundamental book, The Concluding Unscientific Postscript, Kierkegaard formulates his whole approach to Rationalism in terms of the Finite and the Eternal, and attacks Hegel on his concept of Time.²¹ To a direct revelation there is no possible faith-response. Whether Kierkegaard is correct in his analysis of the divine motif for the form of the "incognito," is a question that need not detain us, since it is not germane to our discussion, but he is undoubtedly correct in his assertion that God does not desire to overwhelm us by a direct revelation of himself, but effects the type of relationship which necessitates that the believer be related to God by faith alone; i.e. precisely as one who believes. That this One, in the form of a servant, is God is surely not immediately apprehensible to any human faculty. The mere human perception can merely say that this is "flesh of my flesh, and bone of my bone." Any more adequate comprehension must admit the relevancy of the statement that "flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee"; i.e., not the flesh and blood of Christ, nor your flesh and blood, Peter, "but my Father which is in heaven." Even the miracles of Jesus are not direct revelations of God in immediacy, for their recognition as miracles is contingent upon the prior belief that this One is God. Moreover the very revelatory purpose of the miracle lies beyond itself, for which reason the New Testament never speaks of miracles except in conjunction with the idea of a "sign, and since a sign always points beyond itself, [it] indicates that even the revelational significance of the miracle does not lie in immediacy. Nor were the miracles of Jesus intended to be an unambiguous proof of his divinity. Such a method of proof would have been inept in an age when miracles were not regarded as something extraordinary for, according to Matthew 12:27, popular belief conceded the ability of working miracles even to the sons of the Pharisees.

Nor is there a "direct recognition" of God in Nature. Nature is indeed the work of God, but only the handiwork of God is directly present; God is not. This is the divine elusiveness that God has absolutely nothing obvious about him. It cannot immediately occur to anyone that God exists, yet his very invisibility corresponds to his omnipresence. . . . If God were given in Nature in immediacy, then a direct and external relationship would obtain. Immediacy corresponds to aestheticism, and a direct God-relationship is the essence of paganism; but God in Nature qua "incognito" destroys the immediacy and thus compels faith to take pains to find God through self activity, which involves an irruption of inwardness.²² The essential Paradox is that God became in individual Man; that the Eternal became that which is against its very nature; i.e., temporal. As such it is the Paradox, and in such a Paradox lies the possibility of offense.²³

From this standpoint one can understand the motif that underlies Kierkegaard's strong disavowal of the value of apologetics and his insistence on the necessity of contemporaneousness with the Paradox. No proofs, speculative or historical, may stand between the individual and Christ so as to make the vision of Christ a glorious one and thus keep the individual from seeing only the Christ of the Humiliation Paradox, Offense, which is the only Christ in which one can believe, for an aesthetic or rational glorification of Christ is to render Christ into something men can know or admire, but by that very token to render him into something that cannot be believed.²⁴ It is the writer's contention that Kierkegaard's deepest criticism of the above three interpretations of Reality is a criticism of their Moment, and it is further the writer's contention that Kierkegaard's most basic and determinative category is his concept of the Moment, which determines the peculiar characteristics and motifs of his thought and writings. It is at this point that Kierkegaard makes his most effective critique of non-Christian thought and makes his greatest contribution to Christian thought. We turn then in our next chapter to a closer examination of Kierkegaard's concept of the Moment.²⁵

¹⁹ Ibid., 14.

²⁰ Ibid., 47.

²¹ Ibid., 63.

²² Ibid., 73, 74

²³ Ibid., 88.

²⁴ Ibid., 95

²⁵ Ibid., 116.

So far then it appears that Daane (a) espouses the idea that there is such a thing as genuine historical possibility independent of the plan of God and (b) expresses sympathy with, if not complete agreement with, Kierkegaard's concept of the Moment according to which there is no plan of God back of history and no will of God directly and plainly expressed in history. Consonant with both of these points Daane charges me with holding to a rationalistic position because I defend the idea that there is a God who has a plan for history and who makes this plan directly and clearly known to man in Scripture

In The New Modernism I had defended the idea that though Christianity is surely not a deductive system, or an aspect of the coherence of the reality of which idealists speak, yet it is directly identifiable intelligently defensible. I argued, as I have done constantly and that unless we may presuppose the God of the Bible, then there is no rationality in human experience. God's revelation in nature and in Scripture is inherently clear.²⁶ Men have no excuse for not worshipping God.²⁷

All this is flatly contrary to Kierkegaard's views. For Kierkegaard there is no clear, not even a direct, revelation of God either in nature or in Scripture. And so there can be no intellectual defense of Christianity. And Daane agrees at both points with Kierkegaard.

In the first place Daane rejects the view, so greatly stressed by Calvin, that God speaks clearly to man in nature and history. When men see sin go unpunished, says Calvin, they ought to conclude that there is a final judgment coming.²⁸ All men were from the beginning represented in Adam. And to Adam God gave supernatural revelation about his purpose with history. For this revelation conjoined as it was in paradise with natural revelation, all men are responsible. They have no excuse.

But Daane argues as though men do have an excuse since revelation in history is "incomplete and always inconclusive." Daane speaks of Kierkegaard's view of Christ and its relation to history and says:

This is not necessarily to deny that history contains a revelation of Christ. The writer, Kierkegaard notwithstanding, believes that it does, but it is a denial that any part of history gives conclusive demonstration of God in Christ. History surely reveals God, but history is ever an incomplete process, and there the revelation is incomplete and always inconclusive. When the historical process shall be complete then only will the revelation be conclusive, but since this is the "telos" of history it will also be the "finis" of history. Until then the just must live by faith. Thus Kierkegaard's Moment, through its insistence upon contemporaneity, prevents Christian Faith from becoming sheer knowledge whether of an intellectual or historical kind.

The Moment becomes a denial "intelligam ut credo."²⁹

²⁶ Romans 1:18.

²⁷ Romans 1:20.

²⁸ See, for example, Institutes, 1.5.10.

²⁹ Daane, "Kierkegaard's Concept of the Moment," 150.

In the second place Daane maintains that the Kierkegaard conception of the Moment safeguards the Christian religion against all would-be intellectual defenders. He says: "Kierkegaard's Moment is also a safeguard against the ever present temptation in Christian Theology to define faith as a 'credo ut intelligam.' [I believe in order that I may understand.] The Moment not only insists that Christ can only be known through faith, but that faith ever remains faith and does not undergo a transformation into knowledge."³¹

In The New Modernism I argued that such a position as that of Kierkegaard, in denying that there is any direct and clear revelation of God to be found anywhere, is irrationalist. I further argued that taking the God of Scripture as the presupposition of our thought gives us a sound, and the only sound, argument for the existence of God, since with such a God there is an intelligible basis for human experience, and without such a God there is no such ground. But with Kierkegaard, Daane throws Hegelianism and historic Christianity into one basket and labels them as "rationalist." The only conception of system that comes into his discussion is the non-Christian one, in which ". . . reason, in the act of comprehending the particular, arrives at its universal by abstraction, thereby leaving particularity behind, and as a consequence arrives at an abstract universal."³²

This is Kierkegaard's view of the function of reason. But Daane apparently knows no other. When I criticize Kierkegaard from the point of view that God controls history by his plan, my criticism is said to be "launched by one standing outside of existence."³³

At this point Kierkegaard gives a strong warning against the danger of abstractionism in theology, which Dutch theology has not always avoided, and as a consequence has sometimes moved in a direction that tended to deny the validity of existence and history. . . . When the plan of God is so employed that God's relationship to the world and the world's relationship to God is rationalized and fixed, so that the plan of God becomes a norm for thought and life prior to existence, life is rendered meaningless, and God's relationship to the world becomes an eternal-static, rather than a temporal-dynamic relationship. To those who employ this type of theological method, Kierkegaard cries, "Away from speculation."³⁴

³¹ Daane, "Kierkegaard's Concept of the Moment," 150

³² Ibid., 151.

³³ Ibid., 154.

³⁴ Ibid., 156

Before heeding this warning we should recall that for Kierkegaard "speculation" includes the idea of direct and finished revelation in history. "Away from speculation," as Kierkegaard thinks of speculation, involves "away with the Bible!" as historic Christianity thinks of the Bible. To hold to the idea that the loci of theology as set forth by Reformed theologians keep us from facing the Christ person to person, is to listen to Kierkegaard's warning. The Christ of Kierkegaard can nowhere be found. And faith in this Christ is faith in a blank.

It is not thus that Reformed theologians are wont to speak. When Daane so largely defends Kierkegaard's views, one cannot help but wonder whether the structure of his thought is taken from the Scripture or from existentialism as it has been taught at Princeton Seminary since its reorganization in 1929.

The structure of my thought is simply biblical in the orthodox sense of the term. Daane has not produced and can produce no evidence to the contrary. But there is much evidence that his objection to my position as being rationalist and determinist springs from sympathy with the irrationalism of Kierkegaard.

Underlying Daane's charge that the structure of my thought is not biblical but speculative lies a different conception of Scripture than that historically entertained by Reformed theology. Reformed theology thinks of Scripture as a directly discernible expression of the will of God for man. Modern existentialism, on the other hand is based on the idea that human experience makes its norms and deals as it moves. For it "to exist" involves knowing nothing in the way of absolute truth. Daane has apparently been deeply influenced in his thinking by this modern form of non-Christian thought.

How the World's Philosophies Have Left the True and Living God

A short summary

by Dr. Lane Tipton

on Van Til's Critique of Kant / Van Til and Idealism (Lesson 3)

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=5YehR9DyWd8>

A Critique of Kant's constructivist transcendental idealism

My summary first: Kant, basically, says that the objects of man's experience conform to the inherent categories in the mind of man that he has *invented*¹ – this idealism - the objects/experiences of life conform to the categories of the mind in order to assign meaning to them. Realism is the other way around - the mind of man conforming to the objects. The effect of Kant's philosophy is that man will, independently of God's true knowledge of all the facts of the universe, come up with different meanings for things; a vastly different worldview. This is what it means when we say that man has forsaken God, taken God out of the classroom, has kept God out of his thinking, etc. It's the classic example of man declaring his independence from God. Just what Adam and Eve did – I will declare what is good or evil, not God's revelation of truth as it really is. Man has established himself as absolute and ultimate authority! not the absolute and ultimate authority of God. This is the danger of all worldly philosophies. All of them have in effect ignored God, suppressed the knowledge of God (Rom. 1:18) and have put themselves into the room of God.

¹Eccles 7:29 See, this alone I found, that God made man upright, but they have sought out many schemes.

Dr. Lane Tipton, Minute 25:03-30:45: "Now Van Til brings Kant directly into view in the Survey of Christian Epistemology pg 174, and so, especially when we're thinking here, pg 174, about Van Til, ah, in his critique of Kant, we need to hear this. This is important. He says quote, "If man is given any original interpretive power to begin with, that is, if man can, IN ANY SENSE, come into contact with any object of knowledge apart from God, that power can never be taken from him. And if any special revelation should later come to man, it could never be absolute! [key point!!!] because the interpretive element that man himself would contribute, would always introduce the independently contingent."

Now here, Van Til speaks of Adam as created and posits two things by way of critique. First, if by virtue of creation, Adam were given any original interpretive power to begin with, that can never be taken from him, then it would be an enduring and inalienable gift. Adam would have original interpretive power, and what does he mean by that? He means Kant! He means if Adam had the categories that Kant claims he has – the transcendental aesthetic and the transcendental analytic – and he had them independently of his knowledge of God, then he would always be testing the revelation of God to see to what degree it comports with those original interpretive categories inherent to him. Van Til is saying, please hear this, that is NOT a Christian view of reason as created by God. Why? Well, secondly – On the assumption that Adam were given this legislative, constructive, original reason, Van Til says that would not comport with Covenant Theology. [see how you have to really know other doctrines to see the fallacies of worldly philosophy?!] If it were the case he says, that Adam has original interpretive power to begin with, then special revelation, the revealed terms of the covenant of works could never have absolute authority! Kant's notion of reason as having original interpretive power is inconsistent with the self-authenticating authority of natural and special revelation. The moment you conceive of Adam with this constructive original interpretive power, you've gutted the substance of the deeper Protestant conception. Why? Well, if you think back to what Vos taught and what Van Til taught, which we surveyed in the Doctrine of Revelation, you remember, that reason never at any point existed apart from special revelation. Reason is not only a revelation from God internal to man, but as a gift from God, it is properly subject to the authority of his word. Gerhardus Vos in the RD 2 [RD is Reformed Dogmatics], 43 thru 44, says this about Adam's relation to God. He says, "Since Adam was perfect in every respect along with his natural relationship to God, belonged a completely clear awareness of this relationship. Now let's pause. Given Adam's nature as the image of God, along with his natural relationship to God, there was a completely clear awareness of that relationship – he knew from nature by innate knowledge what God could demand of him, that he stood under God's authority, under the moral opposition between good and evil, that upon breaking the natural relationship, punishment would follow – all of this and still more, he was assured the favor of God and life, provided that he persevered in the good. Point 1 here, under our 3rd point about reason, is that by virtue of creation¹, Adam naturally knew God, naturally knew the obligations of God, naturally had a relation to God by which he was under authority. And so, in the nature of the case, reason is not an independent constructive authority. It's naturally subordinate to the authority of God by virtue of the image endowment." End of the video excerpt.

¹My comment: Another thing that the world's philosophers discard, blur, or completely disregard because they don't believe in it, is the Creator/creature distinction. This has vital and important implications which Dr. Tipton goes into in another video. If we are truly created by God, then by nature, by our creation, we are derivative or wholly dependent upon God; we cannot have any original knowledge that did not come from God by way of natural or special revelation.

Now, here are some related quotes from Van Til in The Defense of the Faith p 397, 401- 402, on Kierkegaard's worldview. And you'll see how similar it is in principle to Kant's view of man's assumed independence from God or his assumed ultimacy and autonomy. Van Til's critics are arguing against God's ultimate control, his sovereignty in everything that comes to pass.

I define the meaning of existence in history in terms of this counsel [God's eternal decree]. And I am aware of the fact that Kierkegaard and his followers define "the moving stream of time," existence without reference to that counsel. I also know that Barth [Karl Barth], like Kierkegaard, rejects the idea of God's counsel or decrees as back of history for the same reason that Daane offers us. Barth argues that the idea of the ontological Trinity as God in himself apart from the world, and the idea of a counsel of such a God as controlling the events of history, would impose a timeless logic on history. It would, he says, do injustice to the uniqueness and therewith to the reality of time. It would, most of all, do injustice to the Christ-Event. My reply to this is that Barth's theology is a philosophical construction destructive of historic Christianity. If the reality and significance of the "moving stream of time" is to be maintained at the expense of the self-contained God and his eternal plan for history then the Christ of the Scriptures disappears. He sinks into the abyss of unrelated irrationalism.

Here again Daane assumes, with Kierkegaard, that finite existence is a concept that must be defined independently of God. It must not be defined in terms of the plan of God. God's revelation as Daane, in agreement with Kierkegaard, says in his dissertation must not be a "norm for thought and life prior to existence." Possibility itself must be made independent of the plan of God and finite existence is existence apart from this plan.

Pg 407-408

He [Daane] wants the independence of man apart from the counsel of God. For him one does not do justice to history unless the events that compose it are existences apart from the plan of God. In other words, it is impossible to satisfy him on the significance of the historical unless this historical is taken in the irrationalist sense of modern existentialism.

A good summary of Van Til's critics:

In conclusion, the picture as a whole may be placed before us. Masselink criticizes me from the point of view of Hepp's "common notions" and from the point of view of the "Old Princeton Apologetics" [basically, Arminian] with its natural theology. Cecil De Boer criticizes me from the point of view of the scholastic [Greek mixed with Christianity] notion of degrees of being and knowledge. He agrees with the Romanists, who say there can be no absolutely evil deed because then the will would have slipped into nonbeing. Jesse De Boer criticizes me from the point of view of a Christianity that is erected on "classic realism" and modern phenomenism [knowledge only thru the senses, denying divine revelation]. Daane criticizes me from the point of view of a sympathy toward the "New Princeton" with its dialectical theology based upon existential philosophy.

In every instance, though with varying degrees, it is the autonomous man that peeps through these criticisms. Knowingly or unknowingly, these men are unwilling to make their stand on the principle of the self-identification of God in the Scriptures.⁶⁴ They seek to satisfy the illegitimate demands of the natural man who sets himself up as his own ultimate interpreter. I do not rejoice in this. I do not report it as a victory; God forbid. But I signalize it in the hope that with me they may rather seek to serve the witness of the Spirit in convicting the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment.

⁶⁴ We can see here how important the beginning of this book is, with its outline of a Reformed doctrine of God.

My Letters

Letter to SM Oct 5 2023

You and I were, for awhile, until we got it cleared up, were talking about two different things; we were in two different categories regarding what philosophy is, etc. Next time I'll need a long, long, long, long time (lol) of me describing what I was trying to say because it involves a thorough understanding of the key doctrines of Christianity such as the true nature of man (man's total depravity, original sin, man's assumed ultimacy and autonomy), then, God's redemptive plan, the nature of God (his aseity, simplicity, sovereignty, immutability, his self-completeness), divine revelation, the Creator/creature distinction, all of which for the most part, philosophers and many evangelicals (sad to say) deny or tone down considerably in order to accommodate man's carnal thinking. They compromise these things in an effort to reach common ground to win them to Christ. But it doesn't work. It backfires.

Here is the main issue and it's seen in Ps 36:9 and 1Cor1:18-20

*For with You is the fountain of life;
In Your light we see light*

[“your light” is revelation which non-Christian philosophers deny: so by revelation we see or perceive light, i.e., true knowledge; (light is knowledge) of the facts God has created, facts about God and about ourselves.]

And regarding all non-Christian worldviews (ie philosophers of all types...Kant, Hume, Descartes, Plato, Leibniz, etc.) 1Cor1:20 addresses them:

¹⁸ For the message of the cross is foolishness to those who are perishing, but to us who are being saved it is the power of God. ¹⁹ For it is written:

*“I will destroy the wisdom of the wise,
And bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent.”*

*²⁰ Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this age? Has not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?

In short, all non-Christian worldviews cannot discern the true or ultimate meaning of all the facts of the universe. Why? Because they are blind. That's the essence of it. Van Til touches on this in this excerpt I found:

“According to the principle of Protestantism, man's consciousness of self and of objects presuppose for their intelligibility the self-consciousness of God. In asserting this we are not thinking of psychological and temporal priority. We are thinking only of the question as to what is the final reference point in interpretation. The Protestant principle finds this in the self-contained ontological trinity. By his counsel the triune God controls whatsoever comes to pass. If then the human consciousness must, in the nature of the case, always be the proximate starting point, it remains true that God is always the most basic and therefore the ultimate or final reference point in human interpretation.

This is, in the last analysis, the question as to what are one's ultimate presuppositions. When man became a sinner he made of himself instead of God the ultimate or final reference point. And it is precisely this presupposition, as it controls without exception all forms of non-Christian philosophy, that must be brought into question. If this presupposition is left unquestioned in any field all the facts and arguments presented to the unbeliever will be made over by him according to his pattern. The sinner has cemented colored glasses to his eyes which he cannot remove. And all is yellow to the jaundiced eye. There can be no intelligible reasoning unless those who reason together understand what they mean by their words.”

The best thing to do, timewise, is to listen to Dr. Tipton (on the Reformed Forum), and Dr. Bahnsen on YouTube over and over and over as you walk around; and along with that, continue to learn all the doctrines; you can't do one without the other. And then you see what riches we Christians really have! I sent you a whole slew of videos that are good, but all you have to do is to search for those things on YouTube; they're everywhere. There's a whole thing on Existentialism that I think Tipton did; might have been Bahnsen.

Letter to SM Oct 7

When I say that worldly philosophy such as that of Kant or Kierkegaard or Descartes, does not take into account God (as Creator, Controller, etc.), the next question is, what do you mean by God? Your idea, or the extent of your doctrinal understanding of God's nature, covenant relationship, Adam's fall, man's depravity, and man's derivativeness in relation to God, the Creator/creature distinction, etc., will determine this. A dynamic and extensive working knowledge of God (the more the better), his ultimate plan, for example, is key to understanding what Dr. Tipton is saying, and what Van Til is saying in distinction to what Kant and ALL the other philosophies are saying. I remember a long time ago that I would say that schools are taking God out or evolution is not in accord with the bible; all this is true, but that's all I knew; my depth of understanding of what it meant to say "the schools are without God" was very shallow and basically had little 'wow' effect. It was a "little faith."

All these things having to do with orthodox Protestantism (the Reformed doctrines; Christianity come to it own) are required in order to understand. in living color, Kant's error and all philosophy's error, without which you could not. Van Til and people like him will take you to the next level of understanding yourself and God into the right application phase of your life, the result of growing in faith or knowledge. So make your prayer this: "Teach me your word; show me how to live it!" or Ps 119:18...Open my eyes that I may see wondrous things out of your law. Guys like Kant, Kierkegaard, et al, don't want to hear it or do this.

Whoa! I this just came to me: now you can see what Jesus meant when he said this in John 5:43

42 But I know you, that ye have not the love of God in you. 43 I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive. 44 How can ye believe, which receive honour one of another, and seek not the honour that cometh from God only?

Kant and all worldly philosophy starts with man as the ultimate starting point in intelligibility as opposed to starting with God (as ultimate) who gives intelligibility to all the facts of the universe (since he created all facts in the universe in the first place.}. They have cut God out of the picture entirely; the same reason they take God out of the schools, etc., believe in evolution, etc.

I'm listening to this one now: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=5YehR9DyWd8>

At first it seems complicated, but now I'm getting used to the terminology and manner of thinking.

Letter to several Oct 12 The Creator/creature distinction

I had to think about this for a while. Here is a huge reason why Paul makes this distinction in Acts (which I glossed over in the past not knowing its importance) when arguing with the Greek philosophers, and why the bible in other places makes this point as well. If man is created by God, a creature of God, then this clear inference stated by Tipton is true which the unregenerate reject, despise and is irksome to them. Why is this important, in fact, vital? Dr. Lane Tipton describes this:

Dr. Lane Tipton quotes: that by virtue of creation, Adam naturally knew God, naturally knew the obligations of God, naturally had a relation to God by which he was under authority. And so, in the nature of the case, reason is not an independent constructive authority [as Kant, et al believes it is - my insert]. It's naturally subordinate to the authority of God by virtue of the image endowment." end of comment

Now read roman 1:18-21 with greater understanding!

18 For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who suppress the truth in unrighteousness, 19 because what may be known of God is manifest in them, for God has shown it to them. 20 For since the creation of the world His invisible attributes are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead, so that they are without excuse, 21 because, although they knew God, they did not glorify Him as God, nor were thankful, but became futile in their thoughts, and their foolish hearts were darkened.

This wicked presumption is the hallmark of all sin; a rejection of God's authority over man; man's assumed autonomy and ultimacy.

By denying creaturehood, they are guilty of presuming that they are their own authority! a law unto themselves, independent of God. This is the typical MO of the unsaved, to assume themselves as the ultimate authority and not God. It is this leftover corruption that is still in believers that God has us go through all manner of afflictions and disciplines in order to purge it out of us.

[Roman Catholicism believes (in error) that upon creation, Adam did not have a natural inbred knowledge of God (knowledge concreated or communicated to Adam upon his creation). He was capable of it, but did not have it; it had to be learned over time.]

Kant believed that our reason was independently constructive; that it would take all facts and experience and form them, assign meaning to them, via the categories already established in our minds independent of God (man having original knowledge! ...all of which is Kant's absolute idealism) In this way he thought we had original knowledge as opposed to clear revelation from God, true knowledge from God. But we are derivative in nature, wholly dependent upon God; Kant doesn't believe this nor do unbelievers and many other philosophers.

And so, Van Til states!

“As I have followed Calvin closely in stressing the fact that men ought to believe in God inasmuch as the evidence for his existence is abundantly plain, so I have also closely followed Calvin in saying that no sinner reacts properly to God's revelation. Is this too sweeping a statement? It is simply the doctrine of total depravity. All sinners are covenant breakers. They have an axe to grind. They do not want to keep God in remembrance. They keep under the knowledge of God that is within them. That is, they try as best they can to keep under this knowledge for fear they should look into the face of their judge."

Min 12:47: So, Van Til's response here is that when he speaks as God's thoughts, he means by that, God's plan realized in creation and providence. Why does he use God's thoughts? To set it in antithetical contrast to Kantian constructivist epistemology, where the thoughts or understanding of man constitute the intelligibility of facts. The last thing Van Til wants to do is state or imply that God and the facts are correlative – that God's knowledge enters into the being of facts or that God and the facts that he knows are mutually constitutive of one another. Van Til makes it explicit that the entire argument of the syllabus for which there will be quotes, is against every form of correlativism. This includes Plato, Kant, Spinoza, Hegel, Bradley, Bosanquet, Bowman, or any other advocate of any other species of correlativism. Van Til's most basic and profound critique of idealism is that correlativism is the internal ground for construing thought as constitutive of objects in a mutual process of development over time. These two responses, then, have helped us see that Van Til opposed Hegelian idealism, absolute idealism as militantly and relentlessly as he opposed Kantian transcendental idealism.

What I want us to do now as a kind of capstone observation, is to review a summary of Van Til's doctrinal dissertation, God and the Absolute; and the capstone expression of the argument is that all forms of idealism in Van Til's estimate, reduce to pragmatism, so that both idealism and pragmatism are foes of Christianity.

Min 19:46: Now what do we say to Hegel as Reformed theologians? How do we apply Reformed theology to Hegel's philosophy as a whole and his view of Jesus as the speculative middle point in the process of development within Giest? [spirit] Gerhardus Vos who taught Van Til at Van Til's time at Princeton Seminary, has an incisive response to what he terms pantheism inherent in the Absolute Idealism that Hegel produces. By way of a single sentence summary, let me say this. Please note this well. Vos locates the mystery of the incarnation in the ineffable union between the immutable divine person of the Son and his mutable human nature and insists that any other view of mystery is pantheistic. Vos describes pantheism as describing any essential or personal change to God in the work of creation or in the act of the incarnation.

Let me give you a few quotes that shore this up. Vos says that in Reformed Dogmatics 342, the following, quote, "In the Logos, a divine person who is immutable! is present from eternity. If now there can be but one person in the mediator and the divine person cannot be irradiated or changed, then it is self-evident that this one person is the divine person of the Logos. One can only maintain the immutability of God if one holds to the personal deity of the mediator, to the deity of the person in the mediator. The choice lies between two persons and one divine person. Now, please note this well. Vos explicitly begins his understanding of the incarnate mediator with an affirmation of an eternal and immutable divine person. Notice the divine person in the mediator cannot be irradiated or changed. Vos conceives of the eternal person of the Son as the incarnate mediator and says that the divine person not only does not change but cannot change. And I've said this in different module, but I do want to repeat it here, the person is not divine and human - two persons (Nestorian), the person is not human (Arianism), and the person is not divine human (Eutychianism). The person of the incarnate mediator is the immutable Son of God, the second person of the Trinity. And Vos says, then, explicitly, that "you can only affirm the immutability of God if you affirm the deity of the person which is immutable." The two are to be taken in this sentence from Vos in an appositional relation, "the immutability of God simply is the deity of the person. The person of the Son subsists as the immutable and simple divine essence, and as such cannot change. The definition of trinitarian persons is that they subsist distinctly as the whole, simple, immutable, essence of God. Now Vos says additionally, "Because already in the Logos there was a divine person who could not change 'cause humanity had to be impersonal or there would be two subjects in existence." Just note this one more time. Vos says, "In the Logos there is a divine person who could not change. It's not that he can't; it's not that he doesn't want to change; it's that he cannot change because he is essentially and personally fully actual.

Min 21:31 But secondly, building on this, Van Til insists in all of his writings, that God remains omniscient in relation to creation, a tenet, Hegel, in the nature of the case, cannot maintain with his doctrine of developmental consciousness, the developmental consciousness of the Absolute, being his central metaphysical concept. Van Til says this, quote – “we are told in scripture that God is light and there is no darkness in him at all; he dwells in light and no man can approach unto. Bavinck says, “in that appellation, there's included the idea that God is fully conscious of himself; that he sees through the whole of his being and there is nothing in his being that is his in darkness or hidden from his consciousness.” Or again, “there is and can be no darkness; he is altogether light. He dwells in light and is the source of light.” Or yet again, “God is eternal and pure being and his eternal knowledge has nothing less than the full eternal essence for his object. Being and knowledge are coterminous in God.” Do you see what is being said here, end of quote, IST pg 234? “God's knowledge comports with God's being” – in fact that's being too weak – God's knowledge is coterminous with God's being. “Just because God's being is self-sufficient and self-complete, so God's knowledge of himself and the world is self-sufficient and self-complete.” If I turn the board over on the back, this is a second anathema to Hegel. The first anathema - the equal ultimacy of eternal unity and diversity in relation to subsistence and coinherence and procession. The second, is that this God, this God, this concrete universal is omniscient in relation to creation. Van Til is saying this concrete universal, listen, is not developing self-consciousness! He is self-sufficient in his being and his knowledge. Listen to this! Van Til, IST 234-235, “It is only if we thus insist on the coterminity of the self-knowledge with the being of God that we can escape all forms of pantheizing thought. If God's knowledge is not coterminous with his being, his knowledge can, at least, be a correlative to his being. This being is then being given a potentiality of its own. God's knowledge can no longer be an internally complete knowledge; it becomes instead a knowledge that he must obtain by a process of investigation of a being that exists independently of himself. And I know I've said this enough in previous modules, I know we've said it enough in our discussion of Hegel, we said it enough in our discussion of Barth and contemporary evangelical mutualists, pantheism expresses itself in knowledge by denying the coterminity of being and knowledge in the self-contained God. Pantheism insists that knowledge, God's knowledge, the Absolute's knowledge, develops through time. Pantheism advocates a divine ignorance theory. Pantheist take Genesis 3:9 to teach that when God calls out to Adam, he does not know where he is hiding in the garden. And Van Til says that on such a view, on such a pantheizing view, God is learning new things and doesn't know future contingents until, quote, “it obtains by a process of investigation.” 26:11

Christianity and Idealism:

The Basic Argument | Van Til and Idealism (Lesson 11) – Dr. Lane Tipton

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=HX5e1Pcs1X4>

Min. 17:14 – 21:42

We've already show cased this in Hegel; this is a little higher level view, we're not as deep. Van Til says that if the Absolute develops over time then so does its understanding or consciousness. Both God, the single subject of interpretation and humanity, the corporate subjects of interpretation, require one another, and are both subject to what? Process, epistemological process. Van Til claims quite directly that the central problem with absolute idealism is the ignorance of the Absolute. He says, quote – "idealism has not complete actuality at the basis of possibility, and he says especially about the Absolute, page 25, Christianity and Idealism, the end is not known to the Absolute from the beginning since the Absolute himself has to wait for the facts to come in. The Absolute must remain ignorant of features, both present and future since its knowledge is developmental." I'll use two examples that might be familiar – they appear in Scott Oliphint's God With Us. In Gen. 22, on the God With Us proposal, when God asks or says to Abraham, "Now I know that you believe me." his thesis is that God has now come to know what he didn't know before. Genesis 3:9, God has now, has to call out to Adam and Eve where they are hiding. Oliphint, page 195 God With Us, "The lack of knowledge that God has as given to us in Genesis 22:12, is a covenantal lack; it's a lack in which God's relationship to his people includes his real and literal interaction." That is a contemporary illustration of the divine ignorance theory that Van Til says, lies at the heart of Idealism. You have to appreciate this. That if the being of the Absolute is in process, then the knowledge of the Absolute is in process; and when this is applied hermeneutically to the teaching of the bible, every instance where God says Now I know, is taken univocally, taken literally, taken developmentally. Van Til would call such a view pantheistic. He says in the Survey of Christian Epistemology about Idealism and other forms of correlativism, quote, The all-important question is what kind of a God reveals himself. Pantheistic thinkers also speak of God revealing himself, therefore also speak of a revelational epistemology if they desired, but for the sake of clearness, the term revelation should really be reserved for biblical thought. According to this view, God has been and is eternally self-conscious; there is no fringe of ignorance or darkness in Him. It is this concept of a completely self-conscious God that is all-important in epistemology – end of quote. And view of an ignorant of developing deity is pantheism. Divine Ignorance theories are pantheistic no matter what nomenclature is applied to them. And Van Til would call an ignorant deity a foe of theism.

Apparent Contradictions in the Bible

God's Counsel vs. Man's Responsibility

By Cornelius Van Til

Code540

No Christian can answer this full-bucket difficulty in such a way as to satisfy the demands of a non-Christian epistemology. We can and must maintain that the Christian position is the only position that does not destroy reason itself. But this is not to say that the relation between human responsibility and the counsel of God is not apparently contradictory. That all things in history are determined by God must always seem, at first sight, to contradict the genuineness of my choice. That the elect are certainly saved for eternity must always seem to make the threat of eternal punishment unreal with respect to them. That the reprobate are certainly to be lost must always seem to make the presentation of eternal life unreal with respect to them. Cornelius Van Til, Common Grace and the Gospel

See code475 on the genuineness of man's choices though back of those choices is God sovereignty over the will of man. Also search for the words genuineness or significance with regard to man's choices; man is not a puppet, yet God controls all things according to his counsel, an apparent contradiction. Also search for the genuineness of second causes.

An excerpt from code485: A word must here be said about the question of antinomies. It will readily be inferred what as Christians we mean by antinomies. {86} They are involved in the fact that human knowledge can never be completely comprehensive knowledge. Every knowledge transaction has in its somewhere a reference point to God. Now since God is not fully comprehensible to us we are bound to come into what seems to be contradiction in all our knowledge. Our knowledge is analogical and therefore must be paradoxical. We say that if there is to be any true knowledge at all there must be in God an absolute system of knowledge. We therefore insist that everything must be related to that absolute system of God. Yet we ourselves cannot fully understand that system.

We may, in order to illustrate our meaning here, take one of the outstanding paradoxes of the Christian interpretation of things, namely, that of the relation of the counsel of God to our prayers. To put it pointedly: We say on the one hand that prayer changes things and on the other hand we say that everything happens in accordance with God's plan and God's plan is immutable.

The thing we are concerned about here is to point out that in the nature of the case there would have to be such a paradox or seeming contradiction in human knowledge. God exists as self-complete apart from us; he is all-glorious. Yet he created the universe that it might glorify him. This point lies at the bottom of every paradox or antinomy. We were in the nature of the case completely interpreted before we came into existence; the universal plan of God needed not to be supplemented by historical particulars and could not be supplemented in this way. The historical could not produce anything wholly new. This much we see clearly. God being what he is, it must be his counsel which acts as the indispensable and self-complete unity back of the finite one and many. The only alternative to saying this is to say that the historical produces the wholly new, and this would be to give up the basic idea of the Christian-theistic scheme, namely, the idea of God and of his creation and control of the universe. On the other hand, the historical must have genuine significance. Or else why should God have created it? Prayer must be answered, or God would not be God. The universe must really glorify God; that is the purpose of its existence. So we seem to have on the one hand a bucket that is full of water and on the other hand we seem to add water to this bucket which we claim to be already full.

It appears that there must seem to be contradiction in human knowledge. To this we must now add that the contradiction that seems to be there can in the nature of the case be no more than a seeming contradiction. If we said that there is real contradiction in our knowledge we would once more be denying the basic concept of Christian-theism, i.e., the concept of the self-complete universal in God. We should then not merely be saying that there is no complete coherence in our thinking, but we should also be saying that there is no complete coherence in God's thinking. And this would be the same as saying that there is no coherence or truth in our thinking at all. If we say that the idea of paradox or antinomy is that of real contradiction, we have destroyed all human and all divine knowledge; if we say that the idea of paradox or antinomy is that of seeming contradiction, we have saved God's knowledge and therewith also our own.

We must note here again how impossible it is in an apologetic argument to close one's eyes to differences between various theological schools. {87} That fact comes out here more strikingly than anywhere else. Arminianism has not been true to its own belief in creation. With belief in creation, it stands committed to that view of God and of God's counsel and that view of man's relation to that counsel which we have outlined. Yet it has been untrue to all this in its insistence that the historical does produce the absolutely new. For that reason, it has to think of the relation of God's counsel to man's activity as one of real contradiction. In order to avoid this "contradiction" it has simply thrown overboard the idea of the counsel of God, as controlling all things. Therewith it has in effect sought to destroy both divine and human knowledge and therewith it has destroyed the very meaning of history which it was so anxious to preserve. God cannot answer our prayers for the salvation of people if those people can reject that salvation when they wish.

An excerpt from code482

The reply of the Reformed apologist is as follows. Good preaching, he will say, will recognize the truth of Scripture that man has been blinded by sin, and that his will is perverted toward seeking self instead of God. But how can deaf ears hear, and blind eyes see? That is to say preaching is confronted with the same dilemma as is apologetical reasoning.⁴² In both cases the Roman Catholic and the Arminian tone down the facts of the gospel in order to gain acceptance for them on the part of the natural man. [very common] In neither case will the Reformed apologist do so. In both cases he will challenge the natural man at the outset. Both in preaching and in reasoning – and every approach to the natural man should be both – the Reformed theologian will ask the sinner to do what he knows the sinner of himself cannot do. The Reformed Christian is often Reformed in preaching and Arminian in reasoning. But when he is at all self-conscious in his reasoning, he will seek to do in apologetics what he does in preaching. He knows that man is responsible not in spite of but just because he is not autonomous but created. [A vital distinction: In other words, because we are created, i.e., creatures, we are wholly dependent upon God for all, i.e., we are not autonomous beings, self-sufficient, etc! See Edwards on this absolute dependence on God] He knows that the idea of analogical or covenant personality is that which alone preserves genuine significance for the thoughts and deeds of man. [as opposed to existentialism where significance is sought through self seeking.] So he also knows that he who is dead in trespasses and sins is none the less responsible for his deadness. He knows also that the sinner in the depth of his heart knows that what is thus held before him is true. He knows he is a creature of God; he has been simply seeking to cover up this fact to himself. He knows that he has broken the law of God; he has again covered up this fact to himself. He knows that he is therefore guilty and is subject to punishment forever; this fact too he will not look in the face.

An excerpt from code534

In their view “second causes” become “first” or ultimate causes; there is then no ultimate cause back of them. As ultimate, these second causes then rest on nothing better than chance. Thus all of human experience is meaningless. It is quite true that “conversion did not make a Euclid out of the Philippian jailor,”²² but this is beside the point under discussion. My interest is only to show that it takes an ultimate cause, God, if there are to be genuine second causes. In other words, it is only on the presupposition of the truth of Christianity that science is to be explained. I do not think the “objectivity” of “classic realism” or of any form of modern realism such as we find represented by John Wild and his friends, allows for the ideas of creation and providence in the biblical sense of the term. It is not “suffocating supernaturalism” to aver that secondary causes are meaningless without God the Creator as primary or remote cause. Suffocation of science and of all human experience would take place if either “classic realism” or modern idealism were true. For then there would be no causes at all. All reality would be composed of irrational particulars. All would then be “chaos and old night.”²³

An excerpt from Van Til in The Defense of the Faith, pg 386

When Arminians say that these doctrines reduce history to a puppet-dance, we reply that the contrary is true. The choices of men in history have genuine meaning because of, not in spite of the counsel of God which controls whatsoever comes to pass.

Notes on Existentialism

by Greg Bahnsen

(with my comments)

from his lecture series

The Certainty of Christianity

code541

I was listening to this lecture by Dr. Bahnsen, and he mentioned a short thing on existentialism; very interesting. By the way, these things are deep and take a long time to assimilate into your thinking. You are juggling many things in your brain on this, other doctrines, etc., to be able to see what Bahnsen is saying. So do that. I like what Jonathan Edwards said...upon sedate and calm reflection... That’s when your mind seems to be relaxed the most, where data points on scripture conjoin in your mind. One other thing: every doctrine in Christianity plays a role in our thinking on all these things. That’s why it’s good to study it all, Original Sin, Election, God’s Sovereignty, Christian theism, etc.

Min 17 – by the way, this whole lecture exposes selfishness, skepticism, etc. Listen to this whole series.

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=K4MaZ-u10bg>

“And then on the other hand you’ll people who will say, “Hey, we’re free, ya know! We’re human beings. We have dignity; we make up our own lives,” a school of thought known as Existentialism - you put that at the very center of philosophy. It’s that human reality chooses its own essence; chooses what it will be. Whether you’re an existentialist or not, you know, that uh, your unbelieving neighbor – he’ll insist that human beings have free will.”

Ok. Upon sedate and calm reflection, think about that. If one thinks Existentialism is Christian, he is wrong. It’s the opposite of Christianity. What the existentialist believes is that man is independent of God – he is a law unto himself; the existentialist defines himself by himself, by his own assumed authority or assumed autonomy and ultimacy of his own reasoning, not by God’s plan. His intellect, his reasoning is ultimate, not God’s. This is the hallmark ID of all earthly or worldly philosophies. Man exalting himself against his maker, his creator. This is why worldly philosophies cloud or completely do away with the Creator/creature distinction. This is how man suppresses the knowledge of God within and around him as Paul notes in Romans 1:18. If we are not created in God’s image, then, hey, we are independent beings accountable to no one! Chance rules. This is, more than likely, the thinking that is in a person who gives license to his worldview of living his own independent self-determined life, doing what he wants to do, etc., deciding the purpose of his own existence apart from God’s plan, regardless of what scripture says. (to a degree, we are all guilty of this worldly mindset, the flesh, until God routs it out of us.)

Application: it is upon this area that you can confront him (with meekness and humility, see 2Tim2 below). All things are yellow to the jaundiced eye. He’s looking through the wrong glasses. These glasses need to be removed, to which you can help in guiding him, but this removing of the yellow glasses, ultimately, can only be done by the Holy Spirit. This is true with all of us to one degree or another and is why God has us go through trials and afflictions...to wean us off our self-dependence, our assumed autonomy and the ultimacy of our own opinions. One other thing; look for inconsistencies in his argumentation; this is common in false ideas about ourselves and God; Bahnsen points this out in that lecture.

Before I was afflicted I went astray, But now I keep Your word. Ps 119:67

So one key reason why he thinks existentialism is Christian is because it accommodates the carnal mind, self-exalted thinking and notions that appeal to the flesh, self, me, me, me, to the self-important. Here’s a key passage on combating this: 2Cor10:5

⁴For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal but mighty in God for pulling down strongholds, ⁵casting down arguments and every high thing that exalts itself against the knowledge of God, bringing every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ,

The word of God is self-attesting. Any deviancy from this is basically asserting one's own opinion over and against God's word, his law, his will.

So when you bring this up to someone, be uplifting in your words, say only what is encouraging and uplifting. This he'll receive, all things being equal. So, when you want to bring out your sword and slice him into little pieces, quickly bring these passages into remembrance. Trust in these, which is to say, trust in God! This will quiet your soul.

Here some great passages on this:

1Pet3:15

¹⁵ But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts, and always be ready to give a defense to everyone who asks you a reason for the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear;

2Tim 2

²³ But avoid foolish and ignorant disputes, knowing that they generate strife. ²⁴ And a servant of the Lord must not quarrel but be gentle to all, able to teach, patient, ²⁵ in humility correcting those who are in opposition, if God perhaps will grant them repentance, so that they may know the truth, ²⁶ and that they may come to their senses and escape the snare of the devil, having been taken captive by him to do his will.

1Thes. 5:11

¹¹ Therefore comfort each other and edify one another, just as you also are doing.

Eph 4:29 this is excellent!

²⁹ Let no corrupt word proceed out of your mouth, but what is good for necessary edification, that it may impart grace to the hearers. ³⁰ And do not grieve the Holy Spirit of God, by whom you were sealed for the day of redemption. ³¹ Let all bitterness, wrath, anger, clamor, and evil speaking be put away from you, with all malice. ³² And be kind to one another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, even as God in Christ forgave you.

Phil. 2:3-4

³ Let nothing be done through selfish ambition or conceit, but in lowliness of mind let each esteem others better than himself. ⁴ Let each of you look out not only for his own interests, but also for the interests of others.

A lecture on Faith and Reason

Worldviews & Rationalism

Man's Assumed Autonomy and

Ultimacy of His Reasoning

Code542

A Series by Greg Bahnsen: Transcendental Arguments

Min. 21:55 -30:28 <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=QQ8oQsSVLrY>

If we can get worked out this notion of an objective proof of God's existence along the lines of transcendental reasoning, which is the subject of our seminar, I think it will really open things up – will enlighten your minds with regard to the relationship of faith and reason. This old conundrum, this chestnut that has been there in the history of the church, I think all of a sudden gets resolved, and very easily; in fact, so easily you look at it and say, How could we have missed this? It's really quite obvious.

I think it's mistaken and indeed it's misleading to think that Christian faith takes over where reason leaves off. Many people have the idea that we can reason about things, such as, oh, science, medicine, industry, economics, history, or whatever it may be, and reasoning will take you really, really far, but at some point reasoning stops and then faith begins. So that for us as Christians we agree with everybody else in the world when it comes to natural matters; matters of this life, temporal existence, nature. We agree with everybody else and their reasoning about those things, but then what we do is we add another story to the house of knowledge or at least personal living, and that's the story of faith, right? So, everybody around here thinks in a natural way and uses reason, and then we add faith to that. And I think that's misleading, I think it is mistaken. Faith is not without reason; faith is not above reason; faith is not contrary to reason in the outlook I'll be trying to teach you in our seminar.

To put it very simply, I do not in any sense endorse what is called fideism. If that's a new term for you, F I D E I S M; literally faithism. Fideism says that Christian faith is independent of considerations of reason or reasoning. Christian faith is a personal commitment; Christian faith is a voluntary or a voluntarist leap, but it has nothing to do with reasoning, with argumentation. And I don't believe that for a moment. I believe Christian faith is not only reasonable – there's plenty of people who say that – you can't show that it violates anything that a reasonable man would say, but I maintain that Christian faith is demanded by reason. Reason can be affirmed without endorsing what's known as rationalism. Rationalism, however, is the term that's subject to so many different definitions, since a specific school of epistemology, but is also a broad attitude toward how we live our lives and conduct ourselves intellectually.

Rationalism in the broad sense says that man's mind is the highest authority, or at least man's mind is autonomous. It never bows to any outside authority. The autonomous man might grant that there's a god. The man who says, I'm intellectually self sufficient; I'm the final authority – such person might grant that there is a god. Usually he doesn't to be sure. But you need to recognize to understand the character of autonomy, he could grant that there is a god, but it could never be the Christian God, right? Why's that? Because the Christian God doesn't bow to the authority of the servant; the servant is to bow to the authority of the Lord.

Now, there are people who want to promote autonomous reasoning to get people to believe in the Christian God. I think that is so fundamentally wrong headed. You know, to try to say to somebody, you know, you need to have faith in this God and I'm gonna prove to you to your own satisfaction, with you being the ultimate authority, that God is the ultimate authority. Should I say that again? I'm gonna prove to you, to your ultimate authority and your reasoning, that God is the ultimate authority. Well, you can't do that. Rationalism in that sense affirms that man's mind is the highest authority. And that it operates independently of God and self-sufficiently. And, I've been in university training in the past, that I continue to pay attention to higher education and to our culture as well, and it just boggles my mind that anybody could believe in the autonomy of man's mind - the self-sufficiency and independence of man's mind. If that were true, why is there such massive disagreement in the universities still? What's wrong with man's mind? How does man's self-sufficient mind not get things worked out? And it's not just that the psychologists differ with the political scientists. Political scientists can't agree among themselves and the psychologists can't agree among themselves. And say, ya, well when into other things which are not quite such soft issues like math or physics; then they all agree. Well, no they don't! They're huge disagreements in schools of philosophies of math; huge disagreements among physicists and so forth. So, the self-sufficiency of man's mind, just on the face of it, is a silly doctrine. That isn't to say it is the reigning dogma or prejudice of people.

Nevertheless, Rationalism is the idea that man's mind is self-sufficient; it's the highest authority. That's different from rationality. Rationality refers to man's intellectual capability. And with all my heart and soul I confirm rationality. And I affirm it because God made us; he made us to think. He expects us to think. Indeed, since we're made in the image of God and He is supremely rational and coherent, He is the truth itself as Jesus said, that we ought to be concerned about the truth and about reasoning and using our minds to glorify God. Paul put it this way: We are to bring every thought captive to the obedience of Christ. We're supposed to be using our minds and using them in a subservient way, as a tool to glorify God. Some people use their minds as a tool to argue against God; we use our minds as a tool to argue for God, but we certainly affirm rationality. We're not fideists. We affirm reason; we do not affirm rationalism. In fact, this seminar, if you, when you get to the end, if you get back over it, I hope you'll see, in a sense, the whole seminar is an attempt to show the Christian use of rationality refutes rationalism. That if we're gonna use our minds in the best way, you can't be a rationalist. And against autonomy, I'm going to be arguing in our seminar, that all reasoning rests upon faith. My first consideration was, faith doesn't go beyond reason. Now I'm gonna turn the tables and say to the unbelieving rationalist's argument is, as a matter of fact, your rationality rests upon faith; you can't justify reasoning without a worldview – broader considerations that analytical philosophers like to think about today; but you can't justify rationality without a broader consideration of the worldview that you have; and the only worldview that will allow for rationality or make intelligible the use of rational procedures is Christianity. And so, this is pretty heavy stuff as you can see. We're arguing that if anybody reasons at all, ultimately, they are borrowing from or actually working in terms of the Christian outlook on life...that faith is foundational to all rationality, to all reasoning. So the faith of the unbeliever as Bahnsen notes here, is an unconscious acknowledgement that they are in God's universe (the knowledge of which they are suppressing, Rom. 1:18) in which God has established design, logic, etc., and thus are trusting in his deterministic or predictable environment or systems, so that we can reason (exercise logic), learn science, build things, etc., as opposed to an environment that is founded upon chance, which if one was consistent with that worldview, could not know anything, trust in anything so as to build, reason, live, etc. Every fact would be a brute fact, having no relation to anything, especially God. So, their faith, their subconscious faith is a faith in the true nature of God's universe. And as a side note, is not a saving faith, but merely a common faith. See [code543]

Thus, we face the question of God's providence. And providence, in turn, presupposes creation. We may say, then, that we seek to defend the fact of miracle, the fact of providence, the fact of creation, and therefore, the fact of God, in relation to modern non-Christian science.

But if the matter is put this way we may as well say that we are seeking to defend Christian theism as a fact. And this is really the same thing as to say that we believe the facts of the universe are unaccounted for except upon the Christian-theistic basis. In other words, facts and interpretation of facts cannot be separated. It is impossible even to discuss any particular fact except in relation to some principle of interpretation. The real question about facts is, therefore, what kind of universal¹⁰ can give the best account of the facts. Or rather, the real question is which universal can state or give meaning to any fact.

Are there, then, several universals that may possibly give meaning or statement to facts? We believe there are not. We hold that there is only one such universal, namely, the God of Christianity. Consequently, we hold that without the presupposition of the God of Christianity we cannot even interpret one fact correctly. Facts without God would be brute facts. They would have no intelligible relation to one another. As such they could not be known by man.

¹⁰ In this context, Van Til uses the term "universal" for any truth of a general or abstract nature - whether it be a broad concept, law, principle, or categorical statement. Such general truths are used to understand, organize, and interpret particular truths encountered in concrete experience. As Van Til goes on to say, if one does not begin with some such general truths (universals) with which to understand the particular observations in one's experience, those factual particulars would be unrelated and uninterpretable, i.e., "brute." In a chance universe, all particular facts would be random, have no classifiable identity, bear no predetermined order or relation, and thus be unintelligible to man's mind.

Pg 42 -Arminian's view of man's depravity

The Arminian holds that on the Reformed conception of man there is no sense to preaching. There would, the Arminian argues, be no approach to an identity of meanings between the preacher and the man "dead in trespasses and sins" to whom he preaches. The dead man cannot even count and weigh and measure.¹⁸ There is an absolute severance of all connection between him and the living.

For this absolute deadness of the natural man, the Arminian substitutes the notion of degrees of deadness, in order thus to establish degrees of contact with the truth. There can be no absolutely evil deed because then the will itself would be destroyed. It is ambiguous or meaningless, says the Arminian, to talk about the natural man as knowing God and yet not truly knowing God. Knowing is knowing. A man either knows or he does not know. He may know less or more, but if he does not "truly" know, he knows not at all. The Calvinist, he argues, is an absolutist who destroys the light of day.

In reply to this the Calvinist insists that there are no degrees of deadness. The natural man does not know God. But to be thus without knowledge, without living, loving, true knowledge of God, he must be one who knows God in the sense of having the sense of deity (Romans 1).¹⁹ For the spiritual deadness of the natural man is what it is as suppression of the knowledge of God given man by virtue of creation in God's image.

¹⁸ By this, Van Til means that, in terms of the Calvinist's transcendental challenge, the unbeliever's espoused worldview or philosophy cannot make counting and measuring intelligible. (Counting involves an abstract concept of law, universals, or order - which contradicts the unbeliever's view of the universe as a random or chance realm of material particulars. By rejecting God's word, the unbeliever would not in principle be able to count and measure things. As it is, unbelievers do engage in counting and measuring but they cannot give a philosophical accounting of that fact.

¹⁹ Van Til here indicates that "knowing God" is not the same thing in every case where God is known. There is a knowledge of God in faith and blessing (which the unbeliever wholly lacks), as well as a knowledge of God in unbelief and curse (which the unbeliever cannot avoid). The latter is truly knowledge, and in terms of it the unbeliever can gain limited knowledge about the world and arrive at intelligible interpretations of experience. The unbeliever denies this latter kind of knowledge because he does not have the former kind of knowledge.

Two Worldviews in Conflict

Below is an exceptionally good teaching on the two different worldviews between a believer and an unbeliever. What is truth? For the unbeliever, his ultimate authority in determining what is truth is himself, his own opinions, his own a priori reasoning. For the believer, the final authority is the word of God, divine revelation. From a regenerated heart, he desires to take all his thoughts captive to the obedience of Christ. Greg Bahnsen explains all this very well. [my comments in blue brackets like this]

3.1 Apologetics as a Conflict Between Final Authorities

Most of us are accustomed to thinking of philosophy or academic debate in terms of intellectual detachment from the living of daily life. (Disputes over the nature of "substance" or about the analytic/synthetic distinction do not, after all, seem terribly relevant to grocery shopping, getting the kids dressed, or fixing the plumbing). Questions about the way we reason and think may be important, but they are ethically indifferent or "neutral" matters for scholarly investigation and debate. The moral quality of our lives is not an issue here for ethics is thought to pertain to our conduct (daily affairs), along with the motives for our concrete behavior and inner attitudes (especially toward other persons). This general outlook is so widespread that it hardly rises to the level of conscious consideration and choice; we just take it for granted. Reasoning is one thing, and ethics is another. That is why Van Til's insights have such a revolutionary effect on most people. He insists (as does Scripture) that the way in which we use our minds-the way in which we reason, how we evaluate claims to the truth, the standards we adopt for knowing, etc., - is itself an ethical matter. This part of human behavior called "reasoning" is as much subject to moral obligations and assessments as anything else we do in the world. The "greatest" commandment teaches us to love the Lord our God with all our minds, too (Matt. 22:37) - to take every thought captive to the obedience of Christ (2 Cor. 10:5). [If we don't, it's because we love ourselves more than God if at all.]

Thus, apologetical dialogue between the believer and the unbeliever exhibits not only two conflicting points of view (as to whether God exists, Jesus rose from the dead, etc.), but also two different moral stances. The believer and the unbeliever recognize two different final standards for living - including that aspect of living known as thinking, reasoning, and arguing. They are divided by their ultimate commitments, either to Christ or to some other authority (usually themselves). Van Til pointed out that sin comes to expression in the unbeliever's intellectual conduct and standards: "When man has become a sinner, his intuitive powers are as sinful as his reasoning powers. Every man by his sinful nature seeks violently to suppress the voice of God." "Thus, the scientist in the laboratory and the philosopher in his study are both dealing with their materials either as a covenant-keeper or as a covenant-breaker. All of man's acts, all of man's questionings, all of man's affirmations, indeed all of his denials in any dimension of his interests, are covenantally conditioned." [Van Til]

Christians must not fall into a false intellectualism here. "Intellectualism in the church has often made an easy compromise with the Socratic dictum that knowledge is virtue. Men often speak as though the only thing that the sinner needs is true information. This . . . is not the case. Man needs true interpretation, but he also needs to be made a new creature. . . Sin is not only misinformation; it is also a power of perversion in the soul." [Van Til] The non-Christian's opposition to the truth about God or the gospel does arise from legitimate intellectual problems with the faith, but from a rebellious and rationalizing heart. "The sinner's problem from his point of view is to cast doubt upon this evidence, to make it appear as though the evidence were not clear. . . It is the effort of every man to put the blame for his failure to serve God upon the elusive character of the evidence for God's existence." [Van Til]

The two opponents in an apologetical encounter are thus intellectually living by two different ethical standards, but they are also arguing according to conflicting final standards for knowledge itself. They disagree on the ultimate authority that should be used to warrant or justify what a person believes as true. Suppose that a certain statue at Piccadilly Circus in London were described in a tour book as a depiction of Eros with his bow drawn, but that, because you have actually been there to see the statue, you assert that the tour book is in error. If your friend replies that those who write tour books are more likely to have the facts straight than you, your friend has attributed more authority to the tour book than to you on this matter. What he would claim to "know" about the statue of Eros is determined by the authority he has chosen to follow. Now, in the far more important dispute between the Christian and the unbeliever, they too have conflicting final authorities for knowledge. As Van Til put it, they disagree on the "reference point" to be used in assessing truth-claims and interpreting experience. (In our illustration, one person gained his perspective from the "point of reference" given in the tour book, while the other's ultimate point of reference was his memory of an eyewitness experience.) Believers and unbelievers have different presuppositions that give them their orientation to the world, to reasoning, and to living. "Either one thinks in terms of the authority of Scripture, making reason and all its activities subject to this authority, or else one acts and thinks on one's own ultimate authority." [Van Til, Introduction to Systematic Theology] Or, as Van Til wrote elsewhere: believers should "agree that human experience and human logic must be interpreted in terms of God and Christ rather than that God and Christ must be interpreted in terms of human experience and logic." [Van Til, Common Grace p104]

A person cannot have it both ways regarding his final standard or ultimate reference point. He presupposes and reasons either according to the authority of God or according to some other authority.⁸ Attempting to be neutral about God's ultimate authority in determining what we know is a result of a bad attitude toward God's ultimate authority. It is a way of saying that one does not really need the work of who...shows us that in all our efforts as ultimate self-authenticating Christ who...shows us that in all our efforts as ultimate self-interpreters we are actually opposing the salvation that he offers. Every bit of supposedly impersonal and neutral investigation, even in the field of science, is the product of an attitude of spiritual hostility to the Christ through whom alone there is truth in any dimension. [Van Til, the Case for Calvinism 1963]

⁸ The complaint will be heard that, if we are arguing over whether God exists and has final authority, we may not take that authority for granted while we are arguing about it. But the complaint is reversible, is it not? The Christian can reply: "If we are arguing over whether God exists and has final authority, we may not take for granted that He is not the final authority; the attempt to authorize (substantiate) His authority by some other standard would amount to the ruling that whatever authority He has cannot be final." A person's presuppositions are (as such) presupposed even when someone is discussing or arguing about them. For example, philosophers who argue for the truth or validity of the laws of logic do not put aside logic while arguing for it.

This is a critical point for apologetics. Van Til's approach recognizes and points out that religious conversion entails a change in a person's point of reference or ultimate standard for knowing and interpreting anything at all. Hence, apologetics [defending the faith] is at base an intellectual conflict over ultimate authorities for knowing and living. "When the sinner has by God's grace in Christ received this new light and this new power of sight then he sees all things in their proper relationships. Formerly he stood on his head while now he stands on his feet. Formerly he referred all things to himself as the final point of reference. Now he refers all things to God his Creator, and to Christ his redeemer as the final point of reference. His conversion was a Copernican revolution. It was not accomplished by steps or stages. It was an about-face. Before his conversion he looked away from the God and the Christ of Scripture. After his conversion he can't see a fact in the world that he does not wish to deal with to the glory of God. The words of Paul, 'Whether ye eat, or drink, or do anything else, do all to the glory of God,' are now his motto. Deeply conscious of his continued sinfulness he is, none the less, now, in the core of his being, a lover instead of a hater of God." [Van Til, The Reformed Pastor and Modern Thought, 35-36.

It is now fairly easy to answer the age-old question of the relationship between faith and reason. Van Til affirmed the importance of reasoning and using our intellect as a tool, but he also understood that this tool would be utilized according to the direction, standard or "reference point" of some ultimate authority (for ethics as well as for knowing). The unbeliever uses his reason (reasoning) in the service of his own personal authority, desires, and rebellion against God. The believer has been brought to a change of final authorities: "When God has reasoned with us and changed our minds till our every thought is brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ, we must use our minds, our intellect, our reason, our consciousness, in order to receive and re-interpret the revelation God has given of himself in Scripture. That is the proper place of reason in theology. There is no conflict between this reason and faith, since faith is the impelling power which urges reason to interpret aright."¹¹

Of course the unbeliever finds this utterly unacceptable. But by what standard is it judged unacceptable? The unbeliever as much as he believer follows some ultimate standard, although he may be reluctant to admit it. For the unbeliever, the tool of reason (reasoning) would be transformed into the final judge for knowing anything (as though there could be some abstract thing¹² that might be venerated as "Reason"), thus replacing the final authority or standard of God's revelation.¹³ Van Til was keenly aware that "we cannot speak of human reason in general, or of the human consciousness in general. 'Reason' in the case of the non-Christian is employed by such as assume themselves to be self-sufficient, while 'reason' in the case of the Christian is employed by those who through regeneration have learned to think of themselves as creatures of God and of their task in life as keeping covenant with God."¹⁴ This is the focal point of the argument between him and the believer. The Christian does not have two ultimate authorities for interpreting life and directing his thinking, one that he shares with the unbeliever and one that is unique to his religious stance. "The Christian knows that he would interpret nature wrongly, due to the sin that is within him, unless he be enlightened by Scripture and guided by the Holy Spirit. Strictly speaking he should therefore not refer to two sources with respect to his general interpretation of life. If he says, 'Scripture and reason convince me that this or that is true, he should mean by this that his reason, as it looks at everything in the light of Scripture, has convinced him. [Ps 36:9b, in your light do we see light] If, therefore, he appeals to the unbeliever on the ground that nature itself reveals God, he should do this in such a manner as to make it appear in the end that he is interpreting nature in the light of Scripture."¹⁵

Apologetics involves a conflict over ultimate authorities- that is, a conflict over our presuppositions or final standard. What should be the source of a person's presuppositions? For the unbeliever, it will be some authority for reasoning other than the word of God, while for the believer it is God's revelation. "For science and philosophy, as well as for theology, we frankly take our basic presuppositions from Scripture... There are no central truths on which all [believer and unbeliever] agree."¹⁶ The disagreement is fundamental and goes to the heart of the matter."¹⁷

¹² Cf. the logical fallacy of reification (or hypostatization): treating as a concrete or specific entity a series of events ("the winds of change") or an abstraction ("the federal government," "Mother nature.).

¹³ Reason - in the sense of the tool of intellectual analysis (reasoning) - must indeed be used to read, understand, and believe what God's revelation says, and yet the final authority that directs this reasoning process is God's revelation itself; moreover, the tool of reasoning is only intelligible in terms of what God's revelation teaches in the first place.

¹⁴ Introduction to Systematic Theology, 29.

¹⁵ Ibid, 197

¹⁶ Van Til held that even where there was the appearance of agreement on fundamental points in the reasoning, science, or philosophy of believer and unbeliever, there was nonetheless and ultimately a difference between them in both the broader understanding and the more specific application of those points.

The Incoherence of the natural man's worldview [my title]

Pgs 109-115

We can rehearse briefly why this is the case. The thing that is most of the philosophy of the unbeliever is its presumption characteristic of moral and intellectual autonomy from God, The non-Christian is not philosophically self-sufficient and cannot make sense out of experience apart from God, but he still desires (and claims) to be independent of his Creator. Van Til pointed out: "Man has declared his independence from God. We may therefore call him the would-be autonomous man. This would-be autonomous man. This would-be-autonomous man assumes that he is ultimate and properly the final reference point in predication, i.e., reality must be interpreted by man in terms of man."⁶⁰ Van Til said of the natural man, who is dead in trespasses and sin, that he "wants to be something that he cannot be. He wants to be 'as God,' himself the judge of good and evil, himself the standard of truth. . . The non-regenerate man takes for granted that the meaning of the space-time world is immanent⁶¹ in itself, and that man is the ultimate interpreter of this world" [Introduction to Systematic Theology] - instead of receiving God's revelation as the ultimate point of reference for his thinking, reasoning, and interpretation of the world or experience. While perhaps not explicitly declaring it to be so, the would-be autonomous man conducts his reasoning and living as though he were not a creature of God and under obligation to the word of His Creator. Van Til said: "I have frequently explained that by the term 'autonomous man' I mean the idea of a man who virtually denies his createdness. . . . With the entrance of sin man was no longer willing to obey the law of his maker. He became a covenant breaker. He sought to be a law unto himself that is, he sought to be autonomous. . . . Men virtually assume or presuppose that they are non-created.... Is this too broad and sweeping a statement to make about all sinners? The daily newspaper is unintelligible on any other basis. There are those who worship and serve the creature and there are those who worship

⁶⁰ Protestant Doctrine of Scripture, 125, Cf. the position espoused by the ancient Sophists that "man is the measure of all things."

and serve the Creator. This is the simple differentiation with which I am concerned. I try to call men back to the recognition of the fact that they are creatures of God by challenging their false assumption of their non-createdness their autonomy or ultimacy." [Defense of the Faith, 247-48]

The Christian worldview maintains the indelibly revelational character of every fact of the created universe and the all-controlling providence of God in governing every event of history. The non-Christian's autonomous philosophy is not "neutral" on such crucial points, but obviously works on assumptions that are quite contrary to them. "Why live in a dream world deceiving ourselves and making false pretense before the world? The non-Christian view of science: (a) presupposes the autonomy of man; (b) presupposes the non-created character, i.e., the chance-controlled character, of facts;⁶⁴ and (c) presupposes that laws rest not in God⁶⁵ but somewhere in the universe." [Common Grace and the Gospel, p195] In defending the faith, the Christian cannot allow the suitability or legitimacy of using such autonomous presuppositions with respect to any aspect of knowledge, as though they can make sense of the natural world but must then be set aside when one thinks about the supernatural aspects of God's revelation in Scripture. As Van Til noted, "If we claim that we are independent in our knowledge and think we can do without God at any point, we may as well assert that we are ready to do without him at every point." [Introduction to Systematic Theology, 199.]

How can the apologist refute the presuppositions of autonomous reasoning? Van Til taught that it could certainly not be by adopting them as our own! "How can we call unbelieving man to repentance

⁶⁴ If the mind of God does not sovereignly determine the relationship of every event to every other event according to His wise plan, then the way things are in the world and what happens there are random and indeterminate. In that case, there is no intelligible basis for holding that any experience is like any other experience, there is nothing objectively common to the two of them, and there is no causal connection between any two events - and thus they are meaningless and indescribable.

⁶⁵ If the laws of science, the laws of logic, and the laws of morality are not seen as expressions of the unchanging mind of God, then the notion of universal and absolute "laws" or the concept of order in the contingent, changing world of matter makes no sense whatsoever. In what way could anything truly be universal and law-abiding, when every event is isolated and random? If universality is supposed to be objective, then there is no justification for holding to it on the basis of man's limited experience, whereas if universality is subjective (internal to man's thinking), then it is arbitrarily imposed by man's mind on his experience without warrant.

by belief in what Jesus Christ the Son of God and Son of man suffered on the cross of Calvary and through his resurrection from the dead, if we ourselves have first so largely emasculated our thinking by adopting the very humanism⁶⁸ from which we are seeking to save them?"⁶⁹ Van Til cautioned that the defender of the faith "all too frequently employs uncritically the conceptions of 'reason' and 'fact'" as these are understood by those who make no profession of Christianity. The result is that there is no teaching of Christianity as a challenge to unbelief." [Introduction to Systematic Theology, 7.]

Rather than accepting the deceptive invitation of the unbeliever to approach the apologetical dialogue in a neutral fashion- which in fact is to approach it in an autonomous fashion-the Christian must argue that the unbeliever's outlook renders such philosophically crucial and critical notions as fact, reason, experience, science, necessity, meaning, and morality unintelligible, due to the incoherence of the unbeliever's professed worldview. "If then a non-Christian should urge our pastor to take off his 'rose-colored glasses' and look at the cosmos with the naked eye of reason,' or should appeal to conscience to refute the interpretation of human experience as given in Scripture, our pastor knows that to do so would be to take the ground from under his own feet. Reason would then be truly 'naked' or formal; its assertions would be as meaningless as the gyrations of a propeller of an airplane engine without the airplane. If the facts could be said to exist at all, they would be utterly interchangeable with one another. . . . It is only in Reformed theology that we have a method of apologetics that meets the requirements of the hour. It alone challenges the natural man in the very citadel of his being. It alone is able to show how he who will not accept God's interpretation of life has no coherence in his experience." [Reformed Pastor and Modern Thought, 30-31.]

So in presuppositional apologetics we seek to "remove the enemy's foundation" by reducing his worldview to absurdity thereby rendering the claims that constitute his case against the gospel unintelligible demonstrating the necessity of the Christian worldview if we are and to make sense of argumentation about, reasoning about, and interpretation of, any element of human experience. Without the assumption of Christian theism [the study of God's nature, etc.], there would be no basis for believing that there is order, connection, predictability, or necessity anywhere in the human experience. Van Til put it this way: "The scientist who is a Christian therefore has the task of pointing out to his friend and colleague, who is not a Christian, that unless he is willing to stand upon the Christian story with respect to the world which has been redeemed through Christ, there is nothing but failure for him. Scientific effort is utterly unintelligible unless it is frankly based upon the order placed in the universe of created facts by Christ the Redeemer. . . To those who are committed to the position which interprets man in terms of a supposedly intelligent procedure not based on biblical principles ... the answer to this must be that the procedure of science and the procedure of philosophy cannot be shown to be intelligible unless they are carried on, on the presupposition of the God who speaks to man in Scripture." [Protestant Doctrine of Scripture, 6,39.]

Given the presuppositions of autonomous reasoning, it is not hard to see why this is the case. In the first place, the "knower" is no different than anything else in his environment; he is not distinguished by a "mind" that has the self-consciousness and freedom to search for the truth, evaluate options, and make intellectual commitments, for man has nothing more than a physical brain, which- like every other natural object is determined by chemistry, biology, and physics. The "thinking" of this product of chance cannot warrant the notion of universals, necessity, causal connections, or moral prescriptions. In the second place, the "facts" that man encounters are likewise random and unconnected in any way that would justify categorization, laws or predictability. The "standards" of logic or reasoning cannot be taken as objective or justified as to their universality - or even applicability to the world of contingent material facts which is so different from them in character. The apologist must be honest in pointing out how philosophically pathetic this "total picture" really is, rather than flattering it by adopting such assumptions as a springboard for proving the completely contrary viewpoint of Christianity. Van Til delighted in describing the absurdity of what autonomous philosophy ends up with; for instance: "If you have a bottomless sea of Chance, and if you, as an individual, are but a bit of chance, by chance distinguished from other bits of chance, and if the law of contradiction has by chance grown within you, the imposition of this law on your environment is, granted it could take place, a perfectly futile activity." [Case for Calvinism, 141-42]

The would-be autonomous man begins by taking for granted that he and God would have to be on a par when it comes to interpreting the world knowing anything or making moral judgments but this

"monistic assumption" (which denies the significance of the Creator/creature distinction for epistemology and ethics) results in the destruction of the intelligibility of reasoning, science, and ethics. Therefore, as Van Til maintained, Scripture does not grant that the unregenerate man has any right to judge anything whatsoever, consistently "denying that man, when acting on his adopted monistic assumption, has any ability or right to judge of what is true or false, right or wrong." [Introduction to Systematic Theology, 29]

How can any sense, then, be made of the claims and argumentation to which the unbeliever has appealed in his case against God or the gospel? His reasoning against Christianity could only be intelligible if what he were trying to disprove were instead true. This is the strongest form of argument in favor of the Christian worldview: it must be secretly presupposed even in the attempt to argue against it. The most compact and dramatic way of summarizing Van Til's apologetic that I have seen (or can imagine) is simply these three words: "Antitheism presupposes theism." Van Til immediately explained: "One must stand upon the solid ground of theism to be an effective antitheist. This demonstrates the Christian worldview to be true from the impossibility of the contrary. Or, as Van Til succinctly expressed it elsewhere: "The only 'proof' of the Christian position is that unless its truth is presupposed there is no possibility of 'proving' anything at all," [My Credo, 1971, pg 21.]

Does this mean that for Van Til unbelievers know nothing whatsoever and cannot make any useful contribution to culture? Not at all. It means that the would-be autonomous man can never give an intelligible, coherent, or meaningful account of how he is able to know anything or accomplish anything culturally. The unbeliever's failure is a rational or philosophical failure to make sense out of knowledge, morality, beauty, etc. But because the unbeliever is not actually what he thinks he is - and the world is not what he takes it to be - he can within God's world, as a creature made in God's image, make intellectual and cultural progress. Van Til held that "as for the cultural products of those who are not Christians, we would follow Calvin in ascribing this to the common grace of God that works in them True, the natural man is not blind in every sense. True, he is not as bad as he could be and as he will one day be. Modern science, so far as it has been carried on by those who are not Christians, has made marvelous discoveries of the true state of affairs in the phenomenal world. But the whole point is that unless it were for the common grace of God there would be no discovery of any truth and no practice of any goodness among those who are not born again." Even the achievements of the non-Christian contribute to the Christian's apologetic, therefore, since such things would be unintelligible apart from the explanation of them which the Christian worldview can offer.

This indicates that the unbeliever has actually been working and thinking in terms of two conflicting worldviews - one which he openly professes and which is autonomous in character, and another which he does not wish to acknowledge, but which makes it possible to make sense out of language, math, science, history, logic, and everything else in his experience and reasoning. Accordingly, Van Til taught that when we defend the faith, our appeal is made to the unbeliever's suppressed knowledge of God, not to the professed presupposition or point of reference that the unbeliever advocates. The apologist must recognize, as Scripture teaches, that the natural man sins "against his better knowledge." In his heart of hearts, he is aware that what the Christian proclaims and defends is the truth of God. Why is it that we as believers acknowledge this truth and submit to the authority of the Savior, while others resist admitting the truth and giving their lives over to Him? It cannot be because we are better or wiser than others, according to Van Til; rather, "we shall, of course, remember that all that we have received has been by grace..., [in which case we] ought to be the humblest of all men." [Common Grace and the Gospel, 129.] Van Til's approach to defending the faith was, therefore, an intriguing combination of the strongest and most aggressive attack upon the intellectual foundations of the unbeliever's reasoning and at the same time an exhibition and gracious acknowledgment of the believer's own grateful dependence upon God for everything he enjoys from the hope of eternal life to the philosophical ability to make sense out of human experience. "Christians can bear witness of this God only if they humbly but boldly make the claim that only on the presupposition of the existence of this God and of the universe in all its aspects interpretive as the revelation of this God, is there any footing and verge for the interpretive efforts of man."

Confronting the Worldview of Unbelievers

Greg Bahnsen commenting on

Van Til's book,

Why I Believe in God

Pgs 138-143 of Bahnsen's book, Van Til's Apologetic

Code545

"Proofs of God and evidences for Christianity can always be countered by the unbeliever's controlling presuppositions or worldview. That is why the presuppositional approach to apologetics teaches us to be prepared to argue with and refute the underlying philosophy that the unbeliever uses to evade the force of the evidences and proofs." Footnote 127, Greg Bahnsen, p136

If I have offended you it has been because I dare not, even in the interest of winning you, offend my God. And if I have not offended you I have not spoken of my God.¹²⁹ For what you have really done in your handling of the evidence for belief in God, is to set yourself up as God. You have made the reach of your intellect, the standard of what is possible or not possible. You have thereby virtually determined that you intend never to meet a fact that points to God. Facts, to be facts at all - facts, that is, with decent scientific and philosophic standing - must have your stamp instead of that of God upon them as their virtual creator.

Of course I realize full well that you do not pretend to create redwood trees and elephants. But you do virtually assert that redwood trees and elephants cannot be created by God. You have heard of the man who never wanted to see or be a purple cow. Well, you have virtually determined that you never will see or be a created fact. With Sir Arthur Eddington you say as it were, "What my net can't catch isn't fish."

Nor do I pretend, of course, that once you have been brought face to face with this condition, you can change your attitude. No more than the Ethiopian can change his skin or the leopard his spots can you change your attitude You have cemented your colored glasses to your face so firmly that you cannot even take them off when you sleep.¹³⁰ Freud has not even had a glimpse of the sinfulness of sin as it controls the human heart. Only the great Physician through His blood atonement on the Cross and by the gift of His Spirit can take those colored glasses off and make you see facts as they are, facts as evidence, as inherently compelling evidence, for the existence of God.¹³¹

¹³⁰ Van Til constantly reminded unbelievers that they were not at all religiously neutral, as they may have thought of themselves. However, the "prejudice" that the unbeliever brings to all experience is so pervasive that he never sees anything differently enough to recognize that he is actually prejudging everything about the facts and reasoning.

¹³¹ The worldview that the Christian sets before the unbeliever cannot be reduced (in something like a deistic manner) to those aspects which make an understanding- of natural experience possible. Because of man's sin and suppression of God's revelation (which is necessary to making experience intelligible), there must be within an adequate worldview some provision of his salvation from guilt and pollution. The redemptive features of the Christian worldview are thus – in man's current fallen situation – not simply an appendix to the rational, scientific, and moral necessity of the Christian's outlook but at its very heart. Man needs to be "saved," according to Van Til, to make an intelligible use of reason.

It ought to be pretty plain now what sort of God I believe in.¹³² It is God, the All-Conditioner. It is the God who created all things, who by His providence conditioned my youth, making me believe in Him, and who in my later life by His grace still makes me want to believe in Him. It is the God who also controlled your youth and so far has apparently not given you His grace that you might believe in Him,

You may reply to this: "Then what's the use of arguing and reasoning with me?" Well, there is a great deal of use in it. You see, if you are really a creature of God, you are always accessible to Him. When Lazarus was in the tomb he was still accessible to Christ who called him back to life. It is this on which true preachers depend. The prodigal thought he had clean escaped from the father's influence. In reality the father controlled the "far country" to which the prodigal had gone. So it is in reasoning.

True reasoning about God is such as stands upon God as upon the emplacement that alone gives meaning to any sort of human argument.¹³³ And such reasoning, we have a right to expect, will be used of God to break down the one-horse chaise of human autonomy.

But now I see you want to go home. And I do not blame you; the last bus leaves at twelve. I should like to talk again another time. I invite you to come to dinner next Sunday. But I have pricked your bubble, so perhaps you will not come back. And yet perhaps you will. That depends upon the Father's pleasure.

Deep down in your heart you know very well that what I have said about you is true.¹³⁴ You know there is no unity in your life. You want no God who by His counsel provides for the unity you need.

¹³³ This is the heart of Van Til's transcendental argument for God's existence. All argumentation involves presuppositions but only the presupposition of the Christian God renders any kind of argument meaningful. In that case, the unbeliever's argument against God or the gospel, if it can make any sense whatsoever, already "stands upon the emplacement" of belief in God's existence. Rational argumentation already assumes the Christian position to be true, even when unbelievers argue against that truth.

¹³⁴ Presuppositional apologetics does not hesitate to point to the unbeliever's inward recognition of the truth of the Christian claims, even though the unbeliever may not be willing to admit to that conviction. He does, after all suppress the truth in unrighteousness. In particular at this point, Van Til presses upon the unbeliever that he is quite cognizant that his professed presuppositions do not provide an intelligible basis for unity in his experience (causal connections between events, conceptual continuity, logical necessity, moral absolutes, etc.). On the other hand, the unbeliever knows that his rejection of the Christian outlook is a matter of personal choice and desire (he does not "want" the God who can provide the order he needs), not intellectual necessity. The apologist should continue to appeal to the unbeliever's inward awareness of such truths (as well as showing that his reasoning and behavior betray this awareness)

Such a God, you say, would allow for nothing new. So you provide your own unity. But this unity must be by your own definition, not that which is wholly new. Therefore it must stand over against the wholly new and never touch it at all. Thus by your logic you talk about possibles and impossibles, but all this talk is in the air. By your own standards it can never have anything to do with reality. Your logic claims to deal with eternal and changeless matters; and your facts are wholly changing things; and "never the twain shall meet." So you have made nonsense of your own experience.¹³⁵ With the prodigal you are at the swine trough, but it may be that, unlike the prodigal, you will refuse to return to the father's house.

On the other hand, by my belief in God I do have unity in my experience. Not of course the sort of unity that you want.¹³⁶ Not a unity that is the result of my own autonomous determination of what is possible. But a unity that is higher than mine and prior to mine. On the basis of God's counsel I can look for facts and find them without destroying them in advance. On the basis of God's counsel I can be a good physicist, a good biologist, a good psychologist, or a good philosopher. In all these fields I use my powers of logical arrangement in order to see as much order in God's universe as it may be given a creature to see. The unities, or systems that I make are true because genuine pointers toward the basic or original unity that is found in the counsel of God.

Looking about me I see both order and disorder in every dimension of life.¹³⁷ But I look at both of them in the light of the Great Orderer who is back of them.¹³⁸ I need not deny either of them in the interest of optimism or in the interest of pessimism. I see the strong men of biology searching diligently through hill and dale to prove that the creation doctrine is not true with respect to the human body, only to return and admit that the missing link is missing still. I see the strong men of psychology search deep and far into the sub-consciousness, child and animal consciousness, in order to prove that the creation and providence doctrines are not true with respect to the human soul only to return and admit that the gulf between human and animal intelligence is as great as ever. I see the strong men of logic and scientific methodology search deep into the transcendental for a validity that will not be swept away by the ever-changing tide of the wholly new, only to return and say that they can find no bridge from logic to reality, or from reality to logic. And yet I find all these, though standing on their heads, reporting much that is true.¹³⁹ I need only to turn their reports right side up, making God instead of man the center of it all, and I have a marvellous display of the facts as God has intended me to see them.

¹³⁸ By contrast, all unbelieving worldviews look at unity and diversity in terms of a fundamental "disorder" behind everything: there is no plan, purpose, or sovereign control that orders events, provides universality for laws, or coordinates mind (logic) and its objects (reality).

¹³⁹ Van Til consistently held that unbelievers are not mindless, ignorant, and useless in understanding the world that God has made. However, their professed "point of reference" (their presuppositions or perspective) is skewed. They need to be "turned around" (converted).

And if my unity¹⁴⁰ is comprehensive enough to include the efforts of those who reject it, it is large enough even to include that which those who have been set upright by regeneration cannot see. My unity is that of a child who walks with its father through the woods. The child is not afraid because its father knows it all and is capable of handling every situation. So I readily grant that there are some "difficulties" with respect to belief in God and His revelation in nature and Scripture that I cannot solve. In fact there is mystery in every relationship with respect to every fact that faces me, for the reason that all facts have their final explanation in God, whose thoughts are higher than my thoughts, and whose ways are higher than my ways. And it is exactly that sort of God that I need. Without such a God, without the God of the Bible the God of authority, the God who is self-contained and therefore incomprehensible to men, there would be no reason in anything.¹⁴¹ No human being can explain in the sense of seeing through all things, but only he who believes in God has the right to hold that there is an explanation at all.¹⁴²

So you see when I was young I was conditioned on every side; I could not help believing in God. Now that I am older I still cannot help believing in God I believe in God now because unless I have Him as the All-Conditioner, life is chaos.¹⁴³

¹⁴⁰ By "my unity" Van Til meant his Christian conception of what gives unity to life and reasoning. It is important to see that the Christian worldview does not simply claim to explain its own perspective (seeing things in a Christian way), but also accounts for the non-Christian's perspective (why he sees things the way he claims to see them). We do not end up with a plurality of "unities" (worldviews that unify experience) competing with each other, as though there were a number of equally self-satisfactory presuppositions. There is one worldview that truly provides unity (and includes an explanation of the competing claims of unbelievers) and a variety of professed worldviews that reduce to disunity (disorder, chance, chaos, etc.).

¹⁴¹ Thus, everyone must choose between two kinds of mystery at the center of their reasoning endeavors. The Christian accepts what is mysterious to him as a man, a revelation that transcends his reasoning, but knows that it is not mysterious to his Creator, whereas the non-Christian accepts an ultimate mystery that is devoid of explanation or meaning.

¹⁴² As the apologetical argument begins, it might appear that the question has to do with which "side" can offer a better explanation of the way things are. In reality, said Van Til, it comes down to whether unbelieving worldviews can, in terms of what they maintain, offer any genuine explanation at all. Using logic and inductive reasoning in order to explain things is futile if there is no explanation for the uniformity of nature (induction) or universal validity of reasoning (logic) themselves.

¹⁴³ Van Til has turned the unbeliever's criticism (namely, that Christians simply cannot help believing) into a commendation of the Christian worldview. Of course, the reason we "cannot help" believing is no longer, if it ever was, due (as the unbeliever thought) to psychological and social conditions, but due to the sovereignty of God, who "gives order" to everything by His controlling plan and purpose. This too might seem to be a basis for objection from the unbeliever (confusing it with fatalism and the denial of human responsibility). Instead, Van Til shows that this worldview alone - where God conditions all things - rescues life and reasoning from chaos (meaninglessness). Because God orders every detail of life and history, there is an objective basis for people to reason about causes, logical necessity, moral absolutes, etc. As a child, perhaps, the believer like Van Til could not help believing, but now, as a grown-up, and from the standpoint of what is necessary to reason about anything, the believer still "cannot help" believing.

I shall not convert you at the end of my argument. I think the argument is sound. I hold that belief in God is not merely as reasonable as other belief, or even a little or infinitely more probably true than other belief; I hold rather that unless you believe in God you can logically believe in nothing else. But since believe in such a God, a God who has conditioned you as well as me, know that you can to your own satisfaction, by the help of the biologists, the psychologists, the logicians, and the Bible critics reduce everything I have said this afternoon and evening to the circular meanderings of a hopeless authoritarian. Well, my meanderings have, to be sure, been circular; they have made everything turn on God. So now I shall leave you with Him, and with His mercy.¹⁴⁴

⁴⁴ This excellent closing paragraph sets forth salient points in Van Til's presuppositional apologetic. (1) The Christian worldview is not presented simply as a viewpoint that explains the facts somewhat better than others; rather, it is - objectively speaking - the only perspective that makes reasonable sense of believing or judging anything. (2) Nevertheless, the unbeliever will follow any number of lines of thought in order to rationalize - to his own subjective satisfaction - his refusal to submit to the Christian God. (3) In the end, everyone must choose an ultimate authority and then regiment his reasoning in terms of it ("circularly"): the Christian looks to God to make sense of things (cf. #1), while the non-Christian looks to himself (cf. #2). (4) Apologists must recognize that the subjective change of the unbeliever, his conversion, cannot be achieved by the power of our argument alone, but depends on the sovereign mercy of God. [all key points!] (5) At the end of our discussions with them, unbelievers should be left with a clear picture of the true nature of the disagreement and with a sense that they must deal with God over it, not merely with their human opponent. This is objectively true, whether they wish subjectively to acknowledge it or not. If God is merciful, they will be saved not only for eternal life, but also in their reasoning.
